† The exact word here is only found in the New Testament in this place, but it is only an intensive form of that used in Acts xv. 22, "leading men" and in Heb. xiii. 7, 17, 20, "leaders," which the common version translates "those that have the rule."

2 (13-33): Characterization for judgment. a (13-22): as to light. 1 (13): rebellion against the Kingdom. 2 (15): eager proselytism to worse evil.

leader, Christ. But the *j*greater of you shall be your servant. And whosoever shall *k*exalt himself shall be humbled; and whosoever shall humble himself shall be exalted.

2. a[1] But woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! because ye *l*shut up the kingdom of heaven before men: for ye neither enter yourselves, nor suffer those that are entering to enter.*

[2] Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites!

j ch. 20. 26, 27.
k Lk. 14. 11. Lk. 18. 14.
l Lk. 11. 52. cf. 1 Thess. 2. 16. cf. Ezek. 34. 18.

* Verse 14 is omitted by the editors.

of an open heaven, which He so lately Himself has opened to them, and again He repeats: "The greater of you shall be your servant." In service—in the ability to serve—true greatness is. And if the spirit of service be love, and love be the spirit of heaven, then it must be—there can be no avoidance of so plain a fact—that "whosoever shall exalt himself among you shall be humbled; and whosoever shall humble himself shall be exalted."

2. The Lord turns now and addresses personally the leaders of the people, smiting them with a sevenfold perfect "woe," because of their condition which He reveals in successive flashes of awful wrath. Yet no mere outburst of passionate emotion is it that manifests itself in these burning words. They are measured utterances in which the truth of divine judgment is as plain as its reality. And even in form, as they are sealed with the number of perfection, which is at the same time the stamp of an oath,* so this seven is in its structure, like that of the creative days, a 3. 3. 1, beginning indeed with the "light," which is in these "blind guides" but darkness, in the first three woes; in the second three, stigmatizing their duplicity—their double life; while the final one, which has the characters of both preceding sections, brands them as the true children of those who slew the prophets, however much (now that these were dead) they might build their sepulcres.

a[1] The first "woe" deals with their opposition to the Kingdom of heaven; which they shut up in the face of men, themselves neither entering in, nor (as far as lay in them) suffering others to enter. As it is put in Luke, they had "taken away the key of knowledge." With their legal and traditional teachings they had barred man's approach to the only place of blessing in subjection to the glorious King in whom the Kingdom was presented to them, so that the outcasts of Israel, the "tax-gatherers and harlots," went into it more easily than they.

Thus they had not the light, and had refused the light: for if "light had come into the world," it is necessarily self-manifesting, as well as that which manifests other things; and men who refuse it do so, not because of insufficient evidence, but because they "love darkness rather than light." And such were the leaders of Israel: here is their condition written upon their forehead.

[2] But while they had taken away the key of real knowledge, it was in perfect accord with this that they should be zealots of their own false knowledge, and eager to gain proselytes to it. Perfectly accordant, too, it was that they should, in the condition in which they were, have proselytes that would go beyond themselves. Calling the light darkness they naturally called the darkness light, and as light would propagate it. The second woe, therefore, follows the first in easily intelligible order.†

* "To swear" is in Hebrew to "use or name seven (victims or witnesses) as to oneself, i. e. to bind oneself by an attested oath." (Davies' Heb. Lexicon.) Compare Gen. xxi. 28. Beersheba is thus the "well of seven" or "of the oath."

† The omission of the fourteenth verse here is justified as well by its character as by the textual evidence; for in this place it would not suit, however characteristic of the leaders it might be, and was. It is found in Mark and Luke.

because ye [m]compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is become [such] ye make him two-fold more a son of hell than yourselves.

3 (16-22): perversion as to holy things.

[3] Woe unto you, ye [n]blind guides, who say, Whosoever shall swear by the temple, it is nothing, but whosoever shall swear by the gold of the temple, he is debtor! Ye fools and blind, for which is greater, the gold, or the temple that sanctifieth the gold? And, Whosoever shall swear by the altar, it is nothing, but whosoever shall swear by the gift that is upon it, he is debtor. Ye blind, for whether is greater the gift or the [o]altar that sanctifieth the gift? He therefore that sweareth by the altar sweareth by it and by all things that are upon it. And he that sweareth by the temple sweareth by it and by him who dwelleth therein. And he that sweareth by heaven sweareth by the throne of God and by him who sitteth upon it.

b (23-28): their duplicity.

b[1] Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay [p]tithes of mint and anise and cummin, and have left out the [q]weightier matters of the law, judgment and mercy and faith: these ought ye to have done and not have left out the other. Ye blind guides, that [r]strain out the gnat and drink down the camel.

1 (23, 24): with profession of whole hearted obedience.

2 (25, 26): lusts within.

[2] Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye cleanse the [s]outside of the cup and of the dish, but within they are full of rapine and indulgence. Thou blind Pharisee, cleanse first the inside of the cup and dish, that the outside may become clean also.

3 (27, 28): corruption of death Godward.

[3] Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are like [t]whitened sepulcres, which indeed appear beautiful outwardly, but within are full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness. Even so do ye outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and lawlessness.

m Acts 2.10. cf. Lk.3.49. *cfr.*1 Cor.3. 4, 5.

n ch. 15. 14. Is. 9. 16. Mal. 2. 8.

o ch.5.33-37. *cf.*Ex.29.37.

p cf. Lk. 18. 12. Lk. 11. 42.

q 1 Sa.15.22. Prov. 21. 3. Hos. 6. 6. Mi. 6. 6-8.

r cf. Jno.18. 28. Lev. 11. 20, 23, 41. Lev. 11. 4.

s Mk.7.4,8,9. Lk. 11. 39, 40. Ps. 51. 6.

t Lk. 11. 44. cf. Ps. 5. 9. cf. Acts 23. 3. cf. Phil. 3. 4-6 with 1 Tim.1.15.

[3] The third woe again shows how the light in them was darkened by their inversion of true proportion as to the holy things. With them the gold of the temple was more highly estimated than the temple itself, and the gift than the altar that sanctified it. And then this casuistry was used to teach men how they could swear vain oaths and be excused responsibility—a responsibility which the Lord affirms in every case.

b[1] The three following woes are plainly different from the preceding ones. They show us the double life of these Jewish leaders. In the first case, the profession of absolute integrity could hardly be more complete than in paying tithes of the very mint and anise and cummin, the least product of their fields; yet on another side there was an absolute deficiency in that which should have been rendered. The moral elements, the weightier matters of the law, were just with them the things that had no weight. They strained carefully out the gnat in such things, but they swallowed easily the camel!

[2] Then the cup and dish they cleansed on the outside; within they could keep them full of rapine and indulgence. With a correct outside the lusts within were retained and sanctioned.

[3] The third woe speaks of spiritual death within, with a good looking exterior

c (29-36): memorializing the prophets; whose return would manifest the reality of things.

c Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye [u] build the sepulcres of the prophets, and adorn the tombs of the just, and say, If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets. So that ye bear witness to yourselves that ye are the [v] sons of those that killed the prophets. Fill ye up also your fathers' measure. Ye serpents, [w] brood of vipers, how shall ye escape the judgment of hell? Wherefore behold, I send unto you prophets and wise men and scribes; and some of them ye shall [x] kill and crucify, and some of them ye shall scourge in your synagogues, and persecute from city to city; that upon you may come [y] all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous [z] Abel to the blood of [a] Zacharias son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar. Verily I say unto you, all these things shall come upon this generation.

3 (37-39): The wings that would have compassed, and the house left till their return to God.

3. [b] O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, that killeth the prophets and stoneth them that are sent unto her! how often u Lk. 11.47, 48. cp. Dan. 9. 5-8.

v Acts 7. 51, 52.
w ch. 3. 7. ch. 12. 34.
x cf. Jno. 16. 2. cf. Acts 5. 40. cf. Acts 7. 54-60.
y cf. Rev. 18. 24.
z Gen. 4. 8-10.
a cf. Zech. 1. 1. cf. 2 Chron. 24. 20-22.
b Lk. 13. 34, 35. cf. Lk. 19. 41, 42.

only, like a whitened sepulcre. This is the most inward aspect of the evil, but it presents the same duplicity as those preceding it.

c In the next and last case, there is a return to the beginning. The opposition to God with which this characterization began is here as real as there; yet it is covered with a veil which might hide it, not only from others but from themselves. The dead prophets they memorialized and honored—built sepulcres to the men their fathers killed. And this honor to the dead might well save them from all identification with the men that killed them, though these might unfortunately be their fathers. Alas, their present opposition to the Kingdom of God showed how much value was to be attached to such a profession of regard for men who lay quietly in their graves and never troubled them. They were witnesses themselves that they were children of those who slew the prophets. Let them fill up then the measure of their fathers: fill it up and more they would, as already He had shown them, for these with whom He was now face to face would be His betrayers and murderers.

And He would send them prophets and wise men and scribes, and the old history would be repeated. With the long record of ages before them, and that history of their forefathers preaching to them of God's controversy with them for their sins, they would renew and consummate it in their own persons, making themselves heirs of all that long reign of unbelief and evil, of the blood-shedding crying out to God from Abel to Zechariah slain between the temple and the altar, in the very face of God Himself. If this were the Zechariah the prophet, of the returned remnant,* how the guilt of Israel is emphasized in this! and "which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted?" are Stephen's words to them at a later time. Upon this generation was to come the recompense of that long wearing out of the saints of God.

3. But here the pent-up love in the heart of Christ breaks out in a lament over the city which had rejected Him. City as it was of murderous hatred

* There seems no good reason for supposing any other than Zechariah the prophet to be meant, though Zechariah the son of Jehoiada is generally taken to be. But this leaves the "son of Barachias" to be accounted for, when the "son of Jehoiada" also would have better reminded them of the history. It seems also too far back (in Joash's time) for the Lord's purpose, when summing up the guilt of the people.

As to Zechariah the prophet, he was son of Berachiah, and grandson of Iddo, and "the Jewish Targum states that Zechariah the son of Iddo, a prophet and priest, was slain in the sanctuary" (See "The Irrationalism of Infidelity," by J. N. Darby, pp. 150-159).

would I have [c]gathered thy children together, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye [d]would not. Behold, [e]your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, ye shall in no wise see me henceforth, [f]until ye shall say, Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord.

[c] cf. ch. 11. 28-30. cf. Deut. 32. 28, 29.
[d] cf. Jno. 5. 40.
[e] ctr. ch. 21. 13.
[f] Ps. 118. 26.

against those sent to it of God, how often would He have gathered her children together, as the hen gathers her brood under her wings! but they would not. Now their house—which He could no longer call His Father's—was left to them as they would have it; but to real desolation. Nor would they see Him henceforth, according to the blessing which those rejected prophets had prophesied should yet be theirs, until, with hearts disciplined with sorrow, and in judgment made to learn the righteousness which alone could be the preparation for it, they should be enabled from their heart to say, "Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord."

Div. 6.

We now enter upon the consideration of a most interesting and important group of prophecies, the importance of which is seen by the place it occupies in all three of the synoptic Gospels. Matthew, as we might expect from its character, gives it most fully; the others in an abridged form, and with certain differences which will claim special consideration when (if the Lord will) we take up those gospels. They treat as a whole of the "end of the age," of the coming of the Lord, therefore, which closes it, and this in its relation to the three classes of which Scripture speaks, "the Jew, the Gentile, and the Church of God." Mark and Luke omit what relates to the last two. Matthew does not give them in this order, but what relates to the Church comes parenthetically, and in parabolic form, between the others.

This mode of presentation, and still more some of the detail, show us, all through, Israel as the central figure upon earth, and giving character to the presentation. The Israelitish part comes first (xxiv. 1–42); that referring to the Church is in veiled speech, and as an appendix to it, and here, if Christians are seen as virgins going forth to meet the Bridegroom, the Bridegroom Himself is Israel's,—the virgins and the bride are not the same, (though the Church stands in this relationship in a higher, a heavenly sphere)—and in the final judgment-scene again, the "brethren" of the King are Jewish. These things must be more fully considered when we come to them, but it is of primary importance to interpretation to make such distinctions. Through lack of it confusion has been introduced where every thing is simple, and along with this, the so called "spiritualizing" process has combined to deprive the Lord's people of much that would, by its extensive connection with other prophecies both in the Old Testament and New, have opened up the mind of God as to the future in a way that otherwise, perhaps, could hardly be attained. Much else, also, besides prophecy, is certain to be obscure where this is. Scripture is so united with scripture, and truth with truth, that no part can be disarranged without disordering the rest. On the other hand, thank God, no truth can be made clear without helping to clear other truth, if followed to its results; and the clue thus put into our hands by God is of priceless value for those that desire to walk amid divinely given certainties rather than by any light of merely human kindling.

For this reason it cannot be strange if we seek to look closely into the meaning of that which is before us here, and examine also some at least of the various interpretations put upon it, with such care as may be needful to form a positive judgment of what the truth is that is taught us in it. We need not merely probable but positive truth. Probable truth may be positive error. We need in Scripture to be able to say, "we know," although to many this may be what

DIVISION 6. (Chaps. xxiv., xxv.)

The Putting down of Evil at the Consummation of the Age.

SUBDIVISION 1. (Chap. xxiv. 1-44.)

Christ's coming in relation to the elect people (Israel).

1 (1-14): The beginning of birth-pains. 1 (1-3): the knowledge sought.

1. [1] AND Jesus [g] went out and departed from the temple: and his disciples came to him to point out to him the [h] buildings of the temple. But he answered and

g cf. ch. 21. 17.

h Mk. 13. 1, 2. Lk. 21. 5, 6.

they stamp as dogmatism merely. Scripture can mean nothing less than this when it proclaims to us a "full assurance of understanding" also, as well as "of faith," and "hope."

SUBD. 1.

It is of first importance then to realize that, in all this first part of the prophecy, it is Israel, or a company of Israelitish disciples, with which we have to do. The twelve were as yet fully that, although the Church or assembly had been spoken of to them. But the foremost among them, and to whom the Lord had especially addressed Himself, needed, as we know, long afterward, to have a special vision to make him go to a Gentile, and the question in which they all unite when with the Saviour after His resurrection, and in the fulness of hope induced by it, is yet, "Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore the Kingdom to Israel?" Certainly then, of the Church, as Paul spoke of it, they could have as yet no conception; of what we call commonly the Christian dispensation they could have had no expectation; if we are reminded of the parables of the thirteenth chapter, what they had gathered from them we know not; but we know that they had not realized as yet the truth of the Lord's death and resurrection which He had in the plainest way and at various times declared, and yet these were fundamental to all the rest.

It is not meant by this to limit what He might now declare, for to suppose this would be in contradiction to what has been already said. He spoke of much that would only open up as they went on, and which even the gift of the Spirit did not at once make plain. This the book of Acts fully shows, with much else. It does not therefore limit the Lord's communications, although we know that there were things of which He could not as yet even speak; but we shall shortly find that it does affect important points in what is now before us, as for instance in regard to that coming of the Lord and that "consummation of the age," of which they question Him.

It is plain, then, that they were Jews not only in fact but in spirit, these disciples of the Lord. The questions they ask must be apprehended from this point of view, and no other; and this will help us to understand the parabolic way in which (even to them) the Christian portion of His answer is introduced. I do not forget that its being Christian even has on the other side been denied by some for whom the Jewish character of much has overshadowed the rest. All this shows how little we can afford to take anything for granted here, and the care with which we must examine things which for the mass of readers even may be undoubted.

1. [1] Let us now take up the question of the disciples which the Lord answers in the chapter before us. He has left finally the temple, as no longer the Father's house. Israel had made it but a robbers' den; and that not merely the traffickers whom He had so easily driven out, but much more the people as a whole, who had refused not only the messengers from time to time sent to them by God, but now the Son of His love, the Witness not of His righteousness alone but of His grace. The vineyard should be their own; and for that they were ready to kill the Heir of it. He could only therefore leave them to their choice, though with His heart wrung at the thought of all that this meant of necessity for them.

said unto them, See ye not all these things? Verily I say unto you, 'There shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down. And [f] Lk. 19. 44. cf. 1 Ki. 9. 8. cf. Ps. 79. 1. cf. Is. 64. 11.

But His disciples are held by other and very different thoughts. Herod's magnificent temple, not even yet complete, though now nearly fifty years building, and growing thus continually under their eyes, the glory of Israel, spite of the murderous hands that built it—the temple drew them yet. "What manner of stones and what buildings are here!" they urge, as if in intercession for that house which He was leaving desolate. But He answers at once, "See ye not all these things? Verily I say unto you, There shall not be left here one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down." For Herod's temple as such there can be no regret, with one who looks on more than the outside.

But it seems to linger yet in their hearts; and on the Mount of Olives, as He sits with the city over against Him, they come to Him to ask when these things shall be; and they add two other questions which in their minds were no doubt practically one,—"what shall be the sign of Thy coming, and of the consummation of the age?*"

The "age," in their thoughts, as already said, could not be any Christian age, of which they had no idea; it was the age in which they lived, and which was for the Jew the age of law. There would follow it the "days of Messiah," and the coming of Messiah would bring them in. There was no interval thought of as taking place between the two, and certainly for the disciples here, no considerable time to elapse before He would return to Jerusalem, and take the Kingdom now denied Him. That time the Lord shows them to be longer than they imagined, though still leaving it largely indefinite, and certainly not interposing a Christian or Gentile age between that present one and His coming to set up the Kingdom, rather making it a protraction of the Jewish "age" itself. The gospel of the Kingdom is indeed to be preached in all the earth for a witness, and "then shall the end come"—the end of that age about which they had inquired. There is no hint as yet of any Christian one.

It was this, doubtless, which helped to confuse the old interpreters. They could see that there was no sign of Christian times before it, and that the end of which the Lord speaks, with the abomination of desolation standing in the holy place had to do with Israel—"them that were in Judea." They naturally connected this with the question, "when shall these things"—the destruction of the temple and what was connected with it—"be?" There seemed indeed no other answer to it than this. Consequently the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus was intended to be pictured—Daniel certainly had spoken of this (chap. ix. 26); but as a consequence also the coming of the Son of man immediately following must be providential merely. Thus the interpretation was complete.

A reference to the same prophecy as given by Luke (chap. xxi.) would seem to confirm this: for here certainly Jerusalem is spoken of as compassed with armies, the Jews led captive and dispersed among the nations, and Jerusalem trodden down of the Gentiles till the times of the Gentiles should be fulfilled. No one questions, or could question, that here is its sack by Titus; and here is the same warning to flee to the mountains, as given in Matthew. The interpretation seems thus fully confirmed.

For the disciples indeed such a coming of the Son of man could in no wise be what they expected or desired. It was no restoration of the Kingdom to Israel; nothing, indeed, but vengeance upon her; no fulfilment of hopes, such as the Old Testament prophets had inspired, of that blessing for the earth even, which was in them always connected with the restoration and exaltation of Israel. Rather would it be the complete setting aside of this. The coming of the Son of man also in Daniel is always to receive a Kingdom, displacing all the kingdoms of the world; and that, not by a slow, leavening process, which would be

* It is not kosmos here, the physical world, but aion, "age," a marked off period of time.

[j] as he sat upon the mount of Olives, his disciples came to him privately, saying, Tell us, [k] when shall these transformation instead of displacement, but by a sudden blow as of a stone falling from heaven upon the feet of the world-colossus, overthrowing and shattering it as in a moment. How great the contrast between the Son of man shattering the Gentile powers and bringing Israel into blessing and supremacy, and the appearing of the Son of man here to put Jerusalem under the iron heel of the Gentiles!

[j] Mk. 13. 3-37. Lk. 21. 7-37.
[k] cf. Lk. 17. 20-37.

Yet the Son of man appearing in the clouds of heaven seems in manifest connection with Daniel (vii. 13, 14), as the abomination of desolation is in our Lord's reference. Moreover, this coming itself, in the clouds of heaven, and with the angels, reads little like a mere providential judgment. Instead of its being to destroy Jerusalem, it is spoken of as coming after it, and separate, therefore, from it. Nay, in Luke, where alone the treading down is spoken of, this goes on until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled, and then come the signs in the heavens, and soon the Son of man.

In Matthew, when He comes, He sends His angels to "gather His elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other," and this might be thought to refer to the day of judgment, by one holding the common views, but could not in any sense apply to the long past judgment upon Jerusalem. Rather is it, if in connection with Daniel, the exact opposite of Israel's dispersion completed under Titus; it is the regathering of the elect nation under the "wings" that would so willingly have long since been spread over them. And this connects with the judgment of the Gentile nations, "when the Son of man shall come in His glory, and all the holy angels with Him, and then shall sit upon the throne of His glory." Then shall "all the nations be gathered before Him, and He shall separate them one from another, as the shepherd separateth the sheep from the goats" (chap. xxv. 31, 32). By no fair inference can this be disconnected from the coming of the Son of man in the earlier part of the same prophecy, to which it self-evidently indeed refers. Nothing but the necessity of an unscriptural theory could have disjoined them from one another.

Thus the coming of the Son of man is most clearly future, a personal coming to set up that kingdom over the earth, for which the disciples rightly looked. But this being established, another result follows,—that the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, as given in Luke, must be distinguished widely from what we find in Matthew. The abomination of desolation standing in the holy place is not even connected with the worship of the Roman standards at the taking of the city over eighteen centuries ago: it is a yet future thing, and in close connection with that coming of the Son of man, of which it is the great and conclusive sign.

To see this clearly we have but to keep together in our minds what the Lord so plainly links together here. The abomination of desolation marks the beginning of a tribulation so severe, that, "except those days should be shortened, no flesh should be saved; but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened." It is plain, therefore, that a time so characterized could not stretch over centuries. Scripture has indeed, over and over again, marked the exact length of it; but this we need not now take up: it is evident that it can be but a short time; but then "immediately after the tribulation of those days" come the signs of the Son of man at hand. Thus it must as plainly be yet future, as the destruction of the city in Luke is long past. In Matthew there is no destruction of the city; in Luke no abomination in the holy place: the prophecies are different, although given by the Lord at the same time.

But this gives rise to another question: if that of which Matthew speaks is still in the future, how can it be the end of the Jewish age? Christianity has in fact replaced Judaism for God upon the earth; and, even though Israel has still promises to be fulfilled to her naturally, when the Lord appears, how can there be any recurrence between now and then of any remnant of the Jewish age?

things be? and what shall be the sign of thy [l]coming, and of the [m]consummation of the age?

[l] ver. 30. cf. 2 Pet. 3. 4. [m] ch. 13. 39, 49.

This question can only be answered by turning once more to the Old Testament to which we are referred here—to Daniel: in his prophecy of the seventy weeks, the whole connection of what we have before us is made plain to us.

In the ninth chapter we find Daniel pleading with God for his people Israel, and for the city called by God's name. God in answer sends the angel Gabriel to acquaint him with His purposes. "Seventy weeks" (of years,) he is told, "are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city to finish transgression and to make an end of sins, and to make atonement for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up vision and prophecy, and to anoint the holy of holies." This last expression points definitely to national restoration and blessing, and all that is spoken of here has reference to the same thing. At the end of this 490 years their sins are to be brought to an end, everlasting righteousness brought in for them. As with the prophecy in Matthew, the end of this is plainly not reached yet, however long ago the time began; and the end cannot be before the coming of the Son of man, as the Lord in agreement with Daniel, declares here. Up to that time their deliverance is not reached; and Zechariah shows how it will be effected (xiv. 1-5).

There is again, however, a great difficulty. Four hundred and ninety years from the decree to restore and to build Jerusalem have long run out,—had nearly done so when Christ appeared publicly in Israel, and yet the blessing for them did not come. Nay, that time was some years past, when the Romans, in sharpest contrast with the promise here, destroyed the sanctuary. But all this, let us notice is in the prophecy itself: sixty-nine weeks (483 years) carry us already as far as "Messiah the Prince" (ver. 25), and then He is "cut off and has nothing," as the margin better renders (ver. 26); and after that, "the people of the prince that shall come destroy the city and the sanctuary." So that the prophecy shows us that there would be this seeming contradiction,—Messiah come, but not accomplishing the blessing; cut off, and so having nothing (to us with regard to Israel a thing perfectly plain); and still the prophecy goes on to the "end of the war," as far as which "desolations are determined." Until this therefore the prophecy cannot end.

Accordingly now, just at the close, we hear of the final, seventieth week: "And he shall confirm a [not "the"] covenant with many [properly "the many"] for one week; and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease, and because of the wing of abominations there shall be a desolator"—that is the literal rendering—"even until the consummation, and that determined is poured upon the desolate."

Here plainly is the consummation, and the determined time ends. To the very end the trouble lasts; and that we understand. The "wing of abominations" brings a desolator; so that here is an "abomination of desolation." Sacrifice and oblation being made to cease imply that it has to do with the holy place. Nay, there is a touching link just here with what we have had in Matthew; for the wing of abominations brings the desolation: how impossible to forget here the "wing" of which the Lord has spoken, under which Israel had been so often called to find shelter, and which would have so effectually sheltered them!

Put Daniel's prophecy in this way side by side with what we have in Matthew, and their exact agreement will demonstrate that they are made for one another. We see that the "end of the age" is nothing but this broken-off end of Daniel's seventy weeks. We can trace also its connection with the destruction of the city in Luke, though this latter does not itself come into the period. There is unity, in fact, throughout.

The answer to the first question of the disciples is more fully given in Luke than in Matthew, as is plain. We have only here in the first and introductory 2 (4,5): false Christs.

[2] And Jesus answered and said unto them, See that no one lead you astray. For [n]many shall come in my name, saying, I am the Christ, and shall lead astray many.

3 (6-8): travail-signs.

[3] And ye shall hear of [o]wars and rumors of wars; see that ye be not troubled: for this must needs come to pass, but the end is not yet. For [p]nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom, and there shall be [q]famines [and pestilences *] and [r]earthquakes in divers places; but all these things are the beginning of travail-pains.

4 (9-13): trial and failure.

[4] Then shall they [s]deliver you up to affliction and kill you, and ye shall be [t]hated of all the nations for my name's sake. And then shall many [u]stumble and deliver one another up, and shall hate one another.

n ver. 24. cf. John 5. 43.

o cf. Rev. 6. 2-4.

p cf. Hag. 2. 22.

q cf. Rev. 6. 5, 6.

r cf. Rev. 6. 12.

s cf. ch. 10. 17, 18.

t cf. Rev. 11. 9, 10.

u ch. 10. 21, 22.

* Some omit.

portion of the prophecy the general character of the times, which in some sense would suit the whole period of the Lord's absence. We find nothing however, in this part, necessarily Christian. This comes in afterwards in the appended parables.

[2] The first words of Christ's reply are a warning against the coming of false Christs. It has been said that it cannot be shown that there were any false Christs before the destruction of Jerusalem. But if that cannot be shown, neither can the opposite. There were many antichrists, the apostle John assures us. Among the Jews also leaders of various kinds with various pretensions were continually rising up. Nor are the disciples addressed here individually, but as representatives of others also who should succeed them, and that right down to the time of the end, when the greatest false Christ will appear that the world has ever seen, and when death will be the penalty threatened for resisting his pretensions; but of this it does not need to speak here.

[3] Next the Lord warns of wars and rumors of war, things which have been common enough certainly; as have "famines and pestilences and earthquakes in divers places." He gives them, however, a very significant character, as the beginning of travail-pains: as if nature were pressing on to the birth of a new and better time, and could not rest content or quiet with the present evil. Nor is there anything strained in this, however unintelligent may be the thing which manifests thus its sympathy with the purpose of God: "for we know," says the apostle, "that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now" (Rom. viii. 22). The mind of God cannot but manifest itself through nature, as well as in the movements and convulsions among the nations of the world; and though the specific lessons may have their difficulty, the general one is not hard to read. It is an unrest everywhere which cries for Him who alone has said—who alone could venture to say—"Come unto Me, and I will give you rest." And the cry sounds in His ears, and will find answer.

[4] With all this His people are warned of special trials. The world that crucified their Master will be the same world still. They must look for suffering even to death, the signs of the world's hatred for His name sake, and which will test the reality and measure of loyalty to Him on their part. Many will be stumbled and betray one another. False prophets will find their own in it and be listened to. And the abounding of lawlessness will have its effects even upon the mass in the decline of love. Let them have courage, however, as forewarned. They have but to have patience, and he that endureth to the end shall be saved.

It is manifest that, looking back over the Christian centuries, such things have characterized them throughout. They will end in an apostasy, out of which there will arise the giant forms of evil which will dominate the earth when the Lord shall have gathered His own out of it to Himself in heaven, and a new work of the Spirit shall begin in Israel, in order that the promises to her may be fulfilled. Those who have discerned the structure of the Apocalypse can be at no loss to discern, after the close of the Church's history as depicted in the epistles to the Asiatic churches (ch. ii., iii.), the united company of the redeemed in heaven (chap. iv.), the Lamb now taking the book of the future into His hands, as the Lion of the tribe of Judah; so that Israel nationally comes now upon the scene, as in the sealed ones of the seventh chapter out of all her tribes. And now as soon as the book begins to be opened, the figures that come forth in answer to the cherubic call are again strikingly similar to what we have in the beginning of the great prophecy before us. Under the first seal the symbol is of foreign conquest; then we have civil war; then famine; then pestilence; then there are under the altar the souls of slaughtered saints; then a great earthquake, whether literal or political or both. And then with the seventh seal, the book is fully opened; and those who have skill to read will find the very prophecies of Daniel to which the Lord presently refers us beginning to be fulfilled, and the half-week of unequaled tribulation again and again brought forward in the following chapters (Rev. vii. 14; xi. 2, 3; xii. 6, 14; xiii. 5).

And many [v]false prophets shall arise and shall lead astray many. And because lawlessness shall be multiplied, the love of the many shall grow [w]cold; but he that hath [x]endured to the end, the same shall be saved. [5] And this [y]gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the habitable earth, for a witness unto all the nations; and then shall the end have come.

[5 (14)]: the end and recompense at hand.

[v] cf. Rev. 13. 11 with Rev. 19. 20. [w] cf. 2 Thess. 2. 3, 4. [x] cf. Heb. 10. 37–39. [y] cf. ch. 10. 7, 23. cf. ch. 28. 19, 20.

The closing word of encouragement here also, without denying its applicability to the Lord's people at any time, cannot but be felt to have special reference to this time of trouble, so severe and yet so brief, and with every day of it numbered. They have but to endure for this brief measured time, and deliverance will come for them. How tender a provision for them this numbering of the very days!

[5] And all through it also the testimony of God will go out to the nations. "This gospel of the Kingdom" will be preached, spite of the distress and opposition, "in all the habitable earth for a witness unto all nations." It would not be like God to allow the end to come without warning, and this is especially the character of the gospel then. It is not just what we have as that now, although the gospel of the Kingdom does go out surely now; but if we look at Rev. xiv. 6, 7, which speaks of the same time and thing, we shall find that a special element enters into it then, which with us would be impossible to preach. The angel flying in the midst of heaven, there, has the "everlasting gospel to preach to them that dwell upon the earth, and to every nation and kindred and tongue and people." It is expressly called the "everlasting gospel," that which has always been the gospel. The gospel of the Kingdom, the announcement of the putting down of evil by the power of God, has been sounding out ever since the promise was given of the victory of the woman's Seed; so that it is truly the everlasting gospel, and yet at the time we are speaking of one thing is said which never could have been said at any other: it marks the exact time of going forth with the most perfect precision: "Fear God and give glory to Him; for the hour of His judgment is come." Then this will have come. The eagles will be gathering to the carcase. Judgment will have returned to righteousness. Instead of the shepherd's rod being transformed into a serpent, the shepherd's rod will smite down the serpent.

Thus, though with all our hearts we may thank God for the revival of the missionary spirit and work for the last century, we cannot properly apply to this the preaching of the everlasting gospel as we find it in Revelation. And 2 (15-28): The enemy and anti-christ.

1 (15-18): his supremacy.

2. [1] When ye therefore shall see the [z] abomination of desolation spoken of through Daniel the prophet, standing in the holy place (he that readeth, let him understand), then let those that are in Judæa [a] flee to the mountains;

z Dan. 9.27. Dan. 12.11. cf. Rev. 13. 14-17.
a cf. Gen. 19. 15-17. cf. Jer. 6.1. cf. Jer. 37. 11, 12.

the passage here also, while it may be better applicable to the present time, has yet, we may be sure, its full and final reference to the same period as that in Revelation. The "end" that then comes is that which will complete entirely the period of the seventy weeks, and so bring in the coming of the Son of man.

2. [1] It results from all that has been said, that that which now follows brings us completely to the end of the age, the determined time of God's disciplinary dealings with Israel, in order to bring them into their promised blessing under Christ, when He appears. This, if really the subject, at once sets aside the ordinary interpretations, which apply it to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. The reference to Daniel (ix. 27; xi. 31; xii. 11) renders this impossible. The ninth chapter does indeed foretell the destruction by the Romans, but as distinctly separates it from the abomination of desolation, which comes in the middle of the last week of the seventy. It is in the midst of the week that sacrifice and oblation are made to cease, and this is commonly referred to the Cross as putting an end before God to the legal sacrifices. It is true that it did so, but how does this agree with the coming in of blessing at the end of the week, which must be and is allowed to be the end of the seventy? For, take away (as is commonly done) the application to Israel which is so plain in the angel's words, then the making an end of sins and the bringing in of everlasting righteousness must be itself by the Cross, and the Cross must be at the end of the week, and not in the middle. Count one half week of years, three-and-a-half years, after the Cross, and what can be shown as bringing in everlasting righteousness at such a time? But the passage itself most distinctly states the making sacrifice and oblation to cease to be in the midst of the week and not at the end of it. This is an argument which would seem to pass the ingenuity of man to meet.

The setting aside of sacrifice, then, is not by atonement; and the other passages clearly show this. Take chap. xi. 31: "They shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice and they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate"; or take the last passage of the three: "And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up." In both cases it is clear that the taking away of sacrifice is for or with the setting up of the abomination. In the ninth chapter it should be clear, therefore, why as soon as the former is spoken of, we hear of the latter: "on account of the wing of abominations [there shall be] a desolator," as it reads literally: idolatrous abominations bring the desolation.

Certain it is that the application of the taking away of sacrifice to the Cross cannot be maintained, and that if it could, that of the abomination to the Roman invader of the first century still would be impossible. The abomination of desolation in Daniel is in the last week of Daniel's seventy; and this can only end with Israel's blessing fully come; and that means with the coming of the Son of man. In Matthew it is exactly the same: only a brief period of unequaled tribulation, which Daniel also unmistakably declares (xii. 11), intervenes between the abomination and the coming of the Son of man; and this interval we can now exactly measure as three-and-a-half years. It is the "time, times and a half" of Dan. vii. 25, and xii. 7, and again of Rev. xii. 14. It is the "forty and two months" of Rev. xi. 2, and xiii. 5. It is the "thousand, two hundred and threescore days" of Rev. xi. 3 and xii. 6. So many are the witnesses to what the prophecy in Matthew now before us speaks of.

There is no need of saying much as to other applications. The profanation of the temple by Antiochus Epiphanes, and which ended in the revolt of the Jews let him that is on the [b]house-top not come down to take away what is in the house; and let not him that is in the field return to take his garment.

[b] cf. Is.22.1, cf. Lk.9.59–62.

under the Maccabees, while it was doubtless a partial fulfilment of Dan. xi. 31, could not possibly fulfil either of the other passages, and was already a good while past when the Lord uttered this. The "abominations of the papacy," to which others would apply one of the passages in Daniel, are wholly out of question here in Matthew. Thus the application we are making of the Lord's words seems the only one really possible.

In Old Testament times, when truth of heart to the one God of Israel was the foundation of all, the false gods of the heathen were in a special sense the "abominations." Thus Milcom is called the "abomination of the Ammonites" and Chemosh of Moab (1 Kings xi. 5, 7), Ashtoreth of the Zidonians (2 Kings xxiii. 13); and there is no doubt that here (as is generally accepted) the desolating abomination is an idol or a false god. Israel has long been, and was then when the Lord spoke, and according to his own comparison, like a man out of whom this unclean spirit had gone (chap. xii. 43–45); but it is to return in the last days in a still more evil fashion; and a false god or idol in the sanctuary of God itself would be the very trumpet-note of defiance to Israel's Jehovah. In Dan. vii. 25, we find of the last horn of the last beast or kingdom pictured there, and whose "great," that is, haughty "words" shall bring destruction upon the beast (ver. 11), that he shall "speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and the law (R. V.); and they shall be given into his hand, until a time and times and the dividing of a time." Thus again we find in Rev. xiii., of what is undoubtedly the same evil one, that "there was given to him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies, and power was given him to continue"—or "do," "practise,"—"forty and two months. And he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme His name and His tabernacle and them that dwell in heaven; and it was given to him to make war with the saints and to overcome them." It is plain by just putting these texts together, that they speak of the same time and power; and we see how it is that the great tribulation of Daniel and of Matthew is brought about.

But in the same chapter of Revelation we are told of a second beast that shall arise along with the former with two horns like a lamb, but speaking like a dragon. He is like Christ, but a devilish imitation—an Antichrist; and as Christ leads men to worship the Father, so "he causeth the earth and them that dwell therein to worship the first beast;" and "he doeth great wonders so that he maketh fire to come down from heaven in the sight of men, and deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast, saying to them that dwell on the earth that they should make an image to the beast . . . and he has power to give breath"—not "life" "to the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed."

As already said, it needs but to put these scriptures side by side to see how well they fit together. Taken apart, we may apply them to the pope or the Mohammedan power, as many do. Putting them together, the connection with the last half-week of the seventy, and the shortened tribulation of the last days, forbids this as an interpretation, which in Matthew is quite impossible. On the other hand, we see how this breathing and speaking image (if we are to take it literally) or whatever it may signify, connects with this closing tribulation, which is indeed the "time of Jacob's trouble," the travail-time of the nation, when they are "born" as "in a day" to God. And here we find the "elect," for whose sake the days are shortened, and who, when the Lord appears are to be gathered together from their long dispersion (Ezek. xxxvii).

2 (19-22): the tribulation.

[2] But woe to those that are with child, and to those that give suck in those days! And pray ye that your flight be not in winter, nor upon the sabbath. For then shall be [c] great tribulation such as hath not been since the beginning of the world until now, nor ever shall be; and except those days had been [d] shortened, no flesh should be saved, but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened.

3 (23-25): signs and wonders.

[3] Then if any one say to you, Behold, here is the Christ, or here, believe it not: for there shall arise [e] false Christs and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders, so as to lead astray, if it were possible, even the elect. Behold, I have foretold you.

4 (26): testing.

[4] Therefore if they say unto you, Behold, he is in the desert, go not forth; behold, [he is] in the inner chambers, believe it not.

5 (27, 28): the coming for judgment.

[5] For, as the [f] lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth unto the west, so shall the coming of the Son of man be. For wherever the [g] carcase is, there shall the eagles be gathered together.

c cf. Jer. 30. 5-7. cf. Dan. 12. 1. cf. Joel 2. 2. cf. Zech. 14. 2, 3. ctr. Rev. 3. 10.

d cf. Is. 65. 8, 9. cf. Zech. 13. 8, 9. cf. Is. 40. 1, 2. cf. Dan. 9. 27 with Rev. 12. 6-17.

e vers. 5, 11. 2 Thess. 2. 8-10. cf. 2 Pet. 2. 1-3. cf. Rev. 13. 11-18.

f cf. Is. 30. 30 with 1 Thess. 5. 1-3.

g cf. Ezek. 39. 17, 18. cf. Rev. 19. 17, 18; Lk. 17. 37.

[2] The notice of the tribulation follows that of the abomination; but we have already sufficiently considered it.

[3] That of the signs and wonders in connection with false Christs and false prophets is also plain. In 2 Thess. ii. we have the same power as the "man of sin," sitting in the temple of God and showing himself that he is God. The connection with Christianity (or rather with apostasy from it) and the thought of the Church as the "temple of God," have combined to lead the mass of interpreters towards Romanism and the pope as the explanation of this also. But how could this be a sign of the day of the Lord being just at hand, when Romanism counts its centuries of despotic sway over men, and that day is not yet come? And again Rome is Babylon the great, the harlot, the woman of sin and not the man of sin. The dark and evil power to rise up at the end will not even profess obedience to Christ, as Rome does. The man of sin is "he that opposeth and exalteth himself against all that is called God or that is worshiped, so that he sitteth in the temple of God, setting himself forth as God." . . . "Even he whose coming is according to the work of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders and with all deceit of unrighteousness for them that are perishing; because they received not the love of the truth that they might be saved" (R. V.)

All this answers clearly to what we have in Matthew, and goes far beyond Romanism, evil as Romanism surely is. It links with all that we have had before, to certify the meaning of what we have here, a meaning which rather Scripture itself has given us than any interpretation of our own.

[4] They are warned now of any attempt to mislead by drawing away disciples after a Christ come secretly—in the desert, or in the secret chambers. Not so would He come. The power of evil at work would have its snares laid on the right hand and on the left; but there would be no need for any nice discrimination to discern the truth.

[5] He would come openly, not secretly. The need appealing would be such as to call not for secret help but open interposition. His coming would be like the lightning lighting up all the heavens, the announcement of swift and unsparing judgment. Wherever the carcase, the corruption, existed the eagles would find it out: judgment would thoroughly do its work. In long-suffering patience there was no longer hope. Judgment itself was now the only mercy. The shepherd's rod must smite, and destroy the destroyers of the flock and the earth.

3 (29–44): The manifestation.
1 (29–31): to the elect, and their gathering.

3. [1] But immediately after the tribulation of those days, the [h] sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light; and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. And then shall appear the [i] sign of the Son of man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the land lament; and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he shall [j] send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from [one] end of the heavens to [the other] end of them.

2 (32–35): the speediness.

[2] Now from the fig-tree learn her parable: when her branch is now tender, and putteth forth its leaves, ye know that summer is near; so also ye, when ye [k] see all these things, know that it is near, at the doors. Verily I say unto you, [l] This generation shall in no wise pass away, till all these things shall come to pass. [m] Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall in no wise pass away.

3 (36–41): a secret told out.

[3] But of that day and hour [n] knoweth no one, no, not the angels of heaven, but the Father only. But as the [o] days of Noah were, so shall the coming of the Son of h cf. Is. 13. 9, 10. cf. Ezek. 32. 7, 8. cf. Joel 2. 10, 31. cf. Am. 8. 9, 10. cf. Rev. 6. 12-14.

i cf. Dan. 7. 13. cf. Rev. 1. 7. cf. 2 Thess. 1. 7, 8.
j ch. 13. 41. cf. Ps. 50. 4, 5. cfr. 1 Thess. 4. 16-18.
k ver. 15. cfr. 1 Thess. 5. 1-5.
l cf. ch. 12. 45. cf. ch. 23. 35, 36.
m cf. ch. 5. 18. cf. Is. 51. 6.
n Acts 1. 7. vers. 42, 44. cf. Mk. 13. 32.
o Gen. 7. 1, etc. cf. 1 Pet. 3. 20. cf. Amos 6. 3-6.

3. [1] We come therefore now to the appearing of the Lord, ushered in by signs throughout all nature. The sun and moon would fail; the stars fall from heaven. Nature itself would call for a stronger than creature hand to save it from ruin. Then would appear the sign for which men had asked. As Jonah to the Ninevites, so would He be again to them, the Son of man once crucified at their hands, now seen in the clouds of heaven. The sign would be Himself, and what a sign! They "look on Him whom they have pierced,"—not in their minds, not in vision, but really: "every eye shall see Him, and they also who pierced Him," "and then shall all the tribes of the land lament"—the reference to Zechariah (xii. 10–14), both here and in Revelation (i. 7) is, or ought to be, unmistakable—"and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Joseph and His brethren are face to face.

Israel must be now re-gathered: this is the mission of the angels, to gather together His elect from the four winds. It might seem indeed as if the winds had scattered them: how little they think that angel hands shall bring them back! Brief are the words used, but how divine love breathes in them! what will be the joy in these from the far off country gathered home!

[2] "The man will not be at rest," says Naomi to her daughter-in-law, "until he has finished the thing this day." And the Lord now impresses upon His disciples the suddenness with which all this will be accomplished. The fig-tree is once more chosen as a figure of Israel: and "when her branch is new and tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is near." The fruit is there as soon as the leaves: thus the development is sudden indeed; summer in this way seems at once to set in: Israel's hopes come thus to sudden fruitage. The very generation that sees the beginning of these things will see the end.*

*So the connection inclines me now to understand ver. 34. That "generation" (γενεὰ) may be taken as "race," or a people marked by certain moral characteristics, there can be no question at all for any one who has examined the matter: and in this sense I used to take it here, that that unbelieving generation of our Lord's day would continue on to the coming of the Lord itself. And this is, no doubt, true. I think, however, it is not so suited to the connection here as that given above, which is accepted by many. The suddenness of the end is the point insisted on.

man be. For, just as in the days before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and knew not till the flood came and took them all away; [p]so shall the coming of the Son of man be. Then shall two be in the field; one shall be [q]taken, and one shall be left; two [women] shall be grinding at the mill; one shall be taken, and one shall be left.

4 (42-44): the world-test.

[42] [r]Watch, therefore, for ye know not on what day your Lord cometh. But know this, that if the master of the house had known in what watch the thief was coming, he would have watched, and not have suffered his house to be broken through. Therefore, be ye also [s]ready, for in an hour that ye think not, the Son of man cometh.

p cf. 2 Pet. 3. 3-10.
q cf. Prov. 14. 32. cf. Ps. 101. 5, 6. cf. Ps. 37. 10, 11.
r ch. 25. 13. cf. Rev. 3. 3.
s ch. 25. 10. cf. Rev. 22. 14. Lk. 12. 31-40.

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chaps. xxiv. 45–xxv. 30.)

Separative judgment between true and false in the fellowship of faith—the Church.

1 (45-51): Faithfulness and usurpation of authority. 1 (45-47): the faithful servant.

1. [t]WHO, then, is the [u]faithful and wise servant, whom his lord hath set over his household, to give them [their] food in due season? Blessed is that servant whom his lord when he cometh shall find so doing.

t Lk. 12. 41-46. 1 Cor. 4. 2.

[3] The Lord adds to this, what makes its suddenness more impressive, that the time in which it would take place was known to none, save only to His Father.* Upon the world all this would come as a surprise, just as the flood did in the days of Noah, judgment suddenly sweeping them to destruction. But at the end it would be separative, selective of its objects: two in the field, one taken and one left, two women at the hand-mill together, one taken and the other left. Here, as in the illustration from the time before the flood, it is judgment that "takes away": the one left is left for blessing; for the earth is now being purified, as we have seen, and where the carcase is the eagles are gathered together.

[4] The Lord enjoins upon all to watch, just because they know not the day upon which He may come. For the world, it will be but the unexpected visit of the thief, breaking in upon the house they count their own. But let all be ready.

SUBD. 2.

Here He introduces the parables which show us, by way of appendix to the Jewish aspect, the relation of His coming to the Church, but in a veiled manner. It was, in fact, what as yet they would not be able to enter into. The three parables which follow all remind us that in the Kingdom as committed in His absence to the hands of men, the true and the false would be mingled together, and at His coming only would the evil be purged out. Here we have therefore that separative judgment seen in relationship to what is professedly a fellowship of faith. The three parables have to do with—1st. the use and abuse of authority; 2nd. the Christian expectation of the Lord, the going forth to meet Him; and 3rd. the special deposit committed to each, and the heart towards Him as shown by the way the trust is discharged. We may notice that in all this part we have no reference to Daniel or to Old Testament prophecy any more. All in it belongs to the mysteries of the Kingdom unknown to the prophets of old, and

* A very few ancient MSS. insert "neither the Son"; but Jerome asserts that, while in his day some Latin copies had it, yet in the Greek and especially "in Adamantii et Pierii exemplaribus" it was not found. According to Athanasius also it was alleged at the Council of Nicæa, A. D. 325, that these words were in Mark only. I take this from a note of Dr. Schaff, the American editor in Lange's Commentary on Matthew.

Verily I say unto you, that he will [u] set him over all that he hath.

2 (48-51): the evil servant.

[2] But if that evil servant shall say in his heart, My [v] lord delayeth his coming, and shall begin to smite his fellow-servants, and shall eat and drink with the drunken, the lord of that servant shall come in a day when he which the very form of the parable expresses (chap. xiii. 34, 35). In what is commonly called the "parable" of the sheep and goats which follows, we have what is no longer that, but plain speech enough, the sheep and goats being only used by way of figurative illustration.

[u] ch. 25. 21. cf. Lk. 22. 29, 30.

[v] cf. 2 Pet. 3. 4. ctr. Rev. 22. 7, 12, 20. Heb. 10. 37.

1. The coming of the Lord is, throughout these parables, the governing object. He is leaving the world as rejected by it; and it is characterized for the Christian as the place of that rejection. But He leaves it to prepare for His people a place in heaven, and He comes again to introduce them there, where He is. Israel has still the earthly promises; but the Church is a stranger here; for her portion and her heart are with Christ in another scene. In the meanwhile she is the representative of her Lord however upon earth, put in charge of His interests on it, and responsible to serve and glorify Him.

[1] In the first parable here it is of ministry that the Lord speaks, pressing the responsibility of him whom his Lord has set over His household, to give them food in due season. The value He puts upon such service is emphatically declared. Blessed shall he be whom his Lord, when He cometh, shall find doing this in faithfulness and wisdom. He will even set him over all that He has.

It is service, as the same blessed Speaker has taught us not long since, that not only leads on to rule, but qualifies for it: just because all rule with God is service. "Love seeketh not her own." To seek one's own is the misery of a fallen creature, and in heaven no such beggar's badge can anywhere be found. Its places of trust are places of service therefore, new ability to serve,—to satisfy love's desire, and pour out of fulness which shall find even there some room for happy overflow, if yet we know little what. Thus, then, the Lord looks at service here as qualifying for service, higher and fuller there—reaping in the same sort as that which has been sown: and that is the law of harvest.

[2] But there is another side which we are to consider: for "if that evil servant shall say in his heart, my lord delayeth his coming, and shall begin to smite his fellow-servants, and shall eat and drink with the drunken, the lord of that servant shall come in an hour when he looketh not for him, and shall cut him asunder and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites." Plainly the man is a hypocrite: it is no case of ignorance merely as to prophetic teaching; it is what his heart says, whether his prophetic views are right or wrong. He, too, like Israel when the Lord came, wants the vineyard for himself, and this he shows by his conduct: he usurps authority over his fellow-servants, and associates himself with loose livers; it does not say that he becomes drunken, but a man is known by the company he keeps; and he is perhaps worse than his company because of the profession he makes. He is a hypocrite, and his doctrine (whether publicly professed or not) comes from his heart, as so much false doctrine does. We are apt to be easily persuaded of that which we want to be true; and so in this case.

Primarily, it is the individual of whom the Lord speaks, but we cannot be aware of the history of the Church without realizing that there is a wider significance; and that along with the decline of the expectation of the Lord's speedy return, and with the coincident assertion of the Church's heirship to Israel's promises, there did in fact ensue that hierarchical transformation of ministry into lordship which culminated at last in papal domination and the necessarily lax manners of the growing world-church. The grain of mustard-seed, enlarged into a tree, sent down its roots proportionately into the earth; and the parable of the transformation soon became its justification also. But this brings the looketh not for him, and in an hour which he knoweth not, and shall cut him asunder, and appoint his portion with the [w] hypocrites: there shall be the weeping and gnashing of teeth.

2 (xxv. 1-13): The wise and foolish virgins: faith's expectancy.

2. [1] Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten [x] virgins, who took their [y] lamps and went forth to meet the [z] bridegroom.

1 (1): at the beginning.

cf. ch. 13. 20, 21. y cf. ch.5.14-16; cf. Phil. 2. 15, 6. z cf. Ps. 45. 8, 11; cf. Is. 62. 4, 5; cf. Eph. 5. 25-27 with Rev. 19. 7.

w cf. ch.25.3, 11, 12. cf. ch.7.21-27. cf. 1 Cor. 9. 23. cf. 2 Pet. 2. 20-22. ctr. Jno.10. 28, 29. x cf. 2 Cor. 11. 12.

judgment of the world upon the professing church itself: "upon thee goodness, if thou continue in His goodness, otherwise thou also shalt be cut off" (Rom. xi. 22). The true saints being removed to be with their Lord in heaven, there is left upon earth nothing but a decaying carcase, to which the eagles will presently gather. Upon every one so left, the awful doom will come which the Lord announces: "the Lord of that servant shall cut him asunder and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites; there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth."

2. The second parable deals still more directly with the Church's expectancy of Christ, which is indeed the very point of it; the figure of a marriage has been already used by the Lord in a parable of the Kingdom (chap. xxii.) but there neither bridegroom nor bride is actually brought in, although the bridegroom is named as the King's son. The gathering of the guests is there the central feature of the parable; here it is the going forth to meet the bridegroom; and the Bridegroom Himself takes the most important place in it.

The bride is still not seen;* but not surely because the virgins are the bride in another aspect, as so many think. This is not more against the unity of thought than it is against the connection, or the orderly development of the revelation. For the heavenly bride has not yet been revealed; and the prophecy as a whole is evidently from the Jewish standpoint, from which the Baptist speaks when he says, "He that hath the bride is the bridegroom" (John iii. 23) Israel is the bride, as with the Old Testament prophets, and it is when Christ comes to take Israel into relationship to Himself, that on the way Christians are called out to meet Him and come with Him to the marriage. The very fact of being called out to meet Him shows who they are. Jewish disciples could not be called out to meet Him; and it is a New Testament truth altogether that "when Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall we also appear with Him in glory."† Thus the bride is Jewish and the virgins are Christian; and if we will remember this, every feature of the parable becomes harmonious.

[1] "Then shall the Kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, who took their lamps and went forth to meet the bridegroom."

The connective "then" has certainly a meaning, and as certainly connects this parable with that which has gone before; nay, even with the judgment upon the evil servant. But that will not suffice to make it mean all that interpreters have taken from it. But it is when the end is reached that the "likeness" of the Kingdom to what is here before us will be fully complete. Nevertheless the parable takes us back to the beginning of the Church's history —to the time of first freshness, when the heathen world around was witness not only that they had "turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God," but also "to wait for His Son from heaven, even Jesus, who delivered

* There is, however, a reading "and the bride" at the end of the first verse, which Westcott and Hort insert in their margin, and which Trench (Notes on the Parables) approves as to the sense, as conformed to the Jewish customs. Probably it is this conformity that has led to the interpolation, which is certainly opposed to the plain meaning of the parable. The marriage could not have taken place before the virgins are called out to meet the bridegroom.

† In Zechariah (xiv. 5) "the Lord my God shall come, and all the holy ones with Thee" does not necessarily imply more than "angels"; and so with Enoch's prophecy which Jude quotes: "The Lord cometh with ten thousand of His saints," or "holy ones."

2 (2–4): the difference between them.

3 (5–7): the rousing of the sleepers.

2 And five of them were [a]foolish, and five were [b]wise. For the foolish took their lamps and took no [c]oil with them; but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps.

3 Now as the bridegroom [d]tarried, they all grew drowsy and [e]slept. But in the middle of the [f]night,

[a] cf. ch. 22. 10. Lk. 12. 20, 21. [b] Deut. 32. 29, chap. 7. 24–27. [c] cf. Eph. 1. 13.

cf. Acts. 5. 32; cf. 1 John 2. 20, 27. [d] cf. 2 Pet. 3. 8-10; cf. ch. 24. 48. [e] cfr. 1 Thess. 1. 9, 10; 1 Thess. 5. 6. [f] cf. Ex. 12. 29; cf. 2 Thess. 5. 3.

them from the wrath to come" (1 Thess. i. 9, 10). What is referred to here is certainly not the fact of what at last took place when the midnight cry had aroused the sleepers, and when in fact the unpreparedness to go forth together immediately manifested itself. As yet the virgins are one, as it would seem, in heart and hope. Afterwards we find the tarrying of the bridegroom, the falling asleep, the startling cry; but not as yet.

The being "virgins" must not be pressed too far, nor yet lost sight of. Hebrew customs are illustrated in it all, even in the number, for "ten lamps or torches were the usual number in marriage processions"; still that does not in the least prevent there being a deeper meaning, for Scripture selects what it can turn to spiritual profit. Thus, though the virgins are not (from the point of view taken here) the bride, or the espoused, yet we are not to refuse the conception naturally attaching to such, of purity, of separation from the world; while the number ten, as well as five, show that this is their responsibility rather than necessarily the reality of their condition. And this comes out clearly in the sequel, though it has been lost sight of by many, in a way that has not only led to misconstruction of the parable but has perverted important truth. The going out to meet the bridegroom is, in the first place and essentially, in desire and expectation of heart, though it results in a positive "going forth" from the world and its associations. A heart in heaven can be fairly measured by the reality of pilgrim- and strangership on earth.

2 A great and fundamental contrast is found to exist between two classes of these virgins: "five of them were foolish and five were wise." And their folly or wisdom is shown in regard to that for which they had come out: "the foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them; but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps."

Here naturally the difference between those of whom I have just spoken and other interpreters comes out. We are told that in this parable all are spoken of as "virgins;" while in those that precede and follow it, all are spoken of as "servants." They are therefore all alike true Christians—"Christians with no stain upon the genuineness of their profession, but whose Christianity lacks that maturity of growth, depth of consecration, and perfection of development which can alone entitle to the highest honors and joys of the kingdom." And this is supposed to be shown in the fact that their lack in the case spoken of here "is not of oil in their lamps, but of oil in their vessels with their lamps" —an extra supply of grace, which the wise virgins carried with them.

A lamp without any oil is, no doubt, a foolish thing enough; too foolish, it might be supposed, for any to think of. Spiritually, however, alas! there is no difficulty at all in the conception of what is seen continually, men satisfied with the form without the power; and this is even the special characteristic of the last days (2 Tim. iii. 1, 5). "The lamps consisted of a round receptacle for pitch or oil for the wick. This was placed in a hollow cup or deep saucer which was fastened by a pointed end into a long wooden pole, on which it was borne aloft." It is distinctly said that the "foolish took their lamps and took no oil with them"; but we cannot definitely say whether the "vessels" in which the wise took their oil were just the receptacles on the top of the poles or something separate altogether from the lamps. The foolish have no oil, no power of the Spirit to make "a burning and a shining light" for Christ; and this their end demonstrates absolutely.

there came a cry, [g]Behold, the bridegroom: come ye out to meet him. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps.

4 (8, 9): the failure proved.

[4] And the foolish said unto the wise, [h]Give us of your oil: for our lamps are [i]going out. But the wise answered and said, [Nay,] lest there be not enough for us and you: go ye rather to those that [j]sell, and buy for your selves.

5 (10-13): the result.

[5] And while they were gone away to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were [k]ready went in with him to the marriage feast, and the door was shut.

g cf. Rev. 3. 11. cf. Jas. 5.8.

h Ps. 49. 7.

i cf. Prov. 20. 20.

j ctr. Acts 8. 18–23. cf. Is. 55. 1.

k ch. 24. 44. cf. Col. 1. 12–14.

[3] The bridegroom tarries, and this has its effect upon them all. Wise and foolish alike, they become drowsy and sleep. So in the history of the professing church the expectation of the Lord grew languid and ceased. The expectation of the conversion of the world came in to replace the true Christian hope of being taken out of it, the millennial reign being finally interpreted by the event, of the overthrow of paganism in the Roman empire. After Constantine, but one prominent teacher is known to have favored what was then called "chiliasm"; and he an unsound man.* There was no longer a watcher to disturb the slumberers.

In the middle of the night, however, a cry is heard, "Behold the Bridegroom; come ye out to meet Him;" and this rouses all the virgins. It is more, surely, than a revival of the doctrine of the Lord's coming which is indicated by this: it is a definite announcement, rather, of His being at hand, which is followed so promptly by His actual arrival that there is no time for those who are awakened unprepared to remedy their condition.

[4] All are aroused; and then comes the conviction on the part of the foolish, "Our lamps are going out." It is urged therefore that they had been lighted up to this time, and that they must have had oil in them, for this to be; but the parables appeal so constantly to the thoughts and feelings of men, that the argument is an unsafe one. The words are their cry only, not necessarily fact at all. And the "ninety and nine just persons who need no repentance" in the well-known fifteenth of Luke, are they in fact such, or in their own thoughts? Surely in their own thoughts only; they are in fact the Pharisees whom the Lord has before Him. So here, it is not necessarily the fact that the lamps were ever lit; and the warning is a solemn one, that one may have a good enough light to welcome the Bridegroom, when He is not there, and find, when faced with the reality, that the light reckoned on expires at once!

The foolish show their folly by their appeal to the wise. In the spiritual application of these things, none but fools could make it; for while a true soul, with the eyes on the wrong object, might fall almost into despair, yet none surely could expect to borrow from another of the grace that was in him to make a light wherewith to meet the Bridegroom. The wise virgins direct them to those that sell, to buy for themselves; and in fact Scripture exhorts men elsewhere to "buy," though "without money and without price" (Isa. lv. 1). Such "selling" speaks of fixed terms upon which alone the one who seeks may obtain what he desires; and in this way, paradoxical as it may seem, we may buy without money. Nay, the very terms of the gospel are that "the gift of God" cannot be "purchased with money," or with anything that religiously might be its equivalent. The pride that will not take a free gift as such must be sent empty away.

[5] They are too late, these foolish ones; for "while they were gone away to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage, and the door was shut. Afterwards came also the other virgins, say-

* Apollinaris the Younger, bishop of Laodicea (died A. D. 390).

Afterwards come also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, [t]open to us. But he answered and said, Verily, I say unto you, I know you not. Watch, therefore, for ye [m]know not the day nor the hour.

3 (xxv. 14-30): Special trusts, and the heart manifested by them, 1 (14, 15): to each according to capacity.

3. [1] For it is as if a man, going away out of the country, called his own servants, and delivered to them his [n]goods. And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, to another one; to each [o]according to his own ability, and immediately went out of the country.

2 16-18): the contrast.

[2] And he that had received the five talents went and [p]traded with them, and gained other five. In like manner he that [had received] the two gained other two. But he that had received the one, went away and dug in the earth, and [q]hid the money of his lord.

t Lk. 13. 25-30.
m ch. 24. 42.
n Lk. 19. 12-27. cf. Lk. 15. 12, 13. cf. 1 Tim. 6. 20.
o Rom. 12. 6-8. 1 Cor. 12. 28-30. cf. Lk. 12. 48.
p cf. 1 Tim. 4. 13-15. cf. 2 Tim. 1. 6. cf. Eph. 5. 16. cf. 2 Pet. 1. 5-8.
q cf. Prov. 26. 15; etc. 1 Pet. 4. 10; cf. 2 Pet. 1. 9-12.

ing, Lord, Lord, open unto us." But they are shut out; shut out, if (as all seems to indicate) it is the earthly marriage, from the earthly joy and blessing, as well as the heavenly; and in any case this is the truth of it. The Lord disowns any knowledge of them; and this He could not do of His own. All that is said of them too sadly agrees with this.*

3. [1] The parable which now follows speaks of the special trusts committed to the servants of the Lord in the time of His absence from them. They are left to care for His interests, and the "talents" are not what is ordinarily taken to be that,—some natural endowment or capacity,—but something added to this, while taking it fully into account: to each one is given "according to his own ability." It cannot be further defined than as being like money in different amounts, possibilities of gain for Christ, what in His love to God and man He counts such. The deposit itself increases by wise use of it; the sphere of service grows larger, as we serve; and this is a point insisted on. The five talents grow to ten; the two to four: capacity necessarily growing also by experience, as we know so well. How little in spiritual things are we any of us shut up to mediocrity, as we are prone to imagine, and suffer seriously by the imagination too.

[2] This is presently seen in the conduct of the three depicted here, though it is not, of course, at all a sufficient account of it. Yet it is worthy of note that the man who hides his lord's money in the ground, is not the one who has received five talents, or even the man who has received but two. And we understand well how natural this is, that it should be the receiver of the smallest gift who makes no use of it. It need not be so: the man of splendid natural ability, and who has corresponding opportunities and superadded endowments may be the very one to forfeit all by his neglect or perversion of them. Still the appropriateness and power of exhortation for us in this circumstance of the parable must not be on this account overlooked. It is the little gift which tends to be despised as little; to the great injury of the people and the cause of Christ. For thus the mass of Christians almost drop out of responsibility, drop into inactivity, more or less complete,—practically give up their talent into the hands of those they esteem better qualified than themselves; who, however, cannot do the work thus imposed upon them, and it remains undone; but this is the largest part of all the Church's work! How necessary to remember that "much more they that are feeble are necessary," and to give a right answer to the prophet's question, "Who has despised the day of small things?"

Suppose we have but one talent, every day's believing use of it will carry us on some way towards two. We are not shut up within the limits of God's first

* Alford, Olshausen, and others deny the finality of the judgment here; but Schaff is wrong in asserting that millennarian commentators in general take this view. He should at least own that there are many exceptions.

3 (19-23): the return and reali-zation.

[3] Now after a long time, the lord of those servants cometh and [r]reckoneth with them. And he that had received the five talents came and brought other five talents, saying, Lord, thou deliveredst to me five talents; lo, I have gained other five talents. His lord said unto him, Well done, good and faithful servant: thou hast been [s]faithful over a few things, I will set thee over many things: enter thou into the [t]joy of thy Lord. And he also that received the two talents came and said, Lord, thou deliveredst unto me two talents: lo, I have gained other two talents. His lord said unto him, Well done, good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful over a few things; I will set thee over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord.

r cf. Rom. 14. 10-12. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 10.

s cf. Lk. 16. 10-12. cf. 2 Tim. 4. 7, 8.

t Ps. 16. 11. cf. Heb. 12. 1, 2.

4 (24, 25): the failure.

[4] But he also that had received the one talent came, and said, Lord, I knew thee that thou art a [u]hard man, reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not scattered: and, being afraid, I went and hid thy talent in the earth: lo, thou hast what is thine.

u cf. ch. 20. 11, 12. cf. Jer. 44. 16-18. cf. Mal. 1. 13. cfr. 1 Jno. 5. 3.

5 (26-30): the recom-pense.

[5] But his lord answered and said to him, Thou [v]wicked and slothful servant, thou knewest that I reap where I v cf. ch. 22. 12, 13. cf. ch. 24. 48-50.

gift. We may shut ourselves up; and by hiding our talent in the earth, both lose what we have and the capacity for gaining more. For the rule is, "to him that hath"—in the way of increase—"shall more be given; but from him that hath not, even that which he hath shall be taken away."

[3] Another thing becomes manifest in result: that it is not the amount with which we are entrusted that ensures the reward, but the faithfulness shown as to it. The servant who had the five talents has gained five talents; but he who has gained but two has as much doubled his capital as the other has, and is received with the same approval into the joy of his lord. It would be possible for the one with the smaller trust, to win even the higher approbation; and it is something for the Lord to find one of His own willing to serve as cheerfully in a humbler as in a higher position. To a love that "seeketh not her own," all would be equal here, though love itself may "covet earnestly the best gifts," these meaning fuller capacity for love's sweet service.

[4] As principles all these things apply to every Christian, yet we are not allowed to suppose that the man who hides his lord's money in the absolute way here described is possibly, after all, a Christian. His plea for it here is total unbelief, and expressed in such a way as would be impossible to the stoutest-hearted in the day which is referred to. But the Lord puts into language of the most out-spoken character what the conduct supposed would really mean. Faith would argue as to every gift of God that He who gave it had made no mistake, and that the possession of anything wherewith to serve was sufficient warrant for service; and love would prize the opportunity for this as blessing from the divine Source of blessing. The man before us is a mere accuser of his Lord; but so would He teach us to judge the legal spirit which, even in a believer, would render one incapable of using frankly and fully whatever he is possessed of, in the service of Him who has bestowed it. If we abhor the awful blasphemy which this man utters, let us abhor the unfaithful and cowardly refusal of our responsibilities which means the entertainment (however disguised) of traitorous thoughts like these. "Faith worketh by love"; and love is the free spirit of service. Lack of the one is, therefore, lack of the other; while we may be sure, and for that reason, that no true believer could be found as this man, with his Lord's talent lying entirely unused.

[5] Accordingly the judgment here is absolute condemnation. He is condemned have not sown, and gather where I have not scattered? thou oughtest therefore to have put my money with the [w]bankers, and at my coming I should have received mine own with interest. Take away, therefore, the talent from him, and give it unto him that hath the ten talents. For unto [x]every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance; but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath. And [y]cast out the unprofitable servant into the outer darkness: there shall be the weeping and gnashing of teeth.

[w] cf. Eph. 5. 15, 16. cf. Gal. 6. 9, 10.

[x] ch. 13. 12. John 15. 2.

[y] ch. 8. 12. ch. 22. 13. ch. 24. 51. ver. 46.

out of his own mouth, for if his master were what he thought him, he should have given his money to the bankers, that he might have received his own with interest. He is cast out into the outer darkness, which speaks of the awful darkness, away from God who is light, and of purer eyes than to behold iniquity.

SUBD. 3.

Thus Israel and the professing church have been before us in their relation to the coming of the Lord; and now we have the Gentiles similarly,—the judgment of the living nations, when, having come, and His throne established upon the earth, He casts out of His Kingdom all things that offend, and those that work iniquity—a judgment not to be confounded with the final judgment of the "great white throne," which is a judgment of the wicked dead alone.

To those who see in Scripture but one general resurrection of saint and sinner at the last day, with one general judgment in which the righteous will be manifested and separated from the wicked, the scene that the Lord puts before us here seems naturally to picture what is in their own minds. If their view be right, it is, of course, quite clear that it must picture it; and this it is to which we must confine our attention here: does it indeed represent a judgment of all the generations of men, Jew, Christian, heathen, dead and living, at the end of the world? Is this what it states or what it implies? If so, we must heartily and unreservedly accept this, assured that it will be found, of necessity, in conformity with all other scriptures; and that if it plainly declares this, we may accept it even without going further. But it must plainly declare it.

Now the coming of the Son of man in His glory with all His holy angels with Him, we have already seen in its relation to Israel, and to the prophecy of Daniel, to which our Lord Himself directly points us. In Daniel He comes to receive a kingdom which He shares with the "saints of the most high" and which stands for ever; first of all, breaking in pieces and consuming the kingdoms of the earth (ii. 34, 35). There surely can be no doubt, except to those entirely prepossessed with other thoughts, that this is a kingdom yet to be set up. To speak of the saints reigning now is a thought utterly foreign to Scripture. It is to the overcomer that the Lord promises that he shall sit with Him on His throne, even as He also overcame and is set down with His Father upon His throne (Rev. iii. 21). Who could sit with Christ upon the Father's throne? And notice He is speaking in this promise as Son of man, walking in that character among the candlesticks (chap. i. 13). If Christians "reign as kings without" the apostles, (who certainly never did) it is a rebuke simply to mention it (1 Cor. iv. 8).

Thus the Kingdom in Daniel is the Kingdom for which still we wait, introduced by that personal and manifest coming in the clouds of heaven of which Matthew (as well as Daniel) speaks, and it is when the Son of man so comes and sits on the throne of His Kingdom that the nations are gathered before Him in the manner spoken of here. There is no hint of resurrection here, and for a good reason. The first resurrection has already taken place before His appearing, for when He appears, we shall appear with Him in glory (Col. iii. 4). This is

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chap. xxv. 31–46.)
The day of manifestation.

1 (31–40): The righteous.

1 BUT when the Son of man shall [z]come in his glory, and all the angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory. And before him shall be [a]gathered all the nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as the shepherd separateth the sheep from the goats. And he shall set the [b]sheep on his right hand, but the [c]goats on his left. Then shall the z ch. 24. 30, 31. cf. Zech. 14. 4, 5. cf. 2 Thess. 1. 7–10. cf. Rev. 1. 7. cf. Rev. 19. 11–21.

a ctr. 2 Cor. 5. 10. ctr. Rev. 20. 11–15. cf. Jno. 5. 24. cf. Ps. 96. 13.
b cf. Ezek. 20. 38; cf. Ezek. 34. 17, 20; cf. Ps. 79. 13; cf. John 10. 11, etc.
c cf. Lev. 16. 5, 7–10; cf. Zech. 10. 3.

indeed a truth which Matthew does not reveal to us, though we have seen the living saints called forth to meet the Bridegroom. But it is a thing made known afterwards to Paul "by the word of the Lord," that the dead saints are to join this blessed company and rise to "meet the Lord in the air," together with them (1 Thess. iv. 14–17). Thus it is plain why there is no mention of resurrection after He is come, and that there could not be any. The wicked dead are yet in their graves, and will only come forth after the millennium is at an end, to stand before the "great white throne" for judgment (Rev. xx. 5, 11–13). The company gathered before the Son of man when He appears and sets up His throne on earth, is simply of living men who have never died, and of Gentiles only.

The judgment is a selective judgment,—the righteous separated from the wicked, the "sheep from the goats." But the saints alive or dead of the present or the past dispensations, will not (as we have seen) stand in such a promiscuous assemblage, to be picked out from the rest by the judgment of their works. The first resurrection will have separated them wholly and for ever. Raised or changed, the saints caught up to meet the Lord in the air will be already in His likeness (1 Cor. xv. 42–44, 52). Give account of themselves they will, and their works will be appraised for suited recompense, but personally into judgment they cannot come (John v. 24, R. V.). Thus it should be absolutely clear that they are not among the mingled company which the King judges here.

But a difficulty arises in the mind immediately—one of those difficulties by which, if fairly met, we are led on to fuller apprehension of the truth itself. It may be naturally asked, if the Lord thus takes away to Himself all the living saints before His appearing, how can there be any "sheep" to put upon His right hand when the Son of man appears? What are they who now are welcomed by the King, as blessed of His Father, to inherit the Kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world?

A similar question, it will be remembered, is asked of John in Revelation (vii. 13) by one of those elders whom he has seen in heaven, sitting upon thrones around the throne of God, and heard singing the song of redemption in the presence of the Lamb (chap. v. 7–10). Here is another company, distinct from these, as also from the 144,000 sealed out of the tribes of Israel, just before seen. They are Gentiles, "out of every nation and tribe and people and tongue," with blood-washed robes and palms in their hands, and the elder asks, "Who are these? and whence do they come?" He asks, and has himself to answer: "These are they who come out of the great tribulation"—not simply "out of great tribulation," which might apply very generally to Christians, but out of the tribulation of which Daniel and the Lord in Matthew speak. Thus they are a company precisely defined and limited, and to the very time of the prophecy before us,—a time in which, if we compare the scriptures, Christianity in the true sense of that term is taken from the earth. Once more, Jew and Gentile, even in blessing, form distinct companies; temple-worship is again going on, till the abomination of desolation stands in the holy place; it is in King say unto those on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the [d]kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: for I was [g]ahungered and ye gave me to eat, I was thirsty and ye gave me drink; I was a [f]stranger and ye took me in; [g]naked and ye clothed me; I was [h]sick, and ye visited me; I was in [i]prison, and ye came unto me. Then shall the d cf. Lk. 12. 32.

cf. Rom. 8. 17.
cf. Zech. 14. 9, 16.
e cf. Heb. 11. 37, 38.
cf. ch. 10. 9-15.
f cf. Acts 16. 15.

cf. Heb. 10. 32, 33. g cf. 1 Cor. 4. 11 with Acts 16. 33, 34. h ctr. Ezek. 34. 4. i cf. Jer. 38. 7-13. cf. 2 Tim. 1. 16, 17.

short that "end of the (Jewish) age," which is nothing else than the cut-off end of Daniel's seventy weeks,—the last week.

In it we see the "everlasting gospel" going out (Rev. xiv. 6, 7), declaring (gospel as it is) "the hour of God's judgment" to have come; and here the instrumentality used is, no doubt, Jewish. Thus we can understand the special character of the judgment itself which turns entirely upon how men have treated the King in His "brethren," the time being that in which "His brethren," instead of being separate, as while the natural promises and privileges were in abeyance, have returned, as Micah prophesies they will, unto the children of Israel (chap. v. 3). Even the apparent ignorance, on the part of the righteous, of the glorious King can in this way be accounted for; because it is only when they look upon Him whom they have pierced that the veil drops completely off Israel's own face (Zech. xii. 10; xiii. 6). No wonder if the Gentiles, turned by their means to God, should not be in advance of the ministry they have received.

Thus there is fullest harmony; and we see that this last week is indeed a seed-time for Israel and the earth. Before it begins, the Lord has called His saints of the past and present up to Himself, and removed the candlestick of Christianity from the earth, spuing out, as in the threat to Laodicea, the mere lukewarm profession. Darkness then covers the earth, and gross darkness the peoples, but the light begins to rise upon Israel, the morning (stormy as it is) of an unending day (Isa. lx. 1 sq.).

There needs not much more to be said of this closing part of the Lord's prophecy. For the righteous there is eternal life, death being for them completely abolished. They "go into eternal life,"—which is not yet said even of the Christian; and the immensely lengthened life of that time Isaiah witnesses (Isa. lxv. 20–22). On the other hand the wicked go away into eternal punishment—the fire prepared, not for man but "for the devil and his angels." They share the portion of those to whom they have chosen to unite themselves. All Scripture declares, with this passage, that it is strictly eternal.*

I do not know of another scripture which treats definitely of such a sessional judgment of the Gentiles as that which the Lord puts before us in this prophecy. The fiftieth psalm seems about as unique with regard to a similar judgment in Israel, when Jehovah having come and shining in glory out of Zion gathers before Him the covenanted people, and when there are, apparently, as here among the Gentiles, the wicked whom He addresses. Psalm fifty-one follows with a general confession on the part of the nation, who own their guilt in the rejection of Christ (see "Notes"). But the Lord's words in Matthew, in accordance with the character of the New Testament generally, bring in more clearly the eternal consequences.

In general the judgment of the nations when the Lord appears is set before us, as even in Revelation (xix), as a smiting with the sword. In the symbolic language of the Apocalypse, Christ is pictured as a Warrior upon a white horse, whom the "armies in heaven" follow. The beast and the kings of the earth and their army are gathered together to make war with Him that sits upon the horse, and with His army. The beast and false prophet are taken and cast righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee ahungered and fed thee; or thirsty and gave thee drink. And when saw we thee a stranger and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee? And when saw we thee sick or in prison, and came unto thee? And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily, I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it to one of the [j] least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.

* See for a full discussion, "Facts and Theories as to a Future State" (Loizeaux Brothers, New York).

[j] cf. ch. 10. 40–42. cf. Acts 9. 2, 4, 5.

alive into the lake of fire; while those that follow them are slain with the sword that proceeds out of the mouth of Him who thus manifests Himself as the "King of kings and Lord of lords." Taken with arms in their hands, in open rebellion, there is no need of judicial inquiry in such a case. But, undoubtedly, with the "rest of the dead" (xx. 5) they await the judgment of the "great white throne" for their measured out award. And this marks a wide difference between the selective judgment of Matthew and the distributive judgment which closes up the record. That in Matthew, being simply selective, requires but the one point to be raised—for Christ or against? While that of the great white throne, being judgment according to their works, requires the whole life-history to be brought into account. As forming no part of the "first resurrection," the "resurrection of life," all is settled for these as to the company with which they stand: it is of the "few stripes," or the "many" that alone there is question.

An Old Testament prophet confirms with his testimony that of Revelation. "And it shall come to pass in that day," says Isaiah (xxiv. 21–23), "that Jehovah shall punish the host of the high ones on high, and the kings of the earth upon the earth. And they shall be gathered together as prisoners are gathered in the pit, and shall be shut up in the prison; and after many days they shall be visited. Then the moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed: for Jehovah of hosts shall reign in mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before His ancients gloriously."

Revelation shows us both the punishment of the "host of the high ones on high," as implied in the binding of Satan (xx. 1–3) and casting him into the abyss, and that of the "kings of the earth upon the earth." But the great assize is not then. The millennium intervenes before their "visitation" comes, and final judgment. The Old Testament doctrine is in necessary harmony with the New and with the so-called "premillennial" interpretation of it.

The Old Testament also shows us Gentile nations outside of the empire of the "beast" and his associates,—the "Latin" nations. "Gog, the prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal" is neither in the empire, nor in alliance with it; and the names given and the powers connected, show not obscurely Russia and the east (Ezek. xxxviii., xxxix.). Daniel's "King of the north" is as certainly Greek, all through his closing chapters; and his position and might, which is not his own (chap. viii. 24) suggest that his connection is with the colossus at his back. All these are to find Jerusalem "a burdensome stone" to them, and meet their judgment at the day of the appearing of the Lord.

But these are the banded armies, behind which are the nations themselves; and we hear of spared ones sent to them (Isa. lxvi. 19), to declare the glory of the now reigning King to those who as yet have neither heard His fame nor seen His glory. And so His Kingdom still extends, not by a sudden revelation, as we might expect, and divine power alone, but by the aid of human instruments, with an economy of that which at such a time we might think would cease to be held for miracle, instructive to realize.

Christianity, it must be remembered, has entirely passed away. The true saints in Christendom having been taken up to meet the Lord in the air, those that have refused His grace while the day of grace continued, have been given up to strong delusion, to believe the lie of Antichrist (2 Thess. ii. 8–12). These swell the ranks of the followers of the beast and false prophet; and their doom

2 (41-46): The wicked.

[2] Then shall he say also to those on the left hand, [k]Depart from me, ye cursed, into the everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels: for I [l]was ahungered, and ye gave me not to eat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me not in; naked, and ye clothed me not; sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not. Then shall they answer, saying, Lord, when saw we thee ahungered, or athirst, or a stranger, or naked, or sick, or in prison, and did not minister unto thee? Then shall he answer them, saying, Verily, I say unto you, [m]Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of these least, ye did it not to me. And these shall go away into [n]eternal punishment; but the righteous into life eternal.

k ch. 7. 23.
l vers. 35-40. cf. Am. 6. 6.
m cf. Prov. 14. 31. cf. Zech. 2. 8.
n Mk. 9. 43-48. 2 Thess. 1. 9. cf. Rev. 14. 11. cf. Rev. 19. 20. cf. Ps. 9. 17.

is fixed (Rev. xiv. 9–11). But the mercy of God still finds its objects, those whom divine wisdom and love may count never to have really had the truth before them, so as to have rejected it, and to these, as well as those outside all profession, the everlasting gospel may bring salvation yet. To the Old Testament prophets Christianity is a thing unknown, and in their writings we must not expect to find it. The book of Revelation it is that adds all this to the Old Testament.

Among the nations outside of the Latin powers, it would seem that the same power of delusion will work in gathering after "false prophets," if not after "false Christs." The Lord warns of these in that day, as if there were more than the one special form of Antichrist which we find in the land of Israel. Satan has usually more than one device, and although never really "divided against himself," can work upon men by deceits of diverse kinds. Thus the Grecian king of the last days,—quite distinct as he is from the more conspicuous form of evil,—is spoken of as a king "of bold countenance, and understanding dark sentences" and who "stands up against the Prince of princes." This is usually taken to be Antiochus, or else Mohammed; but both are negatived as the complete fulfilment by the time specified for the fulfilment by the interpreting angel, "for the vision belongeth to the time of the end," "the end of the indignation"—of God against Israel,—"the appointed time of the end" (Dan. viii. 17, 19, R. V.). Such expressions a comparison with what we have had in Matthew should make absolutely clear.

How little we realize what "he that restraineth" (2 Thess. ii. 7, R. V.) is keeping back, and the flood-tide of evil ready to roll in, when in righteous compensation for the refusal of God's fullest grace, "he is taken out of the way." It is surely the Spirit of God as now working out His purposes as to the Church, that is the restraining power. He alone is competent for it. But the wearing out of divine patience is already manifesting itself for those that have eyes to see. The fearful "end" is not far off.

It is the "cutting off" of the Gentile church, which the apostle at the beginning distinctly threatened (Rom. xi. 21, 22), and thus the absence of Christianity from the world when Old Testament prophecy resumes its now suspended course of fulfilment, which necessarily baffles every interpreter who does not recognize this. For he must in that case necessarily bring in what he looks for, and apply what relates to Israel wholesale to the Christian church. It must be so: for while the Church is the object of God's favor upon earth, the Jews (nationally) are "enemies for your sake" (Rom. xi. 28). Christianity and Judaism cannot go on together; and the "end of the age," the Lord's prophecy here shows fully to be Jewish. For this to come, the Church, as well as the Holy Spirit indwelling her, must be taken out of the way; and "then" only "shall that wicked one be revealed," who for this reason cannot be the papacy, for it will have

DIVISION 7. (Chaps. xxvi.–xxviii.)

The Completed Purchase.

SUBDIVISION 1. (Chap. xxvi. 1–56).

The Presentation of the Offering.

1 (1-16): Prescient and obedient.
1 (1-5): the counsel of God and the counsel of man.

1. [1] AND it came to pass when Jesus had finished all these words, he said to his disciples, Ye [o]know that after two days cometh the passover, and the Son of man is delivered up to be crucified. Then were gathered together the chief priests and the elders of the people to the court of the high priest who was called Caiaphas, and took [p]counsel together that they might seize Jesus by subtilty, and kill him. But they said, Not during the feast, that there be not a [q]tumult among the people.

o Mk. 14. 1. Lk. 22. 1. John 13. 1.

p Jno.11.47. cf. Acts 4. 25-28.

q Mk. 14. 2. *cf.*ch.21.26.

then no Christian "temple of God" to "sit in" (2 Thess. ii. 4). Any neglect of landmarks so definite as these must work confusion as to the interpretation of prophecy.

Thus the "everlasting gospel" sent out to the nations (Rev. xiv. 6, 7) is applied without question to the missionary labors of the present day, although we may be thankful to know that the devoted men who give themselves to this blessed work, could scarcely find their Christian evangel in the words of the angel there, and most certainly do not say, what is so characteristic of the time to which it really refers, "the hour of His judgment is come." They say on the contrary, and rightly, with the apostle, "Now is the accepted time; behold now is the day of salvation."

But upon all this here is not the place to enlarge further. We pass on to very different themes from this.

DIV. 7.

The last division of the Gospel brings us to what is common to them all, and without which there would have been no gospel for us, the suffering and death of the Lord; His resurrection afterwards showing its divine efficacy. According to His own language in the parables of the thirteenth chapter, we may well speak of it as the story of the "completed purchase." The thought is characteristic of Matthew, where, as already said, the Cross is seen as the trespass-offering, which is the restitution-offering in view of the government of God, the wrong done being estimated and a fifth part added to it, that it may be the full amends which He reckons restitution. Thus the reckoning is the cost of atonement, the purchase-price.

In the parables referred to, the finder of the treasure "buys" the field and the merchant "buys" the pearl. The field is the world, and thus even the teachers of "destructive heresies" are "denying the Master that bought them" (2 Peter ii. 1). These are not redeemed, but they are purchased. The Church, Christ's "pearl of price," is both purchased and redeemed. We see again how the character of the trespass-offering suits that of the Royal "Master" whom we find in Matthew.

All through this part, spite of the depth of His humiliation, He shines out as truly Master,—One from whom no one takes His life, but He lays it down of Himself, having "authority," as no other has, to lay down His life, and to take it up again (John x. 18), while doing all in perfect subjection (as in Gethsemane we see Him) to His Father's will. It would be doing Him wrong to say of Him, in any other sense, that He was master of Himself. There was no "self," as with the best and holiest beside, to be master to. There was no division in Him, but perfect harmony throughout. Thus all things moved in 2 (6-16): the discernment of love, and the treachery of the disciple.

[2] Now when Jesus was in [r] Bethany, in the house of Simon the [s] leper, there came to him a woman having an alabaster box of very precious [t] ointment, and poured it upon his head, as he sat at table.* But when the disciples saw it, they were indignant, saying, To what purpose is this [u] waste? For this might have been sold for much, and given to the poor. But Jesus, knowing it, said unto them, Why trouble ye the woman? for she hath done me a good deed: for ye have the poor always with you; but [v] me ye have not always. For in pour-r Mk. 14. 3. Jno.12.1-8.

s *cf.*Lk.15.2. *cf.*Mk.16.9.
t cf. Song 1. 3. cf. Ps. 45.8. *cf.*Lk. 7.37, 38.
u Jno. 12. 4. cf. Am.8.5.
v Lk. 5. 34, 35. Jno. 16. 28.

*Literally, "as he reclined."

correspondence with Him,—even His enemies working out only that which was His will because the Father's,—stooping to death only to master it and make it serve Him, who could not be holden of it.

SUBD. 1.

We have, first, the Lord delivering Himself up,—not in reality to man, for to man the offering was not, and his part in it was only the consummation of human guilt,—but to God, for the drinking of that cup which only the Father's hand could give Him. Gethsemane is thus the central feature in what is before us here, although all the rest has the cross directly in view, with its consequences whether of trial or of blessing. Now, as we may say, the pledge given at the baptism of John is redeemed; the four days of the lamb being kept up are over; and He keeps the passover with His disciples, celebrating beforehand, in His own assured triumphant way, the fruits of a redemption of which the cost was all His own.

1. [1] He turns from the contemplation of His coming Kingdom to what is immediatedly before Him now, and for which He has been all through preparing and fortifying the hearts of His disciples: "Ye know that after two days is the feast of the passover, and the Son of man is delivered up to be crucified." He sees clearly before Him, and announces the exact time of His suffering, which is not in His enemies' hands, but in His own. And immediately we are told of their coming together, as if His word had given them liberty to act. Yet they act blindly, as blind they are, determining not to take Him at the feast, the very time He has marked out as that of His betrayal. He is to suffer at the passover, as the true Passover,—the Substance replacing the shadow; as the resurrection was on the day of the first-fruit sheaf, and the descent of the Holy Ghost at Pentecost.

[2] Next we have, in the strongest and sharpest contrast the love that pours out its precious ointment upon the Lord, and the murmuring of the disciples, prompted, as we are elsewhere told, by one who could sell the Lord Himself for the price of a slave. The last finds its occasion, also, in the first, love rousing and developing its awful opposite in the soul of this unhappy man, whom the defeat of his earthly ambitions and carnal hopes has already set in antagonism. He had begun to compensate himself, as best he could, with the contents of the common bag which carried all the means of subsistence of the little company. That pitiful compensation was coming to an end. Clearer sighted in his unbelief than his companions in their faith, he could understand the intimations, constantly now coming, of his Master's death. The enmity of the leaders of the people was too plain, to need much other prophecy of what was to be. It might not come to that: at the end we find him possessed with the hope that in fact it would not. Still he needed to make his escape from this ruined cause, and carry with him also what he could secure. The price of this ointment might well be coveted by one in such a position, and he breaks out openly with his complaint: "To what purpose is this waste?"

She, too, who has come there with her ointment, has realized as those ing out this ointment on my body, she did it for my [w]burial. Verily I say unto you, Wheresoever this [z]gospel shall be preached in the whole world, that also which this woman hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her. Then one of the twelve who was called [y]Judas Iscariot went unto the chief priests, and said, What will ye give me, and I will deliver him up to you? And they settled with him for thirty pieces of silver. And from that time he sought opportunity to deliver him up.

w cf. Mk. 16. 1. circ. ch. 16. 21-23.
x cf. 1 Thess. 1, 7, 8. cf. Phil. 4. 18.
y Mk. 14. 10, 11. Lk. 22. 3-6. Jno. 13. 3, 27-30.

around Him have not yet, the death that is now drawn so near Him. But the effect is only, if possible, to make Him more absorbingly the object for her heart, and whatever is precious for her goes into death with Him. Her use of the ointment testifies of this, as well as of the fragrance of the death itself, which will abide with us for eternity, and in which we too abide, and shall abide—in the sweet savor of this wonderful obedience.

Even true disciples are caught by the cry of utilitarianism that that which is spent upon Christ alone is "waste," and taken from the poor; and such pleas become for many effectual arguments against what true devotedness to Him demands. Those who would understand and appreciate the laying down of life for His sake, can often not understand the sacrifice of usefulness on His account, even though the demand come in the way of duty. They will say, indeed, that duty cannot really demand such sacrifice; but it does very often demand that we leave entirely out of question all consideration of results, and follow simply and without reserve the dictates of the Word. And it is certainly true that the thought of usefulness governs often disastrously even the interpretation of the word of God itself. Results are never really safe as guidance, and this for at least two plain reasons. First, because they must follow the action, and therefore come too late to determine it. And secondly, if it be thought that we can profit by the experience of others, so many things combine to produce them that we are constantly in danger of mistaking the real cause. Of course, if God's word has spoken decisively, even in the least particular, then all pondering of results is mere unfaithfulness.

The Lord openly vindicates the act of the woman. This devotedness shows itself at the right time to refresh His true human heart, afflicted with the treachery of Judas, and now in near prospect of the cross. She had manifested an appreciative love which those around Him were unable even to enter into, and He declares that wherever His gospel shall be preached among men, this deed of her's shall be told for a memorial of her. It may well be, indeed, a corrective of that tendency of utilitarianism to invade the gospel itself, to the great harm and loss of souls; and this is not unapt to be where salvation is made freest, but more a boon to man than a cost to God. Thus Christ is little known, little followed: to have salvation is to have all that the heart craves; yet it is not really satisfied thus, but the world comes in to fill the vacuum.

The dearer Christ is, the dearer souls will be; and His people represent Him for hearts true to Him. But the bland liberality which so often simulates love to the people of God, while it allows His word to be slighted and His rights to be discredited, works to His dishonor and their inevitable loss. To give Christ His due is the only way by which His people can be enriched. Ah, that the savor of the woman's ointment might indeed still fill the house!

But this love and worship bring out the traitor's heart, and the Iscariot, the "trafficker," fearfully earns the surname by which we know him (see p. 119, notes). For the price of a slave he agrees with the chief priests His enemies, to deliver up his Lord into their hands, they putting contempt thus upon Him and His betrayer. They know not that they are but moving in the way predicted, and manifesting His sovereignty in their very rejection of it.

2 (17-35): At the passover.
2 (17-19): ordering of the passover.

2. [1] Now on the [z]first [day] of unleavened bread, the disciples came to Jesus, saying, Where wilt thou that we make ready for thee to eat the passover? And he said, Go into the city to such an one, and say unto him, The Teacher saith, My [a]time is near: I will keep the passover at thy house with my disciples. And the disciples did as Jesus had bidden them; and they made ready the passover.

2 (20-25): the traitor pointed out.

[2] And when the [b]evening was come he sat at table with the twelve disciples. And as they were eating he said, Verily I say unto you, that one of you shall [c]deliver me up. And they were grieved exceedingly, and began to say unto him, each one, [d]Is it I, Lord? And he answered and said, He that [e]dippeth his hand with me into the dish, the same shall deliver me up. The Son of man goeth as it is [f]written of him; but woe to that man by whose means the Son of man is delivered up! [g]Good were it for that man if he had not been born. And Judas, who delivered him up, answered and said, Is it I, [h]Rabbi? He saith unto him, Thou hast said.

[z] Mk. 14.12-16. Lk. 22.7-13.
[a] cf. Lk. 9. 51. cf. Jno. 8. 20.
[b] Mk. 14. 17-21. Lk. 22. 14-18, 21-23. Jno. 13. 1.
[c] Jno. 6. 70, 71. Jno. 13. 21.
[d] cf. Ps. 139. 23, 24 with 1 Cor. 4. 4.
[e] Ps. 41. 9. cf. Ps. 55. 12-14. Jno. 13. 18, 26.
[f] Mk. 9. 12. Lk. 24. 44-46.
[g] Jno. 17. 12. Acts 1. 25.
[h] ctr. ver. 22; cf. ver. 49; cf. 1 Cor. 12. 3.

2. [1] We now come to the last passover, the story of which is by all the synoptists very briefly told. It is John alone who, while he scarcely mentions the passover itself, gives the full out-pouring of Christ's heart in connection with it. The ordering of the paschal supper is more briefly given in Matthew than in Mark or Luke, the directions as to finding the man at whose house it is to be prepared being omitted. But it is seen, all through, how fully He is Master of all circumstances, and the disciples, it is evident, are intended to feel this. If He be going down the steep decline to Calvary, it is of His own free choice, and He is still the King who does so. "My time is at hand," seems certainly spoken for the ear of a disciple; and it is natural that to such the Lord should give the privilege of entertaining Him at a time like this. That it is already the first day of unleavened bread is decisive that He did not anticipate the appointed time for the passover, as many have thought. The three synoptists unite in this specification of time, Mark and Luke adding that it was the day when they killed the passover. The statements of John alone are thought to be in contradiction to this, but have been often shown to be not really so; nor is this the place in which to consider them.

[2] The traitor is next pointed out, but by gradual approach, as if to alarm and arouse the conscience to repentance before the guilt was fixed. "One of you shall deliver Me up." Then "he that dippeth his hand with Me in the dish." Slowest of all to respond is Judas with his question, asked with fatal certainty of what would be the answer, yet with the appearance of the same innocence as the rest. But notice, he does not, as they, address Christ as his "Lord." That is ended for him: it is "Rabbi, is it I?" "After the sop," says John, "Satan entered into him;" and Satan could not say, "Lord." If there were any struggle in his soul, it is ended now; and in the face of the awful "woe" that he has heard from lips that lie not, he goes away to do determinately what would stamp him as the "son of perdition" through all eternity. Such is the hardening power of sin.

[3] This separation of Judas from the rest takes place before the institution of the memorial feast which follows here; for John tells us that "Judas, having received the sop," went immediately out. Luke inverts the order of this and the last section; but Luke's order is often different from that of time. The

[3] (26-29): the memorial.

[3] And as they were eating, Jesus [e]took bread, and blessed, and brake [it], and, as he gave it to the disciples, said, Take, eat; this is my [f]body. And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it: for this is my *blood of the [new] * covenant, which is shed for many, for the remission of

*Some omit "new."

[e] Mk. 14.22-25. Lk.22.19,20.
[f] 1 Cor.11.23-29. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 24.
[g] 1 Cor. 10. 16. cf. Heb.13. 20. *cf.*1Jno.1.7.

point, however, is not of doctrinal importance: for few would advocate a known traitor being admitted to the table of the Lord; and if it were to be permitted, no discipline could be maintained at all. If Judas were present, he was yet unknown as such to the disciples; and while the Lord knows all the secrets of the heart, His knowledge cannot, it is plain, be guidance for us, who do not possess it. The question is, therefore, as already said, of no practical importance: the principles involved are settled conclusively elsewhere.

There are others, as we know, much more widely and keenly debated, though one cannot say really more entitled to be heard. The Romanist contention that the bread and wine, after the Lord's blessing, were pronounced by Him to be literally His body and blood, involves a grossness of conception which He has Himself rebuked elsewhere (John vi. 60-63). It makes Him while alive in the body, take and break His body in His hands. It multiplies the body of Christ, at the will of man, upon myriads of altars, day by day. It makes God work as constant miracles to conceal those which are in this way taking place; so that to the senses that should still be bread and wine, which has wholly changed its character. It makes the flesh to profit spiritually, while the Lord has Himself denied it. And all this is done to escape a difficulty which never existed, and to make us treat one of the commonest forms of figurative speech, which we are every day using, as if it were a manifest perversion to take it as they themselves are doing without thought of wrong. "The rock was Christ," needed no transubstantiation to make good. Nay, even, "the cup is the new covenant in My blood," cannot be understood by them but as a figure. But "this is My body," must be maintained, in the face of whatever objection from nature, from spirit, from the connection here, from Scripture elsewhere, in the grossest literality!

The doctrine of consubstantiation escapes some of these incongruities, no doubt, but it is as open to some of these charges as is the Romish one itself. It admits that the bread is bread, and the wine wine; but it maintains that the "flesh profiteth" in the way Christ denies; and the actual production, multiplication and eating of the body of Christ.

In opposition to both these is the Calvinistic or "Reformed" view, in which the reception is not by the mouth, but by faith, through the power of the Spirit; and not of the substance of His body and blood, but of the sacrificial virtue or efficacy of His work alone.

Zwingle, on the other hand, maintained that the bread and wine were simply significant memorials; but this is considered by the greater number of the Reformed "too low" a view. Yet in refusing the thought of any actual physical reception of Christ in the Supper, and limiting this reception to that of the virtue of His sacrificial work, and in declaring that it is by faith we feed upon Him, and we can do the same thing apart from the Supper altogether, they come much nearer to Zwingle's view than they seem to be aware: for if, wherever there is faith, Christ is received and fed upon, and in the Supper not apart from faith, what does this add, except a significant memorial of what faith receives?

It is, however, in Luke and in Corinthians, and not in either of the first two Gospels, that its memorial character is explicitly affirmed; and this is of the most decisive importance for the interpretation. "Do this," the Lord says:

sins. But I tell you, I will not drink any more of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it 'new with you in my Father's Kingdom.

l cf. ch. 13. 43. cf. Num. 6. 13-21. cf. Ps. 4. 7.

for what?—"for calling me to mind" (Luke xxii. 19). Here the precise object of the bread and cup is stated; and it is the only object: no other ever is; any other than this is purely an addition to the word of Christ.

Now a remembrance is of what is not present, never of what is. Moreover it is of something in the past, not in time present. The apostle's comment upon it is as plain as can be: "for as often as ye eat this bread and drink the cup, ye proclaim the Lord's death, till He come" (1 Cor. xi. 26, R. V). Clearly the Lord's death is not a present thing, but past: "death has no more dominion over Him." A dead Lord it is we remember, but a living Lord with whom we have now to do.

"Body" and "blood": why, of course, this is death. Would they be mentioned apart, if it were not so? "My body which is given for you" makes us naturally think of a dead not a living body; but "body and blood" separate: of what else can we think? We have no reason at all for attributing "blood" to the Lord in resurrection. Blood is the sign of change and the means of renewal. It implies a life sustained by food and drink,—capable of dying, though not necessarily subject to death. After His resurrection we hear Him speak of His "flesh and bones," not "flesh and blood" (Luke xxiv. 39). But, apart from this, the blood spoken of here is the "blood shed for many," the blood of sacrifice: every thing assures us that we have before us here, not Christ as He is at all, but as He was: the bread and the cup are just significant memorials,—nothing else. The language used prohibits all possible thought of the Lord's glorified humanity, and cuts away all basis for any view of an actual reception of Christ's body and blood; for in that case it must be a dead Christ that we receive, and there is no dead Christ.

Moreover, this "Remember Me" of our Lord and Master seems quite to overtop all thoughts of what we receive in the bread and wine. No doubt we can never have Christ really before us without finding blessing in it; and no doubt the picture given is one of how Christ as the Bread of Life sustains the spiritual strength of His believing people. But what He desires in it is our heart's remembrance, and the highest and sweetest view that we can have of it is surely that which brings before us, and qualifies us best to satisfy, this desire of His.

"Take, eat: this is My body."

"Drink ye all of it: for this is My blood of the new covenant, which is shed for many, for the remission of sins."

Faith it is, of course, that enables us to do what is spoken of here. Eating and drinking are terms which imply the fullest appropriation of that which becomes thus part of our very selves. We enter into the sweetness and blessedness of a love so free, so costly, stooping so low, so triumphant in this humiliation. Out of death has come forth life; we enter into communion with death. Evil has been explored to its depths, and there is yet no dimming of the glory of God; nay, never was He so glorious.

Therefore this blood is that of a new covenant, in which God alone speaks, and as He will. He is free from all hindrance, and thus His whole heart comes out, and the result is that it is grace to the full that appears, and nothing but grace (Jer. xxxi. 31–34). Unlike the covenant that He had made with the people when He brought them out of the land of Egypt, this covenant thus abides. Human instability does not affect it, and sin is cancelled: "the blood of Jesus Christ cleanses from all sin."

But now He is to be separate from His people's joy on earth, looking for participation with them in His Father's Kingdom. Then He will drink the wine with them in a new manner, no more a Nazarite stranger from that as-

4 (30-35): tested and failing.

4 And, when they had sung a [m]hymn, they went out unto the mount of Olives. Then saith Jesus unto them, [n]All ye shall be offended because of me, this night: for it is written, I will [o]smite the Shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad; but after I am risen, I will go before you into [p]Galilee. But Peter answered and said unto him, If [q]all shall be offended in thee, yet will I never be offended. Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, that this night, before the [r]cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice. Peter saith unto him, Even if I must die with thee, yet will I in no wise deny thee. Likewise also said all the disciples.

3 (36-46): Gethsemane (the "oil-press"): the realization of the cup.

3. Then [s]cometh Jesus with them to a place called Gethsemane, and he saith unto his disciples, Sit ye here, while I go and pray yonder. And taking with him Peter and the two sons of Zebedee, he began to be [t]oppressed with grief and desolate. Then saith he unto them, My soul is plunged in* sorrow,—unto death:

m Mk.14.26. cf. Jno. 14. 31. n Mk. 14.27.
o Zech. 13.7.
p ch.28.7,10, 16. Mk. 14. 28. Mk. 16. 7.
q Mk.14.29-31. Lk. 22. 31-34. Jno. 13. 36-38.
r cf. Mk. 13. 35-37.
s Mk. 14.32-42. Lk. 22. 39-46. Jno. 18. 1.
t cf. Jno. 12. 27. cf. Is. 53. 3.

*περίλυπος, "circled with grief."

sociation with His own, for which in heaven itself He waits, as the full cup of blessing.

4 They sing a hymn—in Israel it was usually the four psalms called the great Hallel (Ps. cxv.-cxviii.),—and go out together to the Mount of Olives. And He warns them once more of what is before Him and them. They will all be offended because of Him and scattered; for the prophet had foretold the smiting of the Shepherd, and the consequent dispersion of the sheep (Zech. xiii. 7). But after His resurrection He would go before them into Galilee. In fact the Gospel closes with His meeting them there, passing over most of what took place at Jerusalem, for in Galilee it is that He announces to them the Kingdom as in His hand, and this is the theme of Matthew, as we well know. Every Gospel, as every book of Scripture, keeps to its own portion of the one harmonious revelation of God to which it belongs.

Peter is the one who is to illustrate most fully the "offence of the cross" among those pre-eminently named as Christ's disciples. How perfectly it is shown that divine grace alone can be the hope of any. It is characteristic of him who fails in this signal manner that he should be the one most loudly to maintain that for himself, at any rate, such failure was impossible. And this he repeats, still more emphatically, in spite of the Lord's more precise and positive assurance. He that thinketh he standeth must take heed lest he fall, not merely because of the general liability, but as being then most of all liable. Our own strength is just our weakness, as our weakness realized will be our way to strength—a strength not our own. Every one of the Gospels enforces this most solemn lesson. Matthew and Mark assure us of the participation of the other disciples in Peter's perilous self-confidence. He who would plead exemption must condemn himself by this very pleading.

3. In approaching the mysterious suffering in Gethsemane we are warned by every circumstance—even the scantness of the pregnant words—of the need of reverent caution. Eight of the eleven disciples are left behind, and with Peter, James, and John He goes on further. Presently He bids these also, "Tarry ye here, and watch with Me," but Himself still goes on to what they cannot share with Him. Only a little further, and then He falls upon His face in that deep distress of which He has spoken to the three, plunged in sorrow, as unto death,—"sore amazed," says Mark—and desolate. So He prays,—one prayer which with Him, we may say confidently, never had its like,—"My tarry ye here and watch with me. And going forward a little, he fell upon his face, praying and saying, My Father, if it be possible, let this [u]cup pass from me; nevertheless not as I will, but as [v]thou wilt. And he cometh unto the disciples, and findeth them [w]sleeping, and saith unto Peter, So ye were not able to watch with me one hour! [x]watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation: the [y]spirit indeed is willing, but the

cf. Rom. 13. 11, 12; cf. Eph. 6. 18. y cf. Rom. 7. 15, etc; cf. Gal. 5. 17.

u cf. Gen. 22. 7, 8. cf. Heb. 5. 7. v cf. ch. 6. 10. cf. Jno. 5. 30. cf. Jno. 6. 38–40. cf. Heb. 10. 7–10. w cf. Lk. 9. 32. x Mk. 13. 33.

Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me: nevertheless not as I will, but as Thou wilt."

He rises, comes back to His disciples whom He finds not watching but asleep; wakes them with a reproof and yet a tender apology for their weakness; goes back to say what He has said before, but with less pleading, "My Father, if this cannot pass except I drink it, Thy will be done."

He comes again to His disciples, to find them again asleep, leaves them once more, to pray the same words.

Then it is over. He comes back to them now to bid them sleep on and take their rest. There is a conflict passed, which Luke emphasizes in two particulars which he alone relates: the bloody sweat and the visit of an angel to strengthen Him,—two things which show the exceeding pressure of the agony upon Him physically, but add nothing to the explanation of its nature. What was the "cup" from which He shrank? which, plainly, He was not yet drinking, but which was before Him; as to which there was this prayer that could not be answered; something from which it was perfection in Him that shrank, because in Him all ever was perfect?

It seems certain that it was the cross, in some aspect of it, that cross to which He was going on, and which He had again and again announced to His disciples, and the necessity of it. "The Son of man must be lifted up," He had declared long before to Nicodemus, and again to the multitude (John xii. 32, 33): by this "signifying what death He should die." This, so announced by Himself, it does not seem possible that He should now pray might be averted.

There is, however, a passage in Hebrews which at first sight might seem to put it in this way, as it most certainly seems to refer to this very time, when the Lord "in the days of His flesh, when He had offered up prayers and supplications unto Him that was able to save Him from death," "was heard for His godly fear" (v. 7). This surely refers to Gethsemane, in part at least: yet it does not speak of an unheard prayer, but of a heard one. Moreover, as He was not saved from death, what, both in the Revised, and in the older Version, has been put into the margin, should be in the text—"to Him that was able to save Him out of death," not from it. Out of it He was saved, was perfected as Captain (or "Leader" or "Originator") of salvation by the obedience wrought in suffering, and so is able to save to the uttermost all that come unto God by Him.

Resurrection was the divine answer, then, to a prayer that was heard; but in the twenty-second psalm, which also emphasizes a prayer that was heard, we have a prayer of the same blessed Person, as to which He says, "I cry in the day-time and Thou hearest not; and in the night-season, and am not silent." Have we not here the true Gethsemane prayer for which we are seeking? could there be more than one such prayer of the Lord Jesus?

The subject of the psalm also is the cross, and that in its sin-offering aspect. The cry that characterizes it is the cry that in Matthew the Lord takes up and uses as His own—the awful cry, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" a cry which is answered in the psalm by Him who utters it (See Notes on the psalm). And here, surely, is that from which the Lord must needs flesh is weak. Going away again the second time, he prayed saying, My Father, if this cannot pass, except I drink it, thy will be done. And he came and found them asleep again; for their eyes were heavy. And leaving them, he went away again and prayed the third time, saying the same thing. Then cometh he to the disciples, and saith unto them, [z]Sleep on now, and take your rest; behold, the hour is nigh, and the Son of man is delivered into the hands of sinners. Arise, let us be going: behold, he is nigh, who delivereth me up.

4 (47-56): The delivering up.
1 (47-50): Identification.

4. [1] And, while he was yet speaking, behold, [a]Judas, one [z] cf. Ps. 69. 20.

[a] Mk.14.43-45. Lk. 22. 47, 48. Jno.18.2-9.

shrink because of His very perfection. Such a cup He might take as the Father's will for Him, that God who is holy might dwell among the praises of His redeemed people, but not otherwise. Here then is the awful "cup" to which He is looking forward in Gethsemane, the subject of the one only prayer as to which it could be said of Him who "heard Him always," "Thou hearest not."

To realize the subject of the prayer is not to solve the mystery of it. It certainly gives us to see how true, while perfect, the humanity of the Lord Jesus was. In the seventh century, the words "Not My will, but Thine be done" were used against the Monothelites to prove the distinctness of the human from the divine will in Christ. But while we recognize their competency for such purpose, it is for us to acquiesce in the Lord's own assurance that "No one knoweth the Son but the Father," and to refrain from seeking to penetrate beyond what is ours to know. The truth of His humanity, and its personality (without which it would not have been true) we may thank God for showing us in so clear a manner; and we must hold it fast as essential to the proper Christian faith. Analysis of His inscrutable nature we should not venture upon.

Gethsemane, the "oil-press," answers to its name. We find in it, not the wine-press, the suffering that wrought atonement, not the bearing of sin itself, but the pressure upon Him of that supreme sorrow, as now He touched the very border of it. We are allowed to see the agony of it to Him, who nevertheless takes the cup in its full bitterness, humbling Himself and becoming obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. From the "oil-press" nothing flows but that which is of the Spirit: to God, uncompromising obedience; to man, self-sacrificing devotion to meet every need. We can understand how in the oil here as in the dove before, the types of Christ and of the Spirit should be one; and even so it is that the Spirit rests upon Him in absolute congenial delight. The meat-offering is first mingled with oil and then anointed with oil.

Mere human incompetence for that hour is seen in the disciples. Oppressed with it, they are found asleep—stupefied. As on the mount of glory, so in the valley of the shadow of death. They neither respond to His tender request that they should watch with Him, nor realize their own need, that they enter not into temptation. Even this incompetence might have been warning to them but was not, and they have to prove by sadder experience what they have not learned in a happier way.

And yet, indeed, they may now sleep on and take their rest. The work of deliverance is in hands that cannot fail in what they undertake, although there is now to be laid a deeper foundation than for the earth of old, and the "new creation" to be built upon it is to transcend in every measure the dimensions of the old.

4. [1] The traitor comes now, with the armed men he has procured,—a great multitude with swords and clubs from the chief priests and elders. "The swords indicate that the Roman cohort (John xviii. 3) was the centre of this

of the twelve, came, and with him a great multitude with swords and clubs from the chief priests and elders of the people. Now he that delivered him up had given them a sign, saying, Whom I shall kiss, the same is he; hold him fast. And straightway, coming to Jesus he said, Hail, Rabbi, and [b]kissed him affectionately. But Jesus said unto him, Friend, for what art thou here? Then they came and laid hands on Jesus, and held him fast.

[b] cf. 2 Sam. 20. 9. cf. ch. 7.21.

2 (51–54): resistance and submission.

[2] And behold, one of those with Jesus stretched out his hand, and [c]drew his sword, and smote the servant of the high priest, and cut off his ear. Then saith Jesus unto him, Put up again thy sword into its place, for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword. Or thinkest thou that I cannot call upon my Father, and he shall now place on my side more than [d]twelve legions of angels? How then would the [e]scriptures be fulfilled that thus it must be?

[c] Mk. 14.46, 47. Lk. 22. 49–51. Jno. 18. 10, 11.
[d] cf. 2 Ki. 6. 17. cf. Lk. 2.13, 14.
[e] ver. 24. cf. Jno. 19. 28. cf. Acts 13. 29.

multitude; while the clubs and so forth indicate that the Jewish temple watch, and other miscellaneous fanatics, were there also" (Lange). Jew and Gentile, men of different nationality and diverse classes, were ready to take part, and did, in the world's crowning sin.

The treachery of Judas would fain still conceal itsely in the kiss of identification, which is given emphatically, as if to assure the One he is betraying that he is not part of the multitude that follow him. The Lord penetrates this disguise, not with a rebuke but with a question: "Friend, wherefore art thou here?" to which He adds, as Luke tells us, the more direct one, "Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" Divine love has not, even yet, ceased its expostulation,—has not closed the door against his return even yet.

[2] They take Him unresisting. But Peter is again to illustrate how far even a loyal heart may be from the mind of Christ. In speaking of the hostile attitude of the world in which He is leaving them, the Lord had enjoined one that had no sword to sell even his garment and buy one (Luke xxii. 36). Peter, taking this literally, as we may suppose, no sooner finds his beloved Master thus assailed than his weapon is out, and he smites a servant of the high priest and cuts off his ear. But he has belittled and misrepresented Him whom he would serve, who must be fallen low indeed to need His disciple's sword to extricate Him from such hands as these. If He yield, it is to God, not man, He yields, —to take the cup from the Father's hand: and what should the sword do here? Were not heaven's legions dependent on His will? and would not the Father, if He had willed it, give Him, not twelve frail disciples, but more than twelve legions of angels?

But He had proclaimed also as the law of His Kingdom that they "resist not evil." The men in authority upon earth—to whom God for the need of men had given authority—to these it belonged to do this. If they failed, God was still upon the throne and could not fail. But for His people, His own path of quiet submission was ordained,—submission not to man, but to God. Here to resist would be to resist Him.

This was the path which for Christ Himself alone could give Him the throne for which He came, and His enemies were but unwittingly preparing to fulfil the prophetic voices which from the beginning had proclaimed this as the way of the divine counsels for Him. For the "Captain of salvation" must be "perfected through sufferings." The ram of sacrifice is taken by its horns (Gen. xxii. 13); the need of man thus laying hold, through the love that was His nature, of the power that dwelt in Him.

[3] (55, 56): fulfilment.

[3] At that hour Jesus said unto the multitudes, Did ye [f] come out as against a robber with swords and clubs to take me? I sat daily teaching in the temple, and ye laid no hold upon me. But all this is come to pass that the scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled.

[f] Mk. 14.48, 49. Lk. 22. 52, 53.

[4] (56): the flight.

[4] Then the disciples all [g] forsook him and fled.

[g] Mk. 14.50. cf. 2 Tim. 4. 16.

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chap. xxvi. 57–xxvii. 54.)

The Cross.

1 (xxvi. 57–75): The true ground: His divine claim.

[1] (57–68): the claim asserted.

1. [1] NOW they that had laid hold on Jesus led him away to [h] Caiaphas the high priest, where the scribes and the elders were gathered together. And [i] Peter followed him afar off unto the court of the high priest, and entering in, sat with the officers to see the end.

[h] Mk. 14.53. Lk. 22. 54. cf. Jno. 18. 12–14.

[i] Mk. 14. 54. Jno. 18. 15, 16.

Now the chief priests and all the council sought [j] false witness against Jesus, to put him to death. And they found none, though many false witnesses came. But at [j] Mk. 14.55–60. cf. Ps. 35. 11.

[3] Of this fulfilment of the prophets He reminds the multitudes that had come to seize Him, as He had just reminded the disciple that would have fought for Him. Why had they not taken Him, while daily in the temple He had been teaching publicly amongst them? They had feared the people, as we know; and Judas's treachery alone had given them what they deemed their opportunity. But neither power nor guile could have succeeded against Him, had it not been for that will of God which Scripture witnessed to; which indeed bound them so little, but Him so absolutely; yet they too were fulfilling it.

[4] Now the sheep of the flock are scattered, as the prophet had borne witness: protected in their flight, as John shows us, by their smitten Shepherd. In fact, they could not follow Him now, as He had said to Peter. There could not be permitted even any obscuring of the truth of the solitary, unique place in which He was now to stand, not with but for His people. Even though for Peter it might be entirely different in reality from the cross of his Lord, yet who could think of Peter on the cross beside his Lord? No, He might be "numbered with the transgressors" but not with His disciples. He was alone, therefore, now, and to be alone; until, His work perfectly achieved, He should come forth in the morning of resurrection, with the night for ever past.

SUBD. 2.

The Lord of glory is now in the hands of men, and we are to see what is in their hearts to do with Him. The perfect and ordained trial of man it is, this opportunity of theirs, and in result the world is manifest in all its dreadful alienation from God. The Cross gives character to all that is before us now; men are acting, and God too is acting in view of it, although the special, anticipated cup is not taken till the Cross is actually reached, and even then is confined to the three hours of intensest suffering marked off by the preternatural darkness from all the rest. Those will lose much of what God would teach us as to the mystery of atoning suffering who do not see the distinct meaning here. All the ground is holy, all the suffering necessary; but the more on this account, not less, must be the meaning of such differences as we find here.

1. Christ is now before men's judgment-seats, the ecclesiastical, as we call it, and the civil; before the high priest and the governor; the Jew and the Gentile. The charge before each is different: in the one case, blasphemy; in the other, rebellion. The last was to the Jew every way a false charge, made to serve a purpose, and by the Roman so fully seen through that it was but like last came two false witnesses and said, This man said, I am able to [k]destroy the temple of God, and in three days to build it. And the high priest arose and said unto him, Answerest thou nothing? what do these witness against thee? But Jesus was silent. And the high priest said unto him, I [l]adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us if thou be the Christ, the son of God. Jesus saith unto him, Thou hast said. Moreover I say unto thee that from henceforth ye shall see the Son of man [m]sitting upon the right hand of power and [n]coming on the clouds of heaven. Then the high priest rent his clothes, saying, He hath spoken blasphemy: what need have we more of witnesses? See now, ye k ch. 27. 40. cf. Jno. 2. 19–22.

l Mk. 14. 61–64. Lk. 22. 69–71.

m Ps. 110. 1. Mk. 16. 19. cf. Acts 7. 55, 56.

n cf. ch. 24. 30. Rev. 1. 7. Dan. 7. 13, 14.

mocking him to his face to prefer it. The whole land was soon to go up in flames in opposition to the hated tyranny of the Gentile; and Pilate had already tasted the temper of these men now so careful to maintain the authority of Cæsar. Nay, they were using him in all this for their own purposes, as he well knew, and making him the instrument of their malice. For an upright man the escape for him was easy; but being the man he was, it was impossible.

The first charge was the real one, though here too they might seek false witness to establish it. But the essential provocation for them was in this, what He had already told them to their faces. They were saying, "This is the Heir: come, let us kill Him and seize on His inheritance." "They have seen," He declares, "and hated both Me and My Father."

Certainly, not even to themselves, would they have admitted this. Not only was there a multitude that blindly followed them, but the leaders too were in the deepest sense "blind" also, as again He had told them. There is, in the awful mystery of our fallen nature, a blindness which is all the more intense because intentional,—an ignorance which is the fruit of knowledge. And such was the misery of these unhappy men, with whom the very light in them was darkness, knowing not because they would not know, and condemned therefore even because they did not.

But this was the ground, then, of His accusation, as they declared themselves, "by our law He ought to die, because He made Himself the Son of God" (John xix. 7). This was the issue, though they never faced it, "Was He the Son of God?" Confessedly even, that they never meant to face. Scripture had silenced them. David in Spirit had certainly called his Son his Lord. Why this? They had no answer, and they would not seek one.

[1] He on His part stood by this issue—would not accept another—would not take the Kingdom upon any other ground. "Thou art the Son of God" must in the lips of a disciple be the basis of the other affirmation, "Thou art the King of Israel." False witness, such as they sought, they did not need to condemn Him, nor would He plead one way or the other against it. Let them put the real question, He will answer under oath, and does. "Tell us if Thou be the Christ the Son of God." And He answers, "Thou hast said. Moreover I say unto thee that from henceforth ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven."

There is His counter-challenge. He, yet in their hands, patiently subject to all the indignities they can heap upon Him,—He is just at the end—at the end for ever, of all this humiliation. "From henceforth" all will be changed for Him and for them. And He summons forth Daniel again to link that manhood of His, which they deemed a sufficient disproof of His highest claim, with those prophetic scriptures to which, through all that was in contradiction to it, the heart of the nation clung. Let them give heed to the voices, then, which out of the past spoke with new energy in the living present. Affirmed have heard the [o]blasphemy; what think ye? They answered and said, He is worthy * of [p]death. Then did they [q]spit in his face, and buffeted him, and some [r]struck him with the palms of their hands, saying, Prophesy unto us, O Christ: who is he that smote thee?

2 (69–75): the denial.

2 Now Peter [s]sat without in the court, and a maiden came unto him and said, Thou also wast with Jesus the Galilean. But he [t]denied before them all, saying, I know not what thou sayest. And when he had gone out into the entrance, another saw him, and said unto those that were there, This man also was with Jesus the Nazarean. And again he denied with an oath, I do not know the man. But after a little while, they that stood by came and said unto Peter, Of a truth thou also art of them, for even thy [u]speech discovereth thee. Then began he to [v]curse and to swear, I know not the man. And immediately [the] [w]cock crew. And Peter remembered the word of Jesus that he had spoken, Before [the] cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice. And going out, he [x]wept bitterly.

2 (xxvii. 1–26): The deceptive charge, and the opposing witnesses.

1 (1, 2): before the governor.

2. [1] Now, when morning had come, all the chief priests and the elders of the people took counsel against Jesus,

o cf. Jno. 10. 31–36.
p cf. Lev. 24. 16. cf. Jno. 19. 7. cf. Jno. 5. 18.
q Mk. 14. 65. Lk. 22. 63–65. Jno. 18. 22, 23. Is. 50. 6. Is. 52. 14.
r cf. Jno. 19. 3. cf. Mi. 5. 1.
s Mk. 14. 66–72. Lk. 22. 55–62. Jno. 18. 15–18, 25–27.
t cf. ver. 35. cf. Phil. 3. 3. cf. Acts 3. 14.
u cf. Acts 2. 7.
v etc., ch. 16. 16, 17.
w ver. 34.
x etc., ch. 27. 3–5. cf. 2 Sam. 12. 13. cf. 2 Cor. 7. 9–11.

* ἔνοχος, legally guilty.

as such, with all the glory of His words and works to give authority to His witness, Christ the Son of God was there.

But it avails only for His condemnation, and to set loose the fury of wild passion stirred by the breath of satanic enmity: for this was their hour and the power of darkness (Luke xxii. 53). Frenzied with the majesty of that calm Presence in which they stand, they break out in insult and defiance of all His claim. Rending his clothes as in horror, the high-priest declares the trial over; He has blasphemed, He has condemned Himself. To which they all agree, that He is worthy of death. Then the pitiful form of justice being ended, the spirit beneath is free to manifest itself, and all the depths of men's hearts are poured out.

[2] The true witness of the Master is followed by the denial of the disciple,—the foremost of them all, and under his Master's eye. Three times over and even with noisy profanity, he denies companionship with or knowledge of Him; until it would seem, this reckless overflow of a heart too like their own, assures them, more than his denial, that indeed he cannot be a follower of "Jesus the Nazarene." Only the Eye that Peter discerns presently upon him can find still under all this the partaker of the old intimacy, the man to whom the Eternal Father had revealed His Son. Alas for this other self we carry with us, and which would disown the Christ that we think we could die for! Matthew does not indeed record the look of Jesus upon His fallen disciple, but how, when immediately the cock crew, he remembered the words of prophetic warning that had been addressed to him, but which had been surely part of the provision made for him to sustain the faith which Christ had prayed in that critical moment might not fail, even though it might seem to have already failed. With an awful spasm of conviction, out he went into the night, a crushed and broken man.

Night! but already the darkness was not unrelieved. That which had brought it into his soul was that which heralded the coming day.

2. The charge made before the high-priest was, as already said, the real one, to put him to death. And having bound him, they led him away, and [y]delivered him to Pilate the governor.

2 (3-5): the witness of the traitor.

[2] Then Judas, who had delivered him up, when he saw that he was condemned, was taken with [z]remorse and returned the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders, saying, I have sinned, in that I have betrayed the innocent blood. But they said, What is y Mk. 15. 1. Lk. 23. 1. Jno. 18. 28. cf. Gen. 37. 28, 36.

z ctr. ch. 26. 75.

and was the truth. He did affirm Himself to be what they charged Him with affirming, and was condemned for His own true witness. The charge before the governor was on the contrary a fictitious charge, with just so much truth in it only as would make it serve their purpose. Pilate hears it, hears His own declaration that He is a King, nay, that He is King of the Jews, and having heard and examined, declares Him innocent, and does so to the end. The Kingdom that He claimed was not to be established by human power, nor might they draw sword on His behalf. He had exhorted them to give to Cæsar what was Cæsar's, and declared that they that took the sword should perish by the sword. Cæsar had nothing to fear, therefore, except it were possibly from a quarter where to resist would be hopeless.

But the Jews had not the power of inflicting a penalty of death, and had need, therefore, of the Roman governor for this purpose, and were, no doubt, full of grim satisfaction at the thought of having him in their hands, towards whom they had plenty of ground for ill-feeling, and little enough for good will. Crucifixion was not a Jewish penalty: they might hang the dead upon a tree, but not the living. The Lord, the Yielder up of His own life, had declared that He was to be delivered to the Gentiles to be crucified.

There was a spiritual reason governing all here. For the curse of the law was to be upon Him, and the public, open sign of the curse was hanging on a tree (Deut. xxi. 23); but the infliction of this as a Jewish penalty would have carried this beyond death, and altered its significance. In the hands of the Gentiles alone would crucifixion answer to its end. But this we must look at further in a little while.

In connection with this charge before the governor it is that we see God bringing forward His witnesses to the spotlessness of His beloved Son. Matthew especially dwells upon this, because Matthew gives us all through the governmental side of things, and even the aspect of the Lord's sacrificial work (the trespass-offering) is governmental.* The witness of Pilate is given more fully here than elsewhere; that of Judas, and that of the dream of Pilate's wife, are only in this Gospel. Correspondingly we have the purchase of Aceldama with the money cast back to them by Judas, which is surely significant. The witness of the acceptance of His work we shall look at in its place. The four testimonies previously mentioned are all found in the present section. They are the evidence in rebuttal of the charge brought against Him.

[1] Israel deliver up their King, then, to the Gentiles. It is done formally, by the heads of the nation, whom we hear little later refusing positively any king but Cæsar, as the result of counsel taken to put Jesus to death. The evangelist breaks off at once to follow the course of Judas to the end.

[2] A hope seems to have remained or freshly risen in the heart of Christ's betrayer that, after all, He might not be condemned. Perhaps the words here do not convey as much as that, but rather the horror produced by the actual thing when now accomplished, never to be undone. What tales have we of deeds deliberately done, which when done have assumed at once a new shape of terror and dismay, as if never contemplated before. With what different eyes might the traitor have seen the actual condemnation of his Lord and Master from those with which he had looked on to it, however certain. Clearly it is the awful agony of remorse that awakes now in Judas, and not repent-that to us? see thou to that. And he cast down the silver pieces into the temple * and departed, and went away and [a] hanged himself.

* See Introduction pp. 27, 28, and the notes on the offerings, vol. I, pp. 296-300.

3 (6-10); what they acquired.

3 And the chief priests took the silver pieces, and said, It is not lawful to put them into the [b] Corban, since it is the price of blood. But they took counsel, and bought with them the potter's field, to bury [c] strangers in. Therefore that field is called the field of blood, unto this day. Then was [d] fulfilled that which was spoken through [e] Jeremias † the prophet, saying, And I took the thirty pieces of silver, the price of him on whom a price was set, on whom they of the sons of Israel had set a price, and gave them for the potter's field, as the Lord appointed me.

a 2 Sam. 17. 23. cf. 1 Sam. 31 4. ctr. Acts 16. 27-34.
b cf. Jno. 18. 28. cf. ch. 23. 24.
c cf. Gen. 4. 12.
d Zech. 11. 12, 13.
e cf. Jer. 18. 2, etc. cf. Jer. 19. 1, etc.

* Ναός, the temple proper, not the courts.

† So, practically, all the MSS. The quotation, however, is from Zechariah. The simplest conjecture is that the name should be omitted; but other explanations have been given.

ance. He cannot keep the money he has gained, to which even for the chief priests the blood-stain indelibly attaches. Nay, he shrieks out even in their ears the confession of his sin in having betrayed the innocent blood. But there it ends: "innocent blood;" not holy or righteous, still less "the Holy and the Righteous One": the glory of the Son of God has no part in it—neither heals nor even smites him. There is no turning to Him with whom he had companied so long,—no sense of any one to whom he can turn. There is, in short, no faith, and therefore no repentance. "He cast the silver pieces into the temple"—practically, the sanctuary, the part proper to the priests alone,—"and departed and went away and hanged himself." In this we see again the opposite of faith. How many times must he have seen the miraculous deeds which testified that "the Son of man had power on earth to forgive sins"! but he seems to remember nothing of all this, or else cannot believe in the divine mercy toward himself; and thus he plunges headlong into irrecoverable ruin.

3 So the money is on the hands of those who scruple to defile the treasury with it, though as to their souls they have no such care. But the price of blood they cannot put into the "Corban," among the offerings to Jehovah, and so they take counsel, and buy with it the potter's field—a special place known as that—"to bury strangers in." "The expression," says Lange, "does not refer to Jews from other countries (as Meyer supposes), who in a religious point of view were not strangers; nor to professing heathens, who were left to themselves; but to Gentile proselytes (of the gate), to whom a certain regard was due, while priestly exclusiveness would not allow them to rest in properly consecrated graves. Thus even in this act of cheap charity and pious provision on the part of a Sanhedrin which slew the Lord of glory, Phariseeism remained true to itself. The price of blood and the field of blood are declared quite suited for 'strangers.'"

But this is on man's side only; on God's there was surely a witness of what Israel had really acquired for themselves with this fatal blood-money. Had they not in fact purchased for themselves in every land into which they were to be cast "a burial-place for strangers"? Strangers they have indeed been ever since, and their graves how often in a "field of blood:"—a "potter's field" too, as the quotation here declares; not simply that which lay on the slope of the valley of Hinnom, but the field of the Great Potter of Jer. xviii., in which "the word of Jehovah came to me," says the prophet, "saying, O house of Israel, cannot I do with you, as this potter? saith Jehovah. Behold, as the clay in the potter's hand, so are ye in My hand, O house of Israel."

e (11-23): test for the people,—Barabbas or Jesus?

e But Jesus stood before the governor; and the governor f questioned him, saying, Art thou the king of the Jews? And Jesus said unto him, g Thou sayest it. And when he was accused by the chief priests and elders, he h answered nothing. Then saith Pilate unto him, Hearest thou not how many things they witness against thee? But he answered him not so much as one word; so that the governor marvelled greatly.

f Mk. 15. 2-5. Lk. 23. 3.

g cf. Jno. 18. 33-37. 1 Tim. 6. 13.

h ch. 26. 63. cf. Jno. 19. 9. cf. Is. 53. 7.

Now at the feast the governor was i accustomed to release unto the multitude one prisoner, whom they would. And they had then a notable prisoner, called Barabbas. When therefore they were gathered together, Pilate said unto them, Whom will ye that I release unto you, Barabbas, or Jesus, who is called Christ? for he knew that for j envy they had delivered him up. And, as he was sitting on the judgment-seat, his wife sent unto him, saying, Have nothing to do with that just man; for I have suffered many things to-day in a k dream because of him. But the chief priests and the i Mk. 15. 6-15. Lk. 23. 17-25. Jno. 18. 39, 40.

j cf. ch. 21. 38. cf. Jno. 15. 22-25. cf. Gen. 37. 11.

k cf. Gen. 31. 29.

They had indeed cast this money to the potter, and they have been ever since as a vessel marred upon the wheel, and to be re-moulded. This is the meaning of their discipline in all the long years since.

e Jesus before the governor at once declares Himself the King of the Jews; but to all the accusations of the Jews replies nothing whatever; so that Pilate marvels.

But now the question of His acceptance or rejection is to be pressed on all the people; and again we see how the government of God has arranged every thing to this end. First, there has been established a custom of releasing a prisoner at the time of the paschal feast, and the people had the decision as to what prisoner it should be. Then they had at this time a prisoner of a notable kind, most suitable every way for comparison and by way of contrast with the spotless Victim now before them. This is at once suggested by his name, Barabbas, which is "son of the father." The Syriac and some other versions, with some cursive MSS., even read "Jesus Barabbas," an insertion very hard to explain if not genuine. All Christian feeling would naturally be against it, and certainly favor omission rather than insertion. Together, the names would be an awful diabolic assumption of titles most significant in the Lord.

Mark and Luke add that he had been cast into prison for sedition, thus had actually committed the crime with which they were falsely charging Jesus. Added to which, he was a robber and a murderer. Thus for the people to choose Barabbas would seem impossible, when now Pilate desired to know whether he should release this notorious criminal or "Jesus who is called Christ."

The mercy of God has given Pilate warning also from a wholly unexpected quarter. "As he was sitting on the judgment-seat, his wife sent unto him, saying, Have nothing to do with that just man, for I have suffered many things to-day in a dream because of him." It was the very thing most calculated, perhaps, to act upon the sceptical Roman, a voice out of that dark border-land which by its very darkness seems to attract the imaginative faculty, to fill it with possibilities the less challengeable the less they are defined. Outside of all priestly influence also, his wife is made the witness to his conscience, and against these priests whose measure he has long since taken and whose motives he penetrates. "He knew that for envy they had delivered Him."

In his uneasiness Pilate would fain put the responsibility which he cared elders persuaded the multitudes that they should ask for Barabbas, and destroy Jesus. And the governor answering said unto them, Which of the two will ye that I release unto you? And they said, [l]Barabbas. Pilate saith unto them, What shall I do, then, with Jesus who is called Christ? They all say, Let him be [m]crucified. And the governor said, Why, what evil hath he done? But they cried out the more, saying, Let him be crucified.

[l] Acts 3. 14. cf. Jno. 5. 43.

[m] Lk. 23. 21.

not to face upon the people. Not the chief priests but the popular voice shall determine what is to be done, and the people also shall decide but one way, if he can accomplish it,—it shall be Barabbas or Jesus who is called Christ!

But the unhappy people are under the control of their leaders, and urgently insist upon their choice of Barabbas. It is the heart of man exposed to its depths,—the mind of the flesh, which is enmity against God; and when Pilate, still anxious to escape the fatal responsibility, puts it to them, (as he had no right to do,) what they would have done with Jesus then, immediately the awful cry breaks out from the crowd as with one voice, "Let Him be crucified!" Pilate asks in vain, "Why? what evil hath He done?" The only answer is the more vehement cry, "Let Him be crucified!"

It is the popular vote, after He has been among them three or more years, borne witness to by a constant display of power in grace that ministered to every need of man, by wondrous words that went even beyond this, and revealed, as light from heaven, the whole face of the world, while bringing in for it the glory of what is beyond and above it; Himself in Himself the incarnate glory of God, the seal and perfection of all that He uttered. The end is full, absolute rejection, hatred for His love, passionate hatred as if for some unspeakable wrong, that dooms Him to death, a death of shame, of unutterable anguish, the death of a criminal, a frightful and accursed death. They deliver up the Prince of life and desire a murderer to be granted to them. One cannot but realize in this Jesus Barabbas of Matthew the shadow of one to come, in whom man's natural choice will find its final expression, and of whom the Lord said to the Jews, "I am come in My Father's name, and ye receive Me not: if another come in his own name, him ye will receive" (John v. 43). Another will come in his own name. God allowing all the thoughts of man's heart to come out in full public expression,—another "saviour," the son of another father, true "child of the devil," in whom the unbelief as to Christ shall come to faith, and the crop of sin at last be harvested. "For the mystery of iniquity doth already work, only he who now letteth" (hindereth) "will hinder until he be taken out of the way: and then shall that wicked one be revealed, the son of perdition, whom the Lord shall consume with the breath of His mouth, and destroy with the manifestation of His presence: even him whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish, because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion that they should believe a lie; that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness" (2 Thess. ii. 7–11).

Awful are words like these, but they are words of truth, and to be fulfilled in days that are yet before us. The common application to Popery destroys for us in large measure its power for warning, and teaches us to look for its fulfilment in what has been manifested for centuries, and the day of Christ has not yet come. Not in the Christian Church, but in the Jewish "temple of God" will this defiance of God be uttered, and where Christ was rejected, there shall antichrist be installed. Israel have, alas! saved their Barabbas, to enthrone him in a day which every sign of the times assure us to be very near at hand.

5 (24-26): judgment against themselves.

3 (27-54): The offering up.
1 (27-31): crowned with the curse.

[5] Now, when Pilate saw that it availed nothing, but that rather a tumult was arising, he took [n]water and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just man: see ye to it. And all the people answered and said, [o]His blood be on us and on our children. Then he released Barabbas unto them, but having [p]scourged Jesus, he delivered him up that he might be crucified.

3. [1] Then the soldiers of the governor, having taken Jen cf. Deut. 21. 6. Jer. 2. 22.

o cf. Gen. 4. 10. ch. 23. 35. cf. Acts 5. 28.

p Jno. 19. 1.

And as the Gentiles then joined hands with the Jews to put Jesus to death, so shall they join hands also to enthrone antichrist.

[5] The government of God in all this shows itself, and the power of the enemy itself works in compelled subjection to it. We find now Israel invoking it, and not in vain. Pilate, determined to escape the responsibility of that which under pressure he is about to do, adapts to his purpose part of the Jewish ritual in the case of an unknown murder, and washes his hands in the presence of the multitude, saying, "I am innocent of the blood of this just man: see ye to it." "And all the people answered and said, His blood be upon us and on our children." Thus, if they cannot lift the load from Pilate, they accept their own responsibility in the fullest way; and ever since, flee as they might into all the countries of the earth, the avenger of blood has been behind them. No effectual city of refuge has been found for them; nor will be until they look upon Him whom they have pierced, and in repentance and faith find it in Him the source of all their blessing.

Barabbas is released, and Pilate has the One whom he has owned to be righteous scourged, preparatory to crucifixion.

3. With one more step we come to the Cross itself, the lowest point of Christ's humiliation, and the place of deepest suffering, but not only this: the Cross has a character peculiarly its own, and here alone do we reach what is in the proper sense, atonement. This is, however, contested by so many, and is of such importance in itself that we must look at it in this place sufficiently to understand the character of what is before us.

If sin-bearing be, as it plainly is, an absolute necessity for atonement, Scripture declares without any obscurity whatever, that it was on the Cross He bore sin, and only there. "Who His own self," says the apostle, "bare our sins in His own body on the tree" (1 Pet. ii. 24). Scripture says this, and only this. It never speaks of our Lord as a sin-bearer in life, but in death; including, however, in death not simply the act of death, the expiring, but the suffering connected with it, "the death of the cross": suffering which gave its character to the death itself.

To distinguish it from mere dying, the circumstances are associated with it in a way that at first seems strange enough, to be put (as they are) as if essential to atonement itself. Thus it is said, "Jesus, that He might sanctify the people with His own blood, suffered without the gate" (Heb. xiii. 12). Why without the gate? does not that seem a mere circumstance, quite separable from the suffering itself even, and certainly from the power of the precious blood of Christ to sanctify?

Yet, when we examine the connection with the preceding verse, we find that this suffering without the gate, or what is implied in it, is undoubtedly contemplated in the type to which the apostle is referring: "For the bodies of those beasts whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high-priest for sin, are burned without the camp." "Burned without the camp" certainly answers to "suffered without the gate." And here, notice that the distinction between those offerings whose blood went into the sanctuary and those that did not, was not in the burning, (for all were burnt, though indeed not sus into the prætorium, gathered against him all the band. And having [q]stripped him, they put on him a all wholly burnt,) but in the place of burning: the emphasis is laid upon this very thing.

[q] Mk. 15. 16-20. Jno. 19. 2, 3, 5; cf. Gen. 37. 23.

But what, then, is the meaning? the ordinary place of burning was upon the altar in the tabernacle-court, and there was the place of which it was said, in connection with the blood, "I have given it to you upon the altar to make atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh atonement for the soul" (Lev. xvii. 11).

Yet the blood of what was burnt upon the altar could not go in where the blood of that which was burnt on the ground outside the camp could and did go.

Notice again, that this is the sin-offering, called this distinctively as that in which the judgment of sin is what is prominent — is differential. The judgment of sin, then, is that which is expressed in the banishment of what is nevertheless the "most holy" sin-offering into the holy place outside not merely the courts of Jehovah's house, but outside the camp also, the place of a people in relationship with God.

Banishment from God is what is marked by it: for God is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, and that cannot look at sin; while sin and sin-offering are the same word in Scripture, a man's sin-offering being that in which his sin was put before God. Thus outside the gate, as outside the camp, expresses either the place of one himself a sinner, or the place of One "made sin" for sinners.

"The Tree" intensifies still more this thought; for "cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree;" and the cross is thus a death of curse. "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us: for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree" (Gal. iii. 13). Here again, what might seem merely circumstantial is made to express that which marks the death of Christ as truly propitiatory, the bearing of sin's awful penalty. Here is the "cup" from which the Lord necessarily shrank, but which nevertheless He drank in obedience to the Father's will, as requisite for our redemption. Death and judgment are man's natural portion, because of sin; not death only and there an end, but "after death the judgment" (Heb. ix. 27). Thus death alone could not be what Christ had to bear, and death simply was but its least part. Death is provisional, temporal, a governmental infliction, not an absolute necessity. For judgment in its full character resurrection must come in: death yields up to judgment, and judgment is eternal.

We must not look at the "curse of the law," then, as if it were mere circumstance—the hanging on a tree. That was but the outer garb of a reality more fearful far. Man could give man the cross: atonement was not an effect of suffering at the hands of man, but of suffering Godward. And this is what the cry of abandonment on the cross expresses. It was not that He had been given up into the hands of men; and to make it that would be to make Him less than the many of His people who have suffered such physical agonies at the hands of others without any such thought of being forsaken of God as is heard in this desolate cry. Nay, the psalmist, in that prophetic psalm to which the very words of the cry refer us, has distinguished carefully between this and all that saints ever suffered: for "our fathers trusted in Thee," he says: "they trusted in Thee, and Thou didst deliver them; they cried unto Thee, and were not confounded; but I am a worm and no man . . . be not far from me" (Ps. xxii. 4-6, 11; and see the notes on the Psalm). The sorrow here is an unequalled sorrow, and wholly different from any other.

How different from anything that could be true of Him in that wondrous life He had lived, in which His testimony was, "And He that sent Me is with Me: the Father hath not left Me alone; for I do always the things that please Him" (John viii. 29). How would such a cloud in any other place than this have marred the glory of that life of manifest communion with God, which in its unbroken perfection shone out in Him. Nay, how it would have shadowed the divine glory revealed in Him, that He, being what He was, should have been yet ever in the distance of the sinner's place with God! Or do we think that what is involved in this is only the bearing some results of God's government of a fallen world,—as one of an exiled family, though innocent, not being able to sleep at Jerusalem (!) and such things? If that were all, what need of the cross at all? Is it possible that any one can fail to see the difference—the total, absolute contrast, between the forsaking of God and His being ever with Him? between His life-work and His sacrificial death?

[q]scarlet cloak; and, having plaited a crown of [r]thorns, they put it on his head, and a [s]reed in his right hand,

[q] cf. Gen. 3. 18; cf. Gal. 3. 13; [r] cf. Is. 36. 6; cf. 2 Cor. 13. 4. [s] cf. Lk. 23. 11. cf. Ps. 69. 19.

Another thing that results from all this, and the want of perception of which has clouded for many the full intelligence of the atoning work, is the need of realizing that the penalty upon sin that had to be lifted from us could not be satisfied or modified, by the infinite glory of the blessed Sufferer. Such thoughts appeal to us very strongly and from two different directions. We think of the Father's Son, of the Word made flesh, and shrink confounded from the thought of what seems to be suggested by it, as if a schism (though but for a moment) in the divine nature, or between the divine and human in the Lord. Or, again, contrasting the eternity of the penalty upon man with the actual brief endurance of the Lord's suffering, we incline at once to say, here certainly there was modification of the penalty, and a very great one.

Now in the first case, we are simply baffled by the inscrutability of that which the Lord assures us is inscrutable, the mystery of His divine-human Person, which for those who have not been content to accept the necessary limitations of creature-understanding, darkened now by sin, have constantly ended in the acceptance of some impairment either of humanity or divinity in Him. But neither in this way have they escaped from perplexity, nor, had they done so, could they have found the inscrutable Christ of Scripture. We can but accept Scripture, in its declarations and its silences; and in doing so, we shall find a Christ never impaired in His humanity by His divinity, capable as Man of being understood by men, One capable of all that is proper to man; capable of faith, nay, the supreme example of it; capable of a will which, though holy, He gave up to the Father; capable of being "tempted in all things like as we are, sin apart" (Heb. iv. 15). Can we reconcile it all with that higher glory of deity in Him, which gives new glory to His humanity itself? We should gain nothing by the attempt, but lose wholly. We need a Christ whom we can know, but yet not wholly know; with whom there are inner recesses of light which no man may explore; and that is what we find in Him.

As to the second case, the eternity of the penalty is no necessary element in it, except where the sins or the sinful condition eternally abide: and that is the case wherever the atonement provided has no effect. It is a common mistake to argue against the eternity of the penalty from the time during which the Lord endured it, or upon the same ground for a modification of the penalty as He endured it. Indeed, some will have no penalty at all in His case, but a substitute for it; while others say an equivalent or one modified in some way. The Scriptures cannot be made to agree with any of these thoughts. Christ honored the God of judgment by taking the very judgment lying upon man: He was made a curse for us; He was made sin for us who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him. But let us go now with the solemn history before us.

[1] And here the indications of the divine meaning in the Cross are found in

> And kneeling before him they mocked him, saying, Hail, king of the Jews. And they [u]spat upon him, and took the reed, and [v]smote him on the head. And, when they had mocked him, they took the cloak off from him, and put his own raiment on him, and led him away to crucify him.

u cf. Is.50.6.
v ch. 26. 67.

that which is nevertheless but the awful display of diabolic cruelty at the hands of man. A new class of men are the soldiers to whom Pilate has given Him up, and in them man comes to a new trial. They have heard the justification by the judge of the One whom he sends as innocent to an agonizing death. They are not Jews, these soldiers, care nothing about the Sanhedrin, are not pressed to what they do by the chief priests or the outcries of a people whom they despise as senseless and bigoted fanatics. There was not only in general no love between them and the Jews, but the fiercest scorn and enmity. Nor are they forced by their office as executioners to that for which now as their own special mocking and insult, not to be lost willingly by any of them, they gather the whole band.

How the various classes of men are made to bear witness against themselves through all this scene: most freely acting out the very depths of their hearts, while overruled by the divine purpose to show out the glory of the Man so seemingly helpless in their hands. These are the men of blood and iron, the men with whom might is right, the men who delight to pull down others from their excellency; men with no wrongs even imagined to repay, but simply at their business, which they enter into with the zest of the amphitheatre, the cruel Roman frenzy, which possessed all sections of the people. Now they have a king in their hands—a King!—and with an inscrutable dignity about Him which nothing that man has done can touch. Now it is their turn: what can they do that has not yet been done, and which shall accomplish what all else has failed in?

Herod had mocked Him with a royal robe; it should be theirs to crown Him; but with what? with bay, laurel, myrtle? He takes satire easily, as it were, unconsciously: can they not make Him feel it, this impenetrable Man? You see the brutal jest of the soldier: crown Him? yes, crown Him! make the satire pungent: crown Him with THORNS.

So they stripped Him, and put on Him a scarlet cloak, and having plaited a crown of thorns, put it upon His head, and a reed in His right hand. And they mocked Him, saying, "Hail, king of the Jews!"

But they could not know how, ever after, we should be gazing with eager adoration at this wondrous Figure just as with their cruel hands they had arrayed it; and how the centuries should see in all they had done, no more their malignant mockery, but indeed the divinely significant emblems of God's glorious King.

The scarlet cloak or pallium was such as was worn by kings and emperors, but its color was produced from the coccus; it was a death-stain.

Thorns are the sign of the curse which He was now taking to remove it from us.

And the reed, the type of weakness, becomes the symbol of His power,—or at least of the way through which He has taken it: "He was crucified through weakness." Yet the cross is that which has annulled every foe that was against us, while it has made Him the Sovereign of an Empire soon to be universal: "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Me."

How plain that every detail here is under the government of divine wisdom, and proclaiming in fact His glory. They have failed, and cast aside their mockery, to turn it into mere brutality as useless. They have failed; every foe must fail. The King goes on to His throne.

2 (32–44): "the contradiction of sinners."

[32] And as they were coming out, they found a man of Cyrene, Simon by name, him they impressed to [w]bear his cross. And when they were come unto a place called Golgotha, that is to say, the [x]place of a skull, they gave him to drink [y]wine mingled with gall; and when he had tasted of it, he would not drink. And they crucified him, and [z]divided his garments among them, casting lots. And sitting down, they kept guard over him there. And they set up over his head his [a]accusation written, THIS IS JESUS, THE KING OF THE JEWS.

Then are there two [b]robbers crucified with him, one on the right hand, and one on the left. And they that passed by [c]reviled him, wagging their heads and saying, Thou that destroyest the temple and buildest it in three days: save thyself. If thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross. Likewise also, the chief priests, mocking him, with the scribes and elders, said, He [d]saved others; himself he cannot save. He is the w Mk. 15. 21. Lk. 23. 26. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 10.

x Mk. 15. 22. Lk. 23. 33. Jno. 19. 17. cf. Ps. 141. 7.
y Mk. 15. 23. Lk. 23. 36. Ps. 69. 21. z Mk. 15. 24. Lk. 23. 34. Jno. 19. 23, 24. Ps. 22. 18.
a Mk. 15. 26. Lk. 23. 38. Jno. 19. 19–22.
b Mk. 15. 27, 28. Lk. 23. 32, 33. Jno. 19. 18. Is. 53. 12. c Mk. 15. 29. Lk. 23. 35. Ps. 22. 7.

Ps. 109. 25. d cf. Lk. 15. 2; cf. Jno. 3. 14, 15; cf. Heb. 9. 22.

[32] Of the Cross we have first the human side,—a cross which man may be permitted to carry after Him: and so Simon, the "hearkener," the "obedient," is seen at the outset here. For by dull hearing we may escape the world's impressment after this fashion, though as Simons we shall find it companionship with the Lord. Still we must remember that there was another Simon who had professed readiness to take this place and more, and did not; though he afterwards did. We have to learn the secret of power, even though we have the will; and that the strength we need is made perfect in weakness.

So the place of a skull is reached, the objective point which had been before the Lord all through. A scene of death was the attraction for the Lord of life: for none other could it have had any. But He comes into it, therefore, not to be merely a visitor, but to "taste death" in its reality. He refuses therefore the stupefying draught* offered to those led to execution, and gives Himself up to the full endurance of all that is before Him. Then they crucify Him and divide His garments among them, casting lots; all the while the light of prophecy steadily shining upon all this, as the great Eye of God, though unheeded, heeding silently, until the time comes for interference. And meanwhile still for faith there runs through all the deeper meaning which, if we could not read it, we should be satisfied must be there. But is He not in fact providing at His own cost the clothing which is to cover men's nakedness, and that by divine appointment also, (of which the lot in Israel spoke,) even for His enemies? Certainly thus alone it is that any one of us can say, "He has covered me with the robe of righteousness" (Isa. lxi. 10).

Nay, was it not we, the sinners enriched by Him, who guarded Him there, keeping Him upon that cross of shame which He could not leave, because of our necessities? This was indeed more than all the legions of the Roman army, that which made rescue for Him impossible, and kept all the hosts of heaven from breaking through for His relief.

His title is His accusation: He is Jesus, the King of the Jews; and for that they class Him with robbers, who is presently to sit down upon the Father's throne; and the passers-by revile Him, wagging their heads as they see Him

* The "gall" mingled with the wine was probably "wormwood," a strongly stupefying ingredient, though the Septuagint use it for various bitter substances. The "vinegar," an alternative reading here, and with evident reference to Ps. lxix. 21, was no doubt simply the sour wine in common use.

king of Israel: let him now come down from the cross, and we will believe on him. He [e]trusted in God: let him deliver him now, if he will have him; for he said, I am the Son of God. In like manner, the [f]robbers who were crucified with him reproached him.

[3] a Now from the sixth hour there was [g]darkness over all the land until the ninth hour. And about the ninth hour Jesus cried out with a loud voice, saying, [h]Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani: that is My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Some of those standing by, when they heard it, said, This man calleth for Elias. And straightway one of them ran, and took a sponge and filled it with [i]vinegar, and put it upon a reed, and gave him to drink. But the rest said, Let be; let us see if Elias will come to save him.

e Ps. 22. 8.
f Mk. 15.32. Lk. 23. 39-43.
g Mk. 15.33. Lk. 23. 44. cf. Amos.8. 9. cf. 1Jno.1.5.
h Mk. 15.34. Ps. 22. 1. cf. Is.53.4,5.
i cf. ver. 34.

3 (45-54): the divine reality.
a (45-49): forsaken of God.

there who according to their false accusation was to destroy the temple and in three days was to build it up again. In fact it was they who were now destroying it, and in a little while they will begin to realize the true application, "In three days I will rise again."

But against all His claims, the cross is in their minds a conclusive argument. The Son of God upon a cross! He must, if He is to be believed at all, come down from the cross. And the priests follow, mocking Him with the same arguments: "He is the King of Israel? well, let him come down from the cross, and we will believe." And then they use, all unconsciously, almost the words of the mockers of the twenty-second psalm: "He trusted in God: let Him deliver Him, if He will have Him." Nay, even "the robbers who were crucified with Him, reproached Him" with His powerlessness and lack of help. He is the King with the reed-sceptre and the crown of thorns!

[3] a Deeper the chasm under Him yawns. A preternatural darkness settles down upon the whole land for three hours together, from the sixth to the ninth hour. When it disappears the crisis is over, He Himself declares that "It is finished" (John xix. 30), and then, in the language here, dismisses His spirit and departs. His work is accomplished: the rent veil and the graves broken through remain as the tokens of what is accomplished.

It is surely a superficial thought that the sympathy of nature with her suffering Lord is what the darkness falling over all expresses. The Lord, as it passes away, Himself interprets it in a different manner. If God be Light, darkness is the natural sign of His turning away. The three days' darkness in Egypt we have seen to have such a meaning. The final "outer darkness" of the lost is the most distinct and awful expression of it—darkness outside,—away from the presence and glory of God. It is the rejection by God of those who have rejected Him. It is the necessity of a holy nature which cannot have fellowship with evil. And Christ in the darkness is the sign of His being the Sinbearer of His people,—the sign of that which to Him was the deepest agony that He could suffer, the forsaking of God.

We have already in some measure considered the meaning of this. It is not here that we shall find the doctrine of atonement, but the fact, the making it, with presently the consequences Godward and manward, which show how perfectly it has been made. Christ in the sinner's place, the reality of substitution, God's judgment upon sin owned and borne by Him who knew no sin,—that is what is before us here. These three hours are apart from all other in human history; three hours in which have been manifested, as nowhere else, both man and God; evil and good have come together; the good, not by power interposing for it, but by its own intrinsic blessedness, o'ermastering the evil; God glorified, so as to bring Him in in answer to it, in righteousness the justifier of every one that believeth in Jesus.

b (50): dying.

c (51-53): the sanctuary opened.

b But Jesus, having cried again with a loud voice, [j] dismissed his spirit.

c And behold, the *veil of the temple was rent in twain, from the top even to the bottom; and the earth [l] quaked, and the rocks were rent; and the graves were j Mk. 15. 37. Lk. 23. 46. Jno. 19. 30. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 3.

k Mk. 15. 38. Lk. 23. 45. cf. Lev. 16. 2, 11-14; cf. Heb. 9. 7, 8, 11, 12; cf. Heb. 10. 19, 20.

l cf. Ex. 19. 18; cf. Rev. 5. 12.

To those standing by the cross the Lord's words are a call for Elias; a misinterpretation, probably, of the soldiery, rather than the Jews, but who had caught up some of the common Jewish beliefs which they would have heard expressed around them. Would Elias come and take Him down? Conscience getting roused, they still it with faint mockery addressed to the man who ministers the vinegar to the agonizing thirst of crucifixion, "Let be: let us see whether Elias will come to save Him."

b But the end now is reached. Still, master of Himself, not conquered of death but yielding Himself to it, He cries with the loud voice of unexhausted strength, and dismisses His spirit. The expression is peculiar to Matthew, the royal Gospel, and very unhappily obscured in the common translation.* It is the explicit assertion, as to the moment of death, of what He had Himself before declared: "No man taketh My life from Me, but I lay it down of Myself; I have authority to lay it down, and authority to take it again" (John x. 18). Notice that here it is the simple expression of authority and thus absolutely in place in the Gospel of Matthew, one of those more hidden harmonies of inspiration, which we are apt to let through mere inadvertency escape us. But what a testimony to Him whose royal title was proclaimed upon a cross, whose sceptre was a reed, whose crown was of thorns, and lately in the deepest agony of One suffering for sin! But such are the mysteries of our salvation, now made so fully intelligible to us, yet still the mysteries of a "love that passeth knowledge."

c The peculiar agony passed of the forsaking of God, there remains but death to complete atonement. All that lay upon man is then taken; God's righteousness approved and manifested, sin in its reality as before Him exposed. The result begins at once to be apparent in a double way. The veil of the temple is rent in the midst; and on the other hand the quaking earth opens the graves, "and many bodies of the saints that slept arose, and came out of the graves after His resurrection, and went into the holy city and appeared unto many."

This latter sign is, again, a thing peculiar to Matthew. As the effect of the Lord's work, it would naturally have reference to that special aspect of the work which is presented here; and this we have seen already to be in Matthew the trespass- (which is the governmental) offering.

This is easily understood, if we consider the difference between that which is the necessary part of the penalty upon sin, as resulting from the very nature of God, and therefore unchangeable as that nature, and that which it may please Him to affix to it as the special brand of His displeasure.

As has often been said, while "God is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, and cannot look at sin," and therefore His separation from it is an unchangeable necessity,—death (I am speaking of what we ordinarily call that) is, in man's case, such a governmental brand, and can be removed from him without change on his part, or atonement for him. This is important to realize as bearing upon the resurrection of the wicked. It has been often argued and with apparent justification from a certain statement in Scripture, that the resurrection even of the wicked is due only to Christ's atoning work, and so in their case also has a redemptive character. Here is not the place to discuss the fundamental passage; but the Lord's own words assure us that as, on the one hand, there is a "resurrection of life," so, on the other, there is a "resurrection of opened and many bodies of the saints that slept [m] arose, and came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many.

* "Yielded up the ghost," (R. V.) "yielded up His spirit."

[d] (54): the Gentile.

d Now when the centurion and they that were with him on guard over Jesus saw the earthquake, and the things that took place, they feared greatly, saying, Truly [n] this was the Son of God.

[m] cf. 1 Cor. 15. 22, 23.

[n] Mk. 15. 39-41. Lk. 23. 47-49.

judgment" (John v. 29, R. V.). As, on the one hand, life claims even the bodies of the heirs of life, so on the other, does judgment claim the bodies of the unsaved. And thus it is said, "after death the judgment" (Heb. ix. 27), which takes place, as we see in the book of Revelation, only when "death and hades" have given up the dead.

Thus death has place in God's dealings with man this side of eternity only; and indeed, though it be the brand upon sin, yet still as part of a discipline of mercy. As the removal of man from the place for which he was originally created, and the sundering of all sweet, familiar ties, sending him out alone, naked as he came into the world, but with neither the ignorance nor innocence with which he came into it, to meet he knows not perhaps what, yet fears with a true instinct, if he knows not,—death is the constant appeal to him as to the ruin in which he is,—the "Adam, where art thou?" of God who seeks him. Whatever, then, the final issue, death has no part in it. For even the second death is no repetition of the first, but that in which it is swallowed up and lost; while the saint inherits life eternal.

Notice, now, the peculiar way in which the resurrection of the saints of which Matthew speaks here is connected with the work of atonement. They do not come out of their graves till "after His resurrection." They do not actually rise till then. Plainly, because Christ is the "first-fruits" of them that sleep, the "First-born from the dead;" and none, therefore, could precede Him.* On the other hand, it is when the Lord dies that the graves open: it is this that opens them; we are intended to find connection between this death and the apparition of living men brought up out of death. No phantom merely, we are assured; "bodies of the saints that slept" arising; not to take again their place among men, but as those that belong to another sphere, glowing with the light of it.

The rending of the veil of the sanctuary precedes in the account here, as it preceded in order of occurrence, the resurrection of the saints. It is plainly connected with the three hours of darkness, in the same way in which the latter is connected with the Lord's death. The veil was the sign of that "thick darkness" in which under the law God dwelt. "The way into the holiest was not made manifest." None could see God and live. If Moses himself is permitted to see His glory, it is after He is gone by: thus with His face turned away.

Here, then, is the darkness of the Cross, the darkness in which man abides, spite of all that he can do in his own behalf. He sits in darkness and the shadow of death. Pass the veil he cannot. His Deliverer must come out after him, even to where he is; but having come there in the perfection of that marvelous obedience, cannot abide there. The veil is rent in the divine way, from top to bottom. The light of the glory of God streams forth, God fully manifested in righteousness and in love, and by that way, the way of the Cross which has revealed Him, men be they what they may can draw near, if they will, to Him,—nay, find in His presence thus their one possible sanctuary of refuge.

The resurrection of the saints that follows here is but that which completely

*For this is not a restoration to mortal life once more, as in the case of Lazarus, of the daughter of Jairus, and the son of the widow of Nain; or it would not exemplify, as is plainly intended here, the power of atonement.

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chap. xxvii. 55-xxviii.)
The Resurrection.

1 (xxvii. 55-61): The beginning of the intervention of God.

1. AND there were many women beholding from afar off, who followed Jesus from Galilee to minister unto him, among whom were Mary of Magdala, and Mary the mother of James and Joses, and the mother of Zebedee's sons.

Now when evening was come, there came a °rich man of Arimathea, Joseph by name, who was also himself a disciple of Jesus. This man went to Pilate, and begged the body of Jesus. Then Pilate commanded it to be given up. And Joseph took the body, and wrapped it in a ᵖclean linen cloth, and laid it in his own new tomb, which he had hewn out in the rock. And he rolled a great ᵠstone to the door of the tomb, and departed. And Mary of Magdala was there, and the other Mary, sitting over against the tomb.

o Mk.15.42-47. Lk. 23. 50-56. Jno. 19.38-42. cf. Is. 53. 9.

p cf. 2 Cor.5. 21.

q cf. Jno.11. 38, 39.

fits them for that place, and puts them fully into it. Restitution Godward, with its overplus of glory being fully made, man too can receive his overplus of compensating blessing. If the first paradise be not restored, he shall enter in Christ the paradise of God. Thus the trespass-offering view of the Cross is here complete.

d The fruit of it is seen also in another way. The Gentile centurion and those that are with him, convinced by all that they have seen and heard, confess Him to be, not the King of the Jews merely, but the Son of God. Thus the Roman soldier takes his place with Peter the apostle in proclaiming that which Israel has denied. The dispensational intimation here, according to the character of Matthew's Gospel, seems to be shown in this, that what in Mark and Luke is given as the individual faith of the centurion is here testified as shared by "those that were with him." It is the general faith of a Gentile company.

SUBD. 3.

The atoning work, then, is done: we are now to have before us the answer on God's part to it, an answer which certainly cannot be long delayed. Indeed, as we have seen, there has been already answer; but not yet the answer. That will be no less than in raising Christ from the dead, and setting Him at His own right hand in heavenly places, with all authority given to Him in heaven and earth. We do not see Him in Matthew at the right hand of God: that is reserved for Mark. Nor do we even, as in Luke, see His ascent into heaven. But in accordance with the character of Matthew, we do find all authority put into His hand,—the Kingdom of heaven begun, with its administration committed to men, but with the assurance that He is with them to the end of the age.

1. The Lord having gone down to the depths of His humiliation, from this point all is changed. God permits no more indignity, and, marked out still, as every thing here is, by the voice of prophecy, the rich man comes forward to bear testimony to Him, and give His body its temporary resting place. "They assigned Him a grave with wicked men," says the prophet, "but with the rich man when He had died" (Isa. liii. 9, Heb.). He is numbered with transgressors no more, but in the hands of disciples, tender, if feeble hands, which though it be the shadow of death upon hopes lately so bright, will anoint Him for His burial. These women that have followed Him from Galilee, ministering to Him, wait on Him still with their eyes through all the terror of the Cross, too intent for fear or sorrow to divert their riveted gaze

2 (xxvii. 62–66): The seal upon the sepulcre.

2. Now on the morrow that followed the preparation, the chief priests and Pharisees came together unto Pilate, saying, Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, [r]After three days I will rise again. Command therefore that the sepulcre be secured until the third day, lest his disciples come and steal him away, and say to the people, He is risen from the dead, and the last deceit will be worse than the first. Pilate said unto them, Ye have a watch: go and secure it as well as ye know how. And they went and secured the sepulcre, [s]sealing the stone, besides [setting] the watch.

[r] ch. 17. 23. ch. 12. 40. Jno. 2. 19.

[s] cf. Dan. 6. 17.

3 (xxviii. 1–10): The manifestation of Christ to His own.

3. Now after the sabbath, as it began to dawn on the [t]first day of the week, there came Mary of Magdala and the other Mary, to see the sepulcre. And behold, there was a great [u]earthquake; for an angel of [the] Lord descended from heaven, and came and rolled away the stone and sat upon it. His [v]appearance was until the stone closes the sepulcre. This Joseph, too, just at the hour when all seems lost, comes forward openly to join himself to the disciples of a crucified Master. He goes to Pilate to beg the body of Jesus, and having obtained it, lays it in his own new tomb. For this death cannot mingle with the common deaths of men, but is that which dispels death. Nor can the Holy One enter into the abode of corruption—He who is to know none. The instinct of the heart goes, as it would seem, beyond knowledge; and God is over all, guarding and guiding.

[t] Mk. 16. 1. Lk. 24. 1. Jno. 20. 1.

[u] ch. 27. 51.

[v] cf. Dan. 10. 6. cf. Rev. 10. 1.

2. The enemy, too, is at work to make more secure His coming triumph. His disciples shall not come and steal the body away, and make men think that He is risen. Upon the supposition that they were dealing with imposture merely, that would be well enough: but did they think so? Could they, fresh from the spectacle of such a death as He had died, imagine it?

They remember the words which His own disciples had forgotten; words which had contemplated what they had done to him, and asserted His own final triumph. On the third day He would rise again. If that were indeed true, how vain any effort of theirs to avert the consequences! Yet fear has its fascination, which compels its subjects to follow to the end they dread,—to know and face the worst that can come. Perhaps there were mingled motives, the result of contradictory thoughts which urged them on. At any rate they do all they can with their company of soldiers and their seal upon the sepulcre to make fraud and illusion both impossible, and to certify the only hope available for man.

3. Matthew gives us very briefly the resurrection of the Lord; and of all His manifestations of Himself to His disciples at Jerusalem only that to the women visiting the sepulcre. In His message given through these also He speaks of meeting them, not at Jerusalem, but in Galilee, the scene of His former labors. There the commission with regard to the Kingdom is given them, and it is the Kingdom with which Matthew, as we know, is occupied.

The connection of our Lord with Galilee was from the first the token of His rejection by Israel. In His infancy Jerusalem under the sway of Herod had refused Him, and the rule of Archelaus there had turned Him aside from Judea to Nazareth. Galilee of the Gentiles was the witness of the ruin of Israel, as largely given up to these, the land of the former kingdom of the ten tribes, who had not returned from their captivity in Assyria. Out of Galilee, said the scribes, no prophet could arise. Yet it was there, among a people sitting in darkness and the shadow of death, that the Light was to arise.

like lightning, and his clothing white as snow. And from fear of him the guards shook and became as [w] dead men. But the angel answered and said unto the women, [x] Fear not ye; I know that ye seek Jesus who was crucified. He is not here, for he is [y] risen, as he said. Come, see the [z] place where the Lord lay. And go quickly, and say to his disciples that he is risen from the dead, and behold, he goeth before you into [a] Galilee: there ye shall see him. Behold, I have told you. And they departed quickly from the tomb with fear and great joy, and ran to bring his disciples word. And, [as they went to bring his disciples word,] * behold also Jesus [b] met them, saying, Hail. And they came and held him by the feet, and worshiped him. Then Jesus saith unto them, Fear not; go and bring word to my [c] brethren that they go into Galilee; and there shall they see me.

w cf. Acts 17. 31. cf. Rev. 1. 17.
x Mk. 15. 6. cf. 2 Tim. 1. 7. cf. Rom. 8. 15.
y Lk. 24. 5, 6.
z cf. Jno. 20. 5-8.
a ch. 26. 32. Mk. 16. 7.
b cf. Mk. 16. 9. cf. Jno. 20. 1, 11-18.
c Jno. 20. 17. cf. Heb. 2. 11, 12.

* Probably to be omitted, as in many MSS. and versions.

The passing by of Jerusalem in the close of Matthew is easily seen, therefore, to be significant of the world-wide aspect of the Kingdom now to be proclaimed, a remnant of Israel sharing in it, in the time of their national rejection, the blessings of Christ's rule. But not even into these does Matthew enter deeply: the air of reserve which we have noticed in Matthew clings in measure to him, to the end. There is one expression only which seems to break through it, and carry us on towards the complete revelation,—"Go and tell My brethren." But it is not developed further, and by itself might only apply the language of the Lord's prophecy (chap. xxv. 40) to His present followers.

The separation which some would make between an evening visit of the women to the sepulcre, and a morning one, when the angel addresses them, seems neither necessitated by the words themselves,* nor consistent when the account is taken as a whole.† The stone had been rolled away when they got near enough to see; and thus the resurrection had already taken place. They may have felt the trembling of the ground and seen something of the lightning-like flash that had scattered the watch. But He was risen; and the opening of the tomb was to publish to all that it was empty. The victory is gained; and, as of old, the women celebrate it. Mary of Magdala here comes into prominence, out of whom seven demons had been cast by the word of Christ. And now that He has spoiled principalities and powers and led captivity captive, she in whom the complete power of Satan has been met and conquered is fittingly the leader of this company. Her heart is not empty since the unclean spirits left, but Another has filled it. The dead Christ still lives in her and controls her; and now she is a true "Mary of the watch-tower," even while yet she has no knowledge nor expectation of what has taken place.

It is John who details to us the way in which the risen Lord reveals Himself to her, during an interval of time passed over by Matthew, in which she has left the company with which she had come to the sepulcre to bring Peter and John to see that it was empty. The other women, less bold than she, must have waited for her to rejoin them before they went on to the tomb. If so

* ὀψὲ τῶν σαββάτων may mean "after the sabbath" as well as "in the end of": it: see Lange on the text.

† Yet it is evident that Matthew's account is of the briefest, and that the Lord's appearing to Mary Magdalene alone is omitted by him. Mark states that He appeared "first" to her, which does not seem to allow the presence of the other women at that time, as thought by some, while yet Matthew and Luke (xxiv. 10) plainly seem to include her with them in what is narrated here.

4 (xxviii.11–15): The broken seal.

4. Now, as they were going, behold, some of the guard went into the city and brought word to the chief priests of all that had come to pass. And when they were assembled with the elders and had taken counsel, they gave much [d]money to the soldiers, saying, Say ye, his disciples came by night, and stole him away while we slept. And if this should come to the hearing of the governor, we will [e]persuade him and secure you. And they took the money, and did as they were taught; and this report is current among the Jews until this day.

5 (xxviii.16–20): The Kingdom committed to the charge of men; Himself with them.

5. But the eleven disciples went into Galilee, to the mountain which Jesus had [f]appointed them; and when they saw him, they worshiped, but [g]some doubted. And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, [h]All authority hath been given unto me in heaven and on earth: go ye therefore and [i]disciple all the nations,

d cf. ch.27.4.
e cfr. Acts 12. 19.
f ver. 7.
g cf. Jno.20. 24–29. *cf.*1 Cor.15. 5, 6.
h cf. Jno. 5. 22. *cf.*Jno.17.2. cf. Eph. 1. 22.
i Mk. 16. 15, 16. Lk. 24. 47, 48. *cf.*Acts 1.8.

Mary Magdalene must have already been gladdened with the knowledge that He was risen before she went back with them there. Matthew certainly intimates that Mary was with them at this time, as he only mentions "the other Mary" as her companion, and to these the angel addresses himself.* Now they are told that not only is He risen, but that He is going before them into Galilee, and there they should see Him.

Galilee is in fact the gathering place of the disciples, characterizing the circumstances under which the new faith begins to be published, as we have seen. Presently an unexpected joy is theirs; for Jesus Himself meets them on the way, and while they worship at His feet, repeats to them the message given to them by the angel.

4. Meanwhile some of the guard bring word to the chief priests of all that has taken place. The impotence of all their efforts is revealed; and they have even to publish it, along with the manifestly false account of what had happened while the witnesses were asleep. Spite of all they will continue the vain struggle with omnipotence itself; and such are Israel's chosen leaders.

5. The Gospel closes with the appearing of the Lord in Galilee, where by appointment the eleven meet Him; with others also, as is plain, for it could hardly be of the eleven, after all that we know to have taken place in Jerusalem, that it is written, that "some doubted." From His words to the women also Galilee seems to have been appointed, as already said, for a general gathering of the disciples, and it was probably here that He was seen, as the apostle tells us, "of more than five hundred brethren at once" (1 Cor. xv. 6). The institution of His Kingdom would naturally call for such a gathering; and here it is that He declares all authority to have been given to Him in heaven and upon earth, and sends them out to disciple all nations to it.

It is not a Kingdom set up as yet in power, but established as a Kingdom of the truth by the sowing of the "word of the Kingdom" in the hearts of men. This the parables of it (chap. xiii.) have already shown us. "Discipling" is therefore the mode of introduction into it; but this has two parts, which the Lord joins together here. The great essential for a disciple is, of course, reception of the Word; but since it is a Kingdom into which men are discipled, there is added to this an outward recognition to be made of the authority under which they come: and these are assuredly the "keys of the Kingdom," of which the Lord spoke to Simon Peter (xvi. 19). The "key of knowledge" He had spoken of elsewhere (Luke xi. 52); here we have the external authoritative admission on the part of those to whom the Kingdom is

* In fact there were others, as Luke assures us (xxiv. 10).

j baptizing them unto the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit; k teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have enjoined you. And behold, I am l with you always, until the m consummation of the age.

j cf. 1 Cor. 1. 17. Acts 2. 38, 41. Acts 8. 36.
k Acts 2. 42.
l cf. Acts 4. 31.
cf. Acts 23. 11. m cf. 1 Pet. 1. 13; cf. Rev. 22. 20.

committed: "disciple all the nations, baptizing them," the name to which they are baptized being that of the Triune God, now fully revealed.

"All nations" shows the whole world to be the sphere in which the Kingdom is to be proclaimed, and cannot be the Gentiles only: Israel cannot be left out of such a commission. Certainly, they have not received the Kingdom, nor the King: they cannot be looked upon as an inner circle from which His messengers are to be sent out; and in Luke "repentance and remission of sins" are to be "preached among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem" (xxiv. 47). This is in fact the course that was pursued. By and by Paul is raised up of God to lead in the special Gentile work, and the other apostles, owning what God has done, give it up as apostles to Paul and Barnabas; but this is no failure on their part, nor change in the original plan. Paul still preaches "to the Jew first"; and if of the other apostles we have little scriptural notice, tradition scatters them variously among the Gentiles. Moreover, the commission given here in Matthew to baptize and teach is not one that we can limit in any way to the apostles, but must have wide enough application to embrace all who, in fact and according to Scripture, baptize and teach.

Thus the Kingdom takes its place outside all nations, while having its door wide open towards all, its blessed gospel call for all that have an ear to hear.

The King is, as we know, to be away; and just on this account He gives to those who represent Him here the assurance of His being ever present with them. Faith may reckon upon Him as securely all the way as if He were still bodily and visibly in company with His disciples; "all the days"—every single day—cloudy or bright—until the consummation of the age is reached, and the opened heavens yield Him once more to earth.

SCOPE AND DIVISIONS OF MARK.

CHRIST, the Son of God, as Ministering Servant of man's need whether in life or death, in which He is seen as the Sin-offering, meeting the requirements of the divine nature as regards sin. The dispensational character, so attaching to Matthew, is scarcely found in Mark, and while the Kingdom of God of necessity is found, we have neither the Kingdom of heaven, nor of Christ, nor of the Son of man. He is the unwearied Worker for the glory of God, and until resurrection the title of Lord is seldom given Him. Naturally, therefore, because the condition and need of man are the same for Jew and Gentile, the service is for all, and Mark addresses himself more to men at large, the references to Old Testament fulfilments being also less conspicuous. On the other hand, He is for His people more fully the pattern of the life of faith, as He comes more down to such a place as we find here; and then also He stoops below them into the awful realization of sin and its penalty, as borne upon the Cross.

Mark has but three divisions:—

1. (Chap. i.–v.): The personal ministry of Christ.
2. (Chap. vi.–x. 45): The service of a rejected Master.
3. (Chap. x. 46–xvi.): The heart of service revealed in sacrifice, answered from the heart of God in resurrection and the ascension to heaven of the Offerer.

NOTES.

AN old view of Mark, that it was an abridgment of Matthew, while it is not the truth, has yet in it a certain measure of truth, which would apply to more than Matthew. From the nature of its theme, "the Son of God in service," it must take up what runs through every Gospel. Christ serves upon the throne as well as on the Cross, and at every point between. His words when coming into the world characterize Him at all times: "Lo, I come to do Thy will" show Him to be all through essentially the Servant; and as such God by the mouth of Isaiah, in what is the fullest prophecy of the Old Testament concerning Him, dwells upon Him with delight (chap. lii. 13).

Mark's Gospel can thus have no exclusive line of truth. It has in fact scarcely any important words, certainly no phrase (such as Matthew's "Kingdom of heaven," for instance) peculiar to itself; and might, perhaps, be rather characterized by its omissions (as, for instance, of nomos, "law") than by what it inserts. For law neither measured nor required service such as His, which was the free offering of His heart, and knew no necessity but that of His own nature.

MARK.

DIVISION 1. (Chaps. i.–v.)

The Lord's personal ministry.

SUBDIVISION 1. (Chap. i. 1–13.)

The Person who comes to serve.

1 (1-3): His title.

1 THE [a] beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God: as it is written in the prophet,* [b] Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, who shall prepare thy way; the [c] voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord; make his paths straight.

a cf. Matt. 1. 1. cf. Lk. 1. 1, 5. cf. Jno. 1. 1.

b Mal. 3. 1. Matt. 11. 10. Lk. 1. 76. Lk. 7. 27.

c Is. 40. 3. Matt. 3. 3. Lk. 3. 4. Jno. 1. 23.

* "We regard the testimony of Irenæus and other fathers, with Codd. A., P., as sufficient to establish this reading, against that of 'Isaiah the prophet' preferred by most recent editors" (Lange).

Beautiful it is, and gracious, that Mark, the failed servant, who had shrunk back from the work to which he put his hand (Acts xv. 38), but afterwards recovered and through grace made serviceable (2 Tim. iv. 11), should be chosen as the one to put before us the unfailing, perfect Servant. What comfort for us in this!

DIV. 1.

The three divisions are in very simple connection with one another. The first gives us the Lord's ministry in itself, its character, the needs met and the way of meeting them, with the results that became apparent. The second shows the opposition of the enemy in whose hand the world is, the conflict between the evil and the good, and the meaning of discipleship to a rejected Master. The third shows us the Lord's service perfected in the sacrifice of the Cross, the need met before God, and God glorified in it, resurrection its outcome, with what is implied in this, which only the epistles, however, develop in its fulness for us.

SUBD. 1.

We begin now, with the second of the synoptists, the fruitful work of comparison between them. To this the remarkable similarity in much, the very words being as if copied from one to the other, with the equally apparent differences, which to many often seem to amount to contradictions, on either side invite us. These differences are, for the most part, such as none can claim the merit of having discovered,—they do not need a great deal of searching out: they lie on the surface, and appeal to every reader to inquire as to their meaning. If we have the happiness of being among the number of those who still accredit Scripture as inspired of God, we shall not be surprised to find that not only will this inquiry assure us that there is no contradiction, but that God has awakened it in order to reward our search in His own abundant way. We shall do well to give attention to the differences. Our sense of the reality and value of verbal inspiration will assuredly deepen as the result of this, and the truth of God will acquire fresh distinctness, certainty, and power over us.

[1] In both Matthew and Mark, nay, in all the Gospels, the Person of the Lord is necessarily the first thing put before us; but in very different ways. Matthew, presenting to us the Son of David, gives as the foundation of all His legal title in His genealogy. Mark, as we see, has nothing of the sort. And yet His

2 (4-8): the witness of John.

3 (9-11): proclaimed from heaven and anointed.

2 There came [d]John, baptizing in the wilderness, and preaching the baptism of repentance for [the] remission of sins. And there [e]went out unto him all the country of Judea, and all they of Jerusalem, and were baptized by him in the river Jordan, confessing their sins. And John was [f]clothed with camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins; and did eat locusts and wild honey. And he preached, saying, There [g]cometh after me he that is mightier than I; the latchet of whose shoes I am not fit to stoop down and unloose. I have baptized you with water, but he shall baptize you with the Holy Spirit.

3 And it [h]came to pass in those days that Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee, and was baptized by John in Jordan. And immediately rising up out of the water, he saw the [i]heavens parting asunder, and the Spirit like a dove descending upon him. And there came a voice out of the heavens, Thou art my beloved Son: in thee I am well pleased.

d Matt. 3. 1, 2. Lk. 3. 1-3. Jno. 1. 6, 7. Jno. 3. 23.
e Matt. 3. 5, 6. Lk. 3. 7.
f Matt. 3. 4. cf. 2 Ki. 1. 8. cf. Zech. 13. 4. cf. Matt. 11. 8, 9.
g Matt. 3. 11. Lk. 3. 16. Jno. 1. 15, 26, 33. cf. Acts 1. 5. cf. Acts 13. 25.
h Matt. 3. 13.
i Matt. 3. 16, 17. Lk. 3. 21, 22. cf. Lev. 8. 12. cf. Ps. 89. 20. cf. Acts 10. 38.

title to the place He takes is as much affirmed in Mark as in Matthew. But title to serve, what will give that? If there be power for it, and heart, nothing else is needed. Serving is love's prerogative, wherever power and need are found together. Thus that Jesus Christ is the Son of God is for Mark the explanation of his Gospel. Power cannot fail the Son of God; and love is demonstrated in the fact that the Son of God is become the Man Christ Jesus.

To this is added that He comes in the foretold way: the Shepherd comes through the door into the sheepfold, which the Lord speaks of to the Jews as the sign that He is the Shepherd. Here, therefore, the testimony of two prophets is brought forward: Malachi of a messenger divinely sent to prepare the way of Christ; Isaiah giving the voice of that messenger addressed to Israel to prepare His way: the way of the Lord (or Jehovah), Messiah being Himself Jehovah. To make His paths straight, how much was involved in that!

2 Mark passes on to the testimony of the forerunner: not even pausing for a moment to record the birth of Jesus, as both Matthew and Luke do, he begins his history with the account of the Baptist. Even here he is briefer than either of the others. He shows you the man himself in his rough and independent garb, as Matthew does. He tells you with both the others of his baptism of repentance, and with Luke that it is for the remission of sins. He shows you the people flocking to his baptism from all the country round; but he does not give, as Matthew and Luke do, any details of his address to them, but simply his testimony to Christ Himself, to the glory of His Person and His better baptism, with the Holy Spirit.

Thus it is plain, if Mark abridges, it is an abridgment with a purpose. He is taking our eyes as much as possible off other things, to fix them upon the Person who is coming forth to minister, so glorious in Himself, so wondrous in the gift He brings: the Son of God, and baptizing with the Holy Spirit!

3 But He has higher witness than that of John; and now we see Him coming forth from Nazareth of Galilee, and Himself baptized of John in Jordan. This is indeed the pledge in which He devotes Himself, as we have seen in Matthew, to the path of service which lies before Him. It is His "Lo, I am come," and Jordan prefigures the death which is "written of Him in the volume of the book," in its law of sacrifice.

His vows are now upon Him; and immediately as He comes up out of the water, the heavens are opened, and the Spirit like a dove descends upon Him—the bird of heaven, the bird of love, the bird of sorrow, the bird of sacrifice,— [g] (12, 13): tested.

[g] And immediately the Spirit [j] impelleth him forth into the wilderness. And he was in the wilderness [k] forty days, [g] tempted by Satan, and was with the [m] wild beasts; and the [n] angels ministered unto him.

j Matt. 4. 1. Lk. 4. 1.
k Matt. 4. 2. Lk. 4. 2. cf. Ex. 24. 18. cf. 1 Kl. 19. 8.
g cf. Matt. 4. 3-10. cf. Lk. 4. 3-13. cf. Heb. 2. 18. cf. Heb. 4. 15.
m cf. Gen. 2. 19, 20.
n Matt. 4. 11.

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chap. i. 14-iii.)

His ministry.

1 (i. 14-20): The time, the Kingdom of God, and its claim.

1. [o] NOW after John was [p] delivered up, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of God, and saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is come nigh: repent ye, and believe in the gospel.

cf. Lk. 22. 43. o Matt. 4. 12, 17.

and the Father's voice owns the object of His delight, His well-beloved Son. There is little variation as to all this in the three Gospels: it is plainly fundamental to them all. (See Notes on Matthew, chap. iii. 13–17).

[g] Now once again, Mark hastens over what Matthew and Luke detail with equal care, the temptation in the wilderness. We are merely told of the fact of it, and Mark adds that "He was with the wild beasts." This is in no wise as if they threatened Him. He was the Lord of nature,—the Creator; and as the Second Man, all was in His hand. The angels' ministry was not at all, as Meyer thinks, "a sustaining support against Satan and the beasts," which in the first case would have been only a dishonor to Him, and in the second would have involved a breach between nature and Himself. They came, as Matthew shows, when the temptation was ended, and to minister to His bodily need.

Thus the Lord is put before us, however briefly, in all His relations, not only to the world, in which now we are to see Him serving. The world is already marked out as a world in departure from God, wherein the people specially the object of God's love and care have to be called to make straight His paths before Him by taking themselves their place in the baptism of repentance as those rightly under death because of sin. Into this death He who would serve them effectually must come, and to this His baptism pledges Him. Thus He can minister to all lesser needs which result from this condition.

SUBD. 2.

That ministry itself is now to be put before us, and the various characters of evil, hopeless to any other, present themselves in rapid succession, the spiritual root of it being first of all emphasized; while even the bodily diseases become the pictures of more distressing and fatal maladies,—the visible being made to manifest the invisible, after the manner of Scripture indeed everywhere, and after the manner of nature also: for one is based upon the other. Thus too the divine dealings with these acquire an interest for us they could not otherwise possess. The Gospel narratives are seen to be not simply histories of the past, but depict for us the present also, and appeal to us with fuller, more pervasive and personal claim. That we may know that the Son of man has power on earth to forgive sins, He saith to the sick of the palsy, Rise and take up thy bed, and go unto thy house. The word of God is characterized in this way by its tender concern for the soul of man; and everywhere, "Scripture inspired of God is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness."

1. The Lord's public ministry in Galilee begins from the imprisonment of John His forerunner. He takes up the testimony which the world has done its best to silence, and, more definitely than even John, declares the time to be fulfilled and the Kingdom of God to be come near. Herod might have been thought to have proved his own kingdom to be the more substantial reality, with the herald of the divine one languishing in prison; but now it is that the

And, [p] passing along by the sea of Galilee, he saw Simon, and Andrew, Simon's brother, casting a net into the sea: for they were fishers. And Jesus said unto them, Come ye after me, and I will make you become [q] fishers of men. And immediately they left the nets and followed him.

And going on a little further, he saw [r] James the [son] of Zebedee and John his brother, who also were in the boat, mending the nets. And immediately he called them; and they left their father Zebedee in the boat with the hired servants, and went after him.

2 (21-39): The enemy met, and competent testimony to a new teaching.

2. And they enter into Capernaum; and immediately on the sabbath day he went into the [s] synagogue and taught. And they were [t] astonished at his teaching:

[p] Matt. 4.18-20.

[q] Lk. 5. 10, 11. cf. Matt. 13. 47-50.

[r] Matt. 4.21, 22.

[s] Matt. 4.13, 23. Lk. 4. 31.

[t] Matt. 7.28, 29.

announcement is made afresh with new power and evidence. A gospel indeed in a world so bruised in Satan's fetters; but yet with its claim of repentance which John had so earnestly enforced. These are the first words of the great Healer, and His words precede His deeds. Before all other deliverances, and that these may be truly such, the Word must be spoken by which man lives. For death is but the shadow of sin, and the true life alone can banish it.

The Kingdom of God is at hand. As a Kingdom of truth, it is to be established by the truth in the hearts of men, it must have its heralds. The Lord begins, therefore, now to call the men who are to proclaim it,—who are to be as He terms it, in words derived from that which they give up to follow Him, the "fishers of men." The account given is almost exactly the same as what we find in Matthew, and as brief as can be. There is none of the personal work done in their souls: that is supplied by John and Luke (John i. 35–42; Luke v. 4–11).

2. There is omitted also the first preaching in Nazareth (Luke iv.), which in the decisive rejection which follows it, causes Him to leave the place in which He had grown up. Capernaum, "the village of consolation," became now "His own city" (Matt. ix. 1), and in this for a time fulfilled its name. The first act of His power here, as given by Mark, is one that is fundamental for the blessing of the earth, the casting of Satan out of it. When He shall come in power, to take all things into His hand, the dragon will be shut up in the bottomless pit. Similarly, the first sign given to Moses, whereby he is to prove his divine call as the deliverer of Israel, is the return of the rod of power, which, cast out of his hand, is become a serpent, once more to be the shepherd's rod of protection for the flock.

Here in Capernaum the demon is in the synagogue, in the midst of the professing people of God, and as gathered before God; introduced in the person of a man whom he has possessed. The Word, in the mouth of Christ, manifests him, and he cries out in words which show his conviction, and are demoniac in their suggestion still. Gripping his poor victim to him, "he cries out, saying, Let us alone: what have we to do with Thee, Thou Jesus of Nazareth? art Thou come to destroy us? I know Thee who Thou art, the Holy One of God."

The change of pronoun is very suggestive here. The knowledge of the Holy One is that of the demon alone; he would join with him in the dread which it inspires, and the desire to escape from Him as a destroyer, the one to whom He is to be a Saviour! The devil is always that—the "false accuser"; and the dread of coming doom (which he has—for "the demons believe and tremble") cannot alter his nature. Hell will make no change in this way, though doubtless it will be, and is meant to be, a restraint upon the manifestation of it.

But the word of Christ casts out the demon: in one last convulsion, permitted to show the reality of his malign power, ere he leaves unwillingly his prey.

for he taught them as having authority, and not as the scribes. And * there was in their synagogue a man with an [u]unclean spirit; and he cried out, saying, What have we to do with thee, thou Jesus of Nazareth? Art thou come to destroy us? I [v]know thee who thou art, the Holy One of God. And Jesus rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace, and come out of him. And the unclean spirit [w]convulsing him, and crying with a loud voice, came out of him. And they were all [x]amazed, insomuch that they questioned among themselves, saying, What is this? a new teaching! with authority he commandeth even the unclean spirits, and they obey him. And his [y]fame went out immediately into the whole region of Galilee round about.

And immediately when they had gone out of the synagogue, they came into the house of Simon and Andrew, with James and John. And Simon's [z]mother-in-law lay sick of a fever; and immediately they tell him of her. And he came and took her by the hand and raised her up; and † the fever left her, and she [a]ministered unto them.

u Lk. 4. 33-37. cf. Rev. 16. 13.
v ver. 34. cf. Jas. 2. 19.
w ch. 9. 20, 26. cf. Jno. 8. 44.
x ch. 2. 12.
y Matt. 4. 24.
z Matt. 8. 14, 15. Lk. 4. 38, 39.
a cf. Matt. 27. 55. cf. Philem. 11.

* Many ancient MSS. add "immediately."
† Some add "immediately."

The people, amazed, accredit it as the testimony of a "new teaching," a fresh interposition of God in the affairs of men, as in truth it was. "Signs" were for the confirmation of the Word, wherever this was new, or where, perhaps, as in Elijah's time, it had been practically lost, and needed recovery. Where it had been received, among disciples of Christ even, where the workers of miracles had a distinct place, and signs originally followed those that believed, (Mark xvi. 17), they yet were given in conformity with the divine purpose as to them. The people, therefore, rightly inferred a new teaching from the power accompanying the Lord's word. And the manifestations of that power were completely in accordance with the grace that characterized the message that was being given. They were works of power in deliverance and blessing. The New Testament Elijah "wrought no miracle" (John x. 41); grace in the One that followed John lavished its wonders to attract the needy ones it sought.

Here then the field of service opens out: God in His overflow of goodness amid the sin and sorrow of the world finds in Christ the means of manifestation. In the gospel, for the first time, He is adequately manifested; and the miracles are a visible gospel, "powers of the age to come" (Heb. vi. 5, Gk.), in which the earth's salvation is anticipated and the Kingdom of God seen as redemption from all the effects of sin.

Thus, the power of Satan broken, Simon's mother-in-law is raised up from her sick bed with ability at once to minister. And then a multitude of these two classes, the diseased and those possessed with demons, carefully and twice over distinguished from one another, gather around Him, to find unfailingly deliverance at His hands.

But with this we are given a glimpse also of that abiding intercourse with God in which He lived. "Rising early a great while before day, He went out and went away into a desert place, and there prayed." The picture of service would not be complete without this—the root of it. But how instructive to find such seasons of retirement and prayer observed by the Son of God! Our natural thoughts as to such a Person would be against it. We should be inclined to think it too formal, too artificial, and ignoring too much of His divine nature;

And when the [b]evening was come, and the sun had gone down, they brought to him [c]all that were diseased, and those that were possesesd with demons, and the whole city was gathered together at the door. And he healed many that were sick of various diseases, and cast out many demons, and [d]suffered not the demons to speak, because they knew him.

And in the morning [e]rising early a great while before day, he went out and went away into a desert place, and there prayed. And Simon followed him, and they that were with him. And they found him, and say unto him, All men are seeking thee. And he saith unto them, Let us go elsewhere into the neighboring country-towns, that I may preach there also; for [f]therefore came I forth. And he went into their synagogues, preaching throughout all Galilee, and casting out demons.

[b] Matt.8.16, 17. Lk.4.40,41. cf. Jno.8.12.
[c] Matt. 11.4, 5. Lk. 9. 11.
[d] vers. 24, 25. ch. 3. 12. cf. Acts 16. 17, 18.
[e] Lk. 4. 42-44. Lk. 5. 16.
[f] Is.61. 1, 2. cf. Matt.10. 5, 6.

we should imagine it as implying too much an effort to get near or to keep near His Father. The evangelist does not in the least stop to apologize for it or explain it, however; but leaves it to have its due effect upon us, a needed feature in the picture of the glorious Worker here. How necessary then for us must be such hours of retirement, such seasons of devotion! which, alas, some would consider it "legal" to insist upon, whether for ourselves or others, and which the intrusion of things without, the demands of daily life, the very occupation with service itself, are apt to trench upon so much. Noticeable it is, then, that the apostles, upon making the proposition for the choice of the Seven, gave as their own occupation,—"we will give ourselves unto prayer and to the ministry of the Word:—"to prayer," as the first requisite, not an appendage to their work, but an essential part of the work itself. For here the vessel is put afresh under the fountain,—the instrument into the Hand that is really to handle it.

Nor is it forgotten in saying this that the spring is really in the vessel,—that our Lord has said, "The water that I shall give him shall be in him, a fountain of water, springing up unto eternal life." None the less must there be for overflow the practical acknowledgment of dependence which, giving God His place, gives man also his. No spiritual working is independent of moral order; and divine power works so as to give place to human responsibility for this.

That the Son of God should be found in such conformity to human conditions shows us how truly He is Man; and we are meant, as is plain, to realize this. Scripture does not hide but brings fully before us the truth of His manhood, and that in ways which writers not speaking as "moved by the Holy Ghost" would surely not have ventured.

The disciples follow the Lord with the announcement that all men are seeking Him. They are evidently under the impress of the popular feeling, and have no discernment of its character. The Lord meets it quietly with the purpose of God which He is fulfilling. The crowd might rather hinder His access to souls, or misrepresent the grace which was seeking men to bring them with their personal needs before God. Not in the crowd but in isolation could this best be done, and the seed of the Word must be scattered widely to find the good ground that would receive it. "Let us go elsewhere," He says, "into the neighboring country-towns, that I may preach there also: for therefore came I forth." He passes over the wonders which have attracted the masses, to emphasize the preaching of the Word as His true object. "And He went into the synagogues and preached throughout all Galilee, and cast out demons." Mark, as the Gospel of service, shows us everywhere the power of the enemy on the alert to frustrate it. In the presence of Christ the enemy has no power; but

3 (40–45): The leper cleansed.

3. And there cometh unto him a [g]leper beseeching him, and falling on his knees to him, and saying to him, If thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. And he was moved with compassion and stretched out his hand, and touched him, and saith unto him, I [h]will: be thou cleansed. And immediately the leprosy departed from him, and he was cleansed. And having strictly charged him, immediately he sent him away, and saith unto him, [i]See that thou say nothing to any one; but go thy way, show thyself unto the priest, and offer for thy cleansing the things that [j]Moses commanded, for a testimony unto them. But he went away, and began to proclaim it much, and to spread abroad the matter, so that he could no longer enter openly into the city, but was without in [k]desert places; and they came to him from every side.

[g] Matt. 8. 2-4. Lk. 5. 12-14. cf. Lev. 13. 44-46 with Is. 1. 5, 6.
[h] cf. Jno. 6. 37.
[i] ch. 5. 43.
[j] Lev. 14. 2-20.
[k] ch. 6. 31, 32. cf. Is. 35. 1.

there is in man himself what is of deeper significance, and this it is to which the evangelist now points our attention.

3. Mark and Luke join together the story of the leper and that of the palsied man. Leprosy was in Israel so connected with banishment from the presence of God, and in itself so virulent and incurable an evil, as readily to suggest the corruption and malignity of sin as that of which it was a type (see Lev. xiii. notes). With sin also the Lord links the case of the palsied man: first of all pronouncing him forgiven before healing him. The two together thus naturally remind us of the corruption and impotence of fallen men, the "ungodly" and "without strength" of the apostle (Rom. v. 6). Here is the double witness to the ruin of man; in their healing, therefore, the witness of the full provision for his need in Christ.

The story of the leper is given in very similar terms in the three synoptists. Mark is slightly the fullest; Matthew the least full. Mark alone speaks of the Lord's compassion moving the hand that touched the unclean and cleansed him. Thus an authority higher than that of law was confirmed by the law: and for this the leper is sent to the priest. He had to certify that One not under its restrictions had done what it was not possible for law to do. No more could it deal with the corruption of heart which the touch of Christ alone can remedy. "He that sinneth hath not seen Him neither known Him," says the disciple nearest to Him. Surely he knows Him, who has felt the thrill of that life-giving touch which brings out of the otherwise unending banishment into the sweet relationships of a new life with God for ever.

"Immediately the leprosy departed from him." So that a robber, from his well-earned cross of shame, is ready for Paradise and the company of Christ. So that the apostle can say of us all, that the Father "hath made us meet for the inheritance of the saints in light" (Col. i. 12). The blotches and disfigurements of our practical life may seem to gainsay this; and we must not deny or belittle them: alas, there is in us still that which is not Christian; but there is, too, a new man, "created in Christ Jesus unto good works," and who can say of all this, "It is not I that do it;" and it still remains true, whether or not we have learned to reconcile it with our experience, that "whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin: for His seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God."

Into all this it is not here the place to enter. Mark emphasizes the prohibition to the healed man not to publish the miracle, and notes the effect of this being violated, the reason for the Lord's withdrawing from the crowds being, no doubt, what it was before. Follow Him, however, they will, for their needs are imperative, and the omnipotent mercy of God is with Him, flowing freely for them.

4 (ii. 1–12): Impotence.

4. And again he [l] entered into Capernaum after [some] days, and it was reported that he was in the house. And [immediately] * many were gathered together, so that there was no longer room, even at the door; and he spake the word unto them. And they come unto him bringing a [m] paralytic, borne by four. And, not being able to bring [him] to him on account of the crowd, they uncovered the roof where he was; and having [n] broken [it] up, they let down the couch on which the paralytic lay. And Jesus, seeing their faith, saith unto the paralytic, Child, thy sins are [o] forgiven [thee]. And there were certain of the scribes sitting there, and reasoning in their hearts, Why doth this man speak thus? he blasphemeth: who can forgive sins but one—[p] God? And immediately Jesus, [q] knowing in his spirit that they were reasoning thus within themselves, saith unto them, Why reason ye these things in your hearts? Which is easier, to [r] say to the paralytic, Thy

* Many omit.

[l] Matt. 9. 1. Lk. 5. 17.

[m] Matt.9.2-8. Lk.5.18-26. cf. Is.40.29.

[n] cf. Matt. 15. 23-28. *cf.*Lk.18.39.

[o] *cf.*Col.2.13.

[p] cf. Jno. i. 1, 14 with Jno. 8. 11. cf. Is. 43.25

[q] cf. Jno. 2. 25. *cf.*Matt.17. 25.

[r] cf. ch.1.27. cf. Lk.4.32. cf. Ps. 33.6, 9.

4. The healing of the paralytic follows that of the leper; and here the crowd is a manifest hindrance to drawing near the Lord. His own condition also forbids it on his own part, but the faith of others bears him up, and through all obstacles, into the presence of Christ. How good to see the ready answer that faith in this way here receives. The Lord goes to the root of the matter: He deals with what underlies the whole condition; "Son," He says, "thy sins be forgiven thee."

"It was a wondrous utterance, and must have sounded still more strangely, when thus first heard, than to us who have been familiar with it from childhood. No one had ever heard Him admit, even by a passing word, His own sinfulness; He showed no humility before God as a sinner; never sought pardon at His hands. Yet no Rabbi approached Him in opposition to all that was wrong, for He went even beyond the act to the sinful desire. The standard He demanded was no less than the awful perfection of God. But those round Him heard Him now rise above any mere tacit assumption of this sinless purity by His setting Himself in open contrast with sinners, in His claim, not only to announce the forgiveness of sins by God, but Himself to dispense it. He pardons the sins of the repentant creature before Him on His own authority as a King, which it would be contradictory to have done, had He Himself been conscious of having any sin and guilt of His own. It is clear that He could have ventured on no such assumption of the prerogative of God, had He not felt in Himself an absolute harmony of spiritual nature with Him, so that He only uttered what He knew was the divine will. It was at once a proclamation of His own sinlessness, and of His kingly dignity as the Messiah, in whose hands had been placed the rule over the new theocracy." *

Such an answer to faith was a challenge, no less, to unbelief; and the scribes sitting watchful there among the rest, could not but be roused. It shows how they felt yet the power of His presence, or that for the time, "the world had gone after Him," that they keep it in their hearts without utterance; but there in their hearts it ferments: "Why doth this man speak thus? he blasphemeth: who can forgive sins but God alone?"

But He pursues even the unspoken thought with His divine knowledge: "Why reason ye these things in your hearts? Which is easier"—a beautiful word that "easier": for with Him words must have their full worth, nothing sins are forgiven, or to say, Rise and take up thy couch, and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of man hath authority on earth to forgive sins, (he saith unto the paralytic,) I say unto thee, Arise; take up thy couch and go unto thy house. And he arose, and immediately taking up his couch, went forth before them all; so that they were all amazed and *glorified God, saying, We have never seen it thus.

* Geikie: "Life and Words of Christ."

5. [1] And he went forth again by the sea; and all the multitude came to him, and he taught them. And [t] passing on, he saw Levi the [son] of Alphæus sitting at the tax-office, and saith unto him, Follow me: and he

5 (ii. 13-iii. 6): The dispensational conditions.
1 (ii.13-17): grace seeking.

s. cf. Matt. 15. 31. cf. Phil. 2. 11.

t Matt. 9. 9-13. Lk. 5. 27-32.

less; so that the word carries all the weight of the deed:—"Which is easier, to say to the paralytic, Thy sins be forgiven thee, or to say, Rise and take up thy couch, and walk?" Yet now His deeds shall vouch for His words, if only it may conquer them to faith:—"But, that ye may know that the Son of man has authority on earth to forgive sins,—He saith unto the paralytic—Arise, take up thy couch, and go unto thy house."

And so it is: the glorious announcement is convincingly sealed. Forgiveness of sins, not possible under stringent conditions, or to be known when called to meet God, but now, "on earth," positively assured and made his own, and the new life flowing through him the seal of it: this is what becomes the possession of the rejoicing man. This is also the good news that is published in him to the multitude around. "The Son of man has" this "authority:" One in the reality of man's nature, yet exceptional in that very title; having to emphasize in His own case, as strange to it, what need not be affirmed of another;—well might they be amazed, and glorify God for it! Not to them only: to earth, hell, heaven, it was the marvel of marvels. Angels were saying adoringly, with this company of earth's fallen creatures, objects in their misery of the love that brought Him down: "We never saw it on this fashion."

5. All this intimates the change that was coming in. Already there was among them One who was greater than the law and stood in a very different relation to it than men as sinners. Doubtless there was, incorporated witht he law itself, a ritualistic system which in contrast with the rigor of the moral requirement, addressed itself to sinners as a provision of mercy which pointed the eye of faith also to the better thing to come. But, just as doing this, it revealed its own incapacity for deliverance from the condemnation which the law to which it was wedded preached, and was designed to preach. Only in preaching this could it act as the "handmaid" of the grace for which it was preparing the way; and to find hope in law was just to defeat the very end for which it was given; and thus the Lord had to tell the people led away by their blind Pharisaic teachers: "There is one that accuseth you, even Moses, in whom ye trust."

The ministry of Christ showed clearly that all was on the point of change. Divine love, now manifesting itself in Him, could be satisfied with nothing short of the fullest expression; and this is what He now affirms. The call of Matthew or Levi, and that which is connected with it here, is found in almost identical words in the three synoptists. The teaching as to the Sabbath with which it is followed in Mark and Luke, is found in Matthew in a different connection.

[1] While the matter of the Lord's teaching is more fully given in any other of the Gospels than in Mark, the fact and constancy of it are as much insisted on as in any, and the miracles, as we have seen, follow and confirm it. His going forth again by the sea and teaching may have significance akin to what we find in Matthew xiii.: for the grace now to display itself so fully, apart from law, suggests ever that going forth to the nations in which it was so soon to issue.

arose and followed him. And it came to pass, as he sat at table in his house, that many tax-gatherers and sinners sat also together with Jesus and his disciples; for there were many, and they followed him. And when the scribes and Pharisees saw him eat with tax-gatherers and sinners, they said unto his disciples, He eateth and drinketh* with [u]tax-gatherers and sinners! And when Jesus heard it, he saith unto them, They that are in [v]health have no need of the physician, but they that are sick: I came not to call the righteous but sinners.

[2] (ii.18-22): the old and the new.

[2] And the disciples of John and the Pharisees were [w]fasting; and they come and say unto him, Why do the disciples of John and the disciples of the Pharisees

[u] Lk.15.1,2. Matt.11.19.

[v] Matt. 18. 11. Lk. 19.7.10. cf. 1 Tim.1. 15.

[w] Matt.9.14 –17. Lk.5.33-39. cf. Matt. 6. 16–18.

*Some omit "and drinketh."

Mark alone gives this as the preface to the calling of Levi, as Matthew is called in Luke also; Mark only speaks of him as the son of Alphæus: what is signified for us by the difference of name?

The meaning of Levi we already know. Leah says at his birth: "Now will my husband be joined to me. . . . Therefore was his name called Levi" (joined).

Alphæus is more difficult. Some give it, with Young, as "leader, chief." Others would identify it with Clopas (the Cleophas of our common version, John xix. 25), and then it may *mean "passing on" or "beyond," in a bad sense, "transgressing." In this way the two names have a relation to each other and to the context here, so striking that it is hard not to accept it as giving that divine thought which assuredly there is somewhere to be found. They would thus speak of "joining together" as the result of "passing beyond" law, and so does grace bring God and man, Gentile and Jew together.

In this way Levi, the tax-gatherer, called from his tax-office to be an apostle of Christ, from a legal exactor to be a minister of the divine bounty, comes to fulfil his name. We have abundance of similar cases in the word of God; and if absence of meaning could be proved in Levi's case, this would be indeed the strange thing to be accounted for.

Grace has its way, and Levi follows Jesus; and this becomes an initiative of work of a like pattern. For to Levi's house many come of those whom the Jews put together as of one kind—"tax-gatherers and sinners"—and take their places at table with Jesus and His disciples; and it is added as an explanatory note upon this, "for there were many, and they followed Him." This is only what the Lord Himself told the Pharisees as to John; and they that had ear for John's stern insistence on repentance had ear also on this very account for the "piping" of grace.

But the Pharisees and scribes find fault with this laxity, as they conceive it. "Why is it," they ask, "that He eateth and drinketh with tax-gatherers and sinners?" His answer is conclusive: He is the Physician of souls: will He surround Himself, then, with the healthy or diseased? He does not come on the vain quest for righteousness, which the law had already proved vain: then indeed He would have been, as they thought Him, in a wrong place; but He had made no such mistake. Were they making none? "I came not to call the righteous but sinners." And sinners are they who have always heard that call.

[2] But this involved a far-reaching change of method. The old must give place to the new, the rigid forms be exchanged for the expansive freedom of the Spirit. How could the prescribed fasts go on, with the Bridegroom in their fast, but thy disciples fast not? And Jesus said unto them, Can the sons of the bridechamber fast, while the [x]bridegroom is with them? As long as they have the bridegroom with them, they cannot fast. But days will come when the bridegroom shall be [y]taken away from them; and then shall they fast, in that day. [z]No one seweth a patch of new* cloth upon an old garment, else the new which filleth it up taketh from the old, † and there cometh a [a]worse rent. And no one putteth new wine into old [wine-] skins; else the wine bursteth the skins, and the wine is poured out and the [b]skins perish; but new wine must be put into new skins.

*As Chalpai.

[x] cf. Jno. 3. 29.

[y] cf. Jno. 16. 6, 20, 22.

[z] cf. Gal. 3. 1-3.

[a] cf. Heb. 6. 4-8, cf. 2 Pet. 2. 20-22.

[b] cf. Heb. 10. 26, 27. ctr. 2 Cor. 5. 16, 17.

3 (ii. 23-28): the sign of the Sabbath.

[3] And it came to pass that he [c]went on the Sabbath-day 'through the corn-fields; and his disciples began to make their way, plucking ‡ the ears. And the Pharisees said unto him, Behold, why do they on the Sabbath that which is not lawful? And he said unto them, Have ye never read what [d]David did, when he had need and was ahungered, he and those with him, how he went into the house of God in [the days of] Abiathar the high priest, and ate the show-bread, which it is not lawful to eat, except for the 'priests, and gave also to those that were with him? And he said unto them, The [f]Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath: so that the [g]Son of man is Lord even of the Sabbath.

[c] Matt. 12. 1-8. Lk. 6. 1-5.

[d] 1 Sa. 21. 1-6.

[e] Lev. 24. 5-9.

[f] cf. Lk. 14. 5.

[g] Matt. 12. 8. cf. Jno. 5. 16-18.

4 (iii. 1-6): the need of man.

[4] And he entered again into the synagogue; and there was there a man having his hand [h]withered. And they

[h] Matt. 12. 9-13. Lk. 6. 6-10.

* Or "unfulled."

† Perhaps more literally—"the filling up takes away from it, the new from the old."

‡ Or, "as they went, to pluck."

midst? By and by, indeed, He would be taken away; and then they would fast. But how could their rags of legal righteousness be patched with the so different righteousness of faith? or the new wine of spiritual power be shut up in the forms of ceremonial Judaism?

[3] Mark and Luke append to this the Lord's settlement of the Sabbath question, which for the Jew had such great importance as involving their whole covenant-relation to God. This we have very similarly in Matthew (chap. xii. 1-13, see notes), though in a different connection. The example of David is given here as there; but instead of the appeal to the priests in the temple, and the quotation from Hosea, Mark substitutes Christ's own affirmation that "the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath: so that the Son of man is Lord even of the Sabbath." The tender solicitude for man, which appeared in such an institution, and which the Pharisees had gone far to obliterate by the harshness of their additions, was itself the convincing proof of the authority of the Son of man over it. It was for man that He had become the Son of man; and as such, all the blessing of man was in His hand to accomplish. Reject Him, and all this vanished. The rest of God, the real rest for all His creatures, He alone could bring in; and the sign was necessarily gone when that which it signified had no longer reality for any.

[4] The need of man is enforced more strongly in the synagogue lesson which follows, the healing of the withered hand. Here they would have restrained with their interpretation of the Sabbath law the very going out of divine power watched him, if he would heal him on the Sabbath, that they might accuse him. And he saith unto the man that had the withered hand, Rise in the midst. And he saith unto them, Is it lawful on the Sabbath to do [i]good or to do evil, to save life or to kill? But they were silent. And looking round upon them with [j]anger, being distressed at the hardening of their heart, he saith unto the man, [k]Stretch forth thy hand. And he stretched it out, and his hand was restored. And the Pharisees went out immediately with the Herodians, and took [l]counsel against him, how they might destroy him.

i cf. Lk. 14. 3.
j cf. Matt. 23. 13, etc.
k cf. Jno. 4. 50. cf. Rom. 4. 19–25.
l Matt. 12. 14. Lk. 6. 11. cf. Ps. 109. 4, 5.

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chaps. iii. 7–v.)

Things made apparent.

SECTION 1. (chap. iii. 7–iv. 34.)

God only sufficient.

1 (iii. 7–19): Divine power in grace.
1 (iii. 7–12): in the Lord Himself.

1. [1] AND Jesus withdrew with his disciples to the sea; and a great [m]multitude followed from Galilee, and from Judea, and from Jerusalem, and from Idumea, m Matt. 12. 15. Lk. 6. 17–19.

itself in behalf of such misery as the world was full of. Was it, then, a law not to do good but to do evil? to let death have its way, rather than preserve life? But they remain obstinately silent. Then, the love within Him burning to anger at the hardness of their hearts, He summons divine power to witness against them in the healing of the man. They are confounded but unhumbled; and their wrath against Him unites Pharisees with Herodians henceforth to destroy Him.

SUBD. 3.

We have had then, thus far, the general features of the ministry of Christ among men; we are now called to consider the results of it, or what is made apparent by it as it goes on. And here we must remember, and as of wider application, the words prophetically spoken by Isaiah as to Israel: "Then I said, I have labored in vain; I have spent my strength for nought and in vain; yet surely my judgment is with Jehovah, and my work with my God." Not only was it true of Israel, but, all through the present time, apparent failure attaches to His work. Until He comes again in the clouds of heaven, the world remains the scene of His rejection, and none the less because whole countries are covered with nominal Christianity. Nay, this nominal reception only makes more manifest, where it is but that, how obdurately, when no plea for it is any longer possible, the citadel of the heart can stand out against Him. Thus, to follow one's own will, and justify it, truth is perverted and Christianity debased. "The corruption of what is best becomes the worst corruption."

And yet the end shall speak for Him, that neither His love nor His power has failed. Heaven is filling with the fruits of His travail. By and by the earth also shall have its harvest. Meanwhile faith and patience are exercised and needed constantly.

Sec. 1.

The whole subdivision is divided into seven parts; but the 4+3 into which the seven so often resolves itself, is so strongly marked that these become two sections. The first, as characterized by its 4, shows that external view of results which seems so much stamped with failure, but in which (man being fully proved) the sufficiency of God is seen as alone to be relied on. The second, stamped with its 3 of spiritual energy and resurrection, shows us the work of God itself in its salvation character, unhindered by the power of evil.

and beyond Jordan; and those around Tyre and Sidon, a great multitude, having heard what he was doing, came to him. And he spake to his disciples that a little boat should wait on him, on account of the crowd, that they might not press upon him. For he healed many, so that they pressed on him, that they might [n]touch him, as many as had plagues. And the unclean spirits, when they beheld him, fell down before him, and cried, saying, Thou art the Son of God. And he [o]rebuked them much, that they should not make him manifest.

2 (iii.13-19): His ministers.

[2] And he goeth up into the mountain, and [p]calleth to him whom he himself would; and they came away to him. And he appointed twelve that they should be with him, and that he might send them out to preach, and to have authority to [heal diseases and to]* cast out demons: and Simon he surnamed Peter; and James the [son] of Zebedee, and John the brother of James; and he surnamed them Boanerges, that is, sons of thunder; and Andrew, and Philip, and Bartholomew, and Matthew, and Thomas, and James the [son] of Alphæus, and Thaddæus, and Simon the Cananæan,† and Judas Iscariot, who also delivered him up.

2 (iii.20-30): Rejection and blasphemy.

2. And he cometh into [the] house. And again the multitude cometh together, so that they could not so much as eat bread. And when his [q]relatives heard of n Matt. 14. 36. Lk. 6. 19.

o Matt. 12. 16. ch. 1. 25,34. Lk. 4. 41.

p Matt. 10. 1-4. Lk.6.13-16. Lk. 9. 1. cf. Jno. 15. 16. cf. Rev. 21. 14 with Eph. 2. 20.

q ver. 31. Jno. 7. 5. cf. Jno.8.48. cf. Acts 26. 24.

*Many MSS. omit.
†Or "zealot."

1. At the commencement we see once more divine power flowing forth in grace to meet all the effects of sin, in a world disorganized and ruined by it. A witness this which has a certain, present effect in attracting multitudes from all the country round.

[1] First, we have this as seen in the Lord Himself; where, notice, as to its significance in connection with what has been already said, that Jesus "withdraws with His disciples to the sea:" a hint, as we have seen reason to believe, of that going out to the nations which, however implied in the very character of the grace which is coming in, actually takes its form from Israel's rejection of Him. At present it is Israel that is crowding after Him, but (notice again) in such a manner that He must take to the little ship because of the crowd.

The power of Satan, too, is everywhere manifest, though as manifestly subject of necessity to Him. After the manner we have seen, still they declare Him,—only to be rebuked and silenced by Him, as unfit to be His witnesses. Indeed we may see in it already an indication of how by and by the unclean birds would get lodgment in the branches of the overgrown "tree" of a parable which we find shortly given us in this very section.

[2] Next we are shown this ministry of the Lord extended by means of those called and empowered of Him to represent Him. For this they are ordained, first of all to be "with Him;" then that He might send them out to preach; the power to heal sicknesses and cast out demons being the accompaniment of this. The list of the twelve which follows is not in the same order as that in Matthew, except that Simon Peter's is the first name, while that of the unhappy Judas is the last.

2. What follows here is still for the most part in Matthew, who however gives a much fuller account. Mark omits much that came after the choice of the it, they came forth to lay hold of him: for they said, He is beside himself. And the scribes that came down from Jerusalem said, He hath [r]Beelzebub, and by the prince of demons he casteth out demons. And he called them unto him and said unto them in parables, How can [s]Satan cast out Satan? And if a kingdom be divided against itself, that kingdom cannot stand. And if a house be divided against itself, that house will not be able to stand. And if Satan has risen up against himself, and is divided, he cannot stand, but hath an end. But no man can enter into the [t]strong man's house, and spoil his goods, except he first [u]bind the strong man; and then he will spoil his house. Verily I say unto you, All sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men, and blasphemies wherewith soever they shall blaspheme; but whosoever shall [v]blaspheme against the Holy Spirit hath never forgiveness, but lieth under an eternal sin: [w]because they said, He hath an unclean spirit.

3 (iii.31-35): The real link with Christ spiritual.

3. And his [x]mother and his brethren come; and, standing without, they sent unto him, calling him. And the multitude sat around him; and they said unto him, Behold, thy mother and thy brethren without are seeking thee. And he answering saith unto them: Who is my mother, and my brethren? And looking round on those sitting round about him, he saith, Behold my mother and my brethren. For whosoever shall do the [y]will of God, the same is my brother and sister and mother.

r Matt.9.34. Matt.10.25. Matt.12.24. Lk. 11. 14, 15. Jno. 10. 20.
s Matt.12.25–28. Lk. 11. 16–20.
t Matt.12.29. Lk. 11. 21, 22. cf. Ps.35.10. cf.Lk.13.16.
u cf. Heb.2. 14, 15. cf. 1 Jno. 3. 8.
v Matt. 12. 31, 32. Lk. 12. 10. cf. 1 Jno.1. 7. cfr. Eph.4. 30 with Eph. 1. 13, 14.
w cf. 1 Cor. 12. 3. cf.Is. 5. 20. cf. 1 Pet.4. 4, 5.
x Matt. 12. 46–50. Lk.8.19–21. ch. 6. 3.
y cf. Jno.20. 17. cf. Heb. 2. 11, 12. cf. Rom. 8. 17. cf. Ps. 16.2, 3.

twelve. Of the so-called "sermon on the mount" he has nothing, and little detail of the breach which is now becoming apparent between the nation led by its Pharisaic teachers and the Lord. All this has more its place in Matthew as the dispensational Gospel, while Mark comes almost at once to the conclusion when the scribes impute His miracles to demon power. This exhibits so clearly the heart hardened against all conviction that Christ warns them that blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, by whose power His mighty works were done, is the unpardonable sin. The expression in Mark, if the best accredited text is in fact the true one, is that it is "an eternal sin"—a sin which in its mark of a soul stiffened in determinate resistance to God speaks of an ultimate, eternal condition. Alas, it was demonic power in Israel that was asserting itself, and only One stronger than Satan could bind and deprive him of his prey. Satan would not cast out Satan; and the fact of his being cast out, that very slander admitted. They had thus, in fact, condemned themselves.

3. But all this was but the demonstration of man's condition, which only the power of God is competent to meet. Even his kindred according to the flesh thought of the glorious Worker as "beside Himself;" and now they press upon Him in the midst of His labor with their supposed (at least) prior claim. With Him they could not plead it: the Son of God, this relationship to God governed all. It was on account of the state of man Godward He had come, and His very presence among them argued, not their being right in this, but the reverse. For Him the spiritual condition was that upon which all else depended, and the spiritual link was all that He could acknowledge. In the most decisive way, therefore, He rejects the mere fleshly claim: "Who," He asks, "is My mother, and My brethren? And looking round on those sitting round about Him, He

4 (iv. 1-34): The Word testing men.
1 (1-20): causes of barrenness.

4. [1] And again he began to teach by the [z]sea-side; and there was gathered unto him a very great multitude, so that he entered into the ship, and sat in the sea: and all the multitude were by the sea, upon the land. And he taught them many things in parables, and said unto them in his teaching,— z Matt.13.1, 2. Lk. 8. 4. cf. Is. 60. 5.

Hearken: behold, there went out the [a]sower to sow. And, as he sowed, some fell by the wayside, and the [b]birds came and devoured it up. And other fell upon the rocky ground, where it had not much earth; and immediately it sprang up, because it had no depth of earth; and when the sun arose it was scorched, and because it had no root it withered away. And other fell among the thorns; and the thorns sprang up and choked it, and it yielded no fruit. And others fell upon good ground, and yielded fruit, growing up and increasing, and brought forth thirtyfold, and sixtyfold, and a hundredfold. And he said, He that hath [c]ears to hear, let him hear.

a Matt. 13. 3-9. Lk. 8. 5-8.
b vers. 15, etc.
c Matt. 11, 15. cf. Rev. 2. 7, etc.

And when he was alone, they that were about him with the twelve asked him about the parables. And saith, Behold My mother and My brethren: for whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is My brother and sister and mother."*

4. There follows, as in Matthew, the parable of the Sower and the seed, but only one other of what there is a series picturing the Kingdom of heaven as it would take shape in the absence of the King. The Lord's last announcement of necessity brings in the Gentiles; if at least the work of the Spirit of God should be found among them: it contains, as is evident, a fundamental principle of Christianity; and Matthew traces the history of this till the coming of the Son of man in the clouds of heaven. Mark has one parable, indeed, which Matthew has not, and showing explicitly the absence of the King until the time of the harvest; but Matthew does not need this, as what he does give sufficiently declares it. Mark gives only so much of the history as to develop the principles; pressing all into a moral dealing with the individual conscience.

Here we are still upon the same track as before: the lesson is of the vanity of man, of the sufficiency of God alone. The parables here show this under the test of the word of God. The ground of the human heart yields nothing for God save as the Word is sown in it. Even then there are many causes of unfruitfulness, and foes of the new life that has sprung up. Nay, the general result as to the earth at large is mingled and dubious. What, in fact, has the history of the Church shown, if it be not this? How great the comfort of knowing, however, that this is no unforeseen, unaccountable happening. Before the Church began, the history of professing Christianity had already been outlined, and the causes of failure pointed out; and in the New Testament, parable, literal prophecy and vision have all been used to give us warning—a warning which is encouragement as well.

[1] The causes of barrenness are depicted for us in the parable of the Sower and the seed; and we have already gone through it in Matthew. From the word of God all fruit in man is to be found, yet from man himself opposition comes. The devil, the flesh, and the world are confederates against Christ; and the same hindrances, even where the word is received, prevail to hinder in different degrees the proper fruit of it.

* One need hardly point out the rebuke of Romish Mariolatry in all this. It is, in fact, constant throughout the Gospels (comp. Luke ii. 48, 49; xi. 27, 28; John ii. 3, 4).

he said unto them, Unto you it is [d]given [to know] * the mystery of the kingdom of God; but unto those that are without all things are done in parables: that [e]seeing they might see, and not perceive, and hearing they might hear, and not understand; lest haply they should turn, and it might be forgiven them. And he saith unto them, Know ye not this parable? and how then will ye know [f]all parables?

The sower soweth the word. And these are they by the wayside, where the word is sown, and when they have heard, immediately [g]Satan cometh and taketh away the word that was sown in them. And these are they likewise who are sown in rocky places, who, when they hear the word, immediately with joy receive it; and they have not root in themselves, but endure for a time: then, when [h]affliction or persecution cometh on account of the word, immediately they are offended. And others are they who are sown among the thorns; these are they who have heard the word, and the [i]cares of the world † and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts after other things entering in, choke the word, and it becometh unfruitful. And those are they that were sown upon the good ground: such as hear the word and [j]accept it and bear fruit, thirtyfold, and sixtyfold, and a hundredfold.

2 (iv. 21-25): hindrances to testimony and increase.

[2] And he said to them: Doth the lamp come, that it may be put under the [k]bushel or under the [l]bed, and not to be upon the stand? For there is nothing hid, but in order to be [m]manifested; nor hath anything been made secret, but in order that it might come to light. If any one have ears to hear, let him hear. And

* Many omit.
† Or "age."

d Matt. 13. 10-17. Lk. 8. 9,10. cf. Matt.11. 25-27.
e Is. 6. 9, 10. cf. 1 Cor. 2. 14. cf. Rom.. 8. 5-7.
f cf. 1Cor.10. 6, 11 with Rom. 15. 4.
g Matt. 13. 18-23. Lk.8.11-15. cf. ver. 4 with Jer.5. 27. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 3, 4.
h cf. vers.5, 6 with Prov.28.14. cfp. Ps. 51. 17.
i cf. ver. 7 with Prov. 22. 5. *cf.*1 Tim.6. 9, 10.
j cf. ver. 8 with Jer.4. 3, 4. Hos. 10.12. cf. 1 Thess. 2. 13.
k Matt.5.15. Lk. 11. 33. cf. Lk. 14. 18, 19.
l *cf.*Prov.19. 15. cf. Eph. 5. 14.
m Matt. 10. 26. cf. Phil. 2. 15, 16.

Notice in the Lord's rebuke to His disciples, how little the parabolic form should hinder intelligence for one of His own. "How then will ye know all parables?" shows what on the Lord's part He designs for us. And everywhere, it need not be doubted, in Nature as well as in Scripture, such parables are to be found awaiting the interpretation of faith. Alas, we may, on the other hand, be ignorant of their very existence, and reason may deny what without such guidance it can never find; but agnosticism of whatever quality has no power of conviction for the man that sees; were the prayer oftener with us, "Open Thou mine eyes," we might at least realize more the immeasurableness of our inheritance.

[2] After the causes of barrenness the Lord goes on to warn of hindrances to testimony. If the word of God is that from which all fruit is to come, how great the responsibility to minister it. If a lamp is brought, what do you do with it? It is for illumination doubtless. Do you put it, then, under a bushel measure, or under a bed? Clearly not, but upon its stand. Activity and slothfulness as typified in these two ways may both hinder testimony: the heart bent upon gain, and occupied with what is emphatically called "business," like the thorny ground of the parable, may have little room for the Word, either to get hold of it or to scatter it. While Og's great bed of ease and pleasure may keep men as securely from occupation with or ministry of the things unseen. Christ bids he said unto them, Take [n]heed what ye hear: with whatsoever [o]measure ye mete it shall be measured unto you; and more shall be given you. For [p]whosoever hath, to him shall be given; and whosoever hath not, even that which he hath shall be taken away from him.

3 (iv. 26-29): the manifestation at harvest.

[3] And he said, So is the kingdom of God, as if a man should cast [q]seed upon the earth, and should sleep and rise night and day, and the seed should spring up and grow, he knoweth not how. The [r]earth bringeth forth fruit of herself: first, the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear; but when the fruit is brought forth, immediately he sendeth out the sickle, because the [s]harvest is come.

4 (iv. 30-34): the success which is failure.

[4] And he said, How shall we liken the kingdom of God, or with what parable shall we set it forth? It is like a grain of [t]mustard-seed, which, when it is sown upon the earth, is less than all seeds that are upon the earth, and when it has been sown, it mounteth up, and becometh greater than all herbs, and maketh great branches, so that the [u]birds of heaven can lodge under its shadow.

n cf. Jas. 1. 19. cf. Acts 16. 14.
o Matt. 7. 2. Lk. 6. 38.
p Matt. 13. 12. Matt. 25. 29. Lk. 8. 18. Lk. 19. 26. cf. Jno. 15. 2. cf. 1 Thess. 1. 3.
q cf. Matt. 13. 24-30, 36-43.
r cf. 1 Cor. 3. 6, 7.
s cf. Rev. 14. 14-16.
t Matt. 13. 31, 32. Lk. 13. 18, 19. cf. Acts 1. 15 with Acts 2. 41. cf. Ex. 12. 38.
u cf. ver. 4 with Dan. 4. 20-22.

His disciples have before them the day of manifestation, in which all secret things shall be at last revealed.

Again, in order to minister one must receive; and if the fruit take its character from the seed, must receive only the truth. How important, then, to take heed what one hears! and what one measures out to others will be more than recompensed again: a thing as true of ministry of the Word, as of practical conduct; for heaven's law is scattering for increase,—you do not alienate from yourself what you give to others, but gain the more; and still this opens the way to fresh gain: to him that hath shall more be given. Every bit of truth acquired leads on to fresh truth; every sphere of usefulness found prepares for more.

[3] In a parable peculiar to Mark the Lord now goes on to speak of the day of manifestation at the reaping of earth's harvest, and of what is implied in it for the present time. The seed put into the ground is left there by the sower as if he had no further thought about it. It springs up and grows, as it were, without his knowledge. So the Lord after sowing the seed of His word at the beginning, is gone up to heaven. How much, in fact, seems to be taking place without His knowledge. The crop goes on developing and ripening. When He sees that it is ripe, the sickle will be put in.

Of this harvest time of earth Matthew gives us the fuller detail. The parable here simply emphasizes the time of responsibility and uncertainty—the earth bringing forth of herself; then the intervention, when the crop is ready. Of the general result nothing is said at present. All that has been already before us would imply one not unmixed. Matthew shows us correspondingly tares among the wheat; not even the failure merely of much of the right seed (a lesson which Mark has repeated), but the effect of the enemy's sowing. Mark passes over this to the third parable in Matthew; and here we find what has more sorrowful interest for us.

[4] We have already taken up in some detail the meaning of this third parable. It is that of the mustard-seed, and we have seen in it the picture, indeed, of success of a certain kind, a growth beyond expectation. The smallest of seeds develops into a tree; the Kingdom of heaven becomes (according to the constant use of the figure in Scripture) a world-power,—a thing of self-evident application, so long before our eyes that we have lost the sense of what it means.

And with [v]many such parables spake he the word to them as they were able to hear it; but without a parable spake he not unto them; but in private, to his own disciples, he expounded all things.

[v] Matt. 13. 34, 35.

SECTION 2.

The work of God in its salvation power.

1 (iv.35–41): Abiding sufficiency.

1. And on that day, when the even was come, he saith unto them, Let us go over to the [w]other side: and having sent the multitude away, they took him with them as he was, in the ship. And there were with him other ships. And there cometh a great squall of wind upon the sea, and the waves beat into the ship, so that the ship was already filling. And he was in the stern, [x]asleep upon the cushion. And they awake him, and say unto him, Teacher, [y]carest thou not that we perish? And he awoke and rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea, [z]Peace, be still. And the wind ceased, and there came a great calm. And he said unto them, Why are ye fearful? Have ye not yet [a]faith? And they feared with great fear, and said to one another, [b]Who then is this, that also the wind and the sea obey him?

[w] Matt. 8. 18, Lk. 8. 22.

[x] Matt. 8. 23–27. Lk. 8. 23–25. cf. Lk. 6. 12.

[y] cf. Lk. 10. 40. cf. Ps. 44. 23.

[z] Ps. 107. 29. Ps. 65. 7. Ps. 89. 9.

[a] cf. Matt. 14. 31, 32. cf. ch. 16. 14.

[b] cf. Matt. 14. 33.

Christianity, we say, has a right of dominion over the earth: a claim which Rome has been most successful in making. Alas, if Christianity has ever ruled a nation upon earth, Christ Himself has never done so; and therefore nothing else than a debased Christianity. The success in this way has been dreadful failure: the well-rooted tree has given lodgment to the unclean birds of the air who in the first parable devour the good seed. Here in the degradation of the Kingdom of heaven to a world-power with the prince of this world undethroned, we find what even comes of the word of God among those professedly accepting, not rejecting. And here the view of man as tested by the Word comes naturally to an end.

Sec. 2.

We have now the other side: how God nevertheless manifests Himself to faith, carrying out His purposes unfailingly, spite of all opposition, and as the Saviour of all who put their trust in Him. The three subsections here as the closing part of a septenary series naturally speak of divine manifestation, while the second section as naturally speaks of that salvation work in which He is most fully manifested.

1. The stilling of the storm upon the lake is found earlier in Matthew, but with little difference in detail. In it Christ's power over the elements is exhibited to the wonder of His disciples; and in it probably all His people have seen without any question the sign of His supremacy over all circumstances of the disturbed scene through which we pass. When the storm comes, how often He seems asleep! But this is for practice of faith, not for the overthrow of it. Yet unbelief in them is importunate and querulous: "Carest Thou not that we perish?" as if waves could sink the ship in which He was! But there was the logic of fact: the ship was filling. They wake Him, and at His rebuke the tempest stills; but have they not missed something? and do not we often gain, perhaps, a speedier deliverance through our unbelief? when faith, like the tropic-bird, would find its rest amid the tempest, and see more the "wonders of the Lord."

Mark notices most distinctly His rebuke: "Why are ye fearful? have ye not yet faith?" And why indeed do we not trust Him with absolute rest of heart? Surely it is true that "he that feareth is not perfected in love." But then, how 2 (v. 1-20): The enemy subject.

1 (1-5): the enemy's power.

2. [1] And they [c]came to the other side of the sea, to the country of the Gadarenes. And immediately, when he was come out of the ship, there met him out of the tombs a man with an [d]unclean spirit, who had his dwelling in the tombs, and no one could any longer bind him, even with chains; because he had been often [e]bound with fetters and chains, and the chains had been torn asunder by him, and the fetters broken to pieces: and no one had power to tame him. And continually, night and day, he was in the [f]mountains and in the [g]tombs, crying out, and [h]cutting himself with stones.

2 (6-13): the deliverance.

[2] And when he saw Jesus from afar, he ran and worshiped him; and crying out with a loud voice, he saith, [i]What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of the Most High God? I adjure thee by God, torment me not. For he had said unto him, Come out, thou unclean spirit, out of the man. And he asked him, What is [j]thy name? And he saith unto him, Legion is my name; for we are [k]many. And he besought him much that he would not send them away out of the country. And there was there on the mountain side a great herd of swine feeding, and they besought him, saying, Send us into the swine, that we may enter into them. And he

c Matt. 8. 28-34. Lk. 8. 26-36.
d ch. 7. 25. cf. Rev. 16. 13, 14. cf. Jas. 3. 15.
e cf. r. ch. 3. 27. cf. ver. 26. cf. Rom. 3. 20 with Rom. 8. 7.
f cf. Jer. 13. 16.
g cf. Prov. 21. 16.
h cf. Prov. 23. 29. cf. Prov. 8. 36.
i ch. 1. 24.
j cf. Gen. 32. 27. cf. Ruth. 1. 20. cf. 1 Jno. 1. 9.
k cf. ch. 16. 9.

good to know that His love is such—so true and omnipotent—that to learn this perfectly is all that we can want for absolute deliverance.

2. The familiar story of the demoniac follows, as in the two other synoptists, showing the power of the enemy in its fullest and fiercest display entirely subject to Him. We have already looked at it in Matthew, but who in this case is much briefer in his account than Mark. Mark dwells more upon the desperate condition of the man, his being infested with a horde of demons—as he says, a Legion, and depicts his after-condition as delivered, of which Matthew says nothing. These things lie more within the scope of the present Gospel, in which the quality of the deliverance, the service done to man, is more before us, as in Matthew the Deliverer.

[1] In the first place, Mark shows us in a very distinct way the enemy's power. His victim's abode is in the tombs, he who had the power of death finding a congenial abode amid the tokens of the ruin which his hand has wrought. There he lives in the lawless freedom secured by supernatural strength. Men cannot bind him and cannot tame him: fetters and chains are broken in pieces by him; and bent upon self-injury, he is always in scenes of desolation,—on the mountains or in the tombs, crying out, and cutting himself with stones. Here are features by which we may see still in many different forms how great a hold Satan has of men still and everywhere. Spite of their pride and self-love, they pursue eagerly the paths of self-degradation and self-torture; breaking asunder every restraint which the wisdom bred of bitter experience has taught men to put upon one another. The heights of self-exaltation and the charnel-houses of corruption are alike their haunts; and these, though apparently so far apart, come often-times together.

[2] But the power of Satan, while to the fallen creature so hopeless to overcome, finds in Christ a power to which it must succumb. Throughout these evangelic histories there is not a trace of open resistance on the part of these demons, if as here there were a legion of them. They deprecate the judgment they foresee, but for which the time is not yet come, and plead this in their own behalf. They beseech Him not to send them out of the country, and ask leave to enter gave them leave. And the unclean spirits came out and entered into the [l]swine; and the herd rushed down the steep slope into the sea ([being] about two thousand), and were choked in the sea. And they that fed them fled, and reported it in the city and in the country.

3 (14, 15): the transformation.

[3] And they came out to see what it was that had taken place. And they come to Jesus, and see him that had been possessed with demons [m]sitting, clothed, and in his right mind,—even him that had the legion; and they were afraid.

4 (16, 17): a fallen world.

[4] And they that had seen it declared to them how it had befallen him that had been possessed with demons, and concerning the swine. And they began to beseech him to [n]depart out of their borders.

5 (18–20): the responsibility.

[5] And as he was entering into the ship, he that had been possessed with demons besought him that he might be [o]with him. And he suffered him not, but saith unto him, Go home unto thy people, and [p]declare to them how great things the Lord hath done for thee, and hath had mercy upon thee. And he went his way, and began to publish in Decapolis how great things Jesus had done for him: and all men wondered.

3 (v. 21–43): Resurrection-power.

1 (21–24): an appeal for life.

3. [1] And when Jesus had passed over again in the ship to the other side, a great multitude were gathered unto him; and he was by the sea. And there cometh one of

l cf. Lk. 15. 15.

m cf. Matt. 11. 28–30. cf. Lk. 10. 39.

n Matt. 8. 34. Lk. 8. 37. cf. Ex. 20. 18. cf. Acts 16. 39.

o Lk. 8. 38. cf. Rom. 5. 2. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 2, 4.

p Lk. 8. 39. cf. Acts 26. 19, 20. etc. ch. 1. 44 with Jno. 1. 11.

into the herd of swine. What purpose they might have in this, and whether it was in the end thwarted or suffered, we may have little ability to understand. The demons are still demons, and seeking their own ends as such; while the wisdom of God taketh still the wise in their own craftiness.

[3] We are then given the picture of the delivered man. Three things show the transformation wrought: he is "sitting, and clothed, and in his right mind." Restlessness, vehemence, passion, are gone; the shame of his nakedness is covered; he has come to himself and his mind is cleared. Is there any coming to oneself, where there is not coming to Christ?

[4] But the world is a fallen world, and Satan is the prince of it. Here we see how it is that he is this. Those who beg Christ to depart must needs have the devil to remain. It is but a question between the two, for nature abhors a vacuum. The Lord has shown us how an empty, swept and garnished house waits and invites such a tenant: Christ is too costly a guest: one soul to cost two thousand swine is too high a reckoning. They beg Him therefore, courteously, to depart: for He can be refused with courtesy, and yet refused: and He does depart.

[5] But the rescued man is of another mind than this: divine grace has wrought in his heart, and the deliverance of which he has been the subject is too real and great. He prays that he may be with Him; but the Lord has other purposes as to him: "Go home to thy people," He says, "and declare to them how great things the Lord has done for thee, and has had mercy upon thee." Thus is the saved sinner made to be a witness of the salvation which he has received, in the world out of which Christ has gone rejected. "And he went his way, and began to publish in Decapolis how great things Jesus had done for him; and all men wondered."

3. In the intertwined stories of the daughter of Jairus and the woman with the issue of blood, Mark again is fuller than Matthew, and the dispensational application which we have seen in his account seems to give place here to an

the rulers of the synagogue, [q] Jairus by name, and when he seeth him, he falleth at his feet, and beseecheth him much, saying, My little daughter lieth at the point of death: [I pray thee] that thou come and lay thy hands upon her, that she may be healed and live. And he went with him; and a great multitude followed him and thronged him.

2 (25-34): the confirmation of faith.

[2] And a [r] woman who had had an issue of blood [s] twelve years, and had suffered many things of many physicians, and had [t] spent all that she had, and was no wise bettered, but rather grew [u] worse, when she heard of Jesus, came in the crowd behind, and [v] touched his garment; for she said, If I touch but his garments, I shall be healed. And immediately the fountain of her blood was dried up, and she felt * in her body that she was healed of the scourge. And immediately Jesus, [w] knowing in himself the power that had gone out of him, turned about in the crowd and said, Who touched my garments? And his disciples said unto him, Thou seest the multitude [x] thronging thee, and sayest thou, Who touched me? And he looked round about, to see her q Matt. 9. 1, 18, 19, 23-26. Lk. 8. 41, 42, 49-56.

r Matt. 9. 20-22. Lk. 8. 43-48. cf. Lev. 15. 25-31 with Matt. 15. 19.

s cf. ver. 42. cf. Josh. 4. 2-5 with Am. 3. 2.

t cf. Lk. 10. 31, 32. cf. Rom. 5. 6. cf. Rom. 10. 2, 3.

u cf. Rom. 3. 20. cf. Rom. 7. 8, 11, 24.

v cf. Matt. 14. 35, 36 with Rom. 4. 5.

w Jno. 2. 25. cf. Nah. 1. 7.

x cf. Rom. 10. 16-18. cf. Rom. 9. 6 with Lk. 13. 26, 27.

* Literally "knew."

individual and spiritual one. We have, no doubt, the divine and human sides of what is, in fact, one glorious work of the God of resurrection. From one side we are sinners dying in our sins, and we lay hold upon Christ in our need and prove the virtue that is in Him for our healing. From the other, we were not dying simply but dead, and are raised up from the dead. Both sides are true, but we are not concerned just now with any reconciliation of them. They are in the main the views respectively of Romans and Ephesians, and we reach them in the order indicated by this.

[1] Jair, "the enlightener," as ruler of the synagogue, may signify to us by name and position both the failure and the power of law. The law had said, "Do this, and thou shalt live," but life, as he owns, is only in the hands of Jesus, to whom the conviction of his extremity brings him. Faith springs out of his daughter's need: "My little daughter lieth at the point of death: I pray thee that Thou come and lay Thy hands on her that she may be healed, and she shall live." It is the right effect of law when we are shut up by it in this way to the faith of Jesus.

[2] The Lord listens to his prayer, and follows him toward the house, a multitude thronging Him upon His way there. Amidst them all comes one who has conscious personal need of Him,—an issue of blood, a steady quiet draining of the life away, for which all the help that she has hitherto sought has been but aggravation of the evil and impoverishment. Now she has heard of Jesus, and without means, without hope, she too has reached the place in which she is ready to be attracted. Faith says in her heart, "If I touch but His garments I shall be healed"; and the event confirms this; coming in the press behind she touches; and "she felt in her body that she was healed of that scourge."

This is one of the not infrequent cases in which the spiritual application is so easy to be made that in fact it is made generally by the common consent of Christians, and needs little enforcement. The twelve years of unhealed misery are marked by the number of divine government as that which issues, after all other means of healing has been proved worse than vain, in the exaltation of Christ. The touching of the garments is the appeal to those ways of His which manifest His character, the "habits," in Him so safely to be relied upon. We who had done this thing. But the woman, affrighted and trembling, knowing what had been done in her, came and [y] fell down before him, and told him all the truth. But he said unto her, Daughter, thy [z] faith hath healed thee: go in peace, and be well of thy scourge.

[x] (35-43): "Talitha Koumi."

[35] While he yet spake, they come from the ruler of the synagogue's [house], saying, Thy daughter hath died: why troublest thou the teacher any further? But Jesus, having overheard * the word spoken, saith unto the ruler of the synagogue, [a] Fear not; only believe. And he suffered no one to follow in his company except Peter and James, and John the brother of James. And he cometh † to the ruler of the synagogue's house, and seeth the tumult, and people weeping and wailing greatly; and entering in, he saith unto them, Why make ye a tumult and weep? the child hath not died, but [b] sleepeth. And they derided him. But he, having [c] put them all forth, taketh with him the father and mother of the child, and those that were with him, and entereth in where the child was. And, taking the child by the [d] hand, he saith unto her, Talitha koumi, which is, when interpreted, Damsel, I say unto thee, [e] Arise. And immediately the damsel arose and [f] walked; for she was twelve years old. And they were [g] amazed with great amazement. And he [h] charged them much that no one should know this, and said [to them] that something should be given her to [i] eat.

* Or, "disregarding."
† Or, "they come."

[y] cf. Rom. 10. 9, 10. cf. Lk. 17. 14–19.
[z] ch. 10. 52. cf. Gal 2. 16.
[a] Matt. 14. 27. cf. Is. 43. 1.
[b] Jno. 11. 11–14, 25. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 55–57.
[c] cf. Acts 9. 40. cf. 1 Kl. 17. 19. cf. Matt. 26. 56 with Matt. 27. 46.
[d] cf. Acts 3. 6, 7. cf. Rev. 1. 17, 18.
[e] Jno. 11. 43. cf. Jno. 5. 25, 28, 29.
[f] cf. Rom. 6. 4.
[g] ch. 1. 27. cf. Jno. 12. 12, 13, 17, 18.
[h] ch. 3. 12.
[i] cf. 1 Pet. 2. 2. cf. Col. 3. 1. cf. Heb. 5. 14.

see in her also how necessary faith is to feelings, producing these, not built upon them: "joy and peace" found "in believing." The details of the picture sustain the interpretation: it is not casual resemblance that we find, but the consistency of truth.

She illustrates also the confirmation found in open confession of Christ: how the Lord looks for this on the part of those whom He has healed. He owns her also as one of whom He is not ashamed and assures to her the quiet enjoyment of what His grace has given. Of what immense importance to our spiritual life is the confession of Christ, as He Himself has emphasized it for us!

[35] But now the news is brought that the child is dead: why trouble the Teacher any more? Death, for man, is the end of hope; and, as far as he is concerned, designed to be so. On this very account, it is in this that God can show Himself where man is impotent. "Be not afraid," says the Lord in answer to such a message; "only believe." Unbelief may claim its right to mourn and weep, unreal as much even of this is; but faith it is that alone can see the glory of God.

The same twelve years measure the period of the woman's issue of blood and the age of the child when raised from the dead: the same meaning must attach to them in both cases. "God, for the great love wherewith He loved us, even when we were dead in sins, has quickened us together with Christ, and has raised us up together" (Eph. ii. 4, 5). This goes, indeed, beyond that which we find in Mark; but "with Christ" shows Christ to be, in a deeper sense even than in the Gospel, the Worker of the miracle of resurrection. "With Him" only, as the fruit of His precious death for us, and by grace "bound in the bundle of life" with Him, could we have been brought up out of a death so different. In

DIVISION 2. (Chaps. vi.–x.)

The Service of a Rejected Master.

SUBDIVISION 1. (Chap. vi.)

The unity of opposition and supremacy of divine grace.

1 (1-13): Power in grace. 1 (1-6): pride resisting conviction.

1. [i] AND he went thence and cometh into his [j]own country; and his disciples follow him. And when the sabbath was come, he began to teach in the synagogue: and many hearing him were astonished, saying, [k]Whence hath this man these things? and what is the wisdom that is given unto this man, that such works of power are done by his hands? Is not this the [l]carpenter, the son of Mary, and brother of James and Joses and Judas and Simon? and are not his sisters here with us? And they were [m]offended in him. And Jesus said unto them, A [n]prophet is not without honor, save in his own country, and among his kindred, and in his own house. And he [o]could there do no work of

[i] Matt. 13. 53-58. cf. Lk. 4. 16-30.
[k] Jno. 6. 42. Jno. 7. 15. cf. Acts 2. 7-11. cf. Acts 4. 13.
[l] cf. Lk. 2. 51, 52 with Phil. 2. 7, 8. cf. Acts 18. 3 with Jno. 13. 16.
[m] Matt. 11. 6. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 7, 8.
[n] cf. Jno. 7. 5. cf. Jno. 4. 44. cf. Acts 2[22] 17-23.
[o] ch. 9. 23. cf. ch. 5. 17. cf. Lk. 13. 34.

the Gospel it is a miracle of power that is seen; in the epistle it is a miracle of righteousness and yet of grace toward us.

DIV. 2.

In the face of rejection and active opposition, the Lord now sends out His disciples into the world as a field of labor. They take their character of necessity from Him; and as we have in Him the perfect Servant, so here the servant-character is what is seen in them. This, evidently, is what the second part of Mark takes up and dwells upon, the Lord being seen as the Leader in this, as in the Christian path all through. It gives us first of all the unity of this opposition, from the lowest to the highest, the truth awakening by its challenge of all the corruption in the world the united energies of the world against it. In the next place we see the religious opposition, the legal traditionalism of the day (and traditionalism is always legal) ignorant of man's true need, and therefore of the grace which alone can meet it, hostile really to Moses and to Christ alike. We have then the confession of Christ called for, with the cross as the present result, but the glory the final one. The moral principles involved in the path are then insisted on; essentially the creature put in his right place, and so God having His. While, finally, we have the results when, the creature being thus with God, the victory of God is seen over all that has marred and distorted in it the reflection of Himself.

SUBD. 1.

With the unity of opposition, the supremacy of divine grace is seen: for, after all, God cannot be thwarted of His purpose of blessing, though His method of victory may be by a cross. Divine fullness pours itself out even in a wilderness, and though with contrary wind upon a stormy sea, Christ walks upon it, coming to them and the wind ceases; and on the farther shore all evil yields to Him and passes away.

1. [i] But first we see Him rejected by His own, to whom He comes with power which they needs must own, yet which though manifest in grace cannot win reception for Him. The pride of the natural heart is always the most stubborn opposer of the salvation of God, and cannot even discern the glory of that self-humiliation in Him who has drawn nigh to them. They stumble over the Stumbling-stone.

Yet in this decisive rejection of God's message, there is nothing exceptional, except in the greatness of the Messenger. The Lord speaks of it, as only the power, save that he laid his hands upon a few infirm persons, and [p] healed them. And [q] he marvelled at their unbelief. And he [r] went round about the villages, teaching.

2 (7-13): the ministry by which His personal testimony is extended.

[2] And he called unto him the twelve, and began to [s] send them out [t] two and two; and gave them [u] authority over the unclean spirits; and he charged them that they should take [v] nothing for the way, save a staff only: no bread, no wallet, no money in their girdle; but be [w] shod with sandals, and not put on two coats. And he said unto them, Wherever ye enter into a house, there abide till ye depart thence. And whatsoever place shall not receive you nor hear you, when ye depart thence, [x] shake off the dust that is under your feet for a witness unto them. And they went out and preached that men should [y] repent. And they cast out many demons, and [z] anointed with oil many infirm, and healed them.

2 (14-29): Opposition to man's lusts and the hatred it awakens.

2. And [a] Herod the king heard [of him], for his name had become known; and he said, John the Baptist is [b] risen from among the dead, and therefore do these powers put forth energy in him. But others said, It is a prophet, as one of the prophets. But when Herod heard [of him] he said, It is John whom I beheaded: he is risen. For Herod

p cf. ch. 7. 24, 25.
q ctr. Matt. 8. 10-12. cf. Is. 59. 16.
r Matt. 9. 35. Acts 10. 38. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 21.
s Matt. 10. 1, etc. ch. 3. 13, 14. Lk. 9. 1-6. cf. Matt. 28. 19, 20.
t cf. Deut. 19. 15.
u cf. Jno. 8. 17. cf. Rev. 11. 3, 4. cf. Eccl. 4. 9-12. cf. 2 Tim. 4. 9-11.
v cf. Lk. 10. 17-20. cf. Acts 16. 16-18. ctr. Acts 19. 13-20.
w cf. Lk. 22. 35. cf. 3 Jno. 5-8. cf. 1 Cor. 9. 7-19.
x cf. Eph. 6. 15.
y Lk. 10. 10, 11. Acts 13. 51.
z cf. Jas. 5. 14, 15; cf. Acts 1. 8.
a Matt. 14. 1-12; Lk. 9. 7-9.
b cf. Acts 17. 31.
c Matt. 16. 14; ch. 8. 28.

exemplification of a common rule, that a prophet is not without honor save in his own country and among his own kindred. Human nature is, alas, consistent enough in evil to warrant such general statements: for "as in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man."

In the face of this, as Mark above all emphasizes, the Servant of divine love, able to do little because of an unbelief at which He marveled, patiently did this—"laid His hands on a few infirm persons and healed them"—and seeking yet the way to their hearts, "went round about their villages, teaching." How the perfect manhood of the Lord comes out, and is meant to come out, in this account. The divine glory that is His must not obscure the reality of that which appeals so powerfully to us in the tender human fashion in which the Son of God has come down to minister to men.

[2] He sends out now also the twelve, in extension of His personal testimony; two and two, the number of competent witness, and doubtless for mutual help. Mark emphasizes here as elsewhere the power over unclean spirits which is given them, over the dark and dreadful enemy of men, out of whose clutch they have to be rescued. They are sent forth in such a way as shall manifest in all this their absolute dependence upon Himself,—without provision either of food or money. They are to be shod with sandals, not the more luxurious "shoes;" and not to wear two coats. They are to be content also with what accommodation they find in the first house opening its doors to them; while, on the other hand, judgment is denounced on every place that will not receive nor hearken to a testimony accredited by divine power.

With their message, and with this sanction put upon it, they accordingly go forth.

2. We are taken back now to see the death of the Lord's forerunner, in which His own is not obscurely intimated. Herod, indeed, we are told, alarmed by his guilty conscience, when he hears of the miracles wrought by Jesus, sup-himself had sent forth and [d]laid hold on John, and bound him in prison for Herodias' sake, his brother Philip's wife: for he had married her. For John had said unto Herod, It is not [e]lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife. And [f]Herodias kept it against him, and would have killed him, but could not; for Herod [g]feared John, knowing that he was a righteous man, and holy, and he protected him; and when he heard him he did many things,* and heard him [h]gladly. And when a [i]favorable day was come and Herod on his birthday made a supper to his lords, and captains of thousands, and the chief men of Galilee, the daughter of the said Herodias came in and [j]danced and pleased Herod and those that were at table with him. And the king said unto the damsel, [k]Ask what thou wilt of me and I will give it thee. And he sware unto her, Whatsoever thou shalt ask of me, I will give it thee, unto the half of my kingdom. And she went out, and said unto her mother, What shall I ask? And [l]she said, The head of John the Baptist. And immediately she went in with haste unto the king, and asked, saying, I will that thou give me forthwith upon a dish the head of John the Baptist. And the king was exceeding [m]sorry; but for his oaths' sake, and [n]those who sat with [him] at table, he would not break his word with her. And immediately the king sent forth a soldier of the guard and commanded to bring his head. And he went and beheaded him in the prison, and brought his head upon a dish, and gave it to the damsel; and the damsel gave it to her mother. And when his [o]disciples heard [of it], they came and took up his corpse, and laid it in a tomb.

3 (30-45): Divine fulness manifested for the satisfaction of need.

3. And the apostles [p]gather themselves unto Jesus; and they told him all things, whatsoever they had done, and whatsoever they had taught. And he saith unto them, Come ye yourselves [q]apart into a desert place and rest awhile. For there were many coming and going, and they had not leisure even to eat. And they departed into a desert place by ship privately.

* R. V., following a well supported reading, renders this "was much perplexed." The context however is against this, and good authority gives the reading of the text.

d Lk. 3. 19, 20.
cf. Jer. 26. 1-15.
cf. Jer. 32. 2.
cf. 1 Ki. 22. 8, 27, 28.
e Lev. 18. 16.
cf. Jer. 1. 7-10.
f cf. Prov. 9. 7, 8.
cf. Prov. 15. 12.
cf. Amos 5. 10.
ctr. 2 Sa. 12. 1-14 with Ps. 141. 5. g cf. Acts 24. 24, 25.
cf. 2 Cor. 7. 10.
h cf. Matt. 13. 5, 20.
ctr. Acts 2. 41.
i cf. Gen. 40. 20.
cf. Matt. 26. 16.
cf. Dan. 5. 1, 2.
j cf. Amos 6. 3-6.
k cf. Esth. 5. 3, 6.
cf. Esth. 7. 2.
ctr. 1 Jno. 5. 14, 15.
l cf. Eccl. 7. 26.
cf. Gen. 39. 17-20.
cf. Acts 7. 51-54.
m cf. Matt. 27. 3, 4.
cf. Dan. 4. 27.
n cf. Prov. 29. 25.
o cf. Jno. 1. 35-37.
cf. Jno. 3. 29, 30.
p Lk. 9. 10. Matt. 14. 13, 14.
q Matt. 12. 15.

poses him to be the Baptist, risen from the dead. Thereupon the awful story of lust and hate is given us with very little variation from what we have had in Matthew. It completes the rejection which Nazareth has shown us already, wedding the lusts of the flesh in unholy union with the pride of life. It binds together the world and its rulers in opposition to the throne of heaven, and its claims and grace alike. This is the world in which nevertheless God is to be glorified as nowhere else, and to reap a spiritual harvest which shall show forth the exceeding riches of His grace to the principalities and powers in heavenly places.

3. The Lord retires into the wilderness, the type of the world in the condition to which sin has reduced it, in the Old Testament as well as in the New. Here

And many saw them going and knew [them], and ran there together on foot out of all the cities, and outwent them. And he came forth and saw a great multitude, and he had [r]compassion on them because they were as sheep that had no shepherd; and he began to [s]teach them many things. And when the day was now far spent, his disciples came unto him and said, The place is desert, and the day is now far spent: [t]send them away that they may go into the country and villages round about, and buy themselves bread: for they have nothing to eat. But he answered and said to them, [u]Give ye them to eat. And they say unto him, Shall we go and buy two hundred pennyworth of bread and give them to eat? And he saith unto them, [v]How many loaves have ye? go and see. And when they knew, they say, Five, and two fishes. And he commanded them that all should [w]recline in companies upon the green grass. And they sat down in ranks, by hundreds and by fifties. And he took the five loaves and the two fishes, and looking up to heaven, he [x]blessed and brake the loaves, and gave to the disciples to set before them; and the two fishes divided he among them all. And they all ate and were [y]filled. And they took up of [z]broken pieces twelve hand-baskets full, and of the fishes. And they that ate of the loaves were five thousand men. And immediately he [a]constrained his disciples to enter into the ship, and to go before him unto the other side to Bethsaida, while he himself sent away the multitude.

r Matt. 9.36-38.
s Lk. 9. 11.
t Matt. 14. 15-21. Lk. 9.12-17. cf. Lk. 18. 15, 16. cf. Heb. 2. 17, 18.
u cf. Matt. 10. 8. John 6. 5-14.
v cf. 2 Kings 4. 2. cf. 1 Cor. 14. 19.
w ch. 8. 6, etc. cf. Ex. 14. 13 with Rom. 4. 5.
x cf. Jno. 11. 41, 42, with Ps. 16. 1.
y cf. 2 Chro. 31. 10 with Mal. 3. 10. cf. Ps. 132. 15.
z cf. 2 Ki. 4. 42-40. cf. Eph. 3. 20.
a Matt. 14. 22-27. John 6. 15-21.

4 (46-52): Experiences by the way.

4. And when he had dismissed them, he [b]went away into the mountain to pray. And when even was come, the ship was in the midst of the sea, and he alone upon the land. And seeing them [c]distressed in rowing, for the wind was contrary to them, about the fourth watch of the night he cometh unto them, [d]walking on the sea, and would have passed by them; but they, when b ch. 1. 35. cf. Rom. 8. 34.

c cf. Jno. 16. 5, 6, 20, 33. cf. Matt. 24. 7-9. d cf. Matt. 24. 30. cf. Ps. 77. 19. cf. Jas. 5. 8.

disciples' hands minister to the need of the multitude out of their own provision multiplying through His blessing on it. Five loaves and two fishes feed, and more than feed, five thousand men. The application is of the easiest, and made by Christians generally; and we have been through it in Matthew already: the fullness of its blessed meaning is as little to be exhausted, as the loaves were at the time here brought before us. It is one of those scenes, exceptional in the evangelic history, to which its four writers all contribute, while in John the Lord Himself develops from it His teaching as to the bread of life.

4. The passage across the sea of Galilee is also connected with the ministry in the wilderness in three of the Gospels, Luke alone omitting it. In each of these the Lord's walking upon the water is recited, and His coming to the disciples toiling in the contrary wind. The walk of Peter on the water to meet the Lord, characteristic as we have seen it to be in Matthew, is omitted in the other accounts; the numerical change being in harmony with this. The general significance of what is here before us cannot be mistaken. The ascent of Jesus into the mount to pray, leaving His disciples alone upon the sea until His coming again, shows us unmistakably the limits of the trial-time of faith, in which is they saw him walking on the sea, [e]supposed it was an apparition, and cried out: for they all saw him and were troubled. But immediately he spake with them, and saith unto them, [f]Be of good courage: it is I; be not afraid. And he went up unto them into the ship; and the [g]wind ceased. And they were exceedingly [h]amazed among themselves: for they [i]understood not concerning the loaves, but their heart was hardened.

5 (53–56): The end of the way.

5. And when they had passed over, they [j]came to the land of Gennesaret, and drew to the shore. And when they were come out of the ship, immediately they [k]knew him, and ran throughout that whole country, and began to carry about on their beds those that were sick, wherever they heard he was. And wherever he entered, into villages or into cities or in the country, they laid the sick in the market-places, and besought him that they might [l]touch if it were but the border of his garment; and as many as touched him were healed.

[e] cf. Luke 24. 37.

[f] cf. Is. 25. 9. cf. 2 Thess. 1. 7.

[g] cf. Matt. 8. 26. Ps. 107. 29. cf. Ps. 46. 9–11.

[h] cf. ch. 4. 41.

[i] cf. ch. 8. 17–21.

[j] cf. Lk. 24. 25

[k] cf. Jno. 14. 8, 9.

[l] Matt. 14. 34–36.

[k] cf. Jno. 4. 45. cf. Luke 8. 40.

[l] cf. ch. 5. 27, 28.

experienced the opposition of the "course of this world." No doubt, apart from the great and final interference of the Lord on behalf of His people, there are abundance of lesser fulfilments in which He comes in and ends for a time the storm; and some too in which we do not discern for a time the familiar form, and are afraid; until the Voice says, "It is I;" and we wonder we could have failed for a moment to know it; and the storm for the time is over. And yet, how often do we find, when a new trial comes, that we are scarcely more prepared than before to recognize the One who comes afresh with it; and when He makes Himself known it is scarcely less a wonder.

5. But at last the sea is passed, as when He joins us in the end it will be, and then the blessing comes, even for the earth, when it shall "know," like the men of Gennesaret, the One upon whom all blessing depends, and the blight upon the whole frame of things shall pass, with the spiritual sickness it attends and indicates.

SUBD. 2.

The next subdivision runs still, for the most part, side by side with Matthew. Luke omits it all. We have here in the first place the opposition of traditionalism to the ways of God, and therefore to the true service of man; whereas faith directly connects us with God, discerns and owns His way and is confirmed by Him, as with the Syro-phœnician woman. The healing of the deaf man following this is peculiar to Mark; and in this man's condition spiritually seems more fully imaged to us, with no ear to hear, and therefore speech failing. Here the Lord is specially oppressed by the condition, and His "Ephphatha" is uttered with a sigh. Then in another wilderness scene the divine mercy satisfies once more the poor with bread, which as a figure has been plainly interpreted for us; and with this the present subject ends.

1. The growth of traditionalism is not hard to trace. Truth itself from the source of truth, where ministered by man, necessarily accredits the one who brings it. So far this is well, or it would not be necessary; but how often it follows, and at no long interval, that the teacher comes to accredit the truth which first accredited him. We have gained confidence in the man, and begin to accept with less careful examination whatever comes to us from such a source. The interpreter begins to displace the Word that he interprets. For the next generation this is an easier process, and the rule of the rabbi is soon begun. There is soon (formally or informally) a body of doctrine growing up, which although confessedly human and theoretically fallible, is accepted for truth and attaches to itself the masses. Henceforth he who will learn from

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chaps. vii.–viii. 9.)

The Opposition of Traditionalism and the Service of Love.

1 (vii. 1-23): Human commandments and the divine.

1 (1-8): the rule of the rabbi.

1. [1] AND there were gathered together unto him the Pharisees and certain of the scribes that had come from Jerusalem, and had seen some of his disciples [m] eating bread with defiled, that is, unwashed hands: for the Pharisees and all the Jews, except they wash their hands diligently, eat not, holding the [n] traditions of the elders; and [coming] from the market-place except they wash* themselves, they eat not; and many other things they have received to hold, the washing* of cups and pots and brazen vessels and couches.† And the Pharisees and the scribes ask him, Why walk not thy disciples according to the tradition of the elders, but eat their bread with defiled hands? And he said unto them, Well did [o] Esaias prophesy of you hypocrites, as it is written, This people honoreth me with their lips, but their heart is far away from me. But in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines commandments of men. Leaving the commandment of God, ye hold fast the tradition of men.‡

m cf. Matt. 15. 1-9.

n cf. Col. 2. 8. cf. Gal. 1. 14. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 18. cf. Col. 2. 20-23.

o Is. 29. 13. Ezek. 33. 31. cf. Amos 4. 4, 5. cf. Amos 5. 21-27. cf. Rom. 2. 17-29.

* Literally, "baptize," "baptism."

† Several good authorities omit "couches."

‡ Many add; "washing of vessels and cups, and many other such like things ye do."

God has to break through a steadily increasing barrier to the end he would attain.

Traditional teaching is ever tending downwards. If it has a creed this will be a conservative element, no doubt, but a dead support at best, not a living principle. Being human, it will have gaps through which error will come in, if not error of its own, which will readily unite with further error. Immediate recourse to God is shut off by it, and the profit of His word "for correction, for reproof" is, at least, limited.

In Israel the scribes arose as a reaction from that departure from the law which had been the nation's ruin. They came forward as its defenders and vindicators, and in order to this its investigators and interpreters. Their zeal for its observance urged them to "make a hedge about it" of their own rules, which, while making it ever a heavier yoke, came naturally by degrees to displace what they were intended to enforce. The human came inevitably into conflict with the divine. As additions to it, they broke the law necessarily from the beginning; and the end could not but be still worse than the beginning.

But worse even than their conflicting ordinances was their total mistake as to the nature of the law itself, and of the disease for which it was the appointed remedy. With all their laborious enquiries as to it, they interpreted it superficially, and had no knowledge of its true working. They had not learned the lesson of experience as the apostle declares it, that "that which was ordained to life" he "found to be unto death." They tried therefore to remedy the failure under it by additional ordinances, instead of turning to that Saviour of whom the prophets with one voice testified. Their remedy was law, not grace; letter and not spirit. They would heal man's deep-seated disease from the outside, and if they suppressed the external signs, only aggravated to a fatal issue the internal disorder.

[1] Mark emphasizes beyond Matthew the religious scrupulosity which dealt with the outside, the ceremonial washings (or "baptisms") of hands, cups,

2 (9-13): the opposition.

[2] And he said unto them, Well do ye [p]set aside the commandment of God, that ye may keep your own tradition. For [q]Moses said, Honor thy father and thy mother, and he that speaketh evil of father or mother, let him die the death. But ye say, If a man say to his father or his mother, [It is] Corban, that is, a gift, that with which thou mightest have been profited by me, ye no longer [r]suffer him to do aught for his father or his mother: making void the word of God by your tradition which ye have delivered: and many such like things ye do.

[p] cf. Matt. 23. 14 33.

[q] Ex. 20. 12. Ex. 21. 17. Lev. 20. 9. cf. Deut. 21. 18-21.

[r] cf. 1 Tim. 5. 8. ctr. Eph. 4. 28.

3 (14-23): the heart that which defiles.

[3] And having called the multitude to him again, he saith unto them, Hearken unto me, all of you, and understand: there is [s]nothing from without the man that entering into him can defile him; but the things which [s]come out from him are the things that defile the man. If any one hath ears to hear, let him hear.* And when he was entered into the house from the multitude, his disciples asked him as to the parable. And he saith unto them, Are ye also so unintelligent? Perceive ye not that any thing that is without, entering into a man, cannot defile him: because it goeth not into his [t]heart, but into his belly, and goeth out into the draught,† purging all foods? And he said, That which goeth forth out of the man, that defileth the man. For from within, [u]out of the heart of men, go forth evil thoughts, fornications, murders, thefts, adulteries, covetousness, wickednesses, deceit, licentiousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, haughtiness, folly: all these evil things go forth from within, and they defile the man.

[s] Matt. 15. 10-20. cf. Rom. 14. 14. cf. 1 Tim. 4. 4.

[t] cf. Jer. 17. 9. cf. Rom. 3. 10-18.

[u] cf. Prov. 4. 23.

[v] cf. Matt. 12. 34, 35. cf. Gen. 6. 5. cf. Jas. 3. 10-12. ctr. Ps. 45. 1.

2 (vii. 24-30): The discernment of faith.

2. And from thence he arose and went away into the [w]borders of Tyre and Sidon; and having entered into a house, he would have no man know it; and he [x]could not be hid. But immediately a woman whose little

[w] Matt. 15. 21-28.

[x] cf. ch. 2. 1, 2. cf. Jno. 4. 4-7.

* Many omit this verse.
† Or "place of refuse."

vessels, couches; tedious in proportion to its vain unprofitableness. God, by Isaiah, had characterized it long since as mere externalism without heart, human commandments claiming divine authority: so essentially hollow that the Lord denounces it as hypocrisy.

[2] In fact, what God had commanded was set aside by it; and the breach of the "first commandment with promise" was only an example of many like things which they did.

[3] With such it was even vain to argue. The Lord turns, therefore, to the multude to show them the simple underlying principle which justified to the conscience what He said. Nature had provided for the cleansing of impurities as to the body. Moral, spiritual defilement is, alas, from what comes out of the man, from the heart, and is native there. But how then shall the heart be cleansed?

2. For this they are not ready. He turns from them towards the Gentiles as hiding Himself from their unbelief, to find in one herself a Gentile, a conscious need of Him from which He could not hide Himself, and a discernment of faith which Israel's doctors lacked. This Syro-phœnician, content to take her true daughter had an unclean spirit, having heard of him, came and fell at his feet. Now the woman was a Gentile,* a Syro-phenician by race; and she besought him that he would cast out the demon out of her daughter. And he said unto her, Let the [y]children first be filled: for it is not right to take the children's loaf and [z]cast it to the dogs.† But she answered and saith unto him, Yea, Lord; even the dogs† under the table eat of the children's [a]crumbs. And he said unto her, For [b]this saying go thy way: the demon is gone out of thy daughter. And she went away to her house, and found the child [c]laid upon the couch, and the demon gone out.

3(vii.31-37): Man's state fully realized.

3. And again, having left the borders of Tyre, he [d]came through Sidon to the sea of Galilee, through the midst of the borders of Decapolis. And they bring unto him one that was [e]deaf and had an impediment in his speech; and they beseech him to lay his hand upon him. And he took him away [f]apart from the multitude, and put his fingers into his ears, and he [g]spat and touched his tongue; and, looking up to heaven, he [h]sighed, and saith unto him, Ephphatha, that is, Be opened. And immediately his [i]ears were opened, and the [j]bond of his tongue was loosed, and he spake aright. And he [k]charged them that they should speak of it to none; but the more he charged them, so much the more a great deal they published it. And they were [l]astonished above measure, saying, He hath done [m]all things well: he maketh both the deaf to hear and the dumb to speak.

4(viii.1-9): Wilderness mercy.

4. In those days the multitude being again great, and having [n]nothing to eat, he called to him his disciples

*Literally, "Greek."
†Greek, "little dogs."

y cf. Jno. 4. 22. cf. Matt. 10. 5, 6. cf. Matt. 8. 11, 12.
z cf. Acts 13. 46, 47. cf. Col. 1. 27.
a cf. ch. 6. 43. cf. Rom. 11. 15.
b cf. Luke 18. 14.
c cf. ch. 5. 15.
d Matt. 15. 29.
e cf. Is. 29. 18. cf. Is. 35. 5.
f cf. ch. 5. 37.
g ch. 8. 23. Jno. 9. 6.
h Jno. 11. 33, 35, 38. cf. Lk. 19. 41.
i cf. Job 33. 16. cf. Job 36. 10, 15, 16.
j cf. Is. 32. 4. cf. Is. 35. 5, 6. cf. Matt. 9. 32, 33.
k ch. 1. 43, 44. ch. 5. 43.
l Luke 5. 26.
m cf. Lk. 19. 37, 38. cf. Matt. 3. 17. cf. Jno. 17. 4.
n Matt. 15. 32-38. cf. ch. 6. 34-44.

place as a dog before Him, could find her title in His grace to divine bounty, discerning what was impenetrable to the men of law. This faith on His part He recognizes and rejoices in. The power of Satan is quelled, and the soul satisfied.

3. But Israel had no ear to hear the Voice that spake to them: and this is indeed man's condition naturally, a condition symbolized in this deaf man brought to Christ, and who has a corresponding impediment in his speech: for the speech can only be right where the ear is open. The Lord is oppressed in spirit with this condition. He puts the finger which had touched the leper into his ears: for does not spiritual leprosy underlie such deafness spiritually? and in the cleansing of the leper the ear is the first part anointed. In this type the meaning is quite clear. The soul under the power of sin is deaf to the voice of God—has lost even the power of hearing aright. That which cleanses the leper alone gives the ear to hear.

The Lord touches the tongue also; and then, lifting up His eyes to heaven, sighs and says, Ephphatha! "be opened." Immediately, his ears are opened, and the bond of his tongue loosed. He is here in Decapolis, a part of the land mainly Gentile and heathen, but the fame of this miracle goes far and wide.

4. The crowds follow Him; and the miracle of the loaves is repeated on their behalf. Here again we are in the track of Matthew's Gospel, and the difference and saith unto them, I have compassion upon the multitude, because they have continued with me now three days, and have nothing to eat; and if I send them away home fasting, they will [o]faint by the way: and some of them are come from far. And his disciples answered him, [p]Whence can one satisfy these with bread here in a desert place? And he asked them, How many loaves have ye? And they said, Seven. And he commanded the multitude to sit down on the ground; and taking the seven loaves, he gave thanks and brake, and gave them to his disciples, that they might set them before them; and they did set them before the multitude. And they had a [q]few little fishes; and having blessed them, he commanded these also to be set [before them]. And they ate and were [r]satisfied. And they took up of fragments that remained seven baskets. And there were about four thousand: and he sent them away.

o Matt. 9.36. cf. Ps. 107. 4, 5. cf. Is.40.30.

p cf. Ps. 78. 19, 20. cf. 2 Ki. 7. 1, 2.

q cf. Jn. 7. 3, 4. cf. 2 Chro. 14. 11.

r ctr. Lev. 26. 26. cf. Ps. 132. 15.

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chaps. viii. 10–ix. 8.)

The Revelation of the Glory of Christ here and hereafter.

1 (viii. 10–21): Leaven.

1. AND immediately he [s]entered into the ship with his disciples, and came into the parts of Dalmanutha. And the Pharisees came out and began to dispute with him, seeking of him a [t]sign from heaven, tempting him. And groaning in his spirit, he saith, Why doth this generation seek a sign? Verily, I say unto you, There shall [u]no sign be given to this generation. And he left them, and going aboard again, departed to the other side.

s Matt. 15. 39.

t Matt. 12. 38–40. Matt. 16. 1–4. cf. Jno. 6. 30, 31.

u cf. Matt. 21. 23–27. cf. Lk. 16. 30, 31.

between the two accounts is very slight. The healing of the multitudes, however, which Matthew records, is omitted here, and their glorifying the God of Israel. Instead of five loaves among five thousand men, as on the former occasion, with twelve baskets of fragments taken up (see p. 157, notes), we have now seven loaves with seven baskets, and four thousand men: the numbers of perfection and of the world at large. They remind us of the perfect sufficiency of divine blessing for all human need, and of all men without restriction being in God's desire participants in it. This fittingly closes what we have had before us.

SUBD. 3.

And now we come to the point at which the Lord, having in opposition to the general unbelief elicited from His disciples their faith in Him as the Christ, forbids them any more to speak of Him as that. The Son of man was to suffer and die and be raised from the dead, and come again in glory. The glory now hidden from the world and manifest to faith alone, will at last be revealed from heaven. But till then His disciples must accept the cross after the pattern of their Master. Here the shrinking of nature is at once evident; and in view of it the transfiguration of the Lord attests that they have followed no cunningly devised fables, confirming the word of prophecy by the display of that coming glory. This is Peter's own interpretation of what took place upon the "holy mount" (2 Peter i. 16–19).

1. We start here with the demand of the Pharisees of a sign from heaven, which shows only their own total and wilful blindness to His true glory. The "sign of the Son of man in heaven" will be seen at last; but too late then for His rejectors. The seeking for new proofs amid the profusion that had been

And they had forgotten to take bread; neither had they in the ship with them more than one loaf. And he charged them, saying, Take heed, beware of the [v]leaven of the Pharisees and of the leaven of Herod. And they reasoned with one another, [It is] because we have no bread. And Jesus, knowing it, saith unto them, Why reason ye because ye have no bread? Do ye not [w]yet perceive nor understand? Have ye your heart hardened? Having [x]eyes, see ye not? and having ears, hear ye not? and do not ye remember? When I brake the [y]five loaves to the five thousand, how many hand-baskets full of fragments took ye up? They say unto him, Twelve. And when [I brake] the [z]seven to the four thousand, how many baskets full of fragments took ye up? And they say unto him, Seven. And he said unto them, Do ye not yet understand?

v Matt. 16. 5-12. cf. Lk. 12. 1. cf. 1 Cor. 5. 6. cf. Gal. 5. 9.

w cf. Lk. 24. 25.

x cf. Ps. 115. 5, 6, 8.

y ch. 6. 35-44.

z vers. 1-9.

2 (viii. 22-26): Gradual discernment.

2. And they come to Bethsaida; and they bring unto him a [a]blind man, and beseech him that he would touch him. And he took hold of the blind man's hand and brought him [b]outside the village; and having spat upon his eyes, he put his hands upon him, and asked him if he saw anything. And he looked up and said, I behold men: for I see [them] as [c]trees, walking. Then again he laid his hands upon his eyes, and he saw distinctly, and was restored, and saw all things [d]clearly. And he sent him to his house, saying, [e]Neither go into the village, [nor tell it to any in the village].*

a Is. 42. 16, 18.

b cf. ch. 7. 33. cf. Jno. 9. 35-38.

c cf. Acts 18. 24-28. cf. Phil. 1. 10.

d cf. 1 Pet. 2. 9. cf. 1 Jno. 2. 27. ctr. Rev. 3. 18.

3 (viii. 27-30): Faith manifests itself in the recognition of Christ.

3. And Jesus [f]went out and his disciples into the villages of Cæsarea Philippi. And in the way he asked his dise ch. 7. 36. ver. 30.

f Matt. 16. 13-20. Lk. 9. 18-21.

* Many omit this last clause.

given was but the seeking of justification for their unbelief; and to such no sign could be effectual: none, therefore, would be given. He leaves them and departs to the other side of the sea.

In fact their self-righteousness had no need of Him and was but a ferment of opposition in their hearts. This is what He presently calls it—"leaven," "ferment": the pride and will of man aroused in rebellion against God; and this characterized them. Elsewhere He stamps it as "hypocrisy": for their minds were made up, and their arguments were but insincere,—the dictates of will, not reason. Alas, in disciples also such leaven might be found: self-righteousness as in the Pharisees, worldliness as in the Herodians. Of this He warns them now, though at first they think but of the bread they have forgotten; and they have forgotten practically the bread that He had blessed!

2. Following this, the blind man at Bethsaida illustrates, as it would seem, the gradual breaking in of light with those who are in His hands for the cure of nature's blindness,—hands that do not cease their work until the cure is complete. The hindrances to it have just been put before us,—self-occupation, the world, the half-sincerity and lack of earnestness in our discipleship, and such like things. No wonder if the Lord must have us alone with Himself for cure, outside of Bethsaida, the "place of nets," which the world truly is. Then comes the touch of His hands; and if the sight produced be indistinct, we must still not deny that it is truly sight. Nor will He leave till it be perfected.

3. We have had the hindrances of faith, and its gradual development amid such hindrances; we now have that in which, where real, it ever manifests itciples, saying unto them, [g]Who do men say that I am? And they told him, saying, John the Baptist; and others, Elias; but others, One of the prophets. And he asked them, But ye, who say ye that I am? Peter answering saith unto him, [h]Thou art the Christ. And he [i]charged them strictly that they should tell no man of him.

4 (viii. 31-38): The path and the failure as to it.

4. And he began to [j]teach them that the Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected by the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and after three days rise again. And he spake that openly; and Peter took him and began to [k]rebuke him. But he turned, and looking on his disciples, rebuked Peter, and saith, [l]Get thee behind me, Satan: for thou hast not a mind toward the things of God, but toward the things of men. And calling the multitude to him with his disciples, he said unto them, [m]If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and

g cf. Matt. 22. 42-46.
h cf. 1 Cor. 12. 3. cf. 1 Jno. 4. 2, 3. cf. 1 Jno. 5. 1. cf. Jno. 1. 49.
i cf. Matt. 11. 27. cf. ch. 9. 9.
j Matt. 16. 21-23. Lk. 9. 22. cf. ch. 9. 31.
k cfr. ver. 29. cf. John 21. 18, 19 with 2 Pet. 2. 14, 15.
l cf. Matt. 4. 10 with Gal. 1. 8, 9.
m Matt. 16. 24-28. Lk. 9. 23-27. Lk. 14. 27. cf. Phil. 3. 7-10.

self. It may see men but as trees walking; but it sees Christ and does not confound Him with other men. Those who said He was John the Baptist or Elias did not mean Him any dishonor, but they had not eyes to distinguish the glory of the Christ of God. The Lord tells them that they are not to make Him known as such: for it was now plain that Israel had no welcome for Him; and the Cross was now to be the only expectation that His followers were to entertain. Mark here omits some pregnant words in the confession of Peter, and the announcement both as to the Church and Kingdom with which the Lord answers it. Mark's abridgment of Matthew, if it were that, still follows the distinct purpose of his Gospel, omitting what is dispensational, and simply showing us what distinguishes true faith from all the wisdom or sentiment of man, and carries us on at once to see what man's unbelief involves as to the path of the true believer.

4. He begins therefore now to teach them that the Son of man—speaking of Himself under that title which showed His connection with men at large and His own stooping to all implied in true humanity,—"that the Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected by the elders and chief priest and scribes, and be killed, and after three days rise again."

Immediately the very one in whom faith has been foremost becomes foremost in opposition to it. "Peter took Him and began to rebuke Him"! But He turning round, and with His eyes upon them all, on His part rebukes this opposition as of Satan. Satan had before proposed to Him a way to the Kingdom without the Cross; and here amongst His own is the same voice now, exhorting Him to spare Himself. But these were not the purposes of God, but the weak human thoughts which could so easily oppose themselves to God. Not as seeking His own after such a sort could He be man's Saviour; and the path of His disciples also must be after the pattern of His own. He calls the multitude to Him with His disciples, that the conditions of discipleship to Him may be perfectly understood. He that will come after Him must follow on the same road: he must deny himself and take up his cross also, and follow Him.

He contrasts here the two ways, of one of which every one must make choice. To seek one's own is to lose all,—to lose even oneself,* as it is put in Luke (ix. 25), and for ever. To lose one's life for Christ's sake and the gospel's is eternal

* The ambiguity of ψυχή, "soul" or "life," makes a difficulty in translating, not really in understanding, what is here said. Man being a living soul, his soul is often but a synonym for "himself," and so here. There is a present loss of oneself which is only gain, the laying down one's life for Christ's sake; while final loss is irretrievable ruin.

follow me. For [n]whosoever willeth to save his life* shall lose it; but whosoever shall lose his life* for my sake and the gospel's, shall save it. For [o]what doth it profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his own soul?* or what should a man give in exchange for his soul?* For whosoever shall be [p]ashamed of me and of my words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him shall the Son of man also be ashamed, when he [q]cometh in the glory of his Father, with the holy angels.

5 (ix. 1-8): The end of the way.

5. And he said unto them, Verily I say unto you, that there are some of those standing here who shall not taste of death until they [r]see the kingdom of God come in power.

And after [s]six days Jesus taketh with [him] Peter and James and John, and bringeth them up into a high mountain [t]apart by themselves. And he was [u]transfigured before them; and his garments became shining, exceeding white, so as no fuller on earth could whiten them. And there appeared unto them [v]Elias, with [w]Moses, and they were talking with Jesus. And Peter answering saith unto Jesus, Rabbi, it is good for us to be here; and let us make [x]three tabernacles, one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias. For he [y]knew not what he should answer, for they were filled with fear. And there came a [z]cloud, overshadowing them; and there came a voice out of the cloud, [a]This is my beloved Son: hear him. And suddenly looking round, they saw [b]no man any longer, but Jesus only with themselves.

n Lk. 17. 33. Jno. 12. 24-26. cf. Rom. 6. 1-7. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 5-11 with Acts 20. 24.
o Ps. 49. 6-8. cf. Jas. 5. 1-3. p Matt. 10. 32, 33. cf. Jno. 12. 42, 43. cf. Jno. 5. 44. etc. Rom. 1. 16. cf. 2 Tim. 1. 7-9. cf. Phil. 1. 20, 21.
q Matt. 25. 31, etc. cf. Col. 3. 4.
r cf. 2 Pet. 1. 16-18. vers. 2-4.
s Matt. 17. 1-8. Lk. 9. 28-36.
t cf. ch. 7. 33.
u cf. Rev. 1. 9, etc. cf. Phil. 2. 9, 10. cf. Heb. 2. 9. cf. Rev. 1. 13-16.
v cf. Rom. 3. 21, 31. cf. Deut. 34. 5, 6 with 1 Thess. 4. 6. cf. Rev. 15. 3.
w cf. Mal. 4. 5. cf. 1 Ki. 19.

* ψυχήν, "soul" or "life."

14; cf. 2 Ki. 2. 11 with 1 Thess. 4. 17. x etc. ch. 8. 28, 29; cf. Phil. 2. 9; cf. Heb. 3. 5, 6. y cf. Matt. 20. 20-23; etc. Acts 4. 11, 12. z cf. Ex. 40. 34; cf. Acts 1. 9; cf. Rev. 1. 7. a ch. 1. 11. cf. Jno. 12. 28. b cf. Jno. 6. 68; cf. Jno. 3. 30; cf. Col. 3. 11.

gain. This in the spirit of it applies to all; to-day, as much as at any former time: and a solemn word it is. The confession of Christ still costs: that which does not is scarcely to be called confession. "For whosoever shall be ashamed of Me and of My words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him shall the Son of man also be ashamed, when He cometh in the glory of the Father, with the holy angels."

5. The last words lead on to the transfiguration scene in which that coming of the Son of man is foreshown. We have already considered it in the notes on Matthew, with whose account Mark's is almost identical, except that it is shorter. These repetitions have, doubtless, even as such, their significance; and they differ as being connected with different lines of truth. But we need much more and deeper study to understand such things as these.

SUBD. 4.

We have now the way put before us in its moral features, along with that which experience does not permit us to make marvel of, the contrast of our own ways naturally. Two things are specially insisted on here, the second of which is involved in the first: faith,—which, putting God in His place, puts me in mine; and lowliness, which is just the taking this creature-place before God. As a foundation principle of the path itself we find, what the disciples as yet could not enter into, and in the Gospels could not be much more than hinted

SUBDIVISION 4. (Chap. ix. 9–50.)

God's way for us and our way.

1 (9–13): Foundation principles.

1. AND when they came down from the mountain, he [c]charged them that they should tell no one what they had seen until the Son of man should be [d]risen from among the dead. And they kept that saying, questioning among themselves what the rising from the dead was. And they asked him, saying, Why do the scribes say that [e]Elias must first come? But he said unto them, Elias indeed, coming first, restoreth all things; and how is it written of the Son of man that he should suffer many things, and be set at nought? [f]But I say unto you that Elias is even come, and they have done to him whatsoever they would, as it is written of him.

2 (14–29): The enemy and the deliverance of faith.

2. And when they came to the disciples, they saw a [g]great multitude round them, and scribes questioning with them. And immediately all the multitude seeing him were [h]astonished, and running to him, saluted him. And he asked them, What question ye with them? And one of the multitude answered him, Teacher, I have brought to thee my son, who hath a [i]dumb spirit; and wheresoever it seizeth him it throweth him down; and he foameth, and gnasheth his teeth, and is withering away; and I spake to thy disciples that they might cast it out; and they [j]could not. But

c Matt. 17. 9-13. cf. ch. 8.30.
d ch. 8. 31. Matt.20.19. Matt.26.61. Matt.27.63. cf. Acts 2. 32.
e Mal.4.5,6.
f Matt.11.14. Luke 1.17.
g Matt. 17. 14-18. Lk. 9. 37-42. cf. Rev. 19. 11-21.
h cf. ch. 10. 32. cf. Ex. 34. 29, 30.
i cf. Matt. 12. 22.
j cf. ch. 6. 7. cf. vers. 28, 29.

at,—resurrection; which is twice declared here as to the Lord Himself, but the application of it to disciples is left for us to make. This part closes with a most solemn affirmation of a day of recompense,—the most emphatic, perhaps, that we find in Scripture.

1. As they come down with Him from the mount of transfiguration, the Lord charges the three who have been admitted to this wondrous sight to say nothing of it to any one until the Son of man is risen from among the dead. At this, though He has already plainly spoken of it, they are perplexed. A rising from among the dead is a thing strange to them, though resurrection itself was an accepted truth. This is now the Christian form of it, the Lord Himself being the first-fruits and pattern. No such application is as yet made of it however: only the Son of man is to arise alone on the third day. It is a foundation of our faith that He has done this.

But the disciples have a question they would fain put. How is it that the scribes say that Elias must come before Messiah's day? They know that here is Messiah. The Lord answers that indeed Elias must come first and restore all things. And how is it written, on the other hand, that the Son of man must suffer many things and be set at nought? That did not look like coming after all things were restored. And yet in fact there had been a coming of Elias,—one who had come in such a spirit and power. But that light had gone out: they had done to him according to their will; and so the Son of man would suffer also.

Thus a world contrary, and power in the meantime with it, a path leading down to death, with resurrection as the answer of God beyond: these are the features of the way traveled by the Lord, and upon which His disciples follow Him.

2. The power of Satan has also to be reckoned with; but the enemy here is one already vanquished, and faith only is needed for full deliverance. Faith, he answered and saith unto them, O [k]unbelieving generation, how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you? bring him to me. And they brought him to him; and [l]when he saw him, immediately the spirit convulsed him; and he fell upon the ground and rolled, foaming. And he asked his father, How long time is it since this came unto him? And he said, From [m]childhood: and oft-times it hath cast him into the fire and into the water to destroy him; but [n]if thou canst do any thing, have compassion on us and help us. But Jesus said unto him, If thou canst believe:* [o]all things are possible to him that believeth. Immediately the father of the young child cried out† and said, I believe: [p]help thou mine unbelief. Now when Jesus saw that the multitude came running together, he rebuked the unclean spirit, saying unto him, Thou dumb and deaf spirit, I [q]command thee come out of him, and enter [r]no more into him. And he cried out and convulsed him greatly, and came out. And he became as if dead; so that the mass said, He is dead. But Jesus [s]took him by the hand and raised him, and he stood up. And when he had come into the house, his disciples asked him privately, [t]Why could not we cast him out? And he said unto them, [u]This kind cannot go out except by prayer [and fasting].‡

3 (30-32): The Lord's death and resurrection again pressed.

3. And going forth from thence, they went through Galilee; and he would not have any [v]know it: for he taught his disciples and said unto them, The Son of man is [w]delivered into the hands of men, and they will kill him; and when he is killed, after three days, he shall rise again. But they [x]understood not the saying, and were [y]afraid to ask him.

k cf. Jno. 4. 48. cf. Jno. 14. 12.
l cf. Rev. 12. 12.
m cf. Jno. 9. 1 with Ps. 51. 5.
n cf. ch. 1. 40.
o cf. ch. 11. 22, 23. cf. Matt. 9. 28, 29.
p cf. Eph. 2. 8 with Jno. 6. 44.
q cf. ch. 1. 25-27.
r ctr. Matt. 12. 43-45. cf. Jer. 31. 31-34.
s ch. 5. 41, 42.
t cf. Josh. 7. 6-12.
u cf. 1 Ki. 18. 42-45. cf. Acts 13. 2.
v ch. 7. 24.
w ch. 8. 31.
x cf. Jno. 16. 12, 13 with Jno. 2. 22.
y cf. ch. 10. 32. ctr. Phil. 3. 10.

* Many omit "believe."
† Many add, "with tears."
‡ Some omit.

alas, may be lacking so that power which has been given may not be available. The child brought to the Lord has been already in the hands of those who were expressly authorized to cast out demons; yet they have only shown their incompetency in this case to do anything. It is over these He groans as an unbelieving generation, though still there is a resource in Himself, however much disciples fail. Here, as He says to the father of the child, "all things are possible to him that believeth." Mark emphasizes the malignity of the demon and the long time of possession. After he is gone out, the child seems for the moment dead; but Jesus takes him by the hand and he rises up. To His disciples He says that so virulent a case could yield only to prayer and fasting. But how great is the encouragement in such an enemy so certainly to be vanquished. The demand for faith to be in energy is no abatement of the blessing.

3. Next we have once more the pressing of death and resurrection, possibly in a wider circle than before. There is no comment upon it, except that "they understood not and were afraid to ask Him." How many things we are disposed to shirk after this manner; and in doing so lose, as far as we can, our own best blessings. By and by, this death and resurrection will be the staple of the gospel that they everywhere proclaim; and beyond this still, new glories

4 (33-41): The spirit of meekness.

4. And they [a]came to Capernaum; and having come into the house, he asked them, What were ye reasoning about in the way? But they were silent: for they had been disputing with one another by the way, who should be the [a]greater. And he sat down and called the twelve, and saith unto them, If any one will be the [b]first, he shall be last of all and servant of all. And he took a little [c]child and placed it in the midst of them, and having taken it in his arms, he said unto them, Whosoever shall [d]receive one of such little children in my name receiveth me, and whosoever receiveth me receiveth not me, but him that sent me.

John said unto him, Teacher, we saw one [e]casting out demons in thy name, [who followeth not us;]* and we forbade him, because he followeth not [f]us. But Jesus said, Forbid him not: for there is no one who will do a miracle in my name and be able quickly to speak evil of me: for whosoever is not [g]against us is on our side. For whosoever shall give you a [h]cup of water to drink in my name, because ye are Christ's, verily I say unto you that he shall not lose his reward.

* Many omit.

a Matt. 18. 1-5. Lk. 9. 46-48. Lk. 22. 24-27.
a etr. Phil. 2. 3.
b cf. 1 Cor. 15. 9.
c cf. ch. 10. 13-16.
cf. 1 Cor. 3. 18, 19.
cf. Ps. 131.
d Matt. 10. 40. Jno. 13. 20. e Lk. 9. 49, 50.
cf. Nu. 11. 26-29.
cf. Phil. 1. 12-18.
f cf. 1 Cor. 1. 10-13.
g cf. 1 Jno. 4. 1-6.
cf. 1 Jno. 2. 18, 19.
cf. Matt. 12. 30.
h Matt. 10. 42. Matt. 25. 40.
cf. Heb. 6. 10.
cf. 2 Tim. 1. 16-18.

will develop in it: Christians will learn and rejoice to realize that they are dead and risen with Christ.

This repetition of the announcement of Christ's death may, as I have said, point to that which could not yet be uttered. As a principle of the walk, for us it is of primary importance. To "walk in Christ" involves of necessity the being risen with Him; and this is the only Christian standard.

4. Grace has put us in such a place, and only grace could do it. There is no possible room for the thought of merit in our gaining that which man in innocence could never have pretended to, and which makes our whole life henceforth but a thank-offering for it. Faith is that by which we regain what we had lost in the fall, the place of creature nothingness before God, with the sense also of our guilt in having lost it. Thus there should be for us no claim of greatness any more, while the glorious example before our eyes of One who became for us a servant in His love, self-humbled, poor, emptied of the glory proper to Him, should rid us of all desire of self-exaltation.

Yet, alas, the next thing that we read of after His announcement of the death to which He is going, is an unseemly strife among the disciples as to who should be the greater. The Lord meets it promptly. The desire to be first would only qualify one to be last, and servant of all. Then He takes a little child, young enough to be taken up in the arms, and tells them that He could link His Name with one like that. Nay, here was the type of what He could identify Himself with. He who received one such little child in His Name received Himself, and thus the Father also. Before God indeed, what is the man beyond the babe? Only the happy thing is to recognize it.

John thereupon tells Him, as inviting His judgment on it, how they had found one casting out demons in His Name and had forbidden him as not following them. Here, too, the spirit of meekness had been lacking. They who had but so lately failed (spite of having authority) to cast out a demon, should have known that one who could do so must have some title. Christ's name was not a thing that one could conjure with. There must have been some reverence for that name which could use it as a word of power against Satan. Such an one could not turn quickly round from this to speak evil of Christ. But among 5 (42-50): God's recompense for offences.

5. And whosoever shall [h]cause one of these little ones that believe in me to stumble, it were better for him if a great mill-stone were hanged about his neck, and he were cast into the sea. And if thy [i]hand cause thee to stumble, cut it off; it is better for thee to [k]enter into life maimed, than having two hands to go away into hell,* into the fire [l]unquenchable; [where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched.]† And if thy [m]foot cause thee to stumble, cut it off; it is better for thee to enter life lame, than having two feet to be cast into hell, [into the fire unquenchable; where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched.]† And if thine eye cause thee to stumble, cast it out: it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into the hell of fire, where their [n]worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. For every one shall be salted with [o]fire, [and every [p]sacrifice shall be salted with salt.]† Salt is good; but if the salt have [q]lost its saltness, with what will ye season it? Have salt in yourselves, and have [r]peace with one another.

h Matt. 18.6. Lk. 17. 1,2. cf. Rom. 14. 15-23. cf. 1 Cor. 8. 7-13.
i Matt. 5. 29, 30. Matt. 18. 8, 9. cf. Gal. 2. 20 with Col. 3. 5-11.
k Matt. 19. 17. cf. 1 Pet. 4. 18.
l cf. 2 Thess. 1. 8, 9. cf. Rev. 19. 20. cf. Rev. 20. 10, 14, 15.
m cf. Rom. 6. 13, 14.
n cf. Lk. 16. 22-26. cf. Jer. 8. 20.
o cf. Matt. 3. 11. cf. Lk. 12. 49.
p Lev. 2. 13. Nu. 18. 19. Ezek. 43. 24.
q Matt. 5. 13. cf. Rev. 3. 1. cf. 2 Tim. 3. 5.
r cf. Col. 4. 6.
cf. Gal. 5. 15.

* Literally, "gehenna."
† Many omit.

men there were only opposing ranks: he who was not against was for Him. And he who thought so of Christ's name as to give but a cup of water to one who belonged to Him, should not in any wise lose his reward.

5. The Lord passes from this to speak of recompence upon the other side in the same manner but with more emphasis than in Matthew. Every one must be salted with fire: for "our God is a consuming fire." This jealous holiness by its judgement of the evil would only preserve the good: for, when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world. On the other hand, for the wicked the salting with fire applies to the awful judgment of Gehenna, "where their worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched." Here the holiness of God as pure wrath upon sin, eternal as His unchanging nature, unites with the undying worm of a remorseful conscience to torment the sinner. Ah, better surely to give up what may seem necessary as eye or hand or foot, live here in whatever maimed, imperfect way, and enter into life, than, having here the fulness of all good, pass on to the eternal fire!

But "every sacrifice shall be salted with salt:" that which is to be presented to God must answer to His nature; there must be "the salt of the covenant of thy God," as the law puts it, or what must be in all relationship with Him. Salt is the energy of devotedness to God which keeps out corruption: "salt," therefore, "is good," and if it lose its power, what shall replace it? Salt, therefore, we must have in ourselves. It will diffuse its savor round, of course: if it has any, it will surely do so. But this is ministering, not requiring. We must be jealous over ourselves—careful, of course, to maintain this character in all our intercourse with others; but in peace—so easily broken by a legal and exacting spirit: "have peace one with another."

SUBD. 5.

We have now, as again in Matthew, nature in its relation to God, a matter of great moment in the path of service: the institution of marriage, the relationship to Him of children, the state of man in his best naturally, sin having

SUBDIVISION 5. (Chap. x. 1–45.)
Results: Nature in its relation to God.

1 (1-12): The Creator's ordinance governing still: man and wife one flesh.

1. AND rising up from thence he cometh into the [a]borders of Judea, and beyond Jordan; and multitudes come together again unto him, and as he was wont he taught them again. And the [b]Pharisees coming to him asked him, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife? tempting him. But he answered and said unto them, What did [u]Moses command you? And they said, Moses [v]allowed to write a bill of divorce and to put [her] away. But Jesus said to them, In view of your [w]hardness of heart he wrote you this commandment, but from the [x]beginning of the creation God made them male and female. For this cause a man shall [y]leave his father and his mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and the two shall be one flesh: so that they are no longer two, but one flesh. What therefore God hath united together, let not man put asunder. And in the house again the disciples asked him concerning this. And he saith unto them, [z]Whosoever shall put away his wife and shall marry another committeth adultery against her; and if [a woman]* put away her husband, and marry another, she committeth adultery.

2 (13-16): Children in their relation to the Kingdom.

2. And they [a]brought unto him young children that he might touch them; and his disciples rebuked [those that brought]† them. But when Jesus saw it he was much displeased, and said unto them, Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God. Verily I say unto you, whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a [b]little child, he shall in no wise enter therein. And he took a Matt. 19. 1, 2. cf. Jno. 10. 40.

b Matt. 19. 3-9.
u cf. Lk. 10. 26. cf. Matt. 5. 17-20.
v Deut. 24. 1-4. Matt 5. 31.
w cf. Rom. 8. 3, 4. cf. Heb. 7. 18, 19.
x Gen. 1. 27.
y Gen. 2. 21-25. cf. Mal. 2. 14, 15. 1 Cor. 6. 16. cf. Eph. 5. 31, 32.
z Lk. 16. 18. cf. 1 Cor. 7. 10.
a Matt. 19. 13-15. Lk. 18. 15-17. cf. Matt. 21. 15, 16.
b ch. 9. 36.

* Greek, "she."
† Some omit.

thrown its dark shadow over all; finally, we see nature thus deformed working in the servant of God himself and tending to destroy the whole character of service; but then the victory of God over it, and the perfect Servant setting the pattern for His people and moulding them after His own likeness.

As we have gone through this in Matthew, we shall add but little to it here; seeking mainly to note any points of difference, with a conviction at the same time of how slight and superficial our knowledge of these differences is, and how the word of God must suffer from our scanty knowledge of it.

1. In the question as to marriage we are taught by Christ to respect absolutely the Creator's ordinance at the beginning. According to that, man and wife are one flesh, and this is founded on the creative work itself which made them male and female, one man and one woman. God has joined them together: man must not put them asunder. Mark does not even notice the exceptional allowance of divorce, when the marriage tie has in fact been broken through.

2. As to the children, Mark notices the Lord's displeasure at the disciples' conduct, and gives here substantially what in Matthew is found elsewhere, that only those who received the Kingdom of God as a little child could enter therein (Matt. xviii. 3). Mark also shows a fuller answer on the Lord's part to a them up in his arms, laid his hands on them and blessed them much.

3 (17-22): The heart manifested.

3. And as he went forth into the way, there [c]came one running, and kneeled down to him and asked him, Good Teacher, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life? But Jesus said unto him, Why callest thou me good? [d]none is good but one—God. Thou knowest the [e]commandments, Do not commit adultery; do not kill; do not steal; do not bear false witness; defraud not; honor thy father and mother. But he said unto him, Teacher, [f]all these things I have kept from my youth. Now Jesus, looking upon him, [g]loved him, and said unto him, [h]One thing thou lackest: go thy way, [i]sell whatsoever thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have [j]treasure in heaven; and come,* follow me. But he was [k]sad at that word, and went away grieved; for he had large possessions.

4 (23-27): Natural impotence.

4. And Jesus looking around, saith to his disciples, How [l]hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God! And the disciples were astonished at his words. But Jesus answered again and saith unto them, Children, how hard it is [for those that [m]trust in riches] † to enter into the kingdom of God! It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. And they were ex-

c Matt. 19. 16–26. Lk. 18. 18-27.
d cf. Ps. 16. 2 with Phil. 2. 7.
e cf. Lk. 10. 26–28 with Rom. 3. 20.
f cf. Phil. 3. 5-11.
g cf. Lk. 19. 41, 42.
cf. Hos. 11. 8.
h cf. Lk. 10. 42.
i Matt. 6. 19, 20. Lk. 12. 32-34.
cf. Acts 2. 45.
j cf. Heb. 10. 34.
cf. Phil. 3. 18-21.
k ctr. Acts 20. 24 with Phil. 3. 10-14.
l cf. Lk. 6. 24.
cf. Jas. 5. 1-6.
cf. 1 Tim. 6. 7-11.
m Job 31. 24.
cf. Ps. 52. 7.
cf. 1 Tim. 6. 17-19.

* Some add "taking up the cross."
† Some omit.

slighter request. He is asked to "touch" them; He takes them up in His arms, puts His hands on them, and blesses them.

3. In the ruler's case which follows, we find the heart manifested of one who is, as Paul says of himself when unconverted, "touching the righteousness which is of the law, blameless." There is really that on account of which it is said, (and in direct connection with his "Teacher, all these things have I kept from my youth,") that "Jesus looking upon him, loved him." There was that in him which was lovable. What he says of himself, he says with an honest conscience and conviction of its truth. Nor is he, as his question shows, merely engrossed with the present and without thought of God. He desires and seeks eternal life; and, attracted by what he hears or sees in Jesus, he comes to Him to learn the way to find this.

Mark emphasizes his running and kneeling to the Lord, his "Good Teacher," which from that mere human standpoint the Lord cannot accept. Goodness is in God alone: would that he had sought it only there! Nature is fully judged in the sweep of that assertion; and presently in his aching heart, as he turns, alas, from the One in whom his hope had been, he has to realize at least the bond that (one would fain hope, only for the present) holds him from the blessing that he seeks. But this bond a more than human power must sever. Nature in its fairest form is fallen away from God. Man's need is of a Saviour.

4. This is what the Lord now affirms. To the amazement of His disciples, He declares that it is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter into the Kingdom of God. Those who, to make this less absolute than it seems, would apply it to an eastern city gate, should remember that the Lord affirms directly that that of which He is speaking is "to man impossible." On the other hand, Mark records for us the explanation that a rich man stands here for one that trusts in riches, which at the same time prevents ceedingly astonished, saying to one another, And who can be saved? But Jesus, looking on them, saith, With men it is [n]impossible, but not with God, for with God all things are possible.

5 (28-31): Recompense.

5. Peter began to say to him, [o]Behold, we have left all and followed thee. Jesus answered and said, Verily I say unto you, There is no one who hath [p]left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, [or wife,]* or children, or lands, for my sake and for the gospel's, who shall not receive a hundredfold now in [q]this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with [r]persecutions, and in the age to come eternal life. But [s]many first shall be last, and the last first.

6 (32-45): The victory of God.

6. And they were in the way [t]going up to Jerusalem; and Jesus was going on before them; and they were amazed; and as they followed they were afraid. And he took again to him the twelve, and began to tell them the things that were going to happen to him: [u]Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and the Son of man will be delivered up to the chief priests and the scribes, and they will condemn him to death and deliver him up to the Gentiles, and they will mock him, and scourge him, and spit on him, and kill him; and after three days he will [v]rise again.

* Some omit.

n Lk. 1. 37. cf. Rom. 4. 20, 21. cf. Lk. 19, 2, etc.
o Matt. 19. 27-30. Lk. 18. 28-30. cf. Lk. 5. 27, 28.
p Matt. 10. 37, 38. cf. Rom. 8. 17, 18.
q cf. 2 Chr. 25. 9. cf. 1 Cor. 3. 22, 23.
r cf. Phil. 1. 29, 30. cf. Jno. 16. 1, 2.
s Matt. 20. 16. Lk. 13. 30.
t Matt. 20. 17-19. Lk. 18. 31-34.
u cf. ch. 8. 31. cf. ch. 9. 31.
v ch. 9. 9, 10.

the obvious mistake of a gross literalism, and extends the principle to the poorest in actual possessions. Really he only is in the sense intended "rich," who trusts in riches: and he may do that who never acquires them. In the divinely wrought hunger of soul, the things to which the worldling turns for help become as little valuable as gold to meet desert-thirst.

The disciples in their astonishment say one to another, "Who then can be saved?" But salvation is of God wholly. When men have learned their need of this, there is then no difficulty.

5. Nature in itself is then hopeless; and in the child of God still there abides that which because of its tendencies Scripture calls the flesh. "In me, that is in my flesh," says the man in the experience of the seventh of Romans, "dwelleth no good thing." Of the flesh self is the centre; and into the sphere of spiritual things the flesh will intrude, how easily. Self may claim that in which (in the sense in which we are speaking) it can have no part, and take pleasure in the thought of a foremost place there. Peter's "We have left all and followed Thee," is just such a claim, which the Lord meets in grace with a full assurance that nothing can be left for His sake without abundant recompense, both here and hereafter. But He guards this doubly from abuse such as the carnal mind might make of it: first, by the reminder that it must be done for His sake to be rewarded: not for self, to gain the reward. Secondly, and springing out of this, "many first shall be last, and the last first," which effectually forbids self-placing anywhere.

6. But we go on beyond this, to see the victory of God over all this spirit of strife and emulation. Again He begins to warn them of His coming death and comfort them with the thought of His speedy resurrection. There is no response: fear has already fallen upon them. But presently it is seen of how contrary a spirit they are by the request of the sons of Zebedee for the two places nearest Himself in the coming Kingdom. The Lord points out to them the way

And [w]James and John, the sons of Zebedee, come unto him, saying, Teacher, we would that thou shouldest do for us what we may ask of thee. And he said unto them, What would ye that I should do for you? And they said unto him, Grant unto us that we may sit, one on thy right hand, and the other on thy left hand, in thy glory. But Jesus said unto them, Ye [x]know not what ye ask: can ye [y]drink the cup that I drink, or be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with? And they said unto him, We can. And Jesus said unto them, The [z]cup that I drink ye shall drink, and with the baptism that I am baptized with shall ye be baptized; but to sit on my right hand or on my left is not mine to give, except to those for whom it hath been [a]prepared.

And when the ten heard it, they began to be much [b]displeased concerning James and John; and Jesus called them to him, and saith unto them, Ye know that those who are accounted to rule over the [c]nations lord it over them, and their great ones use authority over them: but so it is not among you, but whosoever willeth to be [d]great among you, he shall be your minister; and whosoever will be chief among you shall be servant of all. For even the [e]Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a [f]ransom for many.

w Matt. 20. 20-28.

x cf. ch. 9. 6. cf. Jas. 4. 3. cf. Ps. 106. 15.

y cf. Matt. 26. 37-40.

z cf. Jno. 13. 36-38 with Jno. 21. 18, 19. cf. Phil. 3. 10. cf. Rev. 2. 10.

a cf. Matt. 19. 28. cf. 1 Cor. 6. 2, 3.

b Matt. 20. 24. cf. Gal. 5. 26.

c cf. Matt. 6. 31, 32.

d cf. ch. 9. 35.

e cf. Lk. 22. 27. cf. Jno. 6. 38, 39.

f 1 Tim. 2. 6. cf. Is. 53. 11, 12. Tit. 2. 14

by which He reaches this. Can they drink of His cup and be baptized with His baptism? And immediately they assure Him that they can. He tells them that in these they shall in fact partake; but the places that they seek are only His to give to those for whom it is prepared of His Father.

This awakes the indignation of the other disciples, and shows a similar spirit to be in them all. And now He shows them their great and fundamental mistake. Heaven is to be no place for the ambition of men. The Son of man came not to be ministered to but to minister: love's mission among them sought only what love alone could count a recompense. And if, "beyond all controversy, the less is blessed of the better," our dependence on Him insures that this ministry of His to us will go on for ever. If love made Him take it up, love will make Him keep it too, as surely as He is Son of man for ever, although the toil and sorrow of His work be past.

If then with Him service is but the sign of a love unending, and so can never cease, can it be different with those whom He is bringing into the glory of likeness to Himself? Can they take up service to win lordship by it, and state and authority? That were surely impossible: nay, the greatest in heaven's Kingdom is he that humbleth himself as a little child (Matt. xviii. 4). In heaven's rule, Love rules; and therefore rule is service still, most valued because it is so.

DIV. 3.

The closing division of the book shows us the Lord's service perfected in His sacrificial death, the acceptance of which is seen in resurrection. But Mark goes beyond this, and further than any of the Gospels, following Him into heaven itself,—to the right hand of God. The connection of this with the sin-offering aspect of the atoning work, as here presented to us, we must consider at another time.

The Cross and the resurrection give us characteristically the second and third

DIVISION 3. (Chaps. x. 46–xvi.)

The Heart of Service revealed in Sacrifice, answered from the Heart of God in Resurrection and the Ascension to Heaven of the Offerer.

SUBDIVISION 1. (Chaps. x. 46–xiii.)

The King.

1 (x. 46–xi. 26): The barren tree.
i (x. 46–52): light.

1. [1] AND they come to [g]Jericho; and as he went out of Jericho, and his disciples, and a great multitude, the son of Timæus, Bartimæus, a blind man, sat by the wayside, [h]begging. And when he heard that it was Jesus the Nazarene, he began to cry out and say, [i]Son of David, Jesus, have mercy on me. And many [j]reg Matt. 20. 29–34. Lk. 18. 35–43.

h cf. Jno. 9. 1. cf. Acts 3. 2. cf. Lk. 7. 42.
i cf. Matt. 15. 22. cf. Matt. 21. 9 with Jno. 1. 49.
j cf. ver. 13.

subdivisions here. The first, as introductory to these, takes us back (as at this point do all the Gospels) to Matthew's view of the King, come to His own and rejected by them; the connection of which with what follows it is plain, when we realize that in this not only Israel's condition but that of the world as a whole is seen, the sin of man in its full development, for which the cross of Christ is the only possible remedy. Thus the three parts of this last division are in fit relation to one another, and form a significant whole.

SUBD. 1.

The first subdivision has also its three parts. The first of these has its central significance in the barren fig-tree, which the Lord curses for its barrenness, a figure scarcely to be mistaken by any who look below the surface, and which in Mark is woven together with the story of His purification of the temple, His Father's house. Israel, alas, for this had to be driven out of that which they had profaned. The "Canaanite (or merchantman) in the house of the Lord" had found in the favored people of God its sorrowful fulfilment.

The second part shows us, along with their hostility to the Lord, His judgment in detail of their condition. This comes out in His answers to their various and evil-designing questions and efforts to entangle Him in His talk,—efforts which end for them in disastrous confusion. He closes it with His unanswerable question to them with regard to David's Son, and then denounces to the people the heartless and ostentatious religiousness of the scribes.

The third part announces (for disciples' ears alone) the coming of the rejected Son of man in glory, to deliver His believing people out of the great final tribulation into which the nation has come because, rejecting Him who came to them in His Father's name, they have received him who comes in his own.

The connection all through, as generally in Mark, is close and intimate with Matthew's Gospel; Mark, however, omitting much, especially of the dispensational details, as the marriage of the King's son, and in the prophecy of the final scenes, all that has reference to the Church and to the judgment of the nations, the separation of the sheep from the goats.

1. [1] In the three synoptic Gospels alike, the Lord's presentation of Himself to the people as their King is prefaced by the miracle at Jericho, which is expressly wrought in answer to an appeal to Him as Son of David. Matthew mentions two blind men, but Mark only one, whose name he (and not Matthew) gives. Bartimæus is simply the son of Timæus, so that he gets his personal name from his relationship. Timæus is in Greek,* "one that is prized," and "the son of

* A Greek name need scarcely be a difficulty, where Greek had been almost the common language for so many years, and where Peter, Andrew, Philip, Nicodemus, Stephen, are all Greek. Its being Greek (the common synonym of Gentile) is in fact spiritually significant, Israel's father Abraham, God's Timæus, having been called in uncircumcision, according to the apostle's argument in Rom. iv.

buked him that he should be silent; but he cried so much the [k]more, Son of David, have mercy on me. And Jesus stood still and said, Call him. And they called the blind man, saying to him, Be of good courage, rise, he calleth thee. And he, [l]casting away his garment, sprang up and came to Jesus. And Jesus answered and said unto him, What [m]wilt thou that I should do for thee? And the blind man said unto him, [n]Rabboni, that I may recover sight. And Jesus said unto him, Go [o]thy way: thy faith hath healed thee. And immediately he recovered sight, and [p]followed him in the way.

[2] (xi. 1-11): the announcement.

[2] And when they [q]come near to Jerusalem, unto Bethphage and Bethany, at the Mount of Olives, he sendeth forth two of his disciples, and saith unto them, Go into the village that is over against you, and immediately upon entering it ye shall find a colt tied, [r]whereon no man ever yet sat: loose it and bring [it]. And if any one say unto you, Why do ye this? say, The Lord hath [s]need of him, and immediately he will send it hither. And they departed, and found a colt tied at the door without, at the way round [the house], and they loose him. And some of those standing there said unto them, What do ye, loosing the colt? And

k cf. Lk. 5. 19.

l cf. Is. 64. 6 with Phil. 3. 7-9.

m cf. Jno. 5. 6, 40.

n Jno. 20. 6.

o cf. Jno. 11. 44 with Rom. 8. 2.

p cf. ch. 1. 18 with Rom. 6. 12, 13.

q Matt. 21. 1-11. Lk. 19. 29-40. Jno. 12. 12-16.

r cf. Jer. 31. 18. cf. Job 11. 12.

s cf. Acts 9. 13-16.

one that is prized" would well represent the state of Israel in her blindness of unbelief still "beloved for the fathers' sakes" (Rom. xi. 28). It is surely a striking name for one whom we have already looked at as on other grounds (see notes on Matt. xx. 29–34) foreshadowing the remnant of Israel in days to come, when God is preparing the way of His King to come to Zion. They need and will find, spite of the opposition of the mass by whom they are surrounded, in Jesus of Nazareth, One who is sent to "preach recovering of sight to the blind" (Luke iv. 18). To Him they will come, "casting away the garment" of religious self-righteousness, which has been ever the hindrance with the people to whom they belong. They will receive sight and follow Jesus.

Such spiritual sight given in Jericho, the world under the curse, into which Christ has come, and which still converts blind beggars into joyful followers of the Lord, is even now His witness. He had to come under this curse to redeem us from it, and the deliverance at Jericho, may well be the pledge of His victory at Jerusalem and elsewhere, though He go to present rejection at the hands of men. The blessed Servant has anticipated it all, and sees with no uncertainty the path before Him. That very rejection shall only give Him occasion for deeper service.

[2] So they come near to Jerusalem, to Bethphage (the "house of unripe figs") and Bethany (the "house of affliction" or "humiliation")* significant names both for Him; and now He sends two of His disciples to bring to Him the colt upon which He is to ride, proclaiming His Kingdom of peace, into Jerusalem. Mark, as little as possible touching the dispensational side of things, omits from his account the mother ass (see Matthew). The acclamations of the multitude hail the "coming kingdom of our father David." There seems at present no opposition. He simply enters Jerusalem, goes into the temple and looks round upon all things there. Then, it being now evening, He withdraws and goes out to Bethany.

Matthew does not notice this first visit of silent contemplation on the Lord's

* More generally taken now as "house of dates," but quite conjecturally.

they said unto them even as Jesus had said; and they let them go. And they bring the colt to Jesus, and cast their garments on him, and he sat upon him. And many [f]spread their garments in the way; and others branches which they had cut out of the fields. And those who went before, and those who followed cried, Hosanna! [g]blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord! blessed is the coming kingdom of our father David! Hosanna in the highest! And he entered into Jerusalem, into the [h]temple; and having looked round upon all things, it being already evening, he [i]went out to Bethany with the twelve.

[3] (xi. 12-26): the ban upon the fig-tree and the cleansing of the house of God.

[3] And on the [k]morrow, as they came out from Bethany, he hungered. And seeing a [l]fig-tree afar off, having [m]leaves, he came, if haply he might find anything thereon; and when he came to it, he found nothing but leaves; for the [n]time of figs was not yet. And he answered and said to it, Let [o]none eat fruit of thee any more for ever. And his disciples heard it.

And they come to Jerusalem; and, entering into the temple, he began to [p]cast out the sellers and the buyers in the temple; and he overthrew the tables of the money-changers and the seats of those that sold doves; and would not suffer any one to carry a vessel through the temple. And he taught, saying unto them, Is it not written, [q]My house shall be called a house of prayer for all nations? but ye have made it a [r]den of robbers.

f cf. ch. 10. 50. cf. Lk. 7. 38.
g Ps. 118. 26. Zech. 9. 9.
h cf. Lk. 2. 46. cf. Jno. 18. 20.
i cf. Lk. 2. 7 with Jno. 1. 10, 11. Matt. 21. 17.
k Matt. 21. 18-22.
l cf. Lk. 13. 6-10.
m cf. Gen. 3. 7. cf. Ezek. 17. 9.
n cf. Is. 1. 30. cf. Ps. 1. 2, 3.
o cf. Lk. 19. 44.
p Matt. 23. 37-39.
q Matt. 21. 12, 13. Lk. 19. 45, 46. cf. Jno 2. 13-16. cf. Mal. 3. 1-6.
r Is. 56. 7. cf. Mi. 4. 2. s Jer. 7. 11. cf. Is. 5. 7.

part, but puts the cleansing of the temple, which did not really take place till the next day, in connection with the triumphal entry. This has of course been charged upon him as a discrepancy. It is in fact the substitution of an order of thought for the order of time; and this is not infrequent in the Gospels.

This simple looking round upon everything and then turning the back upon it is very solemn. It is not judgment that is inflicted, but He finds nothing to His satisfaction, and leaves it to them, and leaves them with it. His own personal position is outside it all. The temple as His Father's house should have been His own. There, if anywhere in Israel, would have been the throne of God, and here was the King of this kingdom, the Son of the Father; and He turns His back on it. Leaving it, He leaves the city also, for Bethany, the "house of humiliation." He can only abide there.

[3] On the morrow, as He returns to the city, He hungers. A spiritual hunger was, in fact, upon Him. The zeal of His Father's house was consuming Him, with all that that house implied, as established among men—a place of approach to Him, not for Israel only, but for all nations. This had been committed to Israel's care, and their privileges upon which they prided themselves, only to look down with disdain upon the Gentiles, were really responsibilities on their behalf. The blessing of the earth depended—and still depends—upon Israel's blessing. As God's vine they had failed, and the vineyard had been laid waste; but He had suffered a remnant to come back, according to His own figure as to them, to be as "a fig-tree planted in" the desolate "vineyard" (Luke xiii. 6), to see if yet there might be fruit for Him.

Here, then, the significance of the present act is seen. The returned people stood before God with its profession of faith in Him, in striking contrast with the nations round, for whom plainly as merely heathen, "the time of figs was not yet." The fig-leaf was the promise of fruit wherever found; and therefore

And the chief priests and the scribes heard it, and [f]sought how they might destroy him: for they feared him, because all the multitude were [g]astonished at his doctrine. And when evening was come he went out [h]without the city.

And passing by, early in the morning, they saw the [i]fig-tree dried up from the roots. And Peter, calling to remembrance, saith unto him, Rabbi, behold, the fig-tree which thou cursedst is dried up. And Jesus answering saith unto them, Have faith in God. Verily I say unto you that [j]whosoever shall say unto this mountain, Be thou plucked up and cast into the sea, and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that what he saith is coming to pass, it shall be [so] to him. Wherefore I say unto you, Whatsoever things ye [k]pray and ask for, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them. And when ye stand praying, [l]forgive, if ye have aught against any, that your Father also who is in heaven may forgive you your offences. [But if ye do not forgive, neither will your Father who is in heaven forgive your offences.*]

[f] Matt. 21. 45, 46. Lk. 19. 47, 48.
[g] ch. 1. 22, etc.
[h] ver. 11.
[i] cf. Lk. 23. 31. cfr. Ezek. 37. 11, 12.
[j] Matt. 17. 20. Lk. 17. 6. cf. Zech. 4. 7.
[k] Jno. 14. 13, 14. Jno. 15. 7. cf. Jno. 4. 50.
[l] Matt. 6. 14. cf. Matt. 18. 23–35.

* Omitted by some, and doubtful.

the Lord comes to it to find this. There was none: and for this He pronounces its doom.

No more is said about this here, but He goes on to Jerusalem and the temple, and what He had found at the beginning of His ministry (John ii. 13–16) He finds unchanged at the end of it. Greed was profaning the very house of God, and that which should have been a house of prayer had become a den of robbers. He purges them all out, assuming for a moment the authority which was His; but the effect is only to bring the chief priests and scribes together to plot for His destruction. As yet the fear of the people holds them back.

We return then to the actual destruction of the fig-tree, which they find next morning dried up from the roots. The Lord uses it to impress upon His disciples the power of faith in God. Not a tree merely, but a mountain would disappear in this way from the path of faith, where faith laid hold of the Invisible for it. But He joins with believing prayer the need of a tender spirit of forgiveness towards any against whom the heart might retain the sense of wrong, lest the Father's government should be made to remember one's own offences.

The Lord leaves the application both of the fig-tree and the mountain to be made by His disciples. They were evidently not yet prepared to realize the doom that Israel as a nation were bringing upon themselves, or that they might be such an obstruction as He pictured to the path of faith. The divine foresight of the end would not prevent the most assiduous tenderness in warning and entreaty till the end should come. God has taken care even to proclaim by the mouth of Jeremiah that His own prophecies of coming judgment might be set aside by a nation's repentance (Jer. xviii. 7, 8); and has even given us in Nineveh an example of this (Jonah iii. 10).

But Israel went on unrepenting until it was in fact, as a nation, sunk like the mountain of which the Lord speaks into the sea of nations round her; and the fig-tree died withered up because it had no fruit for Him who sought it. The blessing of which the Word still gives assurance for them can only be through a veritable resurrection (Ezek. xxxvii).

2. The next section is almost entirely similar to Matthew, save in the omission of two parables, and in the addition by Mark of the beautiful and signifi-

2 (xi. 27–xii.): Rejected and rejecting: the discriminative judgment.
1 (xii. 27–33): the question of authority.

2. [1] And they come again to Jerusalem; and, as he was walking in the temple, there come to him the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders; and they said unto him, By what [m]authority doest thou these things, and who gave thee this authority that thou shouldst do these things? And Jesus said unto them, I also will ask you one thing, and answer me, and I will tell you by what authority I do these things. The [n]baptism of John, was it from heaven or of men? answer me. And they reasoned with themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven, he will say, Why did ye not then believe him? But if we shall say, Of men—they feared the people: for all held John to be truly a prophet. And they answered and said to Jesus, We [o]know not. And Jesus saith unto them, Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things.

2 (xii. 1–12): the rejection of the messengers.

[2] And he began to speak unto them in parables. A [p]man planted a vineyard, and set a [q]hedge about it, and digged a pit for the winepress, and built a tower, and let it out to [r]husbandmen, and went out of the country. And at the season he sent a servant to the husbandmen, that he might receive from the husbandmen of the [s]fruit of the vineyard. And they took him, and beat him, and sent him away empty. And again he sent unto them another servant; and at him they [threw stones and]* struck him on the head, and sent him away with insult. And he sent another; and him they killed; and many others: [t]beating some and killing some. Having therefore† yet one beloved [u]son, he m Matt. 21. 23–27. Lk. 20. 1–8. cf. Jno. 5. 30. cf. Jno. 6. 57.

n cf. Lk. 7. 24–35.
o cf. Jno. 1. 19–28. cf. Jno. 5. 35. p Matt. 21. 33–46. Lk. 20. 9–18.
q cf. Is. 5. 1–7. cf. Ps. 80. 8–16. cf. Deut. 7. 2–6.
r cf. Matt. 25. 14. cf. Josh. 24. 12–14. ctr. Jno. 15. 1 with 1 Co. 3. 8, 9.
s cf. Deut. 26. 8–14. ctr. Hos. 10. 1. cf. ch. 11. 13.
t cf. 2 Chr. 16. 10. cf. Matt. 23. 34–36. cf. Acts 7. 52.
u cf. Heb. 1. 1, 2. cf. Jno. 3. 16.

* Many omit. † Many read, "He had."

cant incident of the widow's mites. It gives, as already said, the Lord's judgment in detail of Israel's condition, in her chosen leaders, who unite in opposition, though veiled, against Him. Everywhere they are met, refuted, their disguise stripped off, until He closes argument with His own triumphant question how Christ can be the Son of David. This is followed by His denunciation of the scribes, and His appraisal of all their ostentatious giving to the temple treasury as less in value than the widow's "two mites which make a farthing."

[1] The question of authority is the one first raised; upon the face of it unutterable folly; for His works bore witness of Him, and it was impossible to suppose that divine power, such as was manifest in them, could have been gained unlawfully. He refuses, therefore, to answer their question, except they answer first His own. If competent to discern as to Himself (and if not, it would be of no use to answer them), they should know as to the baptism of John, whether it was from heaven or of men. If they knew, let them answer.

But they dare not answer. On the one side they cannot excuse themselves, if it were from heaven, for not being his disciples: on the other, they could not deny his claim for fear of the people. And the only refuge left for them is in what for them is a complete and yet most insincere humiliation; they cannot tell!

[2] The parable of the two sons which Matthew gives is here omitted, and that of the vineyard comes into the second place. The thought of the vineyard was familiar to them from the prophets, who had pressed upon them the claims of sent him unto them last, saying, They will respect my son. But those husbandmen said among themselves, This is the [v]heir: come, let us kill him, and the inheritance shall be ours. And they took him, and [w]killed him, and cast him out without the vineyard. What therefore will the lord of the vineyard do? He will [x]come and destroy the husbandmen, and give the vineyard unto others. Have ye not read even this scripture, The [y]stone which the builders rejected, the same was made the head of the corner: this was from the Lord, and it is marvelous in our eyes?

And they sought to lay hold on him, and [z]feared the multitude: for they knew that he had spoken the parable against them; and they left him, and went away.

3 (xii.13-17); Cæsar's portion and and God's: an unveiling.

[3] And they send to him certain of the [a]Pharisees and of the Herodians, that they might catch him in [some] matter.* And when they were come, they say unto him, Teacher, we know that thou art true, and carest not for any one: for thou regardest not the person of men, but teachest the way of God with truth. Is it lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar or not? shall we give, or shall we not give? But he, knowing their hypocrisy, said unto them, Why tempt ye me? bring me

v cf. Ps. 89. 27. cf. Jno. 19. 15. cf. Acts 3. 17.
w cf. ch. 9. 13, 31. cf. Acts 2. 23. cf. Acts 13. 27, 28.
x cf. Lk. 19. 27. cf. 2 Thess. 1. 8, 9.
y Ps. 118. 22. 23. 1 Pet. 2. 7, 8.
z ch. 11. 32.
a Matt. 22. 15. 22. Lk. 20. 20-26.

*λόγος, "matter of speech."

God as to it; and they had built the sepulcres of these prophets, whom they could not deny that their fathers killed. With the murder of the One who spoke to them in their hearts, how could they deny that they were in the succession of the parable? Then came their own Scriptures to prove that the corner stone of God's building was one rejected by the builders. Clearly they could understand that all this spoke of them, and feel it enough to be maddened by it.

[3] Now they break up into parties, (Pharisees and Herodians) which unite together, however, in dexterous combination. They do not question His authority any more: they know that He is true and teaches the way of God in truth. Nor will the fear of man shut His mouth.

So they have a question to ask, an important one, touching closely all ranks and conditions among them, and quite apt to kindle dangerous passions. Pharisees and Herodians were divided about it: here it was for Him to settle: Should they give tribute to Cæsar? Aye, or no?

But they cannot dig deep enough to hide from Him the hypocrisy of that question, that they were merely, as He tells them, tempting Him. Yet He will not decline it: let them only bring Him the tribute money. And they bring it: and there is the image of Cæsar stamped broadly upon it.

They cannot deny,—they are not suffered to ignore the fact,—that this is Cæsar's money. But how much lay hid under this for those that were still capable of entertaining such questions. How long they had given up any full, entire reliance upon the Almighty, the God of their father Abraham, and by profession their own! They had leaned upon another arm than His. They had coveted the riches of a world which Abraham had refused. They were trafficking with Cæsar's money, and must pay him back his money. Issachar in their father Jacob's prophecy had proved but too surely their type: Issachar, the "bony ass, couching between the burdles: and he saw the land that it was good, and rest that it was pleasant; and bowed his shoulder to bear, and became servant to tribute."

a penny,* that I may see it. And they brought it. And he saith unto them, Whose is this image and superscription? And they said unto him, Cæsar's. And Jesus said unto them, [b]Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's. And they wondered much at him.

[b] cf. Rom. 13. 1–8. cf. Tit. 3. 1. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 13–17.

[a] (xii. 18–27): the failure of human tests in divine things.

[a] And there come unto him [c]Sadducees, who say that there is no resurrection, and they asked him, saying, Teacher, [d]Moses wrote unto us, if a man's brother die, and leave a wife behind him, and leave no child, that his brother should take his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother. There were seven brethren, and the first took a wife, and, dying, left no seed; and the second took her, and died, and neither did he leave seed; and the third likewise. And the seven [took her and]† left no seed: last of all, the woman died also. In the resurrection, [when they shall rise again,]† whose wife shall she be of them? for the seven had her as wife. And Jesus said unto them, Is it not on this account ye err, [e]not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God? For when they rise from among the dead, they neither [f]marry nor are given in marriage; but are as angels in heaven. But as regards the dead that they rise, have ye not read in the book of Moses, at the bush, how God spake unto him, saying, I [g]am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? He is not the God of the dead, but of the living: ye therefore do greatly err.

[c] Matt. 22. 23–33. Lk. 20. 27–38.

[d] Deut. 25. 5, 6. cfr. Eph. 1. 3.

[e] cf. Acts 2. 24–31. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 4.

[f] cf. 1 Cor. 15. 42–52. cf. Gal. 3. 28.

[g] Gen. 28. 13. Ex. 3. 6. cf. Rom. 4. 17.

[b] (xii. 28–34): as to the true responsibility to God.

[b] And one of the [h]scribes who had come up, and had heard them reasoning together, and knew that he had answered them well, asked him, Which is the first commandment of all? And Jesus answered him, The

[h] Matt. 22. 35–40.

* "A denarius." † Many omit.

Give Cæsar then what is his: no use to expect divine help to ignore what their sin had brought them into. No! and yet a way there was—a way which they had never taken: give God also His own! how surely then would the burden pass from their back, and the rest they longed for be obtained! "My yoke is easy, and my burden light."

"And they marvelled at Him."

[a] But they are not yet silenced; and after the Pharisee and the Herodian appears the Sadducee: a not unusual order at any time. With them we find the intrusion of mere human thought into spiritual things, and which with its own beggarliness would beggar heaven. But they know neither the Scriptures,—when did an infidel ever know the Scriptures?—nor the power of God. The Lord proves to them how the simplest sayings of God may contain what would enrich us for ever and we do not find it there. Shall we ever awake to the need we have of putting under adequate tillage the rich land which God has given us? As to the Lord's argument here, we can add little or nothing to what has been said in Matthew.

[b] As to the next question, Mark shows us under the tempting spirit of which Matthew speaks a certain effect nevertheless produced in the man who asks it. How apt we are to fight with the truth just when it is gaining access into our hearts! and how contrary often are the thoughts which unite to move us! In first [commandment of all]* is, 'Hear, O Israel: the Lord our God is one Lord; and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. [This is the first commandment].* And the second [like it]* is this: [j]Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. There is not another commandment greater than these. And the scribe said unto him, Right, teacher; thou hast spoken with truth: for he is [k]one, and there is none besides him; and to love him with all the heart, and with all the understanding, [and with all the soul,]* and with all the strength, and to love one's neighbor as oneself is much [l]more than all whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices. And when Jesus saw that he answered with intelligence, he said unto him, Thou art [m]not far from the kingdom of God. And no one any longer dared to question him.

6 (xii.35-37): the scribes conquered on their own ground.

[6] And Jesus answered and said, as he taught in the temple, [n]How say the scribes that the Christ is the Son of David? for David himself [o]said in the Holy Spirit, The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, until I make thine enemies a footstool for thy feet. David himself calleth him Lord; and whence is he his son? And the [p]common people heard him gladly.

7 (xii.38-40): completely judged.

[7] And he said to them in his teaching, [q]Beware of the scribes, who desire to walk about in long robes, and [r]salutations in the market-places, and [s]chief seats in the synagogues, and chief places at feasts, who devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayers: these shall receive a far greater judgment.

* Many omit.

i Deut. 6. 4, 5. Lk. 10. 27.
j Lev. 19.18. Rom. 13. 9, 10. Gal. 5. 14. Jas. 2. 8.
k Deut. 4. 35, 39. Deut.32.39. Is. 45. 6, 22.
l 1 Sa. 15. 22. cf. Ps.51.16, 17. cf.Mi.6.6-8. cf.Hos.6.6.
m cf. ch. 10. 21. cf. Acts 26. 28, 29.
n Matt. 22. 41-46. Lk. 20. 41-44.
o Ps. 110. 1. cf. Is. 11. 1. cf. Mi. 5. 2. cf. Rev. 22. 16.
p cf.Lk.15.1. cf.Matt.11. 5. cf. 1 Cor. 1. 26-29.
q Lk. 20. 45-47.
r Matt. 23. 7-12. ctr. 1 Cor. 4. 9-16.
s Lk. 11. 43. Matt. 23. 6. ctr. Jas. 2. 1-5. cf. 3 Jno. 9.
t Matt.23.14. cf. Rom. 2. 13. cf. Lk. 12. 47, 48.

the scribe before us we find a further effect of the answer given to his question, and the Lord Himself pronounces him "not far from the Kingdom of God." We are not told that he ever entered it; but we have good reason for hope that he had reached the place in which he was as the result of a seeking which could not fail of divine guidance. It needed some boldness to proclaim so heartily his acceptance of the truth, (simple as it may seem and is,) that love to God and to one's neighbor is "more than all whole burnt-offering and sacrifices," and this in sympathetic admiration of Jesus of Nazareth, and in the midst of those who were His open adversaries.

With the exception of this, Matthew's account is almost exactly that of Mark, and we cannot add to what is said of it in the former Gospel.

[6] After the scribe's confession, "no one any longer dared to question Him." But He now turns upon His silenced enemies with a question on His own part. The charge against Him was that "He made Himself the Son of God." The creed of the scribes was that Messiah was simply Son of David. He produces David himself therefore in proof that He must be more: otherwise how, as in the 110th psalm, could the father call his son his lord? To this they have, and could have, no answer.

[7] He proceeds to warn the people against the scribes. Mark does not however reproduce here the detailed judgment which is given in Matthew. He speaks of their love of display, of human applause, of leadership, their very prayers a t xii. 41–44: a turn of the page.

[8] And Jesus, sitting down over against the [u]treasury, beheld how the multitude cast money into the treasury; and many that were rich cast in much. And there came a poor [v]widow and cast in two mites, which make a farthing. And he called his disciples and said unto them, Verily I say unto you, that this poor widow hath cast in more than all they that have cast into the treasury: for they all have cast in of their superfluity; but she of her destitution did cast in all that she had, the [w]whole of her living.

3 xiii. 1: His manifestation in glory.

1–4 13: the beginnings of birth-pains.

3. [1] And as he went forth out of the temple, one of his disciples saith unto him, Teacher, [x]behold what manner of stones, and what manner of buildings. And Jesus said unto him, Seest thou these great buildings? there shall not be left here one stone upon another* that shall not be [y]thrown down. And as he sat on the u Lk. 21. 1–4.

v cf. ver. 40. cf. 1 Kl. 17. 9. cf. Lam. 1. 1–4.

w cf. 2 Cor. 8. 1–5, 12. cf. Phil. 2. 17, 30.

x Matt. 24. 1, 2. Lk. 21. 5, 6. cfr. 1 Cor. 3. 11–15. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 4–9.

y cf. 1 Kl. 9. 7. cf. Jer. 7. 14.

* Literally, "a stone upon a stone."

hypocrisy, while they devoured in their greed the substance of the poor and unprotected. Such were the religious chiefs of the nation, and their character was one most easily to be discerned surely. Yet these blind leaders were as blindly followed.

[8] He turns the page, and shows us amid such a state of things what the eye of God could discern, and His heart delight in, the act of a poor widow, too poor to tempt even the rapacity of a scribe, yet not too poor to put into the temple-treasury a gift beyond all the rich gifts of the wealthiest worshipers. "Two mites which make a farthing:" really about three quarters of a farthing! but the value of it, as our Lord declares, was not according to the market—according to its buying capacity, but intangible and spiritual. The two mites were all the means she had: "all her living." She had put her heart in with it: a heart that had no reserve,—that would keep nothing back from God. The value of it was that of sacrifice, and could not miss appreciation by One who was Himself the Great Sacrifice, or by Him who spared not for us His own Son.

But this was one among all that had cast in; and the commendation takes the form of condemnation; the joy of approbation is only as of a sweet note amid dissonance. Nay, the existence of this one verity of goodness and devotedness seems only to make worse the awful falsehood and self-service and arrogancy of pretension all around. Israel remains unhealed, unhelped, with her sin upon her, and going on to the culminating sin of sins—the Cross.

And, as in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man. There is naturally no difference. The lesson here is lesson for us all, and the exception is of divine grace only. Thus the Cross was not man's sin only, but the grace that meets his sin: and

"The very spear that pierced Thy side Drew forth the blood to save."

3. But before the Cross is reached, the veil is once more for a moment drawn aside, and we are given to see the One rejected and disowned of men coming in the glory of heaven when unbelief shall be possible no more, and resistance beyond a moment's possible thought. We have been already through this great prophecy in Matthew, whom Mark in what he gives of it almost entirely resembles. No doubt there are certain differences, and for these and for the resemblances alike there must be spiritual reasons which we should be able to give some account of. But for this the Gospels in their entirety must be better known, and each part apprehended in the light of the whole. Too little believing work has been done in this direction to enable us to say much to the purpose as to it. That there is divine wisdom in it all it should not need to say;

mount of Olives over against the temple, Peter and James and John and Andrew asked him privately, [z] Tell us when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign when all these things are about to be fulfilled? And Jesus [answering them]* began to say, Take heed that no one lead you [a] astray: for many shall come in my name, saying, I am [he]; and shall lead many astray. And when ye shall hear of [b] wars and rumors of wars, be not troubled: these things must needs come to pass; but the end is not yet. For nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom; and there shall be [c] earthquakes in [divers] places; and there shall be famines [and troubles]:* these things are the beginning of travail.

But take ye heed to yourselves: for they shall [d] deliver you up to councils; and in synagogues shall ye be beaten; and ye shall stand before governors and kings for my sake, for a testimony unto them. And the [e] gospel must first be preached unto all the nations. And when they shall lead you away to deliver you up, be not [f] anxious beforehand as to what ye shall say; but whatsoever shall be given you in that hour, that speak ye: for it is not ye that speak, but the Holy Spirit. And [g] brother shall deliver up brother to death, and the father his child; and children shall rise up against parents, and cause them to be put to death. And ye shall be [h] hated of all men for my name's sake: but he that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved.

* Many omit.

z Matt. 24. 3, etc. Lk. 21. 7. etc. cf. Lk. 17. 20-37.

a cf. 2 Thess. 2. 1-3.

b cf. Rev. 6. 2-4.

c Rev. 6. 12. Rev. 8. 5.

d cf. Matt. 10. 17, 18. cf. Jno. 16. 2.

e Matt. 24. 14.

f Matt. 10. 19. Lk. 12. 11, 12. Lk. 21. 14. cf. Acts 5. 29-32. cf. Acts 26. 1, 2, etc.

g cf. Jer. 9. 4. cf. Mi. 7. 5, 6. Matt. 10. 21, 34-36. Lk. 21. 16.

h Matt. 24. 9. Lk. 21. 17. cf. Jno. 16. 1-3. cf. Acts 28. 22. cf. 1 Pet. 4. 14.

but one may have to confess ignorance, which the many with whom we share it prevent being felt with the shame which should belong to it. To avoid mere repetition the notes on Matthew must be referred to throughout.

[1] The introductory portion no doubt takes in, in its general characteristics, the present time; though Christianity, as such, is not contemplated in it. It partakes in this way in the character of Old Testament prophecy, in which the present dispensation has no place; save, indeed, as you may call a type a prophecy, and then we can find such parabolic utterances not seldom. The prophecy of our Lord here has, in Matthew's version of it, quite similarly its Christian portion couched in this parabolic style. The time had not yet come for plainer speech. Mark and Luke alike omit all this Christian part; while the indefiniteness of this introductory portion leaves room for what is not explicitly found there.

Mark, as well as Luke, emphasizes in a special manner the persecutions that the disciples would have to endure, which in Luke are declared to take place before the signs among the nations. They are, therefore, persecutions of the early Christian days, such as the Acts show us to have taken place as soon as the new message of salvation was proclaimed. In this way the testimony to governors and kings was to be given; and they were, without any anxiety about it, to rely entirely upon the Spirit of God for all that they should say. Even the natural love of kindred would be destroyed by the spirit of hostility to Christ. He that endured to the end would be saved.

[2] The last clause, while as a general principle it applies to all, has certainly a

2 (14-23): the abomination of desolation.

[2] But when ye shall see the [i]abomination of desolation standing where it ought not (he that readeth, let him understand), then let them that are in Judea [j]flee to the mountains, and let him that is upon the house-top not go down, nor enter in, to take anything out of his house; and let him that is in the field not turn back to take his cloak. But woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days! And pray ye that it * be not in the winter. For those days shall be a [k]tribulation such as there hath not been the like from the beginning of the creation which God created until now, and never shall be. And except the Lord had [l]shortened the days, no flesh would be saved: but for the elect's sake, whom he hath chosen, he hath shortened the days. And then, if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is the Christ; or, Lo, there! believe it not: for there shall arise [m]false Christs and false prophets, and shall show signs and wonders, to lead astray, if possible, even the elect. But take ye heed: behold, I have told you all things beforehand.

3 (24-27): the appearing of Christ.

[3] But in those days, [n]after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall be falling from heaven, and the [o]powers of the heavens shall be shaken. And then shall they see the [p]Son of man coming in clouds, with great power and glory. And then shall he send his angels, and [q]gather together his elect from the four winds, from the uttermost part of earth to the uttermost part of heaven.

4 (28-37): watchfulness on the way.

[4] Now from the [r]fig-tree learn the parable. When its branch already becometh tender and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh. So also ye, when i Matt. 24. 15-20. Dan. 9. 27. cf. Rev. 13. 14-18.

* Some read, "your flight."

j cf. Rev. 12. 6. cf. Lk. 21. 20-24. cf. Zech. 14. 4, 5.
k Dan. 12. 1. cf. Rev. 7. 14.
l cf. Is. 26. 20. cf. Dan. 9. 27 with Rev. 12. 12-14.
m Matt. 24. 11, 23, 24 with Rev. 13. 11-18. cf. 2 Thess. 2. 3-12. n Matt. 24. 29. cf. Joel 2. 31. Lk. 21. 25, 26. cf. Rev. 8. 12.
o cf. Heb. 12. 26-29. cf. Dan. 8. 10, 11. p Dan. 7. 13. Matt. 24. 30. Lk. 21. 27. Rev. 1. 7. Rev. 19. 11.
q cf. Matt. 13. 30, 41-43. Matt. 24. 31. cf. Ps. 50. 5.
r Matt. 24. 32-35. Lk. 21. 29-33. cf. Song 7. 12.

special reference to the time of the end, and the Lord goes on immediately to the abomination standing in the holy place, "where" (above all) "it ought not:" the very place in which idolatrous worship would be the most open defiance of Him who had peremptorily forbidden it. This, as we have seen in Matthew, undoubtedly refers to days that are yet to come, after the present dispensation is ended by the removal of the saints to meet the Lord in the air, and when the "remnant of His brethren," as Micah declares, "shall return to the children of Israel" (Micah v. 3): that is, when those converted to God in Israel will no longer find their place as now in the body of Christ, but share the national hopes and promises of the ancient people of God.

All the warnings of the great tribulation following here are almost word for word as we find them in Matthew, with the omission only of the reference to the sabbath, and the danger of deception as to His being in the desert or the secret chambers.

[3] The signs which precede the coming of the Lord follow, and then the Son of man, coming in the clouds of heaven, sends forth His angels to gather together His elect from the four winds,—Israel, once more His people, from their long dispersion.

[4] The parable of the revival of Israel's fig-tree from her winter sleep, with ye see these things coming to pass, know that it is nigh —at the doors. Verily I say unto you, This [s]generation shall in no wise pass away, till all these things come to pass. [t]Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall in no wise pass away. But of that [u]day or of that hour knoweth no one, no not the angels that are in heaven, neither the [v]Son, but the Father. Take heed, watch and pray, for ye know not when the time is. It is as [w]when a man, away out of the country, having left his house, and given authority to his servants, and to [x]each one his work, hath commanded also the porter to watch. Watch therefore: for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, whether at even, or at midnight, or at cock-crowing, or in the morning: lest, coming suddenly, he find you [y]sleeping. And what I say unto you I say unto all, [z]Watch.

s cf. Matt. 10. 23. cf. Rom. 9. 28.
t cf. Matt. 5. 18. cf. Jer. 31. 35-37.
u cf. Acts 1. 7. cf. 1 Thess. 5. 1-10.
v cf. Phil. 2. 7 with John 5. 30. cfr. John 6. 30.
w Matt. 24. 45-51.
x cf. Matt. 25. 14, etc. cf. Rom. 12. 6, etc.
y cf. Rom. 13. 11-14. cf. Eph. 5. 14.

cf. 1 Thess. 5. 5-7. z Matt. 24. 42; Matt. 25. 13; cf. 1 Pet. 1. 13.

what follows to the thirty-second verse, is again almost word for word with Matthew. But Mark alone, in recording the Lord's declaration that "of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven," inserts "neither the Son."* This the Lord's character as the Son of God in service sufficiently explains. "The servant knoweth not what his lord doeth." And to the Corinthians the apostle says, "I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and Him crucified." It is not a question of His divine knowledge, but of what He knew as about His Father's business, as the apostle at Corinth knew nothing but the Crucified One.

It has been urged against this that it is not in this sense that no man or angel knoweth; but this as an objection has no force. For the point of our Lord's words is the inaccessibleness to man of this knowledge. There was none to whom one could go for this knowledge: neither man nor angel could communicate it, nor the Son either, as the apostle of His Father's will. It is a pregnant example of how we need to apprehend the divisions of Scripture according to their proper significance, in order to get the details rightly. "Take ye heed, watch and pray," the Lord adds, "for ye know not when the time is."

Notice the interests which Christ has here. He is going up to where He was before,—to the Father's presence and joy; yet He presents Himself here as having His house on earth, leaving it for a time and coming back to it, to those who have been entrusted with the work and authority of it in the meantime: a theme upon which Matthew dwells more at large. The master of the house comes back at an unknown hour, "at even, midnight, cock-crowing, or in the morning." Later it cannot be, for He of whom this is spoken Himself brings the day. But with the uncertainty, watchfulness is imperative: the true disciple must not be caught asleep.

Subd. 2.

We come now to the Cross. Every view of Christ that the Gospels give connects with the Cross. Every step He took in this world led Him to the Cross. Men's voices decreed Him to be worthy of death. The multitude, in the land where He had raised miracles of mercy, shouted "Crucify Him." Man's wickedness gave Him the Cross. Man's need led Him to it. The righteousness and love—the whole glory of God—find in it their fullest and their eternal display.

* It is found, however, in some copies of Matthew: see notes Matt. xxiv. 36.

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chaps. xiv., xv.)

The Cross.

SECTION 1. (chap. xiv. 1-52.)

The cup chosen.

1 (1-11): The traitor's choice and the occasion.
1 (1, 2): the purpose.
2 (3-9): love and utilitarianism.

1. [1] NOW after two days was the [a]passover and unleavened bread; and the chief priests and the scribes were seeking how they might lay hold of him by craft and kill him: for they said, Not at the feast, lest haply there might be a tumult of the people.

[2] And [b]when he was in Bethany at the house of Simon the leper, as he was at table, there came a woman having an alabaster cruse of [c]ointment of pure nard,* very precious: and she brake the cruse, and poured it on his head. Now there were some [d]indignant among themselves, and saying, Why was this waste of the ointment made? for this ointment could have been sold for more than three hundred pence,† and given to the poor.

a Matt. 26. 1-5. Lk. 22. 1, 2. Jno. 11. 55-57.

b Matt. 26. 6-13. Jno. 12. 1-8.

c cf. Ex. 30. 34-38 with Song 1. 3, 12, 13. cf. Ps. 45. 8.

d cf. Lk. 18. 15.

* Or "spikenard." † "Denarii."

Sec. 1.

The Gospel of Mark shows us the Cross in its sin-offering character, as already stated, Matthew giving the trespass-offering. These two Gospels, as having alike the Lord's cry of abandonment, most evidently represent the offerings which as emphasizing the judgment of sin are not "sweet savor." The distinction has been pointed out in the Introduction (pp. 26–28), and we shall have to touch afresh upon its proofs and illustrations as we go through this closing portion. The essence of the sin-offering is that "cup" which in Matthew's narrative of the agony in the garden has been already before us, and the Lord's choice of it there surely characterizes this first section. Matthew and Mark, it will be seen, cling closely together here as elsewhere, while there is also a difference which is characteristic in the case of each.

1. [1] It is the divine will to which Christ bows in taking the cup. It is not to be wondered at that, here at the outset, that divine will should make itself apparent, overruling, controlling, working by, the various and conflicting wills of men. This is what we find in the introductory portion here, of which the last two verses show how and how far the first two were fulfilled, while what comes between shows what brought about the traitor's action.

The hearts of the chief priests were set on mischief; but they were permitted thus to bring about the will of God for an infinite blessing. Yet their plots are not permitted to entangle the Lamb of the sacrifice: these are anticipated; and although He is delivered into their hands, yet it is open-eyed and unresisting. They must dishonor themselves by purchasing treachery with the blood-money, soon to be hurled back at them by their miserable tool, with words which must have haunted them ever after. Not even they dare put into the treasury that "price of blood."

[2] In the midst of all this there comes the beauteous story of the woman's ointment, always to be told wherever the gospel is preached, for a memorial of her: protest as it is against the utilitarianism which in the gospel itself would make Christ of less account than the "poor" who are to be benefited by Him. Ah, let us remember the claims of the Christ of God, if the poor themselves are not to suffer. This utilitarianism may well hide under it a Judas as chief instigator, while it seduces with its fair seeming even true disciples.

The spikenard is for His burial. That which she has that is precious here goes into the grave with Christ; and though He is not there now, the doctrine of Christ goes further for the Christian: for we ourselves are dead and buried

And they murmured against her. But Jesus said, Let her alone; why trouble ye her? she hath wrought a good work on me. For the poor ye have always with you, and when ye will ye can do good to them; but [e]me ye have not always. She hath done what she could: she hath come beforehand* to anoint my body for the [f]burial. And verily I say unto you, Wherever the gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that this woman hath done shall be spoken of for a [g]memorial of her.

3 (10, 11): fulfilment of the purpose.

3 [h]And Judas Iscariot, one of the twelve, went unto the chief priests, that he might deliver him up to them. And they, when they heard it, were glad, and promised to give him money. And he sought how he might, at a good opportunity, deliver him up.

2 (12-31): Love's witness to His disciples with the cross in sight.

1 (12-17): the preparation of the passover.

2. [1]And the [i]first day of unleavened bread, when they slew the passover, his disciples say unto him, Where wilt thou that we go and prepare, that thou mayest eat the passover? And he [j]sendeth two of his disciples, and saith unto them, Go into the city, and there shall meet you a man bearing a pitcher of water: follow

e cf. Lk.5.35.

f cfr. Matt. 16. 22, 23. cf. Phil. 3. 10.

g cf. Jno.11. 2. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 10, 11.

h Matt. 26. 14-16. Lk. 22. 3-6.

i Matt.26.17 -19. Lk.22.7-13. cf. Jno.13.1.

j cf. ch.11.1. cf. Jno.2.6-10.

* Literally, "anticipated."

with Him, and in Him alone we live, where He is gone. Thus we are identified with Him, to seek His interests only, as He secures ours. Woe will it be to any who sacrifice the claims of Christ for any other. The universe hangs upon Him: "in Him all things subsist:" "all things were created by Him and for Him"; and nothing can be right that is not in its due place of relationship to Him.

[3] The traitor understands more truly than many Christians the significance of the burial of Christ. The three hundred pence are gone for him without possible recovery. The bag he has carried will soon be as unprofitable. He must get what he can, if he sell Christ for it: and all they to whom Christ is offered and who turn away from Him to grasp the world instead, are they not after their manner selling Christ too? and valuing Him perhaps no higher than he did?

2. We follow on now to see the Lord at His last passover with His disciples before He suffers, and instituting His own memorial feast to take its place. The Old Testament is about to give place to the New, and He who is Lord of the sabbath and of the sacrificial rites fulfilled in Him, shows Himself Master of the future which He predicts, and of His own part in it, amid enemies that surround Him, and adverse conditions that seem to hold Him in their grasp. But the ram of consecration can be held only by its horns: it is His very power that makes Him submit and serve, while divine love contemplates the blessed end of all. And those around Him now, the few sheep so soon to be scattered, are the objects of His unfailing care, which would prepare them for the trial so near at hand. This, especially in the synoptics; while John shows us at this time the full out-pouring of His heart, in which, far beyond the present trial, He enters into the blessings of the new era coming in. John's is the Christian Gospel, and, not here alone but throughout, occupies itself with glories which even Christians have feebly apprehended.

[1] Mark gives, as Matthew does not, the special signs which would assure the disciples when they would have reached the house in which He would eat the passover. Was it not on their account that they were permitted thus to see how perfectly the apprehension of the minutest details of the future was possessed by Him. Dispensationally also, was not the man with but the pitcher of water him; and wherever he shall enter in, say unto the master of the house, The teacher saith, Where is the guestchamber for me, where I may eat the passover with my disciples? And he will himself show you a large upper room furnished [and] ready; and there prepare for us. And the disciples departed and went into the city, and found as he had said to them. And they prepared the passover. And when the even was come, he cometh with the twelve.

2 (18–21): the traitor pointed to.

[2] And as they were at table and eating, Jesus said Verily I say unto you, that [k]one of you, who is eating with me, shall deliver me up. And they began to be sorrowful, and to say unto him, one by one, Is it I?* And he said unto them, It is one of the twelve that dippeth with me in the dish. Because the Son of man goeth, as it is written of him, but woe unto that man by whom the Son of man is delivered up: [l]good were it for that man if he had not been born.

3 (22–25): the memorial.

[3] And as they were eating, Jesus [m]took bread, and blessed, and brake it, and gave it to them, and said, Take it: [n]this is my body. And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, and they all drank of it. And he said unto them, This is my [o]blood of the† covenant, which is shed for many. Verily I say unto you that I will drink [p]no more of the fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new in the kingdom of God.

4 (26–31): testing.

[4] And when they had [q]sung a hymn, they went out unto the Mount of Olives. And Jesus saith unto them, All ye shall be offended: for it is [r]written, I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered.

k Matt. 26. 20–25. Lk. 22. 21–23. Jno. 13.21–30. cf. Ps.55.12–14.

l cf. Jno. 6. 70, 71. cf. Jno. 17. 12. cf. Acts 1. 25.

m Matt. 26. 26–29. Lk. 22. 19, 20. *cf.*1 Cor.11. 20–34. cf. Acts 20. 7.

n 1 Cor. 10. 16. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 24. cf. Heb.10. 5, 10.

o *cf.*1 Pet. 1. 18, 19. cf. Heb.10. 19.

p *cf.*Is.53.10, 11. cf. Heb.12. 2.

q Matt. 26. 30. cfr. ver.34.

r Matt. 26. 31, 32. Zech. 13. 7.

* Some add "and another, Is it I?" † Many add, "new."

passing on to the place whence presently the rivers of living water were to flow forth? Indeed, the Old Testament had prepared the place already, which He alone could fill with His glory. Now He is come, for whom it is prepared.

[2] Now they must learn from His own lips that one of the twelve should deliver Him up. It was needful that they should be prepared for this uttermost wickedness, which, however, like so much else, they do not seem to have understood in its real character. It was needful also to the divine love which would not give up even a Judas without warning, to let him know that "even the night" was "light about" him. Scripture too had forewarned and pointed at him. And the Lord adds His awful warning: "good were it for that man if he had not been born."

[3] The institution of the Supper follows, almost in the words of Matthew. Mark omits "for the remission of sins," and for "My Father's Kingdom" substitutes "the Kingdom of God."

[4] They sing a hymn and go out to the Mount of Olives. And there follows now the warning of the trial coming from the smiting of the Shepherd. All would be stumbled; but He carries on their thoughts to His resurrection and going before them into Galilee. Peter protests more than once in his vehement way that he never would be stumbled; and when the Lord adds that he would that night thrice deny Him, he still more stoutly protests that, though he should die with Him, he will not deny Him. He does not discern that this very

But after that I am *risen, I will go before you into Galilee. But 'Peter said unto him, Though all shall be offended, yet will not I. And Jesus saith unto him, Verily I say unto thee that thou to-day, [even] this night, before the cock crow twice, shalt thrice deny me. But he spake exceeding vehemently, If I should have to die with thee, I will not deny thee in any wise. And "so also said they all.

s ch. 16. 7. Matt. 28. 7, 10, 16.

t Matt. 26. 33–35. Lk. 22. 31–34. Jno. 13. 36–38. cf. 1 Cor. 4. 4 with Phil. 3. 3.

u cf. Prov. 27. 19.

3 (32–42): Gethsemane.

3. And they *come unto a place, whose name is Gethsemane; and he saith unto his disciples, Sit ye here while I shall pray. And he *taketh with him Peter and James and John, and began to be greatly amazed and sore troubled. And he saith unto them, My soul is plunged in grief, [even] to death: remain here and watch. And going forward a little, he *fell upon the ground, and prayed that, if it were possible, the hour might pass away from him. And he said, Abba, Father, all things are possible with thee: take away this cup from me; yet not what I will, but what thou wilt. And he cometh and findeth them *sleeping, and saith unto Peter, Simon, sleepest thou? canst thou not watch one hour? watch and pray, that ye come not into temptation: the *spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak. And he went away again and prayed, saying the same thing. And he came again and found them sleeping, for their eyes were heavy; and they knew not what to answer him. And he cometh the third time, and saith unto them, Sleep on now, and take your rest. It is enough: the *hour is come; behold, the Son of man is delivered up into the hands of sinners. Rise, let us be going: behold, he is at hand who delivereth me up.

v Matt. 26. 36–46. Lk. 22. 39–46. Jno. 18. 1, 2.

w cf. ch. 5. 37. cf. ch. 9. 2. cf. Jno. 12. 27.

x cf. Heb. 5. 7, 8. cf. Ps. 102, title. cf. 2 Cor. 13. 4.

y cf. ch. 10. 38. cf. Ps. 88. 18.

z cf. Gal. 5. 17.

a cf. Jno. 7. 30 with Jno. 13. 1.

4 (43–52): The yielding and the testing.

4. And *immediately, while he was still speaking, Judas, one of the twelve, cometh up, and with him a multitude with swords and staves from the chief priests and the scribes and the elders. Now he that delivered him

b Matt. 26. 47–50. Lk. 22. 47, 48. Jno. 18. 3–9. Acts 1. 16.

strength of his is his weakness. And the others with as little discernment repeat his protest.

3. The agony in Gethsemane is told alike in Matthew and in the present Gospel; and we have already considered it. Not the view of death nor of any attendant suffering could move Christ after this manner. It would be dishonor to Him to suppose it. There is but one thing mighty enough to do so, and this connects it with the surpassing agony of the Cross, the forsaking of God. This, we shall find that Mark, by the abridgement or omission of other things, brings into emphatic prominence: it is the full reality of substitution, the Sinless in the sinner's place; and it is this that He is anticipating here.

4. Judas comes up with his band of men from the chief priests and scribes, and into such hands He surrenders Himself for the accomplishment of His Father's will. The disciples are struggling against it,—fighting, and then fleeing. His reproof of them is not given here, but only of the multitudes. Exceptional in Mark is the story of the young man clad in a linen or muslin garment (a sindon), which when they lay hold upon him, he leaves in their hands, and escapes from them naked.

up had given them a token, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that is he; lay hold of him and lead him away safely. And when he was come, immediately he came to him, and saith unto him, Rabbi, and [c]kissed him affectionately. And they laid their hands upon him and took him. But [d]one of those who stood by drew his sword, and smote the servant of the high priest, and struck off his ear. And Jesus answered and said unto them, Are ye come out as against a [e]robber, with swords and staves, to take me? I was daily with you teaching in the temple, and ye took me not: but [this is] that the [f]scriptures might be fulfilled. And they all [g]forsook him and fled. And a certain young man followed him with a linen cloth cast about him, over his naked [body], and they lay hold upon him. But he, [h]leaving the linen cloth behind, fled from them naked.

c cf. Ps. 55. 21. cf. Ps. 62. 4. cf. Ezek. 33. 31.
d Matt. 26. 51-54. Lk. 22. 49-51. Jno. 18. 10, 11.
e Matt. 26. 55, 56. Lk. 22. 52, 53. cf. Lk. 22. 37.
f cf. Jno. 18. 9. cf. Jno. 19. 24.
g Ver. 27. cf. Ps. 31. 11. cf. Ps. 142. 4.
h cf. ver. 54.

1 (xiv. 53-72): The true charge, and the truth charged.
1 (53-65): the confession of the Master.

SECTION 2. (Chaps. xiv. 53–xv. 15.)

The false condemnation.

1. [1] And they led Jesus away to the [i]high priest; and there come together* all the chief priests and the elders and the scribes. And Peter followed him afar off, even i Matt. 26. 57, etc. Lk. 22. 54, etc. Jno. 18. 13, etc.

* Some add "to him."

Significant it seems that the sindon, though generally spoken of as a night-dress, was such a wrapper as was used to enwrap the dead, and is actually, in the only other case in the New Testament, applied to that in which the Lord's body was wrapped (Matt. xxvii. 59; ch. xv. 46; Luke xxiii. 53). It came to be used for any light garment made of this material, and so might be a night-dress; but does not seem to be the word for this specifically.

Its connection with the dead has suggested an allegorical meaning for the story here, at a time when all facts seem to allegorize (if there be even any exception in this way as to Scripture facts). It has been spoken* of as suggestive of the vanity of human effort against the Christ of God. The priests and people, Herod and Pilate, got nothing of the Man against whom they combined but the grave-clothes empty of their temporary occupant. The living Person had escaped: the true life was untouched. And this might be a parable as to all His followers, to whom indeed, as in Christ before God, the vestment of the body is but as it were the light garment of the dead, in whom a hidden life resides not to be touched of death: "the gates of hades cannot prevail against it." In the midst of a hostile world, the Lord of life has well provided for His own.

Sec. 2.

The condemnation of the Lord—trial in any real sense there was not—was two-fold. Before the high priest and council it was upon the true charge, and the truth it was that was charged against Him. He was condemned on His own confession of the truth, that He was the Son of God. Before Pilate they change this accusation for another, that He claimed to be King of the Jews: this for the obvious reason that they can plead: "Whosoever maketh himself a king speaketh against Cæsar." These things naturally appear in all the Gospels, though with different emphasis and omissions as to particular details, according to the different line of truth in each. Matthew and Mark, as usual, come nearest together; John is the most distinct.

1. [1] The confession of the Master is set before us in evident contrast with the within into the court of the high priest; and he was sitting with the officers, and [j]warming himself in the light [of the fire]. Now the chief priests and the whole council sought witness against Jesus to put him to death, and found none. For many bare [k]false witness against him, and their witness agreed not. And certain persons rose up and bare false witness against him, saying, We heard him say, I will [l]destroy this temple made with hands, and in three days will build another made without hands. And neither thus did their witness agree. And the high priest rose up in the midst and asked Jesus, saying, [m]Answerest thou nothing? What is it that these bear witness against thee? But he was [n]silent and answered nothing. Again the high priest asked him and saith unto him, Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed One? And Jesus said, [o]I am: and ye shall see the Son of man [p]sitting at the right hand of power, and [q]coming with the clouds of heaven. And the high priest [r]rent his clothes, and saith, What further need have we of witnesses? Ye have heard the blasphemy: what think ye? And they all [s]condemned him [as] worthy of death. And some began to [t]spit upon him, and to cover his face and buffet him, and say unto him, Prophesy. And the officers struck him with the palms of their hands.

* In the Sermons of Henry Melville.

[j] Lk. 22. 55. Jno. 18. 18. cf. Jno. 21. 9.
cf. Eph. 5. 11 with Is. 50. 11.
[k] Matt. 26. 59-61. cf. Ps. 35. 11.
[l] Jno. 2. 18-22. ch. 15. 29.
[m] Matt. 26. 62.
[n] Is. 53. 7.
[o] Matt. 26. 63, 64. cf. Lev. 5. 1.
[p] ch. 16. 19. Ps. 110. 1. Lk. 22. 69.
[q] Matt. 25. 31. Dan. 7. 13. Rev. 1. 7.
[r] Matt. 26. 65. cf. 2Ki. 19. 1.
[s] Matt. 26. 66. cf. Jno. 19. 7. cf. Lev. 24. 16.
[t] cf. Is. 50. 6. cf. Is. 52. 14.
[u] Matt. 26. 69-75. Lk. 22. 56-62. Jno. 18. 25-27.

2 (66-72): the denial of the disciple.

[2] And while [u]Peter was below in the court, there came denial of the disciple. In every part of this scene man is exposed; consistent only in wickedness, unreliable and inconstant where truest in heart. His self-confidence is his weakness; his weakness, known and owned, his only strength. The Second Man stands alone amid a ruined world; most glorious in this utter desolation; all contradictions uniting to approve Him; all depths to place Him highest. The simple language of the evangelists, putting not an additional word even of emotion—not an irrepressible note of wonder or of praise, to the mere recital of His words, His deeds, His sufferings, is in fact the hush of the sanctuary of His presence, the only fit celebration of that unique glory with which nothing else must or can mingle.

Before the high priest the false witnesses are condemned by their contradiction of each other. They sought witnesses for the purpose that was in their hearts before. And are not those who bring such witness, commonly, if not constantly, of such a spirit? Do not they dare even to search Scripture to justify the condemnation they have determined on already? And yet how often are they obliged to put out of court their own witnesses! How little can they quote without misquoting. It was they who even now were seeking to destroy the temple of God, as His words had implied they would; and it was no other could replace this, but He would raise it up again. Still there was no agreement: and the high priest turns to Jesus, to make Him answer what had need of none, and thus make something of what was nothing. He is therefore silent.

But the direct question He will not fail to answer. "Art Thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed One?" must be answered with no ambiguity at all. It will give them what they seek against Him; but it will give rest also to those that are true enquirers, and minister through the ages to the blessing of man. Yes, He is the Son of the Blessed, while He is the Son of man as well; and they shall see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of power, and coming with the clouds of heaven.

[2] The denial of the disciple follows the confession of the Master. It speaks one of the maidservants of the high priest; and seeing Peter warming himself, she looked on him and saith, Thou also wast with the Nazarene, Jesus. But he denied, saying, I know not, neither understand I what thou sayest. And he went out into the outer court; and a cock crew. And the maid seeing him began again to say to those standing by, This is one of them. But he again denied it. And after a little while those that stood by said unto Peter again, Truly thou art one of them; for thou also art a Galilean. And he began to [v]curse and to swear, I know not this man of whom ye speak. And immediately, a second time, the cock crew. And Peter remembered the saying, how Jesus said unto him, [w]Before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice. And when he thought thereon, he wept.

2 (xv. 1-15): The feigned charge. 1 (1-5): the confession.

2. [1] And [x]immediately in the morning, the chief priests took counsel together with the elders and scribes and the whole council, and bound Jesus, and carried him away, and delivered him to Pilate. And Pilate [y]asked him, Art thou the king of the Jews? And he answered and said unto him, Thou sayest [it]. And the chief priests accused him of many things. And Pilate again asked him, saying, Answerest thou nothing? Behold how many things they accuse thee of. But Jesus still [z]answered nothing; insomuch that Pilate marvelled.

2 (6-15): Jesus or Barabbas.

[2] Now at the feast he [a]used to release unto them one prisoner, whomsoever they asked. Now there was one called Barabbas, bound with them that had made insurrection, men who had committed [b]murder in the insurrection. And the multitude crying out began to ask him [to do] as he was wont to do unto them. And v cf. 1 Sa. 21. 13. cf. Matt. 2. 8. cf. ver. 45.

w vers. 29-31.
x Matt. 27. 1, etc. Lk. 23. 1, etc. Jno. 18. 28, etc.
y Matt. 27. 11. Lk. 23. 3. Jno. 18. 33.
z cf. ch. 14. 60, 61.
a Matt. 27. 15-26. Lk. 23. 17-25. Jno. 18. 39, 40.
b Acts 3. 14. cf. Gen. 4. 8 with Jude 11.

for itself, and needs here little comment. Each evangelist gives it: for there is need of such a lesson being well learned, as that honesty of heart, and true love to Christ, and zeal for Him, cannot save us from the most terrible falls, without that distrust of ourselves which brings in the power of God for us. Not only the sinner needs to be broken down before God, but the saint does. Human strength avails nothing on the path he is called to tread.

Mark alone notices the twofold crowing of the cock, the latter being at the general cock-crowing of which the other Gospels speak. The first fails to arouse Peter; so easily may the conscience become torpid through the power of sin. Only Luke notices the tender reproof of the Lord's look, which followed the second: in fact those eyes had never been withdrawn from him; though the "look" was more than this: it was the divine recall of the wanderer to himself and to God.

2. [1] In the second part here, we have still a confession and a denial, though the latter of a very different kind to what we have just seen. The chief priests still charge Him with being what He truly is, although as a charge they make it falsely. He is the King of the Jews. To their further accusations He answers nothing, so that Pilate marvels: but He has no thought of saving Himself from what was before Him; had He purpose of this kind, He would have stood in no such fashion before His accusers. Mark almost leaves out Pilate; from his point of view he is but a mere circumstance.

[2] It is otherwise as to Barabbas, whose crimes are told out, as they are not in Pilate answered them, saying, Will ye that I release unto you the king of the Jews? For he knew that for [c]envy the chief priests had delivered him up. But the chief priests stirred up the multitude that he should rather release Barabbas unto them. And Pilate answering said to them again, What will ye then that I do [unto him] whom ye call the king of the Jews? And they cried out again, [d]Crucify him. And Pilate said unto them, Why, [e]what evil hath he done? But they cried out exceedingly, Crucify him. And Pilate, willing to content the multitude, [f]released Barabbas unto them, and delivered up Jesus, when he had [g]scourged him, to be crucified.

c cf. Matt. 21. 38. cf. Jno. 12. 19.

d Matt. 26.2 with Jno. 12. 32, 33. cf. Acts 13. 27-29. cf. Gal. 3.13.

e cf. Jno. 19. 4. cf. Jno. 8. 46.

f ver. 6. cf. Is. 61. 1.

g cf. Is. 50. 6.

SECTION 3. (Chap. xv. 16-47.)

The Cup drunk.

1 (xv. 16-20): Crowned with the curse.

1. Now the soldiers led him away into the court which is the prætorium, and they call together the whole band. And they clothe him with [h]purple, and put on him a [i]crown of thorns which they had plaited. And they began to salute him, Hail, king of the Jews! And they [j]struck his head with a reed, and spat upon him, and bowing their knees worshiped him. And when h cf. Ex. 26. 31 with ver. 26.

i cf. Is. 55. 13. cf. Is. 53. 5. ctr. Heb. 2. 9.

j cf. Ps. 69. 3. cf. Ps. 109. 4, 5.

Matthew. He is seen as a chief of sinners, a rebel and a murderer, for whom the feast of redemption offers a possibility of release, but only, according to Pilate's alternative, if Jesus is given up. Jesus becomes, as it were, the Substitute for the chief of sinners. To "release Barabbas" is "to destroy Jesus." Why? because He has done evil? the judge asks in vain, Where is it? Looking deeper than at the wicked wills of men, we may discern in the purpose of God that holy Sin-offering, the true passover, by which even a Barabbas may be delivered, not for good in him, for Barabbas shows none. Thus the gospel story is more completely unfolded. Barabbas is released: Jesus is given up.

Sec. 3.

1. Now we approach the drinking of the cup. He is crowned with thorns, the sign of the curse, as in Matthew, clothed with the purple, but without the reed-sceptre: that only smites Him. And it is indeed, but a reed that smites the Rock; yet presently, through the marvelous working of God, the waters will flow out; and the waters will become a great river, going forth on all sides to gladden the earth.

Notice that the robe is *purple here, not scarlet, as in Matthew. The blood-color is here, but mingled: as we have seen, even the precious blood of atonement, that it might sanctify the people, must be that of a sacrifice offered outside the camp (Heb. xiii. 11, 12). And "so Jesus, that He might sanctify the people with His own blood, suffered without the gate." Here is the true sin-offering, and here is the purple, the composite color,—the blood, the death-penalty taken; but with that, the heavenly side also, that is, the blue. For

* "A scarlet military mantle," says Lange, "was made to represent the imperial purple: hence the designation, a purple (πορφυραν) a purple robe, as Mark and John describe it. And because this is the symbolic import of the robe, there is no discrepancy. The scarlet military robe no more required to be a real purple than the crown of thorns required to be a real crown, or the reed a real sceptre; for the whole transaction was an ironical drama, and such an one, too, that the infamous abuse might be readily perceived through the pretended glorification. The staff must be a reed, the symbol of impotence; the crown must injure and pierce the brow; and so too must the purple present the symbol of miserable, pretended greatness; and this was done by its being an old camp-mantle."

But how, through all this, God was working, to turn all to the bringing out His glory as infinitely higher than that of earthly potentates, we may surely see clearly.

they had mocked him, they took off the purple from him, and put his own clothes on him; and they lead him out to crucify him.

2 (21-32): Crucified.

2. And they *k*impress a certain man passing by, Simon, a Cyrenian, coming from the field, the father of Alexander and Rufus, that he might bear his cross. And they bring him to the place *l*Golgotha, which is, being interpreted, the place of a skull. And they offered him *m*wine mingled with myrrh, but he received it not. And they crucify him, and *n*part his garments among them, casting lots on them what each should take. And it was the *o*third hour, and they crucified him. And the *p*superscription of his accusation was written over, THE KING OF THE JEWS.

And with him they crucify *q*two robbers; one on his right hand, and one on his left. [And the scripture was fulfilled which saith, *r*And he was reckoned with transgressors].* And they that passed by *s*railed upon him, wagging their heads, and saying, Ha! thou that destroyest the temple and buildest it in three days, save thyself, and come down from the cross. In like manner the *t*chief priests also, with the scribes, mocking among themselves, said, He *u*saved others; himself he cannot save. Let the Christ, the king of Israel, now come down from the cross, that we may see and believe. And they that were crucified *v*with him reproached him.

k Matt. 27. 32. Lk. 23. 26. cf. Jno. 19. 17. cf. Phil. 3. 10.
l Matt. 27. 33. Lk. 23. 33. Jno. 19. 17. cf. Heb. 13. 11-13.
m Matt. 27. 34. cf. Ps. 69. 21. Lk. 23. 36. cf. Jno. 19. 28-30.
n Matt. 27. 35. Lk. 23. 34. Jno. 19. 23, 24. Ps. 22. 18. cf. Phil. 3. 9.
o cf. Matt. 27. 45. cf. Lk. 23. 44. cf. Jno. 19. 14.
p Matt. 27. 37. Lk 23. 38. Jno. 19. 19-22. cf. Gen. 22. 13 with Ps. 132. 17.
q Matt. 27. 38. Lk. 23. 32, 33. Jno. 19. 18. cf. Is. 53. 9.

* Perhaps to be omitted.

r Is. 53. 12; Lk. 22. 37. s Ps. 22. 7; Ps. 69. 12; Matt. 27. 39, 40. t Matt. 27. 41-44; Lk. 23. 35; ctr. Heb. 4. 15. u. cf. Jno. 3. 14, 15 with Heb. 9. 22. v cf. Lk. 23. 39-43 with 1 Tim. 1. 13.

that was heaven's side, the consequence of sin laid upon Him, the hiding of the face of God from Him,—for us heaven opened.

These are both royal colors also, as we plainly see; the scarlet of Matthew and the purple of Mark, just as the crown of thorns, the crown of curse, for Him was really a crown. The Sufferer reigns as that, in the Kingdom peculiarly His; and so only could He have, among the sinners of man's race, such a throne as could satisfy Him.

2. The impressment of Simon the Cyrenian upon the road, to bear His cross, is recorded here, as in Matthew; but with an addition here which shows Simon, the "hearkener" and cross bearer, as the father of Alexander and Rufus, God's grace being fruitful in him. Is not this the true way of fruitfulness ever, to hearken and bear the cross?

Golgotha, the place of a skull, is reached, and then the vinegar and gall are offered Him, only to be rejected: Mark gives "wine mingled with myrrh;" the former, the sour wine of common use, much like vinegar; the latter is probably a different thing from "gall," which would hardly seem a fitting term to describe it. The parting of His garments, according to the view that has been given of it,* is as naturally found in all the Gospels as the particularization as to it suits and is found in John. The mockery of the bystanders, and especially of the heads of the people is given almost exactly as in Matthew.

3. And now from the sixth to the ninth hour, there falls a darkness over all the land. We have already considered its meaning generally, but every partic-

* See Notes on Matthew.

3 (33-38): The opening of the sanctuary.

33. And when the sixth hour was come, there was [w] darkness over the whole land until the ninth hour. And at the ninth hour Jesus [x] cried with a loud voice, Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani? which is, being interpreted, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? And some of them that stood by, when they heard it, said, Behold, he calleth Elias. And one ran and, filling a sponge with [y] vinegar, put it upon a reed, and gave him to drink, saying, Let be; let us see whether Elias cometh to take him down. And Jesus, having uttered a [z] loud cry, expired. And the [a] veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom.

4 (39-41): Impending changes.

39. And when the [b] centurion who stood by over against him, saw that he so cried out and expired, he said, Truly this man was Son of God.

[w] Matt. 27. 45. Lk. 23. 44, 45. cf. 1 Jno. 1. 5 with 2 Cor. 5. 21.
[x] Matt. 27. 46–49. Ps. 22. 1. cf. Is. 53. 5, 6.
[y] cf. ver. 23.
[z] Matt. 27. 50. Lk. 23. 46. cf. Jno. 10. 17, 18.
[a] Matt. 27. 51. Lk. 23. 45. cf. Heb. 10. 19, 20.
[b] Matt. 27. 54. Lk. 23. 47; cf. Deut. 32. 31.

ular specified has surely its importance. The three hours, as such, speak naturally of the manifestation of what is hidden, and may most simply speak of the opening of the sanctuary, which takes place at its close. It is the blood of the sin-offering which on the day of atonement in Israel opened it for the moment to let in the high priest, the representative of the people. But that was but for a moment: the characteristic of the legal dispensation was in the veil which hung continuously before the presence of God, so that from man's point of view He dwelt in the thick darkness. It was a darkness forbidding man's approach, and speaking of sin unmet, spite of the hecatombs of victims dying for it. And the true Sacrifice having now come, He must find His way through the darkness, laden with the sin which had forced God thus into distance from the creature of His love.

The three hours of darkness were to Him the measure of what to any other would have been an infinite hopeless distance. The cry of desertion interpreted the darkness. The veil rent from top to bottom proclaimed that it was traversed and removed. The sixth hour speaks of the barrier-limit reached; the ninth, of perfected manifestation.

The agonizing question shows the nature of the darkness, which is not outward but within upon His soul. The quotation from the twenty-second psalm gives us the clue to find the answer which the psalm gives to the question. If a holy God is to abide among the praises of a people taken from among sinful men, He under the weight of that sin must declare that holiness in God's judgment of it. God is glorified in this redemption-work beyond the possibility of all man's sin to cloud again for ever. The light bursts forth now, and as never yet. God is in the light. The separating veil is rent from top to bottom.

To the mockers around the cross, the darkness is as dense as ever. They exclaim that He is calling for Elias. And while one brings to Him upon a reed the vinegar for His thirst, he joins in the cry they raise, to wait and see if Elias will come to take Him down. But Jesus cries again with a loud voice, and expires.

Through all this account we have already seen how, by the omission of particulars recorded by Matthew, Mark emphasizes the sin-offering character of Christ's sacrifice.* But there are positive testimonies, also, that we have noted. And now, as we go on to the after events of the book, we shall find the same character attaching to it, until we see the glorious Risen Man seated in heaven at the right hand of God. The veil is passed, but never closed again: He is gone in, our Fore-runner, and we walk in the light as God is in the light.

4. Before we have left the Cross and its glory of sorrow, intimation is given of victories which it is to achieve, and changes resultant. The first voice, save

*See Introduction, pp. 26–28.

And there were [c]women also looking on from afar; among whom were both Mary of Magdala, and Mary the mother of James the younger, and of Joses, and Salome: who also, when he was in Galilee, followed him, and ministered unto him; and many other women who came up with him unto Jerusalem.

c Matt. 27. 55, 56. Lk. 23. 27-31, 49. Jno. 19. 25. cf. ch. 16. 1.

5 (42-47): Governmental working of God.

5. And when even was now come, because it was the preparation, that is, the day before the sabbath, there came [d]Joseph of Arimathea, an honorable councilor, who himself also awaited the kingdom of God; and he went in boldly unto Pilate, and asked for the body of Jesus. And Pilate wondered whether he were already dead; and calling the centurion, he inquired of him if he had been any while dead. And when he had learned it of the centurion, he granted the body to Joseph. And having bought a linen cloth, he took him down, and swathed him in the linen cloth, and laid him in a [e]sepulcre which had been hewn out of the rock; and he rolled a stone against the door of the sepulcre. And Mary of Magdala and Mary the [mother] of Joses beheld where he was laid.

d Matt. 27. 57-61. Lk. 23. 50-56. Jno. 19.38-42. cf. Matt.20. 6, 9.

e cf. Is. 53.9. cf. Josh.3.4.

that of the dying robber, which, in the midst of Jewish blasphemy and dishonor, owns the supreme glory of the Son of God, is that of the Gentile centurion. Christ already has His own among the uncircumcised, the beginning of the great host that are soon to follow Him.

Then this company of ministering women gathered by His cross, and to be the first heralds of His victory over death, is not without significance. "The Lord gave the word; great was the company of the women that published it" (Ps. lxviii. 11). The victory is so achieved, that not the men of might are needed, but the feebleness of women was abundantly enough. Indeed the men of might, the fighters on the Lord's behalf, had not found their hands. But now the battle was over: He had fought alone, and of the people there were none with Him: with the last great shout of the battle-field, the cry of victory and not of exhaustion, He had entered into His rest. The women are now free to minister. The shadow of the Cross is but the shadow of the sheltering wings of divine love.

It is this victory-shout which, according to Mark, impresses the soldier: "when the centurion saw that He so cried out and expired, he said, Truly this man was the Son of God." He had seen death upon the battlefield, perhaps in many a shape, but never a death like this. If we take John's account, it is the cry that has rung through so many hearts since then, Tetelestai, "It is finished." If it be not the great cry itself, it certainly went with it; and how has that become for Gentile faith the gospel-utterance! It has assured of peace made with God, stilled to rest the tumult of other things, and subdued the heart to Jesus, to the Son of God who loved and gave Himself for the sons of men.

5. "They assigned Him His grave with wicked men; but with the rich man when He had died." So had Isaiah long before predicted, and now we have the fulfilment of it. The malefactor's grave which would have naturally followed the death of the cross could not be permitted Him. That substitutionary work was accomplished which alone had made Him to be numbered with transgressors. In that character He could appear no more; and the righteousness of God, which He had declared in His death, claimed now divine intervention in His behalf. While He yet slept He must sleep in honor, and as it has been well said, the One born of a Virgin-womb could only be fittingly honored in a SUBDIVISION 3.

Resurrection, and Heaven really opened.

1 (1-8): Promise, yet barren.

1. AND when the [f]sabbath was now past, Mary of Magdala, and Mary the [mother] of James, and Salome, bought spices that they might come and anoint him. And very early on the first day of the week, they come to the sepulcre when the sun was risen. And they said one to another, [g]Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulcre? And looking up, they see that the stone is rolled away: for it was exceeding great. And entering into the sepulcre, they saw a [h]young man sitting on the right side, clothed in a white robe: and they were astounded. And he saith unto them, Be not astounded; ye seek Jesus, the Nazarene, the crucified. He is [i]risen, he is not here: behold the place where they laid him. But go, tell [f] Matt. 28.1, etc. Lk. 24.1, etc. Jno. 20. 1, etc.

[g] Matt. 28.2. cf. Ex. 14.13 -16.

[h] Lk. 24. 4. cf. Jno. 20. 12, 13. cf. Acts 1. 10, 11. cf. 1 Tim. 3. 16.

[i] Matt. 28.6. Lk. 24. 5-7. 1 Cor. 15. 3-8.

virgin-tomb. He who could not see corruption, could not lie in a tomb which corruption had defiled. Thus all was in harmony, and God silently controlling all things before visible intervention could take place. Joseph of Arimathea, inspired with a boldness he had not yet shown, goes in to Pilate and asks of him the body of Jesus. Pilate, finding from the centurion that He is indeed already dead, commands it to be given; and in the new tomb, awaiting its predicted resurrection on the third day, that sacred body rests.

SUBD. 3.

As every one knows, doubt has been cast upon the authenticity of the last twelve verses of this Gospel; and if they are, as Meyer calls them, but an "apocryphal fragment," a waif without parentage known, introduced into Mark we know not how, to mend the ragged end of his mutilated or unfinished work, doubt would naturally be cast on more than its authenticity, and most of all for those who are slow to believe in inspiration moving after this fashion. We need not, however, discuss it here, as the authority for the full text is abundant in both MSS. and Versions. The spiritual relationship of the closing verses to the Gospel as a whole is perfect; and this, if proved, is a better argument of itself in favor of authenticity than all besides that has ever been produced against it.

Moreover there is reason of an internal kind for the difference that in fact exists between the two parts of this last chapter,—the first, which gives the promise from the (unseen) Lord to meet His disciples in Galilee: a promise of which Mark gives no fulfilment: while the second briefly relates His actual appearances in and around Jerusalem, and His sending them forth with signs attesting their commission to preach the gospel in all the world. These two parts we have now to consider in their scope and connection with one another.

1. In the first part we have then promise which, as far as Mark's account of it goes, is not fulfilled. Jesus does not meet them in Galilee; and the end for them, the account closing abruptly, is in fear and trembling, rather than the joy and gladness we should have expected from it.

If, then, nothing is without a purpose here (and we at least are not going to question this), there must be for us some meaning in this non-fulfilment, this fear instead of joy. If we think, also, of the disciples as what they were undoubtedly till after (and a good while after) the resurrection,—a Jewish remnant, with hopes still clustering round the Old Testament promises, we can see something very like what Mark pictures here. Christ is come, Christ is risen; there is a promise for believing Israelites which to them as such is not fulfilled; and in short their history, and that of the ministry to the circumcision, with which especially is connected Peter's name (ver. 7, Gal. ii. 7, 9), is just such a his disciples and [j] Peter, [that] he goeth before you into Galilee: there shall ye see him, as he said unto you. And they went out and fled from the sepulcre; for trembling and astonishment had come upon them. And they said nothing to any one, for they were [k] afraid.

2 (9-18): The witness of salvation.

2. Now when he was risen early on the first day of the week, he appeared [l] first to Mary of Magdala, out of whom he had cast seven demons. She went and told those that had been with him, as they mourned and wept. And they, when they heard that he was alive and had been seen of her, [m] disbelieved.

And after these things he was [n] manifested in another form to two of them, as they walked on their way into the country. And they went and told it to the rest; neither believed they them.

j cf. ch.14.71. cf. Lk.24.47.

k cf. Matt. 28. 5. cf. Lk.24.36-40.

l Jno. 20.11-18. cf. Lk.7.42, 43. cf. 1 Cor.15. 8, 9.

m. Lk.24.10, 11.

n. Lk.24.13-35.

broken fragment as is here presented to us. It will be completed, but only in another dispensation, after the parenthesis of the Church's history shall be over, and the "remnant of" the King's "brethren shall return to the children of Israel" (Mic. v. 3): that is, when Israelites converted to God shall again be partakers in the hopes and promises of the nation.

This, I doubt not, is what is intimated in the first verses of Mark's closing chapter. We shall find similar things in the close of John's Gospel, and more fully brought out there: things hard to be uttered, indeed, when the meaning, even of divine history, is so generally considered to be merely in the letter, and when belief in the inspiration of God's word—in any proper sense of inspiration—is being so largely given up. That cannot affect the truth itself, nor its importance for those that have ears to hear.

2. The second part begins once more with the resurrection, and is of another character. Here the Lord Himself appears, and first to one who had been delivered from the power of Satan, which had completely possessed her. This supremacy of power over the whole array of the enemy—seven demons—characterizes the full salvation which is now to be proclaimed. The message given her we find only in John; here only that at first it was disbelieved. The very men who are to be the heralds of it in the world are at first incredulous as to what they long to receive. As Luke says of what took place afterwards, "they believed not for joy": it was, according to the common phrase, "too good to be true."

The appearance to the two on the road to Emmaus, next referred to, is still incompetent to bring conviction; and the Lord then Himself appears to the eleven—the company now spoken of as that number, though Thomas, as we know, was not among them at the first,—and upbraids them with their unbelief and hardness of heart.

The commission that follows is entirely different from that in Matthew, though some have represented it as but another version of it. They were given at different times and places clearly; while they reflect each the character of its respective Gospel. Matthew, whose subject is the Kingdom, gives the mode of reception into it by baptism and teaching. This supposes Mark's commission as being already acted on,—the "what shall we do?" of those already wrought upon by the good news proclaimed. Mark's view of the sin-offering is the basis of the gospel: this blessed work accomplished, the going forth of the good news naturally results.

Faith, therefore, which is implied in the commission in Matthew, is insisted on here: "he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." On the other hand, "he that disbelieveth"—no baptism affecting the case of such an one—"shall be condemned."

And [o]afterwards he was manifested unto the eleven themselves, as they were at table, and upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not those who had seen him after he was risen. And he said unto them, [p]Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to the whole creation: he that [q]believeth and is [r]baptized shall be saved; and he that disbelieveth shall be condemned. And these [s]signs shall follow them that believe: in my name they shall cast out [t]demons; they shall speak with new [u]tongues; they shall take up [v]serpents; and if they [w]drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them at all; they shall lay hands on the [x]sick, and they shall recover.

o Lk. 24.36-45. Jno. 20.19, 20. p Matt. 28.18-20. cf. Lk. 24.46-49. cf. Jno. 20.21-23.
q cf. Acts 13.38, 39.
r cf. Acts 16.30-34.
s cf. Acts 4.29-31. cf. Acts. 5.12.
t cf. Acts 16.18.

4, etc. v cf. Acts 28.3-6. w cf. 2 Ki. 4.39-41. x cf. Acts 9.32-35.

The signs that follow those who believe introduce us into a region of controversy in different quarters. It is plain, however, that even in the apostles' days they were not signs which necessarily followed in every individual. "Have all the gifts of healing? do all speak with tongues?" implies the negative. But the apostle asks moreover, "Are all workers of miracles?"—any kind of miracles?—and this must have a similar answer (1 Cor. xii. 29, 30).

Here then is what at once destroys any argument founded upon the universality of such gifts as these. It could not be said of any Christians that as such they would have them. The question was a much simpler one,—a question of fact: who have them? who have them not? If no one in a generation had them, we could not say they ought to have had, according to the Lord's words. As "signs," the apostle's words as to one of them might apply to others, or to all, "wherefore tongues are for a sign, not to those that believe, but to those that believe not" (1 Cor. xiv. 22); and if unbelievers ceased, we might even expect that these would cease.

But miracles do not produce faith; though they may produce conviction. Those who "believed in His Name when they saw the miracles that He did," He "did not commit Himself to, because He knew all men, and needed not that any should testify of man, for He knew what was in man" (John ii. 23-25). It was but an intellectual conviction, quite possible to men without divine work at all; so that if this were accomplished—if only the gospel were going out amidst a people who accepted Christianity as true—one still would not expect these signs to follow.

Thus we are brought very near to the actual condition of things that obtains in Christendom to-day. Nor do the Lord's words make that condition a hard matter to reconcile with them. The signs did follow, and fulfilled the object for which they were designed. As Christianity became known, and the truth came to get hearing, the miraculous accompaniments ceased, after the manner of all such whenever their purpose was fulfilled. Miracles have always been temporary, gathering around certain crises in the divine history of mankind, times of special divine intervention, and then passing away; and Christianity is no exception to the rule. As to power for conviction, where the word of God is once fairly before men, the Lord Himself has assured us that, if they believe not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead.

That which comes first among these signs has special significance. Satan had possessed himself of the world largely by means of the religions of men, the perversions of that original worship which through successive generations became ever more corrupt. "The things which the Gentiles sacrifice," says the apostle; "they sacrifice to demons, and not to God" (1 Cor. x. 20). And as in Egypt, when God brought out His people, the delivering judgments fell upon their gods, so now in Christianity. "They shall cast out demons in My Name"

3 (19, 20): The return to God.

3. The Lord, therefore, after he had spoken unto them, was [y] taken up into heaven, and sat down at the right hand of God. And they went forth, and preached everywhere, the Lord [z] working with them and confirming the word with signs following.

[y] Lk. 24.50-53. cf. Eph. 4.8-10.
[z] cf. Acts 3. 13 with Heb. 2. 4. cf. 2 Tim. 4. 16, 17.

is the proclamation of Christ's supremacy over the religious rulers of the heathen world.

The gift of new tongues was grace surmounting the judgment of Babel, while yet the primitive "one speech and one language" could not be restored.

The taking up of serpents and the innocuousness of any deadly draught would fence round life from the insidious attack of the destroyer; while the miraculous healings were a manifestation of power over the power of death in others. All together testified to the Lord's victory over Satan, over death, and over sin: for sin was that which gave power to both death and Satan. Nothing could affect these which had not gone to the bottom of the question of sin.

Thus, then, were the messengers of salvation equipped for their work.

3. And now, His end achieved, the shadow taken from the face of God, the sanctuary opened to all seekers of Him, the Servant-Son returns up where He was before. But He returns not as He was before. He returns with the humanity that He has taken: sure pledge that though He has changed the sphere of His service, the service itself He has not given up. He takes humanity itself up to the throne of God, and sits down there with it at the right hand of God.

He has been in the lowest place: He receives the highest. It is the same Gospel which fitly shows Him to us in both. The blood of the sin-offering opens the sanctuary; but more, He who has shed it has entered heaven in the power of it; has entered it a Man, and with this link of Manhood connecting Him thus with others who are men, and for whom He offered Himself.

The consequences of this are not pursued in this Gospel. They must be sought in after-communications of divine grace, which has traced for us His path step by step from lowest humiliation to glory, and how we are concerned in every step. The place at the right hand of God is, of course, peculiar to Himself; but not only does His heart still abide with His people here, but His hand also works for them and with them; and thus Mark presents Him at the close as One whose love makes Him still the Servant of man's need. For "they went forth, and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following."

SCOPE AND DIVISIONS OF LUKE.

LUKE'S Gospel gives us "the face of a Man," which naturally connects, therefore, with the numerical place of the Gospel, the number of "manifestation." In no other of the Synoptics are we brought so near God, or is God so unveiled to us, as witness the fifteenth chapter. This connects necessarily with the peace-offering character of Christ's work, the fruit of atonement as seen in the previous Gospels. The shadow is gone from off the face of God.

The "face of a man" goes beyond this, however: for manhood is that which the Son of God has assumed to Himself, not simply to accomplish our redemption, but as for ever the Head of humanity in new creation. All the blessed results are indeed not yet unfolded; but the Person is here who owns and acts towards His people in all the human sympathy and affection of such relationship. His manhood is emphasized in all the reality of weakness and dependence, His birth and childhood, growing in wisdom as in stature, frequent in prayer; amid all, perfect in obedience, a unique spectacle on earth, so that God's "good pleasure in men," of which the angels unjealously speak, is justified and necessitated. Here God and man meet; with blessing for man which fills heart and life with answering praise.

Even from the Cross, as we contemplate it here, the supreme agony is departed. There is no cry of abandonment; "My God!" is exchanged for "Father." He prays for His murderers; He gives peace to the dying sinner at His side. Salvation is an accomplished thing throughout the book; grace, peace, remission of sins, are proclaimed everywhere in it.

There are three divisions only:—

1. (Chaps. i.–iv. 13): The unique obedient Man.
2. (Chaps. iv. 14–xviii. 34): A Saviour and His salvation.
3. (Chaps. xviii. 35–xxiv.): Restoration, its hindrances and accomplishment, and the peace-offering work by which man is brought nigh.

NOTES.

Div. 1.

THE Person of the Lord is that which is set before us in the first division: the truth, but also the uniqueness of His manhood, born of a virgin mother by the power of the Spirit of God; unique also in the perfection of that obedience, "tempted in all things as we are, apart from sin." It is evident that this is put before us—the reality of what He is—as neither of the previous Gospels develops it. Matthew dwells rather upon His dignity as the Ruler of the people of God. Mark declares Him to be the Son of God, but passes on then immediately to His service, speaking neither of His birth nor human parentage save incidentally at an after-time. John dwells upon His deity, the Word made flesh, the Only-begotten of the Father, where He has no brethren. All in it speaks of contrast rather than human kinship, though Man He truly is. But Luke presents the First-born, which of necessity implies brethren,—the One born of the Spirit, as we are new-born of the Spirit: an immense difference, surely, but which yet gives the connection declared by the apostle (Heb. ii. 11), that "both He that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one: for which cause," he adds, "He is not ashamed to call them 'brethren.'"

The link is not between the Lord as Man and men in general. It was not true as some say, that in becoming Man He became flesh of our flesh and bone of our bone. It is we, His people, who are flesh of His flesh and bone of His bone (Eph. v. 30). For this also death had to come in: for "except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die it abideth alone" (John xii. 24); and it was in the deep sleep fallen upon Adam, the image of such death-sleep, that Eve was taken out of his side (Gen. ii. 21–23).

Thus it is the Sanctifier and the sanctified that are all of one; and yet here also, as already said, there is a difference that is of immense importance. Truly Man as Christ was, and even the Son of man, the power of the Spirit preserved that pure humanity which He took in the virgin's womb from the slightest taint or consequence of evil. Naturally, He was only "that Holy Thing," a "Second Man," unfallen; and more, by virtue of His divine nature, never separable from His humanity, "of heaven" (1 Cor. xv. 47)—a heavenly Man.

We must remember, however, that for the doctrine of all this we must go beyond Luke, and indeed, gather from Scripture generally. As we do so, the gospel of the Manhood will more and more reveal to us the Person about whom these texts and truths gather in a constantly increasing radiance of glory. For Scripture has its central theme in Him, even as "all things were created by Him and for Him." His word is as His work, in all parts testifying to Himself.

Luke shows us the perfect Man, welcoming the searching eyes of a hostile world to prove Him; challenging those who gladly would, to find Him aught but the unblemished One; while God commits Himself to Him absolutely as the One in whom He has found His perfect satisfaction and delight. Yet He is not only in the flesh, but "in the likeness of sinful flesh" (Rom. viii. 3). He is in wilderness circumstances, "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief;" never sheltering Himself, by the power of the divinity that was in Him, from the common lot of men; never pleading the exemption due to His perfection, from any trial known to man; nay, upon a path which led ever downwards to the lowest humiliation, to death and the place of the Cross. All this was made the means of the fullest possible display of an obedience to God which had no limit, —of a love which Godward was the spring of such obedience, to men an unreserved devotedness: "the good Shepherd," laying down His life for the sheep.

These sheep are wanderers, and He must seek them, if they are to be His own. They must be won out of the ways of sin, made to know His voice, the work of His love done in them. Thus He is the Sanctifier; thus they are sanctified. And this work is shown in Luke as in neither of the former Gospels, though it could not, of course, be omitted in any. But with "Luke, the be-

LUKE.

DIVISION 1. (Chaps. i.–iv. 13.)

The Unique Obedient Man.

SUBDIVISION 1. (Chap. i.)

Divine promise fulfilling in sovereign grace.

1 (1–4): The purpose: certainty by sufficient knowledge.

1. FORASMUCH as [a]many have taken in hand to draw up a narrative concerning the things fulfilled among us, as they [b]handed them down to us who from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word, it seemed good to me also, having traced all things accurately from the first, to write loved physician," the remedy for the sin-sick souls must needs have a great place; and so will any acquaintance with the blessed book before us realize it to have in it abundantly the revelation of God's method with all spiritual diseases: the voice of recall and recovery to God sounds everywhere through it.

[a] Matt. 1. 1. Mk. 1. 1. Jno. 1. 1. cf. Acts 1. 1.

[b] Heb. 2. 3, 4. cf. 1 Jno. 1. 1. cf. Acts 1. 21, 22.

SUBD. 1.

In the first subdivision we find the events immediately preceding and in relation with the birth of Christ. In them, in the midst of the ruin in which Israel is found (and Israel is but what man is: there is no exceptional betterness that can be claimed for any), God is seen working in pursuance of long-declared purposes, and in sovereign grace. The names of two of those who come before us in the first place in this account are highly significant in this respect. The first is Zacharias, "Jah has remembered"; his wife's name is Elisabeth, the same as Elisheba, "God has sworn." And in his song of praise Zacharias puts these things together. "Blessed be the Lord"—or Jehovah (of which Jah is a contracted form)—"for He has wrought redemption . . . to remember His holy covenant: the oath that He sware to our father Abraham." Thus is He declared, then, to be acting here.

Thus the spring of all blessing is in God Himself, who from the beginning has pledged Himself in His grace to men, that they might know and so have confidence in it. Thus the New Testament begins for us, with its roots in the Old, new indeed in the fulness of its blessing. He comes who is to bring in the blessing, into whose hands all that concerns human interests and the glory of God can be entrusted without fear. Yet it is Man that is to undertake for man: the Seed of the woman is to bruise the serpent's head; Man is to glorify God where man has dishonored Him; and goodness is to triumph, not by other might but by its own.

1. The introduction to the Gospel is remarkable as showing the unity of thought that runs through the book, even in parts where naturally we should not expect it. Luke's is the Gospel of the Manhood; and "the face of a man" greets us in the opening lines. The human purpose is accomplished in a thoroughly human way, and without the claim of anything more than human. Others have taken in hand to put forth narratives of the events which have been fulfilled among men of late, and which have been handed down to them by eye-witnesses who were also specially accredited as ministers of the Word. The attempts themselves show the desirability of giving permanent form to what as tradition was liable so soon to change and to perversion. The writer had given special attention to this subject, and had traced out all things accurately from the first. He writes therefore to his brother-Christian Theophilus, that he might have certainty about the things in which as a Christian he had been instructed.

unto thee in order, most noble Theophilus, that thou mightest [c]know the certainty of those things wherein thou hast been instructed.

[c] cf. Jno. 20. 29-31. cf. 2 Pet. 1. 16.

He claims no commission from the Lord to write his Gospel. He sees a want existing which he is competent to supply, and he supplies it. He does not even speak or think apparently of writing for the Church as a whole, or what would meet the general need. It is for Theophilus. He says nothing of inspiration. Divine love in him sets him to do what he can to establish in the faith one in whom he is interested; and in result he has written what the whole Church has owned to be of God for all.

It is a beautiful example of how naturally the Spirit of God works, or may work, in what we term inspiration. The instrument He uses is not like a mere pen in the hand of another. He is a man acting freely—for "where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty"—as if from his own heart and mind alone. He uses all the means he has got, and uses them diligently. You are quite prepared to find in his work the character of the writer: why should not He who has prepared the instrument, use it according to the quality of that which He has prepared? Why should He set aside the mind which He has furnished, any more than the affections of the heart which He has endowed? Why, too, should He who fed the multitudes from the loaves and fishes already provided, set aside what the zeal and diligence of the disciple had "accurately traced out"? It was that before-made provision which the Lord blessed and which common men after their own fashion distributed; and who shall tell us just what it was, wondrous as was the change, that the blessing of the Lord had added to it?

The Author of nature is not jealous of nature: He is Lord of it. Amid laws that He has imposed on it, He moves freely, working His own will, so that we are apt to ask, Where is He? when we should ask, Where is He not? And, even when the greatness of the work accomplished demonstrates that here is the Almighty Worker, we look at the ease and simplicity of the accomplishment, and wonder how can it be He?

This is the lesson of Luke's introduction; so suited as an introduction to the One who comes to us with the face of a Man, and speaks to us with a human tongue. As is He, so is His word: in which also the human element misread has been made to banish or diminish the divine; to put God into the distance, instead of bringing Him completely nigh.

Luke says nothing explicitly of inspiration; but he knows the power of what he has to communicate to give certainty as to the Christian verities: a certainty which clearly neither tradition for more than a first generation or so could give, nor an inaccurate, however well-intentioned, account of them. This is the ground of his own writing: he has traced out "accurately" all things from the first. How short a time it was that this tradition had existed! Luke was himself the companion of Paul the apostle; yet already it was needful to take measures for giving a settled form to it, and trace out things accurately. We can see that he has not claimed as much as he has really done: for he has given us one part of a fourfold history of Christ, furnishing together what we need to know of Him in all His various value for the soul. He has pictured for us among these the Man, Christ Jesus, distinct from all other views, yet absolutely accordant; pursuing the line of truth entrusted to him with a simplicity of purpose which moulds every part of his Gospel; while the fulness of divine grace in it speaks and will ever speak as from the full heart of God to men.

One thing we must add to this, which naturally connects with it, that we have in Luke the first and only Gentile writer, that we are aware of, in the Bible; and that he writes to Theophilus, evidently another Gentile; by the title of "most noble" applied to him, as to Festus by the apostle (Acts xxvi. 25), still or recently in some similar position of honor. Thus the gospel was going out among the heathen while Israel had turned the back upon it. Here was grace indeed in its fullest expression; and it is characteristic of what is presented to us here.

2 (5-25): The angel's message: the Saviour's herald.

1 (5-7): righteous but barren.

2 (8-11): the angel's visit.

3 (12-17): fulfillment of prayer: John filled with the Holy Spirit.

2. [1] There was in the days of [d]Herod, the king of Judea, a certain priest named Zacharias, of the [e]course of Abia; and he had a wife of the daughters of Aaron, and her name was Elisabeth. And they were both [f]righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless. And they had no child, because Elisabeth was [g]barren, and they were both advanced in years.

[2] And it came to pass, as he fulfilled his priestly service before God in the order of his course, according to the custom of the priesthood his lot was to enter into the temple of the Lord and burn [h]incense. And all the multitude of people were praying [i]without at the hour of incense. And there appeared unto him an [j]angel of the Lord, standing at the right side of the altar of incense.

[3] And when Zacharias saw him, he was troubled, and [k]fear fell upon him. But the angel said unto him, Fear not, Zacharias: for thy [l]prayer is heard, and thy wife Elisabeth shall bear thee a son, and thou shalt call his

d Matt. 2. 1.
e 1 Chron. 24. 10.
f cf. Gen. 7. 1. cf. Ps. 32. 11. cf. Ps. 15.
g cf. Gen. 16. 1. cf. Gen. 25. 21. cf. Gen. 29. 31. cf. 1 Sam. 1. 2, 5.
h 1 Chron. 24. 19. cf. Ex. 30. 1-10.
i cf. Lev. 9. 23. cf. Num. 6. 22-27.
j cf. Matt. 1. 20. cf. Matt. 2. 13, 19. cf. vers. 26, etc. cf. ch. 2. 9, 10, 13.
k ver. 29; cf. Mk. 16. 8.
l cf. Acts 10. 4; cf. 1 Sam. 1. 11, 20, 26-28.

2. [1] The history opens with what is highly significant. Zacharias is a priest, of the course of Abiah, in the days of Herod the king, and his wife is of the daughters of Aaron, and her name is Elisabeth. All is outwardly in order, though the days are evil days in Israel, as the name of Herod stamps them sufficiently. Yet the priests serve in their courses in the temple, according to what David had established, Zacharias being of the course of Abiah, "my Father is Jah," significantly, the eighth course. Not only this, they are both righteous before God, blamelessly walking in the commandments and ordinances of the Lord. They are advanced in years, however, and without children: Elisabeth ("God's oath") is barren.

The whole is a picture of Israel, the priestly nation, not at its worst but at its best, as seen in a remnant, such as God's grace always maintained there, but which, under law dispensationally, could not inherit the promises. Nevertheless Jah could remember His oath, but only through the Kinsman Redeemer now to arise, and of whom the Gospel of Luke speaks.

[2] Zacharias comes, then, in the order of his course into the temple, his lot being to burn incense when he went in. The lot is the expression of the sovereign will of God, which in man's extremity has ever been his resource. Incense is the fragrance of Christ to God: not perhaps of atonement, but rather of Christ personally. And this is what is in view here. By and by it will be seen that atonement must be by His blood, and types and prophecies had long since declared this; yet in fact, historically when He did come the necessity of His death was kept much in the back-ground. Even the Baptist's pointing to the Lamb of God would seem from his after questions not to have been to himself so clear as we should naturally imagine it must have been. In general, at least, the reserve at first seems to be unquestionable: the incense came before the blood; as on the day of atonement it did also.

Zacharias, then, at the incense-altar sees the angel of the Lord. He stands at the right side of the altar—the right hand of power: for the power of that of which the altar speaks is with him: his visit is, as we see immediately, the expression of the sweet savor of Christ to God.

[3] Yet fear falls upon Zacharias: alas, this cannot surprise us; we are but too well accustomed to such misinterpretations of divine goodness on the part of His own. God means us good, and we charge Him with evil. Through lack of name [m]John. And thou shalt have joy and gladness, and many shall [n]rejoice at his birth. For he shall be [o]great in the sight of the Lord, and he shall [p]drink neither wine nor strong drink; and he shall be [q]filled with the Holy Spirit, even from his mother's womb. And many of the sons of Israel shall he [r]turn to [the] Lord their God. And he shall [s]go before him in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of fathers to children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just, to make [t]ready a people prepared for [the] Lord.

4 (18-23): the failure of unbelief.

18 And Zacharias said unto the angel, [u]Whereby shall I know this? for I am an old man, and my wife advanced in years. And the angel answered and said to him, I am Gabriel, who stand in the [v]presence of God; and I have been sent to speak to thee, and to bring thee these glad tidings. And behold thou shalt be [w]silent, and not able to speak until the day in which these things shall come to pass, because thou believedst not my words, which shall be fulfilled in their season. And the people were waiting for Zacharias, and wondered at his delaying in the temple. But when he came out he could not speak to them. And they perceived that he had seen a vision in the temple; and he kept making signs to them and remained dumb. And it came to pass, as soon as the days of his service were completed, he departed to his house.

5 (24, 25): the effect of being with God.

24 Now after these days Elisabeth his wife conceived, and hid herself five months, saying, Thus hath [the] Lord done to me in the days wherein he looked on me, to [x]take away my reproach among men.

3 (26-56): The revelation of the Holy One.

1 (26-38): the first announciation.

26 Now in the sixth month, the angel Gabriel was sent

m vers. 60-63. cf. ver. 31.
n vers. 58, 67-79. cf. Ps. 32.5, 11.
o cf. Matt. 11. 7-11.
p cf. Matt. 11. 18. cf. Num. 6. 1-8. cf. Judg. 13. 4, 5.
q cf. vers. 41, 67. cf. Acts 2. 4. etr. Eph. 1. 13.
r Mal. 4. 5, 6.
s cf. Mk. 1. 2, 3.
t cf. ch. 3. 1-17. cf. Acts 19. 4.
u cf. Gen. 18. 12. cf. Gen. 15. 8, etc.
v Dan. 8. 16. Dan. 9. 21. cf. Ps. 103. 20.
w cf. Ezek. 3. 26. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 13.
x Gen. 30. 23. cf. Is. 4. 1.

being perfected in the lesson of His love, the fear which has torment takes possession of us. How often has He to say to us, "Fear not," when He is about to give us perhaps the very blessing we have long sought.

So is it at least with Zacharias: the angel has to tell him that his prayer is heard, and a son is to be born to him; a rejoicing not to himself only but to many: for he comes, filled with the Spirit, to turn many to God in Israel, going before Him in the spirit and power of Elias, to make ready for the Lord a people.

18 But Zacharias, though fearing God, is but too much after the pattern of his generation, and seeking a sign to satisfy him of what an angel has been sent from God to declare, gets the sign in his own person, being made dumb until the fulfilment of the angel's words. Thus also the priestly office has failed in Israel, her oracle is silent, her witness is that of judgment upon herself. The multitudes gaze upon her, only to behold her dumb: till by and by her season is fulfilled, and "God's oath" is no longer barren.

24 In the consciousness that God is taking away her reproach Elisabeth hides herself. It is in this way that grace works. If God is with one, and this is known aright, it will not exalt but humble. Nothing, indeed, will duly humble but His presence: in the light of this who can exalt oneself?

26 The angel Gabriel* is sent from God in the sixth month (of Elisabeth's pregnancy) with a more important message. Heaven, after the long silence of from God to a city of Galilee named [y]Nazareth, to a [z]virgin espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the [a]house of David, and the virgin's name was Mary. And the angel came in to her and said, Hail, thou [b]favored one! the Lord is with thee: [blessed art thou among women.*] But she was [c]troubled at that saying, and reasoned in her mind what kind of salutation this might be. And the angel said unto her, Fear not, Mary, for thou hast found favor with God; and behold, [d]thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and shalt bear a son, and shalt [e]call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the [f]Son of the Highest; and [the] Lord God shall give unto him the [g]throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for the ages; and of his [h]kingdom there shall be no end. But Mary said unto the angel, How shall this be, since I know not a man? And the angel answered and said unto her, [The] [i]Holy Spirit shall come upon thee, and power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: wherefore also the Holy Thing that shall be born shall be called [the] [j]Son of God. And behold, Elisabeth thy kinswoman, she also hath conceived a son in her old age, and this is the sixth month with her that was called barren: for [k]nothing shall be impossible with God. And Mary said, Behold the handmaid of the Lord: [l]be it unto me according to thy word. And the angel departed from her.

*Gabriel means the "might of the Mighty One."

* Omitted by some of the oldest MSS.

y Matt.2.23.
z Matt.1.18, 23.
a *cf.*Matt.1. 20. cf. Rom. 1. 3.
b ver. 42. cf. Judg. 5. 24. *cf.*ch.11.27, 28.
c ver. 12. cf. Is. 66. 2. d cf. Is. 7.14.
e Matt. 1.21, ch. 2. 21.
f cf. ch. 3.23, 38. *cf.*Rom.1.4. cf. Jno. 9. 35-38.
g Ps. 132.11. cf. 1 Ki. 8. 25. cf. Is. 9.6,7. cf. Jer. 23. 5, 6.
h cf. Ps. 72. 5-8, 17. *cf.*Ps.89.36. cf. Mi. 4. 7.
i Matt. 1.20. cf. Lev.2.4.
j ver. 32. *cf.*Heb.1.2.
k *cf.*Gen.18. 13. cf. Jer. 32. 17, 27. cf. Rom. 4. 21.
l cf. 1 Sam. 25. 41. ver. 45.

centuries, is once again communicative, and in Luke in a more familiar way than Matthew, where it is Joseph who receives the messages, but in a dream. Here we have open face to face speech, and the most important not in the temple, but in a private dwelling. God is coming near in His grace; and always the nearer He comes the more fully He reveals Himself.

Not only is the angel's mission now not to the temple nor to Jerusalem, it is to Galilee of the Gentiles, and to Nazareth, to a virgin espoused to a man named Joseph, of the fallen house of David: the virgin's name is Mary, or Miriam ("exalted"). All is in ruin here, when God comes in to revive and raise to higher glory.

By the favor of God she is to have a Son, who will be called the Son of the Most High, and, through her the Son of David, shall receive His father's throne, but with unending empire. Then, in answer to Mary's question, it is declared that the Holy Spirit should come upon her, and power of the Highest overshadow her, so that the Holy Thing born should be called the Son of God. This is not, then, the truth of incarnation declared, though, of course, in perfect accordance with it; it is that of a Man born by divine intervention, without human father,—Son of God, but as Man. And this is Luke's theme: it is the Gospel of the Manhood.

Son of man, He is yet a Second Man, a Man without taint of the fall: a new Adam we cannot speak of as yet; for to this two things are needed, which are not as yet brought out: His full, proper Deity, and His atonement. We have had both, of course, in the previous Gospels: we shall find them all, I think, for the first time connected in the Gospel of John.

Mary yields herself to the Lord's will; and the angel departs from her.

2 (39-45): the confirmation.

39 And Mary arose in those days, and went into the hill-country with haste, to a city of Judah, and entered 40 into the house of Zacharias, and [m] saluted Elisabeth.
41 And it came to pass, as Elisabeth heard the salutation of Mary, the babe leaped in her womb; and Elisabeth 42 was [n] filled with [the] Holy Spirit; and cried out with a loud voice, and said, [o] Blessed art thou among women, and blessed the fruit of thy womb. And whence is this 43 to me, that the mother of my [p] Lord should come unto me? for behold, as the voice of thy salutation sounded 44 in mine ears, the babe [q] leaped in my womb with joy.
45 And [r] blessed is she that believed: for there shall be an accomplishment of those things that have been spoken to her from [the] Lord.

3 (46-56): the realization and praise.
(A) Power in grace.
(a) whole-hearted praise.
(b) the low estate regarded.

46 And [s] Mary said:
My soul doth [t] magnify the Lord;
47 and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my [u] Saviour:
48 For he hath regarded the [v] low estate of his handmaiden;
for, behold, from henceforth [w] all generations shall call me blessed:

m cf. Mal.3. 16. cf. Ps. 16. 3.
n cf. vers.15, 67.
o cf. ver. 28.
p cf. ver. 47. cf. Col.1.18.
q cf. Jno. 3. 29. cf. Ps. 8. 2.
r ver. 38. cf. Ps. 2. 12. cf. Heb. 11. 6. s cf.1 Sam.2. 1-10 cf.vers. 67-79.
t cf. Ps. 34. 2, 3. cf.Ps.69.30.
u cf.Matt.1. 21. cf. Acts 4. 12. cf.Matt.12. 46-50.
v cf. 2 Sam. 7. 18-20. Ps. 138. 6.
w vers. 28, 42; cf. Acts 1. 14; cf. Matt. 26. 13.

[2] Before departing, however, he has referred her to Elisabeth, as a sign of the power of God at work, to which nothing is impossible; and Mary, who has asked for no sign to be given her, yet "drinks of the brook in the way," and goes "with haste," as one feeling the weight of what had been communicated to her, to seek refreshment in the company of her kinswoman, linked with her as she is in faith, and now by this new work of God which is beginning to accomplish the long looked for blessing. She enters the house of Zacharias and salutes Elisabeth.

Here the tender mercy of God meets her with a surprise. When Elisabeth hears the salutation of Mary, the very babe within her leaps for joy, and the Spirit fills her at once with divine intelligence. She cries out to her, "Blessed art thou among women," repeating the words of the angel* which had been matter of wonderment to her before. She adds, "And blessed is the fruit of thy womb;" and then expressly addresses her as the mother of her Lord, at whose voice the babe had leaped in her womb for joy. Blessed, she declares her to be also, in the faith which had received the divine message; and there would be an accomplishment of that which had been spoken to her from the Lord,—from Jehovah.†

[3] Thus, if the unbelief of Zacharias meets with rebuke, though tender rebuke, from God, the faith of Mary receives abundant encouragement. Her heart overflows as she realizes the grace that has made her answer to her name, and she pours out her soul in a song of praise which reflects much that of Hannah (1 Sam. ii. 1–10). It is in fact largely an Old Testament strain, a psalm such as might well become a daughter of David; only with the new gladness of the promises to the fathers being just fulfilled, a covenant going back of Moses to Abraham and his Seed: a ground of blessing to all the families of the earth.

There are three parts; the first of which speaks of the power of God which has intervened in grace to deliver and bless with a blessing that shall resound

* If the majority of the MSS. have here preserved the text; and one does not see why, upon such an occasion as the present, the repetition of the words should not have been intended as divine comfort and strength for Mary.

† Wherever "Lord" is without the article in the Greek, or bracketed in the text here, it stands for Jehovah in the Hebrew, which in the Greek Septuagint is always "Lord."

(c) His holiness.
(d His mercy.
(E) Reversals.
(a) might against pride.
(b) high and low.
(c) the filled and the full.
(C) God's remembrance.

For he that is mighty hath done for me [x]great things;
and [y]holy is his name.
And his [z]mercy is to generations and generations,—
to them that fear him.
He hath showed [a]strength with his arm:
he hath [b]scattered the haughty in the thought of their heart;
He hath [c]put down rulers from thrones,
and exalted the lowly.
He hath filled the [d]hungry with good things;
and the [e]rich he hath sent empty away.
He hath helped Israel his [f]servant,
in remembrance* of his mercy;
as he [g]spake unto our fathers,
to Abraham and his seed for ever.

And Mary remained with her about three months, and returned to her house.

4 (57–66): The mercy found.

4. Now Elisabeth's time was fulfilled for her to bear; and she [h]brought forth a son. And her neighbors and kindred heard that [the] Lord had magnified his mercy towards her, and they [i]rejoiced with her. And it came to pass on the [j]eighth day that they came to circumcise the child: and they were calling it after his father's name, Zacharias. But his mother answered and said, Nay, but he shall be called [k]John. And they said to her, There is none of thy kindred that is called by this name. And they made signs to his father as to what he would have him called. And he asked for a writing-table, and wrote, saying, His name is John. And they x cf. Ruth. 4. 14-17. cf. Ps. 126.4.

y Ps. 111. 9. cf. Jno. 17. 11.
z Ex. 20. 6. Ps. 103. 17.
a Ps. 98. 1. cf. Ezek. 20. 33, 34.
b Jas. 4. 6. cf. Gen. 11. 4, 8.
c cf. Dan. 2. 21, Ps. 75. 6, 7.
d cf. Matt. 5. 6, cf. ch. 6. 25.
e ch. 6. 24. cf. ch. 18. 23, 24.
f cf. Is. 44. 21.
g Gen. 17. 19. Gen. 26. 24. Gen. 28. 13-15.
h vers. 13, 24.
i ver. 14.
j cf. Gen. 17. 9-14. ch. 2. 21.
k ver. 13. cf. Gen. 17. 19 with Gen. 21. 3.

* Literally: that he might remember.

through following generations. Soul and spirit unite in joy and praise; and the great things done proclaim the holiness of His Name; His mercy is to many generations of those that fear Him.

The second part shows, in view of what the world is, the complete reversal of things when God comes in. The pride of man is smitten down before Him; rulers are put down from their thrones, and the lowly exalted, the hungry are filled and the rich sent empty away.

The third part gives the blessed fact in which all this is realized. God has remembered His promises to the fathers, seemingly so long forgotten,—mercies only, for Israel's utter failure could allow no possible claim. All the more did they witness to what was in Him, and so could not fail. The help come to Israel was indeed but what enclosed a purpose of wider blessing which the promise to Abraham unconditionally declared.

For in fact the Christ of Israel is the Son of man; the Seed of the woman bruises the serpent's head; life, righteousness and sanctification are in Him who (crucified through weakness) is the wisdom of God and the power of God by grace through faith alike for all.

4. And now, Elisabeth's full time having come, she brings forth the promised son. Her neighbors and kindred come round her, hearing of the Lord's mercy, and rejoice with her. Upon the circumcising of the child on the eighth day the name was given, as then he came into covenant place and privilege; and the friends propose for the son of Zacharias his father's name. But the mother says, "Nay, but he shall be called John," and the father, when appealed to, confirms all wondered. And his [t]mouth was opened immediately, and his tongue [loosed], and he spake, blessing God. And [m]fear came upon all who dwelt round about them; and in all the hill-country of Judea all these things were spoken about. And all that heard them laid them up in their heart, saying, What then shall this child be? for the [n]hand of [the] Lord also was with him.

5 (67-80): God with Israel.

1 (67-75): His faithfulness.

(a) Jehovah, the God of Israel.

(b) the Saviour.

(c) fulfilment of the prophets.

5. And Zacharias his father was [o]filled with the Holy Spirit, and prophesied, saying,

[p]Blessed be [the] Lord, the God of Israel;
for he hath [q]visited and wrought redemption for his people;
And he hath raised up a [r]horn of salvation for us,
in the house of his servant [s]David:
As he [s]spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, from of old,
salvation from our [u]enemies,
and out of the hand of all that hate us:
To work [v]mercy with our fathers,
and [w]remember his holy covenant:
the [x]oath that he sware to our father Abraham,
That he would give us, [y]without fear, [z]delivered from the enemies' hand, to serve him,
in [a]piety and righteousness before him, all our days.
And thou, child, shalt be called the [b]prophet of the Highest:
for thou shalt [c]go before the face of [the] Lord, to prepare his ways:
To give [d]knowledge of salvation unto his people,
by the remission of their sins;

(d) the mercy at last experienced.

(e) way and end.

2 (76-80): the herald of salvation.

(a) the forerunner.

(b) the ministry of salvation.

t ver. 20. cf. Ezek. 24. 27. cf. Ezek. 33. 22.
m cf. ch. 5. 26.
n cf. Ezek. 37. 1. cf. Gen. 39. 2.
o cf. vers. 41, 46-55.
p 1 Chron. 29. 10, 20. cf. 2 Chron. 6. 4.
q cf. Gen. 50. 24. cf. Ex. 3. 16. cf. Jer. 29. 10. cf. Zech. 10. 3. cf. ch. 7. 16.
r cf. Ezek. 29. 21. cf. Ps. 132. 17.
s cf. Ps. 89. 20-29. cf. Acts 13. 34.
t cf. Is. 11. 1, etc. cf. Jer. 23. 5, 6. cf. Ezek. 37. 24. cf. Mi. 5. 2.
u cf. Ps. 18, title; cf. Ps. 72. 4.
v Ps. 67. 1, etc.
w cf. Gen. 9. 15. Ps. 98. 3. cf. Is. 63. 11.
x Gen. 22. 16.

cf. Heb. 6. 17, 18. y cf. Ex. 20. 18-21 with Rom. 8. 15. z ver. 71; Ps. 44. 5, 7. a Ps. 96. 9; cf. Zech. 14. 20, 21. b Matt. 11. 5; Matt. 14. 5. c ch. 3. 4. d cf. Jno. 4. 22; cf. Acts 13. 38, 39.

this. Immediately his mouth is opened and his tongue loosed; and he speaks out, blessing God. Thus too will Israel when she has learnt to call the offspring of her old age "the grace of Jehovah," find her tongue loosed, and bless God. And the hand of Jehovah will again be with the remnant that He has raised up.

5. The prophecy of Zacharias, filled with the Spirit, celebrates, as has been already said, Jehovah's remembrance of the covenant oath. The first part declares His faithfulness in this: He has become once more the God of Israel, as redemption witnesses. A horn of salvation, a Saviour, has been raised up in the house of David, a deliverance from all their enemies, that thus delivered they may serve Him without fear, in piety and righteousness.

The second part is more evangelic; and John appears in it as more than the austere messenger of repentance. He is the fore-runner of Jehovah Himself, to prepare His ways; to give the knowledge of salvation to His people by the remission of their sins. This is quite according to the character of the peace-offering Gospel; and it is striking to find it at the very beginning. God is manifested thus in the tenderness of His compassion, in which the dayspring from on high chases away the shades of night where men sit hopeless, and guides the feet into the way of peace.

Thus the unbelief which had clouded Zacharias' vision in the temple disappears, and the blessing of the people, which had been hindered by the chasten-

(c) the dayspring from on high.

(d) to guide in the way.

On account of the tender* mercy of our God,
wherein the [c]dayspring from on high hath visited us,
To shine upon those sitting in [e]darkness and the shadow of death,
to guide our feet into the way of peace.

And the child [g]grew and waxed strong in spirit, and was in the deserts until the [h]time of his showing forth to Israel.

[c] cf. 2 Sam. 23. 4. cf. Mal. 4. 2.
[e] cf. Is. 9. 2. cf. Matt. 4. 15, 16.
[g] cf. ch. 2. 40.
[h] ch. 3. 1, 2.

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chap. ii.)

A Saviour, and a testimony to Him.

1 (1-7): His birth in Bethlehem ordered of God acting through the throne of the world.

1. NOW it came to pass in those days that a [i]decree went out from Cæsar Augustus, that a census should be made of all the habitable [earth]. The census itself first took place when Cyrenius was governor of Syria. And all went to be enrolled, [j]every one to his own city. Now Joseph also went up from Galilee out of the city Nazareth into Judea, to the [k]city of David which is called Bethlehem, because he was of the house and family of David, to be enrolled with Mary, his [l]espoused, who was great with child. And it came to pass while they were there, that the days were fulfilled for her to bring forth; and she [m]brought forth her first-

[i] cf. Jno. 19. 11.
[j] cf. Josh. 24. 28.
[k] 1 Sa. 16. 1. Jno. 7. 42.
[l] ch. 1. 27.
[m] Matt. 1. 23, 25.

* Gk., "bowels of mercy."

ing hand upon him, is restored and multiplied. Indeed it seems as if now Israel's full blessing were at hand: as it was really, if only they had heart for it. Who could imagine that their own refusal was to put away from them for now nearly two millennia what was then close at hand? Yet come it shall, for God has promised it; and its coming cannot surely be much longer delayed.

SUBD. 2.

As compared with Matthew—the only other Gospel which gives at all the circumstances of His birth or infancy—the account of the Lord's coming into the world is clearly in keeping with the Gospel of the Manhood. There is no incident that the two have in common, and each maintains its own character with the most perfect consistency. In the one the Gentile magi may come to do homage to a King of the Jews; in the other, to shepherds in the field heaven opens to announce a Saviour. The testimony of Simeon and Anna is also to a Saviour and salvation. His circumcision, and the offerings at His presentation to the Lord, alike show Him to us in the "likeness of sinful flesh"; while His growth and development testify to the verity of His Manhood. These things are in full accord with the truth presented in Luke,—each one being necessary to it.

1. How thorough is the humiliation into which He is come is shown by the circumstances of His birth. Cæsar is lord of the world, and orders it as he will, for his own purposes. How different a world from that which He had made at the beginning; yet He is in it as under Cæsar's rule, Joseph and Mary being brought out of Nazareth to Bethlehem to be enrolled as of David's line. Spite of all this, the power of the world is unconsciously working to fulfil a prophecy concerning One it knows not; and this being accomplished, the design drops through as if it had never been: "the census itself first took place when Cyrenius (or Quirinus) was governor of Syria"—some years afterward.

Thus the Lord of all is born a Man, among men His creatures, and laid in a born son, and wrapped him in swaddling-bands,* and laid him in a manger, because there was "no room for them in the inn.

2 (8-20): The angels' announcement.

2. And there were in the same country °shepherds abiding in the field, and keeping watch over their flock by night. And lo, an ᵖangel of [the] Lord stood by them, and the glory of [the] Lord shone round them, and they were afraid with great fear. And the angel said unto them, ᵠFear not: for behold, I bring to you good tidings of great ʳjoy which shall be to all the people: for there hath been born to you to-day in the city of David a ˢSaviour who is Christ, [the] ᵗLord. And this shall be the sign to you: ye shall find a babe wrapped in swaddling-bands,* and lying in a manger.

And suddenly there was with the angel a "multitude of the heavenly host, praising God and saying, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth "peace, good pleasure in men.†

n cf. Jno. 1. 10, 11. cf. ch.23.18. cf. Phil. 3. 20.
o cf. Ps.78.70-72. cf. Ps. 23.1.
p cf. ch.1.11, 26.
q cf. ch.1.29, 30.
r cf. Zeph.3. 14. cf. Zech. 2. 10.
s Matt. 1.21. cf. Is. 63. 1, 8, 9.
t cf. Jno. 1. 41, 49. cf. 1 Cor.12. 3. cf. Acts 2. 36.
u Ps. 148.2. Rev. 5. 11.
v cf. Job 38. 7. cf. ch.19.38. cf. Ex. 15.1. cf. Rev. 5. 13, 14.
w cf. Ps. 72. 2, 3; cf. Is. 52.7; cf. Col.1.20; cf. Eph. 2. 17.

* Or, "enswathed him," one word in the Gk.
† Some of the earlier MSS. read, "among men of good pleasure."

manger, because there is no room for them in the inn. Sad sign, surely, of men's condition, when their Maker, come to be their Saviour, prophesied of in every particular as coming, heralded even now by angelic visitation, could come after all unnoticed and unknown!

2. As already said, in Luke the announcement is, not of a King of the Jews, but of a Saviour; and it is not to the great or wise, but "to the poor the gospel is preached." To shepherds keeping watch over their flocks, the news is brought of the Good Shepherd who goeth after that which is lost; and here it is not a star in the heavens that is the sign, but heaven itself opens, and the angels bring a direct face to face message, while the glory of the Lord shines round about. Good tidings of great joy there are for all the people: a Saviour who is Christ the Lord. And now there is a sign: what is it? Not a sign in heaven, but a little babe, and wrapped in swaddling clothes. Not in a king's palace, but lying in a manger!

How unlike are the thoughts of God to those of men! The Deliverer is a Son of man; nay, the Seed of the woman. Divine power has clothed itself in weakness to accomplish that for which mere power was not competent: for the battle here is not to the strong; an infant bound in swaddling-bands is no symbol of strength, nor a manger that of favoring circumstances, but the very opposite. Still, in such a conflict as is here impending, difficulties may be used to manifest the overcomer, as darkness to bring out the stars. And in a world ruled by God, there must after all be victory in goodness, which the stripping off of mere strength may make plain; nay, the accumulation of all that we conceive as power on the opposite side.

This little babe brings out the praise of angels, if the earth is silent and asleep. The hosts of heaven praise on man's behalf, and with a fuller praise than when, at creation first, "all the sons of God shouted for joy:" "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good pleasure in men."

Sin has dishonored God, and thus introduced conflict where all was harmony. Man, the image of God, set over all else on earth, has fallen lower than was possible for the beast, and after centuries of trial has only demonstrated the impossibility of self-recovery. The first man has had children in his own image, himself repeated in every one of them but too faithfully. But now, at last, there is a Second Man. At last God is glorified in the scene of His dishonor,

And it came to pass, as the angels departed from them into heaven, that the shepherds said one to another, Let us go now as far as Bethlehem, and see this thing that hath come to pass, which the Lord hath made known to us. And they came with haste, and found both Mary and Joseph, and the babe lying in the manger. Now, when they had seen it, they [x]made known* about that which had been spoken to them concerning this child; and all who heard it [y]wondered at the things which had been spoken to them by the shepherds. But Mary [z]kept all these things and pondered them in her heart. And the shepherds returned, glorifying and praising God for all that they had heard and seen, as it had been spoken to them.

3 (21-39): The testimony of the Spirit, on His presentation to the Lord. 1 (21-24): the Obedient One, according to the law, and First-born.

3. [1] And when [a]eight days were fulfilled for circumcising him, his name was called Jesus; which was so called by the angel before he was conceived in the womb.

x cf. Matt.2. 10, 11. cf. Mal.3.16.

y cf. ch.1.58. cf. Is. 9. 6.

z cf. Gen.37. 11. ver. 51. cf. ch. 1.66.

a Gen.17.12. ch. 1. 59. cf. Col.2.11 -14.

* Some MSS. add, "around."

nay, in a manner which has given heaven itself such a theme of praise as it has never known before. Here is for earth's wounds a healing power, for its conflict peace, if delayed yet assured; and for men more than justification of wisdom's old delight in them. The Second Man becomes the last Adam of a new humanity, the embrace of God for a renewed creation.

So the angels depart, and the shepherds go their way to Bethlehem, to find all as the angels had declared, and to make known to others what they have heard and seen. All who hear it wonder; Mary ponders it in her heart; the shepherds praise and glorify God.

3. After the testimony of angels we have now that of the Spirit of God when Jesus is presented to the Lord: a fitting occasion, and the witness that of One who from the beginning inspired the prophets to speak and write of Him. Besides Simeon and Anna, the types and shadows of the Old Testament find here their suited place, though the Antitype of necessity transcends them all.

[1] First, He is circumcised, and receives at that time the significant name given Him before His birth—that of Jesus. He is afterwards presented to the Lord as a first-born Son, or as the law expresses it, one opening the womb. While next we hear of a sacrifice presented on the part of His mother, as to which He declares in the burnt-offering psalm, "In the volume of the book it is written of Me" (Ps. xl. 7). All this we must briefly look at.

His circumcision, as the apostle says of this, makes Him "debtor to do the whole law" (Gal. v. 3). "When the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth His Son, come of a woman, come under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons" (Gal. iv. 4, 5). He thus pledges Himself to full legal obedience, which on His part is to have no relaxation. To others He is to be the Source of a grace which for Himself He is never to know. And the law itself marks out for Him a special place, apart from all others.

At His circumcision it is that He receives the name of "Jesus" (Jehovah the Saviour) of which it was said, "Thou shalt call His name Jesus: for He shall save His people from their sins" (Matt. i. 21). He comes under the law as the Redeemer from under it.

As such we find Him directly under the law of the first-born, and presented to the Lord. Every first-born son is holy to the Lord, and thus God claims the whole family as His; thus He acknowledges the claim and presents them to Him.

We have already seen what family this is of which He is the First-born. It is not Mary's; though through His mother He may have brethren merely

And when the days of their [b]purification were fulfilled according to the law of Moses, they brought him up to Jerusalem, to present him to the Lord (as it is written in the law of [the] Lord, Every male that openeth the womb shall be called holy to the Lord), and to offer a sacrifice according to that which is said in the law of [the] Lord, a pair of turtle doves or two young pigeons.

2 (25-32): salvation seen.

[2] And behold, there was a man in Jerusalem, whose name was Simeon; and this man was [c]just and pious, waiting for the [d]consolation of Israel; and the Holy Spirit was upon him. And it was divinely shown to him by the Holy Spirit that he should not [e]see death until he had seen [the] Lord's Christ. And he came by the Spirit into the temple; and when the parents brought in the child Jesus, that they might do for him according to the custom of the law, he took him into his arms, and blessed God, and said:—

b Lev. 12. 6-8. Ex. 13. 2. cf. Gal. 4. 4, 5.

c ch. 1. 6. Vers. 36, 38.
d cf. Is. 40. 1. cf. Is. 54. 11-13.
e cf. Mk. 9. 1. cf. Jno. 21. 22. cf. 1 Thess. 4. 17.

human. But the true family must be sons of God, though also human. It is in the very idea, a human family, as He is presented as One opening the womb. On the other hand, the whole human family it is not; while yet again all men are invited and urged to become members of it. Those who do so are thus "sons of God, by faith, in Christ Jesus" (Gal. iii. 26), as He is true Man, and Son of God as Man also.

In Hebrews, in which He is distinctly called "the First-born" (chap. i. 6), occurs the passage in which is affirmed at the same time His kinship with and His great diversity from, those whom, because they are all of one with Him, He is not ashamed to call His brethren (ii. 11). Yet He is the Sanctifier, they are the sanctified; and forasmuch as they are partakers of flesh and blood, He Himself likewise took part in the same (ver. 14); for in all things it behoved Him to be made like unto His brethren, that He might be a merciful and faithful High Priest in things pertaining to God, to make propitiation for the sins of the people (ver. 17, Gk.).

We see, then, what this relationship as First-born involves for Him. He is taking up a path peculiar to Himself. He is acknowledging the claim of God upon that family with which He is in true and abiding relationship, and who are in Him presented to God. But these are sinners: they are those who are to be "sanctified" by Him,—"sanctified," as the epistle itself explains it, "by the offering of the body of Jesus Christ" (ch. x. 10). His priestly work is the offering of Himself (vii. 27). Immediately here, therefore, the shadow of this falls over His path: Mary, His mother, must bring her offering for purification (see Lev. xii., Notes). He is "in the likeness"—only in the likeness, but still that—"of sinful flesh" (Rom. viii. 3). His connection with a human mother brings for Him that shadow which acquired its fullest character, as it found its explanation, in the darkness of the Cross. He touches here the margin of that which He was to know in all its dread reality. For He was to be Himself the sacrifice to put away the shadow, and that how gloriously! shadow dispelling shadow evermore.

The sacrifice here is, as we know, the sacrifice of the poor. It is, at the same time, that which if it does not speak of fullest sacrifice, does surely of the Heavenly One: and the dove or pigeon is the only sacrificial bird required in the law.

[2] It is as thus presented to the Lord that the testimony of the Spirit is given as to Him. We find once again the people who fear God, and with whom the secret of the Lord is, not among the heads of the nation, but little known of men, though in communion with one another as those upon whom the Spirit of

(a) peace from the sovereign act of God. (b) salvation going forth. (c) a revelation of the nations and Israel's glory.

Now, Sovereign Lord, thou [f]art letting thy servant go, according to thy word, in peace:
For mine eyes have [g]seen thy salvation, which thou hast prepared before the face of [h]all the peoples:
A light for revelation of [the] [i]nations,
and the [j]glory of thy people Israel.

2 (33–35): a revelation of the hearts.

[3] And his father and mother were in [k]wonder at the things spoken concerning him. And Simeon blessed them, and said unto Mary his mother, Behold, this [child] is appointed for the [l]fall and rising up of many in Israel, and for a sign spoken against; yea and a [m]sword shall pierce through thine own soul, that the [n]thoughts of many hearts may be revealed.

4 36–39): the widow.

[4] And there was a prophetess, [o]Anna, daughter of f cf. Gen. 46. 30. cf. Phil. 2. 17.

g ch. 3. 6. cf. Lam. 3. 26. cf. Is. 25. 9.
h cf. ver. 10. cf. Gen. 12. 3.
i Is. 49. 6. Is. 60. 1–3. cf. Acts 26. 17, 18.
j cf. Is. 40. 5. cf. 1 Sam. 4. 21, 22.
k cf. Is. 4. 4, 5.
k cf. vers. 18, 19, 48, 51.
l cf. Rom. 9. 32, 33. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 7, 8.
m cf. Jno. 19. 25–27; cf. ch. 24. 21.
n cf. 1 Cor. 1. 23, 24; cf. Matt. 22. 41–46.
o cf. 2 Chron. 34. 22.

God is. Of Simeon we know nothing but his character as just and pious and waiting for the consolation of Israel. It was not merely for his own, even spiritual good: his heart longed for the blessing of the people of God, keenly feeling their condition and what alone could meet it.—Who alone could bring effectual comfort. To him it was given by the Spirit to know that he should not see death till he had seen the Christ, Jehovah's Anointed.

He comes, therefore, into the temple at the time Jesus is brought in, and taking Him into his arms, breaks out in praise. This praise, moreover, goes far beyond the consolation of Israel, while it includes this: for the bud of God's promise has a sweeter, richer unfolding than the promise itself implies. Simeon, no doubt, did not realize all that his words pointed to, and there were still developments to be in the day just dawning.

(a) He begins with what is personal to himself. God is acting in His sovereignty, and he can rejoice: for sovereignty with Him means sovereign goodness; He has fulfilled His word to him, and now he may depart in peace. What, indeed, could man have sought or imagined on God's part so blessed as He has done? Who could have thought of what the Babe in Simeon's arms meant for the heart that could take it in?

(b) Simeon knew, at last, that here was God's salvation. If not as yet wrought out, here was the Worker of it; and his faith did not fail as he contemplated the weakness of those infant hands to which it had been committed. Already his eyes had seen it: a salvation which as such, though it might come from Israel, could not be shut up in Israel; nay, God had prepared it before the face of all the peoples. Could it be less in God's desire than world-wide, with the same need on all sides calling for it?

(c) Israel and the Gentiles must be both in the purpose of God; and so much had the Old Testament already declared should be; but Simeon puts them in another order than the Old Testament. "A light," he says, "for the revelation of the nations:" to bring those that had been hidden, sitting in darkness and the shadow of death, into the light of divine blessing. And then "the glory of Thy people Israel." But this will be more fully declared as we go on.

[3] Simeon does not see the bright side only, nor imagine that even God's message of salvation will be at once welcomed because of the need men have of it. While Joseph and Mary wonder at the things that are spoken of Him, he turns to the mother with the warning of what divine light will reveal as to the hearts of men. The Child was appointed for the fall as well as the rising up of many in Israel, and as a sign—surely the most significant that could be—yet to be spoken against. Yea, a sword would pierce through her own soul also. For the presence of Christ as light would bring all to light.

[4] Anna completes the number of these witnesses. All else have failed with Phanuel, of the tribe of [p]Aser, who was far advanced in years, having lived with a husband seven years from her virginity; and she was a [q]widow of as much as eighty-four years; who departed not from the temple, [r]serving with fastings and prayers night and day. And she, coming in at the same hour, gave thanks to God, and [s]spake of him to all those that looked for redemption in Jerusalem.*

4 (40-52): The ways of the youth of Jesus.

4. And when they had completed all things according to the law of [the] Lord, they [t]returned to Galilee, to their own city Nazareth. And the child [u]grew and waxed strong [in spirit,†] being filled with wisdom, and the favor of God was upon him.

And his parents went to Jerusalem every year at the [v]feast of the passover. And when he was twelve years old, and they had gone up after the custom of the feast, and when they had completed the days, as they returned, the child Jesus remained behind in Jerusalem.

p cf. 2 Chr. 30. 11. cf. Rom. 11. 5.
q cf. 1 Tim. 5. 5. cf. Is. 54. 1.
r cf. Ex. 38. 8. cf. Ps. 27. 4.
s cf. ch. 1. 39, etc. cf. Mal. 3. 16.
t cf. Matt. 2. 19-23. cf. Jno. 1. 46. cf. ch. 4. 16, 22.
u ver. 52. cf. Jno. 1. 14. cf. Jno. 4. 6. cf. Heb. 4. 15.
v Deut. 16. 2. cf. 1 Sam. 1. 24.

*Or "the redemption of Jerusalem." †Omitted by most editors.

her; but she has been brought into the wilderness only that God may speak comfortably to her. She is a true child of Asher, the "happy," and of Phanuel, the "face of God;" her name Anna, "grace," identifying her with the principle of a life like hers, where fastings and prayers are but love's service, and her prophesying the outflow of intercourse with God. A blessed picture! Christ will surely be with such the thanksgiving of the heart, and the theme of the tongue. Already it was so with those who looked for redemption in Jerusalem.

4. The visit of the magi and the consequent flight into Egypt are omitted in this Gospel; on the other hand we have here the only notice of the Lord's youth. It naturally finds its place in the Gospel of the Manhood, being evidently intended to show the truly human development of this. The words are simple and natural, with no pretentiousness of knowledge and yet no plea of ignorance; no apology indeed of any kind; no attempt at explanation or reconciliation. We find in them a true, while yet a perfect Child; growing mentally, just as we have no doubt He grew in body; filled with wisdom, no room in Him for folly at any time: His heart turned constantly to God, and so the favor of God resting ever upon Him. Little do we realize how spiritual aim affects the mental capacity. These points are at the end of the chapter taken up once more and emphasized: "And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and men."

Between these statements we have that story of His youth, which shows what His aim was,—the way in which already, at twelve years old, He was occupied with His Father's business. This was the age at which the Jewish child began to come up to Jerusalem at the festivals; and here for the first time it was, no doubt, that the schools of the greater Rabbis were open to Him. How great must have been the attraction to Him of the teaching and discussions of the spiritual leaders of Israel, with whom He was to be in relations so different at a later time! Thus He remains at Jerusalem, after the company with whom He had been had left it on the return to Galilee, and is found there by Joseph and His mother on the third day "in the temple, sitting in the midst of the teachers, both hearing them and asking them questions. And all that heard Him were astonished at His understanding and answers."

Yet how little did those know Him who should have known Him best upon earth! "And when they saw Him, they were amazed; and His mother"—she who had learnt of Him from angels' lips, and had been pondering in her heart

And his parents knew not of it; but, supposing him to be in the company, they went a day's journey; and they sought him among their kindred and acquaintances: and, not finding him, they turned back to Jerusalem, seeking him. And it came to pass after three days that they found him in the temple, sitting in the midst of the teachers, both hearing them and asking them [w]questions. And all that heard him were astonished at his understanding and answers. And when they saw him they were amazed, and his mother said to him, Child, [x]why hast thou dealt thus with us? behold, thy father and I have sought thee in distress. And he said unto them, Why is it that ye sought me? did ye not know that I ought to be about* my [y]Father's business? And they did not understand the thing he spake to them.

And he went down with them and came to Nazareth, and was [z]subject to them. And his mother [a]kept all these things in her heart. And Jesus [b]increased in wisdom and in stature, and in favor with God and men.

w cf. ver. 52.

x cf. Jno. 2. 3, 4. cfr. ch. 1. 35, 38.

y cf. Heb. 10. 5–10. cf. Jno. 6. 38–40.

z cf. Eph. 6. 1 with 1 Pet. 2. 21.

a ver. 19. cf. Matt. 9. 30.

b ver. 40. cf. 1 Sam. 2. 26.

* Literally "in the things of my Father." Surely not as R. V. "in my Father's house."

so much already—"said to Him, Child, why hast Thou dealt thus with us? behold, Thy father and I have sought Thee in distress." From the mere human side of things that was no wonder; but alas that we should be so much at the mere human side of things! "And He said unto them, Why is it that ye sought Me? did ye not know that I ought to be about My Father's business?" It is strange indeed that any should think that this was His own waking up to such a thought. For in this case how could He speak of it as a strange thing that they should not before have had this thought? On the contrary, it is plain they ought to have understood it from all that they had ever seen of Him. This absolute devotedness had been His "wisdom" ever, only manifested more as His child-life expanded into youth and manhood. Thus this visit to Jerusalem, and to what He afterwards used to call His Father's house, comes in between His earlier and His later life in Nazareth, giving the character of it all, while He filled too His place in that human family life, which was His Father's will for Him, subject to the authority of those who at best knew Him so little. Still His mother kept in her heart and thought upon what was still beyond her, God's favor towards Him more and more manifesting itself as the development went on of that which, for the present, drew out man's favor also. For as yet He had not come forth into that place of public ministry and appeal on God's part which would lead on to His rejection by those after whom in grace He had come, and for one brief, awful moment to the transcendent sorrow of the abandonment of the cross also. But thus were His words to be fulfilled, "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Me" (John xii. 32).

Subd. 3.

We have next, after eighteen years more of silence from that passover at Jerusalem, the manifestation of Christ in the midst of Israel. His forerunner, John, proclaims Him as at hand; then, after His baptism by John, He is borne witness to by the Father's voice from heaven, is openly sealed by the Spirit of God descending in bodily form, like a dove, upon Him; lastly, He is vindicated under trial, tempted by the devil in the wilderness. In all this, Luke follows in the track of the other Synoptic Gospels; although Mark omits the details of the temptation. We shall seek to compare the three accounts as we may be enabled.

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chaps. iii.–iv. 13.)
Manifested and Seated with the Spirit.

1 (iii. 1-14): The way of righteousness: a solitary voice in a barren land.

1. NOW, in the fifteenth year of the [c]government of Tiberius Cæsar, [d]Pontius Pilate being governor of Judæa, and [e]Herod tetrarch of Galilee, but [f]Philip his brother tetrarch of Ituræa and of the region of Trachonitis, and Lysanias tetrarch of Abilene, in the [g]high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas, the [h]word of God came upon John the son of Zacharias in the wilderness. And he came into all the region round about Jordan, [i]preaching a baptism of repentance for remission of sins; as it is [j]written in the book of the words of Esaias the prophet: A voice of one crying in the wilderness: Prepare ye the way of [the] Lord; make straight his paths. Every [k]valley shall be filled, and every [l]mountain and hill shall be brought low, and the [m]crooked places shall become a straight [path], and the rough places smooth ways; and [n]all flesh shall see the salvation of God.

Then said he to the multitudes that came forth to be baptized of him, [o]Offspring of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? Bring forth, therefore, [p]fruits worthy of repentance; and begin not to say within yourselves, We have [q]Abraham for [our] father: for I say unto you that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham. And even now also is the [r]axe laid at the root of the trees: every tree, therefore, that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire. And the multitudes asked him, saying, [s]What should we do, then? And he answered and said unto them, He that hath [t]two coats, let him impart to him that hath none; and he that hath food, let him do likewise. And there

c cf. Matt. 22. 7, etc.
d cf. Mk. 15. 1, etc.
e cf. Matt. 14. 1, etc. cf. ch. 13. 31, etc.
f cf. Mk. 6. 17.
g cf. Jno. 11. 49. cf. Jno. 18. 13, 14.
h cf. 1 Cor. 1. 26-29. cf. 1 Cor. 2. 8. cf. Matt. 11. 8. cf. Rev. 1. 9.
i Matt. 3. 1, 2. Mk. 1. 4. Jno. 1. 6-8.
j Is. 40. 3-5. Matt. 3. 3. Mk. 1. 3. Jno. 1. 23.
k cf. Jas. 1. 9.
l cf. Jas. 1. 10. cf. ch. 18. 14. cf. Is. 1. 12-17.
m cf. Eccle. 1. 15. cf. Is. 59. 8.
n Ps. 98. 2. Is. 52. 10.
o Matt. 3. 7-10. cf. Is. 14. 29. cf. Jno. 8. 44.
p cf. Acts 26. 20 with Acts 19. 18-20. cf. 2 Cor. 7. 10, 11.
q cf. Rom. 9. 7. cf. Jno. 8. 33-40.

r cf. ch. 13. 6-10; cf. Rom. 2. 4. s cf. Acts 2. 37; cf. Acts 9. 6. cf. Acts 16. 30, 31. t cf. Matt. 10. 10.; cf. Jas. 2. 15, 16.

1. The first part is introductory, the voice of the Old Testament in the New. John the Baptist coming in the way of righteousness, as the Lord characterizes him, and therefore with his baptism of repentance, since the legal requirement of righteousness only brands all men as under hopeless condemnation, and repentance is but the heart-acknowledgment of this, that grace may appear in its own sovereignty. Luke is fuller in detail here than either Matthew or Mark, though he has less of austerity in the Baptist's ways: neither his rough dress nor diet is mentioned. On the other hand the way of the Lord is more insisted on as to be prepared only by the bringing down of the mountains and the filling up of the valleys,—bringing all flesh to a common level before God, that the salvation of God may be seen by all. Thus baptism is to Jordan, the river of death, to which men's sins bring them, and not their goodness, but to find remission.

The very description of the time shows the condition of ruin in Israel—of the people under law. Even the show of a united kingdom in Israel is gone, Herod's being quartered—the sign of weakness being stamped upon it in the tetrarchies; and a fourth part, Judea itself, under a Roman governor. The high priesthood is divided between the two Sadducees, Annas and Caiaphas. Judah is losing its tribal rod, and Shiloh must appear, to gather the peoples.

came also unto him [u] tax-gatherers to be baptized, and they said unto him, Teacher, what should we do? And he said unto them, Exact no more than that which is appointed to you. And soldiers also asked him, saying, And we, what should we do? And he said unto them, Do [v] violence to no one; nor accuse any falsely; and be content with your wages.

2 (iii.15-20:) His testimony to Christ.

2. Now, as the people were in [w] expectation, and all were reasoning in their hearts concerning John, whether he might be the Christ, John answered them all, saying, [x] I indeed baptize you with water, but there cometh One mightier than I, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose: he shall baptize you with [the] [y] Holy Spirit and [with] [z] fire; whose fan is in his hand, thoroughly to purge his [a] threshing-floor, and to gather the wheat into his garner; but the [b] chaff he will burn up with unquenchable fire.

With many other exhortations, therefore, preached he good tidings to the people. But [c] Herod the tetrarch being reproved by him for Herodias, his brother's wife, and for all the evils that Herod had done, added yet this above all, that he shut up John in prison.

3 (iii.21-38): Christ sealed with the Spirit; the renewal of man.

3. [1] And it came to pass, when all the people were baptized, and [d] Jesus also having been baptized and praying, that heaven was opened, and the Holy Spirit descended in a bodily form as a [e] dove upon him; and a

1 (21, 22): the First-born.

u cf. Matt. 9. 10. cf. ch. 7. 29. cf. ch. 19. 8.
v cf. Jno. 18. 36. cf. 2 Cor. 10. 3–5.
w cf. Jno. 1. 19, 20. cf. Jno. 5. 33, 35. cf. Matt. 21. 26.
x Matt. 3. 11, 12. Mk. 1. 8. Jno. 1. 26, 33. Acts 1. 5. Acts 11. 16. cf. 1 Cor. 1. 17.
y cf. 1 Cor. 12. 13.
z cf. Rev. 20. 9, 15. cf. Matt. 25. 41.
a Matt. 13. 30. cf. Mi. 4. 12, 13. cf. Is. 21. 10.
b cf. Ps. 1. 4. cf. Hos. 13. 3. cf. Heb. 6. 8.
c Matt. 14. 3, etc. Mk. 6. 17, etc. cf. Jno. 3. 24.
d Matt. 3. 13-17; Mk. 1. 9-11; Jno. 1. 31-34. e cf. Acts 10. 38; cf. Gen. 8. 8, 9.

John's is truly a solitary voice in a barren land. It is characteristic of Luke that what is addressed in Matthew to Pharisees and Sadducees is here to the people at large. They can no longer plead the privileges of children of Abraham. The axe is at the root of the trees; while on the other hand, God is able to raise such out of the very stones. To those who ask of him what they are to do, he prescribes no asceticism, but practical righteousness and love; while yet no claim upon God is allowed on this account. As the Lord says at an after-time, no such claim is possible for a creature: "when ye have done all say, We are unprofitable servants: we have done that which it was our duty to do."

2. But John does not end with this. The people, full of expectation, are reasoning in their hearts whether this might be the Christ; and this brings him out to disclaim entirely any such pretension. He is not fit to loose the shoe-latchet of Him who comes after him. He would baptize, not with water merely, but with the Holy Spirit and fire. He would purge His threshing-floor, separating between the wheat and the chaff: the one preserved for the garner, the other to be burnt up with unquenchable fire (See notes on Matthew pp. 55, 56.)

Luke passes on with this to John's imprisonment at the hands of Herod, and the occasion of it; the fore-runner precedes also in his suffering and death the Prince of sufferers.

3. The Father's voice is now heard owning His beloved Son, upon whom the Spirit descends out of the opened heaven, in bodily form like a dove. He is thus now in full reality the Christ, the Anointed; the Spirit of God finding a congenial habitation in a "Second Man," the First-born of a new family, from whom, however, the stream of blessing flows back also through the ages, so that Adam shall once more, though not as of the old creation, be the "son of God."

[1] The meaning of the Lord's baptism by John has been considered in Matthew. It was the pledge on His part to that other baptism unto death in which He met voice came out of heaven, [saying]* [f]Thou art my beloved Son, in thee I am well pleased.

2 (23-38): Son of man and Second Man: the link of salvation.

2 And Jesus himself was beginning to be about [g]thirty years old; being, as was supposed, the son of [h]Joseph, of Heli, of Matthat, of Levi, of Melchi, of Jannai, of Joseph, of Mattathias, of Amos, of Naoum, of Esli, of Naggai, of Maath, of Mattathias, of Semein, of Josech, of Joda, of Joanan, of Rhesa, of Zorobabel, of Salathiel, of Neri, of Melchi, of Addi, of Cosam, of Elmadam, of Er, of Jesus, of Eliezer, of Joreim, of Matthat, of Levi, of Simeon, of Judah, of Joseph, of Jonan, of Eliakim, of Meleas, of Menna, of Mattatha, of [i]Nathan, of David, of Jesse, of Obed, of [j]Booz, of Salmon, of [k]Naasson, of Aminadab, of Aram, of Esrom, of Pharez, of Juda, of Jacob, of Isaac, of Abraham, of Terah, of Nahor, of Seruch, of Ragau, of Phalek, of Eber, of Sala, of Cainan, of Arphaxad, of [l]Sem, of Noe, of Lamech, of Methusala, of Enoch, of Jared, of Malaleel, of Cainan, of Enos, of Seth, of Adam, [m]of God.

4 (iv. 1-13): The testing in the wilderness.

1 (1-4): the true life of man.

4. [1] But Jesus, [n]full of the Holy Spirit, returned from Jordan, and was led by the Spirit in the wilderness forty days, being tempted of the devil; and in those f cf. Is. 42.1. cf. ch. 9.35. cf. Jno.8.29.

g cf. Num.4. 3. cf. Jno.8.57, 58.
h cf. Matt.1. 1-17.
i cf. Zech.12. 12. cf. 2 Sa.5.14. cf. 1 Chron. 3. 5.
j Ruth 4.18-22.
k cf. Nu.1.7.
l cf. 1 Chron. 1.1-4,24-28, 34. cf. 1 Chron. 2. 1-12.
m cf. Gen.5. 1, 2. cf. Num.16. 22.
n Matt. 4. 1. Mk.1.12,13.

* Many omit.

the need of those who as sinners took their place in death their due. In Luke alone it is noticed that He is praying; which we may thus connect with His prayer in Gethsemane, and with Heb. v. 7. Thereon heaven opens, as in fact that death opened it, and the Spirit descends on Him in bodily form like a dove. The dove being the bird of sacrifice, Christ and the Spirit of Christ are One as seen in it, the First-born—man as presented by Christ in this new family—being wholly according to His mind. Thus the Voice from heaven owns Him: "Thou art My beloved Son; in Thee I am well pleased."

So had the angels declared God's "good pleasure in men," as that which the Babe of Bethlehem bore witness to and justified. "Whom He foreknew He also fore-ordained to be conformed to the image of His Son, that He might be the First-born among many brethren."

2 Thus a genealogy follows here traced backward, and not, as in Matthew, forward; and not to Abraham merely, as in Matthew, but to Adam. It is a genealogy, not of the King, (and so giving the legal title, the descent from David) but of the Son of man.

But what need of a genealogy in this case? If He be man, must He not be Son of man—of Adam? True; and so, as has been said, the stream runs backward. The Son of man is also the Second Man; and each link in the chain at least suggests a link of salvation. Thus the genealogy is not put in connection with His birth, but with that coming forward to be baptized of John in Jordan, which was His entrance upon His ministry of salvation; and He is then thirty years of age, the time of the commencement of Levite service.

Son of man as He is generically, Christ is no less Seed of the woman; and it is doubtless Mary's line that is given us here. Joseph is, as husband of Mary, the son of Heli. In the Gospel of the Manhood it is as naturally Mary who would be before us, as in the Gospel of the Kingship it would be Joseph; and the respective histories conform themselves to this.

4. [1] The temptation in the wilderness follows the public testimony of God to His Son. It is founded on it:—"If Thou be the Son of God"; and necessarily follows it. This is the divine order: for it would have been dishonor to both, days he °ate nothing; and when they were finished, he hungered. And the devil said to him, If thou art Son of God, ᵖspeak to this stone that it may become bread. And Jesus answered him, It is ᵍwritten that not by bread alone shall man live, [but by every word of God].*

2 (5-8): the Second Man and the Seed of the woman.

2 And the ʳdevil, leading him up [into a high mountain],† showed him all the kingdoms of the habitable earth in a moment of time. And the devil said unto him, I will give thee all this authority and the glory of them: for it is ˢdelivered to me, and to whomsoever I will I give it. If thou therefore wilt worship before me, all shall be thine. And Jesus answered and said to him, It is ᵗwritten, Thou shalt worship [the] Lord thy God, and serve him alone.

*Some omit. † Some omit, but evidently to be retained.

o Ex. 34.28. 1 Ki. 19.8. ctr. Gen. 2.15-17. p cf. ch. 9.12-17. cf. Matt. 27.42.
q Deut. 8.3. cf. 1 Jno. 2.14.
r ctr. Ps. 2.8. cf. Jno. 17.4, 5.
s cf. Jno. 12.31. cf. Jno. 14.30. cf. 2 Cor. 4.4.
t Deut. 6.13. Deut. 10.20. cf. Rev. 13.12.

if God had waited to see if His Son could stand all tests before approving Him. On the other hand that approval was a challenge to the accuser, the Spirit leading Christ in the wilderness forty days, while Satan was permitted to assail Him. Fasting and hungry with the famine of those days upon Him, the devil appeals to Him, if He be the Son of God, to put forth His power and make bread of the stones which are around Him. Thus He would take Himself out of the place of dependence by using a power which had not been given to man. But the true life of man is not that which is sustained by bread but by the word of God. Obedience, dependence, communion, are its characteristics and its strength. Against one walking in such a path all the suggestions of the enemy are unavailing.

2 The second and third temptations are in reverse order in Matthew and Luke. The historical order seems to be that which is found in Matthew, the second being marked by "then" as following the first; while the third is marked as the closing one by the Lord's "Get thee hence, Satan," which lays bare and dismisses the tempter. Indeed the proposal here in its very nature seems to close the whole matter. Yet there must, of course, be a reason for the change in order here, and that whether we are able or not to discover it; the limit of our knowledge is not that of the word of God which He has given us.

The first answer of the Lord to Satan has shown us man in the true life of dependent obedience for which he was created. Than such a life there could be nothing freer, nothing happier, nothing nobler. Living such a life, the world was his, and all was subjected to him as the image of his Maker. Aspiring to independency he lost it all, and became, by the lusts through which he governed him, Satan's poor drudge and bondsman. This is the empire of which the devil boasts now to the Lord; spreading it before Him in a moment, as if to dazzle Him with it. But all this authority and the glory of earth's kingdoms he whose it now was would give Him, if He would do homage for it.

The dragon has in this way, in the book of Revelation, the heads and horns of the last world-empire: he is the spirit of it, the "prince of this world" (Rev. xii. 3). Later, he is giving authority to the beast,—"the dragon gave him his power and his throne and great authority" (xiii. 2). His terms have been always similar, and the children of the fallen first man have been constantly repeating their father's forfeiture of his birthright freedom.

But the Second Man is now come, the Seed of the woman, who is to bruise the serpent's head; and the conflict is already begun in victory. The prince of this world finds nothing in Him who is here not to do His own will, but the will of Him that sent Him. To such an one he can present no motive that has force. The strong man is bound.

3 (9-13): Messiah, and God's fulfilment.

3 And he led him to Jerusalem, and placed him on the [u] pinnacle of the temple, and said unto him, If thou be Son of God, cast thyself down from hence: for it is [v] written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee to guard thee, and, on their hands they shall bear thee up, lest haply thou dash thy foot against a stone. And Jesus answered and said to him, It is said, [w] Thou shalt not tempt [the] Lord thy God. And when the devil had ended all the temptation, he [x] departed from him for a season.

[u] cf. Ps. 27. 4. cf. Mk. 11. 11. cf. Matt. 16. 1.
[v] Ps. 91. 11, 12. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 2.
[w] Deut. 6. 16. cf. Ps. 19. 13.
[x] cf. Matt. 16. 21-23. cf. Jno. 14. 30. cf. ch. 22. 53.

[3] The temptation by the word of God itself comes last therefore: it is all that remains. He cannot be seduced from it; can it be so presented as that He should be seduced by it? We have already looked at this in Matthew, and seen how it necessarily involved the perversion of the Word, and this by the impatience for the fulfilment of it which would take it out of God's hand instead of leaving Him to fulfil it in His own way. This impatience is only distrust, and to act upon it is to tempt the Lord our God. We are seeking an easier path than His, as if His wisdom had failed, or His power were insufficient for the difficulties of the way. Whereas to "wait on the Lord" is to "spring up with wings as eagles;" it is to "run and not be weary," and to "walk and not faint" (Isa. xl. 31).

The devil has now ended all the temptation, and departs, but only "for a season." He will return as "prince of this world" (John xiv. 30), with the men of this world behind him, to show the sad reality of that dominion over them which he has vaunted, and to gain an apparent victory which will be in the end his complete overthrow.

Div. 2.

The division of Mark and Luke is very similar. We shall find also that of John to correspond essentially. First, we have the Lord presented to us personally, in that character which the particular Gospel exhibits; then His work in active ministry among men; and finally the sacrificial work and its results. Here, as Man, and in the nearness implied by this, the former Gospels having shown us atonement in its full substitutionary character wrought out, as in the sin- and trespass-offering, we find in the second division the salvation so accomplished ministered to men in a way we could not have had before. Not that the fulness of what is in John is reached. The truths of new birth, eternal life, the gift of the Spirit, and other things, are lacking, as John (or the Lord in John's Gospel) shows them to us. There is an approach made to these; God and man meet together; the prodigal is in the Father's house; the fatted calf is on the table: things which have made some of old to suppose—with the known relationship of Luke to Paul—that it was this Gospel which Paul called his own (Rom. xvi. 25). This goes too far, but the doctrinal connection is yet evident. We shall have many opportunities of realizing this.

Subd. 1.

The sovereignty of grace in salvation is the very first thing presented here. God alone could have thought of it: from His heart alone it could have come. Even so, and with all the suitability there is in it to man's condition, it is naturally distasteful to him, for he believes in himself, and does not willingly own the truth of his condition. Hence God must act for Himself as is implied in new birth: for who was ever born of his own will? And Scripture directly negatives this as to spiritual birth (John i. 13).

But thus salvation being of God is effected from first to last in the power of God. How great a comfort for the soul convicted of its own evil, folly and feebleness? God "worketh in you the willing and the doing of His good pleasure" (Phil. ii. 13, Gk.). The work in us is secured by the same grace

DIVISION 2. (Chaps. iv. 14–xix. 27.)

Salvation.

SUBDIVISION 1. (Chaps. iv. 14–vi. 49.)

In sovereign grace, and divine power.

1 (iv. 14-30): The foreshadow.
[1] (14-21): the Source of blessing.

1. [1] AND Jesus [y] returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee; and a [z] fame went out concerning him through all the region round about. And he taught in their synagogues, being glorified of all. And he [a] came to Nazareth, where he had been brought up; and he entered, as his [b] custom was, into the synagogue on the sabbath day, and stood up to read. And there was delivered to him the book of the prophet Esaias. And he opened the book, and found the place where it was [c] written: [d] The Spirit of [the] Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach good tidings to the [e] poor: he hath sent me* to proclaim [f] release to captives, and recovery of [g] sight to the blind, to set at [h] liberty those that are bruised, to proclaim the [i] acceptable year of [the] Lord. And when he had [j] rolled up the book, and delivered it again to the attendant, he sat down; and the eyes of all in the synagogue were fastened upon him. And he began to say unto them, To-day is this scripture [k] fulfilled in your ears.

* Many copies have "to heal the broken-hearted," as in Isaiah.

y ver. 1. Matt. 4. 12. Mk. 1. 14. cf. Jno. 4. 43.
z Matt. 4. 24.
a Matt. 13. 54-58. Mk. 6. 1-5. b ver. 15. Mk. 1. 21. cf. Acts 13. 14, 15. c Is. 61. 1-3. d cf. ch. 3. 21, 22. cf. vers. 1. 14. Acts 10. 38.
e cf. Matt. 11. 5. cf. ch. 1. 53.
f cf. Is. 42. 6, 7. cf. Jno. 8. 32-36. cf. Rom. 8. 2.
g cf. Jno. 9. 1-3, 39. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 4, 6.
h cf. Ex. 21. 26. cf. ch. 13. 11-16.
i cf. Lev. 25. 9, 10. cf. Is. 63. 4. cf. Is. 61. 2 with Mi. 7. 18.
j cf. Rev. 4. 1-5. cf. Rev. 10. -17.
k cf. ch. 2. 10, 11.

that has accomplished the work for us, in the value of which we stand unchangeably. All is provided for equally, the covenant of promise being God's "I will" throughout.

1. [1] This part begins with a foreshadow at Nazareth of what is soon to be fulfilled in Israel's history. The Lord is seen in the place where He was brought up and according to His custom He enters the synagogue on the sabbath day. There He stands up to read, and the book of Isaiah being given Him, He opens at the sixty-first chapter, and applies the words of the Man anointed with the Spirit of Jehovah to Himself. It is clear how accordant with the character of Luke the quotation is. It is the "Mediator between God and man, the Man Christ Jesus" (1 Tim. ii. 5), whose voice is heard here; and it is as come up out of Jordan, where He has pledged Himself to a baptism to death far different, that the Spirit has come upon Him for His work. He declares here in the first words of His ministry, as Luke gives it to us, the purport of that anointing. The preaching of glad tidings to the poor comes first, and gives character to all the rest. When man is in the place of need he can receive the gospel. When he is consciously a sinner, captive to the sin which he cannot, when he will, renounce, the gospel brings him release. The blind receive their sight. Those bruised in fetters liberty.* It is in fact "the acceptable year of the Lord"; the jubilee of God; fuller and more blessed than the law ever proclaimed in Israel.

Now in His Person this had come to them. He was the source of all, the spring of grace and salvation. Where the prophet goes on to "the day of vengeance of our God," the Lord stops short in the middle of the sentence: grace

* This is not in chap. lxi., as the rest is, but inserted from chap. lviii. 6. It is there found in very different connection, and here is so similar to what we have had already, that it would arouse suspicion as to its being really part of the text; but the copies are in agreement.

2 (22-30): grace rejected will go out to others.

22 And all bare him witness, and wondered at the l gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth. And they said, Is not this the son of m Joseph? 23 And he said unto them, Ye will surely say to me this parable, n Physician, heal thyself: whatsoever we have heard of as done at o Capernaum, do also here in thine own country. 24 And he said, Verily I say unto you that p no prophet is acceptable in his own country. 25 But of a truth I say unto you, Many widows were in Israel in the q days of Elias, when the heaven was shut up three years and six months, so that there came a great famine over all the land; 26 and unto none of them was Elias sent, save to Sarepta of r Sidonia, unto a woman that was a widow. 27 And many s lepers were in Israel in the time of Eliseus the prophet, and none of them was cleansed except Naaman the Syrian.

l cf. Ps. 45. 2. cf. Jno. 7. 46.
m Jno. 6. 42, Jno. 7. 41, 52.
n cf. Rom. 2. 21, 22.
o cf. 1 Thess. 1. 8. cf. 2 Cor. 8. 1, etc.
p Jno. 4. 44. cf. Jno. 1. 11.
q 1 Ki. 17. 9, etc. 1 Ki. 18. 1.
r cf. Matt. 11. 21, 22. cf. Matt. 15. 21–28.
s 2 Ki. 5. 1, etc. cf. Matt. 8. 10.

had hastened to anticipate the judgment; although for those who refuse the one there will at last be the other. But judgment lingers with reluctant feet, while those of grace are winged with desire.

22 They heard and wondered: could not but own that these were gracious words. Would they receive them, then? That is a very different thing. They were not the poor, the captive, blind or fetter-bruised. They were wonderful words indeed of Joseph's son! How had He learned this wisdom? and how had He the boldness to take such a place as He was taking? After all, the question was of Him and not of them. Who was He? But they had heard of miracles wrought at Capernaum: let the physician heal himself; what they had heard of elsewhere let Him repeat in His own city, to which His wonders naturally belonged, and the fame of the prophet. For it had become a proverb that out of Galilee there arose none; and as to Nazareth it was a question, could any good be expected of it? Well, if He had such power, let Him exercise it there where there was need and the occasion called.

After all, with all the unbelief that might be in it, it seems natural to ask, why the Lord did not take this means of breaking down their unbelief; why, if He were doing miracles elsewhere, why not here?

But He, seeing more deeply, sees He is rejected. Even while they wonder at His gracious words, they have no need of them: and of what use were miracles, save to confirm that of which they had no need?

It was a case, too, coming under a rule which—so alike are men, so inveterate the evil in them—could be deemed invariable. "No prophet is acceptable in his own country." And this seems as if it were a comment upon their question, "Is not this the son of Joseph?" God acting in a son of Joseph! God speaking with so familiar a voice, and disguising Himself so in nature and common life! That seems impossible; self-contradictory even; startling too by bringing God so near; unwelcome, alas, in the same proportion.

But, however men judge of it, God will be as God, acting sovereignly as He pleases, while in goodness, because goodness is His nature, but not tied to show it according to any of the thoughts of men. What had their history shown as to this? In the awful times of Elijah, when for their sins famine swept through the land for three years and six months;—or in times succeeding, when Elisha was in Elijah's place;—who were they to whom it pleased God to show mercy? There were many widows in Israel, when Elijah was sent to the Sidonian widow! many lepers in Israel unhealed, when Naaman the Syrian was cleansed! Israel might in those days have said to Elijah, "Do these things in thine own country," while yet they had shown no desire after God, but had cast Him off; and now grace rejected might go out to others. There were the poor, the blind,

And all in the synagogue were filled with [f]wrath when they heard these things; and rising up they cast him out of the city, and led him as far as the brow of the hill on which their city was built, so that they might [u]throw him down headlong. But he, passing through the midst of them, [v]went his way.

2 (iv.31-44): Salvation from the enemy.

1 (31-37): "with authority and power."

2. [1] And he [w]went down to Capernaum, a city of Galilee; and he was teaching them on the sabbaths; and they were [x]astonished at his teaching, for his word was with authority. And in the [y]synagogue there was a man who had a spirit of an unclean demon, and he cried out with a loud voice, Let be! [z]what have we to do with thee, Jesus, Nazarene? Art thou come to destroy us? I know thee who thou art, the Holy One of God. And Jesus rebuked him, saying, [a]Hold thy peace, and come out of him. And the demon, having thrown him down in the midst, came out of him, and did him no hurt. And [b]amazement came upon all, and they spake one to another, saying, What a word is this! for with [c]authority and power he commandeth the unclean spirits, and they come out. And there went out a [d]rumor concerning him into all the region round about.

2 (38, 39): disease.

[2] And, rising up out of the synagogue, he entered into the [e]house of Simon. Now Simon's mother-in-law was holden with a [f]great fever; and they asked him for her. And, standing over her, he rebuked the fever, and it left her; and straightway she rose up and [g]ministered to them.

[f] cf. Acts 13. 45-50. cf. Acts 22. 21, 22.
[u] cf. Jno. 8. 37. cf. Jno. 15. 24, 25. cf. 1 Thess. 2. 15, 16.
[v] cf. Jno. 8. 59. cf. Jno. 10. 39. cf. Jno. 7. 30. cf. vers. 9-12.
[w] Matt. 4. 13. Mk. 1. 21. cf. Jno. 2. 12.
[x] Matt. 7. 28, 29. Matt. 13. 54.
[y] Mk. 1. 23-27.
[z] Matt. 8. 29. cf. Jas. 2. 19.
[a] Mk. 1. 34. Mk. 3. 11, 12. cf. Acts 16. 16-18.
[b] ch. 5. 26.
[c] Matt. 12. 29.
[d] vers. 14, 15. cf. Mk. 1. 45.
[e] Matt. 8. 14, 15. Mk. 1. 29-31.
[f] cf. Is. 1. 5.
[g] cf. ch. 8. 2, 3. cf. Gal. 1. 23.

the captives of sin elsewhere,—even among the Gentiles: men who had need of Him, if they had none; and who, finding that need met in Him, would realize in Him more than "the son of Joseph."

But the men of Nazareth are only roused into fury by such words. They seek to kill Him by hurling Him from the brow of the hill on which the city is built; but He passes through the midst of them and goes His way. How plain a foreshadow of the rejection that waited Him at the hands of the people, and of the way in which the death to which they destined Him availed nothing to hinder those purposes for which He stooped even to death also. And so grace went out to the Gentiles.

2. [1] We have had, then, Christ as the Source of blessing, and the character of the blessing which He is come to convey to men. But if blessing be thus prepared for him, the enemy in whose hand he is must be met and despoiled of his prey. This, therefore, is what we find next, the story which we have already had in Mark (i. 21–28), of the demoniac in the synagogue at Capernaum. Very significant it is that the demon is not here in the tombs or in the mountains, but parading his victim in the midst of the concourse of men, and even in the synagogue, as if he would make good his title to him in the presence of God Himself. But under the power of the Word, which is the sword of the Spirit to expose and vanquish him, he is made to realize the Holy One of God, and quails as before his destroyer. He is silenced and made to come out, with one last expression of impotent rage, which only manifests the more the power over him; and amazement seizes upon the multitude who behold it, and spread His fame throughout the region round about.

[2] He enters into Simon Peter's house and the devil's power meets Him in another form. The mother-in-law of Simon is ill with a great fever. He re-

4 (40-44): the manifestation.

40 And when the [h]sun was setting, all those that had any sick with divers diseases, brought them to him; and he laid his hands on every one of them, and healed them. And demons also went out of many, crying out and saying, Thou art the Son of God. And [i]rebuking them, he suffered them not to speak, for they knew that he was the Christ.

42 And [j]when it was day, he went out, and went into a desert place; and the multitudes sought after him, and came unto him, and would have [k]stayed him that he should not go from them. But he said unto them, I must preach the good tidings of the kingdom of God to the [l]other cities also: for therefore was I sent. And he was preaching in the [m]synagogues of Galilee.

5 (v. 1-26): Sanctification; and Christ the Sanctifier.

1 (1-11): conviction.

5 1 Now it [n]came to pass while the multitude pressed on him and were hearing the word of God, that he stood by the lake of Gennesaret: and he saw two ships standing by the lake; but the fishermen had come down from them and were washing their nets. And entering into one of the ships which was Simon's, he asked him to draw off a little from the land. And he sat down and taught the multitudes [o]out of the ship. And when he had finished speaking, he said unto Simon, Draw out now into the deep, and let down your nets for a draught. And Simon answered and said to him, Master, we have [p]toiled all the night and have taken nothing; but at [q]thy word I will let down the nets. And h Matt.8.16, 17. Mk. 1. 32-34.

i ver. 35.

j Mk. 1. 35-39.

k ctr. ch. 8. 37.

l cf. Matt. 11. 1.

m cf. ver.16.

n Matt. 4.18-22. Mk. 1. 16-20.

o cf. Matt. 13. 1, 2. cf. Matt.5.1. cf. Mk. 11. 11.

p cf. Jno. 21. 3, etc.

q cf. Matt.8. 8. cf. Jno. 4.50-53.

bukes it, and it leaves her; and immediately she is restored and able to minister to them.

[2] And now the crowds gather, bringing those sick with all manner of diseases; and the power of God is manifest in healing all without exception. Nothing is too hard for Him. The earth is ready to put on again its paradisaic garb, and the devil to be banished out of it: so at least it well might seem.

There is love also equal to the power displayed. The people, well content to have such an one among them, would fain prevent His leaving them; but it is not enough for Him that seekers should find Him, He must be the Seeker, and seek everywhere the sheep that are astray from their Shepherd. All the cities of Israel must hear the Voice of Him that is come after them. The Kingdom of God must be everywhere proclaimed. That which men most coveted, the miracles of healing, were but the attendant signs of divine authority once more ready to be openly established over a willing-hearted people. Thus alone could there be healing indeed.

3. Naturally we are led on in this way to the inward deliverance, the spiritual healing by which sanctification to God is attained. This we shall find commonly conveyed to us, as so often in the Gospels, in terms of the outward miracle, the clearest and most concise way, no doubt, in which it could be done in these cases. Figures though they are, the Christian understanding can hardly fail to realize their significance.

[1] The first story here, though from its conclusion surely coincident with the call of the first disciples in the previous Gospels, is yet in the main part peculiar to Luke, as it is surely in fullest harmony with its character. It is the record of a soul brought into the presence of God; at once drawn and searched out by the light of it. There is nothing in the nature of the miracle itself that is in the least calculated to terrify or produce any emotion of fear whatever, but when they had done this they enclosed a great multitude of fishes, and their nets were [r]breaking; and they beckoned to their partners in the other ship that they should come and help them. And they came and filled both the ships, so that they began to [s]sink. Now, when Simon Peter saw it, he fell down at Jesus' knees, saying, [t]Depart from me: for I am a sinful man, O Lord. For he was amazed, and all that were with him, at the draught of fishes which they had taken: and so were also James and John, the sons of Zebedee, who were partners with Simon. And Jesus said unto Simon, [u]Fear not; from henceforth thou shalt catch men. And when they had brought their ships to land, they [v]left all, and followed him.

2 (12-16): the leper: corruption of sin.

[2] And it came to pass, while he was in one of the cities, behold, [there was] a man full of [w]leprosy. And when he saw Jesus, he fell on his face and besought him, saying, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. And he stretched forth his hand, and touched him, saying, I will: be thou cleansed. And immedi-

r cf. vers.36-39. cfr. Jno.21. 11. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 16.

s cf. ver. 6.

t cf. Is. 6. 5. cf. Gen. 28. 16, 17.

u cf. Matt. 8. 26. cf. Acts 26. 16.

v cf. Matt. 19. 27. cf. Phil. 3. 8.

w Matt. 8. 2-4. Mk. 1. 40-45. Lev. chs. 13 and 14.

the contrary. They who have toiled all night and caught nothing, find now, upon casting their nets once more at the Lord's bidding, a multitude of fish which fill their own and their partners' vessels till they are ready to sink with the weight. When Simon sees it he is amazed; and falling down at Jesus' knees, he cries, "Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord."

It is the sense of the divine presence, revealed by the miracle, that has stricken through Simon Peter, and brought him to the consciousness of his condition. He cleaves to Him, even while he says, depart. Conscience and heart are at strife within him. But he does not flee: how should he flee from Him who is what he realizes Him to be—who has searched out the paths of the sea and his heart together? Nor does the Lord leave him in doubt as to the grace that can take up the sinful: "Fear not," He says to Simon; "from henceforth thou shalt catch men." The grace thus shown is not simply the reception of sinners. Christ thus known in the heart associates the redeemed with Himself in His message of mercy to men.

[2] In the two miracles following, the need that is to be ministered to is more fully exposed. The leper and the paralytic show us the corruption and impotence produced by sin; the former being the well-known type of sin in the Old Testament, in its subtle invasion, its certain spread, its contagion, its breaking up of human relations, its banishment from God (Lev. xiii.) Man was powerless in the presence of this malignant scourge. The mere touch of one who had it was defilement. Every leper was known, and had to make himself known to all around him, that none might come in contact with him. Moreover the removal of it was one of the signs by which was proclaimed the God-sent deliverer of Israel from the oppression of the Egyptians.

Nowhere then could there be found a more suitable means for the manifestation of His power than in cleansing the leper; and here was one in that awful state of isolation, "a man full of leprosy." This is Luke's description, going beyond the former Gospels: it was not in mere incipiency, but revealing itself in all its terrible reality. But "when he saw Jesus, he fell on his face and besought Him, saying, Lord, if Thou wilt, Thou canst make me clean."

A sorrowful case when one who confesses the power of Jesus to heal him, can doubt His will; and yet, in the case of sin how common! But the Lord would have none question. He does not merely speak, He goes further, and with a touch at once breaks through the barrier of law, and removes that which the ately the leprosy departed from him. And he [x]charged him to tell no one: but go thy way, show thyself to the priest, and offer for thy cleansing as Moses commanded, for a testimony to them. But so much the more went there abroad the word concerning him; and great multitudes came together to hear, and to be healed of their infirmities. But he [y]withdrew himself in the deserts and prayed.

3 (17-26): the paralytic: strength renewed, and divine glory manifested.

[3] And it came to pass in one of those days that he was teaching, and there were Pharisees and doctors of the law sitting by, who were come out of every village of Galilee and Judea, and from Jerusalem; and power of [the] Lord was there to heal them. And lo, men [z]bringing upon a couch a man who was paralyzed; and they sought to bring him in, and put him before him. And not finding what way they might bring him in because of the multitude, they went up upon the housetop, and [a]let him down through the tiles with his pallet into the midst before Jesus. And seeing their faith, he said, Man, thy sins are forgiven thee. And the scribes and Pharisees began to reason, saying, [b]Who is this that speaketh blasphemies? Who can forgive sins, but God alone? But Jesus, knowing their reasonings, answered and said unto them, Why reason ye in your hearts? Which is easier, to say, Thy sins are forgiven thee, or to say, Arise and walk? But that ye may [c]know that the Son of man hath authority upon earth to forgive sins (he said to the paralyzed man), I say unto thee, Arise, and take up thy pallet, and go to thy house. And straightway he rose up before them, took up that whereon he lay, and departed to his house, [d]glorifying God. And amazement took hold upon all, and they glorified God, and were filled with fear, saying, We have seen [e]strange things to-day.

x cf. ch. 8. 56.

y Matt. 14. 23. Mk. 6. 46. ch. 11. 1.

z Matt. 9. 2-8. Mk. 2. 3-12.

a cf. ch. 18. 39.

b cf. ch. 7. 49.

c cf. Acts 2. 22. cf. Mk. 16. 17.

d cf. Acts 3. 8. cf. ch. 17. 15, 16.

e Mk. 7. 37.

law could only brand, not remedy. "I will: be thou cleansed." And immediately the leprosy has departed from him. Now the very priest of the law must pronounce him clean, and Jesus sends the healed man to him for that purpose.

Leprosy speaks of the out-break of the flesh,—the nature of the unrenewed man; but which remains in the renewed man also, and may, alas, break out of him. This last is, in fact, what the type in Leviticus directly speaks of, while leprosy in itself may speak of either. Christ is, in either case, the only and all-sufficient remedy. In John xiii. He takes our feet into His blessed hands to cleanse them from all the defilements of the way, and this is the touch of Jesus for the Christian. For the sinner also there is the touch of the Samaritan-Saviour, come where he is; of which Luke will tell us much at another time: a story which unites in some sense the leper with the paralytic in him who fell among the thieves. The aspects vary of that which is fundamentally the same: the meeting of divine power and love with human need and guilt. The experience of how many can interpret and apply a history like this.

[3] We pass on to the paralytic, in whom the impotence produced by sin is clearly shown us. The Lord, therefore, first assures him of forgiveness—"Thy sins are forgiven thee," and makes the power to "rise and walk" the token to others of the reality of what he has received. And this is the spiritual order.

4 (v. 27-vi. 11): The change involved.

1 (v. 27-32): the call of Levi.

4. [1] And after these things he went forth and saw a [f]tax-gatherer, Levi by name, sitting at the tax-office, and said unto him, Follow me. And he left all, rose up, and followed him. And Levi made a great [g]entertainment* for him at his house; and there was a great multitude of tax-gatherers and others who sat down with them. And the Pharisees and their scribes murmured at his disciples, saying, Why do ye [h]eat and drink with tax-gatherers and sinners? And Jesus answered and said unto them, They that are [i]whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick. I am not come to call the righteous but [j]sinners to repentance.

2 (33-39): the old and the new.

[2] And they said unto him, The† disciples of John [k]fast often and make supplications, and likewise those of the Pharisees; but thine eat and drink. But Jesus said unto them, Can ye make the sons of the bride-chamber fast, while the [l]bridegroom is with them? but days will come when the bridegroom shall be [m]taken away from them: then shall they fast in those days.

f Matt. 9. 9. Mk. 2. 14. cf. Gal. 1. 15. cfr. Matt. 22. 5.

g Matt. 9. 10-13. Mk. 2. 15-17.

h cf. ch. 15. 1, 2. cf. ch. 7. 34.

i cf. John 9. 41. cf. ch. 18. 9-14.

j 1 Tim. 1. 15.

k Matt. 9. 14-17. Mk. 2. 18-22. cf. ch. 7. 33.

l cf. John 3. 29. cf. Song 7. 10. cf. Ps. 45. 9, etc.

m cf. Jno. 16. 6, 20 cf. John 20. 11-15.

* Literally "reception." † Many read, "Why do."

Both this and the previous miracle we have had in the first two Gospels, and in Mark, as here, together. In Matthew they are separated, but with as distinct a purpose as to each. The divine glory of Christ in all this part is fully manifest.

4. We have now what with little variation is common to the three Synoptists, the dispensational change which this open display of divine grace involves. Matthew indeed puts an interval between that which takes place at Levi's house and the contention as to the Sabbath; while Mark and Luke present them in connection. The call of Matthew (or Levi) seems also historically to have been some time before the feast made by him. Each evangelist uses his material according to his purpose, rather than in mere chronological order. The connection between the Sabbath question and the displacement of the legal ritual which was impending is evident, and so it is that they are brought together here.

[1] The call of Levi to the apostleship must have been startling to a Jew. The tax-gatherer was hated as the symbol of foreign dominion, hated for his often unscrupulous exactions, and hated more than all if (as was here the case) it was a Jew who lent himself to what was considered the oppression of his own people. But "tax-gatherers and sinners," thus associated in the language of the multitude, followed the Baptist, while Pharisees and Sadducees turned away from him; and so was it now in the Lord's case. Levi follows Him with unhesitating promptitude, leaving all he had. And the feast that he makes Him is furnished with guests which show how fully he has entered into his Master's mind.

But the scribes and Pharisees as naturally murmur: why eat and drink, they ask, with such as these? The Lord's answer is as simple as can be, and as sufficient. He is a physician looking for the sick; and not, therefore, as disregarding the need men had of repentance, but to bring them to it. It is the goodness of God known that brings men to it.

[2] Then they raise a question about fasting. John's disciples fasted; as, with the message that he brought the people, well was there need. The Pharisees too had not been wrong in this, if only they had penetrated the true meaning of the law, which John had but emphasized. The voice in the wilderness had

And he spake also a parable to them: No one putteth a piece of a [n]new garment upon an old garment: otherwise he will both rend the new, and the piece which is from the new will not [o]agree with the old. And no one putteth [p]new wine into old skins: otherwise the new wine will burst the skins, and the wine be poured out and the skins destroyed; but new wine is to be put into [q]new skins, and both are preserved. And no one having drunk [r]old wine [immediately]* desireth new: for he saith, The old is good.†

[3] a And it came to pass on the [second-first]‡ sabbath that he went through [s]corn-fields; and his disciples were plucking the ears and eating, rubbing them in their hands. And some of the Pharisees said: Why do ye that which is not [t]lawful upon the Sabbath-day? And Jesus answering said to them: Have ye never read this, what [u]David did when he was hungry,—himself, and those who were with him? how he went into the house of God, and took and ate the show-bread, and gave also to those that were with him, which it is not [v]lawful to eat, save for the priests alone? And he said unto them, The Son of man is [w]Lord also of the sabbath.

3 (vi.1-11): sabbath sanctification.
a (1-5): the Lord of the sabbath.

n cf. 2 Cor. 5. 17. cf. Gal. 2. 20, 21. cf. Eph. 4. 22-24.
o cf. Rom. 11. 6.
p cf. Ruth 4. 6.
q cf. Rom. 14. 17. cf. Col. 1. 29.
r cf. Jno. 3. 6. cf. Gal. 6. 15.
s cf. Heb. 8. 13. cf. Heb. 9. 9, 10.
t Matt. 12. 1-9. Mk. 2. 23-28. Deut. 23. 25. u cf. ch. 14. 1-6. cf. Jno. 5. 9, 10.
v 1 Sam. 21. 1-6.
w cf. Lev. 24. 5-9.
x cf. ch. 5. 24. cf. Jno. 5. 17, 18.

* Some omit. † Some have "better."
‡ Many omit "second-first," and the meaning is disputed. The term is not found elsewhere, either in Scripture or amongst Jewish writers.

announced however the coming of One who would be the Bridegroom of His people (John iii. 29): how unsuitable would be the voice of mourning then!

But of this the dead ritualism of the Pharisee knew nothing. Fasting was meritorious in itself according to their thought, and Christ in the truth of what He was had no place in them. Thus Israel's Bridegroom, already in their midst, would, as rejected, be taken from them; and then indeed would the sons of the bride-chamber fast.*

But there was another thing, for the old covenant points beyond itself, and that which was peculiar to it was therefore destined to pass away and be replaced by the new. So opposite were these that the two could not agree. The garment of human righteousness according to the law, however incompetent it might be, could not be patched with the "righteousness which is of God through faith" (Phil. iii. 9). The old wine-skins of the Jewish institutions could not confine the free expansive spirit of the new covenant which was already showing itself. But the opposition to it showed also that with man naturally the law was more to his taste: he who was still drinking of the old wine would not immediately desire the new.

[3] The two incidents which raise the question of the Sabbath are given in almost precisely the same way in the three Gospels. In Matthew they are in different connections from those in which they are found in Mark and Luke; but in all their purport is the same: Christ the Lord of the Sabbath being rejected, they can claim no Sabbath; just as when, David the anointed king of Israel being a fugitive from the wrath of Saul, the show-bread became common food. Alas, Israel in a little while would keep their Sabbath with the Lord of it, crucified at their hands, lying in His guarded grave!

And at all times had mere ritualism lost the spirit of the law while retaining

* There is no thought of Christianity proper, or the Church, in all this. The Church is the heavenly bride, but of this the Baptist had no knowledge: nor did it form part of the Lord's teaching in the Gospels, but remained for the Spirit to bring out after His coming (John xvi. 12, 13). The Lord's words and those of the Baptist are in the line of Old Testament thought.

b (6-11: to save or destroy.

b And it came to pass on [x]another sabbath that he entered into the synagogue and taught. And there was a man there, and his right hand was [y]withered And the scribes and Pharisees watched him, whether he would heal him on the sabbath-day: that they might find wherewith to [z]accuse him. But he [a]knew their thoughts, and said to the man who had the withered hand, Rise and stand in the midst: and he rose and stood. And Jesus said unto them, I ask you if it is lawful on the sabbath to do good or to do evil? to save life or destroy it. And having looked round upon them all, he said unto him, [b]Stretch forth thy hand. And he did so; and his hand was restored. But they were filled with madness,* and [c]spake to one another what they might do to Jesus.

5 (vi.12-49): Responsibilities and rewards of those that are with Him.

1 (12-19): Christ the source of authority and centre of power.

5. [1] And it came to pass in those days that he went out into the mountain to [d]pray; and he continued all night in prayer to God. And when it was day, he [e]called his disciples to him. And of them he chose twelve, whom also he named apostles: Simon, whom he also named Peter, and Andrew his brother, and James, and John, and Philip, and Bartholomew, and Matthew, and Thomas, James [the son] of Alphæus, and Simon who was called [the] Zealot, and Judas [the brother] of James, and Judas Iscariot who became the traitor. And x Matt. 12.9-13. Mk. 3. 1-5. cf. ch. 13.11-17.

y cf. Rom. 8. 3. cf. Ezek. 37. 11.
z cf. ch. 20. 20.
a cf. Jno. 2. 25. cf. Jno. 6. 64.
b cf. Jno. 4. 50. cf. Jno. 9. 6, 7.
c cf. Jno. 5. 18. cf. Jno. 15. 22-25.
d ch. 5. 16. Matt. 14. 23.
e Matt. 10. 1-4. Mk. 3. 13-19. cf. Jno. 1. 40-51. cf. Acts 1. 12.

* Literally, "unreasoning fury."

the form of it. The love to man which the seventh day rest breathed had passed into a rigid exaction which rather slew than saved. In the story of the withered hand this is fully manifest, and in the miracle which is wrought, the Lord brings in the power of God to bear witness against it. But the Pharisees and scribes are only the more roused to madness, and commune one with another what they might do to Jesus.

5. Thus He is more distinctly than before rejected of Israel in the persons of their leaders, and takes His place as such. In answer to their attitude He gathers His disciples round Him, and chooses from them twelve as His "apostles," or "sent ones," to be the witnesses and heralds of the new Kingdom coming in. In their presence and that of a great multitude as well of His disciples as of those from all the country round about attracted by His power and grace, He declares the blessedness, responsibilities, and recompence of those that cleave to Him, the heirs of the Kingdom. They are in a scene characterized by His rejection, and sufferers for His sake, only thus the more blessed, not the less. The end would declare it.

What we have here is, no doubt, "the sermon on the mount," but with abridgment as well as additions, according to Luke's purpose. The remnant character of those that are with Him is very strongly emphasized.

[1] Christ is here the source of authority and the centre of power. As He had already told the people of Nazareth, grace will not be stopped in its outflow by the opposition of men. "The Man Christ Jesus," Himself the expression of eternal counsels, in the sweet dependence of perfect humanity, and the perfect intimacy of the Son with the Father, goes up to God upon the mountain, and continues there all night in prayer to God. It is the anticipation of the place He has now taken, and all that follows is the fruit of that intercession. But thus the wisdom of God which is in it appears in the form of human weakness. He names the twelve, and among them is a traitor. The rest are fishermen and he descended with them, and stood on a level place, and a great multitude of his disciples, and a [f]great number of people from all Judea, and Jerusalem, and the sea-coast of Tyre and Sidon, who came to hear him, and to be healed of their diseases; and those that were beset with unclean spirits were healed. And all the multitude sought to [g]touch him: for power came forth from him and healed them all.

2 (20-26): the separation of His disciples, and contrast in blessing or woe.

[2] And he, lifting up his eyes upon his disciples, said, [h]Blessed are ye [i]poor: for yours is the kingdom of God. Blessed are ye that [j]hunger now: for ye shall be filled. Blessed are ye that [k]weep now: for ye shall laugh. Blessed are ye when men shall [l]hate you, and when they shall separate you from them, and shall reproach you, and cast out your name as evil for the Son of man's sake. [m]Rejoice in that day, and leap for joy: for behold, your reward is great in heaven; for in the same manner did their fathers to the [n]prophets. But [o]woe unto you that are rich: for ye have received your consolation. Woe unto you that are [p]filled: for ye shall hunger. Woe unto you that [q]laugh now: for ye shall mourn and weep. Woe unto you when all men shall [r]speak well of you: for in the [s]same manner did their fathers unto the false prophets.

3 (27-31): the return of good for evil.

[3] But I say unto you that hear, [t]Love your enemies; do good to those that hate you; [u]bless those that curse you; [v]pray for those that despitefully use you. To

[f] Matt. 4.25. Mk. 3. 7, 8.
[g] Matt. 14. 36. Mk. 5. 28-30.
[h] Matt. 5.1-12.
[i] Matt. 11.5.
[j] ch. 1. 53.
[k] cf. 1 Pet. 1. 6, 7.
[l] Jno. 16.1-3.
[m] cf. Acts 5. 41.
[n] cf. Acts 7. 52.
[o] cf. Jas. 5.1. cf. 1 Tim. 5. 9.
[p] cf. ch. 12.15-21.
[q] cf. Prov. 1. 24-28.
[r] cf. Jno. 15. 18.
[s] cf. 1 Ki. 22. 6-8.
[t] ver. 35. Matt. 5. 43, 44. Rom. 12. 20.
[u] Rom. 12. 14. cf. 1 Cor. 4. 12.
[v] cf. ch. 23. 34, 35. cf. Acts 7. 60.

what not; not a sign among them of what naturally we should take for power; and the three most prominent, frequently made so, as it would seem, by their lack of apprehension of His mind and fellowship with Him. We see plainly that without Him they can do nothing. He is all of wisdom to them, all of power. They, like the crowd that swarm to Him from the regions round, are joined to Him by their absolute need of Him, their entire dependence on Him. A Judas even must serve Him. How we see the Christianity that is to spring out of this! The whole of Christianity is Christ: "Christ is all and in all" (Col. iii. 11).

[2] We see this strikingly in what follows here, in which His disciples are separated from all the world about them by this fact, that they are His. The world is in opposition to Him and to His. It hates them, separates them from it, casts out their name as evil for the Son of man's sake. Thus for them it has nothing. They are the "poor," the hungry, the weepers, the afflicted in it. Yet well may they rejoice: for their reward is great in heaven; on earth they but continue the line of the prophets rejected by the world from of old.

On the other hand, and for the same reason, those who are satisfied with it, and the world with them, have their part in the woes that are coming on the world. And He cannot leave this to inference, for He is the Saviour of sinners and His heart goes after them: in its very denunciations grace overflows. But this changes nothing as to the final end: rather does it assure us how fixed and unalterable that end must be.

[3] But the Lord goes on to speak of what the conduct of His disciples is to be in the midst of a world in opposition to them. To those whose ears are open to His words He says, "Love your enemies; do good to those that hate you; bless those that curse you; pray for those that despitefully use you." This rule of returning good for evil is that which He has so bountifully illustrated in His own person, and of which the Cross is the supreme example. The precept of him that [w]smiteth thee upon the cheek, offer also the other; and to him that [x]taketh away thy cloak forbid not thy coat also. [y]Give to every one that asketh thee; and from him that taketh away thy goods ask them not back. And [z]as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise.

4 (32-35): tested by the way of the world.

[4] And [a]if ye love them that love you, what thank have ye? for sinners also love those that love them. And if ye do good to those that do good to you, what thank have ye? for sinners also do the same. And if ye lend to those of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? even sinners lend to sinners to receive again as much. But love your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing back; * and your [b]reward shall be great, and ye shall be the sons of the Most High: for he is kind to the unthankful and the evil.

5 (36-38): under the Father's government.

[5] Be [c]merciful, as your Father is merciful; and [d]judge not, and ye shall not be judged; and condemn not, and ye shall not be condemned; [e]release, and ye shall be released; [f]give, and it shall be given unto you: good measure, pressed down, shaken together, running over, shall they give into your bosom. For [g]with what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again.

6 (39-45): the overcoming of evil.

[6] He spake unto them also a parable: Can the [h]blind lead the blind? will they not both fall into the ditch?

w Matt. 5. 39. cf. Is. 50. 6. cfr. Acts 23. 2, 3.
x cf. 1 Cor. 6. 7, 8. Matt. 5. 40.
y cf. Deut. 15. 7-10. cf. 1 Jno. 3. 17. cf. Gal. 6. 9. Matt. 5. 42.
z Matt. 7. 12. cf. Gal. 5. 14. cf. Rom. 13. 8-10.
a Matt. 5. 46, 47.
b Matt. 5. 45. cf. Matt. 6. 4. cf. ch. 14. 14. cf. Matt. 25. 34, 35. c cf. Matt. 5. 48. cf. Eph. 5. 1, 2. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 15, 16.
d Matt. 7. 1, 2. cf. Rom. 14. 10-13. cf. Jas. 4. 11. cf. 1 Cor. 5. 12, 13.
e cf. Matt. 6. 14, 15. cf. Matt. 18. 23-35.
f Prov. 28. 27.

* Some render, "despairing of none." But the text is clearly right. cf. Gal. 6. 7-10; cf. Eccl. 11. 1, 2.

g Mk. 4. 24; Jas. 2. 13; cf. Rev. 18. 6.

h Matt. 15. 14; cf. Is. 9. 16; cf. Matt. 23. 24; cf. Mal. 2. 7, 8.

non-resistance which follows it we have already remarked upon in going through Matthew. The bountiful spirit which becomes those who owe their all to the free gift of God is enforced in the words, "Give to every one that asketh thee," —words which surely require the wisdom inspired by divine love to guide in their application. This part closes with the general principle that "as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise."

4 The way of the world is put in contrast with this, the world being quite capable of returning love for love, of doing good to those who do good to them, of lending with the hope of getting back as much. But to love and do good and lend without hope of return: this would be conduct suited to the sons of the Most High; because He is kind to the unthankful and the evil.

5 Thus we are to be imitators of God as dear children, and under a Father's holy government also, according to which the measure meted will be measured out; and this as what both suits the nature of God, and the truest interests of His people also. It is evident, therefore, that rewards are not intended to be denied, nor yet disregarded: for that which God gives it cannot but be of God that it should have place in our thoughts and in our hearts. Seeing what we are, this needs and receives careful guarding. We find it so again and again:—guarded, but maintained in this very way (Matt. xix. 27–30, xx. 20–28, notes). He gains who for Christ's sake loses; but not for gain's sake.

6 The "blind" are primarily, no doubt, the Jewish leaders; but the follower will not escape the ditch by being simply a follower: for the truth speaks for itself to him who has ears to hear. He who gives himself up to another's leadership absolutely, has his conscience not before God, but before man; and even the Lord bases His title to be heard upon the truth of what He spoke: "If I say the truth, why do ye not believe Me?" (John viii. 46.) That to

The [t]disciple is not above the teacher, but every one that is perfected shall be as his teacher. But [j]why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, and considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye? [k]How canst thou say to thy brother, Brother, let me cast out the mote out of thine eye, and beholdest not the beam that is in thine eye? Hypocrite, cast out first the beam out of thine eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote that is in thy brother's eye. For there is [l]no good tree which bringeth forth corrupt fruit, nor again a corrupt tree bringing forth good fruit. For every tree is known by its own fruit: for of thorns they do not gather figs, nor gather in grapes from a bramble. The [m]good man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is good; and the evil one out of that which is evil bringeth forth evil: for out of the abundance of the heart his mouth speaketh.

7 (46–49): the complete disciple.

[7] But [n]why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say? [o]Every one that cometh to me and heareth my words and doeth them, I will show you what he is like: he is like a man building a house, who digged and went [p]deep, and laid a foundation upon the [q]rock; and when a [r]flood came, the stream brake against that house, and was [s]not able to shake it, because it had been built upon the rock.* But he that heareth and doeth not is like a man who [t]without a foundation buildeth a house upon the earth; against which the stream brake, and immediately it fell in, and the ruin of that house was [u]great.

* Many read only "well builded."

t (Matt.10.24. Jno. 15. 20. cf. 2 Pet. 1. 14.
j Matt. 7. 3. cf. Gal. 6.1.
k cf. 2 Cor. 10. 6. cf. Rom. 2. 21-23.
l Matt. 7.17, 18. Matt.12.33
m Matt. 12. 34, 35. cf. Prov. 4. 23. cf. Gal.5.19 -23.
n Matt.7. 21 -23. *cf.*ch.13.25. cfr. 1 Cor. 12. 3.
o Matt. 7.24 -27.
p cf. Matt. 13. 5.
q cf. 1 Cor.3. 11.
r Ps. 32. 6.
s cf. John 5. 24. cf. 1 Jno. 4. 17. cf. Rom. 8. 33, 34.
t *cf.*Is.28.14-17. cfr. Prov. 10. 25.
u *cf.*Prov.1. 24-27. cf. Heb. 10. 28, 29.

which a man yields himself necessarily moulds him. If then he surrenders himself to the teacher of error, he will not be above his teacher, but, if he is perfect, be only like him.

On the other hand, if evil be detected in another's eye—in his way of regarding things (and here the teacher of error seems still primarily pointed at)—one must take care that there be no lack of self-judgment as to one's own. Evil must first be judged within before it can be judged outside; and this will give tenderness and compassion, as well as clear sightedness. Judging without self-judgment is but hypocrisy.

And this self-judgment is always of the "beam" as compared with the "mote" in others. For what can we know of others compared with what we may and should know of ourselves? And then the evil fruit we find is but the sign of an evil tree: thorns grow no figs, nor brambles grapes. Thus true self-judgment sets aside self altogether. We do not judge to establish our own righteousness, nor as rejoicing in the evil, but as rejoicing with the good: we learn to "take forth the precious from the vile," because the good is "precious."

[7] Useless indeed is the profession of the lips,—the saying, "Lord, Lord,"—except the life confirm it. Not that the best life will justify before God, or save in the day when all that can be will be shaken. But it is evidence, nevertheless, that Christ is the foundation of the soul,—of a house built secure against all the storms that can assail it. Faith in Christ must, of course, be real; but the more real the faith in other things, the more complete is the delusion, the surer and more fatal the ruin that awaits one. "The ruin of that house is great."

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chaps. vii.–viii. 21.)

The Word as the Ministry of Salvation.

P (vii. 1-17): "Living and powerful."
1 (1-10): supreme over all power.

1. [1] WHEN he had [v]completed all his sayings in the hearing of the people, he entered into Capernaum. And a certain [w]centurion's servant, who was dear to him, was sick and at the point of death. And when he heard of Jesus, he sent to him elders of the Jews, asking him that he would come and heal his servant. And they, when they had come to Jesus, besought him earnestly, saying, He is [x]worthy to whom thou shouldest grant this: for he loveth our nation, and himself hath builded the synagogue for us. And Jesus went with them; but when he was already not far from the house, the centurion sent [y]friends to him, saying unto him, Lord, trouble not thyself; for I am not fit that thou shouldest enter under my roof; wherefore neither thought I myself worthy to come unto thee, but say in a word and my servant shall be healed. For I am also

[v] Matt. 8. 1.
[w] Matt. 8. 5-13.
[x] cfr. ver. 7. cf. ch. 13. 14.
[y] cf. ver. 3.

SUBD. 2.

We have now the Word as that by which the ministry of salvation is effected; the language being still often, as that of the synoptic Gospels so much is, symbolic, and the healing of the body illustrative of that deeper spiritual healing which it is so well qualified to picture to us, and which is so in the mind of the Spirit to keep before us. This fuller blessing, without which there is none, comes moreover continually into more open view, and its features are revealed with growing fulness.

1. The two narratives with which this part opens show us in the most striking way the power of the divine Word as Christ utters it. The first is the story of the centurion in whom the Lord finds greater faith than He had found in Israel: a faith which owns the Lord's supremacy, whether present or absent, over all the powers of nature which are obedient to His will. The second is that of the raising of the widow's son at Nain, which shows that giving way to His word which is the stamp upon the fallen creature; the removal of which is the significant pledge of power come in able to deliver from the condition itself of which it is the stamp. Here then, is indeed a "word living and powerful," as the epistle to the Hebrews calls it (chap. iv. 12), and ready as well as competent to meet man's need.

[1] Matthew gives us the healing of the centurion's servant, but in another connection, and with certain differences, which have occasioned question. For Luke represents not only the elders of the Jews as first sent with prayer that Jesus would come and heal the sick man, but that, while He is upon the road, the friends of the centurion are sent with a second message, which excuses his not coming in person by his felt unworthiness. In Matthew we are told the centurion came; but his words are to the same effect as those of his friends in Luke. It seems, therefore, that the account in the former is to be explained by the latter: the Gentile Gospel taking care to show fully the humble place that the Gentile took, both in making use of the Jewish elders, and in not actually coming to the Lord Himself. The faith at which the Lord wonders is related in both; while the Jewish writer it is who gives, and in fullest accord with the dispensational character of his book, the warning to the Jews of the rejection of children of the Kingdom, while those of the nations should come in from every quarter to partake in its blessings with the patriarchs of Israel.

The Roman soldier sees everywhere in the world the law and order which Rome so emphasized. But he sees it to draw an argument from it for the absoa man set under [z]authority, having under me soldiers, and I say to this one, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh, and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it. Now when Jesus heard these things he wondered at him, and turning to the multitude following him, said, I say unto you, that not even in [a]Israel have I found faith so great. And they that had been sent, returning to the house, found the servant [b]whole that had been sick.*

2 (11-17): death subject to it.

2 And it came to pass afterwards† he went into a city called [c]Nain; and his disciples went with him, and a great multitude. Now, as he drew near to the gate of the city, behold, there was a dead man carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a [d]widow; and quite a multitude of the city was with her. And when the Lord saw her he had compassion on her, and said unto her, [e]Weep not. And coming up to it, he touched the bier; and the bearers stood still; and he said, Young man, I say to thee, Arise. And the [f]dead sat up and began to speak; and he gave him to his mother. And fear took hold on all, and they [g]glorified God, saying, A great prophet is risen up among us, and God hath [h]visited his people. And this word went forth concerning him in all Judea, and in all the region round about.

z cf. ch. 5. 24.

a cf. Matt. 15. 27, 28.

b cf. Jno. 4. 50-53. cf. Ps. 107. 20. cf. Jer. 23. 23.

c cf. Ruth 1. 20. cf. 2 Ki. 2. 19. cf. 1 Jno. 2. 16, 17.

d cf. 2 Ki. 4. 1. cf. Lam. 1. 1.

e cf. ch. 8. 52. cf. Jno. 11. 35.

f cf. Matt. 11. 5. cf. Jno. 11. 43, 44.

g cf. ch. 8. 54, 55.

h ch. 1. 68. cf. Jer. 29. 10.

* Many omit this last clause. † Many read "on the next day."

lute authority of Him whom his faith owns as having supreme power over all the powers of nature. He himself, only a man under authority, could speak and be obeyed; it needed not, then, the presence of Jesus—He needed not to put His own hand to the work, when all things served Him. We have only to compare the wonder of His disciples when He calmed the the sea of Galilee, to realize how indeed the faith of the Gentile surpassed that of the Lord's nearest and chosen followers.

2 The story of Nain is found in Luke only. Nain means "pleasant," what the world was as God made it; what it is still naturally to the natural man. But at the gate of it, carried out, is a dead man, death being still the way out of the world, as it is the shadow over it. The widowed mother, whose only son he is, and the sympathetic crowd that follows, show in how many ways death affects the survivors. The consequences of it, which lie in another world, are not introduced into this picture, but man's conscience will not allow him to forget them: "the sting of death is sin," which threatens the soul with judgment.

Thus the pleasant world is become the "valley of death-shade," and as such Christ has come to it in His infinite compassion, as He comes here to Nain. To the sorrowing mother He says, "Weep not," and His is no fruitless sympathy. He touches the bier, as touch it Himself He must, by His death to give His word power over it. Then the word is spoken which abolishes it, and the dead man rises. He "sat up and began to speak; and He gave him to his mother."

Here, then, is man's need fully met, the judgment which is upon him, all that sin and death imply, has found a remedy. The people fear, and glorify God; and the word goes out throughout all Judea that a great prophet is risen up, and God hath visited His people: a testimony true indeed, but quite below the wondrous truth as to His Person who was there.

2 (vii. 18–35): The twofold testimony of God, demanding faith on man's part.
1 (18–23): the sufficiency of witness to Christ.

2. [1] And the disciples of John brought him word of all these things; and calling two of his disciples, John [t]sent them to the Lord,* saying, Art thou the one that is coming, or wait we for another? And when the men came to him, they said, John the Baptist hath sent us unto thee, saying, Art thou the one that is coming, or wait we for another? In that hour he healed many of diseases and plagues and evil spirits; and to many that were blind he gave sight. And he answered and said to them, Go and bring John word what ye have seen and heard. The [j]blind recover sight; the [k]lame walk; the [l]lepers are cleansed; the [m]deaf hear; the [n]dead are raised up; the [o]poor have good news preached to them;† and [p]blessed is he who shall not be stumbled by me.

2 (24–35): His testimony to John and the rejection of both John and Himself, except by a remnant.

[2] And when the messengers of John had departed, he began to say unto the multitudes concerning John: [q]What went ye out into the wilderness to behold? a [r]reed shaken by the wind? But what went ye out to

t Matt.11.2-6.
j cf. ch.4.18, 19. cf. Matt. 9. 27-31.
k cf. Matt. 15. 31.
l ch.5.12-14.
m Mk. 7.32-37.
n vers.14,15.
o cf. ch. 14. 12-24.
p cf. Matt. 16. 17. *cf.*1Pet.2.8.
q Matt. 11.7-11.
r cf. Eph. 4. 14. *cf.*Jas.1.6,7.

* One ancient MSS. reads "Jesus." † Literally, "are evangelized."

2. The twofold testimony of God which man needs and which God has provided is now shown us in John and the Lord: John the preacher of repentance, the witness to man's condition, the summing up of the Old Testament controversy with man, while pointing forward, as the Old Testament did, to Him who was to come; Christ the Bringer of salvation, the New Testament Voice, the Manifester of God to men, and who opens the way to God for men.

Repentance and faith are the double answer to this double testimony, though neither of these can exist without the other. They are the backward and forward glances of the soul, and which are at the same time its downward and upward ones. Or, conversion being the "turning round" of man, repentance is the back turned upon self, as faith is the face turned toward God in Christ. Repentance is as inseparable, therefore, from faith, as faith is from repentance.

The testimony of John and of Christ come in, then, in this place with perfect naturalness; and in the contrast between them their accord is manifest. In both, divine wisdom will be justified by her children, and the refusal of the one will be seen, as in Israel's case, to be the refusal of the other.

[1] But first we have to see the Baptist in his prison perplexed with doubt, as to which he sends two of his disciples to Christ, that He may satisfy it. "Art Thou the One that is coming?" is his question, "or wait we for another?" Honest doubt never stays away from Christ, but comes to Him for solution. The Lord points him to the works which at that very time He was doing, the power of God being manifested in various goodness, while the gospel-tidings were being given to the poor. Not wonders alone were evidence, but wonders that were "signs"—significant of the nature and power of Him from whom they proceeded. While all the time the sweet gospel invitation addressed itself to the needy, most Godlike in coming lowest down.

The Lord adds one gentle word for the conscience of His fore-runner: "And blessed is he who shall not be stumbled by Me." (See pp. 122, 123, notes.)

[2] The messengers departed with this, and now, when John may seem to have failed entirely in his witness, the Lord bears witness to him. Be it that he had failed, was it in vain that crowds had gone out into the wilderness after him? Was he then but a reed shaken with the wind? Was he a courtier of men, clothed in soft raiment? did they look for such in the wilderness, rather than in the courts of kings? Certainly, his whole life proved him far other than these.

see? a man clothed in [s]soft raiment? behold, they that are in splendid apparel, and live luxuriously are in kings' courts. But what went ye out to see? a prophet? Yea, I say unto you, and [t]more than a prophet. This is he of whom it is written, [u]Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, who shall prepare thy way before thee. For I say unto you, Among those born of woman there is none greater than John; but he who is [v]less in the kingdom of God is greater than he. (And all the people who heard, and the tax-gatherers, justified God, being baptized with the baptism of John; but the [w]Pharisees and lawyers rejected for themselves the counsel of God, having not been baptized of him.) To what, then, shall I [x]liken the men of this generation, and to what are they like? They are like children sitting in the market-place, and calling one to another, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned, and ye have not wept. For John the Baptist came [y]neither eating bread nor drinking wine, and ye say, He hath a demon. The Son of man is come [z]eating and drinking, and ye say, Behold, a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber, a friend of tax-gatherers and sinners! And wisdom is [a]justified by all her children.

s Matt. 3. 4. cf. 2 Ki. 1. 8. cf. ch. 16. 19.

t cf. Jno. 1. 21, ctr. Jno. 1. 27.

u Mal. 3. 1.

v cf. Matt. 13. 17. cf. Eph. 3. 5.

w cf. Matt. 21. 23-27. cf. Matt. 23. 13, etc.

x Matt. 11. 16-19.

y ch. 1. 15.

z cf. ver. 36. cf. ch. 15. 1, 2.

a cf. 1 Cor. 1. 21-24.

3 (vii. 36-50): A spiritual transformation, and the secret of it.

3. And one of the Pharisees asked him to [b]eat with him; and he entered into the Pharisee's house and sat down [to meat].* And behold, a woman that was in

b cf. ch. 14. 1.

* Literally, "reclined."

But what was it, then, that drew men after him? Was he a prophet? Yea, says the Lord, and more than a prophet: he was one of whom the prophet had spoken, as the messenger of God before Messiah's face, to prepare His way before Him.

Such then was John, the preparer for the Kingdom of God; as great in this position as any of women born; yet the one comparatively little, actually in the Kingdom thus announced, would be greater than he. (See pp. 123, 124, notes.)

But in fact John's message had been rejected by the leaders of the nation, the Pharisees and lawyers, while only those classed by these as "sinners" had heard and been baptized by him. These owned the righteousness of God in pressing upon them through John their need of repentance; but the others rejected for themselves the counsel of God, and were not baptized of him. Thus a remnant only of the people, and these the outcasts, were ready for the grace which now addressed itself to them. As to that generation at large, they could only be compared to children sitting in the market-place, triflers who would have had John dance to their piping, and the Lord and His disciples weep when they mourned. They understood not, for they were too careless to understand, either the one or the other. To them John was but a demoniac; Christ a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber, to be judged according to the company He kept. The children of wisdom alone justified wisdom's ways: and who, then, were these children of wisdom? The answer to this is given us in what immediately follows now.

3. That which follows is one of those stories peculiar to Luke and characterizing it, the story of the woman in the Pharisee's house: the woman a "sinner;" the Pharisee one of those "ninety and nine just persons" of whom the

the city, a [c]sinner; and when she knew that he sat at meat in the Pharisee's house, brought an alabaster box of [d]ointment, and standing behind at his feet, weeping, she began to wet his feet with her [e]tears, and wiped them with the [f]hairs of her head, and [g]kissed his feet and anointed them with the ointment. Now, when the Pharisee that had bidden him saw it, he spake within himself, saying, [h]This man, if he were a prophet, would have known who and what manner of woman this is that toucheth him, that she is a sinner. And Jesus answered and said to him, Simon, I have somewhat to say to thee. And he saith, Teacher, say on. A certain creditor had two debtors: the one owed [i]five hundred pence,* and the other [j]fifty. And they having [k]nothing to pay, he [l]forgave them both: which of them therefore will love him most? Simon answered and said, I suppose, he to whom he forgave most. And he said unto him, Thou hast rightly judged. And turning to the woman, he said unto Simon, Beholdest thou this woman? I entered into thy house; [m]thou gavest me no water for my feet, but she hath wetted my feet with her tears, and wiped them with her hair. Thou gavest me no kiss;

c cf. Jno. 8. 3, etc.

d cf. Ex. 30. 22–33 with Song 1. 3, 12. cf. Jno. 12. 3, etc.

e cf. 1 Tim. 1. 13–15. cf. ch. 18. 13.

f cf. 1 Cor. 11. 15 with Phil. 3. 4–7.

g cf. 2 Cor. 5. 14, 15.

h ch. 15. 2. ch. 19. 7.

i cf. 1 Cor. 15. 9.

j cf. Jno. 19. 38.

k cf. Rom. 3. 20. cf. Rom. 5. 6.

l cf. Eph. 1. 7. cf. Rom. 5. 15, 16.

m ctr. ch. 19. 6.

* denarii.

Lord afterwards speaks, and whom He puts there in contrast with the "lost." Here it is the Pharisee who invites the contrast.

They had called Him the "Friend of sinners." We see here how truly He was that, and in what manner: what sinners gained from that wondrous friendship. We see a spiritual transformation wrought, and wisdom justified in a child of wisdom, a sinner transformed. We see how sanctification comes from salvation, or, indeed, is the internal part of it; and that there is nothing holier than the gospel grace.

Asked by a Pharisee to eat with him, Jesus enters the house and takes His place at table. And there it is—strange place for such a meeting—a woman in the city who is a sinner, having heard that He is in the house, draws near and stands behind Him weeping, her tears falling upon His feet. With the hairs of her head she wipes them off, and kissing His feet, anoints them with the ointment which she has brought with her.

Sinner she is, yet the knowledge of it does not keep her back; rather it gives her boldness to be there where of all places, perhaps, she would find the most unsparing judgment. But His shield shall be over her—the Friend of sinners: how differently does that sound to her, and to the Pharisee whose house she has entered!

Indeed he is already astir, his mind drawing its conclusion against One who can permit the familiarity that a woman like this is showing. But even He, he reasons, must be ignorant of her character. A prophet would have known; but a prophet could not have permitted defilement such as this. The Lord answers his unspoken thoughts and makes him judge of himself as compared with this woman whom he condemns; a sinner, truly, but a forgiven sinner. Surely, he too could not deny himself to be a sinner! and if so, did he not know for himself the sweet sanctifying power of forgiveness,—the outflow of heart to God who has forgiven? Perhaps, indeed, he had not sinned as she: could God then forgive the debt of fifty pence, but not the five hundred? And if to her the larger debt had been remitted, could he not recognize in these tears, this abandonment of ecstatic emotion, in contrast with his own cold treatment of the but she, from the time I came in, hath not ceased to kiss my feet. My head with oil thou didst not anoint; but she hath anointed my feet with ointment. Wherefore I say unto thee, her sins—the many—are [n] forgiven: for she loved much; but he to whom little is forgiven [o] loveth little. And he said unto her, Thy sins are forgiven. And those who were at meat with him began to say among themselves, [p] Who is this that forgiveth sins also? And he saith unto the woman, Thy faith hath saved thee: [q] go in peace.

4 (viii. 1-21): The seed testing the soil.
1 (1-3): gathering.

4. [1] And it came to pass afterwards that he [r] went throughout [the country], city by city and village by village, preaching and announcing the good tidings of the kingdom of God; and the twelve [were] with him, and certain women who had been [s] healed of evil spirits and infirmities, Mary who was called Magdalene, out of whom had gone seven demons, and Joanna the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, and Susanna, and many others, who [t] ministered to him of their substance.

2 (4-8): the diverse growth.

[2] And a great multitude coming together, and those who were coming to him out of every city, he spake by a parable: The [u] sower went forth to sow his seed;

n cf. 1 Jno. 1. 9.
o cf. 1 Jno. 4. 19. cf. 1 Tim. 1. 14-17.
p cf. Matt. 9. 3-6.
q ch. 8. 48. Jno. 8. 11.
r cf. Mk. 1. 38.
s Matt. 27. 55, 56. cf. Mk. 16. 9.
t cf. ch. 4. 38, 39. cf. Mk. 5. 18.
u Matt. 13. 3-8. Mk. 4. 3-8.

Guest he had invited, the sense of that larger debt which made her in a Pharisee's eyes a sinner indeed?

But remitted! Yes, it was the consciousness of that remission which had wrought in her after this manner. Even he should understand—could understand in the case of a common debtor; though himself having been forgiven little, he loved but little.

Thus the Pharisee is set in the light of God, and his inmost heart searched out, while He who reveals Himself in doing this, openly takes the place which the woman's faith before had given Him, and confirms to her that which she in her simplicity had appropriated already. "And He said unto her, Thy sins are forgiven." If they murmur at His words, only the more positively does He reiterate them: "And He said unto the woman, Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace."

4. [1] We have seen, then, the power of the Word in the soul of one that receives it; all the more that, as we saw her first, she had as yet had no word distinctly addressed to herself to assure her of the blessing which she grasps with such effect. We now go on to see how the fruits produced characterize the reception of it,—how the seed tests the soil. This is shown in that familiar parable of the Sower, which we have had already in the two previous Gospels, here given a slightly abbreviated form, and without the parables which accompany it in them. As an introduction to it, however, we are shown as fruit of the Word the company of disciples who now follow the Lord, and some of whom minister to Him of their substance. It is here first we find those faithful women who follow Him to the cross itself, and at the sepulchre greet Him first in resurrection. Their own deliverance has attached them to Him, and He on His part receives their services, emancipating them from the harsh restrictions of Rabbinism, which put the woman into a not merely inferior but a degraded place. The twelve are also with Him, and throughout all Galilee, with the testimony of word and work, goes also that of the new communion of faith and love which Christianity was fully and universally to establish.

[2, 3] People gather together to Him out of every city around; and in the midst of such a multitude it is that the Lord searches out the heart (as so commonly He does where the crowds follow Him) by the parable of the Sower.

and, as he sowed, some fell by the [v]wayside, and it was trodden under foot, and the [w]birds of heaven devoured it. And other fell upon the [x]rock, and when it had sprung up it withered away, because it had no [y]moisture. And other fell in the midst of [z]thorns, and the thorns sprang up with it and choked it. And other fell into [a]good ground, and sprang up, and brought forth fruit a hundredfold. And when he had said these things, he cried, He that hath [b]ears to hear, let him hear.

[2] (9-18): the interpretation; all to be manifested.

[3] And his disciples [c]asked him, What may this parable be? And he said, To you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God, but to the rest in parables, that seeing they may not see, and hearing they may not understand. But the parable is this: The seed is the [d]word of God. Now those by the wayside are those that hear: then cometh the [e]devil and taketh away the word from their hearts, that they may not believe and be saved. But those upon the rock are those who when they hear receive the word with [f]joy; and these have no root, who for awhile believe, and in time of temptation fall away. But that which fell among thorns, these are they that hear, and as they go on their way are choked under anxieties and [g]riches and pleasures of life, and bring no fruit to perfection. But that on the good ground, these are they who, in an [h]honest and good heart, having heard the word, keep it and bring forth fruit with [i]patience.

Now no one that hath lighted a [j]lamp covereth it with a vessel or putteth it under a [k]bed, but putteth it upon a lamp-stand, that those who enter in may [l]see the light. For there is nothing [m]hidden that shall not be made manifest, nor secret that shall not be known and come out openly. Take [n]heed, therefore, how ye hear: for whosoever hath, to him shall be given; and whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he seemeth to have.

[4] (19-21): the ways that test men

[4] And there [o]came to him his mother and his brethren, and could not get to him because of the crowd. And it was told him, Thy mother and thy brethren stand without, desiring to see thee. And he answering said to them, My mother and my brethren are these who [p]hear the word of God and do it.

v cf. Acts 17. 18-21.
w cf. 2 Cor. 4. 3, 4.
x cf. Jer. 5. 3. etc. Acts 2. 37. cf. Ps. 51. 17.
y cf. Jno. 3. 5.
z cf. Gen. 3. 18. cf. ch. 18. 24. 25.
a cf. Acts 16. 14, 27-30.
b Matt. 11. 15. Matt. 13. 9. Mk. 4. 9.
c Matt. 13. 10-23. Mk. 4. 10-20. d 1 Pet. 1. 23.
e cf. Acts 13. 10. cf. 1 Cor. 2. 14.
f cf. Gal. 4. 15. etc. 1 Thess. 1. 6. cf. Jno. 9. 22. cf. 1 Thess. 3. 3-5.
g 1 Tim. 6. 9, 10. cf. 2 Tim. 4. 10.
h cf. Ps. 32. 2, 5.
i cf. Rom. 2. 7. cf. Heb. 10. 36.
j Matt. 5. 14-16. Mk. 4. 21-23. ch. 11. 33.
k etr. ch. 12. 19.
l cf. 2 Cor. 3. 2. cf. Phil. 2. 15, 16.
m Matt. 10. 26. ch. 12. 2. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 10.
n Matt. 13. 12. Mk. 4. 24, 25.
o Matt. 12. 46-50. Mk. 3. 31-35.
p cf. Matt. 25. 40. cf. Heb. 2. 11.

No fruit is to be got from man for God, except as the word of God produces it; but with the same seed and the same Sower, how different are the results! The devil, the flesh, and the world are in triple league against God and His word, and man is traitor to himself in listening to them. All this, however, has been already dwelt upon. The closing verses are substantially as in Mark (iv. 22–25).

[4] The following verses are also in both the other Synoptists, though here somewhat briefer and in different connection. They complete, in the place in which they stand in Luke, the view of the relation of the word of God to salvation and fruitfulness for God, and carry us on in principle to Christianity, which develops and manifests this.

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chaps. viii. 22–ix. 36.)
The Fulness of Salvation.

1 (viii.22-25): Peace in Him who is supreme over all.

1. NOW it came to pass on one of those days that he [q]entered into a ship, and his disciples. And he said unto them, Let us go over unto the other side of the lake: and they set out. And as they sailed, he fell [r]asleep. And there came down a squall of wind upon the lake; and they were filling, and were in jeopardy. And they came to him and awoke him, saying, [s]Master, master, we perish. And he arose, and rebuked the wind and the raging of the water; and they ceased, and there was a calm. And he said to them, [t]Where is your faith? But they were afraid and wondered, saying one to another, [u]Who then is this, that he commandeth both the winds and the water, and they obey him?

2 (viii.26-39): Deliverance from the enemy.

2. And they [v]arrived at the country of the Gadarenes,* which is over against Galilee. And as he went out upon the land, a certain man met him from the city who had demons, and for a long time had put on [w]no clothes, and abode not in a house, but in the [x]tombs. But when he saw Jesus, he cried out, and fell down before him, and said with a loud voice, [y]What have I to do with thee, Jesus, [thou] Son of the Most High God?

q Matt. 8.23-27. Mk. 4. 35-41.
r cf. Jno.4.6. cf. Ps. 121. 3, 4.
s cf. Ps. 44. 23. cf. Matt.14. 30, 31.
t cf. ch. 9.41. ctr. Matt.8. 10.
u cf. ch.5.26, etc.
v Matt. 8.28-34. Mk. 5.1-20. w cf. Gen.3. 7-11.
x cf. Prov. 21. 16.
y cf. Mk. 1. 23, 24. cf. Jas.2.19.

*Some read, "Gerasenes."

SUBD. 3.

The third subdivision also for the most part simply puts together in different connection what Matthew and Mark have already given us. Together the details show us the fulness of salvation which Christ has provided for us, and which the opposition of the world only brings into fuller prominence. There must be deliverance out of it also, only we must not expect here the full Christian deliverance of the epistle to the Galatians, but a moral one rather, from its spirit and ways, the rejection of Christ being that of every follower of His, and faith, therefore, giving victory over it.

1. We have, first, deliverance from the power of circumstances through identification with Him who is supreme over all. Thus for faith there is peace through whatever storms: although this does not mean that the hearts of disciples are always on the level of their privileges. Here on the sea of Galilee they were plainly not so. Jesus was with them, that they knew; but He was asleep, and the winds and waves seemed to have no regard for Him. In their fear they rouse Him, to find relief in His display of a power with which they had not credited Him, but to meet the sorrowful reproof on His part, "Where is your faith?" In truth our prayers in their very urgency often betray our unbelief, and would reproach the Lord on His side with a passivity which is but a sign of the confidence that He would fain repose in us as those who know His truth and steadfastness. "He that feareth is not perfected in love"—His love: he has not learned as yet the lesson of such entire trustworthiness as is to be found in Him.

Peace, then, at all times, is God's provision for us; the greeting with which Christ ever meets us; the legacy which His death has left us. All winds and waves yield alike to Him; all things good and evil serve Him, and therefore serve His people, through His abiding care.

2. We have next the story of the demoniac possessed with the "legion," the

I beseech thee, torment me not. For he commanded the unclean spirit to come out from the man. For many times it had seized upon him, and he was kept bound with chains and fetters, and he [z]brake the bands and was driven by the demon into the deserts. And Jesus asked him, saying, [a]What is thy name? And he said, Legion: for many demons had entered into him. And they besought him that he would not command them to go away into the [b]abyss. Now there was there a herd of many swine feeding on the mountain; and they besought him that he would suffer them to enter into them. And he suffered them. And the demons went out of the man and entered into the [c]swine; and the herd rushed violently down the steep into the lake and were choked. Now when those that fed them saw what had taken place, they fled and told it in the city and in the country. And they went out to see what had come to pass, and came to Jesus, and found the man out of whom the demons had gone [d]sitting, [e]clothed, and in his [f]right mind at the feet of Jesus; and they were afraid. And those that had seen it told them how the man possessed by demons had been healed. Then the whole multitude of the surrounding country of the Gadarenes* asked him to [g]depart from them; for they were taken with great fear; and he entered into the ship and returned. But the man out of whom the demons had gone [h]besought him that he might be with him. But he sent him away, saying, 'Return to thy house, and relate how great things God hath done for thee. And he went away through the whole city, publishing how great things Jesus had done for him.

z cf. Rom. 8. 7.
a cf. Gen. 32. 27. cf. 1 John 1. 9.
b cf. Rev. 20. 1-3. cf. Jude 6.
c cf. ch. 15. 15. cf. 2 Pet. 2. 22.
d cf. Matt. 11. 28.
e cf. Phil. 3. 9.
f cf. 2 Tim. 1. 7.
g cf. Acts 16. 39. cf. ver. 28. cf. Matt. 25. 41.
h cf. ch. 18. 43. cf. Phil. 1. 23, 24.
i cf. ch. 5. 14. cf. Matt. 11. 20, etc. with John 4. 48. cf. Acts 4. 20.

3 (viii. 40-56): Faith realized and the dead raised
1 (40-42): the ruler.

3. [1] And it came to pass, when Jesus returned, that the multitude received him gladly, for they were all expecting him. And behold, there [j]came a man whose name was Jairus, and he was a ruler of the synagogue. And, falling at Jesus' feet, he besought him to come into his house; for he had an only [k]daughter about twelve years old, and she was dying.

j Matt. 9. 18, 26. Mk. 5. 22-43.
k cf. ch. 9. 38. cf. Is. 37. 22.

* Some read "Gerasenes."

picture of whose condition is as full as that in Mark, fuller than Matthew. We see the awful power of Satan over him whom he has enslaved, in contrast with the same man "sitting at the feet of Jesus, clothed and in his right mind."

We see also the world preferring Satan to the Deliverer, begging Him to depart, while the delivered man beseeches Him that he may be with Him. Yet the Lord dismisses him to be a witness for Him at home of the divine compassion which has wrought in his behalf.

3. After this we have the twofold story of the daughter of Jairus raised from the dead, and the faith that touched the hem of His garment, and found the healing that it anticipated from the touch. In this we have seen already a parabolic meaning, the divine and human sides of salvation being given in these intertwined miracles: the dead hearing the voice of the Son of God and living,

2 (42-48): the touch of faith.

[2] And as he went, the crowds thronged him. And a woman who had had an [l]issue of blood twelve years, who had [m]spent all her living upon physicians and could not be healed of any, came behind and [n]touched the border of his garment, and immediately her issue of blood stopped. And Jesus said, Who touched me? When all denied, Peter and those with him said, Master, the multitudes [o]throng thee and press on thee, and sayest thou, Who touched me? And Jesus said, Somebody hath touched me, for I know that [p]power is gone out of me. Now, when the woman saw that she was not hid, she came trembling, and falling down before him, [q]declared before all the people for what cause she had touched him, and how she was healed immediately. And he said to her, Be of good courage,* daughter: thy [r]faith hath healed thee; [s]go in peace.

3 (49-56): the raising of the dead.

[3] While he yet spake, there came one from the ruler of the synagogue's [house], saying, Thy daughter is [t]dead; trouble not the Teacher. But when Jesus heard it, he answered him, saying, [u]Fear not: only believe, and she shall be made whole. And when he came to the house, he [v]suffered no one to go in but Peter and John and James, and the father and mother of the child. And all were weeping and lamenting her; but he said, Weep not: for she is not dead, but [w]sleepeth. And they derided him, knowing that she had died. And he put them all out,* and took her by the [x]hand, and called, saying, Child, arise. And her spirit came again, and she rose straightway; and he commanded something to be given her to [y]eat. And her parents were astonished, but he enjoined them to [z]tell no one what had come to pass.

4 (ix.1-17): The world's need and the mercy of God.

1 (1-6): authority given.

4. [1] And having [a]called together the twelve, he gave them power and authority over all demons and to heal diseases, and sent them to preach the kingdom of God and to heal the sick. And he said unto them, Take [b]nothing for your journey, neither staff nor wallet, nor bread, nor money; neither have two coats apiece. And

* Many omit this clause.

l cf. Lev.15. 19.
m cf. Rom. 10. 3. *cf.*Gal.3.21. cf. Rom. 3. 20.
n cf. ch.5.13. cf. Rom. 4. 4, 5.
o cf. ch. 13. 25. *cf.*Matt.11. 20.
p cf. Matt. 15. 28. *cf.*ch. 5. 17.
q cf. Rom. 10. 10.
r ch. 7. 50.
s cf. Jno. 8. 11.
t cf. Ezek. 37. 11, 12.
u cf. Jno.11. 39, 40.
*v cf.*ch.9.28. *cf.*Matt. 26. 37. *cf.*Mk.13.3.
w Jno.11.11 -14.
x Mk. 1. 31. cf. Heb. 2. 14-16.
*y cf.*1 Pet.2. 2.
*z cfr.*ver.39. Matt. 8. 4. a Matt.10.1, etc. Mk.6.7-12.
b ch. 10. 4. ch. 22. 35. cf. 3 Jno.5-8. cf. 1 Cor. 9. 7, 14.

while faith draws from the Saviour the virtue that it needs. Matthew here is the briefest of the three Gospels, Mark's account somewhat the fullest; but of the differences we do not seem able to give a proper account.

4. [1] The Lord now sends out the twelve as messengers of His mercy in a needy world. They have authority over the power of Satan and disease, and are to preach the Kingdom of God, of which the miracles are signs and anticipants. This communicated authority is very significant: for as communicated it could not be supposed to be due to the character of those who were but the delegates of Another, yet as such clothed with power from God. Luke merely gives a partial outline of this commission, of which Matthew furnishes the full details. Here we have simply the breadth of their authority, the claim upon men which it carries with it, and the testimony against those who reject that claim. The evangelizing is in the forefront, but what hope for those who reject the precious whatever house ye enter into, there abide, and thence depart. And whosoever will not [c]receive you, when ye go out of that city, shake off the very dust from your feet for a testimony against them. And they departed, and went through the villages, preaching the gospel and healing everywhere.

2 (7-9): the world's perplexity.

2 Now [d]Herod the tetrach heard of all the things that had taken place and was in perplexity, because it was said by some that John was risen from among the dead, and by some that Elias had appeared, and by others that one of the old prophets was risen again. And Herod said, John I have beheaded; but who is this of whom I hear such things? And he [e]sought to see him.

3 (10-17): the return of the twelve; "satisfying the poor with bread."

3 And the apostles, when they were [f]returned, related to him all that they had done. And he took them, and [g]withdrew apart into [a desert place belonging to]* a city called Bethsaida. But the multitudes, when they knew it, followed him: and he received them, and spake unto them of the kingdom of God, and healed those that had [h]need of healing. And when the day began to decline, the twelve came and said unto him, [i]Send away the multitude, that they may go into the villages round, and into the country, and lodge and find victuals; for we are here in a desert place. And he said to them, Do ye give them to eat. But they said, We have not more than [j]five loaves and two fishes, unless we go and buy food for all this people. For they were about five thousand men. And he said to his disciples, Make them [k]sit down by fifties in a company. And they did so, and made them all sit down. And taking the five loaves and the two fishes, he looked up to heaven and [l]blessed them, and brake, and gave to the disciples to set before the multitude.

c cf. Jno. 13. 20. Acts 13. 51.

d Matt. 14. 1, etc. Mk. 6. 14, etc.

e chap. 23. 8.

f Mk. 6. 30.

g Matt. 14. 13, 14. Matt. 12. 15.

h ch. 4. 40. cf. Rom. 5. 20.

i Matt. 14. 15-21. Mk. 6. 35-44. Jno. 6. 5-13.

j cf. 1 Cor. 1. 27, 28.

k cf. Rom. 4. 5.

l Prov. 10. 22. cf. ch. 22. 19. cf. ch. 24. 30.

*This clause is omitted by most.

grace of God? yet the denunciation is part of that grace, its last effort to rouse the consciences of men to respond to it.

2 Herod himself is roused by all this, but partially, to a foreboding perplexity. He has beheaded John, and here is One exhibiting a power which John had not. Luke shows us the tyrant concluding in an opposite way to that which we find in the previous Gospels. Between the incredulity of a Sadducee and the terror of conscience which breaks out beyond the control of it, he vacillates evidently. But here is a problem that he cannot solve, and he is drawn by that which he fears, because he fears it: "he sought to see him." By and by we shall find how, misled by a carnal mind which cannot penetrate the mystery of the Cross, he is able to treat with awful mockery the object of his former fears; and so he disappears out of inspired history.

3 The twelve return, and the Lord takes them apart privately into a desert place for needed rest. But the multitudes, hearing of it, follow and break in upon Him, and their various necessities call forth once more His compassion actively to minister to them. "He received them, and spake unto them of the Kingdom of God, and healed those that had need of healing." There ensues that first miracle of the multiplication of the loaves which is the only one recorded by Luke and John as well as the other evangelists. With John it is the

And they all ate and were filled; and there were taken up of [m] fragments that remained over to them twelve hand-baskets.

5 (ix.18 36): The way and the end.
1 (18-22): who knows?

5. [1] And it came to pass, as he was [n] praying alone, that his disciples were with him, and he asked them, saying, [o] Who do the multitudes say that I am? And they answered and said, John the Baptist; but others, Elias; and others, that one of the old prophets is risen again. And he said unto them, But who do ye say that I am? And Peter answering said, The Christ of God. And he [p] strictly charged them and commanded them to say this to none, saying, The Son of man must [q] suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and the third day be [r] raised up.

m cf. Eph. 3. 18, 19. cf. 2 Ki. 4. 42-44.
n ch. 3. 21. ch. 5. 16. ch. 6. 12. vers. 28, 29. chap. 11. 1. ch. 22. 40-46. ch. 23. 34.
o Matt. 16. 13-20. Mk. 8. 27-30.
p Mk. 1. 34.
q Matt. 16. 21. Matt. 17. 22, 23. Mk. 8. 31.
r cf. ch. 24. 6, 7, 46.

text of the Lord's discourse upon the bread of life. Luke is somewhat briefer than any of the others, and omits entirely the scene upon the lake which follows it. As Jehovah, with a marvel of creative power, "He satisfies Israel's poor with bread." The need of the world, true wilderness as it is, is made to manifest the divine resources which are in the hand of Him who because of its misery has come into it. The Creator of it is the Redeemer for it; Christ, the Son of man, is both. The details of the miracle we have had before us in Matthew.

5. But the world is not only a place of want and misery, or of sin as lying at the root of these: it is a place into which the Redeemer has come and they know Him not, but reject and cast Him out. This, therefore, is what really characterizes the world for those who receive Him, and salvation must be a salvation out of it. Judgment awaits it; Christ is gone out: heaven receives whom the world has rejected; and for His followers also, if the earth be closed, heaven is opened. Thus the wonder of salvation is increased with the wonder of a rejected Saviour; grace descends lower to find its objects, (for we are all upon the world's dead level,) and places them where all the glory of it will be shown out: for "in the ages to come God will show the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness toward us in Christ Jesus" (Eph. v. 7).

This is now beginning to be shown out to us, although for the full reality of it we must wait until Christ being ascended, the Holy Spirit shall have come down to make known all His glory and the fruit of His work. In the meanwhile, as His rejection becomes manifest, and the way of the cross is seen as the way of discipleship, there is permitted an anticipative vision of "the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ," that His people may along the road "be strengthened with all might according to the power of His glory" (Col. i. 11) so displayed.

[1] Again we find Him in prayer. The unbelief of men, as we may infer from His question presently, is shadowing His soul with all its sorrow and its bitter fruits. He rises from it to ask His disciples, "Who do the multitudes say that I am?" He is not speaking of manifest rejectors, and their answer does not take its color from the enmity of the scribes and Pharisees. "John the Baptist," "Elias," a prophet of old time risen from the dead, are the conjectures of those who mean to do Him honor; but they are conjectures merely, and not faith, and none of them rise up to the reality: they all fail to apprehend the glory of His Person, and therefore the end for which He is come. The light of His glory who is among them has not shone into their souls; He is not their Saviour,—not the Christ: the Baptist had absolutely disclaimed it, and had declared of the One that was coming after him that He was too great for him to be worthy to undo the latchet of His shoes.

And the Lord questions His disciples: "But who do ye say that I am? Peter answers in behalf of them, "The Christ of God." But He forbids them to de-

2 (23-27): the way of the Cross.

[2] And he said to all, [s]If any one will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily and follow me. For whosoever shall desire to [t]save his life * shall lose it, but whosoever shall lose his life * for my sake, he shall save it. For what shall a man be [u]profited if he shall gain the whole world, and lose or forfeit himself? For whosoever shall be [v]ashamed of me and of my words, of him shall the Son of man be [w]ashamed, when he shall [x]come in his glory and that of the Father, and of the holy angels. But I tell you of a truth that there are [y]some standing here that shall in no wise taste of death until they see the kingdom of God.

3 (28-36): the glory realized.

[3] And it came to pass [z]about eight days after these words, that, taking Peter and John and James, he went up into a mountain to pray. And as he [a]prayed, the s Matt.10.38 Matt. 16.24 -28. Mk.8.34-38. cf. Phil.3.10.

t Jno. 12.25, 26. cf. Acts 20. 24.
u cf. ch. 12. 15–21. *cf.*ch.16.19-31.
v Matt. 10. 32, 33. cf. Rom. 1. 16.
w cf. Heb. 11. 16.
x Matt. 25. 31.
y *cf.*2 Pet.1. 16-18. Mk. 9. 1.
z Matt. 17.1 -9. Mk.9.2-10.
a *cf.*ver. 18.

* Or "soul."

clare it now. for if Israel had not faith to receive Him, He on His part was going on to fulfil the divine purpose in stooping to suffering and death at their hands; then, on the third day, to be raised up.

He adds nothing to this, the first open, literal announcement of what, even in this way, was too hard a saying for them to understand. The doctrine of the Cross, though found in all the Gospels, yet develops slowly there. The Old Testament types of it, to us so familiar, were to the disciples as yet like a fountain sealed, inaccessible; and thus much that we should look upon as plain language—as for instance, the Baptist's witness to the "Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world"—would be to them a dark saying. Israel in general were looking for a conquering, not a suffering, Messiah. "We have heard out of the law that Christ abideth for ever," they said in answer to one of His own declarations, "and Thou sayest, the Son of man must be lifted up: who is this Son of man?" (John xii. 34). Thus the unwelcome truth struggled through the darkness, and those who confessed His Person were still, as to His work, in darkness like the rest. As a consequence, much of what was plainly announced remained as seed in the ground for a future harvest.

[2] The Lord goes on to declare the way of His followers to be that of the Cross, and here virtually therefore, as He had not yet, the manner of His own death. But He uses the word symbolically, as the expression "daily" (only found in Luke) would convey to them. To follow Him they must sacrifice their life—themselves—in all that the world counts life; perhaps literally lay it down for Him. The life so lost for His sake would be saved, while he who would grasp the present must lose the future. It is a world hostile to Christ through which we pass, and the confession of Him will cost in such a scene. He gives no reason to expect that it will alter in its spirit essentially, but the reverse: the path He treads is, in this fact that it is His, the path for all His followers; and of those who are ashamed of Him and of His words, He will be ashamed when He comes in His own glory—this is only in Luke—and that of His Father, and of the holy angels.

All this, with the exceptions named, is found, and has been considered, in the previous Gospels. The Lord closes, as in them, with the assurance, that some standing there would in no wise taste of death until they should see the Kingdom of God.

[3] The reference to the transfiguration in this has been also considered. Luke links them more directly together than the other evangelists by his reference: "about eight days after these words." Matthew and Mark say "after six days." Luke's "eight" stamps it with that character of "newness" which attaches to the number. A new scene indeed for the old sin-stricken earth to witness; and the centre of all its glory a Man in prayer!

[b] fashion of his countenance was altered, and his raiment became white [and] radiant. And behold, there talked with him [c] two men, who were Moses and Elias, who appeared in glory and spake of his [d] departure which he was about to accomplish in Jerusalem. Now Peter and those that were with him were weighed down with [e] sleep; but when they were fully awakened, they saw his glory, and the two men who stood with him. And it came to pass when they were departing from him, Peter said unto Jesus, Master, it is good for us to be here; and let us make [f] three tabernacles, one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias, [g] not knowing what he said. And as he said these things, there came a [h] cloud and overshadowed them; and they feared as they entered into the cloud. And there came a voice out of the cloud, saying, [i] This is my beloved* Son: hear him. And when the voice came, Jesus was found alone; and they kept [j] silence, and told no one in those days any of the things which they had seen.

b cf. 2 Cor. 4. 6. cf. Heb. 2. 9.
c cf. Matt. 18. 16. cf. Rom. 3. 21.
d cf. ch. 24. 26, 27. cf. Acts 17. 3.
e cf. ch. 22. 45, 46.
f cfr. vers. 19, 20.
g cf. Matt. 20. 21, 22. cf. Jno. 14. 8-11.
h cf. Ex. 13. 21. cf. Acts 1. 9.
i ch. 3. 22. cf. Jno. 5. 36, 37. cf. John 12. 28-30.
j ver. 21.

*A well-supported reading gives "chosen."

Such is the new Adam upon whom rests all the blessing of the new creation, and in this sign we read its permanence. Man is no more to lapse from God into a fancied but impossible independence; and the path of obedience is no more to be thought of as one of hard and servile drudgery when the Son of God has chosen it for His own. The glory that now alters the fashion of countenance and radiates from His very garments is His own proper glory, veiled in tenderness only to those to whom He has come to minister, that they might know Him better, as through a darkened glass we better see the sun.

But He is not alone: for where He is must be the fruit of His work and the companions of His love. Two men are with Him, and appear in glory also; but they with a glory which is not their own. Moses and Elias, the law-giver and the prophet, shine, as in fact they did, in His glory; and that of which they are speaking is that departure which He is to accomplish at Jerusalem, the very thing of which He has been speaking to His disciples without finding ears to hear.

Now, in fact, they are weighed down with sleep. As upon another, how different occasion, but when the same departure was before Him, He compassionately said of them, the spirit might be willing, but the flesh was weak. The heaviness of earth clung about them, and there was not power to rise above it. Only when they were fully awakened did they see His glory and the two that stood with Him. How much too of what we might see do we fail to see, not because of positive evil, and yet because of lack of energy to reach what is so near, yet so beyond us. But what might our lives be—what might they not be—if things were different with us!

So even when they are awake, they are dazed and confounded. As the two men are departing, Peter makes an effort to stay them by a proposal to build tabernacles for them, as also for the Lord. But then comes the Cloud and overshadows them; Moses and Elias disappear into the Cloud; and out of it the Father's voice once more as at the Jordan-baptism proclaims His Son. Let them hear Him. And Jesus is found alone.

Here is the end, then, anticipated, which is to strengthen for all the way. We have looked at it already in the previous Gospels, each of which has, no doubt, its differences, though we may be feeble in presenting these. We shall soon reach now what is peculiar to Luke.

SUBDIVISION 4. (Chap. ix. 37–62.)

Testing in an evil World.

1 (37–45): the power to use power may fail, but in Christ is still the resource.

1. AND it came to pass on the following day, when they [k]came down from the mountain, a great multitude met him. And behold, a man from the multitude cried out, saying, Teacher, I beseech thee, look upon my son, for he is mine [l]only child; and behold, a [m]spirit taketh him, and suddenly he crieth out, and it convulseth him with foaming, and crushing him, scarcely departeth from him. And I besought thy [m]disciples that they would cast it out, and they could not. And Jesus answered and said, O [n]unbelieving and perverse generation, how long shall I be with you and suffer you? Bring thy son hither. But while he was [p]yet coming, the demon threw him down and convulsed him. And Jesus rebuked the unclean spirit and healed the child, and gave him back to his father. And they were all [q]astonished at the majesty of God.

k Matt. 17. 14–21. Mk. 9. 14–29.

l cf. ch. 7. 12. cf. Gen. 22. 2. cf. Jno. 3. 16.

m ch. 8. 27, etc. cf. Matt. 15. 22.

n cf. ver. 1.

o cf. Jno. 14. 12.

p cf. ch. 8. 49.

q ch. 7. 16.

SUBD. 4.

We have seen then what the world is, through which the disciple of Jesus is called to pass, and how the rejection of the Master characterizes it henceforth for the disciple. It is therefore an adverse stream that he is called to breast, and to meet the combined powers of evil in a warfare that never ends on this side heaven,—which, if it seem to do so, it is but the lure of the enemy replacing his open assault; while, as that which intensifies all the struggle, there is that within us constantly in league with the foe without, an enemy behind all our fortifications, a self against oneself.

Yet are we assured that "all things work together for good to them that love God, to those that are the called according to His purpose." It must be therefore that all this is working for good, this various strife, this enemy within also, all this that is the occasion of such and so keen distress, all this that seems so against us. Nay, there must be in all this a wisdom of God exhibited which when learned shall call forth our wonder and our praise,—a wisdom which has in view not time only but eternity.

And it is not hard to understand this: for if God's thoughts are fixed on bringing us into conformity with Himself, the discernment of good and evil must be a large part of this, we must have our senses exercised to this end. How much the manifestation of God Himself has been made in connection with His mastery over the evil! not in mere judgment of it, but much more in His grace. Must we not for the knowledge of Him, as He would have it, learn also what evil is, be tested by it, learn mastery over it? Thus the good of the trial is apparent, and why it should occupy the place it does here in connection with the fulness of salvation.

1. That failure in this conflict should be so much before us is sorrowful enough; yet even so are we most emphatically warned and guarded against it. The very first lesson is that of how to use the power with which we are intrusted; and the story is one which, for our need of it, is found in all three synoptic Gospels. Luke indeed does not dwell upon the details as the two others do,—Mark especially; nor have we even (what may seem stranger) the insistence upon the need of prayer and fasting which we find in the others. Rather do we find that the power is in Christ, and still available, whatever may be the failure of disciples. The actual display of it does not measure what is available, as long as Christ remains accessible, as He ever is, to the feeblest faith of the really needy. The simplicity and ease with which He acts seems most enforced here; and

But as all wondered at all things that Jesus did, he said to his disciples, Let these words [v] sink into your ears: for the Son of man is about to be delivered into the hands of men. But they understood not this saying, and it was hid from them that they comprehended it not; and they feared to ask him concerning this saying.

[v] Matt. 17. 22. cf. ver. 31.

2 (46-50): the need of humility.

2. And there arose a [x]reasoning among them, which of them should be the greatest. But when Jesus saw* the reasoning of their heart, he took a little [t]child and set it by him, and said to them, Whosoever shall receive this little child in my name receiveth me; and whosoever shall receive me receiveth him that sent me. For he who is [u]least among you all, he is great.

[x] Matt.18.1-6. Mk. 9. 33-37. cf.chap. 22. 24-27.
[t] cf. Ps. 121. ch. 18. 17.
[u] cf. Eph.3. 8. cf.1 Cor.15. 9. cf.Phil.2.3-11.

And John answering said, Master, we saw one casting out demons in thy name, and we forbad him, because he [v]followeth not with us. But Jesus said unto him, Forbid [him] not: for [w]whosoever is not against you is for you.

[v] Mk.9. 38-40. cf.1Cor.3.5. cf.Num.11. 26-30.
[w] cf. ch. 11. 23. cf.Matt.10. 42. cf. Phil. 1. 15-18.

3 (51-56): reproduction and the heart told out.

3. Now it came to pass when the days were being fulfilled for his being received up, that he [x]steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem. And he sent messengers before his face; and they went and entered into a village of the Samaritans to make ready for him. And they did not receive him, [y]because his face was [as if] going to Jerusalem. And when his disciples James and John saw it, they said, Lord, wilt thou that we command [z]fire to come down from heaven and consume

[x] cf. Is.50.7. cf. Heb. 12. 2. cf.Matt.26. 53, 54.
[y] Jno. 4.4,9.
[z] 2Kl. 1. 10, 12. cf. ver. 30.

*Some read "perceived."

Christ as the resource, amid whatever failure on the part of His people is worthy of the first place in the lessons that are given here.

But the fact of His rejection by men abides, however much He may display His power; and though there may be astonishment at it, too, at times. Christ the crucified is the Master we follow, and this truth He would have sink down into our ears and abide with us. Alas, we are not beyond the need either of being warned by the disciples' want of comprehension of this, or even by their fear of being made to comprehend!

2. Two lessons as to humility follow: the first in which the Lord checks the anxiety to be greatest by identifying Himself with the littleness of a little child, and then by the assurance that the least of all among His followers would be great enough. For indeed, that which we have in common, and as the fruit of Christ's work, must be far greater, thank God, than our differences, which will be the result of our own.

The second lesson is in view of their having forbidden one who was casting out demons in Christ's name, but who was not in their company: as if the power that he displayed had been illegitimately acquired. The Lord here assures them that if he were not of their company, he must needs be on their side. For who could divorce the power of the Spirit from the Spirit of power? Self-appreciation here but slenderly covers itself with zeal for Christ; and how soon does it blind us as to plainest principles.

3. We next find the Lord on His way to Jerusalem, the days getting near for His being received up. For the Samaritans it is enough that His face is set toward Jerusalem: they do not receive the messengers sent before to prepare for Him. The spirit of the sons of Zebedee is aflame, and they would bring fire them, [as also Elias did?]* But he turned and rebuked them; [and said, Ye know not of what spirit ye are: for the [a]Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them];† and they went to another village.

[a] Jno. 12. 47. ch. 19. 10.

4 (57-62): the testing by the way.

4. And, as they went in the way, a [b]certain man said unto him, I will follow thee wherever thou goest, [Lord].* And Jesus said unto him, The foxes have holes, and the birds of heaven [have] roosting-places; but the Son of man hath not [c]where to lay his head. And he said unto another, Follow me. But he said, Lord, suffer me first to go and [d]bury my father. But he said unto him, Let the dead bury their own dead, but go thou and announce the kingdom of God. And another also said, I will follow thee, Lord; but first suffer me to bid [e]farewell to those at my house. But Jesus said unto him, No man having laid his hand on the [f]plow and looking back is fit for the kingdom of God.

[b] Matt. 8. 19, 20. cf. ver. 23.

[c] cf. ch. 2. 7. cf. ch. 8. 23. cf. 1 Cor. 4. 11.

[d] Matt. 8. 20, 21. cf. Gen. 46. 4. cf. Gen. 11. 31, 32. cf. ch. 18. 28-30.

[e] cf. 1 Ki. 19. 20, 21.

[f] cf. Acts 15. 37, 38. cf. 2 Tim. 4. 10, 11.

* Many omit.

†The first part here is doubtful; the last, according to the evidence of MSS., still more so. Yet the interpolation seems difficult to understand, and as to the first part must have been early, for it is found in most of the ancient versions, as well as in Marcion, Clement of Alexandria, and others. See the Am. Editor's note in Lange's Commentary.

down from heaven after the manner of Elijah, to consume the churlish Samaritans. The pleading of Elijah's example seems to imply that they were already by no means sure that the Lord would be disposed to such a visitation of an offence like this. They could hardly have been with Him so long, without having learned as much as this of His long-suffering. But Elijah they had lately seen with Him, and his example they might quote with One who so completely maintained as He did the authority of Scripture. But He makes it no question of Scripture; it was they who knew not of what spirit they were. They were not of His: for the Son of man had not come to destroy men's lives but to save them.

The disciples here illustrate the danger in which we are in, seeking to reproduce the examples left us by the men of faith of old, even where most fully sanctioned by the word of God. Dispensations differ, and we must know well how to recognize the difference. Faith too is an individual thing which can only be exercised in one's own path with God; and the imitation of another, as that, necessarily takes us out of such a path. The carrying out of principles, or obedience to precepts, is, of course, an entirely different thing; only they must be the principles of the dispensation to which we belong. From want of understanding this the Church of God has been judaized, secularized, and carnalized; an earthly priesthood, law, the rule of kings, and how much else, have been introduced into it; it has usurped Israel's place and promises; and Scripture has been quoted for all this, and perverted to make it good. Here too, disciples, acting with honest enough meaning, have not known of what spirit they were.

4. Finally in this section we have what Matthew (viii. 19–22) puts in another connection, and doubtless in the order of time. Luke gives the moral connection and adds a third example of such testing of followers by the Lord, which we can suppose to be of no infrequent occurrence. In the first case there is the enthusiasm which looks well, but needs a more sober estimate of what is involved in following Christ. The second, on the other hand, is unready, and needs the rousing call to prompt obedience. The third, which is in Luke only,

SUBDIVISION 5. (Chaps. x.-xvi.)

God with men, and the responsibility connected with it.

SECTION 1. (chaps. x., xi. 13.)

The divine provision.

1 (x. 1-24): A new commission.
[1] (1-16): representatives and forerunners.

1. [1] NOW after these things the Lord appointed seventy others also, and sent them [g] two by two before his face into every city and place where he himself was about to come. And he said unto them, The [h] harvest indeed is great, but the laborers are few: supplicate therefore the Lord of the harvest that he would send* out laborers into his harvest. Go your way: behold, I send you forth as [i] lambs in the midst of wolves. Carry no purse, no wallet, no shoes; and salute no one by the way. And into whatsoever house ye enter, first say, Peace be to this house. And if a son of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon it; and if not, it shall return to you again. And in the same house abide, eating and drinking such things as they have: for the

[g] cf. Mk. 6. 7. cf. Acts 13. 2.
[h] Matt. 9. 37, 38. Jno. 4. 35, 36. cf. I Cor. 16. 9.
[i] Matt. 10. 16. cf. Matt. 7. 15. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 12.

* Literally, "thrust out."

though very similar to the second, requires the renunciation of the claims of the living, as much as of the dead. He who has put his hand to the plow—the one-handled eastern plow, frail and easily overturned, is in question—must keep his eyes on it also, and not look back, or he is unfit for the Kingdom of God.

SUBD. 5.

The transfiguration is a turning-point in all three of the synoptic Gospels. It follows the Lord's announcement of His rejection by the Jews, and the prohibition of His being proclaimed as Christ. Earth has rejected Him, but heaven opens to Him; and this gives character to that which follows.

In Luke especially is there the opening of heavenly things. It is only a glimpse indeed that we get into them. We must not expect the full opening that we have in Christianity, after Christ has gone in for us in the value of His accomplished work, and the Spirit is come out to enable us to enter in there. Still, in the peace-offering view that it presents, God and man are brought together, and we have the anticipation at least, of what is to be fully made known at a later time. Luke connects thus, as has been already said, with Paul's line of truth and Gentile revelation, he himself being a Gentile. It is the portion of Luke to which we have now come that has specially this character; and we shall soon hear of Satan fallen from heaven, though only anticipatively announced, and of those whose names are written there. With this we have the inscrutable glory of the Person of Christ, the tender revelation of man's blessed Neighbor, the fulness of the "good part" given to the saint, and the Spirit to be given to them that ask of God.

All this is found in—

Sec. 1.

the first section here, which speaks, therefore, of the divine provision which has been made for man; as the after ones will show us the opposition of Satan, the world, and the religion of the world, to God's blessed ways, to which afterwards we return to see how God Himself is manifested in them.

1. [1] The commission of the seventy seems at first sight to be but a partial repetition of that given to the twelve. But it is easily seen that this must necessarily be, in so far as they are sent out as the heralds of the same Master into the same world. The number of those sent shows the urgency of the mes-

[j] laborer is worthy of his hire; remove not from house to house. And into whatsoever city ye enter, and they receive you, eat what is set before you, and heal the sick that are therein, and say unto them, The [k] kingdom of God is come nigh to you. But into whatsoever city ye enter, and they receive you not, go out into the streets of it and say, Even the [l] dust of your city which cleaveth to us upon our feet, we shake off against you; but know this that the kingdom of God is come nigh. I say unto you, that it shall be [m] more tolerable for Sodom in that day, than for that city. [n] Woe to thee, Chorazin! woe to thee, Bethsaida! for if the mighty works had come to pass in Tyre and Sidon which have come to pass in you, they would have repented long ago, sitting in sackcloth and ashes. But it shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon in the judgment than for you. And thou, [o] Capernaum, which* hast been exalted to heaven, shalt be cast down to hades. He that [p] heareth you heareth me, and he that rejecteth you rejecteth me; and he that rejecteth me rejecteth him that sent me.

2 (17-20): The enemy abased.

[2] And the seventy returned again with joy, saying, Lord, even the [q] demons are subjected to us by thy name. And he said unto them, I [r] beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven. Behold, I have given you authority to [s] tread upon serpents and scorpions, and all the power of the enemy; and nothing shall by any means hurt you. Yet in [t] this rejoice not, that the j Matt. 10. 10. cf. 1 Cor. 9. 7, 14.

k ver. 11. Matt. 10. 7.
l ch. 9. 5. cf. Acts. 13. 46, 51.
m Mk. 6. 11. cf. Heb. 2. 2, 3.
n Matt. 11. 20-24.
o Jno. 2. 12. Matt. 9. 1.
p Matt. 10. 40. Jno. 13. 20. cf. 1 Jno. 4. 6.
q ctr. ch. 9. 49.
r cf. Rev. 12. 7-11. cf. Rom. 4. 17.
s Mk. 16. 18. cf. Acts 28. 3-5.
t cf. Matt. 7. 22. cf. 1 Cor. 9. 26, 27.

*Perhaps "shalt thou be exalted to heaven?"

sage, as the appended woe upon the cities of Israel implies the nearing judgment of the nation. All being practically (though not openly) decided, makes the result to be manifestly but the separation of a remnant from the self-doomed people. Yet the Kingdom of God is come nigh, and its glories are opening more than ever yet, if hid from eyes that have no care to see them.

[2] The return of the seventy with the joy of their success brings out the farther-sighted joy of their Lord, which plainly reaches on to where the "holy mount" has already carried us. They say exultingly, "Lord, even the demons are subjected to us by Thy Name;" and He replies, that He had beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven, the anticipation of that which Rev. xii. gives in its connection with still future history. It is when the man-child who is to rule all nations with a rod of iron is caught up to heaven, that Satan is cast down to earth. The man-child is surely Christ, as the woman of whom He is born is Israel; yet as soon as Satan is cast down, the three and a half years of the great tribulation begin, which immediately precede the Lord's appearing (See Matt. xxiv. notes). The present period is thus passed over, as it is in the Old Testament prophecy, or where Israel is in the foreground, and thus the ascension of Christ and the taking up of saints of the present and the past are seen as one: they are identified with Him who shares with them His "rod of iron" (Rev. ii. 27).

To this time the Lord is looking on here, the beginning of that complete abolishing of Satan's power of which the casting out of demons by the seventy was an anticipation. He goes on to confirm and extend the authority He has given: "Behold," He says, "I have given you to tread upon serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy; and nothing shall by any spirits are subjected to you, but rejoice that your names are [u]written in heaven.

3 (21-24): the revelation and glory of the Son.

3 In the same hour Jesus rejoiced in spirit* and said, I [v]thank thee, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from wise and prudent, and revealed them unto [w]babes: yea, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight. 22 [x]All things have been delivered to me by my Father; and no one knoweth who the Son is but the Father, and who the Father is but the Son, and he to whom the [y]Son may will to reveal him. And he turned to his disciples privately and said, [z]Blessed are the eyes that see the things which ye see. For I say unto you that many [a]prophets and kings have desired to see the things that ye behold, and have not seen them; and to hear the things that ye hear, and have not heard them.

2 (x.25-37): The law and man's neighbor.

2. And behold, a certain [b]lawyer stood up, putting him to the proof, saying, Teacher, what shall I do to inherit eternal life? And he said unto him, What is written in the [c]law? how readest thou? And he answered and said, Thou shalt [d]love [the] Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind, and thy neighbor as thyself.

u Phil. 4. 3. Rev. 21. 27.
v Matt. 11. 25–27. cf. Eph. 1. 5, 6.
w Ps. 8. 2. cf. 1 Cor. 1. 26–29. cf. Jas. 2. 5.
x Matt. 28. 18. cf. 1 Pet. 3. 22. cf. Jno. 3. 35.
y cf. Jno. 16. 25. cf. Jno. 17. 4, 26.
z Matt. 13. 16, 17. Matt. 16. 17.
a cf. Acts 3. 24, 25. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 10–12.
b cf. Matt. 22. 35. cf. ch. 18. 18.
c cf. Rom. 7. 12, 13. cf. Gal. 3. 21.
d Deut. 6. 5.

* The mass of ancient MSS. with one exception read "Holy Spirit," but it seems strange.

means hurt you." And then He adds, "Yet in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subjected to you, but rejoice that your names are written in heaven." Thus already they are assured of a more blessed place than among the earthly people. They are enregistered in heaven (see Heb. xii. 23), as citizens of that "better country."

3 Thus we are being led out beyond Israelitish hopes and promises, and we see along with the mission of the seventy the faint dawning of a new day. And here now we find in its true order of time, what Matthew for his purpose has connected differently, the Lord's declaration of the inscrutable glory of His Person, and of the Father having put all things into His hand; though this was hidden indeed from wise and prudent ones, and revealed to babes alone. What else are men to God? and how could He crown with the knowledge of Himself the wisdom of the world which it had gained in departure from Him? But now had come that which many prophets and kings had desired to see, and not seen; and blessed indeed were the eyes of those who as disciples of this grace had seen it.

2. There follows that story of him that was neighbor to him who fell among robbers, which shows on the one hand the powerlessness of law to furnish a ministry of grace, and on the other the heart of Him who, apart from law and in such a way as to incur reproach for it and indeed the penalty of the law itself, brought help and salvation to the dying sons of men.

It is given as a parable to one who, being a lawyer, and thus a typical Jew of that day, would fain make trial of Him as to His relation to or conception of Moses, whose disciple it was his own boast to be. And yet he must have supposed it a difficult question that he was proposing for this end: "what shall I do to inherit eternal life?" Was he beginning, perhaps, to realize the difficulty of it? When the Lord makes the law the measure of doing, and puts it to him to answer his own question, he answers like a man who is not resting in the mere outside of things, but takes love to God and one's neighbor as the very

And he said unto him, Thou hast answered right: this [e] do and thou shalt live. But he, desiring to [f] justify himself, said unto Jesus, And who is my neighbor?

[e] Lev. 18. 5. cf. Gal. 3. 11, 12. cf. Rom. 10. 5–12.

[f] cf. ch. 16. 15; cf. 2 Cor. 10. 18; ctr. ch. 7. 29 with ch. 18. 13.

heart of the commandments, as indeed they were. In this, Christ emphatically approves his answer; let him do that, and he shall live.

But to answer the question aright is one thing; to satisfy his soul with it is another: and here is again, perhaps, a token for good, amid all that is evil in his case: there is at least no self-complacency. He seeks to justify himself; but who has accused him? Conscience, it is plain, is at work with him, and that Moses whose disciple he is has become his accuser. He resists it: how we have most of us resisted and resented that sentence of the law which brings us all down to that common level of guilt,—Jews and Gentiles alike "under sin"! The man here is fighting with himself, if in fact he does not discern it, nor even has come yet to realize that it is the heart and not the head merely, as he would fain put it, that is astray: he passes over the "first and great commandment of the law," which he has so clearly stated, to take up the second, and here to shelter himself under a question which he has no thought will turn, as it really does, so terribly against himself, "And who is my neighbor?"

We have heard that it was said by them of old time, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy." Here, then, there might be a matter for much nice discrimination: whether the Israelite alone was the neighbor; whether every one of these was so; whether there was a third class between the two; and then whether, when the classification was uncertain, the duty attaching might be left in suspense too. Casuistry of this kind might certainly be carried far, and men might, of course, let themselves off more or less easily. After all how much uncertainty would come in thus, and correspondingly affect the issue!

But the Lord goes beyond and deeper than all this, and with a searching appeal to the conscience of the questioner sets it all aside. He not only answers the question; He answers it in such a way as completely to expose him to himself, and show him (if he had candor to receive it) that it was but an unneighborly heart that could ask it. This man left half-dead upon the road: there is nothing to determine if he were Jew or Gentile; while it is certain that the priest and Levite were both Jews, and that the true neighbor was a Samaritan. It may be that it was their not having settled the lawyer's question that made the men of law so absolutely without help for an unknown stranger.

But the true neighbor of man is so depicted in this parable as to make us feel how the Lord had provided in it for the need of the one before Him (as for how many others since!) when once he had got into the place of need in which so many things become plain to us. Had he not heard what seems to have been no uncommon saying in the mouth of the people, and evidently from His attitude, as they considered it, toward Moses and the law, that He was a Samaritan (John viii. 48)? How different the reproach would sound for one who had proved, as he, we may trust, was on his way to prove, the powerlessness of priest and Levite in his case! Commentaries are much given to warning us not to go too far in such application; but the danger of false interpretation is apt to be in the exact opposite direction. A picture out of which we may leave whatever features we please to consider of no use save for decoration, is surely that in which we are most liable to go astray. While the having to make every detail fit is just what will put bounds to the imagination when disposed to stray. The insisting upon as complete as possible agreement between the representation and what it represents is in the interests of exact interpretation every way.

How vividly man's natural course is set before us, in that down-hill, dangerous road, with the back upon the city of God and the face towards the place of curse, as which Jericho stands in the well-known history. The robbers may represent any of the many forms of evil that break in upon men and bring them

And Jesus replied and said, A certain man went down from [g]Jerusalem to [h]Jericho, and fell into the hands of [i]robbers, who also [j]stripped him [of his raiment], and [k]wounded him, and departed, leaving him [l]half dead. And by chance a certain [m]priest went down that way; and, when he saw him, he passed by on the [n]other side. And likewise also a [o]Levite, when at the place, came and looked [at him,] and passed by on the other side. But a certain [p]Samaritan, as he journeyed, came g cf. Ps. 48. 2 with ch. 13. 33.

h cf. Josh. 6. 26 with Eph. 2. 3.
i cf. Jno. 8. 34.
j cf. Gen. 3. 10. cf. ch. 8. 27.
k cf. Prov. 23. 29. cf. Ps. 38. 4, 5.
l cf. Eph. 2. 1; cf. 2 Cor. 5. 14.
m cf. Heb. 7. 28; cf. Heb. 8. 4.
n cf. Gal. 3. 10.
o cf. Heb. 7. 9. etc. Acts. 4. 36, 37.
p cf. Jno. 8. 48 with Is. 53. 3; cf. Jno. 1. 46.

to desolation, yet which God uses to make them realize their true state before Him. The stripping off of raiment is the loss of all with which we cover from ourselves the nakedness which from God we cannot hide. A wounded conscience, the consciousness of impotence—"ungodly and without strength"—with the shadow of that death, which is awful banishment from the Life of life, stealing over the soul,—this is a picture true in every part of its tale of misery, the faithful representation of a convicted man.

Who shall be neighbor now to one in this condition? who is there with will and power to help? The Jew, Moses' disciple, is brought before us in two illustrative witnesses: "the testimony of two men is true;" and the priest and Levite are good representatives, if any are, of the help the ministers of law can give.

The priest is the first example; but one fatal phrase disqualifies him at the outset,—"By chance a certain priest went down that way." It is plain what such a word means upon the lips that are speaking here. It means that the Jewish priest was not the divinely provided minister for this condition. The message of law, "this do and thou shalt live," is no gospel for any who could be pictured by this helpless and dying man. True, it could say also, "When the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness and doeth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive:" and here salvation is proposed, but a self-wrought one, still containing the fatal principle. And even the sacrifices, though they proclaimed a God who forgave iniquity, transgression, and sin, left untouched what He Himself had joined with this, "who can by no means clear the guilty." The old page might indeed be blotted out, but only that a new one might be turned, and the vain work begin again. Thus still the veil hung before the face of God: "None can see Me and live," was His own affirmation.

So the priest went by on the other side, and had no help. "Likewise also a Levite, when at the place, came and looked at him, and passed by on the other side."

The same inability,—the same chance visit, no divine messenger; only the Levite comes nearer, peers into the anguished eyes, for a moment lighted up with transient hope, and then he too passes by on the other side.

Thus the ministers of the law declare only the helplessness of the law for salvation, and to emphasize this the more the actual savior is pictured as a Samaritan, a man not merely most distasteful to the Jew as a schismatic, but actually under the condemnation of the law itself. This the true Saviour must needs be: for the curse of the law, denounced on sin, must be really taken for men, if the law is to be maintained in honor, and the sinner saved. And here the antitypical Samaritan is therefore the One who has heart for men and the Witness of what is in the Divine Heart towards them. It is this that is the glory of the gospel. The law cannot bring God nigh, for such as we are. The gospel exhibits Him as come down in His love to seek the lost. This, because of its infinite value for us, is afterwards developed at length in the three parables of the fifteenth chapter, where the whole Triune God is seen in the "joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth." Here it is Christ whom we see in this Samaritan, who "as he journeyed, came where" the wounded man "was, and when he saw him, had compassion on him."

[q] where he was, and when he saw him, he had [r] compassion [on him,] and went to him, and [s] bound up his wounds, pouring in [t] oil and [u] wine; and raised him up upon his [v] own beast, and brought him to an [w] inn, and took care of him. And on the morrow [as he departed,]* he took out [x] two pence,† and gave them to the host, and said unto him, Take [y] care of him; and whatsoever thou shalt spend [z] more, when I [a] come again, I will repay thee. Which now of these three seems to thee to have been [b] neighbor to him who fell into [the hands of] the robbers? And he said, He that showed mercy on him. And Jesus said unto him, Go and do [c] thou likewise.

*Many omit. †"Denarii."

[q] cf. ver. 30 with Rom. 5. 6. cf. Heb. 2. 14.
[r] cf. Ps. 22. 1. cf. Mk. 1. 41. cf. Gal. 2. 20.
[s] ctr. Is. 1. 6. cf. ch. 4. 18. cf. Rom. 5. 1.
[t] cf. 1 Jno. 2. 27 with Acts 5. 32. cf. Rom. 5. 5.
[u] cf. Matt. 26. 28 with 1 Jno. 1. 7.
[v] cf. Gen. 24. 61.
cf. Rom. 5. 9, 10. [w] cf. Heb. 13. 14; ctr. ch. 2. 7. [x] cf. 2 Pet. 1. 3. [y] cf. Jno. 21. 15–17; cf. Acts 20. 28; cf. Heb. 13. 17. [z] cf. Philem. 18, 19; cf. Jno. 1. 16. [a] cf. Jno. 14. 1–3. [b] cf. Prov. 17. 17. cf. Prov. 27. 10; cf. Rom. 5. 7, 8. [c] cf. ch. 14. 21; cf. Acts 26. 17, 18.

The details that follow are again clear and significant, and present the grace of Christ in the fullest way. Faith's appropriation of the blessing, true as it is from the human side, is not what we find here, but rather the appropriation is on the divine side, all the value of the work of Christ made over to the helpless and stricken soul. He is taken into tender hands, and his wounds closed or bound up by the authoritative Word of God: for it is the Word which binds the conscience, and here for healing, as when the sweet compelling utterance of "peace" from a Saviour's lips made rest but duty for those that heard it.

The oil and the wine follow for effectual healing: they are plain symbols of the joyful remembrance of Christ's work—of His precious blood—applied in the power of the Holy Spirit. And here there is such unmistakable plainness, as if no manner of doubt must be permitted upon so fundamental a point. And now he is ready for the road with his deliverer.

The tender care of the latter does not slacken. He lifts him up upon his own beast,—κτῆνος, not often used in the singular, as here, "acquirement," what he had got for himself. The power which supports and carries us on is indeed what Christ has acquired for Himself: it is living power, the "Spirit of Christ," which bare Him in His wondrous Manhood to our rescue, and who, that being effected, now bears us.

So "he brought him to an inn"—according to the blessed universality of the gospel offer, a "place of reception for all." This is what the Church as the house of God is; where still He "cares for" His own,—"takes charge of" them. How much is compressed in how little in these pregnant words!

Now we hear of His departure, though His care abides. And "as he departed, he took out two pence, and gave them to the host, and said unto him, Take care of him; and whatever thou spendest more, when I come again, I will repay thee."

It is to the care of the Spirit that Christ has left His people in the world: here it is impossible to go astray as to the interpretation. But what, then, are we to see in the "two pence"? We may equally with Van Oosterzee, refuse as "trifling" the thought of two sacraments, and yet believe that there is meaning, here as elsewhere. The two pence are plainly recompense for care bestowed, and we may find perfect fitness if we will note that in parabolic figures, such as we have to do with here, the Spirit of God is identified with His work, or with the agents through whom He works. We shall find as to the last a very decisive example in the "woman" of the second parable of the fifteenth chapter; and here it should be easy to see that it is to those by whom the Spirit works in the care of Christ's people that the reward is given. Present reward: for "he that watereth shall be watered also himself;" and yet a future recompense also,

3 (x. 38–42) The fulness of the saint's "good part."

3. And it came to pass, as they went [on their way], that he entered into a certain village; and a certain woman, named [d]Martha, received him into her house. And she had a sister named Mary, who also [e]sat at Jesus'* feet, and heard his word. But Martha was [f]distracted with much serving, and she came to him and said, Lord, dost [g]thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? speak to her therefore that she help me. But the Lord † answered and said unto her, Mar-

[d] Jno. 11. 1, etc.
[e] cf. ch. 8. 35. cf. Ps. 131. cf. Col. 2. 6, 7.
[f] cf. 1 Cor. 13. 1–7. cf. Heb. 11. 5, 6.
[g] cf. Mk. 4. 38. cf. r. Jno. 11. 5.

* Many read "the Lord's." † Many read "Jesus."

when the departed Saviour shall return again. And thus the two pence (or denarii) may have the number of testimony, because the present reward is but the witness of that gracious remembrance of all that is done here for Him, which the future will exhibit in its full reality.

Thus, from first to last, the parable speaks with perfect clearness; and it is of Christ above all it speaks: not mainly to answer a lawyer's question, but beyond this to reveal Himself to the soul of a sinner, though, because of his condition, this cannot be done with the simplicity that would have welcomed need more fully confessed. In this way also it agrees with the place in which we find it, following the declaration of the personal glory of the Son of God with the revelation of His grace, and the full provision in it for the otherwise desperate state of man.

3. After this we are made to understand the full provision for a saint, and how it is to be acquired, and how earnestly the Lord longs to have His people acquire it, how thoroughly He will guard them in their possession of it. Here, for our better instruction, we have contrasted the conduct of two saints. Martha and Mary are again, and more largely spoken of in the Gospel of John, and in accordance with the different character in which they are presented here. As two sides of Christian character, they are both needful for its proper display, the worker and the listener, the servant and the one who, even because she better understands His real dignity, lets her Lord serve her.

It is easily to be seen that the latter is the fundamental necessity, and the higher blessedness. As sinners, as the previous parable has shown us, Christ must serve us first, or we should never find ability, nor have the heart to serve Him either. We would willingly reverse this order, but it cannot be. So too as saints we are prone to get our service out of place, and that because of the same root of self-sufficiency which troubled us as sinners. Served us, of course, He has; and now it is our part to serve Him; but how prone we are to do it after Martha's fashion. How little we realize the need we have of being served by Him all through, and the little need He has of us, save as the objects of His love, and as those in whom the exceeding riches of His grace are to be shown out through the ages.

Martha has received Christ into her house, and surely into her heart. If she is busy, she is busy serving Him; yet that does not prevent her being distracted by it. She is more: she is vexed and irritated. Mary her sister is sitting quietly at the feet of Jesus, listening to His word; and she blames even the Lord for permitting it, while she needs her help so much. But the Lord asserts that Mary has chosen the good part, and it is moreover the only needful thing: it shall not be taken from her.

But is learning of Jesus, then, the one needful thing? Is activity nothing? is service nothing? We may be sure the Lord is very far from meaning that. But if a man brings me, let us say, an apple, I do not despise it when I say, "The one thing is the tree that bears the apples."

One may hear Christ's words and never hearken. There may be even an occupation with them which is little better than mere idleness. But to hear as tha, Martha, thou art anxious and troubled about many things. But [h]one thing is needful; and Mary hath chosen the [i]good part, which shall [j]not be taken away from her.

4 (xi. 1-13): In view of creature need.

4. And it came to pass, that, as he was in a certain place [k]praying, when he ceased, one of his disciples said unto him, Lord, [l]teach us to pray, even as John also taught his disciples. And he said unto them, [m]When ye pray, say, [Our] Father, [who art in heaven] hallowed be thy name; thy kingdom come; [thy will be done, as in heaven so on earth;] give us day by day our daily bread; and forgive us our sins, for we also forgive

h cf. Ps. 27. 4. cf. Phil. 3. 13.
i cf. Ps. 86. 11.
j cf. Jno. 13. 23. cf. 1 Jno. 1. 3. cf. Ps. 119. 72.
k ch. 9. 18, 29, etc.
l cf. 1 Pet. 2. 21. cf. Jno. 16. 7, 13, 24 with Rom. 8. 26.
m cf. Matt. 6. 9-15; cf. Rom. 8. 26.

Mary did, that implies service also, and the right kind of service,—wisdom and power for service; and a service which shall be in the sanctuary also,—worship in the heart of it.

For what fruit will not grow upon that seed sown in the heart—the Scripture able to furnish thoroughly the man of God unto all good works? And how else shall we be able to gain and maintain communion with God than by drinking in the thoughts of God? On the other hand, it is easy to see, and there is plenty of sad experience to show, how service unenlightened by the Word may carry us out of communion with God; and how the cares engendered by it may, as with those of common life, choke much of the good seed. Yet if it is to be feared that there are more Marthas than Maries in the Church to-day, is it not to be feared that there are more than both of these united, of those to whom the cares and pleasures of the world are, far more than any service of the Martha sort, the causes of distraction?

Shall we not covet more that good part which with the Lord's approbation Mary had chosen? Have we not the power to-day to choose where she did? The portions that men naturally covet pass away beyond recall; here is that which the Lord Himself emphatically pronounces "good," and which He seals with eternity of possession to him who has chosen it.

4. There follows now, in that order which we have seen to be so constant in Scripture, after the fulness of the blessing provided, that recognition of creature need which makes the living God so absolute a necessity. We must do more than know about Him; we must have the strength of His arm, a resource in Him ever available. And this is what prayer expresses, the cry to One who hears and who answers. "The fervent, effectual prayer of the righteous man availeth much." The need of it is pressed in an epistle like Ephesians, where we are at the topmost height of heavenly position: it there, perhaps, requiring most to be emphasized that we are not above it. "Praying always with all prayer, and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance and supplication for all saints" (Eph. vi. 18). There could be surely no more earnest exhortation, nor in a more suited place than where the height of all the blessing needs to be practically realized and maintained in daily walk.

The prayer that the Lord teaches His disciples here is that which we have in Matthew substantially, with certain omissions according to all recent editors, for which nevertheless it is hard to account. Certainly Luke it is who gives us the original form of the prayer, if the difference is to be maintained; as it is impossible to imagine the disciples asking to be taught to pray, if they already had been. Then in the sermon on the mount afterwards the Lord must have amplified the prayer by these added petitions, unless Luke can be supposed to have omitted part of what was first given; which again seems hard to believe. A reason for the omissions, if the larger form were first, is as hard to suggest. Nor, apart from all critical questions, can one well see the meaning of such a difference. It would be a bad argument to reason from one's ignorance; yet, on every one indebted to us; and lead us not into temptation, [but deliver us from evil].*

And he said unto them, [n]Which of you shall have a friend, and shall go to him at midnight, and say to him, Friend, lend me three loaves; for a friend of mine on a journey is come to me, and I have nothing to set before him; and he from within shall answer and say, Trouble me not: the door is now shut, and my children are with me in bed: I cannot rise and give thee? I say unto you, though he will not rise and give him because he is his friend, yet because of his [o]importunity † he will rise and give him as many as he needeth. And n cf. ver. 11. cf. Jno. 15. 13.

o cf. ch. 18. 1-8, 39. cf. Rom. 4. 18-21.

*The shortenened form of prayer, leaving out the bracketed portions, has its argument, not from any preponderance of manuscript authority, but from the fact that while those which do contain it are among the earliest known, the use of the prayer as a form by Christians would naturally affect all but the earliest. The omissions are on the other hand not easy to understand, if there had been but one form at the beginning. Even in Matthew the closing doxology, now generally omitted, was evidently introduced from the ecclesiastical usage. The editors generally give the text without the bracketed parts, though the great majority of MSS. have these, in accordance with Matthew. Even so the two cannot be made exactly the same, Matthew having "trespasses," "trespass against us," though the difference is slight.

† Literally, "shamelessness."

the whole we may be pardoned if we incline to the fuller form, (perfect as we realize it to be,) as found in Matthew. There it has already been before us, and there would be no profit in mere repetition.

The Lord adds an encouragement to perseverance which at first sight looks strange enough, but which must have therefore a lesson in this strangeness. How many arguments does the devil use, and which our own hearts assent to for their plausibility, against the continuance of apparently unsuccessful petitions. Yet if there be no more than this against them we are taught here to urge them still. And striking it is that the parallel suggested between the success of importunity with man and with God is one which seems as little capable of full application,—seems as capable of having serious arguments against it,—as any that could be suggested in this line. Nay, the Lord Himself points to the difficulty, while He presses the argument as if there were none. "I say unto you, though he will not rise and give him because he is his friend, yet because of his importunity he will rise and give him as many as he needeth." Can we apply this to God? Not the motive, surely: God does not give to get rid of the petitioner; spite of which the Lord goes on: "And I say unto you, Ask, and ye shall have; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you."

Thus the Lord shows us that we may seek continuously, seek importunately, seek, as one needy man from another; although it might be argued, You are forgetting the difference between God and man. Difference there is, indeed; but we are not to use it to check the pouring out of our full hearts to Him. Be it so that He knows all before we ask; be it that we may be tempted to say with Job, "He is of one mind, and who can turn Him?" let us not heed arguments that would shut us from all the comfort of knowing that we have for our necessity a living God that hears and answers prayer. Ask as if He would yield to mere importunity. Cling to Him as Jacob clung, and say, "I will not let Thee go, except Thou bless me." Ask until you hear Him say, "As a prince hast thou power with God . . . , and hast prevailed."

Then the Lord goes on to speak of the difference between God and man, but which is all in His favor. If men that are evil can be depended on to give good gifts to their children, how much more shall your Father who is in heaven give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him?"

I say unto you, [p]Ask, and it shall be given to you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you. For every one that asketh receiveth, and he that seeketh findeth, and to him that knocketh it shall be opened. But of [q]which of you that is a father shall his son ask bread, and he give him a stone? or also a fish, and he for a fish give him a serpent? or if also he shall ask an egg, shall he give him a scorpion? If ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father who is of heaven, give the [r]Holy Spirit to them that ask him?

SECTION 2. (Chaps. xi. 14-xii.)
Confirmation in view of opposition.

1 (xi.14-26): The strong one not divided, and the Stronger than he.
1 (14-20): the Kingdom of God come.

1. [1] AND he was casting out a demon, and it was [s]dumb; and it came to pass that, when the demon was gone out, the dumb man spake; and the multitudes wondered. But some of them said, By [t]Beelzebul the prince of the demons he casteth out demons. And others, tempting him, sought of him a [u]sign from heaven. But he, knowing their thoughts, said unto them, Every [v]kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation, and house against house falleth: and if also p Matt. 7.7. Matt.21.22. cf. Jno. 15. 7, 16. cf. 1 Jno. 5. 14, 15.

q Matt. 7.9-11. cf. Ps. 103. 13. cf. Is.49.15, 16.

r cf. Acts 1. 14 with Acts 2. 4. cf. Eph. 1. 13.

s Matt.9.32-34. Matt. 12.22-30.

t Mk. 3. 22-27. cf. Eph.6.12. cf. Rev. 9. 11.

u Matt. 12. 38-42. Matt. 16. 1. cf. ch. 20. 2.

v cf. Judges 7.22. *cf.*2 Chron. 20. 22, 23.

He guards against the abuse of the doctrine of importunity. He does not want us to think that we can by our importunity wring a gift out of our heavenly Father's hand that is not good. In madness sometimes, perhaps, we might desire it; only, surely, in madness. But how can He refuse to give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him?

Type of all good gifts this, the Holy Spirit. And John has told us that when the Lord was yet on earth, the "Holy Spirit was not yet given because Jesus was not yet glorified." We must look at what this implies in another place; but we know quite well that the work of the Spirit in enlightening, sanctifying, working all spiritual work in man, was needed then as now, and being needed, was found and enjoyed. And now that, in the Christian sense, the Spirit is given, we can still have, and are called to prove the way in which our Father will respond with fulness of spiritual blessing to the prayers of His people. How comforting is the Lord's assurance here! yet how it reproves us also! Here if we lack, "we have not because we ask not." Shall we be content to go without the fulness of what Christ our Lord has certified to us to be ours if only we value it enough to seek it from the blessed hand of God?

Sec. 2.

The provision of God for His people having been shown, we have now the opposition on the part of the enemy, who is moreover the prince of this world. Thus the world becomes a scene of strife just so much the more because the Prince of peace has come into it. The Lord prepares His disciples for this, warning and confirming them, and setting them in view of His coming again, when winds and waves shall cease. A great deal in all this part is similar to what we have had before,—especially in Matthew; so that we shall notice it more briefly.

1. [1] The substance of what is here we find in Matt. xii. 22-30. The man out of whom the demon is cast is there said to have been blind as well as dumb; and the multitudes ask, "Is this the Son of David?" But there is only wonder, and not conviction, and others refer the power over demons (which they cannot deny) to Beelzebul the prince of the demons. The Lord, addressing Satan is divided against himself, how shall his kingdom stand? because ye say that I cast out demons through Beelzebul. But if I by Beelzebul cast out demons, by whom do your [w]sons cast them out? therefore they shall be your judges. But if I by the finger of God cast out demons, then is the kingdom of God come upon you.

2 (21-23): and Satan spoiled: two opposing ranks.

[2] When the [x]strong [man] armed guardeth his own house,* his goods are in peace; but when a [y]stronger than he shall come on him and overcome him, he taketh away his whole [z]armor† wherein he trusted, and divideth his spoil. He that is not [a]with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth.

3 (24-26): the return of an uncleanspirit.

[3] When the [b]unclean spirit is gone out of the man, he goeth through places without water, seeking rest; and finding none, he saith, I will return unto my house whence I came out. And when he is come, he findeth it [c]swept and adorned. Then goeth he and taketh with him seven other spirits more wicked than himself; and they enter in and dwell there: and the [d]last state of that man becometh worse than the first.

2 (27-36): The testimony competent, but discernment lacking.

2. [1] And it came to pass, as he said these things, a certain woman of the multitude lifted up her voice, and said unto him, [e]Blessed is the womb that bare thee,

1 (27, 28): the blessing of obedience.

* Literally, "court," put for the whole establishment.
† Literally, "panoply."

w cf. ch. 9. 49, 50.
x Matt. 12. 29, 30. cf. Eph. 2. 2.
y cf. Heb. 2. 14, 15. cf. 1 Jno. 3. 8.
z etc. Eph. 6. 11-17.
a cf. ch. 9. 50. cf. 1 Ki. 18. 21. cf. Matt. 6. 24.
b Matt. 12. 43-45. cf. 2 Chron. 36. 14-16 with Neh. 10. 28-39.
c cf. ch. 18. 11, 12. cf. Matt. 23. 13-33.
d cf. Acts. 7. 51-53 with 2 Thess. 2. 9-12. cf. Jno. 5. 45.
e cf. ch. 8. 19-21. cf. Matt. 3. 9.

Himself to them, shows them that He has read their thoughts, and refutes them by the argument that then Satan would be against himself. But if this were the finger of God, then it was the Kingdom of God that had come upon them.

[2] The result in this case was the spoiling of Satan, whom it required power greater than his own to dispossess. And for Himself the Lord declares that He accepted no compromise, and allowed no indifference on the part of any to Him. It was simply for or against; and he that gathered not with Him was only scattering.

[3] But indeed there might be the case in which Satan had not been expelled, but merely left his house empty, to return when he pleased. As the Lord applies it in Matthew, it was indeed their own. Nationally they had reformed from their once constant idolatry, and were now swept clean and adorned, but hollow-hearted. God was not enshrined among them, as their empty temple witnessed. Satan then could come back, and bring with the old spirit of idolatry an intensity of wickedness never before known. The Lord does not say, as in Matthew, that it would be so with them; and the word is left for wider application.

2. We have now the competence of the testimony given asserted, and the reason assigned for its failure with them, in the lack of the spirit of obedience, the want of singleness of eye.

[1] A woman in the crowd that was listening to Him lifted up her voice, and said, "Blessed is the womb that bare Thee, and the breasts that Thou hast sucked." And He answers, "Yea, rather"—so it is, indeed, but there is a greater blessedness—"blessed are they who hear the word of God, and keep it."

It was in fact the central feature of Israel's condition, that with professed reverence for the word of God, they had crusted it over with their traditions, their "unwritten law," which they exalted above it, and so made it of no effect, and the breasts which thou hast sucked. But he said, Yea, rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it.

2 (29-32): a contrast; One greater than Jonah.

[2] And as the multitudes were gathering together, he began to say, This generation is an evil generation: it seeketh a sign, and no sign shall be given it but the [f]sign of Jonas. For as Jonas was a sign to the Ninevites, so also shall the Son of man be to this generation. The [g]queen of the south shall rise up in the judgment with the men of this generation and shall condemn them: for she came from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and behold, more than Solomon is here. Men of Nineveh shall stand up in the judgment with this generation and shall condemn it: for they [h]repented at the preaching of Jonas, and behold, more than Jonas is here.

3 (33-36): the illumination of the eye.

[3] No one, when he hath [i]lighted a lamp, putteth it in a secret place, nor under a bushel, but upon the lampstand, that they that enter in may see the light. The lamp of the body is thine eye: when thine [j]eye is single, thy whole body is light; but when it is evil, thy body also is dark. Look, therefore, that the [k]light that is in thee be not darkness. If therefore thy whole body be light having [l]no part dark, the whole shall be light, as when the lamp lighteth thee with its brightness.

f Matt.12.38-42. Jonah 1.17. Jonah 2.10.
g 1 Ki. 10.1-13. ctr. Is.53.2.
h cf. Jonah 3. 4-10. *ctr.*Mk. 15. 12-14. cf. Acts 7. 54.
i Matt. 5.15. ch. 8. 16.
j Matt. 6.22, 23. cf. Prov. 4. 25. *cf.*Eph.6.5. k *cf.*Heb. 6. 4-6. cf. 2 Pet. 2. 21.
l cf. Eph.5.8-14. *cf.*1Cor.4.4, 5. cf. Ps. 139. 23, 24. *cf.*2Cor.4.6.

as the Lord told them. This is a condition of things which, as we know, has once more come about in the history of the professing Church, human nature manifesting itself similarly in all generations. It is striking, and shows the prophetic character of Scripture, that the Lord here takes occasion by the woman's words, to guard against an error which has assumed of late, in that body which has, more than any other, adopted and developed the traditionalism of the Jews, the most colossal proportions. Romanism has exalted the mother of our Lord above all creatures, and into a perilous nearness to Deity itself. In its cruder forms it would, by virtue of this human relationship to Him, exalt her in some sense above Him to whom she owes this exaltation. The Lord declares here the blessedness of the spiritual tie above the natural, and most distinctly characterizes this blessedness as that of those who "hear the word of God and keep it;" which Rome, as far as lies in her, will not permit. Good reason she has, surely, not to permit it.

[2] The last incident is recorded by Luke alone; what follows is in Matthew also, with some difference. In it He contrasts the spirit of the very heathen at Nineveh, and that of the Arabian queen of Solomon's days, with the people then around Him. A greater than Jonah was then among them, and as Jonah had been a sign to the Ninevites so would He be in His death and resurrection a greater sign; but they would not repent. Nor could a wiser than Solomon attract them with His wisdom.

[3] Not signs were wanting, but the heart to interpret them. God had not done what man would not do: He had not lighted a lamp to hide it from men's eyes, but that all might see and rejoice in the light. But whatever the light might be outside, the light that illumined the man within was his eye: his eye must be single, without any veil there, or the light outside would not light the lamp that could alone be light to him. But the testimony given was not insufficient. If the light within them was not darkness, they would walk in the full brightness of the illuminating lamp.

3 (37–54): Manifested!
1 (37–44): the self-righteousness of the Pharisees.

3. [1] And as he spake, a certain Pharisee [m] asked him to dine* with him; and he went in and sat down to meat. But when the Pharisee saw it, he wondered that he had not first baptized before dinner.* But the Lord said unto him, Now do ye Pharisees cleanse the [n] outside of the cup and of the dish, but your inward part is full of extortion and wickedness. Senseless ones, did not he that [o] made that which is without make that which is within also? But rather give [p] alms of what† ye have, and behold all things are clean unto you. But [q] woe unto you, Pharisees: for ye pay tithe of mint and rue and every herb, and pass over judgment and the [r] love of God; these things ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone. Woe unto you, Pharisees, for ye love the [s] chief seat in the synagogues, and salutations in the market places. Woe unto you, for ye are as [t] sepulcres that appear not, and the men that walk over them know it not.

m cf. ch. 7. 36. Mk. 7. 3.
n Mk. 7. 4-13. Matt. 23. 25.
o Ps. 94. 9, 10. cf. Isa. 16. 7. p ch. 12. 33. ch. 16. 14, 15. cf. ch. 18. 22.
q Matt. 23. 23.
r ch. 10. 27. cf. 1 Jno. 4. 10, 19.
s Matt. 23. 6. ch. 20. 46. cf. Eph. 3. 8.
t cf. Matt. 23. 27, 28. cf. Acts 23. 3. cf. Ps. 5. 9.

* Literally, "breakfast."

† R. V. renders this clause, "of those things that are within" suggesting "giving from the heart," but the text is doubtless the correct rendering.

3. The Pharisees and lawyers are now put in the light, and searched out by it: an exposure, indeed, scathingly severe, and which rouses them to the utmost. The denunciation so closely resembles that in Matt. xxiii., which took place at a later time, that Van Oosterzee* supposes that Luke has, in fact, borrowed from this, and interpolated what was actually now said with it. But besides the natural difficulty of accepting what we should certainly object to in an ordinary historian, there is no part of what is here that we might not imagine to be borrowed; to be sure, with some changes. If we confine ourselves to the unchanged parts, these can only be found in vers. 43 and 52: too small a debt to be worth while to incur. On the other hand, that Matthew borrowed from Luke of what was uttered at this time has similar difficulty, and is rejected by Van Oosterzee himself.

Why may we not accept it as the truth that the Lord in His final judgment of Pharisaism repeated much of what He had said at the earlier time recorded by Luke? Why may He not, at the end of His ministry in Israel, have deliberately reaffirmed His former judgment of those scribes and Pharisees whose characters were so well marked? a double testimony suited to the solemnity of it.

[1] To the Pharisee the Lord's words denounce the self-righteousness which was their prominent characteristic. This failed in its externalism, as if God had made the body, not the soul;—the form, but not breathed the spirit into it. Instead of the excessive scrupulosity which this engendered, let them only be ready to impart to the necessities of others, and all else would be clean to them.

Then their scrupulosity in these minutiæ—tithes of mint and rue and every kind of herb—went with the great defects in things of great account, as judgment and the love of God.

With this, self-exaltation, which made them love the chief seat and public greeting.

While the hypocritical smooth outside, with the defilement underneath, made them like graves which rendered men unclean, without their being aware of them.

* In Lange's Commentary.

2 (45-54): the teaching of the lawyers.

[2] And one of the lawyers answered and said to him, Teacher, in saying this thou reproachest* us also. And he said, Woe unto you also, ye lawyers: for ye lay upon men [t]burdens grievous to bear, and ye yourselves do not touch the burdens with one of your fingers. Woe unto you, for ye [u]build the sepulcres of the prophets, and your fathers killed them. So ye are witnesses and consent to the works of your fathers: for they killed them, and ye build their sepulcres. On this account the wisdom of God hath said, I will [w]send them prophets and apostles, and some of them they shall kill and persecute: that the blood of all the prophets that hath been shed from the foundation of the [x]world may be required of this generation; from the [x]blood of Abel unto the blood of [y]Zacharias, who perished between the altar and the house: verily I say unto you, it shall be required of this generation. Woe unto you, lawyers: for ye have [z]taken away the key of knowledge; ye neither went in yourselves, and those that were entering ye hindered.

And as he said these things unto them,† the scribes and the Pharisees began to [a]press him urgently, and to make him speak of many things; watching him, [and seeking]‡ to catch something out of his mouth that they might accuse him.

4 (xii. 1-12): Tried and in weakness.

4. In those [days], when the myriads of the [b]people were gathered together, so that they trod one upon another, he began to say to his disciples first, Beware of the [c]leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy.

u Matt.23.4. cf. Acts 15. 10. cf. Gal. 5.1.
v Matt. 23. 29-31. cf.Matt.3.9. cf. Jno.8.37 -40.
w Matt. 23. 34-36. cf. Acts 7. 51-53. cf. Hos. 12. 10. cf.Amos 2. 11, 12. x Gen. 4. 8-11. cf. 1 Jno.3. 12.
y 2 Chro.24. 20, 21. cf. Acts 7. 57-60 with 1 Thess. 2. 14, 15. z Matt. 23. 13. cf.Jno.7.48. cf. Acts 4. 16, 17.
a cf. Mk.12. 13. cf.ch 20.20.
b cf. Matt. 16. 6-12. cf. Mk.8.14 -21.
c cf. Lev. 2. 11. cf. 1 Cor. 5. 6, 8. cf. Gal. 5.9.

* Or "insultest." † Some read, "And as he went out thence." ‡ Some omit "and seeking."

[2] The doctors of the law He rebukes for their well-known laying on of intolerable burdens (see p. 215), which they would not even put forth a finger to remove. They built also the sepulcres of the prophets whom their fathers had killed, and honored those whose living voices disturbed men's consciences no longer. Tested by new prophets, they would act as their fathers did, and bring upon themselves the gathering vengeance for all righteous blood from the beginning. Again, as professors of knowledge, they had taken away the very key of it, and, not entering in by it themselves, had only hindered those who were ready to enter.

4. What has been said with regard to the connection of the address to the Pharisees and lawyers with Matt. xxiii. may be and has been said as to the connection of the present chapter with the tenth and other parts of Matthew. That Luke does not always preserve the order of time or the historical connection of events or words may be freely admitted, nor does he here give as definitely as in the last case the time or times of these sayings of the Lord. After the most searching investigation that we can give to such matters, Van Oosterzee allows that definite certainty will, probably, be impossible. If it could be, we would have to ask, would there be any particular profit in such knowledge? It is hard to imagine what. We have the Gospels in the form the Spirit of God has been pleased to give them, and shall surely find divine wisdom in this as elsewhere in Scripture. When it leads commentators to talk of "heterogeneous elements of discourse," we can realize the dangers of too much theorizing in things unknown. We shall do well to take it as we find it, assured that none can mend what needs no mending, and that "to this man will I look," saith the Lord,

But there is nothing [d]covered up, that shall not be revealed, nor hid that shall not be known: therefore whatsoever ye have spoken in darkness shall be heard in the light, and what ye have spoken in the ear in chambers shall be proclaimed upon the housetops. But I say unto you, my friends, [e]Fear not them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do; but I will show you whom ye shall fear: Fear him who, after he hath killed hath authority to [f]cast into hell;* yea, I say unto you, Fear him. Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings†? and not one of them is forgotten before God. But even the hairs of your head are all numbered. [g]Fear not, therefore: ye are of more value than many sparrows. But I say unto you, Whosoever shall [h]confess me before men, him shall the Son of man also confess before the angels of God; but he that shall deny me before men shall be [i]denied before the angels of God. And whosoever shall say a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him; but to him that [j]blasphemeth against the Holy Spirit it shall not be forgiven. But when they shall [k]bring you before the synagogues and rulers and the authorities, be not anxious how or what ye shall answer, or what ye shall say: for the Holy Spirit shall teach you in the same hour what ye ought to say.

*Greek, "Gehenna." †"Assaria."

d ch. 8. 17. Matt. 10. 26. cf. Rom. 2. 16.

e Matt. 10. 28. cf. Is. 8. 12. cf. Acts 4. 23-31. cf. 1 Pet. 3. 14, 15.

f cf. Matt. 25. 41. cf. ch. 16. 22, 23. cf. Rev. 19. 20.

g Matt. 10. 29-31. cf. ver. 4.

h Matt. 10. 32, 33. Mk. 8. 38. cf. Rom. 1. 16. cf. Rom. 10. 9, 10.

i cf. Matt. 7. 23. cf. 2 Tim. 2. 12.

j Matt. 12. 31, 32. Mk. 3. 28-30.

k Matt. 10. 19, 20. Mk. 13. 11. cf. Acts 4. 5-12.

"even to him that is lowly and of a contrite spirit, and that trembleth at My word" (Isa. lxvi. 2).

In that which is now before us disciples are addressed, in view of such a condition of things as what has gone before implies. The multitudes are crowding after Him, so that they tread one upon another, and it was at just such times that the Lord's warning voice was almost certain to be heard, to break the spell of that seductive influence which apparent popularity was so apt to exert over the minds of His real followers. The multitudes were under the sway of the Pharisees, as we know, and their pretentious religiousness helped to maintain them in this place. The Lord warns them against "the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy," and puts them in the light of that coming day when all disguise will be stripped off, and what may have been spoken in privacy in the chamber will be proclaimed openly as on the house-tops.

But fear in the presence of the multitude might be as potent a governing principle as the love of power or applause. He exhorts them, therefore, not to be afraid of those whose power was confined at most to the body and the present life, but to fear Him who could not only kill the body, but cast afterwards into hell.

Then He reminds them of His care and tenderness, with whom not a sparrow is forgotten, and who numbers the hairs of their head. They need not fear, who were more to God than many sparrows.

Then He calls for confession of Himself before men, and they would be confessed by Him before the angels of God; but those who denied Him before men must look to be denied also before the angels. Yet a word spoken against the Son of man should be forgiven, but blasphemy against the Holy Spirit—as in the malevolent imputing of power that they could not deny to Satan,—that would not be forgiven. It was the sign of malignant enmity to God manifested openly as God.

5 (xii. 13-32): Man with God, for evil or for good.
1 (13-21): independency of God.

5. [1] And one of the multitude said unto him, Teacher, speak to my brother to divide the inheritance with me. And he said unto him, Man, who appointed me a [t]judge or a divider over you? And he said unto them, Take heed and guard yourselves from all [m]covetousness: for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of things that he possesseth. And he spake a parable unto them, saying, The land of a certain rich man brought forth abundantly. And he reasoned within himself, saying, What shall I do? for I have not [n]room where to lay up my fruits. And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns and build greater, and there will I lay up all my produce and my goods. And I will say to my soul, [o]Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years: take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. But God said unto him, Senseless one, [p]this night shall thy soul be required from thee; and whose shall those things be which thou hast prepared? So is he who [q]layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich towards God.

2 (22-31): dependent faith.

[2] And he said to his disciples, Therefore I say unto you, Be not [r]anxious for your life, what ye shall eat, nor for the body, what ye shall put on: for the life is more than food, and the body than clothing. [s]Consider the ravens, that they sow not nor reap, which neither have store-house nor barn, and God feedeth them: how much are ye better than the birds? And which of you by anxious thought can [t]add one cubit to his stature? if then ye cannot do that which is least, why are ye anxious for the rest? Consider the [u]lilies, how they grow: they toil not, neither do they spin; and yet I say unto you that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. But if God so clothe the grass which [v]to-day is in the field, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, how much more [shall he clothe] you, O ye of little faith? And [w]seek not what ye shall

t cf. Jno. 12. 47. cf. Jno. 18. 36.
m cf. 1 Cor. 6. 1-7.
cf. Eph. 5. 5. cf. 1 Tim. 6. 9, 10.
n Ps. 62. 10. cf. Is. 5. 8.
o cf. Ps. 49. 6, 11-14. cf. Ps. 73. 3-7, 17-20.
p cf. 1 Sam. 25. 38. cf. Dan. 5. 20-29. cf. Jas. 4. 13, 14.
q cf. Ps. 52. 7. Matt. 6. 19, 20.
r Matt. 6. 25-34. cf. Phil. 4. 6, 7, 19.
s Job 38. 41. Ps. 147. 9. cf. 1 Ki. 17. 4-6.
t cf. Jas. 4. 14.
u Gen. 2. 5. cf. Hos. 14. 5.
v cf. Ps. 103. 15, 16.
w cf. 1 Tim. 6. 8, 9. cf Heb. 13. 5.

On the other hand, in the presence of accusers and judges they were to expect the Spirit of God to give them a mouth and wisdom: they needed no anxiety with regard to that.

Evidently, the theme in all this is a world that they must neither court nor fear, but before which Christ must be held up, with the Spirit of Christ to hold up those who did this.

5. [1] He goes on to speak of those to whom the world was all: not persecutors necessarily, but quietly enjoying it; God and the life beyond forgotten. He pictures such an one making his count of long prosperity and suddenly turned out of it into the presence of Him he had made no account of, and leaving all he valued here to whom he knew not. Folly indeed, but how common a folly! the independence of a nature fallen away from God.

[2] On the other hand, the dependence of faith is the remedy for all care, in the consciousness of the care of Him whose presence and power all creation testifies. Seeking His Kingdom—the maintenance of His authority over what was but His own, and whom they could call, "Father,"—the men of faith with their hearts in the unseen, would find the good of all else ministered to them.

eat and what ye shall drink, nor be ye of doubtful mind: for all these things do the nations of the world seek after, and your Father [x]knoweth that ye have need of these things. But seek his kingdom,* and [all]† these things shall be [y]added unto you.

6 (xii. 32-48): Watching?

6. [1] Fear not, little flock: for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom. [z]Sell what ye have, and give alms; make yourselves purses that grow not old, a [a]treasure in the heavens that faileth not, where no thief approacheth, nor moth destroyeth: for [b]where your treasure is there will your heart be also.

1 (32-34): a gift that empowers for giving.

[2] Let your [c]loins be girded about, and [your] lamps burning; and ye like unto men that [d]wait for their own lord, when he shall return on occasion of‡ the wedding, that when he cometh and knocketh they may open to him immediately. Blessed are those servants, whom the lord when he cometh shall find [e]watching. Verily

2 (35-40): the expectant servant served.

x cf. 1 Pet. 5. 7. cf. Rom. 8. 32.

y Mk. 10. 28-31. cf. 2 Cor. 6. 10.

z cf. ch. 18. 22. cf. Phil. 3. 8. cf. Acts. 4. 33-37.

a Matt. 6. 19, 20.

b cf. Col. 3. 1.

c Ex. 12. 11. 1. Pet. 1. 13.

d cf. Matt. 25. 1-13.

e cf. 1 Thess. 1. 10. cf. Heb. 9. 28.

*Some read "the kingdom of God." †Some omit. ‡Or "from."

All this is simple to us, thank God. We have listened to such words from childhood, and they are not difficult to apprehend, whether or not we have drunk in their blessedness.

6. The Lord carries us on to what is the limit of the life of faith; not death, but His own coming. Death might come, of course, but we must not, and cannot, confound, in such words as we have here, one thing with the other. The whole thought is different, the blessing of the whole Church, and of the earth, and the glory of Christ Himself being connected with His coming. It is not that we know either when He will come; for the injunction to watch implies the reverse of this. "Watch; for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come."

[1] First of all, we have the assurance which permits the heart to go out freely after this. The gift of the Kingdom is assured to us as the Father's good pleasure; and this gift qualifies for giving, which, in fact, is but laying up treasure in it. There no possibility can be, of change or loss; and one's treasure being there, fixes the heart there also. (See p. 93 seq. notes.)

[2] The loins are to be girt up in readiness for removing, and the lamps burning, for it is night while Christ is absent. The whole attitude is governed by the fact that at any time He may return: His servants are to be as those waiting for their lord, when he shall return on occasion of the wedding, that when he cometh and knocketh they may immediately open to him. The common rendering here ("from the wedding") raises a difficulty unnecessarily: for all other passages represent the wedding as following the coming of the Lord, not preceding it, and it would only be possible to say either that the passage here applied to Jewish saints after the heavenly ones were already united to the Lord (Rev. xix. 7); or that the figure was only in loose application to the facts. The last is not to be thought of: why introduce a difficulty so easy to be avoided? The former seems contrary to what is here; for we have seen that since the transfiguration the heavenly things have been more opening to us. Hence it is preferable to translate "on occasion of the wedding," which, while quite justifiable, removes every difficulty.

The blessing of those found in this expectant service is great indeed. The heart of Him who was amongst us "as one that serveth" is called forth in response: He will gird Himself, and make them sit down to meat, and will come forth and serve them. Blessed be His Name, He is the same in heaven as He was on earth. How easy should service be to Him!

"Whether He come in the second watch, or come in the third watch, blessed are those servants." "The Romans divided the night," says Van Oosterzee,

I say unto you that he shall [f]gird himself and make them sit down to meat, and shall come forth and serve them. And if he come in the second watch, or come in the third watch, and find them so, blessed are those servants. But this know that, if the master of the house had [g]known in what hour the thief was coming, he would have watched, and not have suffered his house to be dug through. And ye therefore, be ye ready: for in what hour ye [h]think not the Son of man cometh.

3 (41-44): the portion of the good steward.

[3] And Peter said to him, Lord, speakest thou this parable unto us, or even unto all? And the Lord said, Who then is the [i]faithful and prudent steward, whom his lord shall set over his household, to give them their [j]portion of food in season? Blessed is that servant whom his lord when he cometh shall find so doing. Verily I say unto you, that he will make him [k]ruler over all that he hath.

4 (45, 46): lapsed from service.

[4] But if that servant say in his heart, My lord [l]delayeth his coming, and shall begin to smite the menservants and maid-servants, and to eat and drink, and to be drunken, the lord of that servant shall come in a day that he looketh not for, and in an hour that he knoweth not, and shall cut him asunder, and appoint his portion with the [m]unbelievers.

f cf. Jno. 13. 4, 13. cf. 1 Sam. 2. 30.

g cf. Rev. 3. 3. cf. 1 Thess. 5. 4.

h cf. 2 Pet. 3. 10. cfr. Rev. 22. 17, 20.

i Matt. 24. 45 -51.

j cf. Acts 20. 28.

k cf. ch. 19. 17.

l cf. 2 Pet. 3. 3, 4. cfr. Rev. 22. 7.

m cf. Matt. 25. 30.

"into four night-watches, a division which the Jews had accepted from them. The opinion is entirely without ground that the Saviour here followed another division into only three night-watches. He says nothing of the fourth, simply for the reason that the disciples, from that, should note that His return was by no means to be expected as late as possible; even as He does not name the first, because it would weaken the whole representation of the watchful servants. The Parousia does not come so quickly as impatience, nor yet so late as carelessness supposes, but in the very middle of the night, when the temptation to fall asleep is great and therefore must be most vigorously combated. It may even tarry longer than the servants think; but, grant that it should not take place even till the third, or should come even in the second watch of the night, whosoever perseveres faithfully at his post shall in no wise lose his reward."

The Lord has a word on the other side, where the servant has somehow become "the master of the house," and the coming of the Son of man like the unwelcome visit of a thief. It would be needful for such to remember that the thief does not come at an hour expected, or perhaps the house would not have been dug through. "If he had known" only presses the fact that he does not know.

[3] Peter asks whether this parable is limited to the twelve, or applies to all. The Lord answers, not directly, but by giving, on the one side and on the other, the portion of the faithful and of the unfaithful steward. Responsibility attaches wherever there is trust; and proportionate to the reward of faithfulness is the recompense of unfaithfulness. The parables here, if we may call them such, are almost word for word those at the end of the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew; yet seem to have been given at another time, and the repetition of specially important lessons may surely have had its purpose in imprinting them the more on the minds of the disciples. (See p. 232, notes.)

[4] The only difference in the parable of the unfaithful servant is that instead of eating and drinking with the drunken, he is himself drunken, and the association with others is omitted. His portion is said also to be "with the unbelievers," as in Matthew "with the hypocrites."

5 (47, 48): the award measured.

7 (xii. 49–59): The conclusion.
1 (49, 50): the purpose of God.
2 (51–53): the division resulting.

5 And that servant who [n]knew his lord's will, and prepared not [himself], nor did according to his will, shall be beaten with many [stripes], but he who knew not, but did things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with [o]few. And to whomsoever [p]much is given, from him shall much be required; and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more.

7. [1] I came to cast [q]fire on the earth; and what will I, if it hath been already kindled? But I have a [r]baptism to be baptized with; and how am I straitened till it be accomplished.

[2] Suppose ye that I have come to give [s]peace upon earth? I tell you, nay; but rather division. For from this time there shall be five in one house divided: [t]three shall be divided against two, and two against three: father against son, and son against father; mother against daughter, and daughter against mother; mother-in-law against her daughter-in-law, and daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law.

n cf. Num. 15. 30, 31. cf. Jas. 4. 17. cf. Heb. 10. 28, 29.
o cf. Lev. 5. 17. cf. Rom. 2. 12.
p cf. Lev. 4. 22. cf. 2 Sa. 12. 7–10. cf. Gen. 39. 8, 9.
q cf. ch. 3. 16, 17. cf. Mal. 3. 2, 3. cf. vers 51, etc.
r cf. Mk. 10. 38. cf. ch. 9. 51.
s Matt. 10. 34–36. cf. Gal. 5. 11. cf. ch. 19. 38.
t Mi. 7. 5, 6. cf. ch. 14. 26.

5 There is added here, as not in Matthew, the statement as to the gradation of penalty according to the measure of knowledge of his lord's will on the part of the servant. On the other hand, the want of knowledge, since it was capable of being obtained, does not secure the offender. Indeed the smiting of fellow-servants and the drinking until drunken could not be excused after that manner. The common conscience of men is sufficient to condemn the grossness of what is often done by professing Christians without apparent check from their religion.

7. The Lord closes now with putting the purpose of God in connection with its present effects among men. These in fact were very different. The Prince of peace had brought a sword. Israel, so long identified with the revelation of God to men,—from which salvation was to come for men,—was nevertheless to be set aside. Yet His purposes moved on, spite of all this, to their accomplishment, and the signs were already in the world, though they might be blind to them.

1 Christ had come to cast fire upon earth. The holiness of God was to be manifested; nay, already the effects of it were showing themselves: the fire was being kindled among men. The grace in which it was displayed did not alter this, for grace in no wise means tolerance of sin. Alas, men could little bear the exposure of it: "The world hateth Me," said the divine Speaker here, "because I testify of it that its works are evil" (John vii. 7). Thus the fire that would have purified, consumed.

And of Him holiness required the baptism of suffering that was before Him, before His full heart, otherwise straitened, could be poured out as He longed to pour it out. He Himself must satisfy this necessity of the divine nature. Thus on God's part there should be no hindrance to fullest blessing. According to the significance of baptism, these sufferings would put Him into a new place with God, a place of sanctification on account of His people (John xvii. 19), through which they would find a new and blessed place in Him.

2 But what would be the result of this as to men at large? Peace among men, in the union of heart with heart in the acceptance of it? No; but everywhere division, and among the most intimate relations of life; a man's foes would be those of his own household. "The world would no more endure faith in the Saviour than it did the Saviour Himself, who was faith's object, and whom it confessed. It is well to note how the presence of the Saviour draws out the evil of the human heart. The state described here is in Micah, the description of the most dreadful state of evil conceivable (Mic. vii. 1–7)." (Synopsis.)

3 (54-57): signs.

3 And he said also unto the multitudes, When ye see a [u]cloud rising out of the west, immediately ye say, A shower is coming; and so it cometh to pass. And when [ye see] the south wind blowing, ye say, There will be heat: and it cometh to pass. Hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the earth and of the heaven, and [v]how is it that ye cannot discern this time? But why even of your own selves judge ye not what is right?

4 (58, 59): the failure of Israel.

4 For as thou goest with thine [w]adversary to the magistrate, give diligence on the [x]way to be reconciled with him; lest he drag thee to the [y]judge, and the judge deliver thee to the [z]officer, and the officer cast thee into [a]prison. I tell thee, thou shalt not come out thence, till thou hast [b]paid the very last mite.

u Matt.16.2, 3.
v cf. Rom. 13. 11. cf. 1 Jno. 2. 18. *cf.*1 Chr.12. 32.
w Matt. 5. 25, 26.
x cf. ch. 14. 31, 32. *cf.*Heb.3.7, 8.
y *cf.*Jas 5.9. cf. 1 Pet. 4. 5..
z cf. Judg.6. 1, etc. cf. 2 Thess. 2. 11.
a cf. Matt. 18. 30–34. *cf.*Is. 24.22.
b *cf.*Is.51.17. cf. ch.19.41 –44.

SECTION 3. (Chaps. xiii.-xvi.)

The Gospel as manifesting God to man.

1 (xiii.): Righteousness alone barren.

1. [1] THERE were present at that time some who told him of the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had [c]mingled with their sacrifices. And he answered and said unto them, Suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners [d]beyond all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? I c ctr. ch. 23. 17. cf. Lam. 2. 20.

d *cf.*Jno.9.2.

[3] Yet God had not left them without witness, plainly to be read as the face of the heavens which they were so skillful in discerning. It was hypocrisy to pretend they had not what only their unwillingness to see rendered obscure. Conscience only was needed, the discernment of what was right. The signs given of God are of moral character, and the right is what appeals to every man; yet the appeal may be none the less in vain.

[4] Israel had thus failed as the witness of God on earth. Their own law had pronounced upon them; Moses, in whom they trusted, was but their accuser; while they were refusing Him through whom they might have been reconciled to him. The Lord utters still His warning, but with the consciousness in His heart that their doom was at hand.

Sec. 3.

We are approaching now the very heart of the Gospel; in which God is manifested in righteousness and love to man: His whole character is made apparent. But for this, man also must be manifested, in order that the suitability and necessity of God's grace may be seen. This is the theme of the first part here, therefore, that righteousness alone, man being what he is, can do nothing for him: judgment, and only judgment, is his portion. The second part (chap. xiv) exhibits God and man in contrast to one another; men seeking their own things and without taste for the things of God; with the consequences of this for those that follow Christ. While, thirdly, in the fifteenth chapter, all the heart of God is seen as towards man when simply lost, rejoicing in his recovery. The sixteenth goes on to the practical life of the disciple, and to the recompence beyond.

1. The first part lays the basis of repentance, and shows how far man's judgment of himself must go, if it is to answer to the judgment of God with regard to him. Here we have—

[1] First, very precisely, Paul's doctrine of "no difference," with which he opens the way for the gospel in his epistle to the Romans. They tell the Lord about the Galileans whom Pilate had slain at the very altar, as they were drawing near to God. He probes the thought of their heart by the question: was this, then, a proof that they were greater sinners than others in the sight of God?

tell you, nay; but except ye [e]repent, ye shall all likewise perish. Or those eighteen upon whom the tower in Siloam fell and killed them, suppose ye that they were debtors beyond all the men that dwell in Jerusalem? I tell you, nay; but, except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.

2 (6-9): "but if not"—the alternative.

[2] And he spake this parable: A certain man had a [f]fig-tree planted in his [g]vineyard; and he came and sought fruit thereon, and found none. And he said to the vinedresser, Behold, these three years I come, [h]seeking fruit on this fig-tree, and find none: [i]cut it down; why doth it also render the ground useless? But he answered and said unto him, Lord, let it alone [j]this year also, till I shall dig about it and dung it; and if it bear fruit, [well]; and if not, [k]after that thou shalt cut it down.

3 (10-17): resource in God.

[3] And he was teaching in one of the synagogues on the sabbath; and behold, a woman having a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, and she was [l]bowed together, and wholly unable to lift herself up. And when Jesus saw her, he called to her and said, Woman, thou art [m]loosed from thine infirmity. And he laid his hands on her, and immediately she was made straight and glorified God. But the ruler of the synagogue answered e cf. vers. 23, 24. cfr. 1 Tim. 1. 13-16.

f cf. Jno. 1. 48 with Ezr. 9. 8, 9.

g cf. Is. 5. 1-4. cf. Ps. 80. 8-16.

h cf. Matt. 21. 19, 23-33.

i cf. Ex. 32. 7-14. cf. Ezek. 20. 8, 9, etc. Matt. 3. 10.

j cf. Nu. 14. 11-14. cf. ch. 24. 47 with Acts 3. 26.

k cf. Rom. 11. 21. cf. Acts 13. 46.

l cf. Lev. 21. 20. cf. Deut. 28. 59.

m ch. 4. 18. cf. Ps. 146. 8.

and answers it Himself, that they were not, but that, except they repented, all would perish alike: there was not a possible one who could merit escape.

He adds another example, where the character of what took place might make it seem more like the special judgment of God Himself,—eighteen upon whom the tower of Siloam fell and slew them: were these, at any rate, "debtors" to the justice of God beyond all else of the dwellers in Jerusalem? and again He will not leave it to others to answer, but answers it Himself in the same way as before. The number 18, which is 3x6, speaks of evil manifested in its highest uprise; and note that the Lord says not a word with regard to them to lessen the thought of evil in them: that is not the point. On the contrary, make of it as much as possible, the lesson is only deeper. For the question is, not, were they sinners beyond others? but does the hand of God upon them prove them to be that? had they not been such, could they have pleaded exemption from divine judgment on that account? And to this He answers, No: judgment from God, and even to perdition, will come upon all, except they repent. It is the owning the ruin in which we are alike, which casts us, as sinners, upon unfailing mercy and brings out from under judgment: this, and this alone.

[2] He strengthens this by showing that the delay of judgment does not at all mean escape from it, but only that God desires men to escape, and would leave them the possibility of it. The alternative still remains: "if not, thou shalt cut it down;" the fruit of repentance must be brought forth, or sooner or later (if in this life even never) judgment must take its course.

Even this respite comes, not from comparative betterness, but through a Mediator. It is not that there is some little fruit, but let it alone till all means are exhausted that may produce fruit. It is the plea of mercy only that could avail for any; and the fruit of repentance must at last be found.

[3] Here comes in the assurance of the resource that there is in God for all that so turn to Him, though it be "without strength" as well as "ungodly." A woman bowed together so that she could not lift up herself, for eighteen years! Notice, once more, that sinister eighteen. Yet with Him there is no difficulty.

with indignation, because Jesus had healed on the n sabbath day, and said to the multitude, There are six days in which men are to work: in these therefore, come and be healed, and not on the sabbath day. But the Lord answered him, and said, Hypocrites, doth not o each of you on the sabbath loose his ox or his ass from the manger, and lead it away and water it? And ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom p Satan hath bound, lo, [these] eighteen years, to be loosed from this bond on the sabbath day? And when he said this, all his adversaries were ashamed, and all the multitude q rejoiced at all the glorious things that were being done by him.

t (18-21): the kingdom in man's hand.
a (18, 19): in independence.
b (20-21): the leaven of falsehood.

t a Then he said, Unto what is the kingdom of God like? and to what shall I liken it? It is like a grain of r mustard-seed which a man took and cast into his garden; and it grew, and became a tree; and the birds of the heaven lodged in its branches.

b And again he said, To what shall I liken the kingdom of God? It is like s leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened.

n ch. 6.7-11. Jno. 5.9,10.

o ch. 14. 5. Matt. 12.10-13.

p cf. 1 Jno. 3. 8. cf. 2 Tim. 2. 26.

q ch. 14. 6. cf. Acts 5. 12, 13. ch. 19. 37, 38.

r Matt. 13. 31, 32. cf. Acts 20. 29, 30 with Rev. 18. 2.

s Matt. 13. 33. cf. Gal. 1. 6-9. cfr. 2 Cor. 2. 17.

"Woman, thou art loosed from thine infirmity." He says; and then His hands make His words good. She was made straight immediately, and glorified God.

But this produces indignation in the synagogue: for it is the sabbath; and a man must not use the power of God upon the sabbath day! What! the Lord says: is it to preserve the rest of God unbroken, to keep a daughter of Abraham in bondage to Satan? Notice the emphasis He lays upon this, that she is a daughter of Abraham. How unseemly for one who inherits Abraham's faith to be kept bowed together; and this is, doubtless, how we are to take Christ's plea for her, as in the case of Zacchæus afterwards (xix. 9). This perfects the picture: work there is none, but God's work, and the synagogue in vain would tie His hands. It was, in fact, but loud-voiced hypocrisy: for they had no difficulty in leading away their beasts to the water. They only prized man at less than the beast.

t With this, for the time, His adversaries are silenced, and the people rejoice at all His glorious works. But the Lord repeats here two significant parables whose meaning we have already seen, but which gain a new significance from their new position. They are parables of the Kingdom not then begun, and carry us beyond Judaism into that which would indeed seem to show His adversaries silenced, and the people rejoicing in His power established.

Alas, what it does show is the likeness of human nature in all dispensations, the revival of the synagogue in the professing Church of Christ, and the consequent degradation of the divine in human hands. For these parables show us the Kingdom of God itself administered by man, and the changed form which is the result of this. In the first it is seen like one of the kingdoms of the world, and the ministers of Satan finding shelter in it. In the second the professing Church itself is adulterating the bread from heaven, to adapt it to the tastes of the world; in the end the word being leavened. Such is man; and in no way, perhaps, could he be shown more hopeless in his evil. Hope can be in God alone.

The weakness even of the saint is shown in these pictures: for the evil goes on without ability on his part to overcome it. For himself he may; but he has lost control of that which was committed to him, and cannot recover it. His very separation from the evil, which faithfulness to God enjoins, has to be in confession of the general ruin.

5 (22-30): judgment at the end.

5 And he went through one city and village after another, teaching and journeying towards Jerusalem. And a certain man said to him, Lord, are they [t]few that are to saved? But he said unto them, [u]Strive earnestly to enter in through the narrow door: for many, I say to you, shall seek to enter in, and shall not be able. When once the [v]master of the house has risen up, and hath shut to the door, and ye begin to stand without and to knock at the door saying, Lord, open to us, and he shall answer and say unto you, I know you not whence ye are; then shall ye begin to say, We have [w]eaten and drunk in thy presence, and thou hast taught in our streets. And he will say, I tell you, I know you not whence ye are; [x]depart from me, all workers of unrighteousness. There shall be the [y]weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham and Isaac and Jacob and all the prophets in the kingdom of God, and yourselves cast out. And they shall come from the [z]east and the west, and from the north and the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God. And behold, there are [a]last that shall be first, and there are first that shall be last.

6 (31-35): the evil under control from God.

6 In the same hour came certain Pharisees, saying unto him, Get thee out and go hence, for [b]Herod would fain kill thee. And he said unto them, Go and tell that [c]fox, Behold, I [d]cast out demons and perform cures today and to-morrow, and on the [e]third [day] I am pert Matt. 7.14. Matt. 20.16. cf. Rev. 7.9.

u cf. Matt. 11.12. cf. Heb. 12.16, 17.
v cf. Matt. 25.10-12. cf. Gen. 7.16.
w Matt. 7.21-23. cf. Tit. 1.16. cf. Jude 12.
x Matt. 25.41. cf. 2 Thess. 1.9.
y Matt. 8.12. 2 Pet. 2.17. Ps. 112.10. ctr. ch. 7.38.
z cf. Mal. 1.11. Matt. 8.11.
a Matt. 19.30. Matt. 20.16.
b cf. ch. 9.7-9.
c cf. Ps. 37.12. cf. Mi. 3.1-3.
d cf. Acts. 10.38.
e Matt. 17.23. cf. Heb. 2.10.

Such then is man; and being such, all help, all hope, must be in God alone. "Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils: for wherein is he to be accounted of?" (Isa. ii. 22).

This judgment, seen and accepted in the Cross, is peace, holiness and happiness. Self is set aside by that which has made peace for us; and Christ abides as the One in whom we have acceptance with God, and the store-house, freely ours, of every blessing.

5 But judgment yet abides for those that refuse His grace, and the door of salvation is even a narrow one, for the many who would gladly enter the Kingdom by some way more gratifying to their pride of heart, or freer to the careless foot of those who would have God as careless. Nor would that door be always open: the Master of the house would rise and shut it; and then there would be many left outside, even of those who could plead outward acquaintance with Him, but no practical inward knowledge, still the unsaved doers of unrighteousness. Then would be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when they would see Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the Kingdom of God, but be themselves shut out: and Gentiles too from all quarters would come and sit down there; the last being first, the first last: men's thoughts ever, naturally, the opposite of God's. But God's will stand.

6 The Pharisees come now to the Lord with an apparently friendly suggestion, but which, from His answer to it, evidently proceeded from Herod himself. "That fox" was but seeking in a round-about way to get rid of One whom he feared as well as hated. It is easily to be understood from what we have read of him elsewhere, that he did not want more blood on his hands of such a character as had already stained them. Yet the reports of the marvels done in what was his own kingdom troubled and haunted a heart in which, as is so commonly the case, superstition and unbelief held sway together. If he did fected. But I must go my way to-day and to-morrow and the following [day]: for it is not permitted a *f*prophet to perish outside Jerusalem. *g*Jerusalem, Jerusalem, that killeth the prophets, and stoneth those that are sent unto her! how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a *h*hen her brood under her wings, and ye *i*would not. Behold, your *j*house is left unto you! and I say unto you, Ye shall not see me until ye shall say, *k*Blessed is he that cometh in the name of [the] Lord.

2(xiv.)Man in contrast with and estrangement from God.

1 (1–6): the prerogative of good with God.

2. [1] And it came to pass, as he entered into the house of one of the rulers [who was] of the Pharisees, on the Sabbath, to eat bread, that they were *l*watching him. And behold, there was before him a certain man who had the *m*dropsy. And Jesus answering spake unto the lawyers and Pharisees, saying, Is it *n*lawful to heal on the sabbath, or not? But they were silent. And f cf. Ezek. 3. 5-7.

cf. ch. 4. 24.
g Matt. 23. 37-39. ch. 19. 41, 42.
cf. Hos. 11. 8.
h cf. Ps. 57. 1. cf. Ps. 91. 4.
i cf. John 5. 40.
cf. Acts 3. 14, 15.
j cfr. Jno. 2. 16, 17.
k cf. Ps. 118. 26 with Ps. 24. 7-10.
l cf. ch. 6. 7, etc.
m cf. ch. 9. 11.
cf. Matt. 4. 23.
n cf. Jno. 5. 10, 16, 17.

not want to commit himself to threatening which he might have to make good, he was more than willing that it should be done by others. The Lord shows him that He knew well his design, and that He was perfectly beyond the power of all that he could do. The power of God which was showing itself supreme over man's great enemy, and in tender assuagement of the misery which had evoked divine compassion in its behalf, could not submit to be thwarted or curbed by aught that man could do. It would go on "to-day and to-morrow,"—the two days of testimony in the face of unbelief; on the third day, He, the glorious Worker, would be perfected; and there is surely an enigmatic reference to resurrection. The mightiest miracle of all, not in power displayed only, but in its significance, would place Him for ever in manifest supremacy, with His work accomplished, all the power of the enemy but working out, spite of itself, the divine purpose.

For He knew whither He was going, not to escape Herod, but to meet the enmity of man where it had ever displayed itself most, where most God had, through the generations past, drawn near to men. Jerusalem had a fanaticism of hatred for the prophets which would be jealous of any perishing elsewhere. Then with a sob of anguish for His murderers:—"Jerusalem, Jerusalem, that killeth the prophets, and stoneth those that are sent unto her!"—He turns where His heart draws Him, to testify in face of the inevitable result following —"how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen her brood under her wings! and ye would not." So He and they must part, because they will: their house—no more God's house—is left to them; and "I say unto you, Ye shall not see Me, until ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."

2. The fourteenth chapter shows man, such as we have seen him, in contrast with God, and the rejection of His grace by man in consequence of the resulting estrangement of his heart from Him. The conditions of discipleship are therefore the readiness to abandon even the nearest relatives for His sake, and to take up one's cross to follow Him. The cost must be reckoned seriously in a world so adverse, and God's salt must not be allowed to lack its savor.

[1] Once more the sabbath question is brought up; and this time, by the Lord Himself. In it they would set God against Himself, and make His statutes prohibitory of the profit to men they were intended to secure. He takes this up therefore in the house of one of their rulers and a Pharisee. A man is there before Him who has the dropsy; and He asks the question which was not then for the first time asked, but which they had never answered, "Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath?" But they are silent. Then He makes divine power give the he took him and healed him, and let him go. And he said unto them, [o]Which of you shall have an ass or ox fall into a well, and will not immediately draw him up on the sabbath day? And they [p]could not answer him again as to these things.

2 (7-11): the wisdom of humility.

2 And he spake a parable unto those that were invited, as he marked how they chose out the [q]chief places, saying unto them, When thou art invited by any one to a marriage feast, do not put thyself down in the chief place, lest perhaps a more honorable man than thou be invited by him, and he who invited thee and him come and say to thee, Give this man place, and then thou shalt begin with shame to take the last place. But when thou art invited, go and put thyself down in the [r]last place, that when he who invited thee cometh, he may say to thee, Friend, go up higher. Then shalt thou have honor before all that are at table with thee. For every one that [s]exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that abaseth himself shall be exalted.

3 (12-14): a portion in resurrection.

3 And he said also to him that had invited him, When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, nor thy kindred, nor thy rich neighbors, lest haply they also should invite thee again, and a recompense be made thee. But when thou makest a feast, invite the [t]poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind; and thou shalt be blessed: for they have not [wherewith] to recompense thee; for it shall be recompensed thee in the resurrection of the just.

o ch. 13. 15. cf. Ex. 23.4, 5.
p ch. 13. 17. ch. 20. 26. cf. Matt. 22. 12.
q Prov. 25.6, 7. cf. Jno. 9.34, 40. cf. ch. 18.11. ctr. 1 Tim. 1. 15.
r cf. Phil. 3.4 -7. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 9.
s cf. 1 Sam. 2. 7, 8. cf. Prov. 29. 23. cf. 1 Pet. 5.5, ch. 18.13,14.
t cf. ch. 15.2. cf. ch. 1. 52, 53. cf. ch. 7. 41, 42. cf. Is. 55. 1.

answer, surely an unbribed one: He takes and heals him, and lets him go. God has decided.

The case He puts to them, He had put before; and He puts it to show that they themselves had virtually decided it also, and that to make even a doubt of it was mere hypocrisy on their part; they made none if it were ox or ass, or the worth of these. But good with God has constant prerogative: He never tied His own hands, that He should not bless, though man, if he could, would do so. They lacked sincerity; but how far were they from God, who dared to argue for Him so!

2 He turns to the guests to press on them the wisdom of humility. Even in the world the man that exalts himself is often abased: but with God this is the constant rule. Man's way is that of self-exaltation: he cannot trust God nor see himself aright; he must be abased for blessing or abased in judgment. How the Speaker here in His own Person illustrates the contrast between God and man. How far He had come down! emptying Himself in a love that seeketh not her own, that divine fulness might be in Him for human need: a need which our pride forbids us to own, and would make the cross of Christ but foolishness.

3 Now He has a word also for the entertainer, bidding him seek his recompense at the resurrection of the just. For this, he must not invite those who can repay him, but the poor, the maimed, the blind. To covet what is spiritual, and invisible except to faith: that is not only permitted but enjoined upon us, though the recompense is but mercy, and the Giver One who never mistakes, and whose rule in exaltation and abasement, Christ has just now given. We are safe, therefore, in waiting for His approval; while the sense of His grace encourages the weakest to send his heart on there.

t (15-24): God's offer testing man.

15 t And when one of them that were at table heard these things, he said unto him, u Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God. But he said unto him, A certain man made a v great supper, and invited many; and he sent out his servant at supper-time, to say to those invited, w Come, for all things are now ready. And they all began with one consent to make excuse. The first said to him, I have x bought a field, and must needs go out and see it: I pray thee, have me excused. And another said, I have bought five yoke of oxen, and I go to prove them: I pray thee, have me excused. And another said, I have y married a wife, and therefore I cannot come. And the servant came, and related to his lord these things. Then the master of the house, being angry, said unto his servant, Go out quickly into the z streets and lanes of the city, and bring in hither the poor and maimed and blind and lame. And the servant said, Lord, what thou commandedst is done, and yet there is room. And the lord said unto the servant, Go out into the a highways and hedges, and compel [them] to come in, that my house may be filled: for I say unto you that none of those men that were invited shall b taste of my supper.

u cf. Rev. 19. 9.
v Matt. 22. 2-14. cf. 1 Ki. 10. 5. cf. Prov. 9. 1-5.
w cf. Matt. 10. 6-8. cf. Jno. 7. 37.
x cf. Acts 13. 38, 39.
x cf. ch. 12. 16-21. cf. 1 Tim. 6. 9, 10.
y cf. ch. 17. 26-28. cf. vers. 26, 27. cf. 1 Cor. 7. 29-33.
z ver. 13. cf. ch. 4. 18. cf. 1 Tim. 1. 15.
a cf. Matt. 28. 19. cf. Acts 1. 8. cf. Acts 11. 18.
b cf. Acts 13. 46, 47. cf. Acts 28. 26-28. cf. Rom. 11. 7-10.

15 t Now, when one of those at table hears these things, his heart is stirred to say that he is indeed blessed who shall eat bread in the Kingdom of God: to which the Lord replies by a parable, to the effect that men do not think so, but when God opens to them the provision of His house, the invited guests begin all to make excuse. Their possessions, the relations upon which they have entered, these in themselves not evil, are made excuses for turning the back upon that to which as Israelites they had been invited, and where indeed they claimed to have a place. The Kingdom long looked for had come nigh at last, the blessed Servant of Jehovah had appeared, to make known to the guests that the appointed time was arrived, and all things were now ready. Nothing needed but to come and partake of the free bounty of God,—of a grace which required nothing but man's acceptance of it.

The leaders of the nation, their self-claimed representatives, were those who had treated thus the heavenly message. Grace itself was forced to turn from them to the poor of the flock, those in the streets and lanes of the city, "the poor and the lame and the maimed, and the blind." Poor enough, and with plenty of defects, the very evils of their condition were such as took from them the excuses which had been made by the others. "The blind had no field to view, the lame could not go along behind his oxen, the maimed had no wife who could have hindered him from coming; only the feeling of poverty could have held them back; but this feeling also vanishes, since they must in a friendly way be led in by the Servant" (Van Oosterzee).

Thus the condition of the guests, which stumbled the Pharisees, is accounted for. The publican and the harlot went into the Kingdom of God before these: for their knowledge of themselves as sinners, and their despair of self-recovery, made the Saviour of the lost to be fully suited to them. Repentance and faith were in their case friendly associates which took them by both hands to lead them to Jesus.

But God's provision found not in this way sufficient guests in Israel: "Lord, it is done as Thou hast commanded, and yet there is room." Again, therefore, is the word issued, "Go out into the highways and hedges,"—to the mere unsheltered wanderers, such as were, spiritually, the Gentiles,—"and compel them [5] 25-35): conditions of discipleship to be exercised about.

[5] And there went great multitudes with him; and he turned and said unto them, If any one cometh to me, and shall not [c]hate his own father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple. And whosoever doth not bear his own [d]cross, and come after me, he cannot be my disciple. For which of you, wishing to [e]build a tower, doth not first sit down and count the cost, whether he hath wherewith to complete it? lest haply, having laid the foundation and not being able to finish it, all who behold it begin to mock him, saying, This man [f]began to build, and was not able to finish. Or what king, going to [g]encounter another king in war, doth not first sit down and take counsel whether he is able with ten thousand [men] to meet him that cometh against him with [h]twenty thousand? and if c cf. Gen. 12. 1. cf. Deut. 33. 8-10. cf. Jno. 12. 25.

d Matt. 16. 24, 25. cf. Gal. 2. 20. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 10, 11.
e cf. Matt. 7. 24, etc. cf. Matt. 13. 20, 21.
f cf. Gal. 5. 7. cf. Heb. 6. 4-9.
g cf. ch. 12. 58, 59. cf. 1 Ki. 20. 11. cf. Prov. 25. 8.
h cf. 1 Cor. 10. 22.

cf. Jude 14, 15; cf. Rev. 19. 11-21.

to come in," (love's sweet compulsion,) "that my house may be filled. For I say unto you, that none of those men that were invited shall taste of my supper."

The last words, though speaking of the rejection on God's side of those who were rejecting His grace in Israel, their place given to the Gentiles, yet in principle remains true as to all rejectors, they shall not taste of God's supper. The invitation is now world-wide, and bears with it wherever it goes the responsibility attached.

[5] There follow, the world being such as all this shows it to be, the conditions of discipleship. It is just when crowds are going with Him, and to these, that the Lord declares them. He had spoken in the same way before, but the repetition intensifies His utterance, and shows its exceeding importance. He who comes to Him must hate (in comparison with Him) all nearest and dearest to him, and his own life, too. He must bear his cross, and come after Him, or he cannot be His disciple.

Then He bids them count the cost of this, and draws two pictures: the first under the figure of building: the second, of a warfare.

A "tower" is something that is conspicuous and eminent as a building; and needs, on that account, a special solidity. It may be for defence; it may be for overlooking what is round it. Our Christian discipleship should have all these characters.

It will be conspicuous, in a world like this, just as far as it is Christian. The world is not something of an inferior sort, but the total opposite of Christianity. The Christian is a light in the world, a light which shines in darkness, and cannot blend with it.

It will be eminent: little need to say that, with the Lord's conditions before our eyes. Even the world recognizes the moral height of devotedness and self-sacrifice; though it will make large reserve when it is estimating this in the case of a Christian.

Then as to defence, the character of the disciple fully maintained shields him from how much temptation which the waverer invites and succumbs to; while the suffering to which he is exposed as such causes the "Spirit of glory and of God" to rest upon him (1 Peter iv. 14), power that is equal to every demand upon it.

Finally, the disciple it is who as such acquires the ability to see, the single eye being in fact that of the disciple, to whom Christ is the touchstone of every thing.

But this is a tower that costs much to build, from the point of view from which it is seen by one outside it. It will cost him all that the world holds precious; how much he will gain he is not yet in the place to see. He who not, while he is yet far off, he sendeth an embassy, and asketh [g]conditions of peace. So then, every one of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, cannot be my disciple. [h]Salt* is good; but if even the salt has become savorless, wherewith shall it be seasoned? It is fit neither for the land nor for the dunghill; they cast it away. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

3 (xv.) The heart of God displayed. [l] (1-7): the faithfulness of the Shepherd.

3. [i] Now all the [k]tax-gatherers and sinners were drawing near to him to hear him. And both the Pharisees and the scribes [l]murmured, saying, This [man] receiveth sinners, and eateth with them. But he spake unto them

*Most add "therefore."

[g] cf. 2 Ki. 10. 4. 5. cf. Job 22. 21. cf. Col. 1. 20. cf. ch. 15. 1 24.
[h] Matt. 5. 13. Mk. 9. 50. cf. Jno. 15. 6. cf. 2 Pet. 2. 20-22.
[i] ch. 5. 27-32. ch. 7. 29. ch. 19. 2.
[l] ch. 7. 34. 39. ch. 19. 7. Matt. 9. 11.

attempts it lightly will surely find it beyond his power to accomplish; and he who does not undertake it in strength far greater than his own.

The next picture of discipleship views it as a warfare. A king is going to an encounter with another king: for you must indeed be as a king to meet the forces that are against you in the world. Moreover these are not merely irregular, guerilla forces: they are organized under a king of their own, the dread "prince of this world," with more than the power of this world in his hand, and more than you are likely to be able to meet, high as you may rate your competence. Here, surely, if you come to reckoning, all is against you: the case is more strongly against you, the result of failure worse than in the former one. You may be scoffed at if you begin to build and are not able to finish; but here it will be worse: provoke the animosity of the world against you, and it is an enemy that does not easily forgive.

Thus the effect of reckoning may seem mere discouragement; and so it is meant to be, from all mere levity, and from all self-confidence: if you are setting out in either of these moods, you may as well give up at once. If, on the other hand, you are in serious earnest, the Lord's words are meant only to cast you upon resources better than your own, and all-sufficient.

But savorless salt, of what use is it? just as little is discipleship without reality. Israel had been, in God's thought for her, such a purifying salt for the nations of the earth. It had become savorless; and God's new evangel had not succeeded in imparting to it the quality which it had lost. It could only be cast out. And just such would be the case with those who should now have merely the label without the reality of discipleship.

3. We now come to the very heart of the Lord's teaching in this Gospel, and turn from man and what he is, to realize the love of God towards him, in spite of, or rather, in view of what he is,—the heart of God told out in seeking and saving that which is lost. The three parables of this chapter unite in this: in each case what has been lost is found; in each the joy is with the finder; and in heaven, before the angels, speaks conclusively of Whose joy it is that is presented. The three parables again, in this connection, naturally suggest the Trinity, the Shepherd and the Father being in manifest agreement also with such a thought. The Woman does not seem so, until we realize that the Spirit is often presented in Scripture in the agents and instruments through which He works. The Woman then will stand directly for the Church, but still as the vehicle of the Spirit, and all parts of the chapter will be in place. Father, Son, and Spirit are all occupied with man; and he it is through whom the angels themselves become adoring witnesses of the "exceeding riches of His grace, in His kindness towards us in Christ Jesus."

[i] All the tax-gatherers and sinners were drawing near to Him to hear Him: this was the occasion of the parables and shows us the application of them as not to wandering saints, but to sinners truly that: the "lost," a deeper word used by divine love here than the Pharisees themselves, as to men in this life, this parable, saying, What man of you, having a [m] hundred sheep, and having lost from among them [n] one, doth not leave the ninety and nine in the wilderness, and [o] go after that which is lost until he find it? And, having found it, he putteth it on his [p] shoulders, rejoicing. And when he cometh home, he calleth together his friends and his neighbors, saying to them, [q] Rejoice with me: for I have found my sheep that was lost. I say unto you that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that [r] repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just men who need no repentance.

8 (8–10): the woman, the church.

[8] Or what [s] woman, having ten [t] pieces of silver,* if she lose one piece, doth not light a [u] lamp, and [v] sweep the house, and seek carefully till she find it? And, having found it, she calleth together her friends and neighbors, saying, [w] Rejoice with me: for I have found the piece which I had lost. Likewise, I say unto you, there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth.

* "Drachma": a drachma was worth about 17½ cents.

m Matt. 18. 12-14. cf. Rom. 3. 10.
n cf. Is. 53. 6. cf. Jno. 4. 7, etc.
o cf. ch. 5. 2, 17.
p ch. 10. 34. Jno. 10. 28-30. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 5.
q cf. Zeph. 3. 17. cf. Is. 53. 11. vers. 9, 23, 32.
r cf. Acts. 2. 37. cf. Acts. 11. 18. cf. 2 Cor. 7. 10.
s ctr. Matt. 13. 33. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 12.
t cf. Mk. 8. 36; cf. Matt. 13. 45, 46; cf. Is. 43. 4.
u cf. Zeph. 1. 12; cf. Ps. 119. 105.
v cf. Ps. 50. 21; cf. Ps. 90. 8.
w vers. 6, 7; cf. Acts 8. 8.

would have cared to utter. But these were murmuring, after their manner, at the Physician of sin-sick souls, for going after them. "This Man receiveth sinners," they say, "and eateth with them." It is then that in a parable He makes personal appeal to them. Was there any of them who if he lost but one sheep out of a hundred, would not leave all the rest and go and find it? Yet they wondered at the value of a human soul to Him! He was finding what He had lost: for they were His; He was Maker and owner of them indeed, become shepherd in His care for them; and He would not leave one such till He had got it back.

We see in this a character of these parables as an appeal to the different classes before Him: not meant therefore, to convey merely general truth but to specialize and apply it. The "lost" is not here characteristic of men in general, but meant to apply itself to those who in self-despair would take it as their description. The Pharisees would disclaim it as intended for them—would have resented it if so applied: they would discern readily enough for whom it was intended; while the poor outcast sinners, self-convicted, would find to their unutterable joy, that they were just those whom He, compassionate Saviour, could not suffer to be lost. All that followed was for them: the putting upon His shoulders, the bringing home with joy; His care too great to trust them any more to themselves for getting home. Then the reception, the gathering together of the friends, the angels, to bid them all rejoice with Him! He does not close without a word for the other class here: for, if the lost sheep was the sinner that repenteth, who then were these "ninety and nine just persons who needed no repentance?" Ah, there had been no joy like this in heaven over them! there never could be as long as they retained this character.

[8] The second parable is that of the woman, in Scripture the figure of the Church, the instrument of the Spirit. The lamp of the Word is in her hand, and she needs it in the darkness of the night, while Christ is absent. The "house" is the circle of natural ties and relationships; for it is not just a question of public preaching, but of that testimony upon which the success of the preacher after all so much depends, and for which the whole Church, and not any class or section of it, is responsible. Good it is to realize that every soul of man, covered with the dust of sin as he may be, and hidden in the darkness of the 3 (11-32): the Father's dead alive again.

3 And he said, A certain man had two sons; and the [x]younger of them said unto his father, Father, give me the [y]portion of [thy] substance that falleth [to me]: and he divided to them [his] living. And [z]not many days after, the younger son gathered all together, and went off into a [a]far country, and there [b]wasted his substance in riotous living. And, when he had [c]spent all, there came a mighty [d]famine throughout that country; and he [e]began to be in want. And he went and [f]joined himself to one of the citizens of that country, and he sent him into his fields to feed [g]swine. And he [h]longed x cf. Gen. 37. 3, cf. Gen. 44. 20, 22.

y cf. Gen. 1. 26, cf. Eccl. 7. 29, cf. Acts 14. 17, ctr. Ps. 16. 5, 6.
z cf. Ps. 58. 3, cf. Jas. 1. 15.
a cf. Job 21. 13–15, cf. Eph. 2. 12, 13.
b cf. Prov. 5. 8–14; cf. ch. 16. 1; cf. Eccl. 11. 9, 10. c cf. Is. 55. 2; cf. ch. 8. 43. d cf. Ex. 5. 7; cf. Ezek. 16. 27. e ctr. ver. 24; cf. ch. 16. 24–26. f cf. 2 Chro. 28. 22; cf. Jer. 5. 3; cf. Am. 5. 5. g cf. Mal. 2. 9; cf. ch. 8. 32, 33. h cf. Is. 44. 20; cf. Hos. 12. 1; ctr. 1 Pet. 4. 3, 4.

world, belongs of right to the King's treasury, and has the King's image stamped on him, though with sore disfigurement. Claim him we may, wherever we may find him, for God to whom he belongs. This general evangelism, we may learn from the parable here, is what is the mind of the Spirit for the Church indwelt of Him. Here too there must be friends and neighbors summoned to rejoice,—angelic onlookers who are in sympathy with Him who is always the glorious Seeker, and who sets in motion all the springs of love and pity that flow anywhere in unison with His own.

3 The third parable shows us the dead alive again, the subjective side, therefore, of this recovery of the lost, which the first two were incompetent to express. The sheep is simply brought back; the piece of money is unchanged when restored; but the lost son returns to his father, and in heart, though under the pressure of famine at the first. The parabolic veil also is thinner, and permits the affections of the heart to manifest themselves with freedom. The two classes seen in the first parable, lost sight of in the second, reappear and come fully out in contrast here, the mirror being held up before the Pharisee as never before, in the elder son.

Sons they both are. This, which has led some astray as to the application, is intelligible in view of Israel's relationship to God, as in Deut. xiv. 1: "Sons ye are of Jehovah your God." This, of course, must not be understood as if involving the Spirit of adoption, which they had not, nor what would be implied by such language in the New Testament. It involved of necessity neither new birth nor salvation. An adoption they had; and the Lord says to the Syrophenician woman, "It is not meet to take the children's bread and to cast it to dogs." Again in the parable which He spoke to the Jews after His solemn entry into Jerusalem, He speaks of Pharisees and publicans both as "sons," exactly as here. Those to whom He was now addressing Himself claimed this most unhesitatingly in their own behalf, and in a sense in which He could not allow it: "We be not born of fornication," they said indignantly: "we have one Father, even God" (John viii. 41.)

This relationship, though it might be only external, furnishes the basis of appeal in the story before us. External only it was, at first, with the younger son, and to the end of it with the elder. The prodigal naturally is the younger son: the elders of Israel were with the Pharisees.

This younger son soon shows where his heart is. The "substance" that he gets and squanders is, of course, his portion in natural things, that which God has in fact divided among men to use as accountable to Him who gave it, or perhaps to abuse in utter forgetfulness of Him. The far-off country which he seeks classes him at once among the many whose backs are habitually turned on God. Here for awhile he enjoys himself after the fashion of those to whom transgression has its own delight, in the lusts which yet consume and never satisfy. An end must come, therefore, in which not only his own resources are at an end, but a famine comes upon all the sources of supply. He is in a land, to fill himself with the pods of which the swine were feeding, and no one gave him. And when he [i] came to himself, he said, How many [j] hired servants of my father have abundance of bread, and I am [k] perishing with famine. I will [l] arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have [m] sinned against heaven and before thee: I am no longer [n] worthy to be called thy son; make me as one of thy [o] hired servants. And he arose and came to his father. But while he was yet a [p] long way off, his father saw him, and had [q] compassion, and [r] ran, and fell on his neck, and [s] kissed him fervently. And the son said unto him, Father, I have [t] sinned against heaven and before thee; I am no longer worthy to be called thy son. But the father said unto his servants, Bring out quickly * a robe, the [u] best, and put it on him; and put a [v] ring on his hand, and [w] sandals on his feet; and bring the fatted [x] calf, and i cf. Jer. 31. 19. cf. Acts 2.37. cf. Acts 10. 4-6.

j cf. ver. 19. cf. Lam. 1.7.
k cf. 2 Cor. 7. 10. cf. Acts 16. 30.
l Ps. 32. 5. cf. Jer. 31.6-9. cf. Hos. 14. 1-3.
m cf. Ps. 51.4. ch. 18. 13. 1 Jno. 1. 9.
n cf. ch. 7.6,7. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 9.
o cf. Josh. 9. 24-27.
p ctr. Rom. 8. 15. cf. Jno. 8.35, 36.
q ctr. Gen. 37. 18.

* Some omit "quickly."

cf. Job 33. 27, 28; cf. Rom. 5. 8, 10. r cf. Eph. 2. 4; cf. Tit. 3. 4, 5. s cf. 1 Tim. 2. 4; cf. Ezek. 18. 23. t cf. Jno. 3. 16; cf. Rom. 5. 8. u ver. 18. v cf. Gen. 3. 21; cf. Phil. 3. 9; cf. Zech. 3.3-5. w cf. Gen. 41.42; cf. Rom. 8.15,38,39. x cf. Deut. 33. 25; cf. Eph. 6.15. x cf. Gen. 18.7; cf. Eph. 2.14.

too, where no man gives, but he joins himself to a citizen of that country, and is sent into the fields to feed swine. Sad picture of Satan's service, in ministering to men given up to their own lusts entirely, longing even to be as they are; thank God, (this is His mercy merely and the door of hope) thank God, in vain.

Now he comes to himself, and in his misery the thought of his father's house breaks in upon him. Alas, it is not yet his father; nor does he think aright of it either, if we realize of what it is the parable speaks. Bread there is there, to be sure, enough and to spare—abundance of bread in that Bethlehem, where our Christ was born, and whence He came to us: bread enough, but not for hired servants. No hired servant, as such, could eat the passover in Israel (Ex. xii. 45.) God has all children in His house, and service but for the free hearts who know the constraint of love in serving Him.

The prodigal is not yet in place to know this, and fain would be one of those hirelings himself. All else is gone for him; but he will go back and confess the sin which he committed, which has deprived him of the son's place (never really known), and after the fashion of man's humility, which recognizes not the worthlessness of such labor nor the grace of God, he will say, "Make me as one of thy hired servants."

With all this, he is yet on his way to his father. The father's love anticipates and effectuates the son's endeavor. "When he was yet a long way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck and kissed him." Not a word of the confession intended has been uttered; not a question is put: "I said, I will confess my transgression to the Lord; and so Thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin." There is no reproof for the past, no stipulation as to the future, no condition in this free forgiveness. How it would spoil the revelation of the Father's heart which is to do the yet needed work in the soul of the returning prodigal, make the son a son, and deliver from all thought of that far country, save abhorrence of that which had carried him thither!

Now, in another spirit than that which dictated it, he can pour out his confession. "Make me a hired servant," he cannot say for shame. And the right acknowledgement of his unworthiness is cut short by the father's peremptory joy which bids, "Bring forth a robe,—the best,—and put it on him, and put a ring on his hand, and sandals on his feet." What he could not have pretended to as claim if he had never wandered is now his in the father's delight to have him back: Christ, the sinner's robe of wondrous righteousness, what can equal kill it, and let us eat and make [y]merry: for this my son was [z]dead and is alive again, was lost, and is found. And they [a]began to be merry.

Now his elder son was in the [b]field; and as he came and drew near to the house, he heard music and dancing. And he [c]called to him one of the servants, and inquired what these things might be. And he said unto him, Thy brother is come; and thy father hath killed the fatted calf, because he hath received him safe and well. But he was [d]angered, and would not go in; and his father came out and [e]entreated him. But he answered and said unto his father, Behold, so [f]many years I am serving thee, and have never transgressed thy commandment; and to me thou never gavest a [g]kid, that I might make merry with my [h]friends. But as soon as this thy son is come, who hath devoured thy living with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf. But he said to him, Child, thou art ever with [i]me; and all that is mine is thine. It was meet that we should make merry and rejoice: for this thy brother was [j]dead, and is alive again; and was lost and is found.

y vers.6,7,9. *cf.*Mt. 7.18.
*z cf.*Eph.2.1. *cf.*Jno.5.24, 25.
a cf. ver.14. cf. Eph. 3. 21. *cf.*Rev.22.5.
b cf. Matt. 20, 12. cf. ver. 7.
*c ctr.*ver.18. *cf.*Lk.10.40.
d ver. 2. cf. Acts 13. 45. *cf.*Matt.23. 13. *cf.*Jonah 4. 1, 4, 9–11.
e cf. ch.14.7. cf. Acts 3. 25, 26.
f cf. Ex. 12. 45. ctr. ch. 17. 10. ctr. Phil.3. 4–7.
*g cf.*ch.19.21. *cf.*Mal.1.13. cf. ch.7.41–43.
h cf. Jas. 4. 4; cf. Rom. 8. 7. i cf. Ps. 16. 5; cf. Rom. 1. 21. j ver. 24.

it in the apparel of the angels as they shine in heaven? Then the ring unites the working hand to God for ever; and the feet are shod for all the way, whatever it may be.

"And bring the fatted calf, and kill it, and let us eat and make merry: for this my son was dead and is alive again, and was lost, and is found."

Death is the food of this new life, for which in fact, that it might be, life had to be given. Such is the ransom price by which the prodigal has to be redeemed from the bondage of sin. And henceforth death is not merely conquered, but becomes the minister to a life in which the shadow of death is passed for ever. The fatted calf—or young ox, not immature but in the first fresh vigor,—the type of the laborer for God, is here the peace-offering, that aspect of the Lord's work which the Gospel of Luke expresses. The prodigal is welcomed into the joy of reconciliation and communion with God; but it is the Father's joy, let us still remember, which is all through prominent: "This my son was dead and is alive again, was lost and is found."

Every way in contrast with this picture, we have now that of the elder son; and it would be impossible, surely, for any one to mistake for whom it is intended. He has not wandered, is no prodigal, has no need of repentance, has never transgressed his father's commandment, is still in the field when his brother comes home; and then finding how he has been received, breaks out in indignation. Then another side of his character comes out: he himself brings it out. Music and dancing in his father's house: these are strange things to him. Joy over him there never had been such. He had had no privileges, not even a kid to make merry—not, mark, with his father, but with his friends. Could the cold, cheerless life of a formal religionist be more clearly expressed? He too is in heart away from his father, has no sympathy with the yearning of God's love over a sinner, cannot eat and make merry over the return of such, though his father comes out and entreats him, will not go in. What is the end of a breach like this? That the Lord leaves to be decided by each one in his audience for himself. But God keeps—can they expect otherwise?—to His own thoughts: "It was meet that we should make merry and rejoice: for this thy brother was dead and is alive again: he was lost and is found."

There is one thing here, however, which spite of all the rest has been supposed

4 (xvi. 1-13): The mercy as to earthly things permitted to the failed creature.

4. And he said also to his disciples, There was a certain rich man who had a *steward; and he was accused to him as *wasting his goods. And having called him, he said to him, What is this that I hear of thee? Give "account of thy stewardship; for thou canst be no longer steward. And the steward said within himself, What shall I do? for my lord taketh away from me the stewardship: "dig I cannot; to beg I am ashamed. I k cf. Matt. 25. 14, etc. cf. 1Cor.4.2. cf. 1 Pet. 4. 10.

l ch.15.13,30. cf. ver. 19. cf. Prov.18. 9 with ch. 19. 20.
m cf. Gen.3. 9-14.
cf. Eccl. 11. 9, 10; cf. 2 Cor. 5. 10, 11. n cf. Rom. 4. 4, 5; cf. Rom. 5. 6.

to give countenance to the view that the elder son is the true picture of the child of God, or at least the consistent one. It is, that the father says, "Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine." But to explain this we have only to go back to the beginning of the parable and to remember that the substance which the father had divided between them, and which the younger son had squandered in self-indulgence, could not be any figure of spiritual blessings, but, as already said, of earthly things. If, then, the prodigal had returned, that with all its spiritual gain did not reinstate him in the possession of what he had lost; it did not in itself restore the lost health, the forfeited possessions, the various good gifts of God which had passed away from him. On the other hand, the spiritual blessings which salvation brings do not become the possession of any by the careful or upright use of earthly things. And the witness of his own heart (in the case of the elder son) was that, spite of his own punctilious righteousness, the Father's house had made no music over him.

4. This leads on, however, to the next parable, in which, not the outside multitudes but disciples are taught how they may use even earthly things (even the mammon of unrighteousness) in such a way as that, when this fails, the "friends" they have made by it, may receive them into the eternal tabernacles. But here, notice, there is no parade of the righteousness of the one who acts after this manner. No, it is the very opposite: we have an unjust steward accused of wasting his master's goods, a thing which recalls to us the younger son of the parable before given, rather than the elder. And here is where we all begin naturally, although the Lord has something else to say of this before He closes.

But to begin with, all are stewards of God in the matter of those things with which we have been entrusted; and not one of us can stand before God on the ground of righteousness in our stewardship. Death—and this is brought out in fullest emphasis by the law of Moses—is the turning of man out of the place for which he was originally created, as having failed in it: and who is not turned out? Self-righteousness is thus impossible if we will listen to the teaching of nature itself, and above all of that law under which the Pharisee so securely sheltered himself. The "publican," or tax-gatherer, become a disciple, had owned his sinnership before God, while the Pharisee had refused to recognize it: and thus in the only way possible for man, the repenting sinner had become comparatively righteous.

The parable here is not however of the reception of a penitent, but of stewardship: of one under sentence of dismissal for unrighteousness, and of what he can still do in view of the future.

He does not hope for reversal of his sentence, but seeks how best he may subserve his interest when this has taken effect. If death be this dismissal, as it most evidently is, then in the application this refers to what comes after death; and so the Lord Himself applies it.

The steward is a child of this age, and his wisdom is that of his generation. It is not commended for its righteousness, but for its adaptation to the end in view; and in this respect the children of this age are wiser than the children of light. They pursue their end with more clearsighted consistency, while the children of light are often how strangely *in*consistent. The unrighteous steward is unrighteous to the last, and no plea to the contrary is ever made for him; but know what I will do, that when I am [o] put out of the stewardship, they may receive me into their houses. And he called each one of his lord's debtors, and said unto the first, How much owest thou unto my lord? And he said, A hundred baths* of oil. And he said to him, [p] Take thy writings, and sit down quickly, and write fifty. Then said he to another, And thou? how much owest thou? And he said, A hundred cors† of wheat. He saith unto him, Take thy writings; and write eighty. And the lord‡ commended the unjust steward, because he had done [q] prudently: for the sons of this age are for their own generation [r] more prudent than the sons of light. And I say unto you, [s] Make yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, that, when it fails, they may receive you into the eternal tabernacles. He that is faithful in the [t] least is o cf. Gen. 3. 24. cf. Rom. 3. 10-19 with Rom. 6. 23.

p cf. Tit. 2. 10. cf. Gen. 39. 4-6.

q cf. Ex. 1. 10. cf. Gen. 3. 1. cf. Prov. 30. 24-28.

r cf. ch. 12. 54-57. cf. Deut. 32. 29.

s cf. ch. 11. 41. cf. ch. 12. 33. cf. 1 Tim. 6. 17-19.

t ch. 19. 17. cf. 1 Tim. 3. 8-13.

*The bath is about seven gallons. †A cor is equal to eight bushels.
‡That is, the lord of the steward.

his wisdom as to the future is set before us for our imitation, the unrighteousness of it being distinctly reprobated and set aside in the words that follow the parable: "for, if ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches?"

His master's goods are still in the steward's hands; and these are all the means that he has, as his words plainly show. Yet his authority over them seems only now to extend so far as concerns the rendering that final account that has been required of him. He is no doubt under jealous oversight now, as to any further "waste," such as has been charged against him; but, of course, if he is to render an account, he has authority to call in the accounts. Here he can do no harm.

So he calls in his lord's debtors to see how every one stands, and remits to each a portion of his debt, a thing which Edersheim remarks, was within his rights, though his motive in it was unrighteous. In mercy, and in his master's interests even, he might have done so; he did it in his own.* But the wisdom with which he made capital out of what was not in his hands is clear enough. The moral for disciples is, "Make yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, that, when it fails, they may receive you into the eternal tabernacles."

Certainly it is not meant that we can buy ourselves thus admission into heaven, or that God's grace is shown in permitting us to buy cheap. He gives, but does not sell; unless it be "without money and without price." And even as to rewards, love can reward only what is done from love. Yet love itself may desire, and must, the approval of Him towards whom it is felt, and so may covet the rewards of love; while grace permits us out of what is not our own to make "friends" that shall in this way welcome us in the habitations of eternity.

Thus to use what is so commonly as to be characteristically the "mammon of unrighteousness" is not unrighteous, but faithfulness in that which is Another's; and although it be in "that which is least," as such earthly things must be, yet even as that it may test and manifest the character with regard to what is the "true riches." A man's piety cannot be measured by his charities; but on the other hand it cannot exist without them, for "faith without works is dead." And he who seeks to satisfy himself with that which is not his own, but of which he is merely steward, will find the things that are his own proportion-faithful also in much; and he that is unjust in the least is unjust also in much. If, then, ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true? And if ye have not been faithful in that which is [u]another's who shall give you that which is your own? No servant can serve [v]two masters: for either he will hate the one and love the other, or he will cleave to the one and despise the other: ye cannot serve God and mammon.

*Van Oosterzee concludes that it was his own overcharge that he remitted, and thus that he made his account right with his master, while he gained credit with the tenants. But this introduces much that is conjectural; and it does not seem that he had hope of setting his account right.

5 (xvi. 14-31): The recompense beyond.

5. And the Pharisees, who were [w]lovers of money, heard all these things, and they derided him. And he said unto them, Ye are they who justify yourselves before men; but God knoweth your hearts: for that which is exalted among men is an [x]abomination before God. The [y]law and the prophets [were] until John: from that time the evangel of the kingdom of God is preached, and every one forces [his way] into it. And it is [z]easier for heaven and earth to pass away, than for one tittle of the law to fail. Every one that [a]putteth away his wife and marrieth another committeth adultery; and he who marrieth one put away from a husband committeth adultery.

u cf. 1 Chro. 29.14-16. cf. Ezek.16. 16-21. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 4, 5.
v Matt.6.24. cf. Jas. 4.4. cf. 1 Jno.2. 15. cf. 2 Cor. 6. 14-16.
w cf. Matt. 23. 14. cf. Is.56.11. cf. Jer.6.13.
x cf. ch. 10. 29. cf. Matt.23. 27. cf. Prov.16. 5.
y cf. vers.29, 31. Matt.11.12, 13. cf. Jno.1.45. cf. ch.5.18-20.
z Matt.5.18. cf. Is. 40. 8. ch. 21. 33.
a Matt.5.31, 32. Matt.19.3-9.

ately unsatisfying. Even an Abraham, with his face toward Egypt, will find a famine in the land which God has promised and brought him into.

Thus the Lord deals with the side of righteousness; and He rules with a firm and steady hand. Grace does not relax the lines of government; and the throne of grace is a true and absolute throne. A servant may not be a son, but every son is a servant; and "no servant can serve two masters." God and Mammon are incompatible as that.

5. But that cuts deep; for the Pharisees are among His audience; and they, the zealous maintainers of law, are at the same time money-lovers. They deride Him therefore: for had not the law promised all temporal good to the man that kept it? From this it was easy for one that had never felt the hopelessness of man's condition upon that footing, to make the fruit of a man's own covetousness the token of his acceptance with God. They thus, as the Lord told them, justified themselves before men; but justification is not man's work, but God's: what human law allows one to judge his own case? when, alas, also, the world is in complete opposition to God, and what is esteemed most highly by it is with Him an abomination.

There was another thing. The dispensation of law was passing away. The law and the prophets were until John, and then the Kingdom of God was preached. Now every one was forcing his way into that, through the opposition of those like themselves who neither believed John, nor the One to whom he testified.

The passing of the dispensation did not mean that the law had failed. It could not fail: heaven and earth might pass rather than one tittle of it fail. It did not fail, when that to which it pointed came; nor when that was remedied which Moses for the hardness of their hearts had permitted, and the new dispensation perfected what the law was unable to enforce.

He gives them an example, which the former Gospels have insisted on more fully. Pharisaism had taken advantage of the permission of divorce to give sanction to a license against which the whole spirit of the law bore witness. Now all this was to be remedied. He that should put away his wife and marry another would now commit adultery; and he likewise who should marry a divorced woman. The exception given in Matthew with regard to this, and

There was a certain [b]rich man, and he was clothed in purple and fine linen, making merry in splendor every day; and a certain [c]poor man, Lazarus by name, was laid at his gate full of sores, and longing to be fed with the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table; and even the dogs came and licked his sores. Now it came to pass that the poor man died, and was carried by the angels into [d]Abraham's bosom; and the rich man also died, and was buried. And in hades lifting up his eyes, being in [e]torments, he seeth Abraham from afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. And he called and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue: for I am tormented in this flame. But

b cf. ch. 12. 16-21. cf. ch. 18. 24, 25 with ch. 6. 24.

c cf. Jas. 2. 5, 6. cf. ch. 6. 20. cf. Prov. 19. 1.

d cf. Matt. 8. 11.

e cf. Ps. 49. 14. cf. Prov. 5. 5, 22. cf. Phil. 1. 23.

which is found neither in Mark nor Luke, is not really an exception: for the divorce only affirms the breach of the law of marriage which sin had already made in the case excepted.

Thus the law had not failed, but was only perfected in the Kingdom of God.

The Lord goes back now to illustrate the fundamental mistake that they were making by the contrast of two men, perfect opposites of one another in life and after death, but in either case with the reversal after death of the condition in life.

He pictures a rich man, so rich as that if the Pharisaic idea were right, he should have been in fullest favor with God. He is clothed in purple and fine linen, and passes each day in uninterrupted enjoyment.

There is a poor man at his gate, so poor as to be in beggary and starvation. He longs for the crumbs (the broken pieces) from the rich man's table; and the dogs—unclean animals for the Jew—come and lick his sores.

No evil is recorded of the rich man further than this, that he enjoyed himself to the full. Even neglect of Lazarus is not urged against him. Perhaps Lazarus may have got the broken pieces. That he remained a beggar is true: but is it supposed that a rich man is to feed and care for every beggar at his door-step? Nor do we read of anything to the credit of this Lazarus. Providence seems to have decided against him, and the law to have condemned him: for where are the good things the law has promised to those that keep it?

The beggar dies, and there is a marvelous change. Without any means by which to make friends for himself to receive him into the everlasting tabernacles, he is carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom. A beggar, with everything against him as that, according to the law, gets a place that the best Jew in the world might envy him for. What has caused this? Not law, we may be sure. Not any need of making up for that pitiable life on earth by the after condition. The testimony of the law settles this fully, and would settle it as well for any child of man. Nay, his name, Lazarus, Eleazar, "the Mighty One the Helper" gives us the only key to the explanation here. Spite of all else against him, God the Mighty One, acting apart from law, and so in grace, has lifted him from that degradation in which he was to the place in which now we find him. He who has chosen Jerusalem, Jacob, Abraham, any other name in this line that you please to name, has chosen to do this—to display Himself in it: and who shall say Him nay?

The rich man also dies, and is buried. Again a marvelous, but now dreadful change! In hades—it is not hell, gehenna—he lifts up his eyes being in torment, and sees Abraham from afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. "And he called and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue: for I am tormented in this flame."

Abraham said, Child, [f]remember that thou in thy life-time receivedst thy good things, and Lazarus likewise evil things: but now he is comforted here, and thou art in anguish. And beside all this, between us and you a great [g]chasm is fixed, so that those who desire to pass from hence to you are not able; nor can those from thence cross over to us. But he said, I pray thee then, father, that thou wouldest send him to my father's house: for I have five brethren, so that he may testify to them, lest they also come into this place of torment. But Abraham saith, They have [h]Moses and the prophets: let them hear them. But he said, Nay, father Abraham, but if one go to them from the dead, they will repent. But he said to him, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, [i]neither will they be persuaded if one rise from the dead.

f cf. Lam.1. 7.
cf. Mk.9.46.
cf. Ps.73.7, 17-19.
g cf. Mal.3. 18.
cf. Prov.14. 32.
cf. Jno.3.36.
h cf. vh. 18. 20.
cf. Jno.5.39, 40.
cf. Is.8.19, 20.
i cf. 1 Sa.28. 15-20.
cf. John 11. 43-53.
cf. Matt.28. 11-15.
cf. Rom.10. 17.

The language is, of course, as figurative here as on the other side is Abraham's bosom. All representations of what is beyond the present life seem to partake of the same figurative character, which is, however, all the more adapted to appeal strongly to the imagination. The final judgment is not yet come; the once rich man has, as we presently see, brothers upon earth who may be warned to escape that place of torment. Resurrection, therefore, has not come any more than judgment, but the wrath of God is already realized in suffering which can be most suitably conveyed to us in terms like this. The hope of relief,—of such slight relief as is requested here, is presently declared to be in vain, an impassable gulf (or chasm) unalterably fixed between the lost and saved, no crossing or mingling to be, even for a moment; no hope of condition changing after death, such as many entertain to-day, for a moment to be thought.

But the reason for the rich man's coming into that awful doom is what is evidently intended to be pressed upon us. The Lord has already declared to his disciples that whosoever loseth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal; and that, if a man come to Him, and hate not his own life, he cannot be His disciple. This, it is plain, the rich man had not done. This only it is that is affirmed against him: "Child, remember, that thou in thy life-time receivedst thy good things"—not "good things" simply, but "thy good things." He had chosen life on the wrong side of death, and lost it.

This loss is not merely that: for God cannot be simply passive with regard to sin, and the tormenting flame is the wrath of God upon it. Death is not extinction; nor, therefore, is the second death. All that we find in this picture is the very opposite of this: it is intense realization. And if the pang of remorse is the soul's judgment of itself, (such judgment as the lost may be capable of,) the judgment of God is other than this, and more.

Oh, then, for a voice to warn men! So thinks the poor sinner here. Companionship is no alleviation of this hopeless anguish. "I pray thee then, father," he says, "that thou wouldst send him to my father's house: for I have five brethren; so that he may testify to them, lest they also come into this place of torment." Even this hope fails: "They have Moses and the prophets," Abraham answers; "let them hear them." But he urges further: "Nay, father Abraham; but if one go to them from the dead, they will repent." But he said to him, "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded if one rise from the dead."

No fear that Moses should not receive due honor from the lips of Christ. These Pharisees with their strenuous seeking of a sign from heaven: these are they that dishonor Moses. "Take up, and read," disdainful Pharisee, and thou shalt see how Moses accuses thee of unbelief of all the signs that he has given,

SECTION 4. (chaps. xvii., xviii. 8.)

The Ways which result from the Experimental Knowledge of this manifestation, and from the world's rejection of it.

1 (xvii.1-4): The certainty of offences and the imperativeness of constant grace.

1. AND he said unto his disciples, It is *impossible but that causes of stumbling will come; but woe unto him through whom they come! It were profitable for him if a millstone were hung about his neck, and he were cast into the sea, rather than that he should be a stumbling to one of these little ones. Take heed to yourselves: if thy brother sin against thee, reprove him; and if he *repent, forgive him. And if he sin against thee seven times in the day, and seven times turn unto thee, saying, I repent, thou shalt forgive him.

* Most MSS. omit "against thee."

j Matt. 18.6, 7. Mk. 9. 42. Rom.14.13, 20, 21. cf. 2 Pet. 2. 1-3.

k cf. Gal.6.1. cf. Eph. 5. 15. cf. Lev. 19. 16, 17. cf. Prov.17. 10.

l cf. Matt.18. 21-35. cf. 2 Thess. 3. 15, 16. cf. 1 Cor.13. 6, 7.

and which are fulfilled in Him that speaks to thee. Yet our hearts ache so often for something more, even with Scripture completed in our hands, and a greater than Moses speaking to us from it. Yet "all our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea, and were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea; and did all eat the same spiritual meat; and did all drink the same spiritual drink;" and out of all the host that did so, two men of those that came out of Egypt entered the land to which God was bringing them! So with the men that wanted a sign now, did they dream that when He whom they had devoted to death should come back from the dead, they would be found giving large money to the keepers of His tomb, to have it believed a lie that He was risen? So still, with their eyes tight shut, men cry for light.

Sec. 4.

1. God then has manifested Himself: no lost soul from its far off place of misery shall ever be able to challenge Him in this respect. He swears it even: "As I live, saith the Lord, I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth."

But while His word remains to testify for Him, how often, alas, are even His people found false witnesses! And among the ranks of professing disciples how many causes of stumbling arise! The Lord goes on now to speak of these in a way that shows His earnestness to have all stumbling-blocks removed from before the feet of the least of all. Whom men despise for their littleness, of these His tender compassion would have special care, and this He presses now upon His disciples.

Occasions of stumbling will indeed come: these are sad certainties in so sad a world; but that does not make them less grave, or easier to be passed over: nay, "woe unto those through whom they come." Better were it for one of these to have a mill-stone hung about his neck, and so to be cast head first into the sea, than to be a stumbling to one of these little ones.

But whence do occasions of stumbling most arise? To answer that, must we not ask, to what, then, above all are we witnesses? Failure here will surely be the gravest, as it will be that also of which men will most take note, and which the arch-plotter will seek most of all to get us into. Scripture, then, teaches us that we are to "show forth," even "in the ages to come the exceeding riches of God's grace." Grace characterizes the dispensation, as in contrast with law, the rule of the schoolmaster which preceded this (Gal. iii. 24, 25). What, then, can be so great a failure as to fail in grace? It is to this, then, that the Lord goes on with an emphatic "take heed to yourselves:" "If thy brother sin against thee, reprove him; and if he repent, forgive him." Some of the earliest MSS. omit "against thee," with several of the earliest versions; and yet it seems plain that it should be at least understood: for it is only a personal offence that we can individually forgive; and it is just these personal offences that we most betray inability to deal with aright.

2 (xvii. 5-10): Faith's increase in lowly service without thought of supererogation.

2. And the apostles said unto the Lord, [m]Increase* our faith. And the Lord said, If ye have faith as a [n]grain of mustard-seed, ye should say to this sycamine, Be thou plucked up by the root, and be thou planted in the sea, and it would obey you. But which of you, having a servant plowing or tending sheep, will say to him immediately upon his coming in from the field, [o]Come and sit down to table? and will not rather say to him, Make ready wherewith I shall sup, and gird thyself and serve me till I have eaten and drunk; and after that, thou shalt eat and drink? Doth he [p]thank that servant because he hath done that which was commanded? I judge not. So also ye, when ye shall have done all things that were commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants: we have done that which it was our [q]duty to do.

m cf. Mk. 9. 24. cf. 2 Pet. 1. 5-8. cf. 2 Thess. 1. 3.

n cf. Heb. 11. 11 with Gen. 18. 12-15.

o cf. ch. 12. 37. cf. Rev. 22. 3.

p cf. Job 35. 6, 7. cf. Is. 64. 6.

q cf. 1 Cor. 9. 16, 17. cf. Matt. 25. 37-40. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 9, 10.

3 (xvii. 11-19): The cleansed worshiper.

3. And it came to pass, as they journeyed to Jerusalem, that he passed through the midst of Samaria and Galilee. And as he entered into a certain village, there met him ten men that were [r]lepers, who stood afar off. And they lifted up the voice, saying, Jesus, Master, have mercy upon us. And when he saw them, he said unto them, Go, [s]show yourselves to the priests. And it came to pass, as they went their way, that they were cleansed. And one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back, with a loud voice glorifying God; and he [t]fell on his face at his feet, giving him thanks; and he was a Samaritan. And Jesus answered and

r ch. 5. 12-15.

s Lev. 13. 1, 2, etc.

t ch. 5. 8. Mk. 5. 33. Jno. 9. 35-38.

*Literally, "add faith to us."

Love is to act in the reproof; and this is cared for by the spirit of forgiveness enjoined; while the holiness of grace is seen in the condition of repentance. But if it were seven times a day he sinned, and seven times a day he turned, saying, I repent, he must be forgiven. This, of course, could not happen in a case of discipline in the assembly, where fitness for the table and the fellowship of the whole are involved, and where the authority of the Lord in the assembly is to be maintained. Individually we have no such authority over one another, and the service of love is the best constraint that can be used.

2. In view of the difficulties of the path which the certainty of such causes of stumbling would imply, the apostles—named as such, as those to represent the Lord in a special way as leaders of His people—ask Him to increase their faith. He replies that to faith, small as a grain of mustard-seed, the sycamine tree with its strong spreading roots would yield obediently, and plant itself in the sea. But they must be servants in all this, not masters, nor thinking to take their ease and satisfy themselves before their Master was fully served. Having done all, they were still to confess themselves those who had done no work of supererogation, but their duty only. And this is the way, in fact, in which increase of faith surely will be found. When we are doers of Christ's work, and not our own,—not valuing ourselves upon the doing it, but lowly in spirit—then will the needed faith for all the way be found: faith is for God's way and will: we cannot expect it for our own.

3. The story of the cleansed worshiper follows this. Ten lepers, standing afar off, beseech Him to have mercy. He bids them show themselves to the priests, and on their way they are cleansed. † One, and one alone, turns back to glorify God and give thanks for his healing; and he is a stranger, a Samaritan. It is said, Were there not ten cleansed? but [u] where are the nine? There hath not been any found that returned to give glory to God, except this [v] stranger. And he said unto him, Arise and [w] go thy way: thy faith hath healed* thee.

4 (xvii. 20-37): The world without Christ and its ways till His return.

4. And being asked by the Pharisees [x] when the kingdom of God would come, he answered them and said, The kingdom of God cometh not with observation; nor shall they say, Lo, here, or there: for behold, the kingdom of God is in the midst of you. And he said unto his disciples, [y] Days shall come when ye shall long to see one of the days of the Son of man, and shall not see it. And they shall say unto you, [z] Lo, there; Lo, here: go not after, nor follow: for as the lightning shineth, lightening from one part under heaven to another part under heaven, so shall the Son of man be in his day. But first, he must suffer many things, and be [a] rejected by this generation. And as it was in the [b] days of Noah, so shall it be in the days of the Son of man: they ate, they drank, they married, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and the flood came and destroyed them all. Likewise as it was in the [c] days of Lot: they ate, u cf. Rom. 1. 21. cf. ch. 15. 25, etc.

v cf. Matt. 8. 10-12. cf. Matt. 15. 24-28. cf. Heb. 13. 10-15.
w ch. 7. 50. ch. 8. 48.
x cf. ch. 10. 11. cf. ch. 19. 11. cf. ch. 21. 7. cf. Acts 1. 6, 7.
y cf. ch. 5. 35. cf. Jno. 12. 35. cfr. Jno. 16. 7.
z ch. 21. 8. cf. Matt. 24. 23-28.
a ch. 9. 22. ch. 18. 31-33. cf. Acts 7. 9, 27, 35.
b Gen. 7. 1-8. Matt. 24. 38, 39. 2 Pet. 2. 5. cf. 2 Pet. 3. 3-7.
c Gen. 19. 1, etc. 2 Pet. 2. 6-9.

* Or "saved."

evident he is not hampered by the law that carries the others away from Christ, although belonging to a like system. But Christ has by the deliverance realized become an object for his heart: he returns to Him a worshiper; the others remain in the dead ritualism centering in an empty temple, while he obtains open recognition of a faith in which God is glorified.

In fact these cleansed worshipers, worshiping neither at Samaria nor Jerusalem, and not in temples made with hands, but in the presence of God revealed in the Man Christ Jesus, are typical of the new dispensation coming in, indeed the heart of it. The mere human priests are gone: there is access through grace by faith,—a faith owned of God openly, all distance done away. Of course, it is not meant that the cleansed leper knew all this; but he foreshadowed it, Gentile as he was also, the nine Israelites having turned their back on Christ. It is to these, as one may say, that we now turn, to a people that have rejected Him, and that are now in the evils springing out of that rejection.

4. He is asked by the Pharisees, when the kingdom of God shall come. He tells them that it has in fact come, and without being perceived by them. It was there, presented to them in the Person of the King, in their midst.

But as rejected, He says no more to them of this; but turns to His disciples, to tell them of the days of His absence: not of Christian times, but carrying them on to when Israel's long night would be hastening to its close; days when there would be disciples longing to see one of the days of the Son of man, but not seeing it. Rumors there would be that He was here or there, but they were not to heed them. The Son of man would come, but manifestly to all, as when the lightning lightens the whole breadth of the heavens. But first He would have to suffer and be rejected.

Again He passes on to the time of the end, comparing it to the careless days before the flood, and the similar days before Sodom was destroyed. Judgment came sudden, sweeping, irresistible, and so it would be when the Son of man should be revealed. The warning to one upon the house-top not to come down into the house is given, as in Matthew (xxiv. 17), but not the events with which they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; but in the day that Lot went forth from Sodom, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. After the [d]same manner it shall be in the day in which the Son of man shall be revealed. In that day, he who shall be upon the [e]house-top and his goods in the house, let him not go down to take them away; and he likewise who is in the field, let him not return back. [f]Remember Lot's wife. Whosoever shall [g]seek to save his life* shall lose it, and whosoever shall lose it, [he] shall preserve it. I say unto you, In that night there shall be two [men] in one bed: the one shall be [h]taken, and the other left.†

Two women shall be grinding together, the one shall be taken, and the other left. And they answering say unto him, Where, Lord? And he said unto them, [i]Where the body is, there will the eagles be gathered together.

5 (xviii. 1-8): Vengeance for His elect.

5. And he spake a parable unto them to this end, that they should pray [j]always, and not faint, saying, There was a judge in a city, who feared not God and regarded not man. And there was a [k]widow in that city, and she came unto him, saying, [l]Avenge me of mine adversary. And he would not, for a time; but afterwards he said within himself, Though I fear not God, nor regard man, yet, because this widow troubleth me, I will avenge her, lest by her perpetual coming, she distract me. And the Lord said, Hear what the unjust judge saith. And shall not God avenge his [m]elect, who cry to him day and night, and he [n]beareth long as to them? I tell you that he will avenge them speedily. Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find [o]faith on the earth?

*Or "soul."

†A few MSS. and the Syriac insert here: "Two men shall be in the field: the one shall be taken, and the other left."

d cf. 1 Thess. 5. 2-10. cf. 2 Pet. 3. 10. cf. 2 Thess. 1. 8-10. cf. 2 Thess. 2. 8.
e Matt. 24. 17, 18. Mk. 13. 15. cf. ch. 18. 23.
f Gen. 19. 17, 26. cf. Heb. 10. 38, 39.
g Jno. 12. 25, 26. cf. Acts 5. 41. cf. Acts 20. 24.
h cf. Gen. 41. 13. cf. Jer. 45. 5. cf. Ezek. 9. 4-6. cf. Mal. 3. 16-18. cf. Zech. 13. 8, 9.
i cf. Gen. 40. 17-19. cf. Rev. 19. 17-21. Matt. 24. 28.
j cf. ch. 11. 5-9. cf. Gen. 18. 23-33. cf. Ps. 27. 13, 14.
k cf. ch. 5. 34, 35. cf. Lam. 1. 1-7, 12. cf. Rev. 18. 7.
l cf. Deut. 32. 35-43. cf. Ps. 94. 1-7, 22, 23.
m cf. Is. 34. 1-8. cf. Is. 63. 1-6. cf. Is. 65. 9, 15, 17-25. cf. Rom. 11. 28, 29.
n cf. Ps. 13. 1, 2; cf. Gen. 15. 16; cf. 2 Pet. 3. 9.
o cf. Ps. 57. 1; cf. Nah. 1. 7.

it is there connected. Only we see from the next admonition not to seek to save their lives that enemies are in question. The final judgment would be as discriminative as sudden: one man taken in bed, and his fellow left; one woman taken away by it at the mill, and another left. They ask, where? and He answers, wherever the carcase is, the eagles (or vultures) will assemble; wherever the corruption is, the judgment which is to purify the earth will find it out.

5. That judgment will be the complete settlement of the long reckoning for the persecuted saints who have been so long crying to God under it, and as yet without the full answer which will surely come. The Lord illustrates by the parable of the unjust judge the good of importunity with God, and presses on all under all circumstances that men should always pray and never faint. God's patience is not slowness nor indifference, as the event will show. Faith may count upon Him. In fact, when the Son of man comes, the darkness is such as to suggest the question, Will He find faith upon earth?

Sec. 5.

The last section here closes with the consideration of man's being with God,

SECTION 5. (Chap. xviii. 9-34.)
Man with God: the conditions and hindrances.

1 (xviii. 9-14): Self-righteousness and righteousness imputed.

1. AND he spake also this parable to some who trusted in themselves that they were [p] righteous, and despised the rest: Two men went up into the temple to pray, the one a Pharisee, the other a tax-gatherer. The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with [q] himself: God, I thank thee, that I am not as the [r] rest of men, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this tax-gatherer. I [s] fast p cf. ch. 15. 29. cf. Is. 65. 5. cf. ch. 19. 7.

q cf. Prov. 28. 9. cf. Prov. 15. 8, 29.
r cf. 2 Cor. 10. 12. cf. Rev. 3. 17. cf. ch. 13. 2, 3. ctr. 1 Tim. 1. 15. s cf. Is. 58. 3-7; cf. Zech. 7. 5, 6; ctr. Ex. 34. 28; ctr. Acts 13. 2.

the moral conditions and the hindrances. It reviews in this way some things we have had before, but to emphasize some points of special importance in this particular interest, which for man is surely second to no other.

1. The first point here is that of righteousness; in which, however, the righteousness in which we stand before God is rather suggested than developed. Indeed, so much is this the case that the actual reference to it is passed over commonly, both in translations and commentaries. Here it surely supplies what would otherwise be a serious deficiency, when the object is to depict the true righteousness in opposition to the false.

The Pharisee and the publican, or tax-gatherer, furnish here, as so often, the contrast which He would present. He is speaking directly to "some who trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others:" things which naturally go together. The two men in question are shown us going up into the temple to pray. The position that they take is taken before God, not man. As for the tax-gatherer, that is evident; no one would question it. But as for the Pharisee, though he compares himself with the other, yet he is not presented as seeking credit with men in any way: he is self-righteous, but not a hypocrite. That he prays, however, with himself, (or toward himself) shows how little in the presence of God he really is, even while he addresses himself to Him. His actual requests we do not hear; they are of no importance, even if we are to suppose he makes any. The whole of it that we hear is a thanksgiving for his own good condition; and here he forms a class by himself, in advance of those whom he vain-gloriously puts down as "the rest of men." They are "extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or like this publican,"—of whom the less he knows, the more he can imagine. But that is only the negative side: positively, it is enough to say, "I fast twice in the week; I tithe all that I acquire"—all my profit. In either case he went quite beyond the law.

There is not a hint that he was insincere in this self-admiration. He was indeed but too thoroughly a believer in himself; and his conduct may have been all that he here claims for it. Outwardly correct, morally; ceremonially, going beyond what was legally required: that was what he honestly thought to be enough for God; and indeed enough to give him that unique place quite beyond others, which, as we see, he claimed. The law, in which he trusted would have told him differently; but when did a law-keeper for righteousness ever take his measure from the law? Nay, that was meant for the destruction of legality, and the "Oh wretched man that I am!" which men learn to cry under it, is at least far different from jubilant Pharisaism.

The man's picture is complete, and no comment upon it is needed further. No one believes in him except himself, just as he himself believes fully in no one else. Moses has given sentence against them all that "there is none righteous, no, not one," and "we know that whatever the law saith, it saith to them that are under the law: that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world become guilty before God."

Now we turn to look at the other man. The Pharisee lifts up his head, because he sees nothing. The tax-gatherer is in a Presence that he dares not approach, nor lift up his eyes to. Smiting upon his breast, as if his heart were twice in the week; I [t]tithe all that I acquire. But the tax-gatherer, standing [u]afar off, would not so much as lift up his eyes to heaven, but [v]smote upon his breast, saying, God be [w]propitiated toward me, the [x]sinner. I say unto you, This man [y]went down to his house [z]justified, rather than the other. For [a]every one who exalteth himself shall be abased, but he that abaseth himself shall be exalted.

2 (xviii. 15-17.) The lowliness required.

2. And they [b]brought unto him also the babes, that he might touch them; but when the disciples saw it, they [c]rebuked them. But Jesus called them to him, saying,

[t] cf. Lev. 27. 30. cf. ch. 11. 42. cf. 1 Cor. 13. 3.
[u] cf. 2 Cor. 8. 5.
[v] cf. ch. 15. 13. cf. Is. 6. 5.
[w] cf. Ps. 51. 1-5. cf. Rev. 1. 14.
[x] cf. Ps. 25. 11. cf. Rom. 3. 23; cf. Heb. 9. 14.
[y] ch. 7. 38; ch. 15. 21; cf. 1 Tim. 1. 13.
[z] cf. 2 Sam. 12. 13; cf. Job 33. 27, 28; cf. Acts 16. 30-34.
[a] cf. Rom. 4. 4, 5; cf. Acts 13. 38, 39.
[b] Matt. 19. 13-15; Mk. 10. 13-16.
[c] Matt. 15. 23; cf. ver. 39; cf. 2 Ki. 4. 27; cf. ch. 9. 49, 50, 54. cf. ch. 14. 11; cf. 1 Sam. 2. 5-8.

viler than his life, he lays hold upon the horns of the altar with the cry, "God be propitiated towards me, the sinner."

That is certainly the full force of his words, and the prevalent objection to its being "pressed" is quite unaccountable. The common version gives "God be merciful" only; the revised puts "be propitiated" in the margin as an alternative, but keeps the other in the text. The "Variorum" Bible, with its clippings from every source, has not even a word with regard to it. Yet propitiation by sacrifice was, as must be acknowledged, one of the leading features of the temple ritual, that temple in which the speaker stood. Moreover it is the Lord, the One who could say of just this sacrificial system, "In the volume of the book it is written of Me" (Ps. xl. 7), who gives us this parable. And the direct purpose of it is to show what is true righteousness before God in contrast with the righteousness in oneself in which men have ever trusted. Yet, says Van Oosterzee, "It is entirely unnecessary to press the word hilaskesthai in such a way as to see intimated in it the dogmatic conception of atonement"!

On the contrary, here is the very way of mercy which a sinner needs appealed to by one who realizes himself to be in as unique a way "the" sinner, as the Pharisee is in his own thoughts uniquely righteous. For such an one no vague idea of God's mercy could satisfy the soul; least of all could the Lord allow it to be supposed that it could; and that where Jewish altars were proclaiming day by day, that "without shedding of blood is NO remission." How simple, how natural, to one taught of God, and in the representation of a divine Teacher, that a convicted soul should say, "Let that blood avail for me!"

"I tell you," says the Lord, "that this man went down to his house justified, rather than the other." Here again, a wrong use is made, surely, of the comparison between the two. It does not mean that the publican was justified more than the other, nor would such comparative justification be of much comfort to one in his condition. That which avails before God is the whole question; and as the Pharisee had decided as to himself, that he, rather than the tax-gatherer, would be found righteous before God, so the Lord decides that it will be the reverse of this, the tax-gatherer rather than the Pharisee. In each case this means, the one, and not the other. And it is to the one who in the most distinct way disclaims all righteousness, that righteousness is ascribed, or imputed; but not, surely, merely because he owns himself a sinner, but because there is provided for sinners that propitiation for sin to the value of which before God, even though feebly, his faith appeals.

Thus we see again, as we have seen elsewhere, how near to Paul's is the doctrine of Luke, although it brings us only to the threshold of it. Beyond this, still, there are things which cannot be opened to us until the Spirit of God is come from a glorified Christ in heaven, to reveal what neither eye has seen nor ear has heard.

2. The last verse in the previous part opens the way to the present one. The [d] Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God. Verily I say unto you, [e] Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall in no wise enter therein.

3 (xviii. 18-27): The hindrance of men's possessions.

3. And a certain [f] ruler asked him, saying, Good Teacher, what shall I do to inherit eternal life? But Jesus said unto him, Why callest thou me good? [g] None is good but one, [that is] God. Thou knowest the [h] commandments, Do not commit adultery; do not kill; do not steal; do not bear false witness; honor thy father and thy mother. And he said, [i] All these things have I kept from my youth. Now when Jesus heard it, he said unto him: Yet [j] one thing thou lackest: sell all that thou hast, and distribute to the poor, and thou shalt have [k] treasure in heaven; and come, [l] follow me. But when he heard these things, he was plunged in [m] sorrow, for he was very rich. And when Jesus saw * that he was plunged in sorrow, he said, How [n] hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God! for it is [o] easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. And they that heard it said, And who can be saved? But he said, The things that are [p] impossible to men are possible to God.

4 (xviii. 28-30): The mercy of God as to what is yielded up.

4. And Peter said, Lo, [q] we have left all,† and followed d cf. 2 Chro. 29. 13. cf. Acts 16. 31. cf. 1 Cor. 7. 14.

e Matt. 18. 3, 4. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 2. cf. Ps. 131.
f Matt. 19. 16-22. Mk. 10. 17-22.
g cf. Ps. 16. 2 with Phil. 2. 6, 7. cf. Heb. 7. 26. cf. Jno. 1. 1.
h ch. 10. 25-28. cf. Gal. 3. 10-13.
i ctr. Rom. 3. 19, 20. ctr. Rom. 7. 7, 14. cf. vers. 11, 12.
j cf. 1 Jno. 5. 12. cf. 1 Cor. 13. 3 with 1 Jno. 4. 19.
k cf. ch. 12. 33, 34. cf. Phil. 3. 7.
l ch. 9. 23, 24, 57-62. cf. Jno. 21. 19, 22.
m cf. 1 Cor. 11. 1. cf. Phil. 2. 5.
n ctr. Heb. 10. 34. ctr. Acts 5. 41; cf. ch. 17. 32.
o cf. Rom. 9. 32; ctr. ch. 17. 6.
p cf. Gen. 18. 14; cf. Eph. 2. 4-6.
q Matt. 19. 27-30; Mk. 10. 28-31; ch. 5. 11; cf. Acts 4. 34-37; cf. Phil. 3. 8.

* Or "And Jesus looking on him said." Many omit the clause "that he was very sorrowful."

† Some read "our own."

self-abased tax-gatherer has been exalted, the self-exalted Pharisee has been abased. And now they bring babes to Him that He may touch them, and the disciples (too much akin to the Pharisees in spirit) rebuke them for doing so. But Jesus declares that of such the Kingdom of God is, and that whoever would enter it must receive it in the spirit of a little child. Where God is known and rules, man must needs shrink into his native nothingness. Look at the earth from the sun, and what has become of its lofty peaks and granite ranges? The truly wise will own this from the heart: the pride of life, equally with the lusts of the flesh and of the eye, is not of the Father, but of the world.

3. The last portion has brought us fairly into the track of the previous Gospels, and to the end of this division we still pursue it. The story of the rich ruler shows us now the hindrance of worldly possessions, with one in other respects exemplary, and with an apparently earnest craving for eternal life. Yet he turns his back upon the Lord,—sorrowfully indeed, but none the less really; and the Lord's comment upon it generalizes so sad a case alarmingly. If it were as hard for a rich man to enter into the Kingdom of God as for a camel to go through a needle's eye, then who can be saved? ask the disciples. But salvation is of God; and all things are possible with Him. In fact, if a man has realized his need of salvation, God, it may be hoped, has begun that work in his soul which will make the far off country a place of intolerable famine to him, which lands or gold will be unable to satisfy. He can hardly be called "rich" who has that famine-fever upon him.

4. The question of Peter thereupon shows doubtless a modified form of the thee. And he said unto them, Verily I say unto you, There is no one who hath left house, or wife, or brethren, or parents, or children, for the sake of the kingdom of God, who shall not receive [r]manifold more in this time, and in the age to come [s]eternal life.

5 (xviii 31-34). The way and the end.

5. And he took unto him the twelve and said unto them, Behold [t]we go up to Jerusalem, and all things that have been written through the [u]prophets shall be accomplished to the Son of man. For he shall be [v]delivered up to the nations, and shall be mocked, and treated shamefully, and spit upon: and they will scourge [him] and put him to death; and on the [w]third day he shall rise again. And they [x]understood nothing of these things, and this saying was hidden from them, and they knew not what was said.

r cf. ch. 12. 31. cf. 1 Tim. 4. 8. cf. 1 Tim. 6. 6. cf. Eph. 3. 16, etc.
s Rom. 6. 23, t ch. 9. 44.
u cf. ch. 24. 25–27. cf. Is. 53.
v Matt. 27. 2. cf. Gen. 37. 28.
w 1 Cor. 15. 3, 4. cf. Hos. 6. 2. x Mk. 9. 30–32. cf. Matt. 16. 23 with 1 Cor. 2. 14.

rich man's trouble, so far as disciples may be affected by it. They had left all, —little or much as it might be,—to follow Him: what would they have for it? It is evident that what they have given up has still some value for them, then: and what will be their compensation for it is a matter of concern. The Lord's answer seems one of encouragement, which has with it also a certain blending of reproof. They shall have what the rich man might well crave—eternal life; but in the present also—and had they not begun to taste that blessing yet?—"manifold more" than all that they had given up. Such is God's mercy towards those who, whatever they may have deemed themselves to have renounced for Christ, were in fact but bankrupt beggars when His grace laid hold of them!

5. Once more, therefore, He puts before them what was the way that was opening now before Himself. Here indeed was sacrifice—such as yet they prove unable even to comprehend. The end for Him is in resurrection, in which the life of service taken up once more, His joy is accomplished in what for them and us secures all blessing and the glory of God.

Div. 3.

We enter now upon the last division of the book, in which the glorious work is set before us, in that Peace-offering aspect which, as we have seen, gives character to the whole of Luke. For the most part, the history here comes closely together in the three synoptic Gospels, yet with peculiar passages in the present one, such as the story of Zacchæus and of the penitent thief, which any one would recognize as such. In Luke also, as in Mark only besides, the Lord's ascension into heaven closes the book; a fact so much the more significant because with the ascension and what immediately precedes this, the same writer commences the Acts. The Father's house, which we have before seen opened to receive a prodigal, here receives the One whose work has justified this reception. "We joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the reconciliation."

Subd. 1.

The subdivisions are similar to those in Mark: the first giving the first coming of the King, with the fatal hindrances to restoration for Israel at that time, when for a moment it might seem to be at hand; going on, however, to His second coming when that restoration is accomplished. The general character of what is here resembles Mark rather than Matthew, as indeed we might expect; those parts also in which Mark cleaves to Matthew being often omitted by Luke. It is the King, however, necessarily, that is presented here in all the three.

1. [1] That which takes place at Jericho is more fully given by Luke than elsewhere. The story of the blind man, however, is almost precisely as in Mark, Luke showing its character in the closing ascription of glory to God, both on

DIVISION 3. (Chaps. xviii. 35–xxiv.)

Restoration, its hindrances and accomplishment; and the peace-offering work by which man is brought nigh.

SUBDIVISION 1. (Chaps. xviii. 35–xxi. 36.)

The King.

1 (xviii. 35–xix. 27): Premonitions

1 (xviii. 35–43): the gift of light

1. [1] AND it came to pass, as he [y] drew near to Jericho, a certain [z] blind man sat by the way-side, [a] begging. And hearing a multitude passing by, he inquired what this should be. And they told him that Jesus the Nazaræan was passing by. And he cried out saying, Jesus, [b] Son of David, have mercy on me. And those going before [c] rebuked him, that he should hold his peace; but he cried so much the more, Son of David, have mercy upon me. And Jesus stood and commanded him to be brought unto him; and when he was come near, he asked him, saying, [d] What wilt thou that I do unto thee? And he said, Lord, that I may receive my sight. And Jesus said unto him, Receive thy sight: thy [e] faith hath healed thee. And immediately he received his sight, and [f] followed him, glorifying God. And all the people, when they saw it, gave [g] praise unto God.

2 (xix. 1–10): salvation to a son of Abraham.

[2] And he entered and passed through Jericho. And behold, a man called by name Zacchæus, and he was chief [h] tax-gatherer, and he was [i] rich. And he sought to [j] see Jesus, who he was, and could not for the crowd: for he was little in stature. And running on before, he climbed into a sycamore to see him; for he was going to pass that way. And when he came to the place, Jesus looked up and said to him, Zacchæus, make haste and come down: for to-day I must [k] abide at thy house.

y Matt. 20. 29–34. Mk. 10. 46–52.
z cf. Jno. 9. 1–8, 39. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 3, 4.
a cf. Acts 3. 2. ctr. Jas. 2. 5.
b cf. Matt. 15. 22. cf. Matt. 21. 9.
c ver. 15. cf. ch. 19. 39 with ch. 11. 52.
d cf. 1 Ki. 3. 5. cf. Rev. 22. 17. ctr. Jno. 5. 40.
e ch. 7. 50. cf. Rom. 4. 20.
f cf. ch. 8. 2, 3. ctr. ch. 9. 57–59. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 14, 15.
g ch. 5. 26. cf. Phil. 1. 11.
h Matt. 9. 9, 10. ch. 18. 10–13.
i cf. ch. 18. 23. cf. Matt. 27. 57.
j cf. Jno. 12. 21. ctr. ch. 23. 8. cf. Heb. 2. 9.
k cf. Gen. 18. 2–5. ctr. Gen. 19. cf. Rev. 23. 20.

the part of the blind man, and the people who witness it. The beginning of God's work in a soul, as it was in nature, is the bringing in of light. Israel was now but the blind, led of the blind; and with the light in their midst, the "God of this world darkened the minds of those that believed not, lest the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them."

We have seen in the blind men here (for Matthew shows us two of them) a picture of that remnant in the last days who shall have their eyes opened to see and follow Jesus as their King. Crying after Him, the multitude in that day will indeed "rebuke them that they should hold their peace," but they will only cry the louder to Him, who, finding them in the city of the curse, will presently lead them up to the city of blessing, and of His rest for ever.

[2] The story of Zacchæus follows and is still connected with Jericho and the Lord's passing through it. The name means "pure" or "clean," as his words to the Lord show him to be. We are to take them surely, not as the profession of what he meant to do, but as the answer to the murmured charge against him, and which implicated Christ also, that He was gone to lodge with a man that was a sinner. "A sinner!" he would say, "behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor, and if I have taken anything from any one by false accusation,"—a thing which might be done without design—"I restore him fourfold." He is speaking of what he does habitually, not of what he has made a new resolve to do.

And he made haste, and came down, and received [l]him joyfully. And when they saw it, they all [m]murmured, saying, He is gone in to lodge with a man that is a sinner. And Zacchæus stood and said unto the Lord, Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I [n]give to the poor; and if I have taken anything from any one by false accusation, I [o]restore him fourfold. And Jesus said unto him, To-day is [p]salvation come unto this house: forasmuch as he also is a [q]son of Abraham. For the Son of man is come to [r]seek and to save that which was lost.

[*] (xix. 11–27): the Kingdom appearing at His return, and manifestation then.

[3] And as they heard these things, he added and spake a parable because he was near to Jerusalem, and because they thought that the [s]kingdom of God was to be manifested forthwith. He said therefore, A [t]certain high-born man went into a far country to [u]receive for himself a kingdom, and to return. And calling his own ten servants, he [v]gave to them [w]ten pounds,* and said unto them, Trade, until I come. But his citizens [x]hated him, and sent an embassy after him, saying, We will not that this man reign over us. And it came to pass, when he was [z]returned, having received the kingdom, that he desired those servants to be called to him, to whom he had given the money, that he might know what they had [y]gained by trading. Then came the *Greek, "mina." An Attic mina was equal to about $14. A Hebrew mina to about $83.

l cf. ch. 5.29. cf. ch.10.38. cf. Jno.1.11, 12.
m cf. ch.7.34, 39. cf. ch. 15. 2.
n cf. ch. 11. 41. cfr. ch.18.9, 12, 22, 23.
o cf. ch.3.14. cf. Ex.22.1-4. cf. Lev. 6. 1-6.
p cf. ch. 18. 14. cf. 2 Cor. 7. 10. cf. Acts 11. 14, 15.
q ch. 13. 16. cf. Rom. 4. 11. cf. Gal. 3.7, 14, 29.
r Matt.9.12, 13. Matt.18.11. cf. 1 Tim.1. 13-16.
s cf. ch.17.20. cf. Acts 1.6, 7.
t cf. Matt.25. 14-30. cf. Mk. 13. 34-37. cf. ch. 20. 9, etc. cf. Acts 1.9.
u cf. ch. 20.42, 43; cf. 1 Cor. 15. 25; cf. Rev. 1. 9 with Rev. 11. 15. v cf. ch. 16. 1, etc.; cf. Rom. 12. 6-8; cf. 1 Pet. 4. 10, 11. w cf. Gen. 37. 8; cf. Jno. 19. 14, 15; cf. Acts 17. 5-7; cf. Is. 49. 7.
x cf. Matt. 25. 31, etc.; cf. Rev. 22. 12. y cf. 1 Tim. 4. 13-16; cf. 2 Tim.1. 6; cf. 2 Pet. 1. 5-8.

And yet Zacchæus is no mere Pharisee under his publican's garb. There may well be the Pharisee in him, for it is in our fallen nature; and the Lord's words, gentle and gracious as they are, are well adapted to meet such a condition; even while to one characterized by it He could not have used them. For "a son of Abraham" meant with Him assuredly a child of faith (comp. John viii. 39); and that day had salvation come to that house, with the Object of faith received within it. Thus, not from that "cleanness" of life that he could claim came salvation to him, nor even the assurance of it, but from Him whom he had sought, who had been seeking Him first: "for the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." Such, then, was Zacchæus.

[3] The parable that follows is plainly stated to be supplemental to the Lord's words just spoken, and in correction of the thought that the Kingdom of God was going to be manifested immediately. Nay, He was as a man going into a far country, to receive for himself a kingdom and to return to take possession of it. Time would be given in this way for His servants to prove their faithfulness to Him; and while salvation was by faith, and for the lost, such faithfulness would be recognized and rewarded when the Kingdom would be set up. His ten servants have (like the ten virgins) the number of responsibility, and are not necessarily servants in heart, as we see directly. His citizens moreover are in open rebellion against him, and send after him a positive refusal of subjection to him.

All this, of which then His disciples needed to be warned, is, of course, for us as plain as possible in application. The emphasis, however, is laid upon the different result in the case of those who are all intrusted with the same amount, to trade with on his behalf. Here the parable of the pounds differs from that first, saying, Lord, [z]thy pound hath gained ten pounds. And he said, [a]Well done, good servant: because thou hast been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten [b]cities. And the second came, saying, Lord, thy pound hath gained five pounds. And he said also unto him, Be thou also over five cities. And another came, saying, Lord, behold, thy pound, which I have kept [c]laid up in a napkin: for I feared thee, because thou art a [d]hard man: thou takest up what thou laidst not down, and reapest what thou didst not sow. He saith unto him, [e]Out of thy mouth will I judge thee, wicked servant: thou knewest that I am a hard man, taking up what I laid not down, and reaping what I have not sown; and why didst thou not give my money into the [f]bank, that at my coming I might have collected it with interest? And he said to those that stood by, Take from him the pound, and give it to him that hath ten pounds. (And they said unto him, Lord, he hath ten pounds.) For I say unto you that to [g]every one that hath shall be given; but from him that hath not, even what he hath shall be taken away. But those mine [h]enemies, who would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me.

2 (xix. 28–48): The announcement.

1 (xix. 28–40): peace with the King of peace.

2. [1] And when he had said these things, he [i]went on before, ascending up to Jerusalem. And it came to pass, when he drew nigh to Bethphage and Bethany, at the mount that is called [the mount] of Olives, he [j]sent two of the disciples, saying, Go your way into the village over against [you], in which at your entering ye shall find a colt tied, whereon no man ever yet sat:

z cf. Eph. 4. 8-13. cf. 1 Cor. 4. 7.
a cf. 1 Pet. 5. 1-4. cf. 2 Tim. 4. 7, 8.
b cf. Matt. 19. 28. cf. ch. 22. 28-30.
c cf. Prov. 18. 9. cf. 1 Cor. 9. 16, 17, 27.
d cf. Ex. 20. 18, 19. cf. ch. 15. 29. ctr. 1 Jno. 5. 3. cf. Ex. 1. 14.
e cf. 2 Sam. 1. 16. cf. Matt. 22. 11-13. cf. Rom. 3. 19.
f cf. Rom. 2. 7. cf. Prov. 30. 24, 25. ctr. ch. 12. 16-21.
g Matt. 13. 12. cf. Jno. 15. 2. cf. 1 Sa. 15. 28. cf. Rev. 2. 5.
h ver. 14. cf. Matt. 22. 7. cf. 2 Thess. 1. 8, 9.
i Matt. 20. 17; Mk. 10. 32.
j Matt. 21. 1-11; Mk. 11. 1-10.

of the talents in Matthew, which comes after it and is a development of it. "Matthew presents the sovereignty and wisdom of the giver, who varies his gifts according to the aptitude of his servants; in Luke it is more particularly the responsibility of the servants, who each receive the same sum, and the one gains by it, in his master's interest, more than the other. Accordingly it is not said, as in Matthew, 'Enter into the joy of your Lord,' the same thing to all, and the more excellent thing; but to the one it is authority over ten cities that is given; to the other over five: that is to say, a share in the kingdom according to their labor. The servant does not lose that which he has gained, although it was for his master. He enjoys it. Not so with the servant who made no use of his pound; that which had been committed to him is given to the one who had gained ten. That which we gain spiritually here, in spiritual intelligence and the knowledge of God in power, is not lost in the other world. On the contrary we receive more, and the glory of the inheritance is given us in proportion to our work. But all is grace" (Synopsis).

It is the apprehension of grace also that enables for work, as we see by the opposite of this in the unfruitful servant, who is indeed to be judged out of his own mouth. His words, however, are but an excuse for slothfulness. "Instead of laboring in the sweat of his brow for the interests of his lord, he had hidden the entrusted money in the now entirely superfluous soudarion: literally 'sweat-cloth'" (Van Oosterzee.)

Upon the enemies of the King judgment comes to the uttermost.

2. [1] With these forewarnings of the character of His Kingdom, and of how loose and bring it. And if any one ask you, Why do ye loose it? thus shall ye say to him, Because the [k] Lord hath need of it. And they that were sent went their way, and found as he had said to them. And as they were loosing the colt, its owners said unto them, Why loose ye the colt? And they said, Because the Lord hath need of it. And they brought it to Jesus; and they cast their own garments on the colt, and set Jesus thereon. And as he went, they [l] spread their garments in the way.

And as he drew nigh, [being] already at the descent of the Mount of Olives, all the multitude of the disciples began joyfully to [m] praise God with a loud voice for all the works of power which they had seen: saying, Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord; [n] peace in heaven and glory in the highest. And some of the Pharisees from among the multitude said unto him, Teacher, [o] rebuke thy disciples. And he answered and said, I say unto you that, if these hold their peace, the [p] stones will cry out.

[3] (xix. 41-44). the alternative, humiliation from the hand of the enemy.

[2] And as he drew nigh, he saw the city, and [q] wept over it, saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things that are for thy peace! but now they are [r] hid from thine eyes. For days shall k cf. Ps. 50. 10-12.

cf. Ps. 8. 6-8.
cf. Ex. 34. 20 with ch. 1. 68.
l cf. 2 Ki. 9. 13.
cf. Zech. 9. 9.
cf. Jno. 12. 3.
cf. Jno. 19. 38-40.
m cf. Jno. 12. 12-19.
cf. Matt. 23. 38, 39.
n cf. ch. 2. 14.
cf. Rev. 12. 7-12.
o cf. ch. 18. 15.
cf. Matt. 23. 13.
cf. Matt. 27. 18.
p cf. Heb. 2. 11-14.
cf. 2 Chron. 7. 20-22.
q cf. ch. 10. 34, 35.
cf. Jer. 9. 1.
cf. Jno. 11. 35.
r cf. Is. 6. 9-13.
cf. Rom. 11. 7, 25.
cf. 2 Cor. 3. 13-16.

His claim to it would be treated at this time, Jesus ascends to Jerusalem, by the way of the "house of unripe figs" (Bethphage) and of the "house of humiliation" or "of sorrow" (Bethany). Then, as in the previous Gospels, He fulfils—or presents Himself for the fulfilment of Zechariah's prophecy, riding into the city on an ass's colt. But it is noticeable how much higher is the character, beyond the former Gospels, in which He is presented here. As Son of David He is not even spoken of, but as the King that cometh in the name of the Lord —Jehovah; and with "peace in heaven, and glory in the highest."

This is a strain, indeed, beyond the intelligence of the disciples; as all here is manifestly under the control of God, and pointing onward to a future time. The King that comes in Jehovah's Name brings not only peace on earth, but peace in heaven. We have heard the Lord announce already the casting down of Satan out of it (see chap. x. 18), and have seen to what period this refers. It is but, however, the effect of the Cross, as that which has overcome principalities and powers, and led captivity captive. Back of man's sin, the Cross reaches to the incoming of sin at the beginning, glorifying God about it all. We little realize the need of this, where it is no longer a question of the salvation of sinners, but of the purification of heavenly things (Heb. ix. 23), the reconciliation of things in the heavens (Col. i. 20). Scripture speaks plainly of it, however, both in type and open speech of the New Testament. Nor will God deal with sin even in definitive judgment until He has glorified Himself in view of it. "Hallowed be Thy Name; Thy Kingdom come:" such is the divine order. That "hallowed be Thy Name" is in effect "peace in heaven," as "glory in the highest."

The Pharisees dare to appeal to the Lord Himself to deny Himself, and rebuke the disciples. He tells them that, if they held their peace, the very stones would cry out. As a result of His rejection this has indeed taken place, and the stones of the plowed up city bear witness for Him to-day.

[3] This was the alternative, which His lament over the city brings fully out: it was the Saviour or the destroyer, Christ or the dreaded and hated Roman.

come upon thee, when thine enemies shall cast up a palisade* around thee and shall [s]compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side; and they shall [t]level thee to the ground, and thy children within thee, and shall not leave in thee a stone upon a stone: because thou [u]knewest not the time of thy visitation.

3 (xix. 45–48): the temple cleansed.

45 And he entered into the temple, and began to [v]cast out those that sold,† saying unto them, It is [w]written, My house shall be a house of prayer: but ye have made it a [x]robbers' den. And he was teaching daily in the temple. But the chief priests and the scribes [y]sought to destroy him; the chief also of the people: and they could not find what they might do; for all the [z]people hung upon him, listening.

3 (xx. 1–18): The vineyard and the Heir.

1 (1–8): the question of authority.

20 1 And it came to pass on one of the days, as he was teaching the people in the temple, and evangelizing, the chief priests and the scribes came upon him, with the elders, and spake unto him, saying, Tell us by what [a]authority thou doest these things, or who it is that gave thee this authority? And he answered and said unto them, I also will ask you a question,‡ and tell me: The [b]baptism of John, was it from heaven or of men? And they reasoned with themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven, he will say, Why did ye not believe him? But if we say, Of men, all the [c]people will stone us: for they are persuaded that John was a prophet. And they answered that they [d]knew not whence [it was.] And Jesus said unto them, Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things.

s ch. 21. 20–24. cf. Deut. 28. 49–57.
t cf. Is. 29. 1–4. cf. Mi. 3. 12.
u ver. 42. cf. Jno. 12. 35, 36.
v Matt. 21. 12, 13. Mk. 11. 11, 15–17. cf. Jno. 2. 14–17.
w Is. 56. 7. cf. Is. 2. 3.
x Jer. 7. 11. cf. Mal. 3. 3 with Hos. 12. 7.
y Mk. 11. 18. Matt. 21. 45, 46.
z Mk. 12. 37. cf. Jno. 7. 40, 46.
a Matt. 21. 23–27. Mk. 11. 27–33. cf. Ex. 2. 14. cf. Jno. 2. 18.
b cf. Jno. 1. 23. cf. ch. 7. 28–35.
c cf. Matt. 14. 5. ver. 19. ch. 22. 6. d cf. Jno. 1. 19–28. cf. ch. 7. 33. cf. Is. 6. 9, 10. cf. Jno. 9. 29.

*Or "mound." †A few add, "and bought." ‡Greek, "word."

In fact, they had already made their choice, and could only be left to it. But the Judge weeps as He gives sentence. If Jerusalem had known, though but at the last moment, the things belonging to her peace! but now they were hidden from her. She and her children within her would be destroyed—not a stone left upon a stone—because she knew not the time of her visitation.

45 But this that He foresaw does not hinder the completion of His testimony among them. He purges the temple: for Him, until He leaves it desolate, His Father's house, and the place of Jehovah's throne on earth, though now long vacant. It was the symbol of His life-long thought, the zeal which was to be as the flame of sacrifice consuming Himself, as the psalmist had long since expressed it (Ps. lxix. 9). Luke mentions, however, the casting out of the traffickers very briefly, dwelling more upon His teaching in the house that He had purged, and how the people hung upon His words. What seed was sown, to spring up at an after-time, we cannot tell; but we know that He was emphatically the Sower, and that upon all seed sown the sign of the cross must pass, that it may be fruitful (John xii. 24).

20 1 The conflict with the leaders is now upon Him. They begin it with the challenge of His authority, which He answers by one on His side to settle that of John: as to which, to their confusion, but even then insincerely, they have to own incompetence. He refuses then to show them His: for of what use would it be with those who had just acknowledged themselves to be no proper judges? and when the things about which they asked Him bore the authority for doing them upon their face?

2 (9-19): the rejection of the messengers.

9 [2] And he began to speak unto the people this parable: A man [e]planted a vineyard, and let it out to [f]husbandmen, and left the country for a [g]long time. And at the [h]season he sent a servant to the husbandmen, that they should give him of the fruit of the vineyard; but the husbandmen [i]beat him and sent him away empty. And he sent again another servant; and they beat him also, and treated him shamefully and sent him away empty. And he sent yet a third; and him also they wounded, and cast him out. And the lord of the vineyard said, What shall I do? I will send my [j]beloved son; it may be they will have regard to him. But when the husbandmen saw him, they reasoned with one another, saying, [k]This is the heir: let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours. And they cast him forth out of the vineyard, and killed him. What therefore will the lord of the vineyard do unto them? He will come and [l]destroy these husbandmen, and give the vineyard unto [m]others. And when they heard it, they said, May it not be. But he looking upon them said, What is this, then, that is written? The [n]stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner. Every one who falleth on that stone shall be [o]broken; but on whomsoever it shall [p]fall, it will grind him to powder.* And the chief priests and the scribes [q]sought to lay hands on him in that very hour: and they feared the people; for they perceived that he had spoken this parable against them.

4 (xx. 20-xxi. 4): Testing and tested.

1 (20-26): The claims of Cæsar and of God.

20 4 [1] And they [r]watched him, and sent out men suborned, feigning themselves to be just men, that they might take hold of some word of his, so that they might deliver him up to the power and authority of the governor. And they asked him, saying, Teacher, we [s]know that thou sayest and teachest rightly, and acceptest not the person, but teachest truly the way of God. Is it lawful for us to give tribute unto [t]Cæsar, or not? But he perceived their craftiness, and said unto them, Why tempt ye me?† Show me a penny:‡ whose

*Or, "Scatter as chaff." †Some omit this clause.
‡Denarius, as in Matt. xviii. 28.

cf. 2 Sam. 14. 2, etc. s cf. Jno. 3. 2; Matt. 22. 15-22; Mk. 12. 13-17; cf. Ps. 12. 2. 13, 19-22; cf. Ezr. 9. 7; cf. Neh. 9. 37 with Deut. 28. 33,51.

e Matt. 21. 33-46. Mk. 12. 1-12. cf. Is.5.1-7.
f cf. Deut.1. 15-17. *cf.*Matt.23. 2.
*g cf.*ch.19.12. cf. Acts 13. 19-22.
h cf. Jer.25. 3-7. cf. Jer. 35. 15.
*i cf.*Matt.23. 29-36. cf. Acts 7. 51, 52. cf. Neh. 9. 26.
j cf. Gen.37. 13, 14. cf. Gal.4.4. *cf.*Heb.1.2.
k cf. Ps.2.1-3. cf. Matt. 2. 1-18. cf. Jno. 11. 47-50. cf. Gen. 37. 18-20.
*l cf.*ch.19.27. cf. Ps.2.8,9. cf Acts 13. 40, 41. *cf.*1 Thess. 2. 15, 16.
m cf. Acts 13. 46. cf. Neh. 9. 36, 37. cf. Is. 6. 13.
n Ps. 118.22. Acts 4. 11. 1 Pet.2.4,7, 8.
*o cf.*Is. 8.14, 15. *cf.*Is. 28.16. cf. Rom. 9. 32, 33.
*p cf.*2Thess. 1. 6-10. cf. Dan. 2. 34, 35. *cf.*ch.17.37.
q ch. 19. 47, 48.
*r cf.*Is.29.20, 21. cf. Jer. 20. 10.
t cf. Ezr. 4.

[2] The parable of the two sons is here omitted, as in Mark; and Luke goes on to that of the Vineyard and its Heir, and the rejection of the messengers crowned by the murder of the last, the only son of the owner. He searches out their hearts, foretells their triumph and the ruin it would bring upon themselves, shows them from their own scriptures, that the Stone to be made by God the Head of the corner was first of all to be rejected by the builders themselves. Here they could not help recognizing that He spoke of them, while their blind passion urged them on to the fulfilment of His words.

4. [1] They go on testing Him, as in the previous Gospels. First, by the question of tribute to Cæsar, in which His answer goes to the root of the matter, and shows the way of deliverance also, if only they would take it. They had bor-

"image and superscription hath it? They answered and said, Cæsar's. And he said unto them, Then [v]render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's. And they were not able to lay hold of the saying before the people; and [w]wondering at his answer, they held their peace.

2 (27-40): Relationships hereafter and the Scripture testimony as to death.

[2] And certain of the Sadducees, who say that there is no [x]resurrection, came unto him and asked him, saying, Teacher, Moses [y]wrote unto us that, if a man's brother die, having a wife, and he be childless, his brother should take the wife and raise up seed unto his brother. There [z]were, then, seven brethren: and the first took a wife, and died childless. And the second [took her, and he died childless];* and the third took her; and in like manner also the seven left no children and died; and last of all, the woman died. In the resurrection, therefore, whose wife shall she be of them? for the seven had her to wife. And Jesus said unto them, The sons of [a]this age marry and are given in marriage; but they that are accounted worthy to have part in that age, and the resurrection [b]from among the dead neither marry nor are given in marriage; for neither can they [c]die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are [d]sons of God, being sons of the resurrection. But that the dead rise, even Moses showed at the bush, when he [e]calleth [the] Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. Now he is not God of [f]dead men, but of living ones: for to him all live. And certain of the scribes answered and said, Teacher, [g]thou hast spoken well. For they [h]dared not any more to ask him anything.

u cf. Ezr. 1. 1, etc. cf. ch. 2. 1. cf. ch. 3. 1. cf. Jno. 19. 12.
v cf. Rom. 13. 1, 6, 7. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 13, 14, 17. cf. Acts 4. 19, 20. cf. Acts 5. 29.
w ch. 13. 17. cf. ch. 21. 15.
x Matt. 22. 23-33. Mk. 12. 18-27. cf. Acts 4. 1, 2. cf. Acts 5. 17.
y Deut. 25. 5. cf. Gen. 38. 8, etc. cf. Ruth 4. 5.
z cf. ch. 18. 1-8. cf. Tim. 1. 4.
a cf. ch. 17. 27. cf. 1 Cor. 7. 29. cf. Rev. 19. 7.
b cf. Phil. 3. 11. cf. 1 Thess. 4. 16. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 42-44.
c cf. Rom. 6. 9. cf. Rev. 20. 6. cf. Rom. 6. 5.
d cf. Rom. 8. 17-23. cf. 1 Jno. 3. 2.

* Many omit the words in brackets.

e Ex. 3. 6; cf. Gen. 17. 7; cf. ch. 16. 22. f cf. Eph. 2. 1, 12; cf. Heb. 11. 13-16. g cf. Acts 23. 9. h ver. 26; cf. Prov. 26. 4, 5.

rowed Cæsar's money; let them pay it him back: a just debt could not be met by rebellion and repudiation. On the other hand, there was a way out: let them render to God His due, and He would come in for them. Thus the whole question is settled in a few simple words, and so that they cannot even say a word against it.

[2] The Sadducees take the place of the beaten Pharisees, and raise their question of relationship in the resurrection state, illustrating their difficulty by the case of a woman who had married seven brethren. The Lord answers, that marriage belongs to this world or age, while in the age to come and the resurrection from the dead those counted worthy to obtain these will be as the angels in this respect. The Lord's words announce a resurrection from among the dead comprising the sons of God alone: they are necessarily sons of God if they are sons of the resurrection; the one involves the other. The obtaining the "age to come" (the millennium) goes with this; which is exactly what is said in Rev. xx. 5, that the rest of the dead—the wicked—do not rise again till the thousand years are finished. Among the ranks of these blessed ones there is no death either: and so no need of marriage to fill up the gaps caused by death. He adds that even the dead are yet alive to God; and so destroys the materialis-

[3] (41-44): the glory of Christ manifested.

[4] (45-47): the ways of the scribes.

[5] (xxi.1-4): results with God.

[3] And [g]he said unto them, How say they that the Christ is David's son? and David himself [h]saith in the book of Psalms, [The] Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies the footstool of thy feet. David therefore calleth him Lord, and [k]how is he his son?

[4] Then in the hearing of all the people, he said unto his disciples, [l]Beware of the scribes, who like to walk in long robes, and who love salutations in the market-places, and [m]chief seats in the synagogues, and chief places at feasts; who [n]devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayers: these shall receive [o]more abounding judgment.

[5] And he looked up and saw the [p]rich casting their gifts into the treasury, and he saw also a certain poor [q]widow casting therein two mites. And he said, Of a truth I say unto you, that this poor widow hath cast in more than all. For all these have of their abundance cast in unto the gifts [of God],* but she out of her want hath cast in [r]all the living that she had.

* Some omit.

cf. ch. 12. 16-21; cf. ch. 16. 19-31; cf. ch. 18. 23-27; cf. ch. 19. 2-10. q cf. ch. 18. 3; cf. 2 Cor. 6. 10; cf. Is. 54. 6. r cfr. ch. 18. 12; cf. 2 Cor. 5. 14, 15; cf. 2 Cor. 8. 1-5.

[g] Matt 22.42-46. Mk. 12. 35-37. cf. ver. 3.
[h] Ps. 110. 1. Acts 2. 34. 1 Cor. 15. 25. Heb. 1. 13.
[k] cf. Acts 13. 22, 23. cf. Rom. 1. 3, 4. cf. Rom. 9. 5. cf. Rev. 22. 16.
[l] Matt. 23. 1, etc. ch. 12. 1.
[m] ch. 14. 7. ch. 11. 43.
[n] Matt. 23. 14. cf. Jer. 7. 6-10. cf. Am. 8. 4-6.
[o] ch. 10. 12-14. cf. ch 12. 47, 48.
[p] Mk. 12. 41-44. cf. ch. 6. 24.

tic idea of death held by the Sadducees, the basis of their denial of resurrection. And finally, He proves this last out of the Scriptures they acknowledged—the books of Moses. They acknowledged, but did not know them.

[3] They are silenced,—Pharisees, Herodians, Sadducees, all the leaders of the unhappy people,—and He turns upon them with a question which reaches the bottom of the whole controversy, the question of His Person, of the true glory of Christ. Was He merely David's Son? Why then did David, speaking by the Spirit, call Him "Lord," saying, "The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand until I make thine enemies the footstool of thy feet"? How could He be his Son and yet his Lord? Clearly no answer could be made which did not admit His higher nature.

[4] Then He denounces the scribes as those whose ways made known too certainly what they were. Self-importance, rapacity, hypocrisy, marked them. More abundant judgment would be their lot at last. Let us observe that He first meets and refutes their doctrines before He brings their ways into question. Scripture alone could settle as to the truth; and His appeal is there to the Word and nothing else. Truth might have evil professors of it, without annulling its right as truth; but now it was in place to show how sadly their errors were mated with their characters. The common conscience of men was sufficient to condemn them.

[5] But He does not close with this, for judgment is work in which He has no delight. If He be wearied with the evil, He refreshes Himself with the good, and among the rich who are casting much into the treasure, His eye discerns a single poor widow who casts in a contribution hardly to be reckoned amid their costly gifts. But He reckons differently from men at large, and not so much by what is put in as by what is kept back. She has kept nothing back. For Him this poor widow has cast in more than all. For these have given out of their abundance, leaving much still behind; but she has cast in all the living that she had.

Such sights, then, were still to be seen in Israel. Alas, they were few, as the very terms of the commendation show. For all the gifts of the rich were not equal to these "two mites, which make a farthing."

5 (xxi. 5–36): Judgment.
I (5–24): the first, and impending judgment.

5. [1] And as some spake of the [s]temple, how it was adorned with goodly stones and offerings, he said, As for these things that ye behold, the days shall come in which there shall not be left here a [t]stone upon a stone which shall not be thrown down. And they asked him, saying, Teacher, [u]when therefore shall these things be? and what shall be the sign when these things are about to come to pass? And he said, See that ye be not [v]deceived. For many shall come in my name, saying, I am [he], and the time is drawn nigh; go ye not* after them. And when ye shall hear of [w]wars and tumults be not terrified: for these things must needs come to pass first, but the end is not immediately. Then said he to them, [x]Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom; there shall be both great [y]earthquakes in divers places, and famines and pestilences; and there shall be [z]fearful sights and great signs from heaven. But before all s Matt. 24.1, etc. Mk. 13. 1, etc. cf. Jno. 2. 19–21.

t ch. 19. 44. cf. 2 Chro. 7. 20–22. cf. Is. 64.10, 11. cf. Ezek. 7. 20–22.
u Matt. 24.3. Mk. 13. 3, 4. cf. Acts 1.6, 7. ctr. 1 Thess. 1. 10 with Phil. 3. 20, 21.
v cf. 2 Cor. 11. 13–15. cf. 2 Thess. 2. 3. cf. 2 Tim. 3. 13.
w cf. 2 Chro. 15. 5, 6. Matt. 24. 6, 7.

* Some add "therefore."

Mk. 13. 7, 8. x cf. Hag. 2.21, 22; cf. Zech. 14. 2, 3; cf. Rev. 6. 4. y cf. Rev. 6. 5, 6, 12. z vers. 25–27; cf. Matt. 24. 29.

5. The Lord's prophecy from the Mount of Olives has a conspicuous place in each of the three synoptic Gospels: in John only it is not found. Luke's version of it, however, though approaching that of Mark most nearly, differs in a very striking way from both; and all the more because of its resemblances to them.

Matthew gives the fullest account, showing the coming of the Lord in its relation to the Jews, the Church, and the Gentiles. Mark is briefer, and omits altogether the last two; but like Matthew he speaks of the abomination of desolation and the tribulation unequalled in any other time. This last, through the mercy of God very limited in duration, has the abomination as the date of its commencement, and continues till immediately before the appearing of the Lord,—linking in this way the two together, and showing that we are in the time of the end throughout this part. What precedes it is general in character, and might (and doubtless does) take in from the beginning of Christianity, but as a dispensation says nothing of this. It is passed over, quite as in Old Testament prophecy; though in Matthew taken up in its relation to the coming of the Lord in the parables which follow. Luke also says nothing indeed of Christianity as such, and is briefer as to the Lord's coming and what connects with this. We have nothing of the abomination nor of the tribulation following, but in place of this Jerusalem encompassed with armies and her being trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles—of the empires pictured by Daniel—are fulfilled. Then follow the signs of the Lord at hand.

Luke retains his character in this as the Gentile Gospel; and the smaller details are in harmony with this. Thus there is no angelic mission to gather together the elect; and to the parable of the fig-tree he adds "and all the trees." The indefinite lapse of time fulfilled in Jerusalem's desolation, as contrasted with the immediate coming of the Lord after the tribulation which follows the setting up of the abomination, distinguishes in the clearest way the destruction by Titus spoken of in Luke from the signs of the end-time in the other Gospels. Jerusalem at the end is not destroyed but delivered, though at her extremity, by the appearing of the Lord.

[1] The commencement of the prophecy is very similar in the three Gospels. In Luke, as in Mark, the disciples' questions have to do entirely with the destruction of the temple, of which He had just been speaking, and only in Matthew have we the additional ones, "What shall be the sign of Thy coming, and of these things shall they [a]lay their hands upon you and persecute you; delivering [you] up to the synagogues and prisons, bringing you before kings and governors for my name's sake: but it shall turn out to you for a [b]testimony. Settle it then, in your hearts not to [c]premeditate how to answer: for I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which all your [d]adversaries shall not be able to gainsay or resist. But ye shall be delivered up even by [e]parents and brethren and kindred and friends; and they shall put some of you to [f]death, and ye shall be [g]hated of all men for my name's sake. And a [h]hair of your head shall in no wise perish. By your [i]patience gain your lives.*

But when ye see Jerusalem [j]encompassed with armies, then know that her desolation is drawn nigh. Then let those that are in Judea flee to the mountains, and let those that are in the midst of it [k]depart out; and let not those that are in the country enter into it. For these are days of [l]vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled. Woe unto those that are a Matt. 10. 16-22. John 16. 2. cf. 1 Pet. 4. 12-14.

b cf. Phil. 1. 12, 13, 28. cf. 2 Thess. 1. 4, 5. c ch. 12. 11, 12. Mk. 13. 11. cf. Ex. 4. 11, 12.
d cf. ch. 20. 40. cf. Acts 5. 29-41. cf. Acts 6. 10.
e cf. Jer. 9. 4. Mi. 7. 5, 6. Matt. 10. 21, 35. cf. Jno. 9. 19-23. f cf. Acts 7. 54-60. cf. Acts 12. 1, 2. cf. Rev. 2. 13. cf. Rev. 11. 7.

*Or, "In your patience possess your souls."

g Matt. 10. 22; cf. Jno. 7. 7; cf. ch. 6. 22. h cf. Matt. 10. 29-33; cf. 1 Sa. 14. 45; cf. Dan. 3. 27. i cf. Heb. 10. 36; cf. 2 Thess. 3. 5; cf. Matt. 24. 13. j cf. ch. 19. 43, 44; cf. Dan. 9. 26, 27; cf. Matt. 24. 15-22; cf. Mk. 13. 14-20. k cf. Gen. 19. 17-26; cf. Ex. 9. 20, 21; cf. Jer. 6. 1; cf. Rev. 18. 4. l cf. Hos. 9. 7; cf. Lev. 26. 14, etc.; cf. Ps. 69. 22-28; cf. Is. 65. 12-15.

the end of the age?" Matthew accordingly it is who develops most fully, as we have seen, the circumstances connected with the end-time and the Lord's return, while Luke gives the full answer to the question as to the temple. In relation to this, he brings out also as the others do, the false Christs that should arise, the wars and rumors of wars, the convulsions and disasters. But before all these things the hatred of men to Him would break out in the bitter persecution of His followers. The nearest ties would be no restraint; the dearest affections of nature would be turned to enmity. They would be delivered up to the synagogues and brought before rulers and kings; Christ, however, being borne witness to in this way, and the Spirit, therefore, with them to furnish them with the needful ability to glorify Him. Through all not a hair of their heads would really perish: He who has counted them all would certainly give a good account of them. By endurance they would gain their lives, instead of losing them: by the very loss of them they would keep them, as the Lord assured them before, to life eternal.

Upon the guilty city, stained with the blood of the prophets, and now to be with that of their glorious King also, days of vengeance were coming. When they saw Jerusalem encompassed with armies, then they might know that its desolation was near: a very different thing, nevertheless, from the "abomination of desolation" of which Matthew and Mark speak, and which is connected with the middle of the last week of Daniel, while this comes between the sixty-ninth and seventieth in the same chapter: "and the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary" (Dan. ix. 26). There is really no excuse for confounding things so different, and where the interval between them is so plainly expressed.

There are, no doubt, similar warnings to depart from the city, and lamentations over the childbearing women in each case—as easy to be understood in one connection as in the other. But the omissions in Luke are noticeable. Where the armies encompassing the city are the sign, there is naturally no exhortation as to speediness of departure, no need to pray that it might not be upon the sabbath day. In fact, for those in Jerusalem, such haste would be with child, and to those that give suck in those days! for there shall be great distress upon the land and wrath upon this people. And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and be led [m]captive into all the nations; and Jerusalem shall be [n]trodden down by the nations until the [o]times of the nations be fulfilled.

2 (25–36): the judgment which is redemption.

[2] And there shall be [p]signs in sun and moon and stars, and upon earth distress of nations in perplexity for the roaring of the sea and billows; men [q]ready to die for fear and expectation of things coming on the habitable earth: for the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. And [r]then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory. But when these things begin to come to pass, [s]look up, and lift up your heads; because your redemption draweth nigh.

And he spake a parable to them, Behold the [t]fig-tree, and all the trees: when they already shoot, ye know of yourselves when ye see it, that summer is already nigh. So ye, when ye see these things taking place, know that the [u]kingdom of God is nigh. Verily I say unto you that [v]this generation shall in no wise pass away until all things come to pass. [w]Heaven and m cf. Deut. 28. 64–68. cf. Acts 7. 43.

n cf. Is. 5. 5. cf. Is. 63. 18.
o cf. Dan. 9. 24–27. cf. Rom. 11. 25, 26.
p cf. Is. 13. 9, 10, 13. cf. Ezek. 32. 7, 8. cf. Joel 2. 10, 30, 31.
q cf. Rev. 6. 12–17. ch. 23. 30.
r Matt. 24. 29–31. Mk. 13. 24–27. Rev. 1. 7. 2 Thess. 1. 7–10. s cf. Is. 64. 1–5. cf. Ps. 96. 11–13. cf. Ps. 97.
t Matt. 24. 32–35. Mk. 13. 28–31. cf. Mk. 11. 13.

cf. Matt. 16. 1–3. u cf. Heb. 10. 37; cf. Jas. 5. 8, 9. v cf. ch. 11. 50, 51; cf. Matt. 10. 23. w cf. Is. 40. 8; cf. Is. 51. 6.

rather dangerous than wise, and abundance of time was given, after Cestius Gallus had retired from the city, for leisurely departure. All, therefore, is in perfect keeping.

How terrible these days of vengeance were is known to all. Josephus gives the number of the slain in the siege as 1,000,000; of those carried away captive as 97,000. The complete fulfilment of our Lord's words is matter of common history. The times of the Gentiles are not yet concluded, after more than eighteen centuries of treading down; although there are many signs that they are near their end: to what then takes place the prophecy passes on.

[2] The signs of the end are more briefly given than in the previous Gospels; signs in the sun and in the moon and in the stars, answered by the roaring of the sea with its billows from below; between them the nations in distress and perplexity; men ready to die for alarm at what is coming on the earth. There seems good reason to believe that these signs are physical, while yet there are corresponding ones in the political sphere, as the book of Revelation clearly shows. At such a time God's mercy multiplies His calls to men to give heed to what He is doing; and such mysterious sympathy of nature with human woes gives all the apparent countenance that there may be to the fables of astrology. In such ways man perverts the goodness of God to his destruction.

Amid such signs the Son of man will be seen coming in a cloud with power and great glory. Nothing is said of attendant angels or of the gathering of the dispersed of Israel. But when the disciples should see the beginnings of these things, they were to rejoice and lift up their heads, because their redemption was drawing nigh. These would be, in fact, Jewish disciples, such as they were to whom the Lord was now addressing Himself. Christianity was yet unknown, and the long lapse of time designedly hidden.

The parable of the fig-tree applies, as we have seen in various places, to the Jewish remnant of returned captives in the land. Since dispersed, as Luke has told us they would be, they are now again gathering there; the fig-tree is shooting. But Luke adds "and all the trees": in which we are to see apparently, according to the character of Luke, the revival of the nations making up Daniel's earth shall pass away, but my words shall in no wise pass away. But take [x] heed to yourselves, lest peradventure your hearts be [y] surfeited with debauch and drunkenness, and [z] cares of life, and that day come upon you unawares: for as a [a] snare shall it come upon all that dwell upon the face of the whole earth. [b] Watch therefore, at every season, praying, that ye may prevail to [c] escape all these things that are about to come to pass, and to [d] stand before the Son of man.

x cf. 1 Pet. 1. 13. cf. 1 Pet. 4. 7.
y Rom. 13. 13. cf. 1 Pet. 4. 3, 4.
z cf. ch. 14. 18–20. cf. ch. 17. 28.
a cf. 1 Thess. 5. 1–7. cf. Rev. 3. 3, 10.
b cf. Matt. 24. 42, etc. cf. Mk. 13. 32–37.
c cf. ch. 17. 33–37. cf. Rev. 7. 3. d cf. Matt. 25. 31–40. cf. r. Ps. 1. 5.
e Jno. 8. 1, 2. cf. ch. 2. 7. cf. Heb. 13. 11–14.

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chaps. xxi. 37–xxiii.)

The Cross and its Salvation.

SECTION 1. (Chaps. xxi. 37–xxii. 62.)

Anticipations.

1 (xxi. 37–xxii. 23): Consenting wills.
1 (xxi. 37–xxii. 6): the compact.

1. [1] AND by day he was in the temple, teaching; and at night he [e] went out and lodged in [the mount] that is called the mount of Olives; and all the people came early in the morning to him in the temple to hear him.

empires. Notable it is that Greece and Italy, after a time of long depression, have again become kingdoms. If we go outside of these, but still within the range of Daniel's vision, Egypt is also reviving under British care. Certainly the trees seem putting forth their leaves. The summer surely is already nigh; and there is no summer apart from the Kingdom of God. Again we are reminded, as in Matthew, of the rapidity with which it will at last come on. The generation that sees the beginning will see the end. And here the Lord solemnly affirms the immutability of His word: though heaven and earth pass, this shall not.

In view of such a time again there come warnings, lest the world, its pleasures and its cares engross and stupefy the heart, and these things come unawares; for as a snare it will come upon those who dwell on the face of the whole earth. They must watch and pray, that they may prevail to escape, and stand before the Son of man. "This is still the great subject of our Gospel. To be with Him as those that have escaped from the earth, to be among the 144,000 on Mount Zion, will be an accomplishment of this blessing, but the place is not named; so that, supposing the faithfulness of those whom He was personally addressing, the hope awakened by His words would be fulfilled in a more excellent manner in His heavenly presence in the day of glory" (Synopsis).

SUBD. 2.

We have now, as in the other Gospels, the descent to the cross, but which takes here, as has been already stated, that peace-offering character which is so entirely in unison with all that has been before us in the book. The shadow on the cross itself is in no wise what Matthew and Mark have pictured. It is just indicated, but not felt as there. The glory of its accomplishment shines through it and irradiates it. Correspondingly the descent thither is less protracted, the detail is less minute. In Gethsemane, indeed, the effect of the conflict upon His human frame is given, as not elsewhere: for Luke's is, as we know, the Gospel of His humanity; but the conflict itself is not so fully brought before us. Upon the cross there is suffering, but not distance; and the Saviour and His salvation are completely manifested.

Sec. 1.

Anticipations of the cross naturally fill now the short space of time which yet remains before it. He is a willing sacrifice; not taken unawares, but with the full consciousness of all that is to come upon Him. The disciples on the other hand, in spite of all His forewarnings of what would so profoundly affect

Now the [f] feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, which is called the passover; and the chief priests and the scribes [g] sought how they might kill him: for they feared the people. And [h] Satan entered into Judas, who was called Iscariot, being of the number of the twelve. And he went away, and spake with the chief priests and captains as to how he might deliver him up to them. And they were glad, and agreed to give him [i] money. And he consented, and sought opportunity to deliver him up to them in the absence of the multitude.

[f] Matt. 26. 1-5. Mk. 14.1,2. cf. Jno. 11. 55.
[g] ch. 19. 47, 48.
[h] Matt. 26. 14-16. Mk. 14. 10, 11. Jno.6.70,71. Jno.13.2,27.
[i] Jno. 12. 6.

2 (xxii. 7-13): the witness of the Old Testament to Christ (?)

[2] And the day of unleavened bread came, in which the passover must be sacrificed. And he [j] sent Peter and John, saying, Go and make ready for us the passover, that we may eat. And they said unto him, Where wilt thou that we make ready? And he said unto them, Behold, as ye enter into the city, there shall meet you a man bearing a [k] pitcher of water: follow him unto the house into which he goeth. And say unto their whole future, are still unprepared for it. He is occupied, therefore, here in setting it before them, with its consequences and lessons. We must wait, indeed, for John, to see how perfectly He does this; and how at this time His human heart overflows towards them with divine fulness. Luke, of all the synoptists, is nearest John, but here, on that very account, seems to be limited by him; while he is yet outside the sphere of the previous Gospels.

[j] Matt.26.17-19. Mk. 14.12-16.
[k] cf. 1 Sa.10. 3. cf. Jno.2.6-10. cf. Rev. 5. 20.

1. We see first how many consenting wills lead Him onward to the cross. The wicked wills of men, pursuing independently their wretched ends, are yet under the control of that divine will which in holiness and loving-mercy governs all. A suited preface this to that which follows. The first thing we are apt to see is man's will, and that under the government of Satan, as it was here: and these things are just as truly to be owned, with all their consequences in responsibility and judgment, as if they were the whole truth, which they are so far from being. We may consider them by themselves, or as simply against the will of God; which in their wickedness they were. Yet the whole mystery of sacrifice in heathendom, coming into light in the Old Testament, and crowned with the glory of prophecy, guides on the course of human history to the Great Sacrifice which was to come. The Son of man goeth as it was determined; yet most freely following out the will of God; and now faith looks back in the memorial instituted by Himself, to this as the centre of the ages: the salvation of man, the manifestation of God.

[1] In the temple day by day, teaching as never man taught, the crowds hanging upon His lips, those who looked little below the surface might say with the priests themselves, "The world goes after Him." But the more they feared, the more they were inflamed against Him, seeking His death.

An awful colleague appears: Satan, in Judas the "trafficker,"* ready to make merchandise of his Lord. And these all take their own way, follow their own will, as if God had none, or knew nothing. Yet Satan knows and trembles (Jas. ii. 19); and goes on as if he knew not: such is the infatuation of sin.

[2] The type-shadow of that in which they thus were to have their part was now brooding over them. Other eyes were watching it with what mingled feelings. It was the shadow upon the dial-piece of time which had now reached the decisive moment when it was to pass into the brightness which should illuminate all else. But how pass? Thank God, that is not any more a question.

*See p. 119.

the master of the house, The teacher saith unto thee, Where is the guest-chamber, where I may eat the passover with my disciples? And he will show you a large upper room furnished: there make ready. And they went away, and found as he had spoken to them; and they made ready the passover.

(xxii. 14-23; the memorial.

[3] And when the [k]hour was come, he sat down,* and the [twelve]† apostles with him. And he said to them, With [m]desire have I desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer. For I say unto you, that I [n]will not eat any more at all of it, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God. And having received a [o]cup, when he had given thanks, he said, Take this, and divide it among yourselves. For I say unto you, I will no more drink of the fruit of the vine till the [p]kingdom of God shall come. And taking a [q]loaf, when he had given thanks, he brake, and gave to them, saying, This is my [r]body which is given for you: this do for a [s]remembrance of me. And likewise the cup, after having supped, saying, This cup is the new covenant in my [t]blood, which is poured out for you. Moreover, behold, k Matt. 26. 20, etc. Mk. 14. 17, etc. cf. Jno. 13. 1, etc.

*Literally "reclined [at table]." †Many omit.

m cf. Heb. 9. 11, 12, 26 with Heb. 10. 1-9. cf. 1 Cor. 5. 7.
n cf. ver. 30. cf. Matt. 8. 11.
o cf. ver. 20. cf. Ps. 116. 12-19.
p cf. Matt. 26. 29. cf. Mk. 14. 25. cf. Nu. 6. 20 with Ps. 22. 22-26. cf. Is. 25. 6-8.
q Matt. 26. 26-28. Mk. 14. 22-24. 1 Cor. 11. 23-26. cf. Acts 20. 7.
r cf. 1 Cor. 10. 16. cf. Heb. 10. 5, 10.
s cf. Ex. 12. 42.
t cf. Eph. 1. 7; cf. Heb. 13. 20.

Follow where the man with the water goes in, and there you will find the place prepared which only He can fill. For the Old Testament leads thus to the New; the pitcher merely of water to where presently flow out the living streams in their fulness. This seems to be the meaning which we cannot doubt there must be in the sign given to the disciples here. Christ was going to the place already prepared for Him.

[3] When the hour is come, the Lord takes His place, and the apostles with Him. It is striking how many times more, compared with the other Gospels, the official title of the twelve is used in Luke. We might have expected this rather in Matthew; but there, as in Mark and John, it occurs but once, while Luke has it six times. And we can understand, I think, clearly why this is so, when we consider the evangelic character which Luke has throughout. The heart being filled, the going forth of the "good news" which had filled it necessarily follows. The recurrence of the word here is therefore the very opposite of officialism. It is love which calls to and qualifies for and necessitates the mission.—the overflowing of the heart of God towards men.

Here the Lord shows how His heart goes out. The strong Hebrew iteration most fittingly expresses it: "With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer." He is closing, as the words following intimate, His earth-sojourn with them, and the old dispensation together. He closes it with honor, magnifying it by His celebration of it, while longing for the better thing beyond, its glorious fulfilment in the Kingdom of God. His suffering was the only way to this fulfilment, and itself the assurance, the fullest that could be given, of His longing after it.

He celebrates the old feast, therefore, before He institutes the new; in which He emphasizes, as none of the other Gospels do, its character as a remembrance. As the passover in its full meaning was anticipative, though a memorial of the deliverance from Egypt, the Supper, on the contrary, has its blessedness in being commemorative only. The work of which it speaks is done—complete for ever: the joy is to realize that it is finished. The work is central, closing the old, bringing in the new economy, the new covenant; displacing the temporal with the eternal.

the [u]hand of him who delivereth me up is with me on the table. For the Son of man goeth indeed, as it was [v]determined; but [w]woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed. And they began to [z]question together among themselves who among them it should be who was about to do this thing.

2 (xxii.24-38): Lessons of the cross.
1 (24-30): greatness and rule.

2. [1] There was also a [y]strife among them, which of them appeared to be greatest. But he said to them, The [z]kings of the nations lord it over them, and they that exercise authority over them are called benefactors. But not so [is it to be] with you: but let the greater among you be as the younger, and the leader as the servant.* For which is greater? he that sitteth at table,† or he that serveth?* is not he that sitteth at table?† but I am among you as he that [a]serveth.* But

*Or "minister," "ministereth." †Literally "reclineth."

[u] cf. Ps. 41. 9. Jno. 13. 21.
[v] cf. Acts 2. 23. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 20.
[w] cf. Jno. 17. 12. cf. Acts 1. 18-20, 25.
[x] cfr. vers. 33, 34. Matt. 26. 21-25. Jno. 13. 21-30. cf. Ps. 139. 23, 24.
[y] Mk. 9. 34-37. ch. 9. 46-48.
[z] Matt. 20. 25-28. Mk. 10. 42-45.
[a] cf. Phil. 2. 7, etc; cf. Jno. 13. 13-17; cf. 1 Cor. 9. 19.

The language used in Luke here is also characteristic in its evangelic appropriateness. "My blood shed for many" in Matthew and Mark both, is here "shed for you;" as the bread also is "My body which is given for you." The appropriation is here not by them, but to them. He would have them realize all the consolation—all the tenderness of it.

With a pang comes the realization that the hand of the traitor is with Him on the table. The Son of man was, indeed, going in the way determined; but that altered nothing as to the guilt of him who in his wickedness had set himself to accomplish what was the purpose of God. "Woe to that man," He says, "by whom the Son of man is betrayed."

But Luke touches this less than any other of the evangelists, and he only notices in a general way the questioning that arises among the disciples on account of the Lord's words.

2. There follow what, I think, stand here together as lessons of the Cross; in which are plainly the roots of the Lord's teaching. But the Cross is indeed, as has been said, the great central point of light in human history, and therefore the lesson of lessons: God and man alike displayed in it; God and man come together, man opposed, and reconciled. What have we not in the Cross? In a sense, all lessons are lessons of it; but here, it is with the Cross in view that they are given; and none the less that disciples show themselves even yet as knowing nothing of it. How much do we know of it yet? And is it the gilded cross of the church fane? or the bare and bloody cross of the Christ of the Gospels?

[1] The controversy among the disciples as to who was to be accounted the greatest among them is peculiar to Luke as to the form and place in which we find it here. But it is the echo of what we find elsewhere in Matthew and Mark, and the manifestation of a spirit which would naturally show itself upon other occasions. In the history of the Church, how terribly has it shown itself all through: of which Matthew also has given us Luke's forewarning (xxiv. 49). Whether it is given by Luke in the sequence of time or not, it is evident that we are to read it as here given: brought into plain, naked opposition to the spirit of Him who was now descending so manifestly to the lowest depths of His humiliation,—to that which, above all, our necessity and His love united to bring Him into. For them the Kingdom of God was still but as the kingdoms of the nations, and they knew not that the humbling oneself as a little child was the way of greatness in it. The Lord, as He had done before, reminds them of the essential difference between dignity among fallen men, and that where divine love ruled. The title of "benefactor," Euergetes, is that by which ye are they who have continued throughout with me in my temptations; and I appoint a [b]kingdom unto you, even as my Father appointed unto me, that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.

2 (31-34): the ministry of evil.

[2] And the Lord said,* [c]Simon, Simon, behold, Satan hath demanded to have you,† that he may [d]sift you as wheat; but I have [e]prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not; and do thou, when once thou hast returned back, [f]strengthen thy brethren. And he said unto him, Lord, I am [g]ready to go with thee both to prison and to

* R. V. omits this clause, but the reading is well supported.
† Plural, "all of you."

b cf. Matt. 19. 28. cf. Rev. 2. 26.
c Matt. 26. 31-35. Mk. 14. 27-31. Jno. 13. 36-38.
d cf. Job 1. 8-12. cf. Am. 9. 9. cf. 1 Cor. 5. 5.
e cf. Jno. 17. 9, 11, 15. cf. 1 Jno. 2. 1, 2.
f cf. Jno. 21. 15-17. cf. 1 Pet. 5. 12. cf. 2 Pet. 1. 10-15.
g ctr. Phil. 3. 3.

one of the Ptolemies is known in history, and was often bestowed upon the Roman emperor. But this flattery was not to be among His disciples; but the greater as the younger, and the leader as in the servant's place. Who was the greater in men's thoughts, the one who was at table or the one that served there? In Him what did they see? The Greatest was the One who served them all!

But on His part He was not unconscious of their faithful continuance with Him in His temptations at the hands of men and Satan throughout His ministry. They were thus shown to have after all another spirit than what their present contention would imply. Love had wrought in them also, and love would exalt them to a place in His Kingdom at His table, appointed to a kingdom as the Father had appointed Him, and to sit on thrones judging under Him the tribes of Israel. So far as rule is service, love may desire rule; and where need is, the love that serves does rule; while that which seeketh not its own can have a pleasure which it seeks, and as love, joy in love. Thus the table and the throne can be rewards in the Kingdom of God, looked for and sought after, while not departing from the Saviour's rule. The way appointed for the Kingdom is the Cross, the sacrifice of love; and "if we suffer, we shall also reign with Him."

[2] In the next lesson there is shown a ministry which is not of love, and yet love reigns in it: the sifting of God's wheat by a skilful, but not a friendly hand. "Satan has demanded to have you," says the Lord; "that he may sift you as wheat." It is in that character the accuser of the brethren, as with Job of old, would test their pretension; and he found that it was no light thing to be in Satan's sieve. For Simon the Lord has to pray that his faith, sore tried as it is, may not fail; it is in danger, it would seem, of fatal lapse. Nay, he has really turned aside; he must be "turned back"; but then with a gain, for he is now able, spite of the weakness he has shown, to strengthen others: "when thou hast turned back, strengthen thy brethren."

Would it not seem as if, after all, Satan had nearly succeeded? too nearly, surely, for Peter to claim a victory. His faith has not altogether failed, but that is due only to the intercession of Another: he has in fact a terrible fall. What gain can there be in all this? how can he have learned how to strengthen others,—himself just proved so feeble! and what did Satan's sieve accomplish? or did it accomplish anything? if not, why was it permitted?

All is answered by the fact of what faith is; and of where, being what it is, its strength is found. Faith is dependence upon another; self-distrust, the consciousness of inherent weakness, is therefore necessary to it. We see, then, how it would be possible for defeat to be a victory; how Satan's sieve would then be that strange ministry of evil of which the Cross is the fullest example: for Simon the bringing him out of a strength which was but weakness, into a conscious weakness which would be strength, and in which his lesson learnt would enable him not only to stand himself, but to strengthen his brethren.

death. But he said, I tell thee, Peter, the [h] cock shall not crow to-day till thou shalt have thrice denied that thou knowest me.

3 (35-38): "take what you have:" the manifestation of the world.

[3] And he said unto them, [i] When I sent you forth without purse and wallet and shoes, lacked ye anything? And they said, Nothing. And he said unto them, But now, he that hath a purse, let him [j] take it, and likewise [his] wallet; and he that hath none, let him sell his garment and [k] buy a sword. For I say to you that this that is written must be accomplished in me: And he was [l] reckoned with the lawless; for that which concerneth me hath [its] completion. And they said, Lord, behold, here are two swords. And he said unto them, It is [m] enough.

3 (xxii.39-46): Gethsemane.

3. And he came out, and [n] went, as he was accustomed,

[h] ver. 60. Matt. 10.9, 10. ch. 9. 3. cf. Jno. 17. 11, 12.
[j] ctr. vers. 49-51. cf. 1 Cor. 4. 11, 12. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 16.
[k] cf. 2 Cor. 10. 4. 5. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 19, 32.
[l] Is. 53. 12.
[m] cf. Matt. 16. 11, 12. cf. Jno. 18. 36.
[n] Matt. 26. 36. Mk. 14. 32. Jno. 18. 1.

Thus all is plain; and in that which follows the Simon who needed this is unveiled to us. Honest, earnest, zealous—all that,—his "Lord, I am ready to go with thee both to prison and to death" displays the Simon whose faith in Christ needed to be strengthened by a fall. The end of this story is not yet reached; but the comforting assurance is read plainly in it that (as Paul proved it at a later day) the "messenger of Satan" may be God's missionary too, to do His needed work in the souls of His own.

Yet, had he taken warning, Peter might have escaped, not without his lesson learnt, but by learning it from the lips of the Lord. That before cock-crowing he would thrice deny Him, might have been so accepted as the revelation of his weakness and danger as to save him from it, by delivering him from the need. Instead of this, he resisted the gracious Voice that would have shielded him from the evil; and the prophecy had to take effect. Even then there remained for him, when strength and pride were smitten down together, the comfort of the exhortation: "thou, when thou hast turned back, strengthen thy brethren."

[3] The Lord goes on to warn His disciples of the altered circumstances in which now they would find themselves. The cross was His definite rejection both by Israel and the world. He was submitting to it, and they must submit, and expect to find the full edge of its opposition. When He had sent them forth before, they had lacked nothing: He had effectually provided for them. Now, although His faithful love could not cease, yet they were to be permitted to feel the condition of things. Accordingly, they were to take with them what they had, and go armed, as in a hostile country: better have no garment than no sword. He uses the figurative language so common with Him, and by which He would exercise their hearts with regard to all His utterances; indeed, ours as well as theirs. Presently Peter is using his sword; appealing evidently to the words here, as so many have appealed since, only to find how sadly he had misinterpreted them. "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal," says the apostle afterwards, "but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds." The sword does not naturally symbolize mere defensive warfare; and the spiritual sword is the word of God alone. The true disciple will not meet the opposition of the world with a passive resistance merely, but with that which has power over the conscience and heart. If the world is in active opposition to Christ we are to be His soldiers; and that which is the food of mighty men furnishes at the same time for the battle-field. Thus no one can properly assimilate the bread of God, without becoming so far a champion.

The disciples did not understand it. "Lord, behold," they said, "here are two swords." He replied, "It is enough." For the present, it was of no use to press it further. When the Spirit of God should bring to their remembrance all that He had said to them, they would understand it better.

3. He goes out, as He was accustomed to the Mount of Olives, and we have to the Mount of Olives; and the disciples also followed him. And when he was at the place, he said to them, °Pray that ye enter not into temptation. And he was withdrawn from them about a stone's cast, and he kneeled down and prayed, saying, Father, ᵖif thou wilt, remove this cup from me; nevertheless not my will but thine be done. And there appeared to him an ᵠangel from heaven, strengthening him. And being in ʳconflict, he prayed more earnestly; and his ˢsweat became as it were great drops of blood falling down upon the ground.* And when he had risen from his prayer, he came to the disciples, and found them ᵗsleeping from sorrow. And he said unto them, Why sleep ye? Rise and pray that ye enter not into temptation.

*A number of MSS. omit these two verses, but others equally ancient give them. A false idea of our Lord's divinity might have led to their early omission.

o ver. 46. 1 Pet. 4. 7. 1 Pet. 5. 8.
p cf. Jno. 6. 38. cf. Jno. 12. 27, 28.
q Matt. 4. 11. cf. Heb. 1. 14.
r cf. Heb. 5. 7, 8.
s cf. Heb. 12. 1-4.
t cf. ch. 9. 32. cf. Heb. 12. 5, 12.

now (more briefly than in the other Gospels,) the mystery of Gethsemane. We have already sought to show the character of the suffering there, so far as it is permitted to us to enter into it. The depths who can penetrate? The mysteries of His Person and of His work combine here to make us realize that "no one knoweth the Son but the Father," and the danger of any speculation as to these divine things. Luke, from the character of his Gospel, does not enter so fully into this suffering, for the same reason that the Cross itself does not exhibit the cup in its bitterness, as the previous Gospels do. And we must not mistake for this the physical effects upon Him which Luke alone describes. Even the significant name of the place, Gethsemane, the "oil-press," is not given here; and John makes no mention either of this or of the agony endured there. Each writer is divinely guided in what he gives or withholds, and the only evangelist who was one of the three selected by the Lord to watch with Him in that hour of agony is the only one who omits all notice of it.

Those who dwell most upon the bitterness of the "cup" that was before Him, are they who tell us of the hymn before their starting out. Luke, who dwells upon the effects for others, emphasizes by repetition the Lord's warning, "Lest ye enter into temptation." But he does not speak of the selection of the special three to be with Him; a selection which shows, as in the transfiguration, the sanctuary character of that to which they are admitted. We do not hear the threefold repetition of the prayer, nor see Him prostrate on the ground as He utters it. The appearance of the angel also relieves the darkness. It is not the forsaking of the Cross, although His human frame is oppressed, and needing the ministry that He receives. We dare not say with some, that His soul required it. He was going out to that in which He would be absolutely alone, and where all the blessing of man, all the fulfilment of the divine counsels, would depend upon His ability to endure it all. Who could imagine an angel helping Him on to this?

But the body suffers, and presently the strain upon it is seen in the "sweat, as it were great drops of blood," that fall down upon the ground. Laborer for God and man as He is, His labor is a warfare also: the enemy is here, as He presently says to those who come to apprehend Him: "This is your hour, and the power of darkness." The Seed of the woman is planting His heel upon the head of the old serpent, but His heel is bruised in doing this. In the weakness of perfect Manhood He suffers, and conquers by suffering.

The darkness of the hour is on the disciples also. Coming back to them, He finds them sleeping for sorrow. And again He has to urge on them the peculiar character of that which they are meeting: "Rise and pray, that ye enter not into temptation."

4 (xxii.47-53): The yielding up.

4. While he yet spake, behold, a [u]multitude, and he who was called Judas, one of the twelve, went before them, and drew near to Jesus, to kiss him. But Jesus said unto him, Judas, [v]betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss? And when those about him saw what was going to be, they said, Lord, shall we [w]smite with the sword? And one of them smote the servant of the high priest, and cut off his right ear. And Jesus answered and said, Suffer ye thus far. And he touched his ear and [x]healed him. And Jesus said unto the chief priests and captains of the temple and elders, who were come against him, Have ye come out as against a [y]robber with swords and staves? When I was daily with you in the temple, ye stretched not forth your hands against me; but this is your hour, and the [z]power of darkness.

5 (xxii.54-62): The result in divine government for Peter.

5. And they laid hold upon him, and [a]led him away, and led him into the high priest's house. And Peter followed [b]afar off. And when they had lighted a fire in the midst of the court, and were set down together, Peter sat down [c]amongst them. And a certain [d]maid having seen him sitting in the light [of the fire], and having fixed her eyes upon him, said, This man was also with him. And he [e]denied [him],* saying, Woman, I know him not. And after a little while another saw him and said, Thou also art of them. And Peter said, Man, I am not. And about the space of an hour after, another confidently affirmed, saying, Of a truth this [man] also was with him: for he is a [f]Galilean. And u Matt. 26. 47-56. Mk. 14. 43-52. John 18. 2-11.

*Many omit.

v cf. 2 Sam. 3. 27.
w cf. 2 Sam. 20. 9, 10. Jno.6.70,71. *cfr.*ch.7.38.
x *cf.*ver.38. cf. Matt. 5. 38, 39.
y cf. Is.53.7. *cf.*Ps.109.4. *cf.*ch. 23.34.
z ver. 37. ch. 23. 32.
a *cf.*Ex.12.6. cf. Jno. 14. 30.
b Matt. 26. 57-68. Mk. 14. 53-65. Jno. 18. 13. 19-24.
c cfr. Jno. 13. 23. *cf.*Jno.21.19.
d cf. Gen.12. 11. cf. Jas. 4.4.
e cf. Prov. 28. 1. cfr. Acts 4. 19, 20.
f ver. 34. Matt. 26.69-75. Mk. 14. 66-72. Jno. 18.15-18, 25-27.
cf. Acts 1. 11. *cf.*Acts 2.7.

4. Immediately a multitude are upon Him, headed by Judas, who, according to a preconcerted signal, draws near to kiss Him. Of all signs that could have been given, it was surely that of the most brazen, smooth-faced hypocrisy. The Lord shows His deep sense of the insult: "Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?"

On the other hand the zeal of a disciple would do Him the wrong of defending Him. A sword is out and a servant of the high priest is smitten. The appeal they make to Him has evident reference to His own words: were they to arm themselves with swords without using them? But we must be in communion with Christ to use His word aright. Was He so weak as to need help at hands like theirs? He does not answer this as in Matthew, by any assertion of how the Father's angels waited upon His will; but according to the manner of Luke puts forth His power in grace, and heals the wound. Yes, power He has; but now to lay down His life and take it again; they knew not yet the Cross as the symbol of fullest, widest, sweetest authority.

He turns to the multitudes, to appeal against their treatment of Him as a robber, when day by day He had been openly with them in the temple, and they had not laid hold of Him. They had waited for their hour and found it; darkness had favored them: alas, in reality that "power of darkness" which brooded over and swayed men's minds. They knew not what they were doing, or whither they were going, because that darkness had blinded their eyes.

5. The multitude lead Him to the house of the high priest; but the first thing we are called to see there is the conclusion of that story of Simon Peter which

Peter said, Man, I know not what thou sayest. And directly, while he was still speaking, a [g]cock crew. And the Lord turned and [h]looked upon Peter. And Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how he had said to him, Before the cock crow [to-day],* thou shalt deny me thrice. And he went out and [i]wept bitterly.

[g] cf. Rom. 7. 24, 25. cf. Ps. 60. 8 with Jer. 2. 19.
[h] cf. Ps. 32. 8.
[i] cf. 2 Cor. 7. 10, 11.

SECTION 2. (Chaps. xxii. 63–xxiii. 25.)

Judgment without judgment.

I (xxii. 63–71): The truth in faithfulness.

1. AND the men that held Jesus† [j]mocked him, [k]beating him, and having blindfolded him, they asked him, saying, Prophesy, who is it that smote thee? And many other things they said, railing, against him. And when it became day, the eldership of the people was gathered together, both chief priests and scribes. And they led [j] cf. Ps. 69. 12.

[k] cf. Is. 50. 6.

*Some omit. †Most read, "Him."

we have already heard announced to him by the Lord. It is a brief one. He follows His Master into the place of His mock trial, hoping to escape notice amid the crowd that had swarmed in after Him; but thus obliged already to deny Him with his looks, if not his words. The rest soon follows. He is seen in the light of the enemy's fire, at which he is warming himself. Accusation after accusation brings out denial. In the midst of it all, the crow of a cock startles him into remembrance, and he must have turned, spite of his danger, his eyes upon the well-known Figure, silent, patient, amid the rabble of His accusers. At that moment, "the Lord turned and looked upon Peter." How the eyes met! Then the whole horror of his position burst upon him. "He went out and wept bitterly."

Sec. 2.

We are now to see the Son of God before the judgment-seat of man. Luke is briefer here than any of the Gospels. The attempts of the false witnesses before the Jewish tribunal are entirely ignored, as well as the adjuration of the high priest. We have simply the Lord's affirmation for Himself of who He is, which is sufficient for their purpose: any serious inquiry as to the truth they do not mean. Before Pilate we have only the simple fact of His acquittal of the charge preferred; spite of which He is delivered up to the people's will. It is a judgment without judgment—without the poorest semblance of right. The reference to Herod is peculiar to Luke; but he merely scoffs, and is met on the Lord's part by absolute silence. He is not in any place of authority that calls for recognition, as with Pilate and the Jewish high priest, and in his character there is nothing that can in the least measure claim it. He is past even reproof.

On the whole, Luke, following the other synoptists, seems to give simply the result morally of that of which they have given the history. The guilt of pursuing the Lord to death is that of Israel, Pilate guiltily yielding to them, indeed; and Herod being but the sign of how low Israel had fallen, even though, nay, even because himself (born of an Edomite father and a Samaritan mother,) no real Israelite.

1. As is everywhere apparent, the Jewish question was the supreme one of the Person of the Christ,—the fundamental question for every soul. Here also the fundamental witness is His own. As He stands before us,—as we see Him in every circumstance and relation of life,—who is so worthy to be believed as He?

Here, then, we have His testimony, the "Faithful and True"; and it is in faithfulness as in truth that He renders it. A passage peculiar to Luke points out this: for, when they ask, "Art Thou the Christ? tell us," He can say with assurance, "If I tell you, ye will not believe; and if I also ask you, ye will not answer Me, nor let Me go." It was in fact the incriminating question; and him away to their [l]council, saying, If thou art the Christ, tell us. But he said unto them, If I tell you, ye [m]will not believe; and, if I ask, ye will not answer me, nor let me go.* But from henceforth shall the Son of man [n]sit on the right hand of the power of God. And they all said, Art thou, then, the Son of God? And he said unto them, Ye say it: for† I [o]am. And they said, What [p]need have we of any further testimony? for we ourselves have heard from his own mouth.

2 (xxiii. 1-4): The witness of the judge.

2. And the whole multitude of them arose and [q]led him to Pilate. And they began to accuse him, saying, We found this [man] [r]perverting our nation, and forbidding to give [s]tribute to Cæsar, saying that he himself is Christ, a [t]king. And Pilate asked him, saying, Art thou the king of the Jews? And he answered him, and said, Thou [u]sayest it. And Pilate said to the chief priests and multitudes, I [v]find no fault in this man.

3 (xxiii. 5-12): The scoffer's "sign."

3. But they insisted, saying, He [w]stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Judea, beginning even from [x]Galilee to this place. Now when Pilate heard that,‡ he inquired whether the man were a Galilean. And when he knew that he was from Herod's jurisdiction, he sent him back to [y]Herod, who himself was in Jerusalem in those days. And when Herod saw Jesus, he

*Some omit this clause, but it is evidently to be retained.
†Or, "Ye say that I am." ‡Some read "heard of Galilee."

[l] Matt. 27.1. Mk. 15. 1.
[m] cf. ch. 20. 2, 8. cf. Jno. 10. 24-26.
[n] cf. Acts 7. 55, 56 with Rev. 1. 7. cf. Heb. 1. 3.
[o] Jno. 10. 30.
[p] cf. Mk. 14. 58-59.
[q] Matt. 27. 2. Mk. 15. 1. Jno. 18. 28.
[r] vers. 5, 14. cf. Acts 17. 7.
[s] ctr. Matt. 22. 17-21. cf. Ps. 109. 2.
[t] cf. Jno. 18. 33-38. cf. Jno. 19. 12.
[u] cf. ch. 22. 70. cf. 1 Tim. 6. 13.
[v] vers. 14, 22. cf. Acts 3. 13. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 22.
[w] ctr. John 6. 15. ctr. ch. 14. 25-27.
[x] ch. 4. 14.
[y] ch. 3. 1. ch. 13. 31, 32.

since they asked it for an evil purpose, why should He give them the answer that they sought? But this does not influence Him. What they will make of it is for them to decide; He will not on that account refuse the testimony of such unspeakable importance to them. He is in their hands, for them to work their cruel will upon Him; yet only to bring Him out of His present humiliation, and set Him free for the glory before Him. "Henceforth shall the Son of man sit on the right hand of the power of God." They understand the claim and challenge it: "Art Thou the Son of God, then?" they ask. "Ye say it: for I am," He answers. He is condemned, not at the mouth of other witnesses, but His own.

2. He is carried before Pilate, charged with the notoriously false charge of forbidding tribute to Cæsar: this based upon the truth that He is Christ a King. Pilate puts the question to Him, "Art Thou the King of the Jews?" to which John gives the full answer. Luke simply gives His affirmative reply, and the outcome of the examination, in which Pilate clears Him of all that would involve a crime against Cæsar; from which judgment he never recedes. When he sentences Him at last to the death of the cross, it is with the carefully maintained acknowledgment that he is sacrificing an innocent man.

3. The scene with Herod is peculiar to Luke. Pilate sends Him to him, hoping for something from the ruler from whose jurisdiction Jesus has come, which may settle a case made troublesome by the persistence of the people. Herod has got over his fear of Christ, and is glad to have the opportunity of seeing Him, hoping even to see Him do some "sign" in his presence. His conscience more and more hardened by his evil course, he evidently regards the Lord simply as a magician, such as was Simon the sorcerer in Samaria afterwards, and who would be sure to take the opportunity to impress such an audience with proofs of his power.

He finds indeed a sign, such as he had not looked for, a Man silent and un-was exceedingly glad, for he had been for a long time [z]desirous to see him, because he had heard many things concerning him, and he hoped to see some sign done by him. And he questioned him with many words, but he [a]answered him nothing. And the [b]chief priests and the scribes stood, and vehemently accused him. And Herod with his men of war set him at nought, and [c]mocked him, and having put on him a brilliant robe, he sent him back to Pilate. And the same day Herod and Pilate became [d]friends with one another: for they were before at enmity between themselves.

4 (xxiii. 13–25): Yielded to the people's will.

4. And Pilate, having called together the chief priests and the rulers and the people, said unto them, Ye have brought unto me this man as one that perverteth the people; and behold, I, having examined him before you, have found [e]no fault in this man touching those things of which ye accuse him. No, nor yet Herod; for he* hath sent him back to us; and behold, nothing worthy of death hath been done by him. I will therefore [f]chastise him and let him go. [Now he was [g]obliged to release one unto them at the feast.]† But they cried out all together, saying, [h]Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas: (a man who for a certain insurrection made in the city, and for murder, had been cast into prison.) And Pilate, being [i]desirous to release Jesus, spake again to them; but they cried against [it,] saying, [j]Crucify him, crucify him. And he said to them

z ch. 9. 9.

a cf. Jno. 19. 9. cf. Is. 53. 7.

b cfr. Heb. 4. 15.

c cf. ch. 22. 64. cf. ver. 35. ch. 18. 32.

d cf. Acts 4. 27. cf. Prov. 1. 10–16.

e ver. 4.

f ver. 22. Jno. 19. 1. Matt. 27. 26.

g cfr. ch. 13. 1. Matt. 27. 15. Mk. 15. 6. Jno. 18. 39.

h cf. Is. 53. 3. cf. Jno. 1. 11.

i cf. Jno. 19. 8, 12.

j Jno. 19. 15. cf. Ps. 69. 20.

*A few ancient MSS., and some excellent editors read, "I sent you to him." The vast weight of authority however gives it as in the text.

†Omitted by most editors, but certainly very old.

moved, answering nothing to his questions, nor to the accusations of the chief priests and scribes, who, fearing the effect upon Herod, vehemently accuse Him. There is not even a word of warning or rebuke, but only that unbroken silence so much more terrible.

The unhappy man answers it but with mockery. Arraying Him in a brilliant robe, perhaps that of a candidate for honors, he sends the Lord back to Pilate, as if to intimate that such claims as these merited no more serious consideration.

With this Pilate and Herod are made friends again: they had before been at enmity. They are often represented as united by their common enmity to Christ; but enmity is too strong a term: He had not in fact been enough to them even to draw out enmity. He was to them, as with so many, a mere circumstance in a day's history, with Pilate an annoying one; with Herod, the possible material for amusement which it had failed to yield. Both men had enough of scepticism in them to make it impossible to give themselves to investigate a difficult problem, as to which the cost was much more certain than the profit. Their friendships were probably much less real than their enmities; but both were in a world where Christ was not, or an uncertain speculation at the most. Would that one could believe it an uncommon case.

4. The matter is again upon Pilate's hands, however, who has just enough conscience and enough guilt of his own, to make him unwilling to burden himself with the guilt of others. These miserable Jews too, whom he despised and hated, but who held him by that formidable reminder of his accountability to Cæsar, who was near and real, whatever might be thought of God. So he weakens and vacillates,—makes it not a question of righteousness as at first.

the third time, Why, what evil hath he done? I have found in him nothing worthy of death: I will chastise him, therefore, and release him. But they were urgent, with loud voices, asking that he might be crucified. And their voices* [k]prevailed. And Pilate gave sentence that what they asked for should be done. And he [l]released him who for insurrection and murder had been cast into prison, whom they asked for, but Jesus he delivered up to their [m]will.

k cf. Ex. 23. 2.

l Acts 3. 13-15. Matt. 27. 26. Mk. 15. 15. Jno. 19. 16.

m cf. Jno. 10. 17, 18. cf. ch. 19. 14 with Acts 13. 27.

SECTION 3. (Chap. xxiii. 26-56.)

The Offering up and its Fruits.

1 (26-31): The fore-announcement of doom.

1. AND as they led him away, they laid hold upon a certain [n]Simon, a Cyrenian, coming out of the country,† and upon him they laid the cross, that he might bear it after Jesus. And there [o]followed him a great multitude of the people, and of women who bewailed and lamented him. But Jesus turning unto them said, Daughters of Jerusalem, [p]weep not for me, but weep for yourselves and for your children: for behold there n Matt. 27. 32. Mk. 15. 21. cf. Jno. 19. 17. cf. Phil. 3. 10.

o ch. 8. 1-3.

p cf. ch. 19. 41, etc.

*Some add, "with those of the chief priests."
†Or, "from the field."

but of mercy,—puts it thus into the hands of the Jews themselves whose malignity even he cannot understand,—Barabbas or Jesus? Barabbas? then they must tell him what to do with Jesus, this man in whom no evil has been found: crucify him? surely impossible; but he is now helplessly in their hands. With a last vain effort to have the guilt wholly theirs, he delivers up the Man whose innocency he has so openly declared to the death of the slave, of the criminal, and the curse of God (Deut. xxi. 23).

Sec. 3.

In the story of the Cross the peculiar character of Luke is unmistakable. He omits most of the Lord's suffering from the mere wickedness of men. We do not read of the scourging or the crown of thorns. The mockery round the cross is more briefly given. The darkness falling upon the land is noticed, but there is no cry to One who has forsaken Him. On the other hand, the fruits of His work of atonement are seen all through: in the prayer for the forgiveness of His murderers; in the story of the dying robber; as well as in the rending of the veil of the temple. Even His last words, "Father, into Thy hands I commit My spirit," have their own significance in this way.

The Gospel of the Manhood is seen also. The centurion's testimony is to the "righteous Man." And the lament of the women of Jerusalem is in accordance with this: that human sympathy too simply natural for the Lord, spite of its manifestation of the better side of man's nature, unreservedly to accept.

1. This lamentation of the women is the first thing here, after the account, given in all the synoptists, of the cross being laid upon Simon: the need of cross-bearing by the disciple being a necessary thing to hold up before us all.

To the women He replies with lamentation for lamentation. They have more cause to weep for themselves and their children than for Him, for the day of their sorrow was near at hand in which the blessing would be theirs who had no children. In the midst of a generation the fire of whose wrath could kindle after this sort in the green and fruitful tree, what must be the lot of those who were like the dry wood, fit fuel for the flame? This is not divine wrath of which He is speaking, though divine wrath indeed might give them up to it, but what they would inflict one upon another. The sufferings of those shut up in the caldron of that besieged city are matters of common history. The Lord come days in which they shall say, [q]Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare, and the breasts which never nourished. Then shall they begin to [r]say to the mountains, Fall on us, and to the hills, Cover us. For if they do these things in the [s]green tree, what shall be done in the [t]dry?

2 (32-43): Condemnation and Salvation.

2. And there were led with him two others also, [u]malefactors, to be put to death. And when they came to the place which is called the Skull, there they crucified him, and the malefactors one on the right hand, and the other on the left. And Jesus said, Father, [v]forgive them; for they [w]know not what they do. And [x]parting his garments among them, they cast lots. And the people stood, beholding. And the rulers also [y]derided him, saying, He saved others: let him save himself, if this is the Christ, the chosen one of God. And the soldiers also mocked him, coming to him, and offering him vinegar, saying, If thou art the king of the Jews, save thyself. And there was also a [z]super-

*In Latin, "Calvary."

Jno. 19. 23, 24; cf. Gen. 37. 23, 31-33. z cf. Ps. 22. 6-8; cf. Ps. 69. 12, 21; Matt. 27. 39-43; Mk. 15. 29-32. a Matt. 27. 37; Mk. 15. 26; Jno. 19. 19-22.

q cf. Matt. 24. 19.
r cf. Hos. 10. 8.
cf. Rev. 6. 16, 17.
s cf. 1 Pet. 4. 17.
cf. Ps. 1. 3.
t cf. Matt. 21. 19.
cf. Jude 12.
u Matt. 27. 38.
Mk. 15. 27.
Jno. 19. 18.
cf. Is. 53. 12.
v Matt. 27. 33-37.
Mk. 15. 22-26.
Jno. 19. 17.
cf. Jno. 5. 12.
w cf. 1 Pet. 2. 23.
cf. Acts 7. 60.
x cf. Acts 3. 17.
cf. 1 Cor. 2. 8.
y Ps. 22. 18.
Matt. 27. 35.
Mk. 15. 24.

would lead them to consider the state before God in which the nation as a whole was, already putting their hand to that which as the consummation of their guilt would ensure the awful doom that was just at hand.

2. The cross is reached, and He is placed upon it, two malefactors with Him, one on either side. And now He pleads for those who have placed Him there the ignorance in which they have done it: a thing which leaves them yet the possibility of shelter in the city of refuge; and which the apostle accordingly takes up afterward with the people in his pleading with them to repent and turn to God (Acts iii. 17), as Paul applies it to himself also: "Howbeit for this cause I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly, in unbelief" (1 Tim. i. 13). Thus the Lord has fulfilled His own parable (chap. xiii. 6–9): the barren fig-tree is to be digged about and dunged, in order that it may yet be seen if it will bring forth fruit. This, notwithstanding His sentence pronounced upon it (Matt. xxi. 19), which He will give them still the opportunity to avert, as Nineveh averted theirs. And such is the mercy of God.

Heedless and heartless, they part His garments among them, casting the lot. Luke is briefest of all as to this, of which John will show us another side. The superscription over him in the languages of wisdom-seeking, of empire, of religion, publishes His title to the world.

And now the cry begins to ring out, though in mockery, of salvation. "He saved others," say the rulers: "let Him save Himself, if He be the Christ, the chosen of God." Even the soldiers take it up after their own fashion: "If thou be the King of the Jews, save Thyself." And then one of the robbers makes the impossible conjunction: "If Thou be the Christ, save Thyself and us." Truly impossible to put these things together.

But the rulers know no more of salvation than the soldiers or the robber. A Christ who would save Himself could not be the Christ predicted by the prophets, or the Saviour of others, and Isaiah had pictured exactly what was passing before their eyes. Who could doubt the application of such words as we find here? "Therefore will I divide Him a portion with the great, and He shall divide the spoil with the strong: because He hath poured out His soul unto death; and was numbered with the transgressors, and bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors" (Isa. liii. 12).

scription over him, in Greek, and Roman and Hebrew letters, THIS IS THE KING OF THE JEWS.

Now one of the [b]malefactors that were hanged railed on him, saying, Art not thou the Christ? save thyself and us. But the other answering rebuked him, saying, Dost thou not even fear God, who art in the same condemnation? And we indeed [c]justly; for we are receiving the due reward of what we have done: but this man hath done nothing amiss. And he said, Jesus,* [d]remember me, when thou comest in† thy kingdom. And Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, To-day thou shalt be with me in [e]paradise.

b cf. Matt. 27. 44.

c cf. ch. 18. 13.

d cf. Matt. 25. 31, etc.

e cf. Rev. 2. 7. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 8 with 2 Cor. 12. 2–4.

*Or, "unto Jesus, Lord," but the oldest MSS. read generally with the text; and the alteration to this is more probable than the reverse.

†Some editors read "into."

Here was the secret of the Cross unveiled as the mystery of salvation; and for the Jew with his ritual of sacrifice not to understand it seems to us now almost incomprehensible. The veil was upon their heart, as the apostle declares. Pharisaic pride refused the humbling of the gospel. A Christ crucified was to the Jew a stumbling-block.

But it pleased God to give a lesson of salvation which was to accompany the story of the Cross, just in the place where every eye directed to that Cross should see it. Suddenly the voice of one of the malefactors rebukes his fellow. He, a dying man involved in the same sentence, does he not fear God, before whom he is soon going? does he not fear with that sin upon him which had brought them both justly where they were? but here was One who had done nothing amiss.

Then with this guilt upon himself also, and confessing it, he turns with the boldest possible prayer to this confessed Sinless One. "Jesus," he says,—"Jehovah Saviour,"—he could not be ignorant of the meaning of the name he uttered—"Jesus, remember me when Thou comest in Thy Kingdom." Immediately he is answered—more than answered—"Verily I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise."

We can imagine many things, of course, as to what had inspired him with a faith like this. Whatever he may have known of the Lord, however, at a former time, both Matthew and Mark assure us that "those who were crucified with Him reviled Him." The fair meaning of this has been denied without reason. The fact seems mentioned as if for the purpose of cutting off those methods of making faith easier (and therefore less notable) in the dying man, and the grace of God necessarily, at the same time, less conspicuous also. We all are familiar with the saying, that "there was one such case, that none might despair; and there was but one, that none might presume." Let us rather say that here is a pattern case of salvation, outlined in the sharpest manner that could be imagined, and placed in the most conspicuous place that could be given to it. Without works, except bad works,—without sacrament or ritual of any kind,—by no slow process and by no conditional salvation,—this condemned malefactor is given at once the perfect assurance of a place that very day with his Lord in Paradise.*

Thus the answer of grace goes beyond even the boldness of such a prayer; and when indeed does not grace exceed all possible expectations? Who could have asked or thought that God would give His Son to die for sinners? and He who has done this, "how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?"

*For the efforts of materialistic annihilationists to break down the evidence, derived from this promise, of the consciousness of souls in the separate state, see "Facts and Theories of a Future State." Their arguments are briefly, that Paradise is in the new earth, and so not yet existent, although the apostle did not know but that he might have been bodily in it (2 Cor. xii. 3, 4). Then, as necessitated by this, that we ought to read, "I say to thee to-day;" or else "to-day" must mean "in the day of which you speak"!

3 (44-46): accomplishments.

3. And it was now *f*about the sixth hour; and there came a darkness over all the land until the ninth hour. And the sun was darkened. And the *g*veil of the temple was rent in the midst. And Jesus, when he had cried with a loud voice, said, Father, into thy hands I *h*commit my spirit. And when he had said this, he expired.

4 (47-49): Changes impending.

4. Now when the *i*centurion saw what took place, he glorified God, saying, In very deed this man was righteous. And all the multitudes that had come together to that sight, beholding what took place, returned, *j*smiting their breasts. And all his acquaintance stood afar off, and the women who followed him from Galilee, beholding these things.

5 (50-56): Intervention in divine government.

5. And behold, there was a man named *k*Joseph, who was a councillor, a good man and righteous: he had f Matt. 27. 45. Mk. 15. 33. cf. Ps. 22. 1 with 1 Jno. 1. 5.

g Matt. 27. 51. Mk. 15. 38. cf. Heb. 9. 3-8, 11, 12 with Heb. 10. 19-22.
h cf. 1 Pet. 2. 23. cf. Acts 7. 59.
i Matt. 27. 54. cf. Jno. 7. 45, 46.
j cf. Zech. 12. 10 with Rev. 1. 7.
k Matt. 27. 57-61. Mk. 15. 42-47; Jno. 19. 38-42; cf. Is. 53. 9.

How perfectly does all this suit the peace-offering Gospel! The mockery and insult call forth no response from the blessed Sufferer: He seems all unconscious of it. The need that sought Him, the faith that recognized under such disguise the Lord of glory, drew from the smitten Rock the living waters.

3. The record of divine accomplishment in that hour is told in the briefest way. The darkness that comes over the land is just mentioned, and traced to its cause, the darkening of the sun itself. There follows as connected with it the end of spiritual darkness. With the veil of the temple rent, the sanctuary is open, and God is in the light. This is the characteristic of Christianity, and the result of His entrance into that darkness of which the darkness of nature was but the external sign. Luke places the cause and effect together here, ignoring, as so often elsewhere, the order of time.

But with the cry of "Father," the darkness is ended: the cry of abandonment has been answered; the cup which alone He dreaded is drained (compare the notes on Matthew and Mark); He has but now in peace to depart. The death lying upon man has still to be taken for the perfecting of atonement: God must be owned in regard to the whole penalty on sin, and Matthew has shown us the resurrection of the saints as connected with this. For doctrinal statements of all that is involved here we must wait for the epistles; but here we have the work itself whose meaning they explain.

The word used in Luke for His dying is, as in Mark, "He expired"—"breathed out." It is the simple reality of death as man endures it, quite different from the terms used in Matthew and John. It is passive endurance; in the others activity of will, though in surrender. Here, as true Man, He dies like other men; committing His spirit to His Father, His work accomplished.

4. The faith of the Gentile centurion is recorded in a different form to that which it takes in the other Gospels: "he glorified God, saying, In very deed this Man was righteous." Righteous He is emphatically, not merely, as with others, in the comparative sense: this all that he has seen attests. Prompt and outspoken in his confession, the Gentile takes the first place now, as he has since done for many centuries. He is the first sign of the change impending.

But Luke shows us also a multitude of Jews returning heart-smitten from the spectacle of the cross. For Israel also there is hope in this precious death. We have learned also something of the significance of these ministering women who are seen waiting as the darkness lifts. Things are in transition: if the nation has rejected her King, God too is moving; His purposes in connection with His Son are not to be defeated.

5. The intervention of God is seen more evidently in the provision of a sepulcre suited for that incorruptible body: a sepulcre that has never seen corruption.

not consented to their counsel and deed. [He was] from Arimathea, a city of the Jews, one who waited for the kingdom of God. He went to Pilate, and asked for the body of Jesus. And having taken it down, he wrapped it in a linen robe, and laid him in a sepulcre that was hewn in rock, where 'none had ever yet lain. And it was the day of the preparation, and the sabbath drew on. And the ᵐwomen who had come with him from Galilee, following after, beheld the sepulcre, and how his body was laid. And they returned and prepared spices and ointments.

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chaps. xxiii. 56–xxiv.)

Resurrection and Ascension to Heaven.

1 (xxiii. 56–xxiv. 12): Alive!

1. AND on the sabbath-day they ⁿrested according to the commandment; but on the °first day of the week, at early dawn, they came unto the sepulcre, bringing the spices which they had prepared.* And they found the ᵖstone rolled away from the sepulcre;

*Some add, "and some others with them."

t cf. Acts 2. 24-31.
ctr. 2 Chro. 21. 1, etc.
cf. Rom. 6. 8, 9.
m ch. 8. 2, 3.
n Ex. 20. 8–11.
cf. Col. 2. 13–17.
o Matt. 28. 1, etc. Mk. 16. 1, etc. Jno. 20. 1, etc.
cf. 1 Cor. 15.
p cf. Jno. 11. 38, 39.
cf. Jno. 10. 18.

His grave appointed Him with wicked men, He is delivered from it, and is with the rich man after He has died. He is buried by a Joseph from Elkanah's and Samuel's city, Ha-Ramathaim, (or Arimathea,) the city of the "two heights": names which cannot but speak to us of the elevation which is to be His, and to which He is to lift His people, as the true Joseph in the advancement following His sufferings (See Sam. i., notes). In this connection the burial of Christ will have for us a deep significance, as the apostle shows us; but it would carry us too far now to speak of it.

The women still are here as watchers; and even though the new day has not shined upon them, they are heralds of it.

SUBD. 3.

The sorrow is past; the suffering is over; upon it all rises the glory of a serene and perfect day. The Lord risen, there is peace with God accomplished, acceptance in the Beloved; and with ascension, not only heaven opened, but (as another has said) "heaven furnished for us."

What strikes one especially in these resurrection scenes in Luke, as compared with the other Gospels, is the large place the word of God has in them. This is still, no doubt, the continuation of that Human Face which, as we have seen abundantly, the third Gospel presents to us. The word of God, as that by which in his true life man lives, (as He Himself affirms from Deuteronomy,) was that by which He walked and to which He ever appealed, which He honored and held up, whether before His own, or His enemies. In these last scenes it assumes peculiar prominence. In the journey to Emmaus it is that by which He leads the perplexed disciples to a firmer faith before He manifests Himself to them in the breaking of bread. Afterwards with the eleven He refers to what is written in the Law of Moses and in the Prophets and the Psalms concerning Himself, and opens their understanding to understand the Scriptures. His ascension is to be a new light over all, the basis of mysteries hidden in the Old Testament itself and which necessitate a new testimony afterwards to be committed to a fresh apostle sent forth from Christ in glory, and which is distinctively what he calls it in one place, "the gospel of the glory of Christ" (2 Cor. iv. 4, R. V.).

1. The light of the resurrection morning dawns with comparative slowness in Luke's Gospel. Even because it is the Gospel of peace, we are made to see all but entering in, they found not the body of the Lord Jesus. And it came to pass, while they were in perplexity about this, behold also, [q] two men stood by them in shining apparel. And as they were filled with fear, and bowed their faces to the ground, they said unto them, Why seek ye the [r] living one among the dead? He is not here, but is risen: remember how he [s] spake to you while he was still in Galilee, saying, The Son of man must be delivered up into the hands of sinful men, and be crucified, and on the third day rise again. And they [t] remembered his words, and returning from the sepulcre brought back the tidings to the eleven and to all the rest. Now it was Mary of Magdala, and Joanna, and Mary the mother of James, and the others with them, who told these things to the apostles. And their words appeared unto them as an idle tale, and they [u] disbelieved them. But [v] Peter rising up, ran unto the sepulcre; and, stooping down, he seeth the linen clothes lying there alone, and went away home, wondering at what had come to pass.

2 (13-35): Conflict, the ministry of the Word and communion.

2. And behold, [w] two of them were going that same day to a village called Emmaus, which was from Jerusalem sixty furlongs* off. And they conversed with one an-q cf. Acts 1. 10. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 12.

r cf. Rev. 1. 18. cf. Col. 3. 1.

s Mk. 9. 30-32.

t cf. Jno. 2. 22.

u ver. 25.

v cf. ch. 9. 20. ver. 34.

w cf. Mk. 16. 12, 13.

*Greek "stadia."

the exercise and perplexity about it, and have that upon which all peace rests established upon the surest foundations. Here at first we have but the announcement, "He is alive," carried to the apostles by those who had themselves been only taking their spices to the grave to complete His burial, and hide away for ever their best hopes!

The angels' announcement has in the very fact that it is by angels an air of distance in it, intensified by the reserve and reproof pervading the message. They do not even promise a meeting with Him: He is alive; had He not told them He would rise? why seek the living One among the dead? The women are perplexed and terrified; the apostles sceptical: these are tales, idle tales, bred in the minds of enthusiastic and visionary women: just the thought of a noted sceptic of these latter days. Peter runs, however, to the sepulcre: nothing is said of his companion, John, who will relate the visit in his own Gospel. He sees the linen clothes lying, their tenant gone, and departs, wondering.

2. We are now made to accompany two disciples, of whom we have heard nothing before and shall hear nothing again, and of whom we only know the name of one, Cleopas, upon a sorrowful walk to Emmaus, a village sixty furlongs outside Jerusalem. Their backs upon the city at such a time, and under the peculiar circumstances which they themselves relate, is surely significant. Perplexity and discouragement have taken hold of them; and in such a condition a backward course is inevitable.*

*There is something in the names that impresses us, though one may fail in giving them their proper application. Yet if we believe that every jot and tittle of the inspired Word have meaning, we cannot refuse to see significance in such points as these. Cleopas seems then to mean "All," or "every one," "a glory." The village to which he is going, if we accept the form that used to be given to the word, means "a despised people." Here is contrast, certainly, and one in agreement with a backward (and downward) course. It would remind us naturally of Israel according to the glory with which God in His promises has clothed her (see Rev. xii., the "woman clothed with the sun") and her condition, with Christ her glory renounced. The unbelief of the disciples tended to identify them with this lapsed condition, though divine love was about to recall them—could not possibly leave them to a path like this. But this is only a suggestion as to the meaning.

other about all these things that had taken place. And it came to pass as they conversed and questioned, that Jesus himself drew near and went with them. But their [x]eyes were holden that they did not know him. And he said unto them, What things are these that ye confer about as ye walk, and are downcast? And one of them, named Cleopas, answered and said to him, Dost thou alone sojourn in Jerusalem, and knowest not the things that are come to pass there in these days? And he said unto them, What things? And they said to him, Concerning Jesus the Nazarene, who was a [y]prophet mighty in word and deed before God and all the people; and how the chief priests and our rulers delivered him up to the sentence of death, and crucified him. But we trusted that it was he who is going to redeem Israel. But besides all these things, it is going on the third day since these things took place. And withal, certain [z]women from among us astonished us, having been very early at the sepulcre, and not finding his body, they came saying that they had also seen a vision of angels, who say that he is alive. And some of those with us went to the sepulcre, and found it even so as the women said; but him they saw not. And he said to them, O senseless and slow of heart to believe all that the [a]prophets have spoken; was it not needful that the Christ should [b]suffer these things, and enter into his glory? And beginning from Moses and all the prophets, he interpreted to them in all the scriptures the things concerning [c]himself. And they drew near to the village whither they were going, and he made as though he would go further. And they [d]constrained him, saying, Abide with us; for it is towards evening, and the day is now far spent: and he went in to abide with them. And it came to pass, as he was at table with them, he [e]took the bread, and blessed it, and having broken it he gave it to them. And their [f]eyes were x cf. Jno.20. 14, 15. cf. Jno.21.4. *ctr.*2 Cor.3. 18.

y cf. ch.9.19. cf. Matt.21. 11.

z vers. 1-11.

a cf. Acts 3. 24.

b cf. 1 Pet.1. 10-12. cf. Heb.2.9, 10.

c cf. Rev.19. 10. cf. Rom.1.3.

d cf. Gen.18. 1-8. cf. Jno. 14. 23.

e cf. ch.9.16. cf. ch.22.19.

f cf. Ps. 119. 18. cf. Gal.1.16. cf. 1Jno.3.2.

While, then, they were on the road discussing the events that had happened, "Jesus Himself drew near and went with them." It is a sign of their condition that "their eyes were holden, that they did not know Him." In answer to His inquiries, the whole thing comes out, and "we trusted that it had been He who is going to redeem Israel" tells the tale of doubt and trouble. Yet they have heard the women's story of His being alive, and of Peter's visit to the sepulcre. What to think they know not.

Then, with a reproof for their unbelief, He begins to unfold the long prophetic burden of the ages past, through Moses and all the prophets following: their hearts burning within them as faith is rekindled at the sacred fire. They reach the village while He is reciting; and there they stay the wondrous Stranger from passing on, as He appears ready to do. Constrained by their solicitude, He enters the house to abide with them. There, in the breaking of bread He is revealed to them at last.

It is striking the character of all this: the first announcement made to women; here, before the apostles, two simple disciples are taken up to be ministered to, and with painstaking earnestness to bring them back to simplicity of faith. When opened, and they knew him; and he vanished from them. And they said one to another, Did not our heart [g]burn within us, as he spake unto us in the way, and as he opened to us the scriptures? And rising up that same hour, they returned to Jerusalem, and found the eleven gathered together, and those with them, saying, In very deed the Lord is risen, and hath [h]appeared to Simon. And they related the things [that had taken place] upon the way, and how he was known by them in the breaking of bread.

g cf. 1 Pet. 1. 8. cf. Jno. 20. 29-31.

h 1 Cor. 15. 5.

3 (36-53): Into the Sanctuary

1 (36-43): Himself.

3. [1] And as they spake these things, he himself [i]stood in the midst of them, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you. But they, being excited and possessed with fear, supposed that they beheld a spirit. And he said unto them, Why are ye troubled? and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? Behold my [j]hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me and see; for a [k]spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me to have. And when he had said this, he showed them his hands and his feet. And while they believed not still for joy, and wondered, he said unto them, Have ye here anything to [l]eat? And they gave him part of a broiled fish [and of a honeycomb].* And he took it and ate before them.

i cf. Jno. 20. 19, 20. cf. Mk. 16. 14.

j cf. 1 Jno. 1. 1. cf. Zech. 13. 6.

k cf. 1 Cor. 15. 20. cf. Phil. 3. 21.

l cf. Acts 10. 40, 41. cf. Gen. 18. 8.

2 (44-49) the Word in witness.

[2] And he said unto them, These are my words which I spake unto you while I was yet with you, that all things must needs be [m]fulfilled that are written in the law of Moses, and the prophets, and the psalms, con-

m cf. Acts 13. 27, 29. cf. Acts 17. 3.

*Some omit.

they come back to Jerusalem, they find that He has appeared unto Simon; and we realize that here there is more pastoral work of the same tender sort. This appearing, however, is not given us anywhere at large, as we might have expected. They meet, as it were in secret, the Lord and His failed disciple, before He meets them together, Peter and the rest of the eleven. The tender style of all this, how like the Lord it is! How unofficial, too. It is plain that this is One who is going to be Himself the Shepherd of every individual soul of His, and not put them into the hands of some ecclesiastical go-between. It is, "One is your Teacher, even Christ; and all ye are brethren." Scripture is used, and they are built up with it: no miracles take the place of it: we hear again the Voice that said, "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead."

3. [1] But the time is now come for fuller manifestation; and we see Him presently in the midst of the gathering of His people, inviting them to assure themselves fully of the reality of what they behold. With the doors shut, as John expressly tells us, His appearance in the midst impresses itself upon them as that of His bodiless spirit rather than the reappearance of the One they knew so well as He had lived and moved among them. In the tenderest way He invites them to make proof of His being in the body, to look at and handle Him, with the very wounds He had received still upon Him. When even yet, because of the greatness of the joy, they cannot realize it, he takes of the food they give Him and eats before them. It is the blessed fact and its full certification to those who are to be His witness that are put before us in Luke, and not yet the doctrines in connection with it, which are to be given us elsewhere.

[2] The Word is again appealed to, and His solemn testimony given to the written Word as it existed in His day, His sufferings and resurrection being a special cerning me. Then [n]opened he their mind to understand the scriptures; and he said unto them, Thus it is written, [and thus it was needful]* that the Christ should [o]suffer, and [p]rise from among the dead the third day; and that [q]repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name unto all the nations, beginning at Jerusalem. Ye are [r]witnesses of these things. And behold, I send forth the [s]promise of my Father upon you; but do ye remain in the city [of Jerusalem]† [t]until ye be clothed with power from on high.

3 (50-53): Christ in heaven.

[3] And he led them out as far as [u]Bethany; and lifting up his hands, he [v]blessed them. And it came to pass, as he blessed them, that he was separated from them and [w]carried up into heaven.

And they [x]worshiped him, and returned to Jerusalem with great [y]joy, and were continually in the [z]temple, praising and blessing God.

* The weight of authority seems to be against these words.
† These words are doubtful.

n cf. Acts 16. 14. cf. Jno. 16. 13.
o cf. Is. 53. cf. Ps. 22.
p cf. Ps. 16. 8-11. cf. Ps. 17. 15.
q Acts 2. 38. Acts 20. 21.
r cf. Acts 1. 21, 22. cf. Acts 2. 32. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 4-9.
s Jno. 14. 16, 17. Acts 1. 8.
t Acts 1. 4, 14 with Acts 2. 1-4.
u Jno. 12. 1.
v cf. Jno. 20. 19.
w Mk. 16. 19, 20. cf. Eph. 4. 10.
x cf. Rev. 5. 8-14; cf. Heb. 1. 6.
y ctr. ver. 17; cf. 1 Pet. 1. 8.
z Acts 2. 46, etc.; cf. Heb. 13. 10-16.

part of this prophetic witness. Repentance and remission of sins are to be preached to all nations in the name of the Risen One; Jerusalem, guilty above all, to be first addressed. Thus Luke maintains its character to the end. Nothing is said of miraculous attestation, nor of baptism: the gospel is left in its own sufficiency. But they, its witnesses, are to be clothed with the power of the Spirit, the promise of the Father, sent by Himself: a step in advance of both Matthew and Mark, and in the line of the Acts and Paul.

[3] The gospel is to be first addressed to Jerusalem, but He does not ascend from thence, but from Bethany. "From thence He had set out to present Himself as King to Jerusalem. It was there that the resurrection of Lazarus had taken place; there that the family which present the character of the remnant—attached to His Person, now rejected, with better hopes—in the most striking manner received Jesus. It was thither He retired when His testimony to the Jews was ended; that His heart might rest for a few moments among those He loved; who, through grace, loved Him. It was there that He established the link (as to circumstances) between the remnant attached to His Person and heaven. From thence He ascends." (Synopsis.)

He ascends with His hands stretched out in blessing, to take that place before God in which He abides, the Representative of His people, the Head of blessing for them. While Israel and the earth wait for His return to find what the Old Testament has pledged in their behalf, His place in heaven is the sign of a new order of blessing which the "mysteries" of Christianity are to take up and unfold to us. Luke is here again the precursor of Paul; while John has first his own glories to display, which, while seen on earth, are essentially of heaven; and at last will unite heaven and earth together, as surely as He in whom we recognize them unites already in His Person, in one indissoluble perfection, God with Man.

SCOPE AND DIVISIONS OF JOHN.

JOHN, as the final Gospel, is that which above all displays the glory of the Person of Christ as the Divine Word tabernacling in flesh, the Only-begotten Son of the Father. In it, therefore, as in suited connection with this, is seen the divine work in man in its full reality. The results of the previous Gospels are brought forward, and as tested by Christ in it, the Cross has shown the world to be at enmity with God. Man is but flesh, and must be born again to see the Kingdom of God. He is dead Godward, and Christ is here the Eternal Life, the Light of men; and communicating life that they may receive the revelation. Eternal Life is thus the central truth of the book, and in connection with it the Spirit of God is seen as Communicator and Perfecter of it. The whole Triune Godhead is thus displayed in the activity of divine grace towards men. Thus John is also necessarily and pre-eminently, the apostle of love: for God in the activity of His nature is Love.

The aspect of the Lord's work in atonement is that of the burnt-offering; the sweet savor of perfect obedience under the full stress of trial: the fire of sacrifice bringing out nothing else but this.

The development of these truths in the Gospel is such as needs little introduction; John being so much more doctrinal than historical, for the most part a collection of discourses, the subject of each strongly marked, and making the divisions very clear and simple. As in the two preceding Gospels, the main divisions are three:—

1. (Chaps. i.–ii. 22): The eternal life in Christ its Source, the Only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.
2. (Chaps. ii. 23–xvii.): Eternal life as communicated and dependent.
3. (Chaps. xviii.–xxi): The perfected offering, and Life in the Risen One.

NOTES.

Div. 1.

The first division gives us eternal life in the Person of the Word become flesh; carrying us back to eternity to behold His glory before any creature existed, and to show us in Him the Creator of all. In relation to the Father He reveals in manhood the glory of the Eternal, Only-begotten Son; and in Him God, hidden under law, is fully revealed in grace and truth. But this implies also the communication of eternal life to men, that, born of God, and having title to the place of children, they may be able to receive the revelation.

Faith utters its voice in His herald John, proclaiming His glory as the Eternal: for sinners, the Lamb of sacrifice; for saints, baptizing with the Holy Spirit. And now begins the drawing unto Him as such: first we see those who learn from Him where He abides and abide with Him,—characteristically, a heavenly company; then Nathanael, coming to Him as the One of whom Moses and the prophets wrote, owns Him as the Son of God and King of Israel: characteristic of an Israelitish, earthly one. We then see how He waits for the divinely appointed hour for Israel's blessing, when once their purification is more than a hollow form. And lastly, the evil which has hindered God dwelling in His house on earth, is purged out, so that He may return. Through all it is Christ who, as the expression of the mind and will of God (the Word), acts for Him, giving Him at last His rest for ever.

Subd. 1.

The Life as the Light of men is the theme of the first subdivision; the Word made flesh its full and glorious display. Creation as His work is a revelation also; but darkness having come in with sin, it is no longer a sufficient one. Hence the Word Himself enters the creation He has made, and God is manifest in a new glory among men.

But man is not naturally a seeker after God, unhappy only in not having found Him. No: he has turned his back upon Him, and must be born again, and that not of his own will, in order that he may receive the glorious revelation. The communication of eternal life in this is not openly declared as yet; but those who are born of God have now the title to become His children.

1. John begins "in the beginning." There is no article; and the indefinite form, as the whole connection shows, here carries us back to the most remote that can be imagined. Whenever anything else began, then "the Word was," —not "began." The Word had no beginning.

By the fact of this eternity of existence He is necessarily God: God only is the "Eternal;" but the apostle will not leave us to such an inference: "the Word was with God," he says, "and the Word was God,"—a distinct Person in the unity of the Godhead.

"With God" here is literally "toward God"; and this affirms, along with distinctness of Person, the adherence of regard and affection to Him of this Being whose designation as "the Word" points Him out as giving expression to the mind of God. And this Personality and relationship are eternal likewise: the Word is not a development from God, even though a pre-creation one: for "He was in the beginning with God."

Thus a glimpse is permitted us into what is involved in a plurality of Persons in the Godhead. "God is love:" and are we to think of Him before creation as dwelling in a blank and utter solitude, alone, with no outflow for His love? no object towards which it could flow out? even now with no sufficient object worthy of Himself? And He, the Father, was He no Father then? and have His creatures alone given Him the reality of such a title? Nay, there was in the Godhead as such, as this passage already shows, an activity, a reception, an intercommunion of love: "the Word was with God," toward God. The Only-

JOHN.

DIVISION 1. (Chaps. i.–ii. 22.)

The Eternal Life in Christ, its Source, the Only-begotten of the Father, full of Grace and Truth.

SUBDIVISION 1. (Chap. i. 1–18.)

The Life the Light.

1 (1-4): The Creator, and the Light in its Source.

1. IN [the] [a]beginning was the [b]Word; and the Word was [c]with God; and the Word was [d]God.* He† was in [the] beginning with God. All things a Gen. 1. 1. cf. Col. 1. 17. cf. Ps. 90. 2. b cf. Rev. 19. 13. cf. ver. 18.

c ch. 17. 5. cf. prov. 8. 22-31.
d cf. ch. 20. 28. cf. 1 Tim. 3. 16. cf. Heb. 1. 8.

*The order of words in this last clause is in the original inverted, doubtless for additional emphasis:—"and God was the Word."
† "This One," (Gk.).

begotten Son was then in the bosom of the Father. That "bosom of the Father" is not a development, but a glorious, everlasting reality.

Now we are given to see in the Word the actual Creator. "All things came into being through Him"; and again the apostle is emphatic as to this: not even a single thing must be excepted, that ever came into being.

We can easily recognize something of the significance of such a statement; but do we recognize how far it will lead us? If the Word be, as should be plain, the One who utters out the mind of God, does this merely show us that creation is the embodiment of that mind? that God willed, and the Word performed? Or does it not, at least, prepare us to believe that creation as His work would be a revelation of His character, His thoughts and purposes? This latter is the only sufficient and worthy reason for the emphasis laid upon the fact that the Word was the Creator. The action of the Word, then, was the speech of God: who, if He speak, speaks not simply because He will, but because He has something to communicate. What is it He has to speak of—He who surely cannot speak an idle word? If we can trust such thoughts, how far will they carry us? far beyond the point at which "natural theology," so-called, leaves us. It will be a little thing then to find that it shows, as any manufactured article might do, that some Being made it,—by the marks of design in it that it had a Designer. Nay, we shall realize it as that which,—written as a universal language which has never suffered from the judgment of Babel—God has used to utter His parables of divine wisdom in every attentive ear. True, they are parables, and need care to interpret them,—need diligence of heart to use the care; but so would lead into the most fruitful exercise of heart and conscience, if by them we sought believingly to draw near to God.

How naturally upon every theme whatever, the Lord's teaching fell into this form of parable, making the world vocal with divine monition and heavenly comfort! How naturally these analogies of spheres so different appeal to reason itself with the force of demonstration! How readily the Teacher above all teachers expects His disciples to apprehend such lessons, as if the key to all this symbolism were in their hands! "Know ye not this parable? and how then will ye know all parables?" From Genesis to Revelation all Scripture teems with them: surely not applications of mere casual resemblances, but rather, real utterances of the Voice that speaks in them; and with which, if we are not familiar, it is to our shame that we are not.

But indeed, while in one of God's two Books we own Christ to be the theme, the book of nature speaks to most, it is to be feared, as if there were no Christ in it; though "by Him and for Him were all things created."

And how thankful we have reason to be for this symbolical character of nature came into being [e]through him; and without him not one thing came into being which hath come into being. In him was [f]life; and the life was the [g]light of men.

[e] Heb. 1. 10. Col. 1. 16. 1 Cor. 8. 6.
[f] cf. ch. 5. 26. cf. 1 Jno. 1. 2.
[g] ch. 8. 12; ch. 12. 35, 36, 46.

when we consider that from this lower sphere all our words for the higher are derived. Were the one not really (and therefore divinely) adapted to the other, how surely would this lead us astray! On the other hand to take them frankly as thus fitted to one another, how great a help should it be in the interpretation of spiritual things. But it must be confessed we are little practised in such explorations as this implies; even though Scripture and nature be allowed to be God's two witnesses; which should agree and confirm each other in their witness therefore.

We proceed now to the spiritual sphere, what was in the Word, not made by Him: for "in Him was Life, and the Life was the light of men." Many indeed take life here in the most comprehensive way, "the Word being the Source of all life to the creature," but the latter clause of the verse, it is admitted, can only refer to spiritual life. And how could this be classed with that of plant or beast, for instance? or said to be in Him? He is the Author of it: in that sense, the Source, though it be not exactly the right word for it. Life in Him, the Eternal, is surely eternal life; and having shown sufficiently for his purpose here the relation of the Word to creation generally, John at once proceeds to his grand subject. Only the eternal life could be the light of men.

A real definition of life it is generally confessed we have not. It belongs, indeed, to those essential mysteries in which so much of our knowledge is rooted. Of natural life we can only gather from its phenomena certain general ideas, which still ought to help us, if the natural and spiritual are in such close correspondence as we have claimed for them. What then can we learn phenomenally of natural life?

Life, as we read it in nature, is a spring of ordered activity which controls and manifests itself in the inanimate to which it has communicated itself. The dead material is taken up by it, assimilated, and formed into living tissue, and then into organs which work under the control of a common plan and purpose. Take the plant for example, in which you have the life force simply, without the presence of soul or spirit to perplex the results. Here then the stamp of mind is put upon that in which mind is not. It is the witness of a Mind beyond itself which works through and controls it everywhere in harmonious obedience.

Life is thus naturally self-communicative, propagates itself, proceeds from nothing else but life. This is conceded by science to-day, as far as science can speak in such a matter. It is a thing not manufactured nor evolved, not working up from below, not the product of dead matter, but an imperial power ruling this, even while freely yielding itself to it, permeating and so lifting it into a higher sphere, according to the constant law of progress disclosed by the world as a divine product.

But life in nature is haunted by its shadow, death; life in the Word is a Life eternal, "that eternal life," says the epistle, "which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us." And how manifested? As life is always here, by self-communication to a lower nature, which could receive its impress and thus display a character beyond its own. "The Word became flesh, and tabernacled among us; and we beheld His glory: glory as of an Only-begotten with the Father, full of grace and truth." The mind and purposes of God were manifested in a humanity perfectly attuned to harmonious obedience to that will of God which was the one motive of His being in the world. Thus the Life was the light of men: the glory of Godhead was seen in perfect human righteousness: "As long as I am in the world," He says, "I am the light of the world." The Life is but the activity of His nature, (which is the divine nature,) which has taken up manhood in Him, to reveal itself thus, communicative and imperial.

2 (5-11): The conflict between light and darkness.

2. And the light shineth in [h]darkness, and the darkness [i]apprehended it not. There was a man [j]sent from God, whose name was John. He came for a witness, that he might bear witness concerning the light, that all might believe through him. He was [k]not the light, but to bear witness concerning the light. The true light was that which, coming* into the world, [l]lighteth every man. He was in the world, and the world came into being through him, and the world [m]knew him not. He came unto his [n]own, and his own received him not.

*R. V. connects this clause with "every man;" there is nothing in the text to forbid either rendering.

[h] cf. Eph. 5. 8-13. cf. ch. 3. 19.
[i] cf. 1 Cor. 2. 14. cf. ch. 8. 43.
[j] ver. 33. Mal. 3. 1.
[k] ver. 20. cf. ch. 5. 35.
[l] ch. 9. 5.
[m] ver. 5. cf. 1 Cor. 2. 8.
[n] cf. Matt. 21. 33-39. cf. Ex. 4. 22.

2. But the next thing we hear of is darkness, and a darkness which the light as such cannot banish. It shines in it, but is not realized. This is the nature of spiritual darkness, which is not a mere absence of light, but in opposition to it. God is light; but man has his back upon God, and walks in his own shadow. He has not faith in God, and as he learned to distrust Him even in Eden, much more as out of Eden and under the consequences of his sin, which he puts to the discredit of his Maker. Thus everything is distorted, for God is the reason of all things, and if He be unknown, all things fall into confusion. Then we must do what we can for ourselves; self is all that is left us to believe in; a self which has lost all but the wreck of the image of God in which man was created.

Over all another shadow broods, of one "a liar from the beginning," and who has persuaded men to believe his lie. Under him darkness becomes a kingdom, and the power by which he reigns: "the god of this world blinds the minds of them that believe not, lest the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them" (2 Cor. iv. 4).

In such a world was this glory now to be displayed. The inspired writer filled with his theme, does not pause to speak of how or how far in former times the light had shone for men: everything seems but contrast to the present revelation; which yet—such the world was—God cannot leave without calling special attention to it. Men must be roused to behold it, and by the voice of one nearer to them, as more upon their level, more intelligible to them, as echoing the voice of conscience in their hearts. Such indeed was the "man sent from God, whose name was John." But he is not yet heard in his testimony, as he will be presently. Simply the fact is given: God sent him, a witness to bear witness concerning the truth, that all might believe through him. What an assurance of a world far away from God, that the Light must have one to proclaim it, the Creator must have one to introduce Him into His own world; and then it is necessary to say, 'He was not that light," lest men should mistake the witness to Christ for the Christ he witnessed to!

The characteristic of the real light is given, that it is not local, but for all. Sunlike, men cannot hold it in Judea simply. The Baptist was "a burning and a shining light;" but not the day-Luminary, filling heaven and earth with splendor. This universal character, reprobated in its full reality by the narrow Jew, the Evangelist shows in its true glory. Did God create the Jew only? Thus "the world" is one of the prominent words in this Gospel: "God so loved," not Israel merely, but "the world." Zion on her hill-top might catch the first rays of the dawn: let her golden orb rise higher, and it will reach lower too.

Men are equalized after another fashion, and which will make needful either equal judgment or fullest grace. The Light finds everywhere darkness; and darkness which yields not to the Light as light. "He was in the world, and the world was made by Him, and the world knew Him not." Falsehood knows not truth, nor hatred love. But more: Israel had been specially prepared by centuries of special dealing for this very time; her own King, Messiah, Deliverer, 3 (12-18): The glory of the Word tabernacling in flesh revealed to men receiving out of His fulness.

3. But as many as [o]received him, to them he gave authority to become children of God,—to those believing on his name: who were [p]born, not of [q]blood, nor of the [r]will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.

o 1 Jno. 5. 1. cf. Gal. 3. 26. p cf. ch. 3. 3-7. q cf. 1 Pet. 1. 23. r cf. ch. 6. 63; cf. Rom. 8. 8.

at last had come to her, to fulfil all her promises: "He came unto His own, and His own received Him not." The education of a race, and in the divine school, failed; and failed in the very thing which all was designed for.

3. The purpose of God cannot be defeated. The need which it had to meet is now fully declared. Claim there can be none on man's part. Israel is but as the Gentile, save that, with higher privilege, her guilt is greater. The Gospel of John begins where the other Gospels end, and with the Cross as the full revelation of man's condition, as it has never before been revealed: for, if under the law the mind of the flesh is shown hopelessly insubject to the law of God, now it is seen to be "enmity against God." But thus there must be not only a work done for man, such as the other Gospels have fully declared, but also a divine work done in him, which John alone presents in its entirety. He alone speaks of the new birth, quickening, eternal life as a present possession in the soul, as well as of the gift of the Spirit, which gives it its full and "abundant" character. With him, first, the children of God by faith are recognized in their place as such, and the Lord in resurrection sends the message of His coming ascension to His "brethren."

We have now already the new birth and the new place announced, in which the will of God rises above the opposition of His fallen creature, and displays itself in a grace which draws near to Him the objects of His unsought love. "To as many as received Him, to them He gave authority to become children of God,—to those believing in His Name." This is, of course, the distinguishing mark of these, that in opposition to His own people Israel, who did not receive Christ, they received Him, thus distinguishing their faith from a mere conviction of the mind. Their belief was such as made them desire and accept Him. His Name—Jesus, the Saviour—becoming the discovery of One who met their divinely awakened need. To these He gave authority to take a place never before possessed by men in the reality of what is involved in it, as children of God by birth and nature. The sonship of the Old Testament was not founded upon this, and carried with it no assurance of salvation nor of spiritual life. God was a Father to Israel, who was thus His "son," His "first-born" (Ex. iv. 2; Jer. xxxi. 9). In the passage in Jeremiah it is "Ephraim is My first-born." In Mal. i. 6 He asks, "If I be a Father, where is Mine honor?" In chap. ii. 10, the sense in which He is called so is seen: "Have we not all one Father? has not one God created us?" And similarly in Isa. lxiv. 8, we have the appeal to Him: "But now, O Lord, Thou art our Father: we are the clay and Thou our potter, and we all are the work of Thy hand." In the preceding chapter (lxiii. 16) they cry, "Thou art our Father, our Redeemer" (Goel, "Kinsman-Redeemer"); but it is power that they seek to come in for them, as in Egypt. In all these cases, which are all that are in the prophets, the fatherly relationship, though assumed towards Israel in a special way, is founded upon creation.

With this title of first-born, therefore, which is given to Israel, is associated the thought of supremacy upon earth; and in the eighty-ninth psalm it is given to Messiah in the same way: "He shall cry unto Me, Thou art my Father. . . . Also I will make him My first-born, higher than the kings of the earth" (vers. 26, 27).

In both Psalms and Proverbs, God is compared to a father, and here the tenderest thoughts are expressed: "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him" (Ps. ciii. 13). But here too, what we are by creation immediately comes in: "For He knoweth our frame; He remembereth that we are dust." Again in Proverbs (iii. 11, 12), we find what the apostle has quoted in the epistle to the Hebrews; "My son, despise not thou the chas-

And the Word [s]became flesh, and [t]tabernacled among us; and we beheld his [u]glory, the glory as of an [v]Only-begotten with the Father, full of [w]grace and truth.

s cf. ch. 6. 33, 42. cf. 2 Cor. 8. 9. cf. Phil. 2. 6-8; cf. Heb. 10. 5; cf. Lk. 1. 35. t cf. Ex. 25. 8, etc. with Matt. 1. 23. u cf. ch. 2. 11; cf. Matt. 3. 17. v ch. 3. 16; cf. Rom. 8. 29. w ver. 17; cf. 2 Cor. 5. 19.

tening of the Lord; neither be weary of His correction: for whom the Lord loveth He correcteth, even as a father the son in whom he delighteth."

Conversely, the angels are sons of God (Job i. 6; ii. 1; xxxviii. 7), most clearly in the same creative way, and as Paul quotes to the Athenians from one of the Greek poets that "we are His offspring" (Acts xvii. 28). God is thus the "Father of spirits" (Heb. xii. 9), and the possession of a spiritual nature constitutes that image of God in which we are created; though, if man does not answer to the relationship, that relation cannot be acknowledged. Thus the Lord could say to the unbelieving Jews. "If God were your Father, ye would love Me . . . ye are of your father the devil" (John viii. 42, 44)—men such as the devil, and not God, had made them.

This is the Old Testament idea of children, which reaches out after the New Testament idea, but without being able to attain the blessedness of this, founded as it is upon a new creation, a new life and nature, where no fall can again mar what the sovereign grace of God has accomplished. Children of God there were, of course, from the beginning; but now for the first time they are given to take the place of children, owned as such because they have so believed on Christ's name as to have received Him. What underlies this and justifies it is that they are the subjects of a true divine work. They are born again, not of blood—the way of natural birth; not of the will of the flesh,—man in his fallen condition; nor of the will of man—even when renewed; but of God, and God only.

Now the glory of the Light can be seen, the glory of the antitypical tabernacle, to which that of old pointed. Wisdom's delights were of old with the children of men; when Christ was born, the angels celebrated it; but it is John, the disciple whom Jesus loved, who lay on His breast, and gathered there the full intelligence of his position, who has revealed to us this new manifestation. "The Word became flesh," he says, "and tabernacled among us; and we beheld His glory; the glory as of an Only-begotten with the Father, full of grace and truth."

God had from the beginning visited His people. With a redeemed people, though it were only the shadow of the later redemption, the witness of what was in His heart was given, and the Pillar of Cloud and Fire became the Leader of His people from the border of Egypt into the land. But all this only prepared the way for the full reality which now appeared: the Word, the personal Wisdom of God, became flesh. An expression is used which most completely declares the reality of manhood into which He entered. It was not some docetic form of it, but the verity of that which we know as such, and which most implies the weakness of the creature. And that He became flesh imports this manhood, not as something outside of or other than His true Self, but assumed into it. While yet this was not, nor could be, transmuted Deity, but the Tabernacle of Deity: the divine and human not being confused together, but united; the Word tabernacling among us by becoming flesh. The Glory beheld was of an Only-begotten with the Father: One in whom the divine nature was, not as what might be in some true sense communicable to the creature, but in a way unique, peculiar to Himself; not derived, therefore, from the Manhood He assumed, but His relationship in the Godhead; "with the Father" implying that communion in the Godhead, the necessary result of this.

The Glory was not hidden, as of old, but beheld—by those that had eyes for it. That which was even necessary goodness under the law, the barrier that kept men from intruding where they could not stand, ceased to be any longer: it was now in grace that God was revealed; grace which did not moreover hide the truth, but prepared the soul for its reception and endeared it evermore.

John beareth witness of him and hath cried, saying, This is he of whom I said, He that [z]cometh after me is come to be before me: for he was before* me. And † of his [y]fulness have we all received, and grace upon grace. For the [z]law was given through Moses; grace and truth came to be through Jesus Christ. No one hath [a]seen God at any time: the Only-begotten Son, who is in the [b]bosom of the Father, he hath declared him.

x ver. 30.
y cf. Col. 1. 19. cf. Col. 2. 3, 9, 10.
z Ex. 20. 1, etc. cf. Gal. 3. 19. cf. Rom. 10. 4-10.
a Ex. 33. 20. cf. 1 Tim. 6. 16. cf. Col. 1. 15.
b cf. Prov. 8. 30. cf. ch. 14. 31. cf. Col. 2. 2.

* Literally, "first," or "chief."
† Most of the earliest MSS. have "for"; but the earliest versions seem to balance this.

The aspect of the truth was invitation, not repulsion; it preached of life and not of death.

The witness of John to the deity of Christ is appended to this. Strictly it is to His pre-existence; but the one involves the other. No angel could leave the sphere in which God created him, and the Arian view of Christ's Person has no countenance in the Old Testament. So fully is this the case that in his first epistle John can say "come in flesh" as equivalent to declaring the divine-human Person. "He that cometh after me," says the Baptist, "has come to be before me:" He has come into a greater place. And no wonder! "for He was before me." And there, as it seems, the voice of the Church, by the lips of the evangelist, breaks in.* "And out of His fulness have we all received, and grace upon grace." It was grace that even at the second giving of the law could reveal along with this "the Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin." But still that left the law, nay, even the more made it a "ministration of death" for man, as showing the awful reality of his condition. As long as man stands on the footing of his own responsibility before God, his state is hopeless; only Christ before God for him can suffice. And this alone is "grace upon grace," that which we receive from Him,—grace that is all grace, without mixture or limit.

Accordingly, the law is put in contrast with this: "the law was given through Moses;" the second tables were written, not by the "finger of God," but by the mediator's hand. But the mediator himself could not behold face to face the glory of the Lord,—could see nothing but His "back parts:" could not see God and live. Still it remains, therefore, spite of all that was declared to him, that "no one hath seen God at any time." But the Only-begotten Son hath not only seen Him: as the Son of His love, in the Father's bosom, He hath declared Him—told Him out. Thus "grace and truth came to be" for us "through Jesus Christ." It is a grace which is identified with truth, as the singular verb joined to the two nominatives shows. It is not, as when the law was given, grace based upon a supposed condition in man,—a condition found not to exist. This caused the inadequacy of law, with whatever limitation: man must be depended on in some way: but in fact, "wherein is he to be accounted of?" The law is helpless, therefore; while the fulness of grace in Christ supposes nothing in man, except a most real need to be met out of this fulness. Here, if there were failure, it would be Christ who failed; and that is impossible. Grace and truth exist together for us now in Christ; and God in righteousness and love is told out fully in the One Mediator, who in Person and work brings God and man together.

SUBD. 2.

The first eighteen verses are, in fact, the witness of God as to Christ—a revelation. Who could know of the Word in eternity, the Creator; or of the Only-

* There is a similar out-burst in praise and testimony at the commencement of another book of John, Revelation (i. 5-7).

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chap. i. 19–34.)

The witness of faith.

1 (19-28): The Forerunner: himself the testimony.

1. AND this is the witness of John, when the Jews [c]sent priests and Levites from Jerusalem, to ask him, Who art thou? And he confessed, and denied not; and he confessed, I am [d]not the Christ. And they asked him, What then? Art thou [e]Elias? And he saith, I am not. Art thou the [f]prophet? And he answered, No. They said to him therefore, Who art thou? that we may give answer to those who sent us: what sayest thou of thyself? He said, I am the [g]voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of [the] Lord, as said the prophet Esaias. And they

c ch. 5. 33.
d cf. Lk. 3. 15-17, ch. 3.28, 30.
e cf. Matt. 17. 10-12. cf. Matt. 11. 14.
f cf. Deut. 18. 15-19. Acts 3. 22, 23.
g Matt. 3. 3. Is. 40. 3. cf. 2 Cor. 13. 3.

begotten Son in the Father's bosom, or of the Word incarnate, except by revelation? But now man is given his place, and allowed to tell his story from his own side,—to show how he has come to rejoice in Christ; and we are called now to listen to the Baptist in this character of witness to his Lord.

1. It is a blessed testimony, and shows us, as the other Gospels scarcely do, the bright side of what elsewhere seems a life so shadowed. But in them we see him rather in his witness to the nation—which is, of course, a witness about Christ too; but more in His relation also to the nation and where their present state spoke sadly of what was to be the outcome of his presentation to them. With Pharisees and Sadducees coming out in their hollow fashion to his baptism of repentance, a vipers' brood, as he calls them, his testimony is largely a warning of coming judgment. The axe is already at the root of the trees, and they must not plead their being children of Abraham as exemption from the wrath at hand. He who comes is going to purge His floor and gather (it is true) His wheat into the garner; but the chaff He will burn up with unquenchable fire. Corresponding to all this is the figure of the preacher in the wilderness, his leathern girdle fastened round his garment of hair. Of this aspect of John's ministry we find here little indeed: for here he is not standing in the presence of the people, but in Another Presence of which he is come to speak. He is standing in the glory of that Light which is in the world, and he is transfigured by it. The austerity has passed out of manner and form, and become the tender abstraction of the worshiper. They come after him, attracted by what they more readily understand, priests and Levites from Jerusalem, seeking the man able thus to stand alone, while with his words he bows the multitudes before him; they find one bowing himself in abasement deeper than that of his stricken hearers. Only not in the shadow, but in the light; not in the alarm of an awakened conscience, but in the joy of a heart that has found its rest in faith.

They came to ask him, "Who art thou?" "And he confessed, and denied not," says the exultant Spirit; "and he confessed, I am not the Christ." Was it not, after all, but a small thing to say that? Yes; but it was the manner of his saying it, unasked, as one who knew in his soul that Christ whom men needed, so as to need nothing else. What did it matter what he himself was, when he and they (but in how different fashion) were standing in the presence of His glory; and they ignorant of it? But they go on: "What then? art thou Elias?" And he saith, "I am not." "Art thou that prophet?"—the Prophet of whom Moses had spoken, and whom they did not know to be Christ also; and he answered, "No;"—shorter and shorter, as one who would be quit of it; but they will not leave it there. "They said to him, therefore, Who art thou? that we may give an answer to them that sent us: what sayest thou of thyself? He said, I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord"—of Jehovah—"as said the prophet Esaias."

had been sent from the Pharisees; and they asked him, and said unto him, [h] Why baptizest thou then, if thou art not the Christ, nor Elias, nor the prophet? John answered them, saying, I baptize with [i] water: there standeth one in the midst of you, whom ye [j] know not; he who coming after me hath come to be before me;* the latchet of whose shoe I am not [k] worthy to unloose. These things took place in Bethany,† beyond Jordan, [l] where John was baptizing.

h cf. 1 Cor. 1. 13-15. cf. Acts 19. 4.
i Matt. 3. 11. cf. Heb. 10. 4.
j ver. 5.
k Matt. 3. 14. cf. ch. 3. 29, 30. cf. Matt. 11. 11.
l Lk. 3. 3.

* The earliest versions here again are in opposition to some of the earliest MSS., which have only, "he who cometh after me."
† Not "Bethabara," as the common version.

Vox et præterea nihil: a "voice,"—scarcely a person; a voice whose whole value lies in the message that it brings; a voice, which of necessity must pass away, but which may do a work that shall not pass; here a voice that shall bring to the souls of men the imperishable Word which shall abide for ever. We cannot but realize the voice in John thus to be in suited relation to the Word, which is Christ, and of whom as such the Gospel speaks. Nor is there a moan in this over his mere brief apparition among men. What are men that a name among them and a following from them should be a thing to covet? Nay; but there is a Seeker of men, and for whom they have value, not as aught but as naught; as helpless, astray, lost, ruined. That the speaker knew; and knowing, spoke of it with a joy that would not permit him to be silent, nor permit him to stand before their eyes to hide or lessen the glory which was before his own.

But those who had been sent were of the Pharisees, and they saw nothing; nor, as conscious of their need, did they heed the testimony. They had misinterpreted the ages past, and here was the voice of those ages, and it was strange and distant, and the light in the eyes of him who spoke, had they not seen it before in many a fanatic? But, keen ritualists as they were, they had rightful question with him now, founded on his own confession: for, if he were neither Christ, nor Elias, nor the Prophet, why did he baptize?

In fact, it was a boldness unheard of to impose such a baptism upon Israelites: he a man without miracle to attest him, with nothing indeed save his own unworldly life, and that fervent appeal to the conscience which awoke it to its office, with the startling announcement of heaven's Kingdom and its King at hand. Meet him on the ground of Scripture or of fact they could not; but it was easier to question his personal right to such a prerogative as he claimed, of which they too were the prescriptive judges. But John answers them in his own strange fashion by an attack upon all ritualism in its very essence. Baptize? yes, he baptized—with water! Water symbolically might have deepest meaning; otherwise it could but put away the filth of the flesh. Water does water's work: for which its Maker ordained it. Why make much of this, while in the midst of them stood One, unknown, unnoticed, so great that the Baptist, as he declares, was unworthy to do for Him a menial's office, and had derived from Him all the significance he had.

Thus John was in his person a witness for his Lord. He not merely had a voice to speak for Him: he was that voice. Delivered from the common cravings of men, and standing apart from their contending interests but not their needs, Christ had delivered, Christ sufficed for him. As another could say afterwards, and with fuller intelligence, John could have said in his measure with equal truth, Christ lived in him; Christ's interests absorbed and energized him. A beautiful testimony! His voice might utter itself in the wilderness; his heart abode amid the "precious fruits brought forth by the Sun" which shone upon him, a man "filled with the Holy Spirit even from his mother's womb."

2 (29-31): The Sin-bearer and Saviour.

2. On the morrow he seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith, Behold the [m] Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world. He it is of whom I said, [n] After me cometh a man who is come to be before me: for he [o] was before me. And I [p] knew him not; but that he might be made [q] manifest to Israel, therefore did I come baptizing with water.

3 (32-34): anointed and baptizing with the Spirit.

3. And John bare witness, saying, I beheld the [r] Spirit descending like a dove out of heaven; and it abode upon him. And I knew him not, but he who sent me to baptize with water, he said unto me, Upon whom m ver. 36. cf. Gen. 22. 7, 8. cf. Ex. 12. 3-5. cf. Is. 53. 7. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 18-20. cf. Rev. 5. 6.

n vers. 15, 27.
o cf. ch. 8. 58. cf. Col. 1. 17.
p ver. 33. cf. Lk. 1. 80. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 16.
q cf. Lk. 1. 17, 76. r Matt. 3. 16; Mk. 1. 10; Lk. 3. 21, 22.

2. But with these men for his hearers John cannot get his heart out; as on their part there is no movement of the heart towards the blessed One of whom he testifies. With other audience upon the morrow his joy breaks out; and we see how fully he is one with all whoever since have found in Jesus the rest and satisfaction of their souls. "He seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith, Behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world." Thus we see how his faith has taken refuge in a Sin-bearer and Saviour, the only Saviour of the world. We have at the outset here the broadest view of Christ's sacrifice, as characteristically throughout the Gospel. The Baptist speaks also of "sin," not "sins." That which has been from the time of the fall ever in view in all God's dealings with the world will through this work be at last completely removed, and eternal righteousness established in its place. Meanwhile the broadest foundation is laid, for every one that will to rest on. Not Israel, not the saints, not even believers as such are given title here, but men as men, sinners with the consciousness of nothing else but sin; for for sinners the sacrifice for sin was offered; and though it be said most truly that only by faith do we receive the fruit of it, yet faith does not eye itself but its object, nor rest in any estimate of one's own condition (as to which we might be deceived) but upon the sure testimony of the Word both as to our condition and as to that which has met the condition.

Thus John's confession here is not too broad to allow of the simplest individual appropriation of it. The rock is not too broad to build upon. Every one is welcome: no question raised as to any one who comes; and none need raise a question.

John adds as to this Lamb of sacrifice his confession of Him as a divine Person, repeating his former words. He adds also that he had been (as the world itself) blind as to His glory. Yet that He might be made manifest to Israel was the whole purport of his own mission. It is the consciousness of the condition in which we were, out of which divine love and power alone have brought us that will enable us to rely upon the same grace for others, and upon nothing else but grace.

3. But this is not the whole of John's testimony. He has seen Christ as a Man marked out by the descent of the Spirit of God upon Him, and had this given to him as the sign by which he should know the One baptizing with the Holy Spirit. He sees and bears witness, therefore, that this is the Son of God.

The oil upon Aaron's head descends to the skirts of his clothing; and thus is accomplished that unity among brethren of which the Psalmist speaks (Ps. cxxxiii.) Now that the oil is the type of the Spirit, with which Christ as the true Aaron is anointed without blood, hardly needs demonstration (Ex. xxix. 7). Every thing combines to show that it was after John's baptism when the Spirit descended to abide on Christ, as the Baptist beheld it here, that this was fulfilled. (See Matt. iii., notes.) He had bowed in Jordan as the true offering in death for the sins of others, just as the Baptist proclaims Him now the Lamb of God to take away the sin of the world. He is declared, as the Spirit descends thou shalt see the Spirit descending and abiding on him, he it is who *baptizeth with [the] Holy Spirit. And I have seen and borne witness that he is the *Son of God.

s Acts i. 5.
t vers. 14, 18, 49. cf. ch. 5. 18. cf. ch. 9. 35, etc. cf. ch. 20. 29, 31.

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chap. i. 35–42.)

A fore-shadow of a heavenly gathering.

AGAIN on the *morrow John stood, and two of his disciples; and looking upon Jesus as he walked, he saith, *Behold the Lamb of God. And the two disciples heard him speak, and they followed Jesus. And Jesus, having turned, and beheld them following, saith unto them *What seek ye? And they said unto him, Rabbi, (which is to say, being interpreted, Teacher,) where u cf. ch. 20. 1 with 1 Jno. 2. 8. cf. Eph. 1. 22, 23.

v ver. 29. cf. Acts 13. 38, 39.
w cf. Matt. 20. 32.

upon Him, the Son of God; and that, as the apostle tells us (Heb. v. 5), is His call to the priesthood. The baptism of the Spirit is thus His priestly action, the anointing oil flowing down from the Head, which in the psalm produces the unity of brotherhood in Israel, and could not but as fully apply to that of a heavenly people, or to the Church; the Body of Christ is formed by the baptism of the Spirit (1 Cor. xii. 13); and though we could not have this as yet developed, for us it is the highest expression of spiritual unity, the fullest manifestation of the power of Christ's priestly work. It gives completeness to the Baptist's testimony to our Lord.

SUBD. 3.

"To Him shall the obedience of the peoples be" was Jacob's word of old as to Shiloh: a word which has waited long for its fulfilment. Of that generation of Israel to which He came He had to say, as foretold by the prophet: "I have labored in vain, and spent my strength for naught, and in vain; yet surely," He adds, "my judgment is with the Lord, and my work with my God" (Isa. xlix. 4). Jehovah answers Him accordingly, not only with the assurance that Jacob shall nevertheless be brought to God by Him, but also He shall be a light to the Gentiles, that He may be His salvation to the ends of the earth (ver. 6).

But the full reality of the work among the Gentiles was, even so, not given to the Old Testament to foresee. The mystery of the Church was yet "hid in God" (Eph. iii. 9), although the Old Testament had also its witnesses, which on account of their veiled and typical language could not be understood until it pleased Him to lift off that veil. There they serve now to show the place in His heart this supreme grace of His towards men ever had.

Even in the Gospels, with the exception of what is conveyed in the brief words to Peter which Matthew has recorded for us (xvi. 18), the Church still lies hidden. John, whose testimony to the Person of Christ is so full, and whose Gospel, from its unfolding of eternal life and the gift of the Spirit, so well deserves the title which has been given to it of the "Christian Gospel," yet says nothing explicitly of the Church of God. It is of the family of God he speaks throughout, even when it is the Church that furnishes his example of the family.

We have, however, something more than this in what we have now before us, though not in explicit statement. The Son of God, the Word made flesh, and stooping to be the Lamb of sacrifice, then and thus Baptizer with the Holy Spirit, and bringing men into a spiritual unity which is necessarily communion with the Father and the Son, begins in the power of the grace manifested in Him to draw men to Himself. He becomes the Centre of what we soon discern to be a two-fold gathering, in principle a heavenly and an earthly one. The mind of the Spirit is evidently to show us this by typical example, the Christian and the Jewish assemblies in their characteristic features as these,—the New Testa-

[x] abidest thou? He saith unto them, [y] Come and see. They went therefore, and saw where he abode, and they [z] abode with him that day; it was about the tenth hour. One of the two who heard John* [speak] and followed him was Andrew, Simon Peter's brother. He first [a] findeth his own brother Simon, and saith unto him, We have found the Messias (which is, being interpreted, the Christ). He brought him to Jesus. Jesus looking

x cf. ch. 14. 2, 3. cf. Heb. 1. 3.
y ver. 46. ch. 4. 29. cf. Col. 3. 1.
z cf. ch. 17. 24. cf. 1 Thess. 4. 17.
a cf. ver. 45. cf. Mk. 5. 19. cf. Acts 1. 8.

*Or, "hearing from John."

ment and the Old finding in Him harmonious fulfilment. How suited is this, after His fulness has been displayed, to show us something of the circles of blessing that shall surround Him, to which eternally this fulness shall flow out. The exact, even minute correspondence forbids any mistake as to what is intended: every word tells. The more we examine the more shall we realize that here are all the details of a picture such as the Spirit of God alone could have drawn, and which is addressed to our intelligence as Christians to discover.

At the commencement John is still the witness, the Old Testament in him sending its disciples to Him who is the fulfilment of its sacrificial shadows, to the Lamb of God, who satisfies as such the first need of the soul, and in setting it free makes it inalienably His own. The true disciples of the Old Testament are, therefore, those who follow Jesus; and it was as a Jewish remnant that the Church began. But immediately we hear of something beyond this. Jesus sees them following and asks, "What seek ye?" and they seek, in fact, the place where He abides. It is practically the second occurrence of a word which is common in John and characteristic of his Gospel,—related, as it is to that divine side of things with which he has so much to do. Thus the Spirit "abides" on Christ: does not come occasionally, and leave again, as with the prophets of old. The Father also "abides" in Him (xiv. 10). The believer "abides" in Christ, and Christ in him; as the branch "abides" in the vine (xv.) and thus the vine—the sap—in the branch. The bread from heaven "abides" unto eternal life (vi. 27). But here the place where Christ abides carries our thoughts at once to His own "where I am," in the Father's house, where are the "abodes" (xiv. 2) in which His people are to be with Him for ever. We have in type the heavenly family, who even now by faith see where He abides and abide with Him while night is on the earth, to come out in the morning with Him. No name of earth attaches itself to this His dwelling-place; and though, plainly, as the time indicates, they pass the night with Him, no night is mentioned, for where He is it is day.

All harmonizes thus far; but we have more than this: for "one of the two who heard John speak and followed Him was Andrew, Simon Peter's brother. Andrew, the "manly," "courageous," is indeed akin to Simon, "the hearkener," the "obedient," who becomes Peter the "stone" the rock-like man; and both together may speak of the energy needed to go through the transition which the name of Peter at once suggests here, and which John further emphasizes for us by interpreting the Messias of Andrew's testimony into the Gentile "Christ." The sacred language itself is changing, as we see in that of the New Testament, which is the language of the outside world.

Andrew brings his brother to Jesus; and at once we have the change of name, which in Matthew takes place at a later time. There it is evidently a confirmation of what is given at the commencement of his discipleship; there the point had come from which the whole transformation could be seen, which here is confined to himself personally. The "hearkener, the son of the dove" (Jonas)* —for with the hearing the dead live (chap. v. 25), and this life is the Spirit's upon him said, Thou art [b]Simon the son of Jonas: thou shalt be called Cephas: which is, being interpreted, A stone.*

*The weight of MS. authority is for "John," though they do not agree as to the spelling. The text in Matt. xvi. reads "Jonas" without dissent at all; which makes for the less supported reading here.

[b] cf. Matt. 16. 18. cf. Gen. 17. 5.

SUBDIVISION 4. (Chap. i. 43–51).

The earthly gathering.

ON the [c]morrow he was minded to go forth into Galilee, and findeth Philip; and Jesus saith unto him, [d]Follow me. And Philip was from Bethsaida, of the city of Andrew and Peter. Philip [e]findeth Nathanael, and said unto him, We have found him of whom Moses in the law wrote, and the prophets, Jesus the son of Joseph who is from Nazareth. And Nathanael said unto him, [f]Can anything good be out of Nazareth?

[c] cf. Mal. 4. 2. cf. 2 Sam. 23. 4.
[d] cf. Matt. 4. 19.
[e] ver. 41. cf. Mal. 3. 16.
[f] ch. 7. 41, 42, 52.

*Gk., "Peter."

work—becomes Cephas, which also is interpreted into the Gentile Peter: that is to say "a stone." Peter himself gives us the full significance of this (1 Pet. ii. 4, 5): "To whom coming, as unto a living Stone, . . . ye also, as living stones, are built up a spiritual house." Thus the Church is formed; and in what is intimated in this name now conferred we see the heavenly company assuming the full character of the house of God, the dwelling-place of the Spirit. The other aspects of the Church as the body and bride of Christ are to be the subjects of after revelation.

Here then is the first gathering to the Lord as it is now, Israel having rejected Him, as in John we see all through. But even on this account John will not leave it there, and we are next to see, after the same representative manner, an Israelitish company, which serves by contrast only to make more distinct, if possible, the character of that which has preceded it.

SUBD. 4.

We have a new day, and the Lord meaning to go forth into Galilee, which we have seen elsewhere to be the typical place of blessing for Israel (see p. 69 notes) where her ruin is most manifest. And now, instead of a continuation of the former gathering by the testimony of disciples, there is a new beginning, and the work of the Lord Himself, who calls Philip. Now the disciples' work begins again: Philip calls Nathanael with a new testimony; "We have found Him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets wrote, Jesus the son of Joseph, who is from Nazareth." The being the (titular) son of Joseph, which sounds strange as the voice of faith in John's Gospel, gives Him yet His apparent legal title to the throne. Exceptional in this Gospel it plainly is, but the King of Israel is manifestly intended to be now before us: in principle it is an Israelitish gathering that is begun. Nathanael shows also at first the Jewish unbelief: "Can anything good be out of Nazareth?" And yet the Lord testifies of him, "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile." Notice that it is as an "Israelite" he is presented to us. "Whence knowest thou me?" he asks in surprise. "Before Philip called thee," the Lord answers, "when thou wast under the fig-tree, I saw thee." Doubtless there had been some special exercise of heart,—something in which he had been seeking God,—that Christ refers to. And with the true remnant of Israel in the last days, we know that the exercises through which they will pass will be as overshadowed by the fig-tree, which is the figure of a remnant of the nation returned to the land, but not returned to God (Luke xiii. 6–9), and who will receive Antichrist. The Psalms enter largely into these trials and sorrows; and in them God has provided for them beforehand that which will sustain their faith through that unequalled tribulation through which they will have to pass. In them, when they come to see Him face to face they will find how the Christ they have been seeking has been already with them.

Philip saith unto him, [g]Come and see. Jesus saw Nathanael coming unto him, and saith of him, Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no [h]guile. Nathanael saith unto him, Whence knowest thou me? Jesus answered and said unto him, Before Philip called thee, when thou wast under the [i]fig-tree, I saw thee. Nathanael answered him, Rabbi, thou art the [j]Son of God; thou art [k]King of Israel. Jesus answered and said unto him, Because I said unto thee, I saw thee under the fig-tree, believest thou? thou shalt see [l]greater things than these. And he saith unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto you, [Henceforth]* ye shall see [m]heaven opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man.

g cf. Nu. 10. 29. cf. Zech. 8. 21.
h cf. Ps. 32. 2. cf. cf. Is. 29. 13. cf. Zeph. 3. 13.
i cf. Lk. 13. 6–9. cf. Matt. 21. 19. cf. Neh. 9. 36, 37.
j ver. 34. ch. 6. 69.
k cf. ch. 12. 13. cf. ch. 19. 7, 8, 19.
l cf. Heb. 6. 5. cf. Lk. 22. 28, 29.
m Gen. 28. 12. cf. Hos. 2. 19–23. cf. Rev. 21. 23, 24.

SUBDIVISION 5. (Chap. ii. 1–12.)

The governmental order for the reception of the blessing.

AND the [n]third day there was a marriage in Cana of [o]Galilee; and the [p]mother of Jesus was there; and n cf. ch. 1. 43. cf. Ezek. 37. 12. cf. Rom. 11. 15. o cf. Matt. 4. 15, 16 with Hos. 1. 9. p Lk. 1. 28; cf. Rom. 9. 5; Rev. 12. 1, 2.

*Some of the earliest MSS. and versions omit, with most editors.

Nathanael at once owns him, as the people will, and in the way in which (as we have seen in the other Gospels) He must be owned, to have blessing from Him: "Rabbi, Thou art the Son of God; Thou art the King of Israel." As Son of God, they rejected Him in the high priest's court; as King of Israel, before Pilate. Here plainly Nathanael shows himself as representing the faith of the nation in the day to come; and in that character the Lord answers him: "Because I said, I saw thee under the fig-tree, believest thou? thou shalt see greater things than these. Verily, verily, I say unto you, Henceforth ye shall see heaven opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man." If the "henceforth" here is to be accepted, then it would seem even plainer that the Lord anticipates the time when the nation converted to God will make their own the confession of this new disciple. From that time heaven will indeed be opened to them, and they will see the angels its inhabitants attendant upon One who will be manifestly "Son of man." This will be indeed a marvelous and blessed thing to see; and the title "Son of man," we have seen constantly connected by the Lord with His appearing in the clouds of heaven, with the glory of the angels. Doubtless it was also the title He loved to take during His life-time upon earth, as bringing near to those among whom He was the grace of His incarnation; but the whole connection as we have traced it, and the full meaning of the words themselves, seem to forbid more than a partial reference of them to the time of His earth-sojourn. Israel on the other hand will in millennial days undoubtedly stand under the glory of the heavens opened; but thus still be in a position short of theirs who will go in where He abides, and abide with Him. The two companies, the heavenly and the earthly, are thus in marked contrast, yet in connection with one another; and we see the Lord in His place as the Centre of each. How suited, we may again say, that after His manifestation in the fulness of His grace, as the evangelist has shown Him, we should see the effect of this in the two circles of blessing which now we see around Him, and which are but the types of those who shall fill heaven and earth and eternity with their joy and praise.

SUBD. 5.

The next scene that is presented to us is also in connection with this; and here we have Galilee once more, the third day, and a marriage, to which Jesus and His disciples are invited guests. In connection with Israel these things are

Jesus also was called, and his disciples, to the marriage. And when the [q] wine failed, the mother of Jesus saith unto him, They have no wine. And Jesus saith unto suggestive symbols; and while we would in no wise make light of the natural significance, it will surely not do this to show, as others have done before, how the spiritual significance shines through it and adds lustre to every feature. Indeed this is no exceptional character of the scriptures we are now considering. We have been constantly realizing it in the Gospel histories and in those of the Old Testament, as well as in the types and shadows of the law. When we come to the doctrinal epistles this character of the inspired Word is no longer found: for the plain reason that the spiritual is no longer under the veil of the natural, but is openly revealed. In the book of Revelation we find it, however, taken up again, and in a more pronounced way than in any other part; and here the natural significance is for the most part only a veil, the hiding in parabolic enigmas not only of prophetic announcements as to the earth, but of the glories of eternity itself and of those precious realities which we long to know in their full blessedness. Happy he, then, who has best learned this language, which from our Lord's use of it we may call His favored speech, the apocalyptic tongue of heaven.

[q] cf. Lam.5. 15. cf. Is.24.7,8. cf. Am.8.10.

But let us look at the natural aspect first; in which yet we must not think it strange that the spiritual should come in, since that which is truly natural according to God can never be divorced from the spiritual: the Word, as we have just heard, is the Creator, and creation is therefore but the expression in nature of the spiritual—of the divine mind. With the disappearance of the spiritual, the very basis of the natural would necessarily disappear.

Here in the Lord's first miracle, we do right to expect in some way an introduction to His work in general on and in behalf of nature. For this is the character of all beginnings in the word and work of God. They are really of the nature of introductions to all that follows and which is developed out of them, as the seed incloses and outlines the future plant. Thus it is that the book of Genesis, and above all, the first part of it, gives the germ and outline of all Scripture. Here in the miracle at the marriage feast we shall surely find a "sign" of this kind: it is called a sign—something which has significance after the divine order.

"A marriage" carries us back at once to Eden, and to the divine word whereby it was instituted. "It is not good for man to be alone." He is made for communion, as the gift of language shows—to communicate and to receive communication. And in this, too, he realizes not merely the need of the creature, but is in the likeness of his Creator. In the very preface to his creation, the words, "Let us make man," speak of communion.

Man truly is made to recognize in it the dependence of a creature, to whom independence would be every way unsuited and unwholesome. If not mere misery, the pride through which an angel became a devil would be fostered by it, and God's will is to "hide pride from man." His whole mode of existence here is but one interconnected series of dependencies in which marriage is a central point. And here love finds its opportunity and displays itself in the sweet ministries of life, which reflect so much of the character of God and of His ways who is Love.

Marriage is central, therefore, in the web of human life, the basis of all relationships as God has instituted them. And as marriage (not mere sexual union) it has at most its mere shadow in the temporary attachments of the creatures below man. Personal obligation, voluntarily assumed, and expressed in constant fidelity, distinguishes it by the height of a whole heaven from these partial reflections of it.

We can understand, therefore, the importance of the sanction which the Lord gives by His presence at this marriage feast; and even why He takes at it the place He does, as Maker of all. It is every way harmonious; while the need her, Woman, what have I to do with thee? mine [r]hour is not yet come. His mother saith unto the servants, [s]Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it. Now there were six waterpots of stone set there, after the Jews' manner of [t]purifying, containing two or three firkins* apiece. Jesus saith unto them, Fill the waterpots with [u]water; and they filled them up to the brim. And he saith unto them, [v]Draw out now, and bear unto the ruler of the feast: and they bare it. When the ruler of the feast tasted the water that had [w]become wine, and knew not whence it was (but the [x]servants who had drawn the water knew), the ruler of the feast calleth the bridegroom and saith unto him, Every man setteth on the good wine first; and when men have drunk freely, that which is inferior; thou hast kept the [y]good wine until now. This beginning of signs did Jesus in Cana

*Or, "measures."

r ch. 7. 6, 8. ch. 8. 20. cf. Is. 63. 4.
s cf. Lk. 2. 51.
t cf. Mk. 7. 3, 4. cf. Heb. 9. 9, 10.
u cf. ch. 3. 5 with Eph. 5. 26. cf. Ps. 51. 16, 17.
v cf. Mal. 3. 3, 4. cf. 2 Cor. 3. 16.
w cf. Ps. 4. 7. cf. Ps. 65. 3. cf. Is. 54. 1. cf. Zeph. 3. 17.
x cf. Matt. 14. 19. cf. Am. 3. 7.
y cf. Is. 65. 17–19. cf. Is. 54. 4.

and limitations brought us by the fall are recognized also and provided for. The wine runs out: the joys of earth pass and cannot be renewed; alas, the empty forms of purification, like the six empty water-pots of stone, provide no basis upon which the blessing can come. Only the servants who draw the water know how, when at his bidding the pots are filled with water, this is changed into the new wine which is alone really "good"; and in which we recognize the memorial of His own deep sorrow, yea, of the blood outpoured for the guilt of man. And here Cana, "purchase," comes to its true significance, as the secret of the return of blessing of which Galilee reminds us. But we shall see all the details of what is here more fully brought out as we take up this story in its connection with the series of pictures in which the glory of Christ is being continuously displayed.

In this, which is the full application, Galilee will speak specifically of the return of blessing to Israel, Cana still showing us how the blessing is regained; and the "marriage" in such connection will take us back to the language of the Old Testament prophets, who figure in this way Israel's relation to Jehovah in time past, broken by her sin, but to be restored again in a more perfect and glorious way (see Hos. ii.), in what will be the resurrection time of the nation, of which, no doubt, the "third day" mentioned speaks (Hos. vi. 2). Here are the elements of what is now before us. Beside this, the "mother of Jesus" is here: who can only figure Israel, of whom Christ came, as concerning the flesh (Rom. ix. 5). And the disciples of Jesus coming with Him to the marriage point to those associated with Him in nearer intimacy and a higher order of blessing than the Jewish bride herself.

But a marriage still for Israel, raised as a nation from the dead, brings up of necessity the thought of her broken vows and the long delay of blessing. The feast, which should have been for her continuous, has failed, the wine has run out. The mother of Jesus, the nation in the flesh, aware in some sense of her condition, appeals to Him vaguely, as we see in this Gospel; would take Him by force even, and make Him a King (ch. vi. 15), from which He can only withdraw Himself. This is the "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" of the chapter here; His "hour," indeed, "is not yet come."

Why? when the need is apparent, and confessed? Ah, the need of wine is; but there is another need, deeper, yea, fundamental, which they do not confess, nor realize. Those six empty water-pots of stone, set there for purifying, but incapable now, symbolize the condition of hollow formalism. Six is the number of labor without rest, though capable of assuming another significance; but how long has this been the suited expression of a people away from God; the practiof Galilee, and manifested his [z]glory; and his disciples believed on him. After this he went down to [a]Capernaum, he and his mother and his brethren and his disciples; and there he abode not many days.

[z] ch. 1. 14.
[a] cf. Matt. 4. 13 with Matt. 9. 1.

SUBDIVISION 6. (Chap. ii. 13-22.)

The purging out of evil.

AND the Jews' [b]passover was near, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem. And he [c]found in the temple those that sold oxen and sheep and doves, and the money-changers sitting. And, having made a scourge of small cords, he cast all out of the temple, both sheep and oxen, and poured out the changers' money, and overthrew the tables, and said unto those who sold doves, Take these things hence: make not my Father's house a house of [d]merchandise. And his disciples re-

[b] cf. ch. 5. 1, ch. 6. 4, ch. 12. 1.
[c] cf. Matt. 21. 12, 13. cf. Mal. 3. 2, 3.
[d] cf. Is. 56. 7, cf. Matt. 23. 14.

cal comment upon His words, "Mine hour is not yet come"! In this interval time is not reckoned, and not as yet have we seen the end of it.

But the time comes at last, and He must work to secure the blessing which without Him will never come. Now He says to the servants, "Fill the waterpots with water"; and they fill them to the brim. The number now may be that of discipline, which we know in fact God will use to bring them under the power of His word, which is His means of purification. "The washing of water" is "by the Word" (Eph. v. 26).

Thus self-judgment is accomplished: the Word received, the basis of blessing is established for the soul: faith is come, and the object of faith will soon be clearly seen. The water changes into the wine of joy, which is identified, as we have seen before, with the remembrance of Christ's precious sacrifice. It is very much the story of any sinner saved by grace; and it will be Israel's in the day at hand. Then indeed will the wine be the best wine; better than the lips have ever before tasted. The words of the master of the feast point the contrast with the world's joys which spoil the taste and then deteriorate. With this there is no intoxication, no perversion of taste, no evil, but only good. It can be said, "Drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved"; and of Judah (the worshiper), "He has washed his garments in wine, and his vesture in the blood of grapes; his eyes shall be red with wine." The fear of intemperance here is never before the soul.

The numerical structure here emphasizes the governmental order for the reception of blessing, and shows the reason of the long delay of it in the case of Israel. The conditions are the reception of the Word in faith, with the self-judgment which is repentance. And thus Christ becomes the Saviour of the lost, the one Object, for the heart that has known Him so. Thus He takes His throne among men.

SUBD. 6.

There follows, at Jerusalem, upon the occasion of the "Jews' passover," as John characteristically calls it, a first purging of the temple by Him, which He repeats, as we have seen in other Gospels, after His presentation to them openly as their King. It is given as one of the features of millennial blessing by the prophet Zechariah, that "there shall be no more a Canaanite"—or "trafficker"—"in the house of the Lord of hosts" (xiv. 21). The profanation of that which, till he finally leaves it, He always calls His Father's house stirs within Him the zeal for it which, as the psalmist is cited here as saying, consumed Him. How much did that house, God's dwelling-place among men, mean for Him whose great work was to establish it! In His own Person God had come down, and in such a way as implied no mere temporary visitation. His Name Emmanuel had told that out. Wisdom's delights were with the sons of men; yet with iniquity membered that it is [e]written, The zeal of thy house eateth me up. The Jews therefore answered and said unto him, What [f]sign showest thou to us, that thou doest these things? Jesus answered and said unto them, [g]Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. The Jews said therefore, [h]Forty and six years was this temple in building, and wilt thou raise it up in three days? But he spake of the [i]temple of his body. When therefore he was risen from among the dead, his disciples [j]remembered that he had said this; and they [k]believed the scripture, and the word that Jesus had said.

[e] Ps. 69. 9. cf. Ps. 119. 139.
[f] Matt.12.38. ch. 6. 30. cf. 1 Cor. i. 22.
[g] cf. Matt. 26. 61. cf.Matt.12. 40.
[h] cf. 1 Ki. 6. 38. cf.Matt.2.3.
[i] cf. ch.1.14. 1 Cor. 6. 19.
[j] Lk. 24. 8. cf.ch. 12.16.
[k] cf.ch.20.9. cf.Ps.16.10.

He could not dwell. The precious blood shed for their sins could only make their persistence in them after this more hideous and more hateful. Thus the house must be purged in which God is to dwell; and the glory of God and the blessing of man required its purgation.

As Son of God, therefore, Christ casts out the defilement, taking openly a place of authority which none dare openly dispute. The shadow of future judgment falls upon them and scatters them. The Jews ask what sign He can show that the authority He claims belongs to Him. He answers them with a challenge to "destroy this temple and in three days He would raise it up"—referring to His death and resurrection: a parable which they could not interpret, and applied falsely to Herod's building, still unfinished; while even the disciples understood it only when it was fulfilled. The eyes of those held by externalism were not on Him; while as yet it held even those of true disciples. Thus the blow had to fall even upon the temple itself which left not even one stone upon another, and scattered its worshipers also far and wide over the earth; while the new temple of His humanity, glorified by the outbreaking of the glory that was within, becomes in heaven an open sanctuary, whence the divine Light shall irradiate the earth.

Div. 2.

The second division of the Gospel comprises the larger portion of the book. In it we have as the thread upon which its precious truths are strung, eternal life as communicated to men, with its accompaniments and implications for the possessor of it, when now it is known in its abundant blessedness (ch. x. 10).

It is divided into four parts: in the first of which the life and all that accompanies it are seen as individual blessings simply, as in new birth, and the living water springing up within the soul; in the second, they are seen in relation to the scene around, as quickening out of a world lying under judgment, and the living waters pouring out for the refreshment of others. The third part is of a larger character, and has three different portions: (1) the soul is brought to God and is at liberty,—has the freedom of the house of God; (2) it belongs to the Shepherd's flock, outside the fold, and follows Him who saves and leads it into His abundant pastures; (3) it has life in resurrection-power, death abolished for it, and the Son of God glorified thereby. The fourth part, in the Lord's last discourse with His disciples, gives the furnishing for the way through a world out of which He is gone, but as expecting His return to receive us to Himself.

The relation of these things to one another, with the unity and harmony of their presentation in the Gospel, can only be considered as we take them up in detail.

Subd. 1.

The first subdivision, then, speaks of eternal life and its accompaniments as individual blessing. This is naturally the first thing to be considered, before we look at the relationships into which we are brought by the reception of this divine gift. The beginning of all is new birth, which we have in the first section, made known to us by the Lord Himself in His words to Nicodemus. This

DIVISION 2. (Chaps. ii. 23–xvii.)

Eternal life as communicated and dependent.

SUBDIVISION 1. (Chaps. ii. 23–iv.)

As individual blessing.

SECTION 1. (Chaps. ii. 23–iii. 21.)

The beginning in new birth.

1 (ii.23-iii. 8): In the sovereign power of God: spirit from the Spirit.

1. NOW when he was in Jerusalem at the passover at the feast, [k]many believed on his name, beholding the [l]signs that he was doing. But Jesus did not [m]trust himself unto them, because he [n]knew all men, and needed not that any should testify of man: for he knew what was in man.

k cf. ch. 4. 48.
l cf. ch. 6. 14, 36.
m cf. ch. 11. 45, 47.
n cf. Lk. 16. 30, 31.
n cf. ch. 6. 15.
n cf. Mk. 1. 43, 44.
o ch. 5. 42.
o cf. Matt. 9. 4.
o cf. ch. 6. 70.

is a field much traversed and by the feet of many combatants; nor must we shun a conflict upon the issue of which, as will be evident, so much depends. We are here at one of those beginnings from which such different roads open that much will depend for us upon our not missing the right way.

The second section gives us the Baptist's final testimony, both in work and word; in which, in utter despair of man, he puts us into the hand of the Heavenly Guide, to be led on where he as of the earth cannot conduct us.

Upon which the third section carries us on, in the Lord's words to the Samaritan woman, to realize what life is in the Spirit; and here a Gentile scene opens, and fields are seen white to the harvest, while Israel rejects Him whom the faith of the Samaritans recognizes as the "Saviour of the world."

The fourth section, however, as an appendix to this, reminds us by a sign again wrought in Israel—nay, in Cana, the scene of the first miracle—that God has not cast away His people of old, and shows how in their distress they will seek to Christ at last, and find His grace still ready to receive them. Here the first subdivision manifestly closes.

Sec. 1.

1. Before we look at new birth itself, we must realize man's need of it; and this is shown us in the most striking way,—not in the case of those who openly refuse Christ, but on the contrary in that of those who accredit His claim. The miracles he did at Jerusalem at the passover wrought, we are told, conviction in many minds. "They believed in His name": the words used in the first chapter as to those to whom He gave authority to become children of God: yet here no such result follows, but the reverse. "Jesus did not commit Himself to them: because He knew all men, and needed not that any should testify of man; for He knew what was in man."

It was a natural work then, this conviction: sincere enough, but merely intellectual; the result of a reasoning process, leading to a correct conclusion, but with no vital change in the men themselves. They were convinced; they were not converted. Their judgment was formed upon evidence strong enough, but not derived from any glory they had seen in Him. It is not said therefore of these, as of those in the first chapter, that they "received Him." Christ had not gained admittance at the door of their hearts. It was still the light shining in darkness: He had still no beauty that they should desire Him. They had no imperative need, that should demand Him. Alas, here was in reality the deepest and most fundamental need, which nothing that was in man, or of man therefore could meet at all. Death could not produce life; and with the Lord's knowledge of what is in man, He can trust nothing that is from him. This need can only be met from a Source outside of man: he to whom Jesus can trust Himself can only be a man new born.

But there was a man of the Pharisees named [p] Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews: this man came to him by [q] night and said unto him, Rabbi, we [r] know that thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do these signs that thou doest, except God be with him. Jesus answered and said unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except one be [s] born anew, he cannot [t] see the kingdom of God. Nicodemus saith unto him, How

p ch. 7. 48-52. ch. 19. 39, 40.
q cf. ch. 12. 42. cf. Lk. 9. 26.
r cf. ch. 5. 36. cf. ch. 9. 29-33. cf. ch. 12. 37-40.
s ch. 1. 13. cf. ver. 36.
t cf. 1 John 3. 2; cf. Matt. 5. 8.

This brings us to Nicodemus and the Lord's teaching as to new birth. The circumstances are to be noted under which he comes, with a caution which shows his apprehension of the danger for himself, and which shows therefore his earnestness in coming. His history afterwards, as the evangelist gives us the means of tracing it, confirms both these things as true of him. In the cleansing of the temple the first note had sounded of a conflict whose end (from any human point of view) it was not hard to foresee. The chiefs of the priesthood were implicated in that desecration of the house of God which the young prophet of Galilee had so denounced and broken in upon: a man who had risen up unsanctioned by the leaders of the people, of whom Nicodemus himself was one. Yet at such a juncture he risks reputation and abases his Pharisaic pride to come as an enquirer to the despised Nazarene.

He comes with the distinct acknowledgment that He is a teacher come from God; and that on the same warrant of the signs wrought by Him, which those before had grounded their faith upon,—a faith which He had discredited and set aside. But there was a hunger in the heart of Nicodemus which was not in theirs, and which brought him to the feet of Jesus; and none were ever rejected there. Yet the Lord meets him with an abruptness and peremptoriness which we do not expect from the grace which characterized Him. Putting side by side with this His manner with the Samaritan woman afterwards, it is striking to see the difference. To her was the assurance of God's readiness to give (if she but asked Him for it) living water; the token of a love she had not known nor sought to know. To him the conditions, strange and impracticable as we know they seemed, upon which alone one could see the Kingdom of God: a shut door, as it might seem, in the face of the real seeker; while she who sought not was to be wooed and won for Him. And this was, no doubt, one reason for the difference; and which makes for Nicodemus, instead of against him. Won he was: his heart drawn, and ready to receive the truth as made known to him, even to face the unwelcome, if it were but truth; and the Lord treats him accordingly.

But there is another side to it in the fact of the Pharisaism that yet cleaves to him, and which knows nothing of the lost condition of man as man. Yet to this he must be brought, stripped of every remnant of his own righteousness, and clothed even with the spotted robe of shame in which she at the well listened in wonder to hear of what God could be, even for her. Grace itself, with Nicodemus, must humble before it can exalt, must teach the worthlessness of man that all God's glory may shine out for him. The Pharisee must renounce his many years' laboriously built up claim on God, and go back behind infancy itself, to a nothingness which would be shelter to his dishonor if it were only that, there to lie down helpless at the mere pleasure of God to save or to destroy! "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except one be born anew, he cannot see the Kingdom of God;" and who then by his own will was born at the first? So is man born again: "not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God."

The Kingdom of God was that which the prophets had announced, and for which all Israel waited. We must not think of it in the form it has now taken, the King away, and its administration in the hands of men. We must think of it as established by power at the coming of the Lord, when for Israel a remnant alone will enter it, whose character Isaiah explicitly declares (chap. iv. 2–4).

can a man be born when he is u old? Can he enter a second time into his mother's womb and be born? Jesus answered, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except one be born of v water and the w Spirit, he cannot x enter into the kingdom of God. That which is born of the u cf. Jer. 13. 23.

v cf. Ezek. 36. 25-27. cf. Eph. 5. 26. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 23.

w cf. Tit. 3. 5; cf. Gen. 1. 2. x cf. Rev. 21. 27; cf. Rev. 22. 14, 15.

For "in that day shall the Branch of the Lord be beautiful and glorious, and the fruit of the earth be excellent and comely for them that are escaped of Israel. And it shall come to pass that he that is left in Zion, and he that remaineth in Jerusalem shall be called holy: even every one that is written among the living in Jerusalem; when the Lord shall have washed away the filth of the daughter of Zion, and shall have purged the blood of Jerusalem from the midst thereof by the spirit of judgment and by the spirit of burning." Then follows the account of the glory of Jerusalem in millennial days.

It is certain therefore that, when Israel enters the Kingdom, every one will be born again that does so; and it should be clear that this is what a Jew like Nicodemus would expect, and had right to expect, if taught of the prophets. Of the Christian form of the Kingdom he could know nothing, and could be expected to know nothing; for it was not yet revealed. Nor could the Lord's words even apply to the present time, in which all the parables declare a mingled condition of things, tares and wheat together, wise and foolish virgins. On the other hand, for us, in the perfected form of it, it will, of course, apply in the fullest way; but of all this Nicodemus could as yet know nothing: so that the Lord's expression of wonder, "Art thou the teacher of Israel and knowest not these things?" forbids all direct reference in this way, and the passage in Ezekiel (xxxvi.) from which He takes the words that presently follow are a positive prediction of Israel's entering the Kingdom in this manner.

This, if true, has an important bearing upon the meaning of new birth which we shall presently consider. The principle of man's need of it for blessing at any time remains, of course, unaffected. Man is man, naturally the same all through his history; and "as in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man." God also remains the same, and the need of renewal, therefore, to be with Him.

Nicodemus is confounded at the thought of such a change as the Lord speaks of. It is not simply the application to Israel over which he stumbles, though this would be, of course, an additional mystery; but as to the thing in itself, how can it be possible? he asks: "How can a man be born when he is old? can he enter the second time into his mother's womb and be born?" That is naturally impossible; but he has no explanation of it: what spiritual change can there be, so complete, so radical, so entirely beyond man to accomplish, as would be implied in a new birth?

The Lord reaffirms what he has said in the same solemn and emphatic manner; but now with explanations which go to the heart of the matter: "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except one be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the Kingdom of God." Then He states the need of it: "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born anew."

In considering this it is natural to think first of the need, before we consider how God's grace has met it. It is evident that when the Lord is declaring the need of man's being born again, the words that declare it must have in view what man is as fallen. Thus, if with Müller and Weiss we interpreted "that which is born of the flesh is flesh" as meaning that "the corporeal birth produces only the corporeal sensuous part," one would suppose this to be as true if man had never fallen; that is, supposing that man naturally has nothing but this; and what follows would affirm, as in contrast with the sensuous part, that the spirit of man was a product of new birth; or else "that which is born of the Spirit" would refer to creation and not to new creation.

flesh is y flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is z spirit. Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born anew. The a wind bloweth where it listeth; and y cf. Gen. 5. 3. cf. Rom. 8. 5-8. ch. 6. 63.

z cf. 1 John 3. 9; cf. Eph. 4. 22-24. a cf Ezek. 37. 9, 10; cf. Jas. 1. 18.

But we may confidently maintain, on the one hand that new birth is spoken of—that it is the Lord's subject here; and also that man every where has spirit, as well as soul and body,—that is, the sensuous part. Nay, spirit is in man the very seat of personality, as of all human knowledge (1 Cor. ii. 11), and that by which naturally men are the "offspring of God" (Acts xvii. 28), as the "Father of spirits" (Heb. xii. 9). New birth does not create a personality, or make a man out of a mere bestial creature.

If, then, "that which is born of the Spirit" speaks, as it certainly does, of the product of new birth, "that which is born of the flesh" covers all that man is naturally; and that he thus is only "flesh" is the effect of the fall. "Flesh" is not a new element of personality; it is strictly and evidently a degradation of it, a fallen condition. Spirit and soul are in men still, and yet these are but "flesh" after all: sunk into it, penetrated by it, so that in this way it has come to have a "mind," a "will," independent and away from God, "lusts" therefore (chap. i. 13; Rom. viii. 6, 7) of a heart unsatisfied. God and the unseen having ceased to be a reality for the soul, or at most having become a dread reality, the visible, the tangible, the sensible, possess and control it. Man is therefore flesh and only flesh.

In looking at the other side of what is here, the new birth of the Spirit, we have to remember what the trespass-offering teaches us, that God in restoring never merely restores. He does not reconstitute humanity as it was in Adam, but brings in Christ and makes Him the type of a new humanity, another order of manhood. This is according to a definite law of progress which runs through creation, and to which new creation conforms. According to this at each step in advance we find not the higher developing out of the lower: the plant out of the mineral, the animal out of the vegetable, man out of the animal; but a higher principle brought in and made by stooping to it to raise the lower. Thus life does not develop out of the inanimate, the crystal is not the budding of an organization, though it may be a prophecy of it. That life is only from life is admitted by men of science generally as far as observation and experiment can determine. Life then is a new principle which by union with it raises up the inorganic. In the animal again, the soul is not developed out of the life principle, but unites with and raises it up similarly to a higher level. In man spirit unites itself to soul. After the failure of man we may expect a new development after the same manner, by the union of a higher with a lower nature, and thus the formation of a "new man."

Of the "last Adam," however, we do not hear as yet, although we shall before the Gospel is concluded. At present we have only the new birth itself and its product a "spirit" nature. "Except one be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God. That which is born of the Spirit is spirit."

Water and Spirit combine to effect this wondrous transformation. What are these two that can thus unite for such a purpose? "Of all ancient writers," says Hooker, "there is not one to be named who ever expounded the text otherwise than as implying external baptism." Among moderns also this is by far the most common view; although some would take water as simply a symbol of purification. Those who make it baptism apply it mostly to Christian baptism, but some to John's and some to proselyte baptism. The "washing (or bath) of regeneration" (Tit. iii. 5) and the two baptisms of water and the Spirit are naturally taken to support this view. But the baptism of the Spirit is not in order to new birth, as the Lord's words after His resurrection clearly prove. He says to the disciples: "For John verily baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Spirit not many days hence" (Acts i. 5). But certainly it was > thou hearest the voice thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, nor whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit.

not at Pentecost, to which the Lord's words refer, that they were born again; and as certainly, therefore, when they were born again, they had not received this baptism. Thus, plausible as it may look at first, water and the Spirit cannot be united in this way.

But moreover Christian baptism was not as yet instituted, and the Lord could have expressed no astonishment at a Jewish teacher like Nicodemus being ignorant of such value attaching to it as would be thus expressed in the words we are considering. As for John's baptism, his own words are against any thought of this. His "I baptize with water" not only contrasts his baptism with that of the Spirit, but deprecates the very thought of water as capable of having so great significance.

As a symbol of purification we come nearer to the truth of it; but here the apostle helps us further with his statement that "Christ loved the Church and gave Himself for it, that He might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the Word" (Eph. v. 25–26), and Peter adds that we are "born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever. . . . And this is the word," he goes on, "which by the gospel is preached unto you" (1 Pet. i. 23–25). Thus it is by the word of the gospel, and not by the word that sanctifies baptismal water, as some have dreamed, that this wondrous change is effected. And if we have difficulty in understanding how the Spirit should unite with the water of baptism to accomplish a spiritual work for which water is plainly incompetent, it is on the other just as easy to see that the Spirit does unite with the Word for this purpose. "For our gospel came unto you," says the apostle to the Thessalonians, "not in word only, but in power, and in the Holy Spirit, and in much assurance" (1 Thess. i. 5). Thus, by the Spirit and the Word, comes in new birth.

The apostle John under the figure of "living water" speaks of the Spirit in the believer (vii. 37–39). We can understand it clearly by this united action of the Spirit and the Word. If Christ by the Word purifies His church, the Spirit is necessary to make the Word effectual. As has been said by another, the Word without the Spirit is merely rationalism; the Spirit without the Word—the claim of that—would be fanaticism. Water is the Word; the Spirit with the Word the "living water." In the Lord's words to Nicodemus we have the bringing of the two together; and then, as "that which is born of the flesh is flesh," so "that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. A fleshly nature is the product of the natural birth; a spiritual nature is the product of the new. It is only the Spirit that is spoken of here; but elsewhere we are reminded that "his seed"—the incorruptible seed, of which Peter speaks,—"abideth in" the one born again (1 John iii. 9); and James in another but similar figure speaks of the "engrafted word" (i. 21), by which, as the word of truth also, God has begotten us (ver. 18).

All this speaks but one language. We see that in the children of God there is implanted a nature in moral likeness to God,—in this sense, a divine nature. The full doctrine of it will develop as we go on: the co-existence of the flesh with it in the believer, the meaning of this, the hindrance resulting, the power over it, all this we shall have to look at elsewhere. So much is clear, that the believer is a true child of God as begotten of Him, and recipient of His nature: and this is what new birth implies.

The words "water" and "spirit" are, no doubt, from Ezekiel xxxvi. 25, 26, which describes the divine preparation of Israel for the Kingdom; but the Lord makes them stronger than the prophet, who does not use the expression "born again." "A new spirit" also is not the same as "spirit" from the Spirit. Yet the prophet's words should have made a teacher of Israel recognize the import of the Lord's words in relation to that change, so complete and so essen-

2 (iii. 9-18): Accompanying salvation through the Cross.

2. Nicodemus answered and said unto him, How can these things be? Jesus answered and said unto him, Art thou the teacher of Israel, and [b] knowest not these things? Verily, verily I say unto thee, [c] We speak that which we know, and bear witness of that which we have seen, and ye receive not our witness. If I have told you [d] earthly things and ye believe not, how will ye believe when I tell you of [e] heavenly things? And no one hath [f] ascended into heaven, but he who [g] came down from heaven, the Son of man who [h] is in heaven.

b cf. Ps. 51. 2, 5, 6, 10. ver. 7.
c ver. 32. cf. ch. 5. 31-38.
d ver. 5. cf. Is. 60. 21.
e cf. ch. 6. 53-58. cf. ch. 20. 17.
f cf. Prov. 30. 4. cf. ch. 1. 18.
g ch. 6. 38, 42, 58.
ch. 16. 28. h cf. 1 Ki. 8. 27; cf. Is. 57. 15.

tial, which the people must undergo in order to enter upon the long desired inheritance.

For us also the parabolic mode of speech employed should be no difficulty, constantly as He uses it to convey spiritual truth. The exercise needed for its apprehension He never seems to desire to avoid; for by it that apprehension is made more real, full and heartfelt. As spoken to a Jewish teacher, the words are perfectly natural; as his ignorance of their meaning shows his want of understanding of Israel's true condition and his own. Marvel it was indeed to her teachers that the people of God should need to be born again; but that need, so real and great, could only be met by the power of the unseen Spirit working in a way uncontrollable, as invisible to man, however plain the effects of it. It was the sovereign grace of God, therefore, which worked and must work, free as the wind, and if grace to Israel, could not be confined to Israel: we all have the same need, and are debtors to it alike.

2. But we have another need, and as imperative, which the Lord goes on to put beside the former. If men must be born again, the Son of man too must be lifted up that they may have eternal life. Death must minister to us as well as life: that which was against us must be put on our side; and then the full reality of His gift will be manifested,—not merely life, but eternal life.

Nicodemus can only express his bewilderment: "How can these things be?" he asks. The Lord asks in turn how he can be the teacher of Israel, and yet not know them. Then He affirms His own knowledge, from which He speaks, not with the uncertainty of their traditional teachers. Yet Israel received not His witness, even when He spoke of things upon earth, where what He said could in many ways be tested. New birth was a thing in this way sufficiently within their knowledge: for the work of the Spirit in men had a voice if they could hear it, and the prophets also had borne witness to it. Now if still they believed not, how would they believe if He spoke of heavenly things? of a sphere as to which they would have no witness but His own? For it was plain that there was no one—He is speaking of accessible witness only, as is manifest, not of Enoch or Elijah or the spirits of the dead—no one who had ascended up to heaven, to give any confirmation. His own witness must stand alone. He, the Son of man, had been in heaven; from heaven He had come down; still, by the mystery of His nature, the One who is in heaven. The divine-human Person comes out distinctly here, the One always in heaven, though a man on earth: of no created being could such a thing be said. And here at once comes in the witness of heavenly things; which, alas, Israel would reject, as we know they rejected Him who bore the witness, and of whom the witness was.

But that rejection itself was controlled of God to work out His purpose, and to this immediately therefore the Lord now goes on: "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so also must the Son of man be lifted up, that every one who believeth on Him should not perish, but have eternal life." Here the Cross is spoken of in its full character, as it clearly would be where the divine purpose is in view as here. Men indeed might lift up the Son of man (chap. viii. 28); and man's sinful act could not work out the righteousness of

And as [i]Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of man be [j]lifted up, that every one who believeth on him should [not perish, but] * have eternal life. For God so [k]loved the [l]world that he [m]gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever [n]believeth on him should [o]not perish, but have [p]eternal

*Some omit.

i cf. Nu. 21. 4-9.
j ch. 8. 28. ch. 12. 32-34. cf. Gal. 3. 13.
k 1 Jno. 4. 9, 10. cf. Tit. 3. 4-7.
l cf. ch. 12. 46, 47. cf. Rom. 5.
6-8. m cf. Gen. 22. 2; cf. 1 Jno 4. 14; cf. Rom. 8. 32. n ver. 36; ch. 5. 24. o cf. ch. 10. 28. ctr. 2 Thess. 1. 9. p ch. 6. 47, 54; ch. 17. 3; cf. 1 Jno. 5. 11-13.

God; but that lifting up in the divine ordering was to be for us the token of wrath endured, of curse taken and removed: for "cursed is every one that hangeth upon a tree." (See Deut. notes, p. 585). This answers, according to the type which the Lord brings forward, to the lifting up of the serpent in the wilderness, which healed, by looking to it simply, the serpent's bite. And Christ being made a curse for us, by faith in Him the power of sin in us is overcome, the poison of the serpent is done away for us. "In the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin"—a sin-offering—He has put away sin for us in that which condemns it in us: we are justified, and set upon God's side as to it. The Cross is salvation for us in this double character, as penalty owned, and penalty removed; which in result turns our eyes away from ourselves to Him who is henceforth to fill them.

The penalty borne for the believer, there can be for him no perdition. The application of the brazen serpent here seems fully to confirm the reading "shall not perish," omitted though it be by some of the earliest MSS. The having eternal life goes beyond the simple removal of death, and beyond the type, while it gives us the connection with the Lord's theme with Nicodemus. For, if "that which is born of the Spirit is spirit," the possession of the divine nature implies of necessity eternal life. That which is divine is that which is truly "eternal:" not simply unending when begun, but which had no beginning, and thus can have no end. The sacrificial work of Christ is here affirmed as the basis of this priceless gift to men, which in the moment of faith becomes assured to him who has this.

For this the Son of man must be lifted up: atonement must be made, and made by One in the nature of him who sinned; thus capable as man of taking the penalty upon man, and affirming the righteousness of God in it as bowing to it. Righteousness, the first necessity, is therefore met: the righteousness of God is put upon the side of the sinner who believes, as the apostle Paul will show us elsewhere. The ground of blessing is laid for all who will accept it.

But that is the human side; and God, if that be all, is the recipient only. His righteousness is declared, true; but that is not an adequate manifestation of Himself, and God is fully manifested in the gospel. Hence the Lord goes on to that most precious, most familiar statement of it in the Bible: "For God so loved the world, that He gave His Only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have eternal life."

Here we are at the heart of the matter. We have not now the conditions emphasized upon which divine mercy can come to us, though still it remains true that such conditions there are and must be, if God abide faithful to His own nature, as He must. But here we have the moving cause of our salvation, the activity of that nature: "God loved," for "God is love." Then He loved whom? the Jew? the better class among men? those that love Him? No: but the "world," and not even "the world of the elect," as some would put it, but (as what follows should make plain) the world at large, the great world of His creatures, though now estranged from Him. Loved them, then, how much? how can we find measure for this love of His? Here is the measure of it: He "so loved the world that He gave His Only-begotten Son; that every one who believeth on Him should not perish, but have eternal life."

Divine love has thus sought men with an earnestness and seriousness which life. For God sent not his Son into the world to [q]judge the world; but that the world through him might be [r]saved. He that [s]believeth on him is not judged; he that believeth not is judged [t]already, [u]because he hath not believed on the name of the only begotten Son of God.

3 (19-21): Manifestation by the light.

3. And this is the judgment, that the [v]light is come into the world, and men loved the darkness rather than the light, [w]because their deeds were evil. For every one that doeth evil [x]hateth the light, and cometh not to the light, that his [y]deeds may not be discovered;* but he that practiseth the truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be [z]manifested that they are wrought in God.

*Or, "reproved."

18. 7. y cf. ch. 7. 7; cf. Eph. 5. 11-13; cf. Heb. 4. 12, 13. z cf. 1 Jno. 1. 5-7; cf. 2 Cor. 1. 12; cf. Ps. 139. 23, 24.

q cf. Lk. 9. 56. cf. ch. 5. 45. ch. 12. 47.
r 1 Tim. 1. 15. Lk. 19. 10.
s ch. 6. 40. cf. Rom. 8. 1.
t ver. 36. cf. 2 Cor. 2. 15, 16.
u ch. 8. 24. ch. 16. 8, 9.
v ch. 1. 4, 5, 9. ch. 8. 12. ch. 12. 35, 36, 46.
w cf. Rom. 13. 12, 13.
x cf. Prov. 15. 12. cf. 2 Chron.

can only be questioned by questioning the true dignity of Him who has come so far on God's part, to give us the assurance of it. And to Him all the ages witness, who is Himself above them all, the unique phenomenon in human history, of all God's miracles the crowning one.

But if God's love has come out in such a manner, the rejection of it is as fatal as the acceptance is fraught with blessing. "How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation?" "He that believeth not is judged already, because he has not believed in the name of the Only-begotten Son of God." But not for judgment, but for salvation, did God send His Son. That the Redeemer will in fact be the Judge of men (chap. v. 22, 23, 27) is something very different from this, nay, opposite to it.

3. But light is come into the world, and the light makes everything manifest. Here is the judgment, that men do not desire manifestation when their deeds are evil, but love the darkness which conceals them. By turning from the light, they show that they know where the light is—that it bears witness to the conscience, although they are not in it so as to get the good of it. The practiser of truth comes to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest as being wrought in God.

Here, for the present, Nicodemus and the Lord part. The Pharisee is yet hindered by his Pharisaism, and these parting words seem words for his conscience, governed as he is so much by the people among whom he is. His name bears the same equivocal stamp with his character as yet. It may be "victory of the people" or "one who conquers the people:" which it will be with him is yet in the balance. But in a darker night than the present he is to come forth at last as conqueror, not conquered. His soul will have passed out of the shadow, just when the light might seem to have failed it. For him, as for many, "it shall come to pass that at eventime it shall be light."*

Sec. 2.

We have now the final testimony of John to Christ, with the contrast, drawn by John himself, between them. He, though a "burning and a shining light," as the Lord declares, is earthy, and must pale before the orb of day. But there is no sorrow to him in this: the friend of the Bridegroom only "rejoices greatly because of the Bridegroom's voice," and his testimony at the close rings out in such a manner that many take the latter part of it to be that of the Evangelist rather than the Baptist. But this does not seem, at least, to be marked out for us in any decisive way, and our own thoughts as to what might or might not

*The similarity and the contrast between Nicodemus and Nicolaos, from whom come the Nicolaitans of Revelation (chap. ii.) is to be noted. The Nicolaitans are conquerors of the people (of God); Nicodemus, of the populace. God has a laos, but not a demos.

SECTION 2. (Chap. iii. 22-36.)

John's final testimony: the contrast between himself and Christ.

AFTER these things came Jesus and his disciples into the land of Judea; and there he tarried with them and baptized. And [a]John also was baptizing in Ænon near to Salim, because there was much water there; and they came and were baptized. For John was not yet cast into [b]prison. There arose then a reasoning of the disciples of John with a Jew about [c]purifying. And they came to John and said unto him, Rabbi, he who was with thee beyond Jordan, to whom thou barest witness, behold, he baptizeth, and [d]all are coming to him. John answered and said, A man can receive nothing, except it hath been [e]given to him from heaven. Ye yourselves bear me witness that I said I am [f]not the Christ, but that I am sent before him. He that hath the bride is the [g]bridegroom; but the [h]friend of the bridegroom, who standeth and heareth him, joys with rejoicing because of the bridegroom's voice. This a Matt. 3. 5, 6.

b Matt. 14. 3-12.
c cf. Matt. 15. 1, 2, etc. cf. ch. 2. 6.
d ch. 4. 1-3. cf. Lk. 14. 25, 26.
e cf. 1 Cor. 3. 5-7.
f ch. 1. 20-27.
g Matt. 9. 15. Matt. 22. 2. cf. Ps. 45. 1, 9, 14.
h cf. Matt. 11. 10, 11. cf. Song. 5. 1.

transcend the intelligence of one in his position do not seem a sufficient authorization.

We find at the beginning here Jesus with his disciples in the country of Judea, and baptizing,—although we are presently assured that personally the Lord did not baptize, but His disciples only (chap. iv. 2). We have nowhere else an account of such baptizing, which we naturally conclude to have been of a similar character to that of John, which is immediately mentioned. It is a confirming witness of the truth that John was proclaiming, as we may gather also from Mark (i. 15). Baptism is in the New Testament always to death; Christian baptism to Christ's death (Rom. vi. 3); and to take one's place in death is a profession of repentance. Death is the sentence from God under which man has come through sin, and thus those baptized by John confessed in it the sins which had brought them there (Matt. iii. 6). In such a position they awaited the forgiveness which He who was coming after John would bestow. Now He had come, and His own proper ministry began, as is clear, beyond John's baptism. Yet He could through His disciples confirm the truth of this, while taking care to keep His own place apart.

John also continued baptizing, keeping his place as forerunner, and was now in Ænon, "abounding in springs," near to Salim, or Shalem, "peace." The names are as significant in this case as in all other in the word of God. Question arose here, we are told, between John's disciples and a Jew, about purifying. Of the nature of this, and of how little answer there might be, we may judge from the Lord's words with Nicodemus; and the want of settlement of such a question would be likely to bring up the further one of the new Teacher who had appeared; and the disciples come to John thereupon, with the announcement that He to whom he had borne witness was now Himself baptizing, and men were flocking to Him.

John had, in fact, raised questions which he could not settle: we may say that it was of the very essence of his mission, that it should be so. Jesus alone was to satisfy the expectations that had been aroused by John; and in him the spirit of the past ages found embodiment, pointing on beyond themselves. John, therefore, takes occasion by all this that has arisen to speak once more and decisively of his own relationship to Christ.

A man can receive nothing, he says, except what has been given him from heaven. For one satisfied with the will of God there is abiding contentment: for, let things go as they may, God still rules all. How blessed to realize that my joy then is fulfilled. He must [i]increase, but I must decrease. He who cometh from above is [j]above all: he that is of the earth is earthly and [k]speaketh [as] of the earth; he who cometh from heaven is above all. And what he hath [l]seen and heard, this he testifieth, and no one [m]receiveth his testimony. He that hath received his testimony hath set to his seal that [n]God is true. For he whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God; for God* is not giving the Spirit by [o]measure. The Father [p]loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand. He that [q]believeth on the Son hath eternal life; but he that is not subject† to the Son shall not see life, but the [r]wrath of God abideth upon him.

[i] cf. 2 Cor. 12. 5–10. cf. Gal. 2. 20.
[j] cf. ch. 1. 31. cf. Matt. 3. 14. cf. Rom. 9. 5.
[k] cf. ver. 12. cf. Mk. 1. 4.
[l] ver. 11. cf. ch. 1. 18. cf. ch. 8. 38.
[m] ch. 1. 11, ch. 8. 45.
[n] cf. 1 Jno. 5. 9, 10. cf. Rom. 3. 4.
[o] cf. Col. 2. 9. cf. ch. 14. 8, 9. cf. Tit. 3. 5, 6.
[p] cf. ch. 5. 20–23. cf. Gen. 24. 36.
[q] vers. 15, 16; ch. 20. 31.
[r] ver. 18; 1 Jno. 5. 12; cf. Eph. 2. 3.

* Many read, "He," but the meaning is the same.
† Or, "believeth not." The thought seems to be heart subjection.

which keeps the heart at peace unfailingly—bids one be still and know than He is God.

He had said he was not the Christ, but His fore-runner; and in the crowds that were flocking to the new Teacher he but saw that the bride was for the Bridegroom, not for himself, who was but the Bridegroom's friend. Did they grieve for him? he joyed with rejoicing—joyed exceedingly, in the Bridegroom's voice; though it meant for himself necessarily decrease, with the increase of that Other.

Was He not necessarily supreme? He who had come from heaven, and bare witness thus of heavenly things with direct personal knowledge of them, such as none that were of the earth could have. Value Him at His worth, what were these crowds that were coming to Him? It seemed, in fact, as if none were receiving His testimony. But those who did so, found therein the truth of God as to all His promises and in all His ways: he could set to his seal that God is true. For God was giving, through Him whom He had sent, free utterance to His own heart. In contrast with the fragmentary communications of former times, He was not now giving His Spirit by measure. Nay, here was the Son Himself, the Beloved of the Father, with all things given by this love into His hand: His words, therefore, are the full heart of God made known.

Faith in Him is, then, the one necessity: he that believeth on Him has eternal life; but he that is not subject to the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abides upon him. Eternal life or no life; eternal life or wrath abiding: these then are the alternatives.

Thus John sends his disciples to Jesus.

Sec. 3.

We have now to follow the Lord outside of Judea and even of Galilee, to find more receptive hearts in Samaria than in either of these, and His own heart freer than yet in Israel. A significant time it is, and all the more for its exceptional character, even in John's Gospel. Samaria, spite of the claim put forth to "our father Jacob," is really Gentile, though with a tinge of Israelitish blood which was worse than valueless, the fruit of mixed marriages forbidden and abhorred. The woman wonders that a Jew should ask but a drink of water from a Samaritan. Yet the spirit of the Lord, escaping from the oppressive self-righteousness of Jewish Pharisaism, finds room to expand in hostile Samaria; and here it is that He is fed with more than common food, and has before Him a view of whitening harvest-fields which we do not hear of elsewhere.

This connects clearly with the Lord's theme with the woman of Sychar, of living water springing up within the soul, which the evangelist, as we have seen, interprets elsewhere of the Spirit to be received in a new way after Jesus

SECTION 3. (Chap. iv. 1–42.)
Life in the Spirit.

1 (1-26): Abiding sufficiency in the soul.
1 (1-15): from God's gift.

1. [1] WHEN therefore the Lord knew that the Pharisees had heard that Jesus was making and baptizing [s] more disciples than John, (though Jesus himself baptized not, but his disciples,) he left Judea and [t] departed again to Galilee. And he must [u] needs pass through Samaria. He cometh therefore to a city of Samaria called Sychar, near to the piece of land that [v] Jacob gave to his son Joseph. Now Jacob's spring was there. Jesus therefore, being [w] wearied with his journey, sat thus at the spring. It was about the sixth hour. There cometh a s ch. 3. 22-26.

t ch. 1. 43. cf. Matt. 4. 12.
u cf. Matt. 15. 21, etc. cf. Lk. 19. 10.
v cf. Gen. 33. 19. cf. Gen. 48. 22. ver. 12.
w cf. Matt. 4. 2. cf. Matt. 8. 24. cf. Matt. 21. 18. cf. Heb. 4. 15.

should be glorified (chap. vii. 38, 39). Thus we are, in fact, on a line of truth characteristically Christian and Gentile; the Lord looking forward, as is plain, and speaking in the parabolic manner usual with Him in such connection; and yet so as to convey as much as could be conveyed of the blessing with which His heart overflows—of that abundant life which He is come to communicate (x. 10).

1. [1] The Lord Himself calls and prepares the messenger by whom He is going to reach the men of Sychar. Such a messenger He chooses! But it is not exceptional with Him to take up the beggar from the dunghill, so that, as we know, the publicans and sinners followed Him habitually. But here was one not following, but sought out,—a weary and jaded, not conscience-stricken sinner, whose wakening into life is a story which has wakened how many others! May God in His goodness tell it out once more, so that it may still be fresh in repetition, and some like her be attracted by it yet.

How suited that it is in His withdrawal for awhile from the self-righteous legalism of the Pharisees that the Lord comes into Samaria, to sow a new field with the Word of life! He withdraws even, as it would seem, from that baptism of disciples in which He has been rather accrediting John's testimony than giving voice to His own. John's voice was now hushed in prison, and his rejection had broken up that partial reestablishment of divine relationship with the people at large which the multitudes flocking around him might seem to have effected. It was gone, that dream of pious hearts in Israel: the shepherd was smitten and the sheep were scattered. And though the Chief Shepherd still remained, the open gathering was for the time given up, save of immediate followers needed for the maintenance and carrying on of the divine testimony, until it could be resumed on other ground.

With His back thus turned for the time upon Jerusalem, and His face turned toward Galilee, the place connected, typically at least, with Israel's restoration in the latter days, the two days' testimony in Samaria comes into its place morally, as a picture of the present interval of divine grace to the Gentiles. We shall find, in fact, when we come to the healing of the nobleman's son in Capernaum, that we have in this a real foreshadow of Israel's restoration when this interval is at an end. All is therefore in complete harmony.

We find, therefore, the Lord now at Sychar ("purchased") which took its name from the piece of land purchased by Jacob from the sons of Hamor, and given to Joseph, who was buried there. All that Jacob had purchased, therefore, (though he meant it otherwise,) and all that he could give to his best-loved son, was the place of a grave: a good place in which to speak of another gift and another purchase, free to all who desired and sought it, a spring of life instead of a place of death, and of which Jacob's spring could be at once the type, and (what all types must be) the instructive contrast also. To this spring, which as we learn directly was not free-flowing but shut up in a well, the Lord came, a wearied man, and sat Him down there.

woman of Samaria to draw water. Jesus saith unto her, [x]Give me to drink. For his disciples had gone away into the city to buy provisions. The Samaritan woman therefore saith unto him, How dost thou, being a Jew, ask drink of me, who am a Samaritan woman? For the [y]Jews have no dealings with the [z]Samaritans. Jesus answered and said unto her, If thou knewest the [a]gift of God, and [b]who it is that saith unto thee, Give me to drink, thou wouldst have asked of him, and he would have given thee [c]living water. The woman saith unto him, Sir, thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep: whence then hast thou the living water? Art thou greater than our father Jacob, who gave us the well, and drank of it himself, and his sons, and his cattle? Jesus answered and saith unto her, Every one who drinketh of this water shall [d]thirst again; but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall thirst [e]no more for ever; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a [f]spring of water, springing up unto eternal life.

x cf. Gen. 24. 14. cf. Lk. 15. 5 with vers. 32-34.
y cf. Ezr. 4. 3, 10. cf. Neh. 9. 2.
z cf. 2 Kl. 17. 24-41. cf. ch. 8. 48. cf. Lk. 17. 15-17.
a cf. Rom. 6. 23.
b cf. vers. 25, 26, 42. cf. ch. 9. 35-38.
c cf. Jer. 2. 13. cf. Is. 44. 3. cf. ch. 6. 51, 63.
d cf. ch. 6. 35, 58. cf. Rom. 6. 21. cf. Eccl. 1. 8 with Eccl. 2. 1-11.
e cf. Deut. 33. 23; cf. Gal. 5. 1 6; cf. Eph. 3. 17-19.
f cf. 1 Cor. 12. 13; cf. ch. 7. 37-39; cf. Eph. 1. 13, 14.

It was the sixth hour, under a noon-tide sun, and there a Samaritan woman came to draw water.

She too was weary, as her words presently indicate; alone, as He was alone, but only to make the essential contrast greater: she in the sin that isolates necessarily, shamefully, condemningly; He in the unique glory of His Person, of His quest, of His estrangement from the spirit of a world, in which were yet the objects that in love He sought. They were at opposite extremes,—in opposite paths,—and yet they met; not of her will or care, nor knew she what was before her; on His part, of the love which had in it its own necessity: "He must needs pass through Samaria."

Samaria had its name from the city which was its capital, "conservative," as it may be freely rendered, but in the interests of division. Alas, this went much further than they knew, and was but the expression of a deeper alienation, which could be healed only by Him who should cast Himself into the breach of human revolt from God, and bring back from it. "Give Me to drink" is here the first word of reconciliation, to the woman's wonder. "How dost Thou, being a Jew, ask drink of me, who am a woman of Samaria?" At once He brings before her God whom she knew not, and Himself in some way identified with the "gift of God" of which He speaks. Had she known, she would have taken the place of the needy one, which she truly was, and have sought of Him as having power and grace. He would not have refused her: He would have given her living water.

She does not understand, and His words are veiled as yet, for the water of such a springing well as that by which they were was in common phraseology "living" water. But this from Him in some mysterious way, with no visible means of drawing from that deep well, but as a "gift of God" telling out Him she had not known, in a way how different from her imaginings. The evident intention in all this, however much the terms may be discussed, is to make God in His love shine into her darkened soul, and to draw her by that love to Himself as the representative of God there for need on her part. Her wonder rises, and her eyes are fixed upon Him. She would learn from Himself, who is He? greater than her father Jacob, as it would seem, who himself depended with all his household upon this well alone! And still He draws her on, as He speaks now of the gift that He will give, not such water as she is thinking of, from the 2 (16-18): for sinners; the witness to the conscience.

[2] The woman saith unto him, Sir, [g] give me this water, that I thirst not, nor come hither to draw. Jesus saith unto her, Go, [h] call thy husband, and come hither. The woman answered and said, I have no husband. Jesus saith unto her, Thou hast well said, I have no husband; for thou hast had five husbands, and he whom now thou hast is not thy husband: this thou hast spoken truly.

g cf. ch. 6. 34. cf. Matt. 20. 22. cf. vers. 28, 29.

h cf. Ps. 50. 21. cf. ch. 2. 25. cf. Num. 32. 23.

well there: "Every one who drinketh of this water shall thirst again, but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall thirst no more for ever; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a spring of water springing up unto eternal life."

A marvelous advance, and a great miracle surely. Eternal life she knows in some sense. It is not a mere endless condition, but the life of the blessed. And this water, a perennial spring of refreshment within the man himself, springs up to eternal life! How her eyes would brighten and enlarge and fix themselves upon the wondrous Speaker! And yet she seems still to have grasped how little of that of which He is speaking: "Sir," she says, "give me this water, that I thirst not, nor come hither to draw."

Dull she is, indeed; and little, we may think, has been gained so far. After all, she is thinking still of bodily thirst and of literal water. Yet instructive it is to see the Lord's way of dealing with such an one. The enigmatic language, —common indeed among the children of the East, yet evidently misunderstood, and left at last without such explanation as (it would be natural to say) a soul like this would require: it is plain that it is not so much the mind as it is the heart at which He is aiming; grace and truth are found in it all, and in this order: both together, and yet grace leading and characterizing; dealing with the heart even before the conscience, which is never indeed forgotten, yet never attacked. How different the manner in all this from that with Nicodemus, a man with so many things in his favor compared with the woman here, and yet with whom the appeal to the conscience is so earnest, so immediate, so seemingly abrupt. Yet after all, the underlying principle is the same, and the very thing which at first seems against Nicodemus is, in reality, in his favor. The woman had yet to be drawn; the teacher of Israel with all his Pharisaism and stiff prejudice, was yet already drawn: the latter could bear to have the conscience searched as the other at first could not.

Another thing, however, to be taken into account is just this Pharisaism of the one, while the other, though her conscience needed also to be wakened by the truth, had no false refuge under which to hide itself, and which had to be torn away. Here the advantage was on the side of the woman, the evil of whose life made it a simpler thing to turn away from it all than it was for Nicodemus with his pseudo-saintly one. Hence the one comes quickly into blessing; the other struggles and is held back.

But let us look now, apart from all question of the dealing with the woman's soul, at the truth which is brought before us here. The living water is interpreted for us in the seventh chapter as spoken of "the Spirit which they that believed on Him should receive: for the Holy Spirit was not yet, because Jesus was not yet glorified." We have, of course, no reason to interpret the same figure differently here from there: so that the living water speaks of the Holy Spirit as come down from heaven, the characteristic of the present or Church-period. The Lord therefore is anticipating a then future time, and hence, no doubt, we find a certain reserve as to the way in which it is spoken of, the veil being more lifted as the time of the fulfilment draws nearer. The figure combines what in the statement as to new birth we had separately, the water and the Spirit. The water as the Word is that through which the Spirit of God works, and the Spirit is thus the life of the Word. The figure of the "spring"

2 (19-26): manifestation and worship.

[3]The woman saith unto him, Sir, I [i]perceive that thou art a prophet. Our fathers worshiped in [j]this mountain, and ye say that at Jerusalem is the place where one must needs worship. Jesus saith unto her, Woman, believe me that the hour cometh when ye shall [k]neither at this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem worship the Father. Ye worship ye [l]know not what; we know what we worship: for [m]salvation is of the Jews. But i cf. Lk. 7. 39. cf. ch. 9. 17. cf. ch. 8. 1-11.

j cf. Judg. 9. 7. cfr. Deut. 26. 2. cf. Ps. 78. 67-69.

k cf. Zeph. 2. 11.

cf. Mal. 1. 11. l cf. 2 Ki. 17. 28-41; cf. Acts 17. 23; cf. Gal. 4. 8. m cf. Ps. 147. 19, 20; cf. Rom. 3. 1, 2; cf. Rom. 9. 4, 5; cf. Acts 8. 14-17; cf. Is. 2. 3.

gives additional force to this, and especially with the addition "springing up." Power, freshness continually maintained, are in the spring; and the spring springs up—or "leaps," a strong expression—"unto eternal life."

What is the connection here between the spring—the Spirit of God in the believer—and the life? It is not surely merely an endless flow that is intended by the expression. Nor is it that the presence of the Spirit of God in the believer is needed for the commencement of life in the soul. Unhappily there is a lack of knowledge among Christians as to the true character of that gift of the Spirit which is characteristic of Christianity. We shall have it all fully brought out by the Lord Himself in His closing words to His disciples in the present Gospel. Here all this is anticipated, as already said, in these pregnant figures; and we must therefore anticipate what is there said, sufficiently to understand what is here before us. It should take little to convince us that the gift of the Spirit, that indwelling which the Lord promises His disciples there (chap. xiv. 17)—"He shall be in you,"—did not precede life in their case, nor bring it by this personal indwelling, but followed it. They were already in possession of life when the Lord promised this, and of eternal life, for there is no other spiritual life: it is eternal life or no life (see chap. vi. 53, 54). He declares also that it is eternal life to know the Father, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom He had sent (xvii. 3), that He had manifested the Father's name to them, and they had received His words, and believed that the Father had sent Him (6, 8). Thus they had eternal life already, when this promise was given. It could not be for them the result of a gift which was to come afterwards.

The indwelling of the Spirit necessarily supposes a house in which He could dwell; and it is not until new birth that such a house is formed. Christ received by the soul must be the foundation of it; and where Christ is, the Spirit of Christ can be. He witnesses to Christ, and thus the living waters begin to rise up in the soul, which shall henceforth be its perpetual satisfaction.

But how then "unto eternal life"? The water (the Word) and the Spirit have united to produce the life already. The gushing spring of living water has the same elements. The life is in the water; the Spirit is in the Word; but now it is the Spirit personally present, the Divine Witness Himself in permanence. Here all figures must fail to express the fulness of the blessing, infinite as the glorious Person. But it is plain that if eternal life is the product of the Word through the Spirit in the soul, then the satisfying fulness now must be in result to produce the abundance of the life itself in practical experience and power: the spring leaps up unto eternal life. Here eternal life is an experience, an application of "life" which we are all accustomed to distinguish from "life" as vital power,—the life we live from the life by which we live. But this is eternal life; and, as another has said, "to be complete, it must pour itself into the objective eternity: the eternal rests not till it comes to eternity."

After all, as interpreted by experience, the promise may seem too large. "Shall thirst no more for ever": what an assurance this is! But how little oftentimes does it seem to justify itself in actual realization. Here comes in the sad reminder for us of how we with our unbelief limit the glorious largeness of the divine promises, and often seem bent upon making falsehood of eternal Truth. Christ speaks according to the fulness of the gift bestowed. As to our

the [n]hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshipers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father [o]seeketh such as his worshipers. God is a Spirit; and those that worship him [p]must worship him in spirit and in truth. The woman saith unto him, I know that [q]Messias cometh, who is called Christ: when he is come, he will tell us all things. Jesus saith unto her, I who [r]speak to thee am he.

n cf. ch. 5. 25. cf. ch. 16. 25, 32.
o cf. Lk. 19. 10. cf. ch. 6. 44.
p cf. Acts 7. 48. cf. Heb. 10. 19-22. cf. Heb. 13. 10-16. cf. Phil. 3. 3.
q ch. 1. 41, 49; cf. Deut. 18. 15-19. r cf. ch. 9. 37; cf. Matt. 16. 15-17.

enjoyment of it, it is always conditional upon the way in which faith entertains it. We are not to "grieve the Holy Spirit of God whereby we are sealed to the day of redemption." But Christ is not going to draw in, in His picture of the Christian, things which are only blots and disfigurements. Alas for the unchristianity of Christians! but the shame of it is all our own. Eternal life is in us derived and dependent, needing the constant ministry of divine grace to maintain it in its manifestation in us, to develop and perfect it according to God. The full perfection of it is set before us to provoke our longing after it, and the boldness of faith to claim it from God. We are not to expect that it will be realized without the activity of faith and the diligent use of what God has given us as means to its attainment.

[2] Let us go back now to the woman. Attracted, wondering, faith in this mysterious Speaker beginning to awaken in her soul, she asks for this gift, pledged to her for the asking. "Sir," she says, "give me this water, that I thirst not, nor come hither to draw." She asks, but indeed knows not the gift of God, nor who it is that says to her, "Give Me to drink." But divine grace that is at work with her will not leave her thus, nor despise the day of small things which is nevertheless that work begun. Her heart is touched, desire awakened, her soul turning towards God; now she must have her conscience reached, that she may realize what her need is and find the satisfaction of it. But with what a gentle hand does He touch the sore that He is going to heal! the worse the sore the more gentle must be the handling. As if He would have her but bring another to share the gift for which she has asked, He says, "Go call thy husband and come hither." At once her life is bare before her. She shrinks and would cover it: "I have no husband." True, He says: I know it: "thou hast well said, I have no husband: for thou hast had five husbands; and he whom thou now hast is not thy husband: in that saidst thou truly."

So it is out. Put into few brief words, no lingering upon it, no upbraiding with it, there it yet lies before her in the light, never to be covered up again. He knows it, has known it, knew it when approaching her at first He had told her of God as she had never known Him. Now it is out, it seems like a confession He has made for her who had not courage to make it for herself. Said plainly indeed, yet not severely, but gently, pitifully, the words are like a pleading for her, a revelation of Himself. Is she not glad to be with Him upon these terms? nothing kept back, as indeed nothing could be kept back, from Him?

[3] "Sir," she says, "I perceive that Thou art a prophet:" that is her seal set to the truth of His words; and then, with that desire which He has awakened, to be (as even she, it seems, may be,) with God—therefore to be right with God, to approach Him in His own way, she puts the question of questions for a Samaritan: "Our fathers worshiped in this mountain; and ye say that Jerusalem is the place where one must needs worship."

It surely is not a putting off from her the first question of her sins. Had He not, with full knowledge of them, yet encouraged her to seek from God that gift of His, which she could see better now that He as the representative of God could offer to her? And in drawing near to God was there not a provision for sin, of His own establishment? Little she knew about the meaning of that yet. Little, as yet, did His own disciples know, even though the Baptist had pointed

2 (27-42): The work widens; two days of testimony.

2. And upon this [s]came his disciples, and wondered that he was speaking with *a woman; yet no one said, What seekest thou? or, Why speakest thou with her? The woman then [t]left her water-pot and went away into the city, and saith unto the men, Come, see a man who [u]told me all things that I ever did: is not this the Christ? They went out of the city [therefore],† and came to him.

s ver. 8.

t cf. Lk. 5. 11, 27, 28. cf. Phil. 3. 7.

u cf. Ps. 50. 21. cf. ch. 3. 19, 20.

* Or "the." The absence of the article does not necessarily make the noun indefinite.

† Many omit.

to the "Lamb of God." Was there not, however, in her heart something beginning which could make her better understand about that spring within the heart, of living water? And here was One who could resolve her doubts, and give her questions a divine answer! He does; but in a way how different from her expectations, when He sets aside both Gerizim and Jerusalem! To her the poor Samaritan, He makes known what those in closest companionship with Himself were as yet not prepared for. Yet He does not leave the question of Samaritan worship unsettled either; rather it assumes a more serious character: but first He tells her of the transcendent hour at hand which should abolish all outside worship and let men into the sanctuary of God, as children to worship the Father. What a revelation to this woman of shameful life, to whom just a moment before that life had been shown out without a remnant of a veil to hide it! Yet who among the mere children of men was better fitted than she, upon any title in himself, to draw near? And, if God were showing grace, to whom rather than to such as she would that grace manifest itself in more glory?

And now it was the Father seeking worshipers. Could it be kept back, the spring of happiness which in her also was beginning to well up, interpreting that former perplexing figure, and already seeking outflow? True, she had worshiped she knew not what; coldly, indifferently, or with spasms of dread in the gloom of the supernatural. And all the while in Israel, though even there the mass might know it as little as she, was the river of salvation. "Salvation" was "of the Jews": a stream which as yet indeed ran low and narrow between its banks, which the lowly and the thirsty alone knew of, but which was there: soon to burst forth in copious refreshment; salvation, by which men came to know God! And the hour was coming, and now was,—how that announcement must have woke the echoes in her heart!—when the true worshipers (not righteous, not self-approved, yet true)—when the true worshipers should worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father was seeking such to worship Him in the only way in which God, as a Spirit, could be acceptably worshiped.

Yes, she knew it, or, at least, approved it as He spake it, but too wonderful it seemed; the rush of many thoughts too great. Then as she yet believed not for joy and wondered, the cry arose in her heart for the full Interpreter of all, Messias! was He at hand? Then indeed would all perplexity be ended, all anxiety at rest: "when He is come," she says, "He will tell us all things."

And He who saw divinely all her heart, as He had seen her life,—seen the craving of her heart, seeking the good that came not, saw His work was done. For her there was but one satisfying good remaining: One for whom now the joy that had arisen in her soul waited as its justification, whom the expected longing of her heart forewitnessed as at hand: Messias, the Christ. There was but one thing more to do: and with His own heart full (as presently He bears witness that it is) yet with the quiet of that supreme contentment in His words, He completes her blessedness:—

"I that speak to thee am HE."

Thus is the living water reached for her, if not yet the Spirit of God had come

In the meanwhile his disciples asked him, saying, Rabbi, eat. But he said unto them, I have [v]food to eat that ye know not. His disciples therefore said to one another, Hath any one brought him to eat? Jesus saith unto them, [w]My food is that I should do the will of him who sent me, and finish his work. Say ye not that there are yet four months and the harvest cometh? Behold, I say to you, Lift up your eyes, and look upon the fields; for they are [x]white already unto the harvest. He that reapeth receiveth [y]wages, and gathereth fruit unto life eternal, that he that soweth and he that reapeth may [z]rejoice together. For in this is the saying true, [a]One soweth and another reapeth. I sent you to reap that on which ye have not labored: [b]others have labored, and ye have entered into their labors.

And [c]many of the Samaritans out of that city believed on him on account of the word of the woman who testified, He told me all things that I ever did. When therefore the Samaritans came to him, they [d]asked him to abide with them, and he abode there two days. And more a great deal believed on account of his word. And they said unto the woman, No longer do we believe on account of [e]thy saying; for we have heard him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the [f]Saviour of the world.

v cf. Matt. 16. 6–12.
w ch. 6. 38–40. Ch. 17. 4. cf. Lk. 2. 49.
x cf. Matt. 9. 36–38. cf. 1 Cor. 16. 8, 9. cf. Acts 18. 9–11.
y cf. Ps. 126. 6. cf. 1 Thess. 2. 19, 20. cf. 2 Tim. 4. 7, 8.
z cf. 1 Cor. 3. 6–9. cf. Am. 9. 13.
a cf. Acts 18. 27. cf. Col. 2. 1, 2. b cf. Matt. 11. 13. cf. Heb. 1. 1, 2. c ver. 42. cf. Mk. 5. 19.
d ctr. Mk. 5. 17.
e cf. 1 Ki. 10. 6, 7.
f 1 Jno. 4. 14. cf. ch. 3. 16, 17.

to be the indwelling Spring of it within her. Doctrinally, the connection of the whole is plain; as indeed the Lord's words carry us on to the day of an opened sanctuary and of Christian worship. Without this the fulness of life in the Spirit could not be expressed, the living water could not spring up. We see clearly also how anticipative, how Christian, in the truth contained in it, the Gospel of John is. We shall notice this more and more as we go on in it.

2. The stream of blessing widens: the woman becomes the messenger of Christ, to tell out in the city the blessedness she has received. The Man who had told her all things that she ever did is One to whom she can freely invite others. She has left her water-pot behind to carry the news of living water; and her tale procures many listeners who come out of the city to find the One who has lighted up with His love this heart so dark.

Meanwhile His disciples have come back from the city, where they had gone to buy provisions, and find Him refreshed and independent of the food. In answer to their astonishment, He tells them that His food is to do the will of Him that sent Him and to finish His work. And then He speaks to them of fields that He sees already ripening to a spiritual harvest, and of the common joy of sower and of reaper. In fact, they were to enter into the labors of previous generations, of the prophets who had prepared the way for them, Himself above all the unwearied Worker for the salvation of men. Israel might reject Him, and His labor seem vain in this respect, but here, outside of Israel, He sees the incoming of the Gentiles, while the tardy fields of Judea yet showed no sign.

Of this the Samaritans here are now the first-fruits, and there follow two days of fruitful testimony, in which at their solicitation He abides with them; many believing through the woman's witness to Him, and yet more through His own word; while their faith owns Him as the Saviour, not of Israel only, but of the world. All this shows plainly what is foreshadowed here.

SECTION 4. (Chap. iv. 43-54):
Israel's need bared and met with mercy.

Now after the two days he departed thence to Galilee. For Jesus himself bare witness that a [g]prophet hath no honor in his own country. When therefore he came into Galilee the Galileans received him, having seen all the things that he did at Jerusalem at the feast: for [h]they also went to the feast. He came therefore again to Cana of Galilee, where he had made the [i]water wine. And there was a certain *courtier whose [j]son was sick at Capernaum. This man, having heard that Jesus had come out of Judea into Galilee, went to him and asked him that he would come down and heal his son: for he was at the [k]point of death. Jesus therefore said unto him, Except ye see [l]signs and wonders ye will not believe. The courtier saith unto him, †Sir, come down, ere my child die. Jesus saith unto him, [m]Go, thy son liveth. The man [n]believed the word that Jesus said unto him, and went his way. But already, while he was going down, his servants met him, saying that his son lived. He inquired of them therefore the hour at which he began to amend. They said therefore unto him, Yesterday, at the seventh hour the fever left him. Then the father [o]knew that it was at that hour at which Jesus said to him, Thy son liveth; and himself [p]believed, and his whole house. This [q]second sign again did Jesus when he came out of Judea into Galilee.

g Matt. 13. 57.
h ch. 2. 23. cf. ch. 7. 1-9.
i ch. 2. 1-11.
j cf. Lk. 8. 41, 42. cf. Lk. 9. 38. cf. Jer. 31. 15-17.
k cf. Ps. 44. 22.
l cf. ch. 2. 18. cf. Matt. 12. 38-42. cf. ch. 20. 29.
m cf. Matt. 15. 28. cf. Matt. 8. 13.
n cf. ver. 53.
o cfr. ch. 9. 18, 24.
p cf. ch. 11. 45.
q ch. 2. 11.

*Literally, "king's officer." Probably attached to Herod's court.
†Or "Lord."

Sec. 4.

But John, while he shows us characteristically a Christ outside of Judaism, and the precious truths which are now enjoyed in Christianity, always reminds us that God has not given up His purposes as to Israel, which are delayed but not forfeited by their unbelief. We have seen this in the first division of the book, in the miracle at Cana, where the delay of blessing in their case is accounted for, but as soon as the empty forms of purification are made real (the water fills the water-pots), then the wine, the good wine, is found in them. Now the Lord is found at Cana again, having left the white fields of Samaria for Galilee, and another miracle is wrought, though the subject of it is at Capernaum, not Cana. Judea has rejected Him, but Galilee seems ready to receive Him, and now in the courtier who comes to Him at Cana we find a plain picture of Israel, courtier of the world as she has long been. His condition, as the Lord characterizes it, is just what hers has been: "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe." But he is in need: his son at the point of death in Capernaum, the city of lost opportunities, to be brought down to hades for its rejection of Christ; death facing him, he turns to Christ as his only hope, and finds the gracious answer of peace and deliverance: "Go, thy son liveth." He believes, departs, and finds it as the Lord has said to him. His son is raised up, and his whole house is brought to faith with him.

It is a simple story; and thus will Israel in her extremity be brought to God. Capernaum will come to Cana, the "village of consolation" be restored to its name upon the ground of "purchase," Christ manifesting forth His glory. And the time is not far distant now.

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chaps. v.–viii. 1.)

Eternal Life as separating from a World under Death.

SECTION 1. (Chap. v.)

Quickening by the sovereign grace of Christ; righteousness attaching to it.

1 (1-9): The power of Christ when grace itself (in connection with law) is barren.

1. AFTER these things was a [r]feast of the Jews, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem. Now there is in Jerusalem by the [s]sheep-[place]* a pool, which is called in Hebrew Bethesda, having five porches. In these, lay a [t]multitude of the sick, blind, lame, withered, waiting for the moving of the water. For an angel went down, at a certain season, in the pool, and troubled the water. [u]Whoever then first stepped in after the troubling of the water, was made whole of whatever disease he had.† Now a certain man was there who had been in his infirmity [v]thirty and eight years.

r cf. ch. 6. 4.

s Neh. 3. 1, 32. cf. Is. 53. 7.

t cf. Mk. 1. 32, 33.

u cf. Ezek. 18. 20-23. cf. Is. 55. 7. cfr. Rom. 5. 6.

v cf. Deut. 28. 59. cf. ch. 9. 1.

* Or "gate."

† The most ancient MSS. generally omit from "waiting" to "had." But the Alexandrian retains it, with the Vulgate. And the narrative needs it for its complete intelligibility.

This rounds off to a complete end, as is evident, the first subdivision of this central portion of the book.

SUBD. 2.

The second subdivision continues the subject of the first, eternal life as communicated to men, and dependent, a life of faith and communion; but this is now looked at as distinguishing and separating from the world, from its character and portion. As in the last subdivision also, the Spirit of God is seen as giving the life its power and fulness, and even under the same image as before, the living water; but it is now not simply rising up within and refreshing the one in whom it is, but overflowing to others also, "rivers of living water." This is naturally a third section; the first shows the life as quickening by the voice of the Son of God, who is at the same time the Judge of men; and the quickening is thus an acquittal by the Judge, a sentence of righteousness. The second shows us the life of faith with its sustenance, and communion resulting. The three sections together form evidently once more a complete whole.

Sec. 1.

The first section has been already briefly characterized. We find in it, more clearly than in what has preceded, an incident taken from one of the Lord's abundant miracles, and made an object lesson from which the teaching following it is drawn. Yet the truth given goes beyond the illustrative object, as is necessarily the case in one way or other with all typical or parabolic teaching: a thing which needs to be at once fully realized, and guarded from the abuse which has been often made of it. We shall have help given as to this in all this part of John.

1. The impotent man as healed by Christ is the object lesson of this chapter. The background of this is the story of Bethesda with its own impotence to heal such a case as his, spite of the angelic intervention, which made the pool a "house of mercy," but with conditions with which the man here before us could not comply. The nature of the disease forbade his availing himself of the proffered remedy.

A "feast of the Jews" brings up the Lord again to Jerusalem. We are not even told what feast it was, and the language seems plainly to tell us why, sufficiently striking as it is, even in John's Gospel, where alone it is found. A "feast of the Jews," as such, we are outside of here, even though it was the occasion of the Lord's visit; which, indeed, as all this Jerusalem ministry, only

When Jesus saw him lie, and knew that he had been already a long time [thus], he saith unto him, [w] Wilt thou be made whole? The infirm man answered him, Sir, I have [z] no man, when the water is troubled, to w cf. ver. 40. cf. Lk. 15. 28.

x cf. Lk. 10. 31, 32. cf. Is. 63. 5.

served to expose the hollowness of what was going on there, and along with this the powerlessness of the law itself as a remedy for man's condition. This last is surely the main point here: it brings us at once to what Bethesda shows us,—a truth which sets aside all help in the old covenant, and shuts one up to the grace of God alone.

Bethesda immediately comes into view with its porches filled with the sick, who are waiting for the visitation of that miraculous power which at a certain season troubled the water. Then for the moment there is healing virtue for the one who can first step in: there is the condition, the only one; whatever the virulence of the disease, it may be cured, if only one can get into the pool; but for impotence there is no healing possible.

In the midst of this multitude our eyes are fixed upon one man who lies there vainly seeking help. For thirty and eight years the disease that has fastened upon him has rendered him helpless; and there he lies in the presence of a remedy which for him is none. Others may be healed, not he. He is not able to step into the pool; he has none to put him in. The desperateness of this condition engages the heart and hand of Jesus on his behalf; he is not put into the pool; but he hears the omnipotent word which heals him, and in a moment rises up, takes up the bed he lies upon and walks.

As all these miracles are types of spiritual healing, we cannot be wrong in interpreting this of such. Moreover, the connection in this case between sin and helplessness is plain from our Lord's words to this man afterwards (ver. 14). It is a general truth which the Lord affirms that "he that committeth sin is the bond-servant of sin" (ch. viii. 34, R. V.); and none can break this bondage but the Redeemer of men. All modes of healing man's disease, short of the power and grace of Christ Himself, do but by their failure make its obduracy more manifest, and the need of Christ. And for this the law was given—not of God's choice, but of man's choice—to demonstrate against his unbelief man's utter helplessness. For all modes of man's devising are but law in principle, and men can imagine no other: it must be man's work or God's grace. Of the impossibility of its being the former Bethesda speaks to us.

The law, indeed, as given the first time,—pure law and nothing else,—had nothing remedial in its nature, and as under it Israel stood not at all, so none could expect to stand. The first tables of the covenant were broken at the foot of the mount by the hand of him who had just brought them down, and nothing remained of it but penalty.

But this was not the sufficient trial of man, for the very reason that in it as yet there was nothing remedial. We recognize without much difficulty that we are sinners, and that God must show mercy, while yet we cannot give up the legal principle. We need forgiveness,—need help,—need abatement of the severity of pure law: that is readily owned; but to give up all possibility—all need, therefore—of human work, man's pride and conscience unite in an earnest struggle against such a complete setting aside of responsibility, as he imagines it,—such an acknowledgment of complete failure in responsibility as it really means. Thus arise the various schemes of amalgamation of law and grace with which the religious systems of men abound; all of which the second giving of the law anticipated and has set aside, while it has shown how alone such a scheme could satisfy the requirements of the divine character.

The standard of responsibility never can be lowered, whether actually or virtually. The same tables of the covenant that had been broken are restored. The mercy of God may blot out the past, and allow a new beginning, but never an alteration of the terms (if they are to be legal terms) of final acceptance.

2 (9-18): The ruin for sinful men which would result from law being maintained with them; and the opposition of the men of law.

put me into the pool; but while I am coming, another goeth down before me. Jesus saith unto him, [y]Rise, take up thy bed and walk. And immediately the man was made whole, and took up his bed and walked.

2. And on the same day was the [z]sabbath. The [a]Jews therefore said unto him that was healed, It is the sabbath; it is not lawful for thee to take up thy bed. But he answered them, He that [b]made me whole, the same said unto me, Take up thy bed and walk. They asked y Matt. 9. 6, 7. cf. Acts 14. 8-10. cf. Rom. 4. 19, 23-25.

z ch. 9. 14. cf. Lk. 6. 6-10.

a cf. Matt. 12. 2, etc.

b cf. Mk. 2. 28.

Thus with the declaration made this second time, that God is "gracious and merciful, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin," it is no less positively maintained that He "can by no means clear the guilty." "When the wicked man turneth from his wickedness, and doeth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive"; but it must be "that which is lawful and right,"—nothing less. But that is the very thing which is so hopeless.

If God can accept less, how much less? where can one stop? with the best that one can do? A careless soul may treat that carelessly; but who ever has done really the best one could? Will He take less still? These thoughts are only inventions of the enemy, and of which the word of God knows nothing. But then the whole scheme breaks down at that very point.

This Bethesda witnesses: at the place of sheep, whether gate or pool (the doubt about what it is may be itself significant), the "house of mercy" rears its five pillars, clinging still to the number of responsibility, with no help for the impotent such as is this man, for thirty-eight years afflicted for his sin, as Israel for theirs wandered in the wilderness an equal time, until "that evil generation" had perished from among them. No thought could there have been of help in the pool at all, if that heavenly influence had not troubled the water. But for him it is still in vain—vain as the troubling of law by grace, which in a legal system is always that, two contradictory principles being at work in it. From the typical point of view, however, the case of the impotent man is no exception; yet how many as with him think of it as such, are "coming," but always ineffectually, and looking for help, whether from man or God, to get into the pool.

How new an experience comes with the voice of Jesus. "Wilt thou be made whole?" Yet he begins to talk about the pool. Why not? Must it not be of God, when the angel comes down into it? And the law: is it not of God? was it not "given by the disposition of angels"? And we would even have Christ but a servant of Moses, a means of enabling us to keep the law; or One giving virtue to sacramental ordinances, always with man's aid in some way to perfect them. But Jesus passes by the pool altogether, making whole at once by His word. The thirty-eight years of impotence are ended in a moment: the man rises and walks.

2. Conflict begins on the part of the fleshly religionists who know neither their own need nor the grace of God. We have seen the image of law in the pool, and the grace and power of Christ manifested in contrast with it. We shall find in what follows how fully in accordance with this is the truth that is now to come before us. The healed man in obedience to the Lord's word takes up his bed; and that day was the Sabbath. The Jews naturally object that he is violating the law; and his answer throws the entire responsibility for this upon the One who healed him. He knows not even who He is, He has got lost from him among the throng: so that the miracle itself seems to have had no right effect upon him; and this is confirmed by what shortly follows, when the Lord, finding him in the temple, warns him not to bring on himself again by sin a judgment which would increase in severity. The result is that he goes and tells the Jews that it was Jesus who had made him whole.

Thereupon the anger of the Jews flames out against Jesus because He has done him, therefore, Who is the man who said unto thee, Take up thy bed and walk? But he that had been healed knew not who it was; for Jesus had [c]withdrawn himself, a multitude being in that place. After these things Jesus findeth him in the temple and said unto him, Behold, thou art made whole: [d]sin no more, lest some [e]worse thing befall thee. The man departed and [f]told the Jews that it was Jesus who had made him whole. And on this account the Jews [g]persecuted Jesus [and sought to slay him,]* because he had done these things on the sabbath. But Jesus answered them, My Father is [h]working until now, and I work. Therefore the more did the Jews seek to kill him, because he had not only broken the sabbath, but also said that God was his own Father, [i]making himself equal with God.

3. [j]Jesus therefore answered and said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, The Son can do [k]nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do. For whatsoever

* Many omit.

[c] ch. 8. 59. Ch. 10. 39.

[d] cf. ch. 8. 11.

[e] cf. Matt. 12. 45. cf. Prov. 29. 1. ctr. ch. 9. 35-38.

[f] cf. 1 Sa. 22. 7-10.

[g] ch. 7. 19-24.

[h] ctr. Gen. 2. 2, 3. cf. Is. 43. 24.

[i] cf. ch. 10. 33. cf. Phil. 2. 6. cf. ch. 14. 9.

[j] ver. 30. cf. ch. 10. 17, 18. cf. ch. 16. 13.

3 (19-29): The revelation.

[k] (19-23): His unity with the Father in work and will.

these things on the Sabbath. It was for them the sign of that covenant to which they held, and which they did not discern had gone so fatally against them. The Lord in answer takes the highest ground here. True, He works on and knows no rest in His labor of love. He was in communion with His Father, who worked on and knew none. How could He rest—how could they wish God to have His rest, with men in the misery into which sin had brought them? Had they given Him His rest, of whom He had complained that they had made Him to serve with their sins, and wearied Him with their iniquities? (Isa. xliii. 24.) But then where were they with reference to this covenant of law of which the Sabbaths were the sign, and which had gone so terribly against them?

It was indeed the highest ground that He could take, Himself not with the people in their sin and failure, universal as it was, nor under its penalty, but working in the pity of His Father towards them in those divine works which manifested Him as all that He claimed to be. What could they give as answer? Nothing but, alas, the vindictive animosity of their pride so humbled, sin so unanswerably charged against them! Yet how had He charged? Nay, it was not He, whose works of mercy besought them rather to take shelter under the wings that brooded over them. They flung from them the appeal. Of Him, the Son of the Father, in their midst, they will not permit themselves to face the possibility, and as the only alternative must persecute Him to the death for claiming it.

3. They are in fact forced to a decision; and He will not leave them, therefore, without the distinct revelation of the glory that is His. This follows consequently immediately, with an overwhelming argument against their unbelief. The effect seems to have been for the time the silencing of His accusers, although their enmity is not removed, and we find it at His next visit to Jerusalem bursting out in a more determined effort to get Him into their hands.

[j] They might have misunderstood Him as to His unique claim to have God for His Father; although no Israelite would have ventured to speak of God after that manner. That God was a Father to Israel meant something very different, as they rightly conceived, though faith might have found in it an encouragement to draw nearer to Him than in fact there was ability for. But the Lord leaves them no room to doubt in what follows now of the high and exclusive way in which He declares Himself the Son of God. Even the refusal of the possibility of an independent will with Him in what He did, was itself a claim of the highest kind that could be made, consistent with the unity of the Godhead. It is things he doeth, these things the Son also doeth in like manner. For the [k]Father loveth the Son, and showeth him all things that he himself doeth; and [l]greater works than these will he show him, that ye may marvel. For as the Father [m]raiseth up the dead and quickeneth them, so also the Son quickeneth whom he [n]will. For neither doth the Father [o]judge any one, but hath given all judgment to the Son; that all may [p]honor the Son, even as they honor the Father: he that honoreth not the Son [q]honoreth not the Father who hath sent him.

[k] ch. 3. 35. ch. 15. 9, 10.
[l] cf. ch. 14. 12.
[m] ch. 11. 43, 44.
[n] cf. Jno. 15. 16.
[o] cf. Acts 17. 31. cf. Ps. 2. 6. cf. Matt. 26. 63-65.
[p] cf. Phil. 2. 10, 11. cf. Rev. 5. 11-14.
[q] cf. Lk. 10. 16. cf. ch. 15. 23; cf. 1 Jno. 2. 23.

true, also, that the unity of which he speaks here is a practical, ethical one, and not a unity of essence; but it goes so far as to lead up to this. He does not either for a moment forget the manhood that He has taken. The Father "shows" Him; He "sees what the Father does" and does in like manner; but who beside the Eternal Son could speak of doing "in like manner" to the Father? even to raising up the dead and quickening them?

The threefold "verily, verily,"—the strong form of affirmation which only John records—naturally divides what is here said into three parts; the first of which declares this practical unity. So perfect is it that He can do nothing of Himself; there is a moral impossibility of His doing anything that is not the expression of the Father's mind. He sees the Father's doing, and does in like manner whatever the Father does. Omniscience and omnipotence are involved in this, and yet in One who is in the place of dependence, but to whom, in the love He has to Him, the Father shows all things that He does. The One who is able to see all that God sees: who is He?

Thus what had startled the Jews—the recent miracle—was but a small thing in comparison of what would indeed awaken their wonder. The Father, they acknowledged, raised the dead and quickened them*: true, and the Son quickens whom He will. But this involves power in His hands as Judge: for to bring up really from the dead those to whom death, as with men in general, is by divine sentence, means judicial power to reverse that sentence. This leads on to a most important consequence, as we shall see directly. In fact, the Father judges no one, but has committed all (final, definitive) judgment to the Son, giving Him honor such as belongs to the Father Himself; and indeed, necessarily, he who does not honor the Son does not honor the Father either: for He has sent Him. Such is the unity of the Son with the Father. It is a unity in Godhead; or else we are taught to give to a creature the honor due to God alone.

[2] Such then is the glory of the One they are challenging. He is the divine Judge of all: the Lord of life and death. Hence follows the blessed consequence: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth Him that sent Me hath eternal life, and cometh not into judgment, but is passed out of death into life." Thus with the possession of eternal life comes deliverance not merely from condemnation, as the common version renders it, but from judgment itself; the very reception of life is an acquittal: the Judge has spoken, and there is no more judgment needing to be reached.

Eternal life is thus marked by bowing to the word of Christ, which is the accrediting of Him who sent Him; and so He says when speaking to the Father at an after-time: "This is life eternal, that they may know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent" (ch. xvii. 3). On the other hand, those are dead who "having the understanding darkened, are alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blind-

* Raising the dead without quickening might be, as in the case of Samuel: to make them really alive is a further and greater thing.

2 (24): the deliverance of the believer from death and judgment.

[2] Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that [r]heareth my word, and believeth him that sent me, hath [s]eternal life, and cometh not into [t]judgment, but hath [u]passed out of death into life.

r cf. ch. 8. 43. cf. Matt. 13. 9. cf. ch. 12. 37-40. cf. Rom. 8. 17.

cf. 1 Pet. 1. 21. s ch. 3. 15. t cf. Rev. 20. 11-15; cf. Rom. 8. 1. u cf. Col. 1. 13.

ness"—or "hardness"—"of their hearts" (Eph. iv. 18). This, alas, is not the exceptional condition of a few among men, but of the Gentiles, the "nations," says the apostle; and Israel is no better. "As in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man." It is God alone who can break through a barrier of this kind, and bring "out of death into life."

[2] Life then is the fundamental necessity, the first thing needed by the soul: there is no middle state, as is evident, between life and death. We have to learn, and it may be only very gradually, as the child born into the world learns, what life is as the condition into which we have come; but without the life itself we could not have even the most rudimentary experience. We live the life, because we have the life whereby we live: if we do not distinguish in the spiritual realm, as we have to do in the natural, these two things from one another, all will be in confusion with us.

Life for the dead is resurrection-life; and the Lord now asserts the power of resurrection to be in His hands in a double way, spiritual and physical. He speaks as the Incarnate Word, and does not go back to the time of His pre-existence. He speaks of what shall be, but what is already begun, and of Himself as the Son of God among men, distinguishing between the "hour" of the spiritual and the "hour" of the physical renewal. The one had come already, though in its full blessedness as in Christianity, it had yet to come. The dead were already hearing the voice of the Son of God, and to every one that heard it it was life. Nor was there any distinction between the life as then given, and the life as it would be given: it was in either case an impartation of the life that was in Himself, as Source of it for men. For as the Father had life in Himself, so had He given to the Son to have life in Himself: "given," according to the divine counsel, to Him who was to be the "Last Adam," the Head of the new humanity; but thus to have it in Himself as the Father had it in Himself, as the Source from which others might derive it.

Let us clearly understand what is taught us here. The life in Him is of course eternal life: we understand why it is eternal; that which is in the Father and in the Son must be so. It is not simply because it will never end, but because also it never began: it always was and it always will be; that is eternity in the full sense of eternity.

It is not eternal life because it has come through death and is beyond it: in the Father, it never came through death; as divine life it never can be touched by it. It begins in us, and in us is in character a resurrection life; but that is not why it is eternal life, but it is eternal because it is divine.

It is life in us also: that is distinctly declared. Quickening is the impartation of life: except it were life in us, it would not be our being made to live at all. It is not Christ's having it in Himself that constitutes the difference between Him and those to whom He imparts it, but that He has it as the Father has it, is the perpetual Source and Fountain of it to others. We have it always in dependence—always in Him; were it possible to be cut off from Him, all would be at an end for us, but that does not mean that it is not in us, which it is positively asserted to be. "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink His blood, ye have no life in you": that on the one side; on the other, "he that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life" (ch. vi. 53, 54). Thus it is eternal life or no life, and it is of "life in you"—therefore eternal life in you—that He is speaking throughout. Otherwise it would be still true as to the one who had eaten the flesh of the Son of man, that there was no life in him. And again in His first epistle John says, "Every one that hateth His brother is a murderer, and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him"

2 (25-29): resurrection manifesting His glory.

3 Verily, verily, I say unto you, that the hour cometh, and *now is, when the *dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live. For as the Father hath *life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself, and hath given him authority to execute judgment [also], because he is *Son of man. Marvel not at this, for an hour is *coming in which all that are in the tombs shall hear his voice and shall come forth; they that have practised† good unto a *resurrection of life, and they that have done† evil to a *resurrection of judgment.

* Some omit. † Different words in the original.

v cf. ch. 4. 23.
w cf. Eph. 2. 1, 5.
x cf. ch. 6. 57. cf. ch. 1. 4.
y ver. 22. cf. Acts 10. 42.
z cf. Matt. 25. 31.
a cf. 1 Cor. 15. 12. cf. Acts 24. 15.
b cf. 1 Cor. 15. 42-44. cf. 1 Thess. 4. 16. cf. Rev. 20. 4-6.
c cf. Rev. 20. 12-15.

(1 Jno. iii. 15): words that would have no force except from the fact that the Christian has eternal life abiding in him.

Notice that expression, "abiding in him": it naturally refers us to what we have in the Gospel afterwards, where the Lord figures under a vine and its branches the relation of His people to Himself. Here the branch abiding in the vine is the condition of the vine in its life, which is its sap, abiding in the branch. This the Lord follows up with His "ye in Me and I in you" as the condition of fruit-bearing. So in the epistle, the life abiding in the professing Christian is tested by the fruit; the abiding of the life being maintained by the constant active inflow of the fulness that is in Christ into the lives of His people.

That our life is in Christ, then,—or as John rather puts it, in the Son,—is in no wise in opposition to its being in us also, as communicated, dependent life. Such it always is, and always will be. Our ability to define or give it rightful expression is feeble enough; even natural life has never been successfully defined; in cleaving closely to the inspired language we shall find a safeguard to our thoughts which will at the same time help them to legitimate expansion.

If the Father has given to the Son to have life in Himself in the same way that the Father has, the natural corollary to this is that "He hath given Him authority to execute judgment, because He is Son of man." The giving of life we have already seen in fact to imply such authority, inasmuch as it is at the same time a freeing from judgment; that is, from coming personally into it. A giving account of ourselves there will surely be, and a judgment of works, but not a judgment by works or according to works. That is the judgment of the "great white throne" (Rev. xx. 12, 13), and in it no fallen creature could ever stand. Even the psalmist cries: "Enter not into judgment with Thy servant: for in Thy sight shall no man living be justified" (Ps. cxliii. 2). The confusion that exists among Christians in such a matter as this is as lamentable as it is inexcusable: for Scripture has made it as plain as can be, that, raised or changed into His image in glory, all the saints of the present and the past shall at Christ's coming be caught up to meet the Lord in the air and to be ever with Him. When He comes to judge even the living, we shall be with Him, and with Him "the saints shall judge the world." The judgment of the dead before the great white throne is separated from this by an interval of a thousand years: a broad enough division, surely. But the indifference to prophecy, and even to the subject of the Lord's coming itself, has had its sad recompense in the loss of knowledge of things of fundamental importance to Christianity itself.

Judgment, all final judgment, is in the hands of Christ alone: for the tender and beautiful reason, "because He is Son of man." By a Man perfect in manhood, who has known even the weakness of it, as that title, "Son of man" indicates,—by One who "gave His flesh for the life of the world"—shall the world be judged. What assurance this gives of the most perfect consideration for creature frailty, of all circumstances that can be pleaded, in the judgment executed!

4 (30-47): The failure of man under test.
1 (30-32): of His own true witness.

4. [1] I can of [d] myself do nothing; as I hear I judge; and my judgment is righteous, because I [e] seek not mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. If I bear [f] witness concerning myself, my witness is not true: there is [g] another who beareth witness concerning me, and I know that the witness that he witnesseth concerning me is true.

2 (33-35): of John His messenger.

[2] Ye [h] sent unto John, and he hath borne witness to the truth. But I [i] receive not witness from man; but these things I say that ye may be [j] saved. He was the [k] lamp, burning and shining; and ye were willing for a [l] season to rejoice in his light.

[d] ver. 19. cf. ch. 8. 28.
[e] ch. 6. 38. cf. ch. 7. 18.
[f] cf. ch. 8. 13, 14, 18, 54.
[g] ver. 37.
[h] cf. ch. 1. 19-28.
[i] cf. ch. 17. 25.
[j] ch. 1. 7. cf. ch. 12. 28-30, 35.
[k] cf. Matt. 5. 14.
[l] cf. Matt. 3. 5-7.

Lastly, physical resurrection is also in His hand: "The hour is coming in which all that are in the tombs shall hear His voice and shall come forth"—the hour for each and all, but which does not necessarily imply the same hour for each and all: which we are assured by many another scripture that in fact it will not be. "Every man in his own order," says the apostle: "Christ the first-fruits; afterwards they that are Christ's, at His coming" (1 Cor. xv. 23). There is no confusion. "Each" will be "in his own rank," as it would be better rendered; and each rank will come forth at its appointed time; only "they that are Christ's, at His coming."

Time is not specified in the Lord's words here; for time does not affect the question of authority, and it is of the authority given to Him that He is speaking. But the "life" and "judgment" which are in His hands to dispense characterize respectively two contrasted resurrections. "They that have done good" come forth "to a resurrection of life; and they that have done evil to a resurrection of judgment." In either case death is seen in its merely provisional character: for the full carrying out of God's purpose it must disappear. Man apart from the body is not man as God made him; and therefore not what His dealings contemplate. Life, on the one hand, claims the body of the saint; as judgment, on the other hand, the body of the sinner. It is for the "deeds done in the body" men are to receive; and it is in the body that they are to receive it. And it is noticeable that the saint here, as well as the sinner, is characterized by his "doings." Although life is a "gift," and not a reward, yet the fruits of that life, brought forth by the renewed man, are recognized in the resurrection. The holiness of God is seen in result to have been maintained by His grace, as it is manifested in the judgment of evil.

4. Thus the Lord has in the presence of His enemies, soon to be as criminals before His judgment-seat, revealed His personal glory as the Son of the Father, with the authority belonging to Him as Man, come in the purpose of divine love among men. He proceeds to reprove them for their unbelief, in view of the witness that had been given to Him in so many ways. The character of His own testimony; the testimony of His forerunner; the supernatural works which accredited Him on the Father's part; the Father's own testimony; the Scriptures accepted by themselves: all united to put His claims beyond the power of all the cavils of unbelief to affect. And He then proceeds to point out the nature of the unbelief itself which they manifested, what it proceeded from, what it would lead to, and leaves them in the hands of Moses, whom they so trusted, yet who was their real accuser before God. It is a crushing reply, which for the present seems to stagger and confound them, so that we hear of nothing from them more, until after another period of labor in Galilee, He returns at the feast of tabernacles to Jerusalem.

[1] He returns to speak of that practical oneness which he had with the Father, which forbade Him doing anything simply of Himself. As a consequence, no independent will of His own perverted His judgment. He judged as He heard: that is, according to the real facts of the case. This perfect simplicity made His

[3] (36, 37): of signs and manifestations.

[3] But I have witness greater than that of John: for the [m] works which the Father hath given me to complete them, the very works that I do bear witness concerning me that the Father hath sent me. And the Father who hath sent me, [n] he hath borne witness concerning me. Ye have neither [o] heard his voice at any time, nor seen his shape.

[4] (38–40): the failure of their own experience.

[4] And ye [p] have not his word abiding in you: for him whom he hath [q] sent, him ye believe not. Ye search * the [r] Scriptures: for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they that [s] witness concerning me: and ye [t] will not come unto me, that ye might have life.

[5] (41–44): the conditions of faith.

[5] I receive not [u] glory from men; but I know you, that ye have not the [v] love of God in you. I have come in my [w] Father's name, and ye receive me not; if [x] another

m ch. 10. 25, 38. ch. 14. 11.
n Matt.3.16, 17.
o cf. ch. 12. 29. cf. ch. 1.18.
p ver. 42. *cf.*ch.14.23,
q ver. 24.
r cf. Matt.2. 4-6. *cf.*Lk.24.25 –27.
s cf. Deut.18. 15-18. *cf.*Rom.1.2. cf. 1 Pet. 1, 10-12.
t cf. Lk. 14. 18. cf. ch. 1.11.
u cf. 1s.53.3. cf. 2 Pet. 1. 17.

* So far as the form is concerned this may be rendered as an imperative.

cf. Acts 3. 13. v cf. ch. 8. 42; cf. Lk. 11. 42. w cf. ch. 7. 28, 29; cf. ch. 17. 4. x cf. Matt. 24. 5, 11, 24; cf. 2 Thess. 2. 8-12; cf. Rev. 13. 11-15.

word to be indeed the word of God, and to have a character far removed from that of others. Thus it had to be confessed, "Never man spake like this Man." It was indeed the most signal witness to Him. Yet it stood not alone: it would have been an anomaly had it done so, and the word of the law, "the testimony of two is true," would have rendered it invalid. If He bore witness regarding Himself, though perfectly qualified to do so, it would not by itself be valid: which is clearly the meaning of the law. The testimony of one man might be true—absolutely; just as true in itself as that of two. But it would not be true in the same way to others: it would need confirmation. The Lord appeals therefore to another testimony—His Father's. This confirmed His own in such a way as that there could not be any more testimony needed. And, in fact, all the testimony of which He speaks here resolves itself into these.

[2] John's testimony He refers to: a merciful concession to the need of man, though as a merely human one He could not have need of it. It was a call to rouse men's attention and awaken the sense of need on their part; and in fact many had been roused: they had sent to him and he had borne witness to the truth. He was as the lamp, burning and shining, not the light of day, but lighting up the darkness of the night. They had been glad of it, and willing to avail themselves of its cheer for a season. Limited like all of man both as to time and place, John's testimony had of necessity to give way to Him of whom he testified.

[3] But now there was greater witness. The glorious works that were being done by Him, and which in their completeness spoke of a work far more glorious, these were gifts from the Father which manifested His Son, while the Father had even directly uttered His voice in attestation. But they, alas, had never at any time heard His voice—to them He had never spoken; nor had they seen one form of His many manifestations.

[4] The Lord proceeds to speak of what in one sense was, in another should have been, a matter of their own experience. Scripture was in their hands, they searched it, they thought they found in it eternal life. Well it spoke of Him, the Giver of life: yet they would not come to Him to find it. In fact they had not God's word abiding in them; for the One whom He had sent they believed not.

[5] The truth was, the conditions of faith were lacking in them. They received glory from one another; they did not seek it from God; they had not the love of God. Thus One coming in His Father's Name they would not receive. But that would put them into the hands of Antichrist. He will come in his own come in his own name, him ye will receive. How can ye believe who receive [y] glory one from another, and seek not the glory that cometh from God only? Think not that I will [z] accuse you to the Father: there is one that accuseth you, [a] Moses, in whom ye trust; for if ye had believed Moses, ye would have believed me: for he [b] wrote concerning me. But if ye [c] believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words?

y ch. 12. 43.

z cf. ch. 3. 17, cf. ch. 12. 47.

a cf. Rom. 3. 19, 20.

b cf. Num. 21. 9, cf. Lk. 24. 44.

c cf. Lk. 16. 29–31, cf. Acts 13. 27, cf. 2 Cor. 3. 14.

SECTION 2. (Chap. vi.)

Eternal life as a life of faith, and its sustenance.

1 (1–21): Christ according to Old Testament promise

1 (1–14): As Jehovah, the Creator, Source of Israel's blessings.

1. [1] AFTER these things Jesus went away beyond the sea of Galilee [that is,] of [d] Tiberias. And a great multitude followed him, [e] because they saw the signs that he wrought upon the sick. And Jesus went up into the mountain, and there sat with his disciples. But the [f] passover, the feast of the Jews, was nigh. When Jesus then lifted up his eyes, and saw a great multitude coming to him, he saith unto Philip, Whence should we d Matt. 14. 13–21, Mk. 6. 35–44, Lk. 9. 10–17.

e cf. ver. 26, cf. Matt. 4. 23, 24.

f ch. 2. 13, ch. 5. 1, ch. 11. 55.

name, doing his own will, and be received. A solemn thing to realize, and yet most sure, that all that would displace Christ in the soul makes room for Antichrist.

They could not believe, therefore. Moses had written of Him; and they trusted Moses, without believing His testimony. Moses, not He, was their accuser. If they had believed Moses, they would have believed Him. If they believed not Moses' writings, how would they believe His words? A serious question for the days in which we are.

Sec. 2.

We now have eternal life as a life of faith, a life ministered to and sustained by the bread from heaven, the antitype of the manna, but which (even on that account) transcends it. In the same way as in the last section the history is the text, from which as its occasion the truth is drawn, or which gives shape to it, though this goes far beyond, as there, what the occasion could suggest. The two parts into which the section is in this way naturally divided, are otherwise also in contrast with one another: the first giving the Lord's presentation to Israel, which was rendered vain by their unbelief; the second, the Christian verity which translates all their blessing into higher truth.

1. [1] The Lord is again in Galilee or the neighborhood, and a great multitude is gathered around him. The question of providing for such a company is raised by the Lord Himself and is addressed to Philip; who replies that it would take more than 200 pence (or denarii) even scantily to supply them. Andrew thereupon suggests that there was a lad there who had five barley loaves and two small fishes; but, as he intimates, there was no real hope in that. Yet the Lord accepts and uses these, even though it veil in some degree the wonder of that which He is about to do. The men are made to sit down, and He blesses and distributes to them; the ministration by disciples' hands is not found in John as in the Synoptists; here we have only the divine hand that really accomplished all. He provides; He ministers: Jehovah, the Creator, in tender care for all; none lost in the general mass; the details cared for, as we see all through nature, not left to the rougher management of subordinates. By and by, when all are filled, then even the fragments must not be wasted: the very last thing, perhaps, that we should expect from One who could work a miracle like this. But it is not a miracle—a "wonder" merely—but a "sign": significant all through. Where is the ragged end of nature? where are her mere useless dust-heaps? where will you find the thing she wastes? Nay, her very instruments of destruction are buy bread, that these may eat? And this he said to [g] prove him: for he himself knew what he was going to do. Philip answered him, Two hundred pennyworth* of bread is not enough for them, that each may take a little. One of his disciples, Andrew, Simon Peter's brother, saith unto him, There is a [h] lad here, who hath five 'barley-loaves and two small fishes; but what are these for so many? Jesus said, Make the men [i] sit down. Now there was much grass in the place. The men therefore sat down, in number about five thousand. Jesus took the loaves therefore, and having given [k] thanks, he distributed to those that were set down, and likewise of the fishes as much as they would. And when they were filled, he saith unto his disciples, Gather together the [l] fragments that remain over, that nothing may be lost. They [m] gathered them together therefore, and filled twelve hand-baskets with the fragments of the five barley-loaves, that remained over unto those who had eaten.

[z] (14-21): Rejected, a stormy sea for faith until He comes.

[z] Then the men, when they saw the sign that Jesus

[g] cf. Lk. 9. 18. cf. ver. 67.

[h] cf. Jer.1.6, 7. cf. 1 Cor. 1. 27, 28.

[i] cf. Judg.7. 13. cf. Ex.4.2.

[j] cf. Is.30.15. cf. Is.55.2.

[k] cf. ch. 11. 41, 42. *cf.*Lk.22.19.

[l] cf. Lev.23. 22.

[m] *cf.*Neh.8. 10.

* Denarii.

but transformers, and in the interests of preservation: "that nothing be lost" is a principle that runs through all.

[z] Christ then is here displayed in divine power amidst the people; and the question comes, as ever, how will they respond to it? They do, in fact, recognize that "this is of a truth that prophet that cometh into the world"; and they would gladly avail themselves of the power manifest, using it, however, for their own ends, and controlling it by their own will. The result is, as the Lord foresees, that they would take Him by force and make Him a King! they would compel Him to be the leader of one of those popular revolts against Roman authority, which at a later time occurred so often. Once committed to it, as they thought, beyond the power of drawing back, He would resign Himself to the will of the multitude and become the Deliverer for which all were looking. How strange a thing is the mind of man, when perverted by that very will which in this case they believe has so much power, but which only avails to cloud all true perception, and to make their reasoning the most pitiable folly. They are going to have a prophet after their own heart, and divine power work at their bidding! From such reception, which was all that the nation as a whole had for the Deliverer, the Lord necessarily withdraws. He goes up into the mountain, Himself alone, type of that ascension where He was before, which is to follow, and to which He presently refers. Meanwhile His disciples are upon the sea, darkness falling, the sea rising under a contrary wind; and such is the world in the absence of Christ for those that follow Him. "The wicked are like the troubled sea when it cannot rest," and the "course of this world" which has rejected Him is "according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience." Its being called "the sea of Tiberias" is very significant, the Israelitish city bearing the name of a Roman emperor, the Gentile dominant over those who should have been the people of God, but who are sunk like Jonah in the sea of the nations, even though miraculously preserved.

The "ship" in which the disciples are marks these out as a Jewish remnant, which in fact the disciples were when He left the earth, and will be again when He returns to it (see Notes to Matt., p. 158). The Church proper is seen in Peter stepping out upon the waters to go to Jesus; but this we have not here.

had done, said, This is of a truth that [n]prophet that cometh into the world. Jesus then knowing that they were about to come and take him by force to make him a [o]king, withdrew again into the [p]mountain, himself alone. But when [q]evening came, his disciples went down to the [r]sea, and having entered into a ship, they went over the sea toward Capernaum. And darkness had already come on, and Jesus had not yet come to them. And a [s]strong wind blowing, the sea began to rise. When therefore they had rowed five and twenty or thirty furlongs, they saw Jesus [t]walking upon the sea and drawing near the ship, and they were [u]afraid. But he saith unto them, [v]It is I; be not afraid. Then they desired to take him into the ship; and [w]immediately the ship was at the land whither they were going.

2 (22-71): The confirmation in Christianity.

1 (22-33): food abiding to eternal life.

2. [1] On the morrow, the multitude which stood on the other side of the sea, when they saw that there was no n ch. 1. 21. ch. 7. 40. cf. Deut. 18. 15.

o cf. ch. 12. 12-15. cf. ch. 2. 23-25.
p cf. Lk. 5. 15, 16. cf. Acts 3. 21, 22.
q cf. ch. 12. 35. cf. Rom. 13. 12.
r cf. Rev. 17. 15. cf. Lk. 21. 25.
s Matt. 8. 24. cf. Matt. 24. 29.
t Matt. 14. 22-33. Mk. 6. 47-51. cf. 2 Thess. 1. 7, 8.
u cf. Gen. 45. 3; cf. Mal. 3. 23. v cf. Is. 43. 1, 2; cf. Song 2. 8-13. w cf. Ps. 107. 28-31; cf. Is. 25. 9, 10.

Only He is seen coming, and they are alarmed, but His word dispels their fear; and when they receive Him into the ship, immediately they are at the land for which they set out. This ends the Jewish part: but which furnishes the principles which are developed and applied in the Lord's words which follow, and in which the thread of John's Gospel with its theme, eternal life, is resumed and carried on.

2. The promises to Israel are confirmed and raised to a higher level in Christianity, and thus become the germs and types of fuller and more wondrous blessings. The world in which we are is the world which has rejected Jesus, and into which, as just said, Israel through unbelief has sunk, and for the meantime lost her place and blessing. Into her place on earth the Church is come, but as a pilgrim and a stranger only, with blessings in a higher sphere. That which is abnormal to Israel, to be a stranger and pilgrim upon earth, is normal to the Church.

[1] The multitude seek for Jesus, in ships that have reached the place of the miraculous supply of food since the disciples left it in the only one there. Jesus had not gone with the disciples, that they know; but they follow the disciples to the city of His adoption, Capernaum, and to their astonishment find Him there. They ask Him in astonishment "when"—which involves the question, "how—He got there." But He has no reply to that; only a rebuke for the motive which made them follow Him. It was not because they saw signs: that is, not because they had realized the significance of His miracles. Had they done so, they would have been brought by them into the presence of God; and He would have got His place in their souls. But it was not so: they had but eaten of the loaves and been filled! Food that perisheth for the life that passeth: that was all that they were in pursuit of; let them work rather for the food that abideth, and that ministers to a life which is eternal. What a contrast between these!

He does not yet say that He Himself is the bread of life. He would, as with the woman of Samaria, fix their eyes upon the imperishable and eternal, and wake up in them heart-hunger after these. Till they had this, all else would be a riddle which they would not even care to solve. But He tells them that this food the Son of man would give them, not now the Son of God. As Creator He could by the mere act of His will furnish abundantly what this life required; but the food of eternal life only the Son of man could give them: for that, He must become the Son of man; man, in unique humanity; amid all the sons of men, the Son of man. What a difference between the work of creation, with all other ship there save that into which the disciples had entered, and that Jesus had not [x]gone with his disciples into the ship, but that the disciples had gone away alone, (howbeit there came ships from Tiberias nigh unto the place where they had eaten the bread when the Lord had given thanks,) when therefore the multitude saw that Jesus was not there, nor his disciples, they themselves entered into the ships and came to Tiberias, [y]seeking Jesus. And when they found him on the other side of the sea, they said unto him, Rabbi, when camest thou hither? Jesus answered them and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Ye seek me, not because ye [z]saw signs, but because ye ate of the loaves x cf. ch.16.5, 6.

y cf. Mk. 1. 37.

z cf. ver. 2. cfr. ch.2.11.

its display of wisdom, power and goodness, and the amazing self-sacrifice of redemption by a Son of man!

The Lord does not, and could not say, "Work for the life," but for the "food" of the life. The life itself is the fundamental, primary gift which alone makes possible any right working. The dead cannot work into life, but the Lord quickens by His voice, as we have seen. Here we are in another line of things, and there is something for man to do, though he cannot give himself life. When they take Him to mean working works, He tells them that God's work—the thing He wanted them to do—was to "believe on Him whom He had sent." But they had been "working" to get that food with which He had fed them; and, great as was the miracle, the food itself was but that of the earthly life. Ah, if they would take the same pains, if they would show the same eagerness, to get the bread of life eternal. He who had given them the one had been appointed and accredited of God with the seal of the Spirit (as after His baptism by John) to give them the other. Indeed, the bread itself was sealed and certified to them at the same time, the incorruptible food of an imperishable life; and Gift and Giver were the same blessed Person.

The multitude, however, at once take openly the position of unbelievers. They can ask Him in the face of the miracle what He is working, and then, naturally enough from the standpoint of those who follow Him because they have eaten of the loaves and been filled, point to the sustenance of Israel by the manna forty years in the wilderness as indeed what they might call a proper "sign." The Lord answers that the true bread from heaven is not that which Moses gave, but that which His Father gives, and that is He who cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world.

There they are brought face to face with that upon which all now depends for them. Eternal life is there for their acceptance or rejection in the Bread of Life, the true Manna, which is Christ Himself. Faith in Him would make them partakers of this precious gift which was not for Israel only but for the world. Wherever the need might be, here was the sufficient supply, free to all that welcomed it. He who had come down from heaven to man sought but for a welcome: how often has He sought in vain!

[2] The response, however, seems at first in this case to be all that one could desire. Like the woman of Samaria, and without exposing their ignorance as she did hers, they ask for the gift of which He had spoken. "Lord," they say, "evermore give us this bread." How like two cases may be that are nevertheless essentially different! and He who "knew all men, and needed not that any should testify of man," could not be deceived. Nevertheless, He insists emphatically on the value of the gift: "I am the bread of life: he that cometh to Me shall never hunger, and he that believeth on Me shall never thirst." This is exactly in the line of what He said at Sychar to the woman, and a little fuller, pointing more to the necessity of faith, and to its character, not as mere belief in a fact, but reliance upon a Person, in whom the fulness of satisfaction was to and were filled. Work not for the food that [a]perisheth, but for that food that abideth unto eternal life, which the Son of man will [b]give you: for him the Father, even God, hath [c]sealed. They said therefore unto him, What should we [d]do that we might work the works of God? Jesus answered and said unto them, This is the work of God, that ye [e]believe on him whom he hath sent. They said therefore unto him, What [f]sign then doest thou, that we may see and believe thee? what workest thou? Our [g]fathers ate the manna in the wilderness, according as it is written, [h]Bread from heaven gave he them to eat. Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, [i]Moses gave you not the bread from heaven, but my Father giveth you the [j]true bread from heaven. For the bread of God is he who [k]cometh down from heaven and giveth life unto the world.

2 (34-51): conflict, and separation of a remnant drawn to Christ, who expect in faith the portion beyond death, which is annulled for them.

[2] They said therefore unto him, Lord, [l]evermore give us this bread. Jesus said unto them, I am the [m]bread of life: he that cometh unto me shall [n]never hunger, and he that believeth on me shall never thirst at all.

a ch.4.13,14. cf. Is. 55. 2.
b cf. ch.4.10. cf.ch.10.28.
c cf.ch.10.36. cf. Matt. 3. 16, 17.
d cf. Lk. 10. 25. etc. Acts 16. 30.
e ch.3.14-16. ch. 5. 24. Rom.4.4,5.
f cf. ch. 4.48. cf.Matt.16. 1-4.
g Ex. 16. 4-36. Nu. 11.7-9.
h Neh. 9.15. Ps.78.23-25.
i cf.1 Cor.10. 11. cf.Heb.3.5, 6.
j vers.55,58. cf.ch. 15. 1.
k vers.50,51. cf.1 Cor.10. 16.
l cf. ch. 4. 15; m ver. 48; cf. Ps. 104. 15; cf. Ps. 105. 40. n cf. ch. 4. 14; cf. ch. 11. 25, 26.

be found. But alas, this insistance upon faith is no good sign for those to whom He is speaking; for where faith is, it does not need to turn in upon itself, and does not grow by self-occupation. Nor does he who hungers and thirsts need to be told that the mere contemplation of a feast will not satisfy, but only the appropriation of it. But here was the feast spread and the welcome and a wonderful assurance: once more, perhaps, as with the parallel saying to the woman, that which may rebuke also the poverty of faith in those who have it, and to understand it we must remember that that first coming to Christ which is once for all, yet implies also a constancy of coming for all needs, an hourly dependence, and a simplicity in taking Him for all; a refusal of all helps to eke out His sufficiency by other means. In this it is that want of truth to Him will make our experience fail in just that measure. Drinking of this world's water we shall thirst again; going to the world for help, like Abraham with his face towards the south, there will come a famine in our own things, even when we would fain enjoy them. A dishonored Christ will fail to satisfy. Let us not impute to Him what is due to the dishonor we have done Him. We must take Him for all, to find Him all-sufficient.

But with the crowd now following the Lord there was not even the most rudimentary faith. "I said unto you, that ye have seen Me even and believe not." The work He had done they had to acknowledge, and for this they followed Him; but it was their bodies that got the food; they had known neither spiritual hunger nor supply. They had seen Him (as declared in the miracle), but they had not believed. And such is man universally: what hope, then, as to any? The answer given by the Lord is, There is hope in God alone: "All that the Father giveth Me will come to Me"; there is not merely hope, therefore, but certainty that, spite of all the opposition of the human heart to God, Christ shall not lose that which divine love in Him has sought. How fully sure is it then that He can add, "And him that cometh unto Me, I will in no wise cast out." To reject the gift of His Father's love would be indeed an impossibility. Even in this, that oneness of His will with the Father's which He has before asserted, displays itself: "For I came down from heaven, not to do Mine own will, but the will of Him that sent Me." The love that is in His heart towards men works in absolute conformity to the Father's will; and necessarily, for

But I said unto you, that ye have °seen me even, and believe not. All that the Father ᵖgiveth me will come to me, and him that cometh unto me I will in ᵍno wise cast out. For I am come down from heaven, not that I might do mine ʳown will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the ˢwill of him that sent me, that of all that he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should ᵗraise it up at the last day. For this is the will of my Father, that every one who seeth the Son and ᵘbelieveth on him should have eternal life, and I should raise him up at the last day.

o ver. 26. ch. 12. 37.
p vers. 44, 45. cf. ch. 17.2, 6, 9. cf. Acts 13. 48.
q cf. Matt. 11. 28. cf. Lk. 15.2. cf. Is. I. 18.
r ch. 5. 30. cf. Heb. 10. 5-10.
s vers. 39, 40. cf. 1 Tim. 2. 4.
t vers. 40, 44, 54; cf. ch. 11. 24-27; cf. 1 Cor. 15. 20-23.
u ch. 5. 24; cf. 1 Jno. 5. 9-13.

"God is love," and therefore the will of God is the activity of Love itself. Father and Son are in absolute unity, therefore, here: the Son devoting Himself to carry out the salvation which is of God for man. "And this," He adds, "is the will of Him that sent Me, that of all which He hath given Me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day." Resurrection has thus to come in for the fulfilment of what He is speaking of. Israel rejecting Him, as He sees in the crowds that are now about Him, the Kingdom which had been announced as at hand would be delayed, and faith might have to wait for the accomplishment of what it sought in resurrection. And in any case, resurrection must come in at the "last day" (the close of Israel's age of law), and before the Kingdom. Death must be swallowed up in victory (Isa. xxv. 8) or how much would be lost! and He it is who must accomplish this.

He repeats this immediately, only in a somewhat stronger way, that "this is the Father's will, that whosoever seeth the Son and believeth on Him should have eternal life, and He would raise him up at the last day." This is surely not meant to set aside the duty of watching for the Lord, on the part of believers of that time, nor to say, therefore, that all would necessarily die, to be raised up. The quickening of the mortal body (Rom. viii. 11), in the case of those who are alive when the Lord comes, brings into the complete likeness of the risen saint, and is an action of the same character as resurrection. For His present purpose it was not needful to distinguish between them. Israel's seeing and not believing on Him was to be made the occasion of the call of a people characteristically heavenly, and to this the words before us point.

But the Jews murmur at the greatness of His claim. To them He is but the son of Joseph: they know, as they think, both His father and His mother; and how then can He say He has come down from heaven? Jesus only replies that, except the Father draw him, no one can come to Him; and such an one He will raise up at the last day. Then He explains that this drawing is by divine enlightenment, as the prophets had spoken of being taught of God. Every one who had heard from the Father and learned of Him came to Jesus. And yet, on the other hand, no one had actually seen the Father but Himself, who was of Him.

Thus man with his back to the light walks in his own shadow, with God unknown; and God has to pursue him with that unwelcome light, make him to realize his condition and his need of Jesus, that he may find the unseen Father in the Son. Here, then, the bread of life—the means of eternal life—is found. Those who ate the manna in the desert nevertheless died. For him who eats of the true heavenly bread, there is no real death: he will live forever. The lost knowledge of God, the moral link with Him, has been restored; and this is a life which so possessed will endure. The estrangement from God, which brought in death—which is in itself death—is over. Divine life—the divine nature—is in him who by faith in Christ is reconciled to God.

But for this another thing is needed, which the Lord now goes on to, and which the manna fails even to represent. The bread from heaven it does, Christ

The Jews therefore [u]murmured at him, because he said, I am the bread that came down from heaven. And they said, [w]Is not this Jesus the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? how then* doth he say, I am come down from heaven? Jesus answered and said unto them, Murmur not among yourselves. [x]No one can come to me, except the Father who hath sent me draw him; and I will raise him up at the last day. It is written in the prophets, [y]And they shall all be taught of God. Every one that hath heard from the Father and learned [of him] cometh unto me. Not that any one hath [z]seen the Father, save he who is of God, he hath seen the Father. Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that [a]believeth on me hath eternal life. I am the bread of life. Your [b]fathers ate the manna in the wilderness, and are dead; this is the [c]bread that cometh down from heaven, that one may eat of it and not die. I am the [d]living bread that came down from heaven: if any one have eaten of this bread, he shall [e]live for ever; and the bread that I will give is my [f]flesh which I will give for the life of the world.

[3] The Jews therefore contended with one another, saying, [g]How can this man give us his flesh to eat?

*Some read, "now."

u cf. vers.52, 61. ctr. vers.67–69.
w Matt. 13. 55, 56. ctr. 2 Cor. 5. 16. cf. ch. 7. 15, 27, 41, 42.
x cf. ch. 12. 32. cf. Jer. 31. 3. cf. Eph. 2. 8.
y Is. 54. 13. Jer. 31. 34. ver. 37.
z ch. 1. 18. ch. 7. 29.
a ch. 3. 36.
b cf. Nu. 14. 26–29.
c vers. 33, 35.
d cf. ch. 5. 25, 26.
e cf. Gen. 3. 22. cf. ch. 4. 14.
f vers. 53–56. cf. ch. 1. 14 with Heb. 10. 10.
g ver. 41. ch. 3. 4.

3 (52-58): the peace-offering by which we dwell in Christ and Christ in us.

in humiliation, in the wilderness of the world; yet abiding as the "hidden manna"—the manna preserved in the ark—for the land also; like the bread that abideth to eternal life. But now the manna fails to represent that which we find in the "bread of God," which now assumes a sacrificial character: "the bread that I will give is My flesh, which I will give for the life of the world."

[3] Immediately there is a a clamor again. "The Jews"—who are probably here, as they are more distinctly in the next chapter, the Judeans, in contrast with the Galileans, and always His bitterest adversaries—"the Jews therefore contended with one another, saying, How can this man give us His flesh to eat?" There were with them no spiritual needs to make them infer a spiritual meaning, and the Lord does not explain. We shall find presently that when He does so, it has no effect in preventing many even of His professing disciples dropping off from Him. Here He only insists the more on the truth and necessity of what He is declaring. With another of His strong affirmations, He carries His statement further than before, and gives it fuller emphasis: "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink His blood, ye have no life in you: he that eateth My flesh and drinketh My blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day. For My flesh is truly food, and my blood is truly drink."

They were accustomed to such figurative speech; and the words would not sound as if they had been spoken elsewhere than in that eastern land. Moreover the impossibility of taking them literally would seem apparent, while the sacrificial system of the law would naturally suggest the thought of reference to it in the words of Christ. But to drink the blood of the offering was in entire opposition to the law, which forbade the drinking of any blood. Yet the giving His flesh for the life of the world, of which He had spoken, could be nothing else but sacrificial, while the feeding upon the flesh by any other than the priests could only apply to the peace-offering.

Our Christian knowledge enables us easily to put by the side of our Lord's words passages from the Old Testament history, the prophets and the psalms, Jesus said therefore unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, [h]Except ye have eaten the flesh of the Son of man, and drunk his blood, ye have no life in you: [i]he that feedeth on my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life, and I will [j]raise him up at the last day. For my flesh is [k]truly food, and my blood is truly drink. He that feedeth on my flesh and drinketh my blood [l]abideth in me and I in him. As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by [m]reason of the Father, so he that feedeth on me shall live by reason of me. This is the bread that came down from heaven: not as your fathers ate the manna and [yet] [n]died; he that feedeth on this bread shall live for ever.

h ctr. Lev. 17. 10.
i cf. ver. 40. cf. Jer. 15. 16. cf. Rom. 10. 10.
j cf. 1 Thess. 4. 14-16.
k cf. ver. 32. cf. Rom. 5. 8, 9. cf. Heb. 9. 22.
l ch. 15. 4, 5. cf. 1 Jno. 2. 6, 28.
m cf. ch. 5. 26, 30. cf. ch. 17. 4.
n ver. 58; cf. Heb. 3. 16-19; cf. Deut. 2. 14, 15.

which should have helped the listeners to understand their application. In their own Targums stands recorded their own interpretation Messianically (partially, at least) of Isa. liii. and Ps. xxii. and xl., besides much else. But the conclusion was unwelcome to their unhumbled pride, and Christ crucified was "to the Jew a stumbling-block." Let us turn from them to consider for ourselves what His words mean.

Appropriating faith could hardly be more vividly pictured than in the eating and drinking of Christ's flesh and blood. The Supper of the Lord has kept continually before us the language here, which ritualism would spoil by insisting upon a real partaking in a so-called "sacrament" of a living instead of a dead Christ. Its being His death in which at His table we remember Him takes away the whole foundation of a doctrine which debases and carnalizes what is of the deepest spiritual import. We need not take it up here where we are warned on every side that it cannot be an ordinance of which the Lord is speaking when He says, "Except ye eat and drink, ye have no life in you," any more than when on the other hand He says, "He that eateth and drinketh hath eternal life." The ordinance speaks of that of which the words speak; and the truth is symbolized in act there, and in words here.

Let us note that on the one side, if we eat not we have no life,—nothing that can properly be called that: if we have eaten we have eternal life: eternal life or no spiritual life at all: that is what the Lord's "verily, verily" affirms.

Moreover, He is speaking of life in you: the eternal life is therefore in you; otherwise it would be saying, if you eat not you have no life in you, while yet, if you eat, you still have no life in you: which would be, of course, too incongruous to maintain.

Christ's flesh is given for the life of the world, and here the flesh and blood are apart: this is a sacrificial death, in which, according to the law, the blood was carefully poured out before the flesh was either burned or eaten. There was an exception to this, when the sin-offering was burned outside the camp; but this is the peace-offering; which, while it does not go so fully into the work of atonement, dwells more upon the effect of it. The passover had this character, where the whole household fed upon that the blood of which was on the door-posts. Accordingly it is the "passover, the feast of the Jews," which was at hand when these words were spoken.

The difference between the flesh and blood is evident. The "blood is the life"; and "it is the blood that maketh atonement for the soul." Thus it speaks of the work accomplished, as only in death could it be accomplished; while the flesh is the victim that has died; in type, the Person of the Lord Himself. Thus the Person is first dwelt upon, the Bread from heaven; and then "the bread which I will give is My flesh."

The drinking the blood is characteristic of Christianity, as compared with that which was before it. The work is known and entered into, with its blessed s (59-71): carnalizing of His words by which disciples fall away.

59 These things he said in the synagogue as he taught in Capernaum. 60 Many of his o disciples, when they heard [this] said, This saying is a hard one: who can hear him?* 61 But Jesus, knowing in himself that his disciples murmured at this, said to them, Doth this offend you? 62 [what] then if ye see the Son of man ascending where he was before? 63 It is the p Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the q words I have spoken to you are spirit and are life. 64 But there are some of you that believe not. For Jesus r knew from o vers.64,66. cf. Matt.16. 21-23. p cf. 1 Cor.1. 23. cf. 1 Pet.2.8

q ch. 3. 13. cf. Matt.26. 63, 64. cf. ch.16.10.
r cf. 2 Cor.3. 6. cf. ch.3.5,6.
s ver. 68. cf. ch. 17.8. cf. Acts5. 20.
t ver. 36.
u ch.2.24,25. ch. 13. 11.

*Or "it."

effect as bringing us to God. Death has become the sustenance of Life. It is not however of the present power of resurrection of which the Lord speaks here, but of going on to it as that in which our portion is. Christ having gone out of the world by death, and we having entered into the fellowship of His death, we wait to be with Him.

Of this identification of ourselves with Him, and of Himself with us He goes on to speak. His flesh is truly food, His blood is truly drink. The food we take becomes by assimilation part of our very selves; and this wondrous food which has in it the true and eternal life (we being the dead and it the living) works "contrary to nature" to assimilate us to itself. Thus we abide in Him and He in us: Christ makes us His own, and then lives in us as His own.

He compares with this even His own human life as sent of the Father. As Man, He thus lived by reason of the Father, the Father's will being that which He was here to carry out. Even so with him in whom Christ as received by him abides, he lives by reason of Christ: Christ it is who is the explanation of his life, its thought and purpose. This is a life which is true life, a life therefore over which hangs no shadow of death: it abides for ever.

s But even to many of His disciples this was a hard saying, and they stumbled at it. They were thinking of the "Kingdom and glory," and wanted nothing of the "Kingdom and patience" which must precede it. To eat and drink into His death, whatever this might mean, was not the fulfilment of their carnal expectations. They had in truth no heart to inquire further, and stopped at the mere letter and the flesh. The Lord assures them therefore, He was going up where He was before. As to what He had been saying, the flesh could profit nothing; the Spirit of God alone could give life, and His words were spiritual—suited to the work of the Spirit—and quickening where He wrought. But some of them had no receptive power—no faith: and here He spoke with the consciousness which had been ever present with Him, of who it was that believed not, and how unbelief would end in apostasy and betrayal. He could find no hope but in that love-gift of the Father, of which He had spoken, and which assured Him of a people that should come to Him.

Thus He was prepared for rejection; and they took Him at His word, and rejected Him. "Upon this many of His disciples went back and walked no more with Him." Such was the dropping off that He had reason to turn even to the twelve and ask, Were they going too? Faith in Simon Peter answered for the rest, there was no other to whom to go: it was, and so it has remained. Christ or none at all! And for those for whom it is so there are "words of eternal life" which are found with Him; all the more surely that, as they are unacceptable to carnal men: words which in their unearthly purity proclaim indeed the "Holy One of God."

Peter speaks for them all, but they are not in fact united in the same testimony: for now as the truth develops, and the light shines amid the darkness, the darkness gathers strength in opposition to it. This seems to be the time when in the defection going on among professed disciples, the heart of Judas the beginning who they were that believed not; and who it was that would deliver him up. And he said, On this account I said unto you, that no one can come unto me, except it be [v]given him of the Father. Upon this many of his disciples [w]went back, and walked no more with him. Jesus therefore said unto the twelve, Will ye [x]also go away?* Simon [y]Peter answered him, Lord, to whom shall we go away? thou hast words of eternal life; and we have [z]believed and know that thou art the [a]Holy One of God. Jesus answered them, Have I not chosen you twelve, and one of you is a [b]devil? He spake of Judas [the son] of Simon, Iscariot: for he it was who should deliver him up, being one of the twelve.

v vers. 44, 45.
w cf. ver. 60. cf. Acts 7. 39, 51.
x cf. Lk. 14. 25–35. cf. ch. 10. 26–28.
y cf. Matt. 16. 16–19. cf. Lk. 5. 8.
z cf. ch. 11. 27. cf. ch. 1. 41, 42.
a cf. Acts 2. 27. cf. Mk. 1. 24.
b ch. 13. 18. ch. 17. 12. cf. Acts 1. 25.

SECTION 3. (Chaps. vii.–viii. 1.)

The Spirit in the believer the manifestation of the glory of the unknown Christ.

1 (1-9): Alone because of faithfulness, till His appointed time.

1. AND after these things Jesus walked in Galilee: for he would not walk in Judea because they of Judea† sought to [c]kill him. Now the feast of the Jews was near, [which is] the [d]Tabernacles. His

c ch. 5. 16, 18.
d cf. Lev. 23. 33–36. cf. Num. 29. 12, etc. cf. Ezr. 3. 4. cf. Zech. 14. 16–19.

* The form of the question indicates a negative answer is expected.
† Same word as for "Jews," but here distinguishing from Galileans.

begins to conceive its first malignant schemes of hostility to the Lord. His character is at least now formed as what the Lord declares him to be, a "false accuser"—a "devil." The seed of the betrayal has already taken root within him.

Sec. 3.

The connection between this section and the last is very evident. As we have already seen, life being so largely the subject matter in this gospel, the Spirit of God is necessarily connected with this as the Communicator and power of the life. Thus in the first subdivision we had life in the first two sections, and in the third the Spring of living water; in the present one, we have had in like manner life in the first two sections, and now, in the third, we have again the living water: but it is here not simply springing up within the believer, but pouring out from him in the world "rivers of living water." The world at large is not changed by it, but an oasis is created in the desert, a prophecy of what is yet to come for the whole world.

Thus the feast that brings the Lord at this time to Jerusalem is the feast of tabernacles, Israel's joyful celebration in the land of her wanderings past, and with which the blessing of the earth is concurrent. But this has not come, and He who can alone bring it in for them is rejected by His own. Thus He goes up only to substitute as it were Pentecost for Tabernacles. The blessing is greater and of a higher order than anything the latter can show, but it is individual, not national; and still less world-wide.

For the blessing itself implies a Christ no longer present among men, but, according to the words which we have just heard uttered, "gone up where He was before." We have heard too by what way. Death has come on Him on whom it had no claim: a voluntary, sacrificial death, and His glory for ever; but the sign also of His rejection by men, a rejection which would even have been complete, had not the Father's gift secured a people to His Son. Thus then we have been brought to where we are doctrinally in the present chapter: the world still rejecting Him; the Father acting for the glory of the Son; the Spirit manifested in the world itself in those who have believed on Jesus, the Witness of His unseen glory: these are the characteristics of that to which we have now come.

1. The state of the world is that which is first revealed, the Lord Himself in brethren therefore said unto him, Depart hence and go into Judea, that thy [e]disciples also may behold thy works which thou doest. For no one doeth anything in secret, and seeketh himself to be known openly. If thou doest these things, [f]manifest thyself to the world. For [g]neither did his brethren believe in him. Jesus therefore saith unto them, My [h]time is not yet come; but your time is always ready. The world [i]cannot hate you; but me it hateth, because I testify of it that its works are evil. Go ye up unto the feast; I go not up [yet]* unto this feast, because my time is not yet fulfilled. And having said these things unto them, he abode still in Galilee.

2 (10-36): Diverse opposition
1 (10-18): His knowledge and the way of knowledge the will to obey.

2. [1] But when his brethren had gone up unto the feast, then also he himself went up, not openly, but as it were in [j]secret. They of Judea then sought him at the feast, and said, Where is that man? And there was a great [k]murmuring among the multitudes concerning him. Some said, He is a [l]good man; and others said, Nay, but he leadeth the multitude [m]astray. However no one spake openly about him for [n]fear of those of Judea.

e cf. ch. 6. 66, cf. ch. 2. 11.

f cf. ch. 14. 22 with ch. 17. 16.

g cf. Mk. 3. 21, cf. Rom. 9. 5, 6.

h ch. 2. 4, vers. 8, 30.

i ch. 15. 19, cf. 1 Jno. 3. 13.

j cf. ch. 6. 15, cf. Matt. 12. 16–20.

k cf. ch. 6. 41.

l vers. 40, 41, Matt. 21. 46.

m cf. Lk. 23. 2, 14, cf. Matt. 27. 63.

n ch. 9. 22, ch. 12. 42, 43.

*Many omit.

what complete solitude in the midst of it, without sympathy even from His human kindred, and the professing people of God only to be classed with the world: going on indeed with their feasts, the empty forms of a piety which for the mass does not exist, and which have become therefore the signs of hardness and levity of heart. What a witness against them is that history of divine deliverances which their feast of tabernacles commemorates, while those who are especially the clusterers round the holy places then, "they of Judea," are specially marked out here as those in open and deadly hostility to the Lord of life, the Son of Him they worship.

The Lord therefore does not go up at first, or openly, to the feast. He is neither Lord there, nor even welcome Guest. Nor is the time come for His open manifestation to the world, which hates Him for His faithfulness. Thus He abides solitary in His unique and perfect Manhood among men estranged from Him by His perfection.

2. [1] At the feast contradictory murmurings are heard about Him, some for, some against; suppressed however by the fear of those of Judea, who in all decisions concerning questions of authority and teaching had the upper hand. In the middle of the feast, Jesus who had come up privately to it, appeared in the temple and with the authority that belonged to Him, began to teach. Amazed at the knowledge which plainly He had not acquired at the ordinary schools of rabbinic learning, which it in no wise resembled, they inquire how He has come by it. He answers that His doctrine is not His own, but His who sent Him. He has not learned of men, nor put forth what was simply of His own mind; but what He taught He had learned of the Father in that abiding intercourse with Him in which He lived (chap. viii. 28). And He adds that they too might know for themselves whether His doctrine were of God, or of a man's mind merely. They would know this, if they were but willing to do the Father's will: for the spirit of obedience clears out of the soul the earth-vapors that obscure the heavens; he who has not heart-felt desire for the truth will scarcely learn it.

This is itself simple, if only we believe that God can certify the truth to His creatures, and that He cares enough for them to desire that they should have it.

But when it was now the middle of the feast, Jesus went up into the temple and [o]taught. They therefore of Judea wondered, saying, How knoweth this man letters, having never [p]learned? Jesus therefore answered them and said, My doctrine is [q]not mine, but his who sent me. If any one [r]willeth to do his will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it is of God, or whether I speak from myself. He that speaketh from himself seeketh his [s]own glory; but he that seeketh his glory who sent him, he is true, and there is no unrighteousness in him.

2 (19-24): the double witness of the law against His adversaries.

[2] Did not [t]Moses give you the law? and [u]none of you keepeth the law: why do ye seek to [v]kill me? The multitude answered, Thou hast a [w]demon: who seeketh to kill thee? Jesus answered and said unto them, I o ver. 28. cf. Matt. 5. 1, 2, etc. cf. ver. 46.

p cf. Matt. 7. 28, 29. cf. Acts 4. 13.
q ch. 8. 28. ch. 12. 49. ch. 3. 34.
r cf. ch. 8. 43. cf. Matt. 21. 23-27. cf. Ps. 25. 9.
s ch. 5. 41. ch. 8. 50. cf. Gal. 1. 10.
t ch. 1. 17. cf. Rom. 2. 17-29.
u cf. Rom. 3. 19.
v ver. 1.
w ch. 8. 48, 52; cf. Matt. 12. 24.

But, simple as it is, if we believe it, what does it reveal with regard to the condition, not of the world merely, but of the children of God to-day? The various and conflicting views of Christians as to almost every Christian truth, how are they to be accounted for, with the Bible open before us, and the Spirit of truth to lead us into all truth? What heart-searching should it not give us, to learn how far we are really willing to have the truth—the whole truth, at whatever cost.

Another test the Lord gives here: "He that speaketh from himself seeketh his own glory; but he that seeketh His glory who sent him, he is true, and there is no unrighteousness in him." This is a personal test, as the other was the doctrinal. And here was the double witness to the glorious Speaker: who but Himself could have faced the application of these by the watchful multitudes that were around Him?

[2] He turns now openly upon His adversaries, to warn them how thoroughly the law to which they clung witnessed against them. He charges them plainly with their murderous designs upon His life; a charge which the Galileans, ignorant of what the Judeans were meditating, impute to the diseased fancies of a demoniac. The Lord goes back to the miracle which had aroused their malignant animosity. Circumcision, though incorporated by Moses in the law he gave, was yet not what came from Moses but from the fathers; it had another character, in fact, from law, as connected with those through whom God in His grace gave them the promises. Thus circumcision itself is by the apostle afterwards (Rom. iv. 11) shown to be the seal of the righteousness of faith in Abraham; and he receives it when his body is now dead and fruit from him naturally impossible, the very time of its reception thus corresponding with its spiritual meaning. This circumcision then, belonging to a period before law, and in its meaning the very opposite, is by the law itself preferred to the law,—that is, the commandment of the sabbath. Thus grace had, by the law itself, precedence above the law.

Now the impotent man was healed by the selfsame grace, his body now dead like Abraham's. Grace, not law, had had the priority in divine order, as was evident; and law, as an incompatible thing, could not be added to grace when it did come (see Gal. iii. 19–26), but came to make man's need of grace apparent. Sickness and death having come in through sin, only grace could heal the impotent; and this we have seen to be the principle which the miracle in all its details discloses. "Take up thy bed and walk" asserts the superiority of grace to law, as did the circumcision of a man upon the sabbath day. No doubt it required, as the Lord shows here, not to judge according to the appearance; but this is the true judicial spirit, and always necessary for righteous judgment.

have done [x]one work, and ye all wonder. On this account Moses gave you [y]circumcision (not that it is of Moses, but of the fathers), and ye on the [z]sabbath circumcise a man. If a man receive circumcision on the sabbath, that the law of Moses may not be broken, are ye angry with me because I have made a man every whit whole on the sabbath? Judge not according to [a]appearance, but judge righteous judgment.

3 (25-31): the secret of their condition manifested.

[3] Some of those of Jerusalem said therefore, Is not this he whom they seek to kill? and lo, he speaketh openly, and they say nothing to him. Have the rulers indeed recognized that this man is the Christ? But we [b]know this man whence he is; and when the Christ cometh [c]none knoweth whence he is. Jesus therefore cried out, teaching in the temple and saying, Ye both know me, and know [d]whence I am; and I am not come of myself, but he that [e]sent me is true, whom ye [f]know not. I know him: for I am from him, and he hath sent me. They sought therefore to take him; but no one laid hand on him, because his [g]hour had not yet come. And many of the multitude believed on him, and said, [h]When the Christ cometh, will he do more signs than this man hath done?

4 (32-36): their failure, and the change impending.

[4] The Pharisees heard the multitude murmuring these

x ch. 5. 10-16.
y Lev. 12. 3 with Gen. 17. 12-14.
z cf. Matt. 12. 4-8.
a ch. 8. 15. cfr. Is. 11. 3, 4.
b cf. vers. 40-43. cf. ch. 6. 42.
c cf. ch. 8. 14, 19. cf. Mal. 3. 1.
d cf. Matt. 21. 38. cf. ch. 12. 37-43.
e ver. 16.
f cf. ch. 1. 18. cf. ch. 8. 42, 55.
g ver. 6. cf. ch. 17. 1 with Lk. 22. 53.
h cf. ch. 4. 25, 26. cf. Matt. 12. 23.

[3] Again there is a stir among the crowd at His boldness, and on the part of some of Jerusalem, who know full well what is in the hearts of the rulers with regard to Him, an expression of astonishment that they do not interfere. Could it be possible, they ask each other, that a revulsion of mind has come, and that the rulers are beginning to recognize this Man as the Christ? But no; surely that were impossible; they knew Him and His origin, and there was no room for such mystery as they expected to attach to the coming of Messiah. Evidently to them He was but the simple Galilean, the Nazarene; and all that had taken place at Bethlehem and Jerusalem had slipped entirely out of unretentive minds which cared too little to retain it. While they were murmuring such things, the voice of Him of whom they were speaking penetrated to them where they were, not to assert His birth in David's city or of David's line, nor to recall the vision of angels and the quest of the magi, graved in the hearts of many by the slaughter of the babes. Nay, He allows that they know Him in their mere external way (for of nothing else were they speaking) sufficiently: He did not propose to supplement that knowledge, which for them would still be ineffectual. That which they needed to know He had already declared, and the way to know it, but they recognized not divine truth, nor therefore His divine mission. He was from God; but they knew not that God from whom He was.

And still the hand of God kept back the angry outburst that was ready to break out against Him: Master of all circumstances till the appointed hour when He would yield Himself to the divine will which He came to accomplish. Moreover those quiet penetrating words were gaining ground with many of the multitude, who were asking if, when Christ came, He could be expected to do more signs than the Man they were refusing had already done.

[4] A more direct effort to take Him is the result of this, the chief priests and Pharisees sending officers to apprehend Him. The Lord, with perfect understanding of all that is going on, tells them that it needs not: He is going away —back to Him who had sent Him into the world. Days would come when at last in vain they would seek Him; and into that place into which He was going things concerning him; and the chief priests and the Pharisees sent ᵍofficers to take him. Jesus said therefore, Yet a ʲlittle while am I with you, and I go to him that sent me. Ye shall seek me, and shall not find me; and ᵏwhere I am ye cannot come. They of Judea said therefore among themselves, Whither is this man about to go, that we shall not find him? Is he about to go to the dispersion among the ᵍGreeks, and teach the Greeks? What is this thing which he said, Ye shall seek me and shall not find me, and where I am ye cannot come?

3 (37-39): The indwelling Spirit manifesting Him.

37 Now in the ᵐlast day, the great [day] of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any one ⁿthirst, let ᵍ vers. 45-47. cf. ch. 18. 3.

ʲ ch. 12. 35, 36.
ᵏ cf. ch. 13. 33. cfr. ch. 14. 2, 3. ch. 8. 21.
ˡ cf. Jas. 1. 1. cf. Acts 22. 21, 22.
ᵐ cf. Lev. 23. 34.
ⁿ Is. 55. 1. cf. Rev. 21. 6.

they could never come:—a solemn warning; but which they fling off from them in their scorn. He has indeed spoken of God as the One that sent Him, and then the warning is plain; but they will not have it so. No: He must be going to the dispersed among the Gentiles, and to teach the Gentiles; and this too was to be, though not according to their thought. Little did they realize that Lo-ammi ("not my people") was to be written upon them in the time soon to come, in a sterner fashion than ever yet had been. But beyond, in the place from which He had come, to which He was going to return, there could be no Father's welcome for the rejectors of His Son.

3. He was going away, therefore. "He was in the world, and the world had been made by Him, and the world knew Him not. He had come to His own, and His own received Him not." In that which was considered the chief of their festivals, His voice was heard only as a strange and dissonant sound. He was going away now to where He was before.

The last day, the great day of the feast, had come; and those who had gathered to it from all parts of the world were soon to separate. It was a day of rest and of holy convocation, of gathering, not of scattering; and as an eighth day,* the commencement of a new week, it spoke of eternity, of an eternal reunion, when all servile work should be at an end for ever, sin and its consequences being together put away. It corresponds with this really, that dwelling in booths was only for seven days; the eighth speaking of the entrance into the land.

Another ceremony, but which has no authority from Scripture, ceased also on the eighth day,—the pouring out of water drawn from the pool of Siloam. "This," says Lange, "was the celebration of the miraculous springs which God opened for the people on their pilgrimage through the wilderness. But because the eighth day marked their entrance into Canaan, the water-drawing ceased. On this day the springs of the promised land gave their waters to the people: an emblem of the streams of spiritual blessing which Jehovah had promised to His people."

They were still in the land,—a broken remnant of them, under the Gentile domination: and where now were those spiritual streams, the "living waters" that were to "go out from Jerusalem in summer and in winter"? (Zech. xiv. 8). Centuries had come and gone, and there was no sign even yet of the fulfilment. The ceremonies survived, but with the heart-sickness of deferred hope. Seasons of expectancy had passed away, fading quietly into the ordinary vacant dulness, or sometimes crushed out fiercely under an armed heel. Now there was to some the breath of another revival, although the voice of him who had first announced it had been silenced in Herod's prison. But John had given place to a Greater; and signs and wonders that might well be Messianic were waking up expectation from Galilee to Jerusalem. Yet why did He not use him come to me and drink. He that [o]believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his [p]belly shall flow [q]rivers of living water. But this he said concerning the [r]Spirit, which they that believed on him were about to receive: for [the] Spirit was not [s]yet, because Jesus was not yet glorified.

* Edersheim does not regard it as the eighth day, which, he says, "in Rabbinic language was regarded as 'a festival by itself;'" but certainly not in the language of Scripture.

o cf. ch. 6. 35.
p cfr. Lk. 15. 17.
cfr. Phil. 3. 19.
cf. Ps. 84. 6.
q cf. ch. 4. 14.
cf. Acts 4. 20.

cf. 2 Cor. 4. 6. r cf. ch. 14. 16, 17; cf. Acts 2. 4, 33. s cf. ch. 16. 7.

His power after another fashion than merely in feeding or healing the multitudes? why did He not rally around Him the strength of Israel, and strike off their fetters?

The booths were gone; the wilderness-journey had come to an end; the eighth day had brought them to the land: with their Messiah in their midst, would not the land, in all the breadth and fulness of the promise to Abraham, be before them now? Yet He had spoken of going away, and to a place inaccessible to those who should seek Him and not find Him. What could all this mean, they must have questioned, many of them in their bewilderment, and found no answer.

But "in the last day, the great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any one thirst, let him come unto Me and drink. He that believeth on Me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water."

"Of those who had heard Him," says Edersheim, "none but must have understood that, if the invitation were indeed real, and Christ the fulfilment of all, then the promise had its deepest meaning, that he who believed on Him would not only receive the promised fulness of the Spirit, but give it forth to the fertilizing of the barren waste around. It was truly the fulfilment of the Scripture-promise, not of one, but of all: that in Messianic times the Nabhi (prophet), literally the 'weller forth,' viz. of the divine, should not be one or another select individual, but He would pour out on all His handmaidens and servants of His Holy Spirit, and thus the moral wilderness of this world be changed into a fruitful garden. Indeed, this is expressly stated in the Targum, which thus paraphrases Isa. xliv, 3: 'Behold, as the waters are poured out on arid ground, and spread over the dry soil, so will I give the Spirit of My holiness on thy sons, and blessing on thy children's children.' What was new to them was that all this was treasured up in the Christ, that out of His fulness men might receive, and grace for grace. And yet even this was not quite new."

The interpretation is given by John himself on account of the importance of it: "But this He said concerning the Spirit, which they that believed on Him were about to receive; for the Spirit was not yet, because Jesus was not yet glorified."

The fulfilment carries us on to Pentecost, when the Spirit of God came in witness to the glory of the rejected Saviour. And we must not suppose, because of the reference to the Old Testament, that in the manner of its fulfilment there was nothing but what the prophets of old declared. Peter's quotation of Joel at the time when the Spirit came shows how really the promise of our Lord could fulfil the Old Testament prophet. It does not show that there was not a deeper and greater blessing in what took place at Pentecost. The Lord's words here speak of the effect only—"rivers of living water" flowing out of the believer. The evangelist explains that this would follow the reception of the Spirit after Christ should be glorified. And the Lord's previous words assure us that this would be in the day of His absence, not of His presence; although even yet it was assured to them that He would return if only (nationally) they repented. They did not; and the mystery of the Church came gradually out. Of that there is nothing here: all is individual; and even as to the individual, we must connect what is said here with what had been said to the Samaritan woman, before we can understand that the reception of the Spirit means that indwelling presence which is the abiding spring within the man from which these 4 (40-viii. 1): Testing and tested.

4. [Some] of the multitude therefore, having heard these words, said, This is of a truth the [t]prophet. Others said, This is the Christ. But others said, Doth the Christ then come out of [u]Galilee? hath not the Scripture said that the Christ cometh of the seed of [v]David, and from the village of Bethlehem where David was? There came to be a division therefore among the multitude on account of him. And some of them would have taken him, but no one laid hands on him. The officers came therefore to the chief priests and Pharisees, and they said unto them, Why have ye not brought him? The officers answered, [w]Never man spake* like this man. The Pharisees therefore answered them, Are ye also led astray? hath any of the [x]rulers believed on him? or of the Pharisees? But this multitude that knoweth not the law, they are [y]accursed. [z]Nicodemus saith unto them (he that came to him before, being one of them), Doth our law judge a man, except it [a]first hear from him, and know what he doeth? They answered and said unto him, Art thou also of Galilee? Search and see: for out of [b]Galilee ariseth no prophet.

And they went each one to his house; but Jesus went unto the [c]mount of Olives.

*R. V. following a strongly supported text, reads, "Never man so spake," omitting last clause.

t ch. 6. 14.
u ver. 52. cf. ch. 1. 46.
v cf. Jer. 23. 5. cf. Mi. 5. 2. cf. Lk. 2. 4-12.
w cf. Matt. 7. 29. cf. ch. 4. 29.
x cf. ch. 12. 41, 42. cf. 1 Cor. 1. 26-29. cf. 1 Cor. 2. 8. cf. Matt. 11. 25, 26.
y cf. ch. 9. 34.
z ch. 3. 1. ch. 19. 39.
a cf. Deut. 1. 17. cf. Prov. 18. 13.
b ver. 41.
c cf. Matt. 26. 30.

"rivers" issue. For the full truth and bearing of the doctrine we must look elsewhere.

But where else shall we find so wonderful a picture of what the man indwelt of the Spirit is in the world as witness of the glory of His rejected Lord? As we have to say of kindred utterances in this Gospel, it seems too highly drawn for a picture of any save the rare exceptions among Christian men. But let us accept the reproof of this, and try rather to realize what a man indwelt of the Spirit would be normally as that. The Spirit of God—God—dwelling within one: the Living Centre of the practical life; the Enlightener of mind and conscience; the Energy of the affections and the will: all power, all wisdom in Him who as Vice-gerent of Christ has come to hold me for Christ against all that in a world opposed to Him would hinder my witness! what competency, what fulness at all times accessible to me does all this imply!

A perpetual spring in a vessel must needs overflow the vessel in which it is, the smallness of which is no limit to the spring itself. When once the vessel is full, all the power of the spring will manifest itself in the overflow. Hence, (if we think of the spring and not of the vessel,) "rivers of living water" are not too much to predicate of the outflow from this divine Source of blessing within the soul, which, first filling to complete satisfaction the soul itself, must surely then flow out for the need of others.

This is the Lord's own witness to the gift He gives, who cannot err in the estimate He makes of it. When we realize what it is, we cannot think it to be too high. Our experimental knowledge will depend indeed upon our practical subjection to the Spirit indwelling us; but how blessed to know that this is to be gained in so simple a way, and that this is the picture the Lord can give us of the normal Christian.

4. From this we go back to see the world in which He is, and which does not know Him. Reasonings there are many, and contrary thoughts; false tests,

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chaps. viii. 2–xii.)

Brought to God, in the power of resurrection life.

SECTION 1. (Chap. viii. 2–59.)

The Life the Light.

1 (2-11): Grace and truth.

1, AND early in the morning he came again into the [d] temple, and all the people came to him; and he sat down and taught them. And the scribes and the [d] Lk. 21. 38. cf. ch. 18. 20.

and true tests falsely applied; the failure of His enemies to apprehend Him, failure from the timidity of the half-decided, as Nicodemus. Amid all this they scatter away from Him, every one to his own, and leave Him. He, solitary in the world He made, He to His solitude in the mount of Olives.

SUBD. 3.

The third subdivision is very distinctly marked as that, and in a double way: both as bringing into the sanctuary and giving the resurrection character of life as communicated to us by One who is both "the Resurrection and the Life." And these things are very clearly connected together by the fact that only through death could the sanctuary be opened for us, and resurrection is of necessity therefore the way in.

Historically we have not yet come to either; and this part even more distinctly if possible, than the former ones, shows us the anticipative character of the Gospel of John. As already said, there is no rending of the veil in it, as we find it in the Synoptic Gospels: for in John the Word, tabernacling in flesh, displays in Himself divine glory,—"glory as of an Only-begotten with the Father, full of grace and truth." This is what we find in what is before us here: Christ as the Light of the world, Immanuel, the Son of the Father, perfectly one with Him in all to which He testifies, a Light from which the pretentious self-righteousness of the Pharisees is driven out in confusion, while yet a convicted sinner can stand there, because revealed in grace. Grace and truth are found in Him together, and as the Son He gives the freedom of the Father's house.

Thus we begin here with the soul in the light. The second section shows the light in the soul; which makes Christ Himself the Object before it; who, as the Shepherd of the sheep, leads out His own from the Jewish fold of law into enjoyed salvation, liberty and green pastures. But for this the Shepherd must give His life up for the sheep, and these green pastures are in fact on resurrection ground.

This leads therefore to the third section, in which death is met for the believer, and Christ is now the resurrection and the life, Lazarus being here the text of the sermon, as the blind man is in the second section, and the woman taken in adultery in the first. In each case, as we have seen in the impotent man and the miraculous feeding of the multitude, the sermon goes beyond the text.

Sec. 1.

The first section, then, shows us sovereign grace in action, God Himself the only hiding-place of the convicted and condemned, and freedom therefore by the truth. Here where divine grace is so fully displayed, the history of the text is a lamentable illustration of how little that grace is realized by Christians themselves. We have but to take up indeed the writings of some of the earliest "fathers," to discover how soon the glory of its light became dimmed in the professing Church,—how soon the Judaism which combatted the apostle Paul from the beginning had overgrown or displaced the gospel which he preached. We may wonder indeed that it could venture to mutilate Scripture itself in such a manner as the MSS. and versions show has been done in this case; but this is what Augustine, as is well known, in a day little later than the earliest copies, charges against "some of little, or rather enemies to the true faith."

Pharisees bring a woman taken in [e]adultery, and having set her in the midst, they say unto him, Teacher, this woman was taken in the very act, committing adultery. Now in the law [f]Moses commanded to stone such: thou therefore, what sayest thou? But this they said, [g]tempting him, that they might have whereof to

[e] cf. ch. 4. 16–18. cf. Matt. 5. 27, 28.
[f] Lev. 20. 10. cf. Deut. 22. 21, 22.
[g] cf. Matt. 19. 3, etc.

We can, in fact, easily understand the motive which would lead to the omission of such a story as is here before us: who could imagine any bold enough to insert it where he did not find it? or the manufacture of so exquisite a piece of forgery as this would be? Indeed, few if any would venture to go quite so far as this. They speak of it rather as of some apostolic tradition, some fragment of true history, not perfectly preserved. They bow it out, in short, regretfully, but in no wise does this compensate for the greatness of the loss.

Of course, I am aware that there are difficulties urged, entirely apart from questions of the text. Thus Edersheim objects: "That a woman taken in the act of adultery should have been brought before Jesus (and apparently without the witnesses to her crime); that such an utterly un-Jewish, as well as illegal procedure should have been that of the 'Scribes and Pharisees'; that such a breach of law, and what Judaism would regard as decency, should have been perpetrated to 'tempt' Him; or that the Scribes should have been so ignorant as to substitute stoning for strangulation, as the punishment of adultery; lastly, that this scene should have been enacted in the temple, presents a veritable climax of impossibilities."

But much of this seems to be misconception merely; the rest a strange pledging oneself to what would be impossible for Scribes and Pharisees to do, mad with disappointed hatred against Christ, and bent upon compassing His destruction. As to the penalty of adultery being strangulation, "Michaelis," says Lange, "has justly denied the authority of the Talmud, and has asserted, on a comparison of Ex. xxxi. 14; xxxv. 2, with Num. xv. 32–35, that the formula 'put to death' generally means stoned. Besides strangulation is frequently used first, only as an alleviation of the prescribed penalty, as in the burning in the middle ages."

As to bringing her for judgment to the Lord, there is no evidence of any formal trial instituted, such as would need the production of witnesses. The appeal is to a prophet who should know the mind of God rather than to a judge, who should decide as to the fact. The case was decided according to Moses' law; but were they to act as Moses commanded? Thus the illegality vanishes: they were not setting up a new court, even feignedly; but knowing the grace they cavilled at, they would make Him either act in opposition to this, or come out in opposition to the law itself.

As for their respect for decency or the temple, under the pressure of such an opportunity, they were the children of those who murdered Zacharias, perhaps on the very spot where the Lord was at this time: and it would be scarcely safe to theorize in regard to it.

The narrative is witness to itself in its inimitable beauty and simplicity, its union of holiness and grace. It is witness also in the place in which it stands, as the introduction to the chapter, the key to what follows in it. In all this part of John the doctrine developes out of a narrative,—some miracle or significant thing, the text (as we have called it) of the sermon following. Take the story of the woman away, you will not realize in the same way at all the meaning of what is left, a broken statue without a head. This one can hardly show aright except as we take up the chapter, and therefore we may go on to this at once.

1. The Lord returns from the mount of Olives to the temple, and the people flock around Him. His manifest victory over the rulers on the previous days has discouraged open attempts upon His Person; while all the more it has accuse him. But Jesus, stooping down, [h]wrote with his finger on the ground. And, as they continued asking him, he lifted himself up, and said unto them, He that is [i]without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her. And again he stooped down, and wrote on the [h] cf. Ex. 31. 18. cf. Dan. 5. 5, 25-28.

[i] cf. Rom. 2. 1, 22.

shown the necessity of some bold stratagem to make Him commit Himself in the eyes of the people as an offender against the law, for which they were zealots. It was just the time for such an effort as we find here, which if it were in some respects extreme, only made manifest the more the extremity to which they had been brought. As against the Friend of publicans and sinners also, their plot was well conceived. He had dared, as they murmured, to assume the prerogative of God in forgiving sins, and would evidently not be intimidated from the course He was pursuing by any fear of consequences. Yet He had not as yet ventured to pronounce the pardon of one openly condemned by Moses' law. Here was a new case therefore for Him to decide, in which He might easily come into collision with it. Did He not go after that which was lost until He found it? They would bring one lost indeed to Him, and see if He would take the burden of such: "a woman taken in adultery, in the very act!" The law had decided what was to be done: would He venture to annul its sentence? But if not, His reception of sinners must receive some modification: if He did—as they surely rather hoped—His followers would have to make open choice between Him and Moses, and the crowd would certainly drop off from Him.

The temptation is obvious, and they had much reason to expect success. Had He not in His sermon on the mount contrasted His own sayings with those of the ancients? And perhaps they had already heard such a saying as that "the law and the prophets were until John." Such things, doubtless exaggerated and multiplied by common rumor, would encourage them in their hope, as they came forward with their appeal to the Teacher for His judgment. Their surprise must have been great when, instead of answering them, "Jesus, stooping down, wrote with His finger on the ground." The common version adds: "As though He heard them not;" and others have given a similar interpretation. But He could not have repeated such an action with such a meaning. On the contrary, though we have nothing of any words which might be written, it is plainly the sentence itself which they are to find in the ground. But they do not understand Him, and as they continue asking, He lifts Himself up at last, and faces them.

No: He does not reverse Moses' sentence; let it be carried out: only let there be spotless hands to execute it. "Let him that is without sin among you cast the first stone at her." The sentence of the law is right: yes! but on whom really is the sentence of the law? who shall escape it, if it be strictly applied? Manifestly, it is as a teacher, not a judge, that He is answering. They might say, Is law and order to come to a stand-still, because there are no spotless hands to execute it? Plainly not: nor, if the Lord were speaking as a judge, would it seem to have been in place to require any such thing. The judge in a given case has to do with the accused, and not with the executioner. But the Lord distinctly refuses to take such a place in Israel: "Man," He says to one who would have put Him in it, "who made Me a judge or a divider over you?" But if, as here, He is appealed to as a teacher, He will answer as a teacher; and then very differently. In this character, it is with the appellants that He has first of all to do, and not directly with the accused; and this is accordingly His course at this time. They would exhibit Him as one in opposition to Moses; He makes them realize that He alone it is who understands Moses, and uses the law with them for the purpose for which it was given, making them feel the sharp edge of its universal condemnation, in order that they may realize their need of that grace at which they cavil, and which He had come to declare and minister to men. "He that was without sin" was indeed the man the law was ground. But they, having heard that, [j]went out one by one, beginning with the elder ones until the last; and Jesus was left [k]alone, and the woman, where she was, in the midst. And Jesus lifted himself up and seeing none but the woman, said unto her, Woman, where are those thine accusers? hath [l]no one condemned thee? And she said, No one, Lord. And Jesus said unto her, [m]Neither do I condemn thee: go thy way; hencefore [n]sin no more.*

j cf. ch.3.20.
k cf. ch.9.34, 35. cf. Ps.51.4.
l cf. Ex.11.7. cf. 1Cor.4.3.
m cf. Rom. 4. 7, 8. cf. Rom. 8. 33, 34.
n cf. Lk.7.48–50. cf. Tit.2.11, 12.

*From vii. 53–viii. 11 is omitted in many ancient MSS., sometimes placed elsewhere; and many differences are found in the text.

seeking. For the lack of finding one, the death it threatened brooded over all; and none could see the face of God and live. Here was the first thing they needed to realize, in order to know the joy of that open face of God, which revealed in grace in the Person of the Son, brought life instead of death—eternal life.

"And again He stooped down, and wrote upon the ground." There it was indeed that man's sentence was written: that ground out of which man was taken, to which he must return,—dust to dust. Was that sentence upon the woman merely? Was it only upon the gross transgressor? There was the law's settlement of the question: "the man that doeth them shall live in them"; "the soul* that sinneth it shall die." Ah, yes: if the glory of God were in the face of Moses, they could not look upon it there: grace was the sinner's only refuge; it was theirs.

But they will not bow themselves to this. They stand in the light convicted, but only to flee out of it into the covering darkness. "And they, having heard that, went out one by one, beginning with the elder ones until the last; and Jesus was left alone, and the woman where she was in the midst."

Thus the attack has failed; the would-be accusers are silenced; they leave behind them even the sinner herself: it has become impossible for them to touch her. On her part, she remains: the light which they have found so intolerable reveals no more as to her than she has known already. Guilty, lost, she was and is: the retreat of her accusers has not altered that; to what it has left her as yet she knows not. He has not reversed Moses's law, whose words have yet inexplicably for the moment freed her. To herself He has not yet spoken. What will He say—what can He—with whom there is an authority that can make the leaders of the people bend and give way before it? Now she hears His voice again, and to herself, questioning, "Where are those thine accusers? has no one condemned thee?" And she says, "No one, Lord." He says again: "Neither do I condemn thee: go thy way; henceforth sin no more."

Now we cannot say what, or if any work, was wrought in the woman's soul. She utters no word which would entitle us to say that there was faith in her to lay hold of the grace that there was in Him for the chief of sinners. On His part He says nothing as to forgiveness of sins or of salvation. He has not come to judge the world, but to save the world. If the judges in Israel throw up her case, therefore, she is free. It is a great deliverance for her, and may be the type and prelude of one far greater. But the question as to this that remains does not at all affect the truth as presented to us here of God revealed in grace in the Person of the Son, in whom every soul hopelessly condemned and guilty may find refuge. Grace and truth are in Christ Jesus, and the Life is the Light of men. Whether she availed herself of it or not, on His side the sanctuary was opened; and in a world where righteousness was not,—where those who would claim it had to retire abashed and confounded from the presence of Him who for

*That is, "the person": a common use of the word soul in Scripture, and which is still preserved to our day. See for the argument as to the death-penalty of the law the notes on Exodus xxxiv. 1-7.

2 (12-20): The Father and Son their fellowship in testimony.

2. Jesus therefore spake again unto them, saying, I am the [o] light of the world: he that followeth me shall in no wise walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life. The Pharisees therefore said unto him, Thou bearest witness concerning thyself: thy [p] witness is not true. Jesus answered and said unto them, Even if I bear witness concerning myself, yet my witness is true; for I know [q] whence I came and whither I go; but ye know not whence I came or whither I go. Ye judge according to the [r] flesh; I [s] judge no one. Yea, and if I judge, my judgment is true: for I am not [t] alone, but I and the Father who sent me. And also in your law it is written that the witness of [u] two men is true: I am one who bear witness concerning myself, and the Father who sent me [v] beareth witness concerning me. They said therefore unto him, Where is thy Father? Jesus answered, Ye [w] neither know me nor my Father. If ye had [x] known me, ye would have known my Father also.

o ch. 1.4,5,9. ch. 9. 5. ch. 12. 46.
p cf. ch.5.31. cf. ver. 17.
q ch. 13. 3. ch. 16. 28.
r ch. 7. 24. cf. Lk. 16. 15.
s ch. 3. 17. ch.12.47,48. cf. ch. 5.27.
t ver. 29. ch. 16. 32.
u Num. 35. 30. Deut. 17. 6.
v ch. 5. 37.
w ver. 55. ch. 16. 3. ch. 17. 25.
x cf. ch.1.18. cf. ch. 14.7.

those accepting condemnation was but a hiding-place. The sanctuary is opened then in sovereign grace, though the actual bringing to God, and the work that brings there, have not as yet found adequate expression. Holiness is found, however, in its true relation and due order: no condemnation leading on to no more sin. Grace and not law is the power for holiness.

2. The Lord returns to His speech with the multitude, interrupted by the appeal of the scribes and Pharisees, in words which have plain reference to what has just taken place. In that temple which, up to the moment of His final rejection, He was accustomed to speak of as His Father's house, where the Glory of old had tabernacled, and in the treasury in which the gifts of the worshipers were deposited, He openly claims that glory as His own. "I am the Light of the world," He says: "he that followeth Me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." The Sun is indeed rising above the hills of Judea; and the nations far and wide are to enjoy its light. Not only so, but Israel herself is beginning to be seen as part of that world which has been lying in the darkness. Sin and unbelief have shut out from her the glory which was or should have been her own, and now are shutting out the fuller splendor into which that earlier light has broadened. Israel has not vindicated any peculiar claim to that for which she has as a nation had no eyes, no heart. Light is for those that have eyes, and for practical use. So now it is "he that followeth Me": his alone is the blessing; he "shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life."

Christ is the Life which objectively is the Light of men. In His words and acts the manifestation of God, the world in its contradiction of Him was necessarily manifested also. He was the test and touchstone of all, and in His presence every thing stood out in its true character. But thus also Christ received in the heart, the life received, becomes subjectively the light for it. In His light it finds light, and thus in following Him it has the "light of life."

A full, divine claim; and the Pharisees from their side naturally at once challenge it. "Thou bearest witness concerning Thyself," they say: "Thy witness is not true." But it is plain that that can rightly mean only "invalid." Obviously, a man may speak truly concerning himself; but his testimony, if unsupported, is insufficient. The Lord tells them that He speaks from knowledge; whereas they have only ignorance to oppose to it. They ought to have been able to recognize His divine mission at least, and owning this, they would have recognized His ability to testify also. But with all their ignorance they judged after a fleshly manner: putting themselves self-confidently into the

These things spake he in the treasury, as he taught in the temple; and no one took him; because his [y]hour was not yet come.

3 (21-29): From above, and returning thither: then to be manifested.

3. He said therefore again unto them, I [z]go my way; and ye shall seek me, and shall [a]die in your sin: whither I go ye [b]cannot come. They of Judea said therefore, Will he kill himself, that he saith, Whither I go ye cannot come? And he said unto them, Ye are from [c]beneath; I am from [d]above: ye are of this world; I am [e]not of this world. I said therefore unto you, that ye shall die in your sins: for [f]except ye believe that I am [he], ye shall die in your sins. They said therefore unto him, [g]Who art thou? And Jesus said unto them, Absolutely* what I am even saying to you. I have many things to say and to judge concerning you; but he that sent me is true; and the things that I have [h]heard from him, these things I speak unto the world. They knew not that he spake unto them of the Father. Jesus therefore said, [i]When ye shall have lifted up the Son of man, then shall ye know that I am [he], and that I do [j]nothing of myself; but as the Father hath taught me, I speak these things. And he

*The rendering of the Authorized and Revised Versions, "from the beginning," is inadmissible. Both the tense and the verb itself forbid this.

[y] ch. 7. 8.
[z] cf. ch. 13. 33.
[a] ver. 24. cf. Ezek. 3, 18.
[b] ch. 7. 34. cf. Hos. 5. 6. etc. Jer. 50. 4, 5.
[c] ver. 44.
[d] cf. ch. 3. 13. cf. ch. 17. 8.
[e] ch. 17. 14, 16. cf. ch. 18. 36.
[f] cf. ch. 16. 9 with Acts 4. 12.
[g] cf. ch. 1. 19. cf. Matt. 26. 63.
[h] ch. 3. 11, 32. cf. ch. 15. 15. ver. 40.
[i] ch. 3. 14. ch. 12. 32, 33. cf. ch. 16. 8-11. cf. Acts 2. 36, 37.
[j] ch. 5. 19, 30.

judge's seat, for which they were incompetent; and ready to cut off, as in His case, those whom they ignorantly condemned. On His part, He was not taking the judge's seat, as the case of the woman illustrated. (Had He come to judge, they would all have been cut off.) And yet He truly was the One competent to do so, always in the mind of the Father, and one with it.

And if He bore witness concerning Himself, He did not stand alone in this. His witness was valid, for the Father who sent Him was bearing witness also concerning Him. He speaks evidently of those works of power, of which elsewhere He says, "The Father that abideth in Me, He doeth the works": a witness they could not deny, yet would not accept. And still they meet His claim with their mere ignorance: "Where is Thy Father?" The way to know His Father was to know Himself; and indeed they knew neither.

So He spoke in the treasury of the temple, and the hand of God was still upon them: they could do nothing. No one laid hand upon Him; for His hour to deliver Himself up, which waited His will, not theirs, was not yet come.

3. There is still no ear and no heart. He can only tell them, therefore, that He is going away—going to that place inaccessible to them, of which He had elsewhere spoken. They would seek Him, though not in true repentance, thus with no answer: they would die in their sin.

The men of Judea in sarcastic mockery say, He must mean to kill Himself: for the suicide's place of punishment is the only place they can think of where they cannot find Him. He tells them that they are from beneath, He from above: there is in them no work of God; the world in opposition to God has made them what they are: they are of it, as He is not. Thus they will die in their sins, because they will not by faith in Him lay hold of that mercy which God is holding out to them.

"Who then is He?" they ask. He can only answer that He is just what He is saying to them. Of what use to go on telling them things for which they have no ear? And concerning themselves also He has much to say and to judge; who sent me is [k]with me: he hath not left me alone; for I do always the things that are [l]pleasing to him.

¶ (30-47): Searched out.

4. As he spake these things, many [m]believed on him. Jesus therefore said to those of Judea that believed him, If ye [n]abide in my word, ye are my disciples indeed; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free. They answered him, We are [o]Abraham's seed, and have [p]never been in servitude to any: how sayest thou, Ye shall be made free? Jesus answered them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, [q]Every one that practiseth sin is the bondman of sin. Now the bondman abideth not in the house for ever; the [r]son abideth for ever. If therefore the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free [s]indeed. I know that ye are Abraham's seed; but ye seek to [t]kill me, because my word hath no way with you. I speak that which I have [u]seen with my Father; and ye therefore do what ye have seen with [v]your father. They answered and said unto him, [w]Abraham is our father. Jesus saith unto them, If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the [x]works of Abraham. But now ye seek to [y]kill me, a man who hath told you the truth which I heard from God: this did not Abraham. Ye do the works of your father.

k ver. 16.
l cf. Matt.3. 17. cf. ch. 6.38. cf. ch. 17.4.
*m cf.*ch.2.23 -25. cf. ch. 7.31.
*n cf.*ch.15.7, 8. ver. 36. *cf.*Rom.8.2.
o vers.37,39. cf. Matt. 3. 9 with Lk. 16. 24, 25. *cfr.*Rom.4. 11, 12.
*p cfr.*Neh.9. 36, 37. *cf.*ch.19.15.
q cf. Tit.3.3. cf. Rom. 6. 16–21. *cf.*2 Pet. 2. 19.
r cf. Gen.21. 10. *cf.*Phile.15, 16.
s cf. Gal.5.1. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 16. cf. Rom. 8. 15.
t ch. 5. 18. ver. 59.
u ver. 26. v ver. 44; cf. 1 Jno. 3. 8. w ver. 33. x cf. Gal. 3. 7, 9. y ver. 37.

but of what use? Still the True One has sent Him, and He has truly declared His words to the world. But they do not know of whom He is speaking.

Then He goes on to speak of His lifting up which they in their unbelief are going to accomplish. Then will come His manifestation and His vindication. And even now He who has sent Him is with Him, He cannot leave to Himself One who constantly does the things that please Him.

4. A wave of conviction passes over the multitude, and on hearing these words many, we are told, believed on Him; but the expression is no stronger than with regard to those who "believed on His Name" when at the feast-day they saw the miracles that He did; and of whom it is said that "Jesus did not commit Himself to them" (chap. ii. 23–25). Of these also the Lord speaks doubtfully, and presently they resent His words and lapse into unbelief the fiercer for their disappointment in Him. Perhaps they had caught at the lifting up of which He had spoken, as exaltation by the people, followed as He had said it would be by the manifestation of Himself. The Lord's words to them are certainly words well suited to turn them from any thought of mere political liberty to be gained, and to test them as to their need of a real salvation. Abiding in His word, He tells them, would prove them to be really His disciples. They would know the truth, and the truth would make them free. But at once they resist and resent this. They, the seed of Abraham, in bondage, needing to be made free? they cry: how can He speak of that? they were never in bondage to any! Spite of its notorious contradiction to the truth, their protest shows of what bondage they were thinking. But the Lord will not raise a question here, but goes deeper. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Every one that practiseth sin is the bondman of sin;" and this, though men often count it freedom, is the bitterest bondage. Hence, as this is the condition of man in general, the first thing that he needs is to be set free. There is no such thing in the spiritual realm as self-attained freedom: salvation from sin must be of God.

But what then must be the relationship to God of those who are the slaves of sin? Freemen towards God they cannot be, and yet, though rebels in heart and

They said unto him, We were not born of fornication: we have [z] one Father,—God. Jesus said unto them, If God were your Father, ye would [a] love me: for I came forth from God, and am come [from him]: for neither am I [b] come of myself, but he [c] sent me. Why do ye not know my speech? Because ye [d] cannot hear my word. Ye are of the [e] devil [your] father, and the lusts of your father ye desire to do. He was a [f] murderer from the beginning, and stood not in the truth; because there is [g] no truth in him. When he speaketh falsehood, he speaketh of what is his own: for he is a [h] liar, and the father of it. And because I [i] speak the truth, ye believe me not. Which of you [j] convicteth me of sin? if I say truth, why do ye not believe me? He that is of God [k] heareth God's words: ye therefore hear not because ye are not of God.

5 (48-59): Immanuel.

5. They of Judea answered and said unto him, Say we not well that thou art a [l] Samaritan, and hast a demon? Jesus answered, I have not a [m] demon; but I [n] honor z cf. Deut. 32. 6. cf. Gal. 3. 26.

a cf. 1 Jno. 2. 23. cf. 1 Jno. 5. 1. cf. ch. 15. 23.
b ch. 5. 43. ch. 7. 28.
c cf. Heb. 5. 4, 5. ch. 3. 17.
d cf. 1 Cor. 2. 14. cf. Jer. 6. 10. cf. ch. 7. 17.
e cf. Matt. 13. 38. ver. 23. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 3, 4.
f cf. Gen. 2. 17 with Heb. 2. 14.
g cf. Ezek. 28. 12–17.
h cf. Gen. 3. 4, 13. cf. 2 Cor. 11. 3. cf. Rev. 12. 9; cf. Rev. 20. 7–10.
i cf. 2 Thess. 2. 11, 12; cf. ch. 5. 43.
j cf. Lk. 23. 41, 47; cf. ch. 9. 31; cf. ch. 19. 4–7.
k cf. ch. 6. 37, 44; cf. ch. 10. 26; cf. 1 Jno. 4. 6.
l cf. ch. 4. 9; cf. Lk. 10. 33; cf. Is. 53. 3.
m ver. 52; ch. 7. 20; ch. 10. 20, 21; cf. Matt. 12. 24.
n cf. ch. 5. 41; cf. ch. 12. 28.

will, cannot escape from service. But unwilling service is again but bondage: the slaves of sin are therefore the slaves of God.

Man being what he is, what then can the law, the boast of the Jew, in fact, do for him? To the "soul that sinneth" it denounces death, and the shadow of this hangs over all. The covenant of Sinai is that "which gendereth to bondage, which is (typically) Hagar" (Gal. iv. 24); and freedom is unknown to it.

We see, therefore, to what the Lord is going on in the next words, seemingly disconnected as they are from what precedes them. "Now the bondman," He says, "abideth not in the house for ever; but the son abideth ever." The apostle's illustration of Hagar and Ishmael cannot but come into remembrance; and the casting out of the bondwoman and her son was now soon to come to pass. Even this is but the dispensational shadow of the dread final rejection into outside darkness which the unsaved sinner, zealous law keeper as he may be, must surely experience.

"But the son abideth ever." He is in the freedom begotten of relationship, and not under the bondman's law which may cast him out. The principle is general, but there is no application of it with regard to Christians, as the Christian status of sonship was not yet known. In fact, only Christ Himself can make free, and this is the Lord's application of it here: "If therefore the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." For the Son is no mere servant in the Father's house, but one in word and purpose with the Father; and His work is that salvation-work which alone can make free. Thus again to abide in His word leads into that communion with the Father and the Son, in which alone is found the mastery of all restraints and difficulties whatever. Blessed then is freedom such as this! for ever blessed He who brings us into it.

The Lord goes on to speak of how little their Abrahamic lineage was manifested in their ways,—how little they could really claim him for their father. And when they dare to go further, and resting on their national privilege would assert God Himself to be their Father, He shows they have no spiritual character corresponding to this, and the devil was indeed their father: murderer as he was from the beginning, and not abiding in the truth, which just as such found no reception from them. Convict Him of sin they could not, and yet they would not hear what they could not confute.

5. They turn upon Him with a two-fold thrust in answer to His double my Father, and ye dishonor me. But I °seek not mine own glory: there is ᵖone that seeketh and judgeth. Verily, verily, I say unto you, If a man ᵍkeep my word, he shall never behold death. They of Judea said unto him, Now we know that thou hast a demon. Abraham is ʳdead, and the prophets; and thou sayest, If a man keep my word, he shall never taste of death. Art thou ˢgreater than our father Abraham, who is dead? and the prophets are dead: whom makest thou thyself? Jesus answered, If I glorify myself, my glory is nothing: it is my Father that ᵗglorifieth me: of whom ye say that he is your God. And ye ᵘknow him not, but I know him; and if I said I know him not, I should be a liar like unto you; but I know him, and I ᵛkeep his word. Your father Abraham ʷrejoiced to see my day; and he saw it, and was glad. They of Judea therefore said unto him, Thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham? Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, ˣBefore Abraham came into being, I am. They took up ʸstones therefore to cast at him; but Jesus hid himself and went out of the temple [passing through the midst of them, and so passed on],*

*Some omit.

o cf. ver. 54. cf. Phil. 2. 6-8.
p cf. ch. 5. 23. cf. Phil. 2. 9-11.
q cf. ch. 5. 24. cf. ch. 14. 23, 24.
r cf. Heb. 11. 13. cf. ch. 11. 25, 26 with 1 Thess. 4. 13, 14.
s cf. ch. 4. 12. cf. Heb. 3. 3.
t cf. ch. 5. 31, 41. ver. 50. cf. 2 Pet. 1. 17. cf. Heb. 1. 5, 6.
u ch. 7. 28. ver. 19.
v ver. 29. cf. ch. 15. 10.
w cf. Gen. 22. 1-18. cf. Gen. 15. 1-6.
x cf. Ps. 90. 1, 2 with Heb. 1. 10-12. cf. Heb. 13. 8.
y cf. vers. 5, 7, 11 with Is. 53. 5; ch. 10. 31.

charge. To the first, that they are no true children of Abraham, they retort that He is a Samaritan. To the second, that their father is the devil, that He is Himself possessed with a demon. The Lord quietly puts it away with the remark that they are dishonoring Him who seeks His Father's glory, not His own. But His Father seeks and judges. Then closing His assurance, still held out to whosoever will, of freedom by the truth, He takes up and removes the shadow which the law left hanging over its disciples, with His strongest form of affirmation: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, If a man keep My word, he shall never behold death."

They meet it only with a shout of derision, for they know no removal of death save one, and without exercise of conscience know not even the sting of it—what makes death death. Abraham is dead and the prophets: is He greater, this man who will not permit, to His very disciples, even a taste of death?

But He answers: If He is but a man glorifying Himself, that glory is empty enough. Nay, but it is His Father glorifies Him,—He whom without true knowledge they call their God. On His part, if He denied the knowledge that He had of Him, He would be as false as they were now in professing that they knew Him. He did know Him, and kept His word. Then He looks back over the expectant ages awaiting Him whom now, being come, they refused, and affirms, "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see My day; and he saw it and was glad." "Thou art not fifty years old," they reply; "and hast Thou seen Abraham?" His answer is the full disclosure of His glory, the claim of the incommunicable title of Deity for Himself: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham came into being, I AM."

It is Immanuel; but there is no knee bent to Him, no loving homage tendered. They take up stones to stone Him; and He, hiding Himself for the moment from their sacrilegious violence, passes out of the temple.

See. 2.

We have seen thus on God's part the sanctuary opened, God revealed in Christ in grace and truth,—the Life the Light of men. We have not yet seen the re-

SECTION 2. (Chaps. ix. x.)

The Going forth out of the Fold with Christ: Salvation, Freedom, Sustenance.

1 (ix.): The Light of Life.

1 (1-7): the Source of light.

1. [1] AND as he passed on, he saw a man [a]blind from birth. And his disciples asked him, saying, Rabbi, who sinned, this man or his [a]parents, that he was born blind? Jesus answered, Neither this man sinned, nor his parents, but that the [b]works of God should be manifested in him. I* must work the works of him that a cf. Acts 3. 2. cf. ch. 11. 10.

a cf. Lk. 13. 1-5. cf. Ex. 20. 5. cf. Jer. 32. 18. cf. Ezek. 18. 20.

b cf. ch. 11. 4. cf. 1 Tim. 1. 16.

*Some read, "We," but the context shows "I" should be read.

spouse to it on man's side. We have not seen the Light received, and Christ become as the result of this the Object for the heart. We find this in the present section; and the power of the revelation, by which henceforth the walk is with and in obedience to Him. But this involves in other respects also a complete change. For Judaism as a legal system implies throughout a shut up heaven, the veil which in it hung before the face of God. To Moses himself is said, "Thou canst not see My Face." Thus the soul brought to God is necessarily, by that fact, outside of Judaism. As the epistle to the Hebrews teaches us, to be "inside the veil" means therefore, of necessity, to be "outside the camp."

God also not being revealed, the light not having come, Judaism is but a fold in which the sheep meantime are shut up in the darkness. This is their safeguard indeed, until the expected Guide and Shepherd comes, though not giving the security of the Shepherd's presence. Thus also there is bondage yet, not liberty; and, though they may be fed in the fold, it is not the place of pasture. So, when the Shepherd comes, it is to lead out of the fold, and this section is a true Exodus. It is the going forth which we shall find actually accomplished in the history of the Acts, the Exodus of the New Testament. Here we have it in its principles; and the Gospel of John in this once more displays its character as anticipative of Christianity. It is, in fact, that "beginning" from which John dates in his first epistle; Christ Himself being the Root necessarily out of which all things spring; and here anticipatively with His work accomplished, the Prophet of the new era now at hand.

1. The historical basis here is given at length: an instructive example of one to whom light is communicated, not less spiritually than physically. His simplicity and firm adherence to the truth so far as he knows it are beautiful, spite of the opposition of the leaders of the people, over whom his straightforward honesty of heart gains a manifest victory. He is given the privilege of being cast out for Christ's name, even before he knows the glory of Him for whom he suffers. Cast out, he receives the revelation of the Son of God and worships; the first of the many to form the flock of the good Shepherd, outside the fold. As a follower of the Light, he walks no more in darkness, but has the light of life.

[1] Passing on out of the hands of His persecutors, the pitiable condition of a man blind from birth arrests the Lord's attention; and the disciples (of whom we now hear for the first time during His present visit to Jerusalem) inquire as to a matter full of perplexity to such as believed with the Rabbis in every physical evil as the result of some specific sin. Was this man so born for sin committed even before birth? or was it for the sin of his parents? Neither explanation of it seems to satisfy them; and indeed, looked at, as they contemplate it, as mere punishment, it must be ever hard to satisfy oneself as to the inequalities of it that seem upon the face of the things. The Lord lets in the light of a higher purpose, as applicable to any other as to the man then before Him,—"that the works of God should be made manifest in him." Of course, the sin which has come into the world has been the cause of all the evil in it; and, of course, there is very commonly specific punishment for specific sin. With this the heart can have no rest, however, until we realize that God is manifesting Himself in all human history; for this cannot be in mere righteousness only, sent me, while it is [c]day. The night cometh, when no man can work. While I am in the world, I am the [d]light of the world. When he had said these things, he [e]spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle, and anointed his eyes with the clay, and said unto him, Go, wash in the pool of Siloam (which is by interpretation, [f]Sent). He went away therefore, and washed, and came [g]seeing.

2 (8-34): the growth and conflicts of faith.

[2] The [h]neighbors therefore, and those who had before

[c] ch. 11.9,10.
[d] ch. 8. 12. cf. 1 Pet. 2.9.
[e] Mk. 7. 33. Mk. 8. 23. etc. Num. 12. 14.
[f] cf. ch. 4. 50. cf. Rom. 1. 5.
[g] ch. 11. 37. cf. Matt. 11. 5.
[h] cf. Mk. 5. 19.

but in love as well. We have a whole book in the Old Testament devoted to the working out of this problem of the mission of evil, which in Job's case was mistaken by his friends in the same fashion as the disciples' question would indicate here. But if the manifestation of God in His works be the great overruling purpose everywhere, then not only must there be in general love as well as righteousness, but in every one of His works there must be love. Where love is not, there God is not: if "God is love." And here the miracle (or as Scripture would speak of it from its having this very character of manifesting God, the "sign") is only a special manifestation of Him who everywhere is the same God.

The Lord adds that the day for His activity as Man upon the earth is hastening to a close. For Him also, in that sense, the night is coming; and for the world also, from which He, the Light of it, is soon to be taken. This is not in contradiction to the truth that Christianity, with its wondrous blessings, was to follow His ascension to heaven: for Christianity is not the "light of the world," but the taking out of it a people, whose place is to be with Christ where He is, and whose blessings are "spiritual blessings in heavenly places." This is in perfect keeping with what is the doctrine now before us, the abandonment of the Jewish fold, and the gathering of Jews and Gentiles into one, outside it. For Christians it is the night that is passing, not the day; but a night in which we see far into heaven.

The Lord now spits upon the ground, and making clay with the spittle anoints the eyes of the blind man with the clay. That might seem as if it would rather confirm his blindness than remove it, and the typical significance speaks in the same way: for out of the ground man was made, and the spittle, connected so often with humiliation and reproach, adds such thoughts to the lowly condition which manhood in itself implied for Him. Thus with Christ the very grace which brought Him down so low was misunderstood and cavilled at by the pride and self-righteousness of scribes and Pharisees, and seemed, in fact, but to make the blind eyes blinder. The plain fact of His humanity became for them an unanswerable argument against His claim of divinity, as we find shortly here. But there is a remedy which will change all: "Go, wash in the pool of Siloam," says the Lord; and then that we may recognize the spiritual meaning of this, the interpretation of the name is added, "Sent." These interpretations (found in the Gospel of John alone) are in themselves significant, as we have seen already (chap. i. 41, 42), of the going over of spiritual blessing to the Gentiles, and the present one is again perfectly in keeping with the subject here. The water is the type of the Spirit, and the spring gushing from the temple-mount, where normally rested the cloud of the divine presence, the place of the "Father's house," was an apt figure of Him in His gracious working, who was to come after the Lord's ascension, "sent" to declare the Rejected One.

How differently does this poverty now appear when it is seen as the self-abasement of divine Love in quest of men, the poverty by which they are to be made rich! And how does the application of Him thus open the eyes indeed to all other things! "He went away therefore, and washed, and came seeing."

[2] Immediately the conflict begins; and first as to the man himself. So differ-seen him that he was a [t]beggar, said, Is not this he who sat and begged? Some said, This is he; others said, Nay, but he is like him; he said, I am he. They said to him therefore, [j]How were thine eyes opened? He answered, The man called Jesus made clay, and anointed mine eyes, and said to me, Go to Siloam and wash. I went away therefore and washed, and recovered sight. They said to him, [k]Where is he? He said, I know not. They bring him to the Pharisees, the man once blind. Now it was the [l]sabbath when Jesus made the clay and opened his eyes. The Pharisees therefore also again asked him how he recovered sight. And he said to them, He put clay upon mine eyes, and I washed, and see. Some of the Pharisees said therefore, This man is not of God, because he keepeth not the sabbath. Others said, [m]How can a sinful man do such signs? and there was a division among them. They say again therefore to the blind man, What sayest thou of him, because he hath opened thine eyes? He said, He is a [n]prophet. The Jews therefore did not believe that he was blind and had recovered sight, until they called the parents of him who had recovered sight, and asked them, Is this your son, who ye say was born blind? how then doth he now see? His parents answered and said, We know that this is our son, and that he was born blind; but how he now seeth we know not, or who opened his eyes we know not: ask him; he is of age; he will speak for himself. These things said his parents, because they [o]feared the Jews. For the Jews had already agreed that if any one confessed him to be the Christ, he should be [p]put out of the synagogue. On this account his parents said, He is of age: ask him. They called therefore the second time the man who had been blind, and said to him, Give glory to God; we know that this man is a [q]sinner. He answered therefore, If he is a sinner I know not; one thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see. They said to him therefore, What did he to thee? How opened he thine eyes? He answered them, I told you already, and ye did not hear: why would ye hear it again? would ye also become his disciples? They railed at him and said, Thou art his disciple; but we are [r]Moses' disciples. We know that God spake unto Moses, but this man, we know not [s]whence he is. The man answered and said unto them, Now in this is a wonderful thing, that ye t cf. Lk. 18. 35–43.

j cf. ch. 3. 4.

k cf. ch. 10. 39–42. cf. ver. 35.

l cf. ch. 5. 9.

m cf. ch. 3. 2. cf. vers. 31–33. cf. ch. 10. 21.

n ch. 4. 19. ch. 6. 14.

o ch. 7. 13. ch. 12. 42, 43.

p ch. 16. 2. cf. Lk. 6. 22.

q ver. 16. cf. ch. 5. 23.

r cf. ch. 5. 45–47. cf. Acts 13. 27.

s cf. ch. 7. 27, 28. cf. ch. 8. 14.

ent is he with the light in those blank and sightless eyes, that they cannot at first believe it is the same. Then comes the question, what has made this change; and he refers it to the "man called Jesus." There is as yet little knowledge indeed of the One who has had compassion upon Him. Still it has taken hold, and a little germ of faith, scarcely to be distinguished as that at first, increases amid opposition, even by means of it, until, having learned to own Him as a prophet, the glory of the Son of God is finally revealed.

know not whence he is, and he hath opened mine eyes. We know that God [t]heareth not sinners; but if any one be a worshiper of God and doeth his will, him he heareth. Never* was it heard that any one opened the eyes of one that was born blind. Except this man were of God, he could do [u]nothing. They answered and said unto him, Thou wast wholly [v]born in sins, and dost thou teach us? And they [w]cast him out.

3 (35-41): the revelation.

35 Jesus heard that they had cast him out, and having [x]found him, he said unto him, Dost thou believe on the [y]Son of God? He answered and said, And who is he, Lord, that I may believe on him? Jesus said to him, Thou hast even seen him, and he who speaketh with thee is he. And he said, I believe, Lord; and he [z]worshiped him. And Jesus said, For judgment am I come into this world; that they that see not might see, and that they that see might become [a]blind. Some of the Pharisees that were with him heard these things, and

* or, "Since the world was."

t cf. Ps. 66. 18. cf. Acts 19. 13-16.
u cf. ch. 5. 19. cf. ch. 14. 10, 11.
v ver. 2. cf. Ps. 51. 5. cf. Lk. 18. 11, 12.
w ver. 22.
x cf. Heb. 13 10-13. cf. Heb. 10. 19-21. cf. ch. 8. 9.
y cf. vers. 11, 17, 25, 31, 33. cf. ch. 1. 49.
z cf. ch. 14. 9. cf. ch. 20. 16, 17, 28. cf. Phil. 2. 10. cf. Rev. 5. 12.
a cf. Matt. 13. 12-15. cf. Acts 6. 51-53.

The picture of hierarchic pretension with its blindness and hostility to the truth is complete. The Pharisees question the man, the parents, the man again. That the unbribed power of God has acted they have no wish to take into their argument. If He has, let Him have the praise of it: that hinders nothing the condemnation of Him with whom God has chosen to ally Himself, for His share in the matter. Did He not make the clay upon the Sabbath-day? The man with clearer insight affirms that God does not hear sinners: if He were not of God He would not be owned of God after this manner.

They have no argument to meet this; all the more earnestly do they denounce it. A man wholly born in sins,—for was not his blindness proof enough of that?—to be teaching them! So they cast him out of the synagogue: they have before decided that if any should confess that the Worker of these mighty deeds was Christ, he should be cast out. Thus the open rupture with the disciples of Christ has begun on the part of the synagogue.

35 He is cast out; but cast only in this way into the company of Christ at whom all this is aimed. Nor will he be long left without the blessedness of such companionship. Again Jesus finds him, as before He found him, now to complete the work which He had then begun. "Dost thou believe on the Son of God?" He asks; and he, though not knowing Him in that glory which is His, yet with full confidence in his Guide, inquires, "And who is He, Lord, that I may believe on Him?" He is following on in the track of the light that is come to him, and now has reached the Source of it. "Jesus said to him, Thou hast even seen Him, and He that speaketh to thee is He." At which, with the straightforward simplicity that had baffled the Pharisees, and now yields itself with complete conviction to the completing truth, he answers, "I believe, Lord;" and worships. He has not found merely a creed: he is brought to God. That which we did not apprehend in the woman is now unmistakably seen in the once blind man: he is morally and spiritually, as well as physically enlightened; he is in the light, and the light also is in him.

And the Lord, who came not into the world for the purpose of judging it, but for its salvation, nevertheless by the fact of His presence in it, has brought judgment into it. The necessary effect is found that the (consciously) blind—the seekers therefore of light—are brought to see; while the pretentious seers—the men of this world's wisdom—are made blind. The Pharisees ask where they are to be classed—with the blind or with the seeing. The Lord answers them

2 (10): The flock outside the fold.
) (1-5): the call of the true Shepherd.

they said unto him, Are we blind also? Jesus said unto them, If ye were blind, ye would have [b]no sin; but now ye say, We see; therefore your sin [c]remaineth.

2. [1] Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that entereth not through the [d]door into the sheepfold, but mounteth up elsewhere, he is a [e]thief and a robber. But he that entereth through the door is the [f]shepherd of the sheep. To him the [g]porter openeth; and the sheep [h]hear his voice; and he calleth his own sheep by [i]name, and [j]leadeth them out. And when he hath put forth all his own, he goeth [k]before them, and the sheep [l]follow

b cf. ch. 15. 22-24. cf. Jas. 4. 17. cf. Acts 3. 17. cf. Rom. 5. 13.
c cf. Rom. 2. 17-29. cf. ch. 20. 23.
d cf. ch. 1. 45 with Heb. 5. 4-6.
e ver. 8. cf. ch. 5. 43.
f Ps. 23. 1. cf. Gen. 49. 24.

ver. 14. g cf. Matt. 3. 13-17; cf. Is. 42. 1-4. h ver. 27; cf. ch. 6. 44. i cf. Ex. 28. 9, 10, 21; cf. ch. 20. 16; cf. Is. 43. 1. j cf. ch. 9. 34-38, cf. Heb. 13. 13; cf. Gal. 5. 2. k cf. Col. 2. 11-15; cf. ch. 17. 19. l cf. Num. 10. 33; cf. Col. 3. 1.

that they have classed themselves: they say, "we see." Had they been blind, the sin that now was theirs would not have remained to them.

2. By the will of the Jews themselves therefore, the flock of Christ are now outside the fold. From His own side the Lord now confirms this: for He had come as the Shepherd into it, to lead out His sheep into a larger place. The principle of the fold is now to be given up: restraint is now to be exchanged for freedom,—a freedom made safe by an Object for the heart, controlling it by its affections, and by a living guidance which is realized as that of perfect wisdom, indissolubly united to as perfect love.

[1] That Israel were the sheep of Jehovah had been the theme of the prophets of old. He who came into this fold to exercise authority must do so under the plain warrant of Jehovah Himself. And Ezekiel had prophesied in His Name that He would raise up for them "one Shepherd" who should feed them, even His "servant David" (xxxiv. 23): that Greater one of David's line, of whom that king had only been the fore-runner and type. This was, of course, Messiah, the Lord's Anointed; and every mark that pointed out the Anointed pointed out the Shepherd of Israel also. These marks combined constituted the "door," or way of entrance by which the true claimant of such prerogative would come. All else were but thieves and robbers: men seeking their own gain in ways of treachery and violence. The entrance by the door was possible but to One,—the true Shepherd,—to whom the porter would open. He, so coming, would call His own sheep by name and lead them out.

The interpretation that would apply all this to the New Testament ministry in general, is so forced and really arrogant in its assumption, as scarcely to need notice. The one expression, "His own sheep" can apply to no under-shepherd; and who but He could call them by name, and lead them out? To Him alone every thing applies in the simplest and fullest way. Coming at the time definitely predicted by Daniel, confessedly of David's line, born at Bethlehem, displaying the signs that none other ever did, and that unique character which could not permit confounding Him with any other,—He came through the door manifestly. And the Spirit of God in the prophesyings at His birth, at His presentation in the temple, in the testimony of the Baptist, and the visible anointing which preceded this, opened the door of the fold. Now the sheep were beginning to hearken to His voice, calling them each by his name with a knowledge which individualized them all, with perfect and tender knowledge. These were His own sheep, but not all the sheep in the Jewish fold; and this is the strange thing that now becomes manifest, that though He who has come is the Shepherd of Israel, it is not Israel as a whole that knows His voice. Like many of the eastern folds, this one is found to have other sheep than His sheep. The call is an appeal to faith which not all have; and by it is wrought a separation, which sets them outside of the fold of Judaism altogether.

He "leadeth them out:"—stronger still in the next sentence: "when He has him; for they know his voice. But a [m]stranger they will in no wise follow, but will flee from him, for they know not the voice of strangers.

2 (6-21): salvation, liberty, sustenance, in company with the Good Shepherd: the contrast with wolf and hireling.

[2] This allegory spake Jesus unto them; but they [n]knew not what things he was saying unto them. Jesus said therefore again, Verily, verily, I say unto you, I am the [o]door of the sheep. All those that came [p]before me are thieves and robbers; but the sheep did not hear them. I am the door: by me if any one enter in, he shall be [q]saved, and shall [r]go in and out, and find [s]pasture. The [t]thief cometh not save to steal and m cf. vers. 12, 13. cf. Gal. 1.8. cf. 2 Cor. 11. 13-15.

n cf. ch. 8. 43.
o cf. ch. 14. 6. cf. Acts 4. 12.
p cf. Jer. 23. 1-6. cf. Ezek. 34. 1-6. cf. Zech. 11. 16, 17.
q cf. Acts 16. 30, 31.
r cf. Rom. 8. 2.
s cf. Ezek. 34. 14; cf. 1 Pet. 2. 2.
t ver. 8; cf. 2 Pet. 2. 1-3.

put forth all His own." For the principle of the fold is now to be abandoned. "The law is not of faith;" and faith is the sole productive energy in man for God: "faith, if it have not works, is dead," so necessarily productive is it, as surely as it is living: and "faith worketh by love." But law is a system of prohibition, whose inspiring principles are self-interest and fear; while "there is no fear in love." "Love seeketh not her own."

The law was a prohibitory fence thrown around men, the curb upon a will which was naturally lawless, which it could not change, and which fretted against it. Hence it was bondage and not liberty: under which the very children of God were as servants, and not sons (Gal. iv. 1, 3, 7); and which therefore did not yield for the Father's heart that which would satisfy Him. Every way the fold must go: Christ must put forth all His sheep; the putting forth implying however the strange power that a legal system yet may have even over true believers. How needful indeed this putting forth, and the history of the resistance to it, the Acts with the book of Revelation will by and by declare to us.

As we know, they were not all His sheep that lay in that Jewish fold; and His presence in it was that which tested this, and drew the line of separation. His sheep were they who recognized the Shepherd's voice; not merely knew Him by external testimony, but in the response of their hearts to what appealed to them as no other. Hence they were drawn, and followed Him in that wondrous path in which they found Him ever before them, in the track of light His footsteps left. And the Shepherd adds with regard to them, in the deep satisfaction of His own heart, "A stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him: for they know not the voice of strangers." They are not obliged to know whose voice it is, nor to be learned in theological disquisitions. There is but one Voice for which they have ear or heart; and from another voice they flee; for from any who would simulate that Voice, or claim authority over them beside, they do right in suspecting evil. For the sheep ordinarily, apart from what may appeal to them in the need of others, their best safety is in flight.

[2] But those to whom He is speaking understand nothing of what He is saying; the Lord therefore repeats and emphasizes His claim as the Shepherd of the sheep; dwelling upon their happiness with Him, in contrast with those who would make them a prey, or at least follow their own interests and leave them as a prey to others. He as the Good Shepherd would lay down His life for them; and that as the expression of the Father's love.

He begins with the assertion of His being the door of the sheep. It is not a question of the fold any more: there is no longer a fold; His sheep were in it, but are now ideally outside it altogether. The flock is His, and in His hand; and He is the only way of entrance into it. He receives into the fellowship of His people. Others that had come before Him were only thieves and robbers, with no title, and seeking no interests but their own; but His true sheep had never been deceived; and amid the multitudinous voices now, His voice, so unlike all others, rings out still, clear and distinct in its appeal to those in con-to kill and to destroy; I came that they might have [u]life, and have it [v]abundantly. I am the [w]good shepherd: the good shepherd layeth down his life for the sheep. But he who is a hireling, and not the shepherd, whose own the sheep are not, beholdeth the [x]wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep, and fleeth: and the wolf seizeth them and [y]scattereth the sheep. [The hireling fleeth,]* because he is a [z]hireling, and is not concerned about the sheep. I am the good shepherd, and [a]know those that are mine, and those that are mine [b]know me; even as the [c]Father knoweth me, and I know the Father; and I [d]lay down my life for the sheep. And [e]other sheep I have, which are not of this fold; them also I must bring; and they shall hear my voice, and shall become one [f]flock, one shepherd. Therefore doth the Father [g]love me, because I lay down my life, that I u cf. ch. 6. 33.

v cf. ch. 7. 37-39.
w cf. Is. 40. 11. cf. Ezek. 34. 11-13, 22-25. cf. Heb. 13. 20. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 25. cf. Matt. 20. 28.
x cf. 1 Sam. 17. 34-36. cf. Acts 20. 29.
y cf. Zech. 13. 7.
z cf. 1 Pet. 5. 2.
a ver. 27. cf. Nah. 1. 7. cf. ch. 6. 64. cf. 2 Tim. 2. 19.
b ver. 4. cf. 2 Tim. 1.

* Many omit.

12. c cf. Matt. 11. 27. d cf. ch. 15. 13; cf. 1 Jno. 3. 16. e cf. ch. 17. 20; cf. Acts 15. 7-9; cf. Is. 56. 8. f cf. ch. 11. 52; cf. Eph. 2. 13-16; cf. Col. 3. 10, 11; cf. Eph. 3. 1-6. g cf. ch. 5. 20; cf. Phil. 2. 9; cf. Eph. 5. 2.

sciousness of their need and guilt. Where is there another who could propose to meet all the unrest in human hearts for every one who should come to Him? and who but He has done it?

Again He declares: "I am the door: by Me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture." Salvation—a strange thing in this sense to the Jew—here lies at the very beginning of the blessings belonging to the flock of Christ; not as a possible attainment, but as a gift of unconditional grace, never therefore to be revoked. This positive assured security of His people tells at once that He and they are outside the legal fold. So the liberty that is associated with this speaks also: "He shall go in and out;" that is, the fold is no longer a place of confinement for him. He may in New Testament liberty go back to find in the Old Testament what God has given of Christ in it; but he belongs to it no more. Then also "he shall find pasture": the true place of it is certainly outside the fold. All here combines to tell his blessing, and where he now belongs.

The assurance of all blessing lies in this that he is in the care of the Good Shepherd. Wisdom and love are His; with power also that can lack no resources. The thief comes only to steal and to kill and to destroy. He on the contrary comes to give life, and that abundantly. Here a power beyond all creature power is seen; a need which is beyond all that the figure would imply. The theme of John's Gospel discloses itself once more: life, which is eternal and His gift, without whose work none could have it. This, of course, looks backward as well as forward: life for any, at any time, could be but the result of His coming; which waited not for its effectuation to bring forth its fruit; or else, of necessity, every mercy shown to man must have waited likewise. But we know without any peradventure it was not so.

Manifested, however, the life was not, until the personal Life had come. It was possessed, as we have seen, new birth—without which none could see the Kingdom of God—involving its possession; but it was possessed in the midst of hindrances of the most effectual kind to manifestation. This is a question of the condition of the life, and not of the life itself. The babe does not yet manifest what the man is; and yet it has the life and nature of the man.

In the Son come into the world, the eternal life was first and fully manifested. It was seen in Him in that knowledge of and communion with the Father, which was in Him perfect, and never clouded for a moment. And by Him it may take it again. No one taketh it from me, but I lay it down of [h]myself. I have [i]authority to lay it down, and I have authority to take it again: this [j]commandment have I received of my Father.

There was a [k]division among the Jews on account of these words. And many of them said, He hath a [l]demon, and raves; why hear ye him? Others said, These are not the sayings of one who hath a demon. Can a demon [m]open the eyes of the blind?

h cf. ch. 18. 6. cf. Matt. 26. 53.
i cf. Heb. 10. 5-9. cf. ch. 2. 19. cf. Acts 4. 28. cf. Heb. 2. 14.
j ch. 14. 31. cf. ch. 17. 4.
k ch. 9. 16.
l ch. 8. 48.
m cf. ch. 9. 31, 32.

was revealed as the portion of those who in faith received Him; for, now that He had come, there was no faith that did not receive Him. He that believed on the Son had eternal life; and he that was not subject to the Son did not see life, but the wrath of God abode upon him.

Nor did this wait for redemption to be accomplished. "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live. For as the Father hath life in Himself, so hath He given to the Son to have life in Himself." Thus already was He quickening dead souls with the life that was in Him; and in His prayer to the Father in which He declares that "this is life eternal, that they should know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent," He declares also that this knowledge they already had: "they have known surely that I came out from Thee, and they have believed that Thou didst send Me."

Thus the eternal life communicated to men was already exhibiting itself in its true character; already men knew the Father and the Son. But this was not yet the life in its full abundance; of which the Lord here speaks. Its character was manifested as a life of divine acquaintance and communion; but for this communion to be enjoyed aright, it needed to be freed from many great and terrible hindrances: the Cross had to be accomplished; the resurrection of Christ from the dead must give the answer on God's part to the claim of righteousness there made good, that now as risen with Christ we might be possessors of a life triumphant over death, and justified from all that had brought in death, in a recognized place of nearness to God unknown before. There in the place of sons with God, and with the Spirit of sonship to give the enjoyment of the place, the life eternal would at last have its true abundance. This is what the Lord here looks forward to: the development of it awaits us in the portion of the Gospel soon to come before us, with the Epistle to the Romans for the results in known justification, and the believer's place in Christ, and the Epistle of John for the practical results in the life down here.

He is come then to give life: as the Good Shepherd, by laying down His own: yet it is not so much doctrine that is here, as the insistence upon a love proved at whatever cost. The hireling cares but for his wages: the sheep are not his own, and he is not personally concerned about them: when the wolf appears, he leaves the sheep and flees; alas, no supposititious case, but what has been abundantly seen in history. The wolf in consequence, the open adversary, catches them and scatters them. The hireling acts in character: nothing better could be expected of him. On the contrary, between the Good Shepherd and His own exists a bond of the most tender intimacy. "I know My own, and they know Me; even as My Father knoweth Me, and I know My Father: and I lay down My life for the sheep." "The world knew Him not:" there was the strangeness resulting from contrasted natures. His sheep know Him: for they have received His life and nature, and have thus been brought into communion; and this is the same kind of knowledge as exists (however much more perfectly) between the Father and the Son. The love implied in it is manifested in this, that He lays down His life for the sheep.

But His sheep as thus defined have no longer any relationship with the Jewish fold, still less can be limited to those who have such. Law could not give this

3 (22-30): the Glory manifested in the re-dedicated temple, and His own in His hand.

3 Now the feast of the [n]dedication was taking place at Jerusalem [and]* it was winter. And Jesus was walking in the temple in Solomon's porch. The Jews therefore came round about him, and said unto him, How long dost thou hold our soul in suspense? If thou art the Christ, tell us [o]plainly. Jesus answered them, I told you, and ye believe not: the [p]works that I do in n cf. ch. 2. 19, 20. cf. Matt. 24. 1, 2.

o cf. Matt. 21. 23-27.

p ver. 38. ch. 5. 36. cf. Acts 2. 22.

* Some omit.

gift of eternal life, nor have, therefore, any control over it. In the fold itself there had been those that were not His own; and there are sheep of His not of that fold at all, but Gentiles, far enough off, to be brought nigh and made to hear His voice. Then there shall be one flock, one Shepherd. There is no fold any more: the fold was Jewish and legal, and is gone. In Christ is neither Jew nor Gentile.

That wondrous act of self-devotion by which all blessing is effected and justified for men gives to the Father's heart a new reason for the love wherewith He loves even His well-beloved Son. "Therefore doth the Father love Me, because I lay down My life, that I may take it again." He does not lay it down, as giving up that humanity which He has taken to accomplish the work,—the earthen vessel in which alone the bird of heaven could die. Nay, He takes up again, though in changed condition, the life He has laid down,—takes it to lay it down no more. His death is neither the exhaustion of His love, nor the limit of His work for man. He has served in the lowest deep of suffering on earth; He serves on the Throne of glory still. And the Father's love, which thus rests upon Him as Man continually, embraces as well the fruits of His work, —the men for whom He has toiled, and suffered, and won. This is all fully told out in the epistles of Paul specially; but John, though in some respects the very opposite of Paul, has many connecting links of doctrine with him; beyond the rest of the inspired writers; and this is true even as compared with Luke, whose Gospel has been even styled Paul's Gospel. We shall soon be called to realize this, which here begins to dawn on us. Our acceptance in the Beloved, of which Paul speaks (Eph. i. 6), roots itself in this peculiar love of the Father to the Son.

But the Lord goes further than this, and shows us the Father's purpose in that which He is executing, the Father's commandment entrusted to Him to execute. Not by constraint but freely He lays down His life: "No one taketh My life from Me, but I lay it down of Myself: I have authority to lay it down, and I have authority to take it again." For as Man, He will not dispose of His own life without the Father's sanction; but that is not all: "this commandment have I received of My Father." Thus throughout He is the obedient servant of the divine counsels: one with the Father in what He has in hand to do; the Word, in all things the expression of the Divine Mind; and still "we behold His glory,—glory as of an Only-begotten with the Father, full of grace and truth."

So "there was a division again among the Jews on account of these words." On the one hand they repeat the old blasphemy, that He had a demon, and was raving. Others object to such a sentence, and yet seem to go no further than perplexity. In sorrowful indecision only, the matter for the present ends.

3 The feast of the dedication of the temple occurred two months later than the previous narrative; the connection of it with it is, however, manifest. The dedication commemorated was not that of Solomon's, but the re-dedication by Judas Maccabæus, after its profanation by Antiochus. Yet the Lord walking in Solomon's porch (or colonnade) is surely significant in this way, as carrying us back to that first dedication, if only by way of contrast. The massive foundations of Solomon's structure remained, but only in ruin, which, however sought to be repaired, witnessed to what had come in the way of failure and ruin. How my Father's name these bear witness of me. But ye believe not [q]because ye are not of my sheep, [as I told you].* My sheep [r]hear my voice, and I [s]know them, and they [t]follow me. And I give unto them [u]eternal life; and they shall in no wise ever perish; and no one shall [v]seize them out of my hand. My Father who gave them to me is greater than all; and no one is able to seize them out of the Father's hand. I and the Father are [w]one.

q ch. 8. 47. cf. 1 Jno. 4. 6. cf. ch. 6. 44.
r ver. 3. cf. Rom. 10. 17. cf. Acts 16. 4.
s vers. 14, 15.
t cf. ch. 8. 12. vers. 3, 4. cf. ch. 6. 66–69.
u ch. 3. 16. cf. ch. 17. 3.
v cf. ch. 6. 39.

* Many omit.

cf. Rom. 8. 35–39; cf. 1 Pet. 1. 5. w cf. ch. 5. 19; cf. ch. 14. 9–11; cf. ch. 17. 21–24.

much this second temple, again renewed with great magnificence by the bloody hands of the Edomite Herod, lacked of what the old possessed! As it stood, it was the very witness of their pretentious legalism, covering up the decay and desolation underneath. The Glory was departed, the Living Voice that had once spoken to them was silent now. The Ark and Mercy-seat, where the covering blood should have been sprinkled, the Throne of the divine Inhabitant, was gone. All went on now, not upon the old basis, but only as permitted by long-suffering patience, still pleading, still abused.

Yet the Maccabæan outburst of loyalty to God had for awhile seemed to argue better things in the near future for the returned remnant of a people already scattered. Alas, it was but the convulsive leap of a flame that for a moment sought the heavens, and then died down to its now cold ashes. On man's part, what hope more? In a few souls God's mercy kept hope still; but the fulfilment of it lingered long.

And now there was a new Voice in Solomon's porch: a Voice that did not ignore the ruin, did not accord with the Pharisaism which the people followed, did not ring with the trumpet-tones of the warlike zealotry which would seize its triumph out of the reluctant hand of time; and yet thrilled heart and conscience, as if all the being of man were in His hand and answered to His summons. The Light shone; and the depths within were penetrated by it.

For in fact the Glory had returned, and the Voice long silent had again awakened. It had proclaimed itself in the temple and synagogue, as well as in the places of daily concourse, and in the quiet homes of men. Here was He for whom they had dedicated and re-dedicated the temple, the fitting completion to their celebration of it now. But the fervor of enthusiasm around Him was not for Him: already He had been rejected, vilified and blasphemed; and the few who really listened had to take as outcasts their place with Him. But He was leading them out; and the hand that led them sheltered them; the glory of His presence shone around them: they are hidden in the Sanctuary of it from all that would injure them; for none shall pluck them out of His hand.

The Jews come round about Him in Solomon's porch, and urge Him not to leave them longer in suspense, but tell them plainly if He is the Christ. He answers that He has already told them without effect; and that the works He was doing in His Father's Name bore witness of Him. They believed not because they were not of His sheep, who heard His voice. These sheep of His He knew, and they followed Him. He had said this before; but He now adds: "And I give unto them eternal life, and they shall in no wise ever perish," (it is the strongest possible affirmation,) "nor shall any one pluck them out of My hand."

The absolute security of the sheep of Christ could hardly be more fully affirmed. For, first of all, they have a nature which, as divine, is truly everlasting; it has become truly their own nature, although it is true that they have yet also in them a fleshly nature which is not in conformity, but in contradiction to it. This, which seems to many a strange doctrine, is nevertheless the true experience of every child of God. Yet in face of it the apostle can say, "Who-

The Jews therefore again took up [z]stones that they might stone him. Jesus answered them, Many good works have I shown you from the Father: for which of these good works do ye stone me? The Jews answered him, For a good work we stone thee not, but for [y]blasphemy, and because thou, being a man, makest thyself God. Jesus answered them, Is it not [x]written in your law, I said, Ye are gods? If he called them gods to whom the word of God came, (and Scripture [a]cannot be broken) say ye of him whom the Father hath [b]sanctified and sent into the world, Thou blasphemest, because I said, I am the Son of God? If I do

z ch. 8. 59.
y cf. Matt. 9. 3. cf. ch. 19. 7. cf. Lev. 24. 16.
x Ps. 82. 6. cf. Ex. 22. 9, 28.
a cf. Matt. 5. 17-19. cf. 2 Tim. 3. 16, 17. cf. Acts 13. 29.
b cf. ch. 8. 42. cf. ch. 1. 32-34.

soever is born of God doth not commit," or "practise," "sin: for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God." The character of the divine life in him is such that it masters the evil; not, in final result, is mastered by it. It abides; it is eternal life.

But the Lord does not leave us to any inference, even the surest: He goes on to say: "And they shall in no wise ever perish." The consequence is developed, and the negation faces every way: think of what danger you may, that "in no wise ever perish" meets it all. The weakness of the creature, its mutability, with the sad history of change that lies against it, all is met by such an assurance. But the Lord goes even further: He looks at the question of the world against these poor sheep of His,—the world, and Satan the prince of it,—and He seals His assurance with a double seal: They are Mine, He says: "No one shall seize them out of My hand. My Father who gave them to Me is greater than all; and no one is able to seize them out of the Father's hand." The Cloud is opening now to let out the enfolded Glory; now it shines fully out: "I and the Father are one."

The meaning of this last assertion has nevertheless been disputed. It is plain how those who heard Him took it, and how, instead of expressing alarm and grief at so great a mistake, He confirms finally their interpretation. Schaff well shows the argument, which I can do no better than insert in this place. He says (Lange's Commentary on John):—

"The neuter ἓν (one) denotes, according to the connection and for the purpose of the argument, unity of will and power; which rests on the unity of essence or nature: for power is one of the divine attributes, which are not outside of the divine essence, but constitute it. Even if we confine ἓν to dynamic unity, we have here one of the strongest arguments for the strict divinity of Christ. It is implied even more in ἐσμεν (we are) than in ἓν. No creature could possibly thus associate himself in one common plural with God Almighty without shocking blasphemy or downright madness. In this brief sentence we have, as Augustine and Bengel observe, a refutation both of Arianism and Sabellianism: ἓν refutes the former by asserting the dynamic (and, by implication, the essential) unity of the Father and the Son. 'I and the Father' and 'we are' refute the latter by asserting the personal distinction. Sabellianism would require the masculine εἷς, instead of the neuter; and this would be inconsistent with 'We are,' and the self-conscious 'I.'"

The Jews understand well enough, and take up stones to stone Him: but the might of His presence stills them. He calmly appeals to them: "Many good works have I shown you from the Father: for which of these good works do ye stone Me?" They could not deny the power or the goodness, but the grace which had brought the Son of God among them in such lowly guise, they could not believe: "For a good work we stone Thee not, but for blasphemy; and because Thou, being a man, makest Thyself God." Thus His words seemed against His works, and for His words they condemned Him; in His reply, there-not the [c]works of my Father, believe me not. But if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works, that ye may know and [believe]* that the Father is [d]in me, and I in the Father.

They sought therefore again to take him, and he [e]went forth out of their hand; and went away again [f]beyond Jordan unto the place where John was baptizing at the first; and he abode there. And many came unto him; and they said, John indeed did no sign, but [g]all things that John spake concerning this man were true. And [h]many believed on him there.

* Many read, "understand."

[c] ch. 14. 10, 11. ch. 15. 24.
[d] ch. 14. 10. cf. ch. 17. 22, 23.
[e] ch. 8. 59. cf. Lk. 4. 30.
[f] ch. 1. 28. cf. ch. 7. 1.
[g] ch. 1. 7, 29–34. ch. 3. 27–36. ch. 5. 33.
[h] cf. ch. 7. 31. cf. ch. 8. 30.

fore, He appeals to their own Scriptures, their "Law," as they themselves called the whole of them, but the spirit of which their unsubject hearts had so little entered into. Was it not written in their law, "I said, Ye are gods"? Thus the title of "gods" had been given to mere men; but who by the word of God that came to them, the commission by which they, the judges in Israel, acted, became His representatives. "If those who in so acting had received an indirect commission, were gods, the very representatives of God, could it be blasphemy when He claimed to be the Son of God, who had received, not authority through a word transmitted through long centuries, but direct personal command to do the Father's work; had been directly and personally consecrated to it by the Father, and directly and personally sent by Him, not to say, but to do the work of the Father? Was it not rather the true and necessary inference from these premises?" (Edersheim.)

The Lord here doubtless refers, not to that of which He Himself alone could have the consciousness, but to His open anointing by the Spirit in bodily form, and the Father's attesting words, when after His baptism by John He went forth to His ministry. John had borne witness to Him in connection with this, as the "Son of God." Was it not suitable that, if men by God's commission could represent Him so, He, sent openly among men in such a manner, should be in fact such a Representative as only the true Son could ever be?

The works of His Father done by Him confirmed all this in the fullest way. They implied this abiding of the Father in Him, in the power displayed, His abiding in the Father in intimacy of communion. Thus there was sufficient witness to the truth of His claims; and if they believed not His words, they might at least believe His works.

The seal which the Lord puts upon the perfection of Scripture is as plain as possible. "Scripture cannot be broken." The fact of its being Scripture guarantees the absolute inspiration of the very words used. The term He builds upon might seem to be at least somewhat extreme as applied to men; yet He takes it as an example of a rule of the most universal character, to which no exception at all can be made. Not only this or that statement which it makes can be demonstrated as true, but the mere fact of its being in Scripture sufficiently vouches for it. The highest Critic that can be never criticizes Scripture, but affirms the truth of all of it; and the futility of all men's efforts to break it in pieces. They are doomed of necessity to defeat and dishonor, as is all the rebellion of the creature against God.

But Israel rejected the testimony of His words and works together. Again they sought to take Him,—a thing impossible until His own time came. He went forth out of their midst unharmed, and went to where formerly John had baptized, where, the soil having been broken up, the seed of His word took root. "John," they said, "did himself no miracle; but all that John spake of this Man was true. And many believed on Him there."

SECTION 3. (Chaps. xi., xii.)
Resurrection-Life; in which the Son of God is glorified.

1 (xi. 1-46): The presence of the Life.
1-4: the call and the purpose.

1. [1] Now a certain man was sick, Lazarus from [t]Bethany, of the village of Mary and her sister Martha. It was Mary who [j]anointed the Lord with ointment, and wiped his feet with her hair, whose brother Lazarus was sick. Therefore his sisters [k]sent unto him, saying, Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest* is sick. But when Jesus heard it, he said, This sickness is [l]not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God may be glorified thereby.

[t] cf. Lk. 10. 38, 39. cf. Lk. 24. 50.
[j] ch. 12. 3.
[k] cf. Lk. 7. 3. cf. ch. 4. 46, 47.
[l] cf. ver. 11. cf. Matt. 9. 24. cf. ch. 9. 3.

* φιλεις, the love of a friend.

Sec. 3.

We have now the character of the life received as resurrection-life. For us it has necessarily sprung out of death, the death of Another: according to the Lord's words that we find here, that, "except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but, if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit."

For us also quickening is out of death. Dead naturally in trespasses and sins, we are quickened together with Christ, and raised up together. The first is a change of condition, an immense one, from death unto life, from a naturally hopeless state of alienation from God ("alienated from the life of God, through the ignorance that is in them, because of the hardness of their hearts,") to a state of knowledge of God which implies communion with Him, even though it be at first about our sins. "Risen with Christ" is a change of position; the place of the dead is changed for the place of the living: it is the opposite of burial, as life is the opposite of death.

Thus resurrection-life is life with the fruits of Christ's death attaching to it; fruits into the enjoyment of which we come more or less gradually, but which belong to us from the beginning of the life itself. Here we find the removal of the hindrances which have existed to our drawing near to God, and the opening of the sanctuary: the realization upon our side of that which upon God's side we have seen already. This shows us the unity of this third subdivision, as also we have seen.

It is Christ's death that has delivered us from the bondage of the law, and brought us out of the fold into the green pastures into which the Shepherd leads His sheep. The sections here unite together into a perfect whole, as needs must be the case where they are realities of the Spirit's work, and in Scripture which is everywhere a living organism.

The section divides naturally into two parts: the first, dwelling upon the presence among men of the Personal Life Himself; the second showing the death, out of which for us the life must come.

1. The presence of the Life is for those who receive Him the annulling of death, as is shown for us illustratively in the resurrection of Lazarus. Here text and sermon are interwoven throughout; the Lord's words interpreting His works, while yet the faith of His disciples was unable to apprehend in any proper way what for full development waited the coming of the Spirit to disclose. Here again we find the anticipative character of the Gospel, and the link between John and Paul, of which I have before spoken. We must go on to Ephesians and Colossians to learn fully what it is to be quickened and raised up with Christ, though here we have the basis of the doctrine.

[1] Lazarus, whom Jesus loves, is lying sick at Bethany; and his sisters, Mary and Martha, of whom Mary is specially dwelt upon as the one who anointed the Lord's feet with ointment, send Him word of it. They need do nothing more than let Him know.

2 (5-16): the delay and death: the shadow of death.

[2] Now Jesus loved * Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus. When, therefore he heard that he was sick, he [m]abode still two days in the place where he was. Then, after these things, he saith to his disciples, Let us go into Judea again. The disciples say unto him, Rabbi, the Jews [but] now sought to [n]stone thee, and goest thou thither again? Jesus answered them, Are there not twelve hours in the day? if any one walk in the m cf. Matt. 15. 23. cf. Lk. 18. 7.

n ch. 10. 31.

*Ἠγάπα, stronger than the other word.

The after-circumstances cannot but remind us of the story of Jairus' daughter in the synoptic Gospels, in which also there was delay upon the road, and when He came the child was dead; the greater miracle of resurrection followed also in this case. The typical meaning is made plain there by that other story of her who touched in faith the border of His garment, while He was on the way, and was healed of her bloody issue. Even so, while on His way to raise dead Israel, as He yet will do, He is detained by the faith of the Gentiles which claims and draws virtue from Him.

Underneath this dispensational view there lies a universal application in which the two miracles are but different sides of the one story of salvation. From the human side, faith lays hold of Christ, and finds the virtue that is in Him. From the divine side, man is seen to be dead, and must have life. Israel's state nationally only pictures the condition of men at large.

These meanings may perhaps co-exist in the story of Lazarus (or Eleazar, "the Mighty One is helper") of Bethany (the "house of humiliation"). The names alone tell a story of where the help of the Mighty One is found. Israel will find it there in the day that is to come. But that the deeper and at the same time wider application is that which is most in the line of truth before us here needs no argument. Although there are in John, as we have seen, supplementary glances at Israel's condition, yet the deeper and therefore universal view of man as man is what is the general truth, and that as the basis for the announcement of higher and Christian blessings.

Lazarus is sick; and, though Jesus loves him,—nay, even because He does,—Lazarus must die; yet his sickness is "not unto death,"—has not that in view as its end,—"but for the glory of God, that the Son of God may be glorified thereby." The blessing of the creature is not forgotten in this, but established; for it is in this pre-eminently that God is glorified. On the Urim and Thummim of the high priest's breast-plate, the "lights and perfections" (typically) of God Himself, are written the names of the tribes of Israel; and these again, for us, are the typical expression of the Christian in his various characters. "I am glorified in them," says the Lord of glory; and He who is thus glorified in them will glorify them with Himself.

Mary's anointing of Him is not forgotten here: the "exalted one," as her name denotes, is best known as that in her exaltation of Him. Wherever the gospel is preached is this told for a memorial of her. Here it is mentioned anticipatively, though it will be again given in its place historically.

[2] Jesus loves them all, these disciples of His, and remains where He is two days still, as if the news of this sickness had not affected Him. But now He says, to the surprise of those who after all knew Him so little, "Let us go into Judea again." When they object that the Jews had sought to stone Him, He simply refers them to the twelve hours of the day, in which without stumbling man could walk. He, in fact, was the light of the world while in it; full light for those that followed Him. Apart from that they might stumble; for the light was not in themselves. And then He tells them, not of His present safety from the men of Judea, but of the purpose which, without needing to think of them at all, drew Him there at this time. "Our friend Lazarus," He says, finding day, he stumbleth not, because he seeth the [o]light of this world; but if any one walk in the night, he stumbleth, because the light is not in him. These things said he, and after this he saith, Our friend Lazarus is fallen [p]asleep; but I go, that I may [q]awake him out of sleep. The disciples therefore said unto him, Lord, if he have fallen asleep, he will be healed. Now Jesus had spoken of his death; but they thought that he spake of the rest of sleep. Jesus therefore then said plainly, Lazarus hath died; and I am [r]glad for your sakes that I was not there, that ye may believe; nevertheless let us go to him. Then said [s]Thomas, who is called Didymus,* unto his fellow-disciples, Let us also go, that we may die with him.

[3] (a) When therefore Jesus came, he found that he had

o cf. ch. 9. 4. cf. ch. 7. 30.

p cf. Matt. 9. 24. cf. Acts 7. 60. cf. Matt. 27. 52.

q cf. 1 Thess. 4. 13–17.

r cf. ch. 9. 3. cf. 2 Cor. 12. 9, 10.

s cf. ch. 14. 5. cf. ch. 20. 24–29.

3 (17–46): the resurrection.

a (17–27): the Personal Life.

* The Hebrew and Greek respectively for "Twin."

a motive for them also in the affection in which their hearts accompany His own, "Our friend Lazarus is fallen asleep; but I go that I may awake him out of sleep." He talks so quietly they do not understand Him; for the shadow of death is upon all their souls, but the thought of sleep is not even a shadow. "Lord," they say, "if he have fallen asleep, he will be healed." Then He descends to their common language: "Lazarus hath died; and I am glad for your sakes that I was not there, that ye may believe:"—how little like faith was their present mood!—"nevertheless let us go to him." Thomas breaks out with a love which has not emerged yet from the shadow, "Let us also go, that we may die with Him."

[3] (a) How monotonous and tedious in its night-like uniformity is the spirit of unbelief! specially, as we see it here, not in the outside world, which has rejected Christ, but among those who yet have, spite of all, received Him, and cling to Him. We are permitted here to see how heavily the cloud hangs before we see it lift and scatter: for the Life is come; and the Life is the Light of men.

We find the Saviour now come to Bethany, where Lazarus had been already four days in the tomb. Martha, foremost always in her activity, meets Him outside the village, with a confession at once of her faith and her disappointment: "Lord, if Thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." In what follows, her emotion, excited by His presence, goes beyond her actual faith, as the result shows: "But even now I know that whatsoever Thou shalt ask of God, God will give it Thee." The Lord tests her at once with the assurance of a joy too great for her: "Thy brother shall rise again." She sinks at once into mere orthodoxy: "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day." The Lord replies in the memorable words that have comforted so many since: "I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth on Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and every one who liveth and believeth on Me shall never die."

Here then is He in whom resides the power of resurrection and of a life not subject to death. Resurrection comes first, and is that which would appeal to Martha in her present condition. Of life untouched by death she could think only as a future thing, to follow this when in its full reality it should be come. But the Lord applies it to the then present time, dividing this from the past by the presence of Himself now come for the annulling of death. He that believed on Him, though having died, death should be annulled for him: he should live again, and live eternally. But for the believer now alive, this power over death would at once manifest itself; and here He makes it plain that He is speaking of no special, exceptional class: "every one who liveth and believeth on Me shall never die."

been already four days in the tomb. Now Bethany was [t]nigh unto Jerusalem, about fifteen furlongs off, and many of the Jews had come to Martha and Mary, to [u]comfort them concerning their brother. When Martha therefore heard that Jesus was coming, she went to meet him; but Mary [v]sat in the house. Martha therefore said unto Jesus, Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died; but [w]even now I know that whatsoever thou shalt ask of God, God will give it thee. Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall rise again. Martha saith unto him, I know that he shall rise again in the [x]resurrection at the last day. Jesus

t cf. Lk. 24. 50.

u vers. 31, 33, 36, 37, 45.

v cf. Lk. 10. 39.

w cf. vers. 39, 40.

x cf. Lk. 14. 14. cf. Acts 23. 8.

The difficulty of the passage has been such to some as to make them think of the Lord's coming as the time when it would be fulfilled. When He comes again the dead in Him will be raised, the living believer, changed into His image, will never die. There will certainly be the most perfect fulfilment of what is said here. But on the other hand, there is nothing but such a fulfilment to make us think of such a postponement of it to the future, which is quite in opposition to the division of time which the Lord is making: "every one that liveth and believeth"—now; not shall be living and believing at My return: of which He is not saying a word here.

As for the present application the apostle does not hesitate to say that God according to His own purpose and grace, given us in Christ Jesus before the age-times,* "now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, has abolished" (or "annulled") "death, and brought life and incorruption" (not "immortality") "to light by the gospel" (1 Tim. i. 9, 10). This is the inspired application of the Lord's words here, which it makes perfectly plain. In the past death was,—a shadow over souls, such as we see it in the previous part of the chapter, such as we find it in the wail of a Hezekiah, or in Job's picture of "a land of darkness, as darkness itself and . . . where the light is as darkness" (Job x. 22). But now with the Life is come the Light; and the shadow of death is penetrated by it. He that had the power of death is met and vanquished, the captives are freed (Heb. ii. 14, 15).

There is, however, in the Lord's words here, that anticipative character which we have seen so much in John. He Himself was even then, as He is just about to show, the "resurrection and the life,"; yet this anticipates that death of His through which alone the power of death could be annulled. In Him the Eternal Life was to pass through death, not to be enfeebled even for a moment by it, but the reverse: to gain thereby a new energy for the deliverance of those now to receive it, which should make it that "abundant" life of which we have heard the glorious Giver speak. The time had not yet come to utter it fully, and we must go on to the epistles of Paul to find the doctrine in its full development. But here is the root of it. He that is quickened of God now is "quickened together with Christ, and raised up together" (Eph. ii. 5, 6): the virtues of that death out of which alone is life attach to the life communicated. For those who have it, death in the reality of this is behind and not before them; the storm of judgment is behind and not before: that which is before is the pathway of light in which the risen Christ is ascended to glory, the Representative-Head, and Forerunner of His people. For the full development of this, as has been said, we must wait for him whose gospel is in his own description of it, "the gospel of the glory of Christ" (2 Cor. iv. 4, Gk), whom the Spirit of truth was pleased to use

* In the common version, "before the world began"; in the revised, "before eternal times," but "times" cannot be "eternal." The fact is that the word (αἰών) of which this is the adjectival form has two meanings: one being "age," by which in the plural it is always translated; while the other is "eternity" proper, a later use. The mere fact of its being plural in this case decides for its being rendered as I have rendered it, "the age-times."

said unto her, [y]I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth on me, though he have [z]died, shall live; and every one who liveth and believeth on me shall [a]never die. Believest thou this? She saith unto him, Yea, Lord; I believe that [b]thou art the Christ, the Son of God, who should come into the world.

b (28-38): sympathy.

(b) And when she had said this, she went away and called Mary her sister secretly, saying, The Teacher is come and calleth thee. And she, when she heard it, arose quickly and came to him. Now Jesus had not yet come into the village, but was still at the place where Martha met him. The Jews therefore, who were with her in the house and comforted her, seeing that Mary rose up quickly, and went out, followed her, thinking, She is going to the tomb, to weep there. Mary therefore, when she came where Jesus was, and saw him, fell at his feet, saying unto him, [c]Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. Jesus therefore, when he saw her [d]weeping, and the Jews weeping, who had come with her, was deeply moved in spirit, and troubled, and said, Where have ye laid him? They say unto him, Lord, come and see. Jesus [e]wept. The Jews therefore said, See how he loved * him. But some of them said, Could not this man, who [f]opened the eyes of the blind, have caused that this man also y cf. ch. 5. 21. cf. ch. 6. 39, 40. cf. Rev. 1. 18.

z cf. ch. 5. 28. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 22, 23.
a cf. 1 Cor. 15. 51-57. cf. ch. 21. 22.
b cf. Matt. 16. 16. cf. ch. 6. 68, 69.
c ver. 21.
d cf. Acts 8. 2.
e cf. Heb. 4. 15. cf. Lk. 19. 41.
f ch. 9. 6, 7.

* ἐφίλει, the love of a friend.

for the ministry of this; but we shall find the Lord in John steadily leading us on in this direction, until He finally commends us to the Spirit of truth to teach us what as yet they could not bear (xvi. 12, 13).

Martha shows us this in her answer to the Lord here. When He asks of her, "Believest thou this?" she can only answer, with true faith but without understanding of the blessedness contained in the words she has just listened to, "Yea, Lord, I believe that Thou art the Christ, the Son of God, that should come into the world." True, and a glorious truth; but it is not that of which He has been speaking.

(b) Evidently she has the consciousness of this: for immediately she leaves Him, and goes in search of a better scholar. She who has learnt so much at the feet of Jesus, she—it seems as if she said—will understand the better what this means. So she goes and calls Mary her sister secretly, and says: "The Teacher is come, and calleth for thee." Mary, who seems to have been waiting for a positive call, thereupon rises quickly and comes to Him. The Jews, who had come out from Jerusalem to comfort as best they might the afflicted sisters, follow her, as they suppose, to the tomb, and find themselves instead in the presence of Jesus.

Mary is unconscious of them now. She falls at His feet with a stronger emotion than has been manifested in Martha, but only to repeat in her sister's words what they had evidently often said to one another, that if He had but been there, their brother would not have died. There, unlike Martha, she stops and says no more. She sees no way, and cannot speak as if she did. Let the lips she has listened to so often speak for Him and her. And here the Lord is moved as we do not read of His being before. As He looks upon the weepers round Him, He is deeply moved in spirit, and His words move on to action. "Where have ye laid him?" He asks. And when they bid Him "come and should not have died? Jesus therefore, again deeply moved within himself, cometh to the tomb.

c (38-45): the glory of God.

(c) It was a cave, and a [o]stone lay upon it. Jesus saith, Take away the stone. Martha, the sister of him that was dead, saith unto him, Lord, already he [h]stinketh; for it is the fourth* day. Jesus saith unto her, Said I not unto thee, that if thou shouldst believe, thou wouldst see the [i]glory of God? They took away the stone, therefore, and Jesus lifted up his eyes and said, Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me. And I knew that thou [j]hearest me always, but on account of the multitude that [k]stand around I said it; that they also may believe that thou hast sent me. And having said this, he [l]cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth! And the dead came forth, bound feet and hands with [m]grave-clothes, and his face was bound round with a napkin. Jesus saith unto them, [n]Loose him, and let him go.

Many, therefore, of the Jews who came to Mary, and saw what he had done, [o]believed on him; but some of them went away to the Pharisees, and [p]told them what Jesus had done.

*Or, "he is (dead) four days."

o cf. Matt. 27. 60, 66.

h ctr. Acts 13. 36, 37.

i ver. 4. cf. ch. 17. 4. cf. ch. 2. 11.

j cf. ch. 8. 29. cf. ver. 22.

k cf. ch. 12. 29, 30.

l cf. ch. 5. 25. cf. Matt. 8. 8.

m ctr. ch. 20. 5–7. cf. Gal. 4. 10. cf. Col. 2. 20–23.

n cf. Rom. 8. 2. cf. Gal. 5. 1. cf. Acts 18. 25, 26.

o cf. ch. 8. 30, 31. cf. Acts 9. 42.

p cf. ch. 5. 15.

see," His tears are restrained no longer: "Jesus wept." Precious sympathy of One whose consciousness of power does not prevent His entering into the sorrows He is relieving; who in His wonders of divine power was still the Man Christ Jesus, and "Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses."

The Jews take notice of His grief, and say, "See how He loved him;" while with some it wakes the inquiry, has He then, like others, nothing but His tears to give him? He opened the eyes of the blind; and could He not prevent this man dying? Then again He is deeply moved within Himself, as He feels the unbelief which everywhere follows Him. And now He is at the tomb.

(c) It is a cave; and a stone lies at the mouth of it. And now the unbelief of Martha would oppose the removal of the stone: of what use can it be to bring to light a man four days buried? of what but to turn a sweet if sad memory into an offence? But the only offence is the unbelief that will retain him in the tomb, and shut out from the soul, as the Lord reminds her, the glory of the living, omnipotent God.

He is now then face to face with death, and in view of the multitude gathered there, He thanks the Father that He has heard Him, and as One always hearing Him; expressly referring to that assemblage there in unbelief, but who may be brought to believe. In that confidence, and in attestation of such oneness always with the Father, He calls aloud for Lazarus to "come forth!"

How that multitude of eyes must have peered into the darkness; and what a hush of expectation must have fallen upon the crowd, as they strained every sense to catch the issue of such a pledging of God to a miracle like this. Jairus' daughter had but just died; the widow's son at Nain was but on his way to burial; but here was one who in that quick southern clime must have been already far sunk into corruption, and God pledged by One professing to be always heard by Him to bring him up!

And the pledge is redeemed! Shambling forward, as one bound up yet in the habiliments of death, Lazarus obeys the call and comes—a living man. He has recrossed the boundary-line which none of himself or by mere human aid has ever come back over. He has come back a witness to the Resurrection and the 2 (xi. 47-xii): The Death in which is life.

1 (xi. 47-xii. 8): anticipations.
a xi. 47-52): man's plea and God's foundation.

2. [1] (a) The chief priests, therefore, and the Pharisees gathered a [q]council, and said, What are we doing? for this man [r]doeth many signs. If we let him thus alone, [s]all will believe on him; and the [t]Romans will come and take away both our place and nation. But a certain one of them, [u]Caiaphas, being high priest that year, said unto them, Ye know nothing at all; nor consider that it is profitable for us* that [v]one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not. And this he spake not of himself, but being high priest that year, he [w]prophesied that one man should die for the nation; and not for that nation only, but also that he should [x]gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad.

*Many read "you."

q cf. Matt. 26. 3.
cf. ch. 9. 22.
r cf. ch. 12. 19.
cf. Acts 4. 16.
cf. ch. 3. 19.
s cf. ch. 6. 15.
cf. ch. 18. 36, 37.
etc. ch. 19. 12-15.
t cf. Acts 16. 13, 14.
cf. Acts 21. 28.
u cf. Matt. 26. 3.
v ch. 18. 14.
cf. Is. 53. 8.
w cf. Nu. 27. 21.
cf. Num. 23. 7-10.
x cf. ch. 10. 16; cf. Rom. i. 16; cf. Is. 49. 6; cf. Ps. 22. 27.

Life, that the Son of God may be glorified in him. He has come back, a challenge thrown in the face of Christ's would-be murderers, of the possibility of success against One to whom death and the grave are subject. He has come back to walk in the power of such a victory, the type and pattern of that resurrection-life which "every one that liveth and believeth on Him" is called now to enjoy. In such a life is God indeed glorified. In such a life is power over the world attained. In men taken out of the world, sanctified and sent into it again, to represent Him in it as He did the Father.

"Loose him and let him go," is now the enfranchizing word. The will of the Lord is that those who have received life from Him should enjoy it in all its blessed freedom, delivered from the grave-clothes of Judaism, meant to put on men the stamp of death, and not of life. "Loose him and let him go," is the Lord's word now to the evangelist and to the teacher. Let the law do its work thoroughly upon the life of flesh and nature; and let the Cross confirm the lesson of the end of human strength, human wisdom, human will; but let the man in Christ be free as the light and air of heaven to which now he belongs: not in bondage but in freedom can the Son of God be glorified; and everywhere there rings through the New Testament the echo of His own words here, "Loose him and let him go."

The result of the miracle is that, on the one hand, many believe; on the other, word is brought to the Pharisees, and stirs more than ever the animosity which seeks the life of Christ.

2. [1] Here then the second part begins, in which we find the need of that Death out of which alone for us the resurrection-life can come. Anticipations of it and of its fruit start up in unlikely places. A Sadducean high-priest prophesies unwittingly, God overruling the heartless suggestion of human expediency to give testimony to the unique value of His Son's work which then goes beyond it. On the other hand, Christ has His own feast, the anticipation of what He can find in the company of His people. Out of worst evil is going to be the bud and fruitage of fullest good; and God shall be supreme over all, His glory everywhere manifest.

(a) We find then the Pharisees in council with the chief priests, men of a different creed and interests, but with whom they could make common cause against Christ. They have to confess that He whom they are unrelentingly pursuing "doeth many signs." Their only argument from this is that if they let Him alone, all men will believe on Him, and the Romans will take away their place and nation. This brings forward Caiaphas, who rebukes them for their inability to make so simple a calculation as that between the value of one man and a nation. He does not speak of right but of profit, and claims this for b (53–57): withdrawal and expectancy.

(b) From that day therefore, they took counsel that they might kill him. Jesus therefore no longer walked [y]openly among the Jews, but went away thence into a country near the desert, to a city called Ephraim and there abode with the disciples. Now the [z]passover of the Jews was nigh, and many went up to Jerusalem out of the country before the passover, that they might [a]purify themselves. They [b]sought Jesus therefore, and said among themselves, as they stood in the temple, What think ye? that he will not come to the feast? And the chief priests and Pharisees had given commandment that if any one knew where he was, he should make it known, that they might [c]take him.

c (xii.1–3): a feast for Him.

(c) Jesus therefore, six days before the passover, came to [d]Bethany, where Lazarus was whom Jesus raised from among the dead. There therefore they made him a

y ch. 7. 1.

z ch. 6. 4. ch. 2. 13. cf. ch. 5. 1.

a cf. ch. 18. 28. cf. Num. 9. 10-13. cf. 2 Chron. 30. 17-20. cf. Is. 29. 13.

b ch. 7. 11.

c cf. Matt. 26. 14-16. ch. 18. 2, 3.

d ch. 11. 1.

his own side of the account. Nor does he realize the blinding nature of self-interest, nor question the competence of his conclusion in the least. His arithmetic is so simple it can hardly be worked wrong.

Notice how, when God puts His seal upon all this, the whole character of it changes. From God's side, this "profitable for us" becomes (of course) "profitable for you;" the self-interest that in the first case distorts and spoils everything becomes a glorious manifestation of divine love, which can then only consist with fullest righteousness. "The Son of man must be lifted up," that this profit may be realized: if it were not divine righteousness itself, Love could not give up its Beloved to it.

Thus Israel's blessing is secured; but there is a purpose beyond this in the death of Christ that the evangelist from his standpoint cannot fail to notice. He is not going to die "for that nation only, but also that He might gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad." As the Shepherd had sheep not of the Jewish fold, so the Father had children not of that family. As not all in the fold were the Shepherd's sheep, so not all the family of Israel were God's family. The law which gendered to bondage could not mark out or gather the children of God. Adoption could not be enjoyed under it: the real children were as servants and not sons. God was saying, "I am a Father to Israel," not to those born of the Spirit, and children of God indeed. The moment He acts upon this latter principle, the old distinction is given up, and the children that Judaism scattered abroad are gathered.

Thus John keeps steadily to his theme, eternal life and what accompanies its possession, now that it is manifested. Of the Church he does not speak; but of the family; unity with him is unity of life, and so in the Father and the Son.

(b) The Lord being thus rejected, and His death determined, He withdraws from those who are compassing it to a country near the desert, to a city called Ephraim, and remains there with His disciples. This too seems an anticipation of what is coming, when withdrawn from Israel, and found among disciples only, He really withdraws for "double fruit," which "Ephraim" means.

Among the Jews, gathering in preparation for their passover, there is expectation with uncertainty, while the malice of His enemies is planning for His death.

(c) Six days before the passover, He is at Bethany again, in the midst of that little company who had in so remarkable a way been witnesses of His glory, and who show us that believing remnant which, while Israel rejected Him, gathered around Him. These are soon to be the commencement of that Christian gathering which in John has been already variously foreshadowed. Here they make Him a feast, as once (and only once) before, Matthew the publican

[e] feast, and [f] Martha served; but Lazarus was one of those at [g] table with him. [h] Mary then having taken a pound of ointment of pure spikenard, very costly, anointed the feet of Jesus, and [i] wiped his feet with her hair; and the house was [j] filled with the odour of the ointment.

d (xii. 4-8): tested.

(d) Now [k] Judas Iscariot, one of his disciples, who was about to deliver him up, saith, Why was not this ointment sold for three hundred pence,* and given to the poor? But this he said, not that he was concerned about the poor, but because he was a [l] thief, and had the bag, and carried what was put in it. Jesus said therefore, Suffer her to have kept it for the day of my burial. For the poor ye have always with you, but [m] me ye have not always.

2 (xii. 9-19): testimony and conflict.

[2] The great [n] multitude of the Jews, therefore, knew that he was there; and they came, not on account of Jesus only, but that they might see Lazarus also, whom he raised from among the dead. But the chief priests took counsel that they might [o] kill Lazarus also; because that on his account many of the Jews went away and believed in Jesus.

* "Denarii," as elsewhere.

cf. ch. 13. 33. n ver. 12; cf. Mk. 12. 37. o cf. ch. 9. 34; cf. ch. 15. 20.

e Matt. 26. 6-13. cf. Lk. 5. 29-32. cf. ch. 4. 7, 31, 32.
f cfr. Lk. 10. 40, 41. cf. Matt. 11. 29, 30.
g cf. Mk. 5. 43. cf. Lk. 15. 23, 24.
h ch. 11. 2. cf. Lk. 7. 37, 38. cf. 1 Tim. 1. 15-17. cf. Song 1. 3, 12-14.
i cf. Lk. 10. 39. cf. ch. 11. 32. cf. Matt. 21. 8.
j cf. Ex. 40. 34, 35. cf. Acts 2. 2.
k cf. Matt. 26. 8.
l cf. ch. 13. 29. cf. ch. 6. 70, 71.
m Mk. 14. 7. ver. 35.

had made Him a feast, though with a very different company. There as the Saviour of sinners, Matthew had put Him in company with sinners; and a feast, we may be sure, that meant for Him. Here it is with saints that He is found, the fruit of His salvation, and typically on resurrection ground; and here service, communion, worship, have their representatives. Martha still serves; Lazarus is at table with Him; while Mary, entering more deeply into what is before Him, anoints Him for His burial. John alone names Mary here, as he alone points out the traitor as raising the murmuring against her, and that which moved him in it. John too speaks of the anointing of His feet, the other Gospels of that of His head. Here she is like the woman in the Pharisee's house, as in the wiping them with the hair of her head. John also tells us how the house was filled with the odor of the ointment. Thus deeper appreciation on the part of the beloved disciple seems to flow from deeper communion with the Lord's own estimate (comp. Luke vii. 44, 46). How sweet to Him was that lavish expenditure of love which others counted waste. In the Synoptists the memorial of it goes out with the gospel; in John the odor abides in the house. Glorious testimony to a woman's act, such as we find recorded of no other. But she had learnt at His feet what she poured out there.

(d) This act of love brings out the traitor; and we have a glance at His previous history. What the other was pouring out on Him, he would have filched from Him. When he could do this no longer, he sold himself.

[2] Now we have the Lord's entry into Jerusalem as King of Israel. It naturally occupies in John a much smaller place than in the other Gospels. The elaborate preparation for it that we see in the others John has nothing of; nor is there the detail of the entry itself, the purification of the temple, nor the strife with Him on the part of the heads of the people, nor His solemn arraignment of them all. Nor have we the Olivet prophecy following. On the other hand, we have the effect of the resurrection of Lazarus, the testimony to Him of those in whom it had wrought, and on the other hand, the intensifying of the opposition by it. The fulfilment of Zechariah's prophecy is only realized by the disciples afterwards. All this is for John the history of a struggle, and the end of which is

On the morrow, a great multitude that came to the feast, having heard that Jesus was coming to Jerusalem, took [p]branches of palms and went out to meet him, and cried, Hosanna; [q]blessed is he who cometh in the name of the Lord, even the King of Israel. And Jesus having found a young ass, sat upon it, as it is [r]written, Fear not, daughter of Zion; behold, thy King cometh, sitting upon an ass's colt. These things [s]knew not his disciples at first, but when Jesus was glorified, then they remembered that these things had been written of him and that they did these things unto him. The multitude therefore that was with him when he called Lazarus out of the tomb, and raised him from among the dead, bare [t]witness. On this account also the multitude went to meet him, because they heard that he had done this sign. The Pharisees therefore said to one another, Ye see that ye profit nothing: behold, the [u]world is gone after him.

2: glory displayed, fruit realized.

[3] Now there were certain [v]Greeks of those who came up to worship at the feast. These therefore came to p Matt. 21.8-11. Mk. 11. 8-10. Lk. 19. 36-40. cf. Rev. 7.9, 10.

q cf. Ps. 118. 25, 26.
r Matt. 21. 1-7. Zech. 9. 9.
s cf. ch. 2.22. cf. ch. 13.7. cf. ch. 14.26. cf. Lk. 18.34.
t ver. 11. cf. Lk. 19.37.
u cf. ch. 11. 47, 48.
v cf. Mk. 7. 26. cf. Acts 10. 34, 35. cf. ch. 10.16. cf. Ps. 72.9-11.

the Cross and the setting aside of Israel nationally. He marks it in connection with what follows here, which is peculiar to himself. For his purpose, he has no need to enlarge upon it. The coming up of the Greeks introduces once again what is his peculiar theme.

[3] The Greeks here are pure Gentiles and not Grecian Jews, although worshipers of the true God as revealed in Israel. As sharers of the hopes that Israel's prophets had aroused, they come forward, respectfully using the mediation of a disciple to gain an interview with Him. The mediation of a Jew was a perfectly natural thought for a Gentile believing in the prophets, where the Gentile seeking God, clings to the skirts of the Jew (Zech. viii. 23). As the centurion before used the Jewish elders, so the Greeks here would use Philip. He, with the caution of his people in such a matter, associates another with himself to approach his Master in the matter; and Andrew takes the lead in communicating their desire to the Lord. He at once declares that the hour is come that the Son of man should be glorified; using the title by which is indicated His link with man as Man.* As Son of man, all peoples, nations and languages are to serve Him, and in a Kingdom that shall not be destroyed (Dan. vii. 14).

The hour had not arrived, however, for the Kingdom here depicted; and it has not yet arrived; nor is the Son of man a title which He takes in relationship to the Church. But there was an hour just at hand for another, His strange, yet greatest glory, to be acquired by Him; and in which not His connection with Israel but His manhood place for men was for all eternity to make Him glorious. By the power of this work the Son of man lifted up was to draw all men to Him. In the value of it, the earth and all the dwellers in it will become His own. Without it man's ruined race could be but as a cinder-slag in the fire of God's wrath. He goes on immediately to speak of this necessity, therefore, in order to His own fruitfulness, affirming it as constantly in John with what is of deepest importance with the seal of His double "verily;" "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except the grain of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit." Nature is summoned here to show the law of increase which is stamped upon her; and that creative law is made an argument for the necessity of the death that is before Him. What an exaltation of the analogies in nature, to exhibit and use them

* Andrew, the "manly," is foremost in the introduction.

[w] Philip, who was of Bethsaida of Galilee, and asked him, saying, Sir, we desire to see Jesus. Philip cometh and telleth Andrew; and Andrew cometh and Philip, and they tell Jesus. And Jesus answereth them, saying, The hour hath come that the Son of man should be [x] glorified. Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except the grain of wheat fall into the ground and [y] die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it beareth [z] much fruit. He that [a] loveth his life shall lose it, and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal. If any one would serve* me, let him [b] follow me; and [c] where I

* διακονέω.

a Matt. 10. 39; Lk. 14. 26. b cf. ch. 13. 36–38; Matt. 16. 24. c ch. 14. 3; ch. 17. 24.

w ch. 1. 43, 44. ch. 14. 8–11.
x cf. Lk. 9. 31, 51. cf. Matt. 26. 53, 54.
y cf. Ex. 21. 3. cf. Matt. 16. 21–23. cf. ch. 3. 14, 15. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 36.
z cf. Gen. 2. 18, 21–23. cf. ch. 20. 17 with Heb. 2. 11, 12.

in such a way as this! and what a means of interpreting nature itself is here given us! How it shows that Christ, ignored by the so-called "natural" theology, is the true key to the interpretation of nature, and that the Cross is stamped ineffaceably upon it. Nature is thus invested with the robe of a primæval prophet, and that the Word, who is God, is the Creator of all things becomes not merely the announcement of Scripture, but a plainly demonstrated fact before our eyes to-day.

The grain of wheat falls into the ground and dies: it has life in it, and it carries it with it through death itself. The death which it undergoes is in the interest even of the life, which it sets free from its encasement—from the limitations which hedge it in—to lay hold of and assimilate the surrounding material, by which it expands into the plant which is its resurrection, and thus at last into the many grains which are its resurrection-fruit. How plainly is this no accidental likeness which the Lord has seized for illustration of His point. It is as real a prediction as ever came from the lips of an Old Testament prophet: every seed sown in the ground to produce a harvest a positive prediction that the Giver of life must die. The union of Christ with men is not in incarnation, though that, of course, was a necessary step towards it. But the blessed Man, so come into the world, was a new, a Second Man, who could not unite with the old race, but becomes the Head of a new one, another—a "last Adam." Alone He was the life, and the Life was the Light of men; but if that were all the history would be summed in the words that follow: "And the light shineth in darkness and the darkness comprehendeth it not. He was in the world . . . and the world knew Him not." To the dead life must be communicated, that there may be eyes to see. Men can only be born again into the family of God, of which the Son of God as Man is the beginning.

Yet the Life cannot simply communicate the life. Around Him are the bands of eternal righteousness, which has pronounced condemnation upon the guilty, and only by the satisfaction of righteousness in the penalty incurred can these bands be removed. Death—death as He endured it—alone can set Him free from these limitations: He is "straitened till it be accomplished." In resurrection He is enlarged, and becomes the Head of a new creation; and "if any man be in Christ, it is new creation" (2 Cor. v. 17). In those redeemed by His blood the tree of life has come to its precious fruitage.

Thus the Son of God goes forward to His death. These Greeks coming up show divine grace working. Mere King of the Jews He is not, but the Saviour of men; and the wide harvest coming in is claiming Him for the realization of its promise. The burden of the world is upon Him. Past, present and future centre in Him. The glory of God, the blessing of man, call on Him with a voice which He has heard long since in the height from which He has descended. Now from a lower and nearer point of view the depths appear of am, there shall my servant* be; if any one serve † me, him will the Father [d]honor. Now is my soul [e]troubled, and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour‡? But on this [f]account came I to this hour. Father, [g]glorify thy name. There came therefore a [h]voice from heaven, I [i]have both glorified it, and [j]will glorify it again. The multitude therefore that stood and heard it, said that it thundered; others said, An [k]angel hath spoken to him. Jesus answered and said, This voice came not for my sake, but for [l]your sakes. Now is the [m]judgment of this world: now shall the [n]prince of *διάκονος. †διακονέω, ‡Many omit the question.

d cf. 2 Tim. 4. 7, 8. cf. ch. 14. 21, 23. cf. ch. 16. 27.
e cf. Matt. 26. 38, 39. cf. ch. 13. 21.
f cf. ch. 18. 37. cf. Heb. 10. 5-10.
g cf. Lk. 22. 42. cf. ch. 5. 30.
h cf. Matt. 3. 17. cf. Matt. 17. 5.
i cf. ch. 11. 40-42.
j cf. Rom. 6. 4; cf. Phil. 2. 11.
k cf. Acts 23. 9.
l ch. 11. 42.
m cf. Gal. 6. 14.
n cf. Matt. 12. 29. cf. ch. 14. 30; cf. Heb. 2. 14.

the abyss into which He must yet descend, that He may lay in it the eternal foundations which nothing shall shake again.

Each grain of wheat that is found on the parent plant follows of necessity by the law of its own nature the pattern of the grain from which it came. His people too must be prepared to follow Him upon the road on which He is going. "He that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal. He that serveth Me, let him follow Me; and where I am, there shall also My servant be; if any one serve Me, him will the Father honor." Here is the rule, and here is the reward of service: to be with Christ, where He is, is such reward as love itself would seek, crowned with the honor which the Father puts upon such loving service. The way of attainment is by the path that He has trodden, and that way, in its general character at least, is unmistakably plain.

For Him, however, there was that which darkened the road, and made it what for us it never can be. What He has taken from ours was the intense sorrow of His; not mere death, nor even with all that the wickedness of man and the malignity of Satan could add to it of bitterness, but the awful reality of sin borne by Him in the midst of all this, and the penalty of it in its unrelieved intensity. The anticipation of this presses upon Him as He speaks: "Now is My soul troubled, and what shall I say? Father, save Me from this hour?" Nay, "for this cause came I to this hour." Relief could not be found in this direction: there was but one thing could give it, but one prayer possible: "Father, glorify Thy Name." To that immediately the answer comes: and in the hearing of the multitude: "there came a voice from heaven; I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again." That was what the Son was here in the world for, and it was in open acceptance of the Son's work that the Father glorified His own name. In a special way this had been done in the resurrection of Lazarus; but it was to be done in a more signal manner, when "by the glory of the Father" Christ Himself would be raised from the dead (Rom. vi. 4).

Meanwhile this Voice came as His witness to the multitude. For Himself it could not be needed, who walked in a communion with God which was never broken. Alas, for them a Voice from heaven was a strange and, for the mass, an unintelligible sound. The multitude said, "It thundered." A few, who still did not clearly recognize it, said, "An angel has spoken to Him." The Lord replies, It is for your sakes and not Mine; and then warns them that the world's judgment is at hand in that which He is looking on to. His death at its hands would indeed be its condemnation. Its chosen prince was not the true, but the usurper; to be cast out yet by the power of that which He was accomplishing by its means. The Son of Man was to be lifted up from the earth, the witness of His rejection by men, yet of the curse borne for them: of which the final result in the new earth would be, all men drawn to Him by its sweet beneficent power, even now the attractive centre for the myriads of the redeemed.

this world be cast out. And I, if I be [o]lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me. This he said, signifying what death he was about to die.

[4] (34-43): the testing.

[4] The multitude therefore answered him, We have heard out of the law, that the [p]Christ abideth for ever; and how sayest thou that the Son of man must be lifted up? [q]who is this Son of man? Jesus therefore said unto them, Yet a [r]little while is the light among you: walk while ye have the light, that the darkness may not overtake you. And he that walketh in the darkness [s]knoweth not whither he goeth: while ye have the light, believe in the light, that ye may [t]become sons* of light.

These things spake Jesus; and departing, [u]hid himself from them. But [v]though he had done so great signs before them, yet they believed not on him: that the word of Esaias the prophet might be fulfilled, which he said, [w]Lord, who hath believed our report? and to whom hath the arm of [the] Lord been revealed? For this cause they could not believe, because Esaias said again, He hath [x]blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart; that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them. These things said Esaias, because† he [y]saw o ch. 3. 14. ch. 8. 28. cf. Rom.5.8. cf. 1 Jno. 4. 19.

p cf. Ps. 72. 17. cf. Is. 9. 7. cf. Ps. 102. 23–27.

q *cf.*ch.8.25. cf. ch. 5. 27

r ch. 7. 33.

s cf. Jer. 13. 16. cf. ch. 11. 9, 10. *cf.*1 Thess. 5. 4

t *cf.*Eph.5.8. *cf.*1 Pet.2.9. *cf.*Col.1.12.

u ch. 8. 59.

v *cf.*ch.11.47–53. *cf.*ch.10.38.

w Is. 53. 1. Rom.10.16.

x cf. Is.6.10. *cf.*Matt.13. 14, 15. cf. ch. 8. 43 with 2 Thess. 2. 11, 12.

y Is. 6. 1-8.

*Not children, as is usual in John. †Many read "when."

Thus it is His heart relieves itself. The glory of God, the overthrow of evil, the redemption and reconciliation of men, is to be accomplished by that, the cost of which is to be for Him so much. He weighs the gain against the purchase-price for Him, and is content.

[4] There follows here again, as so constantly in John, that conflict of unbelief with the truth which reveals so perfectly the condition of man. The moral disease which cleaves to him is the very thing which makes the remedy so distasteful. Above all, the Cross is utterly an offence; and fullest grace of God is refused for its incompatibility with the self-righteousness of man. The Jews take up this affirmation that the Son of man must be lifted up, which they rightly enough interpret of His death, to put it in contrast with what the law has declared. The Christ according to it abides forever; and how can this be consistent with the Son of man being lifted up? Who is He then, this Son of man? But the Lord does not directly answer them. For their state of heart is not reached by the formal answer of a question. He simply presses on them the speedy passing of the opportunity which they now had. The light would be soon taken from them, except by their availing themselves of it they make it their own. When the darkness came, they would lose the way indeed; acceptance of the light while yet they had it would make them sons of the light, in whom the light would be as nature.

With these words He is gone again out of their midst, and hidden from them. He had wrought so many signs among them, and they had only fulfilled Isaiah's prophecy of a people given up to hardening. The moral glory of His suffering and humiliation had only, being such as they were, blinded their eyes; and His grace published had but hardened their heart, so as to make it impossible for them to see or understand, to be converted and healed. These things Isaiah said, as seeing in the glory of Jehovah displayed in the temple the glory of Christ: for Christ is the Word, in whom alone God has ever displayed Himself; and in his glory; and he spake of him. Although indeed from among the [a]rulers also, many believed on him, but on account of the Pharisees they did not confess him, lest they should be [a]put out of the synagogue: for they [b]loved glory from* men rather than glory from* God.

5 (44-50): responsibility attaching to the light.

[5] And Jesus cried aloud, and said, He that believeth on me believeth not on me, but on him that [c]sent me; and he that beholdeth me [d]beholdeth him that sent me. I am come [as] [e]light into the world, that every one who believeth on me may not abide in darkness. And if any one hear my words and believe them not, I [f]judge him not: for I came not to judge the world, but to [g]save the world. He that rejecteth me and receiveth not my words, hath what judgeth him: the [h]word which I have spoken, that shall judge him at the last day. Because I spake not from myself, but the Father who sent me, he hath given me [i]commandment what I should say, and what I should speak. And I know that his commandment is [j]life eternal: what things therefore I speak, even as the Father hath said unto me, so I speak.

a cf. ch.7.48. cf. ch. 3.1. cf. 1 Cor. 1. 26.
a cf.ch.9.22, 34. cf. Heb. 13. 10-13.
b cf. ch.5.44. cf.Rom.1. 16. cf. 2 Tim.1. 8.
c cf. ch.5.24. cf.Mk.9.37.
d ch. 14. 9. cf. ch. 1. 14, 18. cf.Col.1.15.
e ch. 1. 4, 5. cf. ch. 8. 12, vers. 35,36.
f cf. ch. 5.45. cf. ch. 8. 15, 26. cf. Lk. 12. 14.
g cf.ch.3.17. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 19. cf. Rev. 20. 11-15.
h cf. Deut. 18. 18, 19. cf.Matt.25. 31-46.
i cf.ch.10.18. cf.ch.14.31.

* Literally, "of."

cf. ch. 15. 10; cf. ch. 3. 34. j cf. ch. 6. 63 with ch. 17. 8.

the Man Christ Jesus this display is at last fully made. But how could the Pharisaic Jew, ignorant of himself and God alike, recognize the One in the Other?

Yet the evidence was abundant; so that among the chief rulers many believed. Their reason was convinced, but their hearts were unchanged, and the consequences of confessing Him were too serious: they desired the glory that men could bestow rather than the glory which God could give: the fatal choice of alas how many!

[5] The Evangelist brings forward, therefore, here the emphatic words of Jesus which proclaim the responsibility attaching to the light which had shone among them.

Light indeed it was, the revelation of God in His true character, so that to believe on Him was to believe on Him who sent Him forth, to behold Him was to behold the One from whom He came. There was no side interest to divert any from the true and living God He represented.

His mission also was the appealing, attractive mission of salvation, and not of judgment. There was everything in it to win, rather than repel. Yet in the last day, that sweet and winning message would witness against the rejector of it all the more surely. Ah, says the apostle, how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation!

And in all this, nothing was spoken from Himself, but all according to a commandment given Him of the Father. He knew it in its outcome, its meaning for man—eternal life! and spoke it in the joy of communion with it,—with Him who sent it.

So the message ends: here is the responsibility of him who hears it. Henceforth, until as the Lamb of sacrifice He again appears among the people, He is shut up in the company of His own, to communicate to them His last words of guidance and overflowing love, for the impending time of His absence from them: a legacy which has never been exhausted yet; and of which, live as freely on it as we will, we shall find it hard to exhaust even the daily income.

SUBDIVISION 4. (Chaps. xiii.–xvii.)

Mercy for the path.

SECTION 1. (Chap. xiii. 1–17.)

With all power His, and faithful to those given Him, He maintains them in righteousness.

NOW before the [k]feast of the passover, Jesus knowing that the [l]hour was come that he should depart out of this world unto the Father, having loved his own that were in the world, [m]loved them [n]unto the end.* And when supper was begun, the devil having now put into the heart of Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, to deliver him up, he knowing that the Father had [o]given all things into his hands, and that he was [p]come from God and was [q]going to God, riseth from supper, and [r]layeth aside his garments, and taking a towel, [s]girded himself. Then he poureth [t]water into the basin, and began to wash the disciples' [u]feet, and to [v]wipe them with the towel with which he was girded.

k cf. Matt. 26. 2. etc. cf. ch. 12. 1.
l cf. ch. 7. 8. cf. ch. 12. 23. cf. ch. 17. 1.
m ver. 34. ch. 10. 11. cf. Song. 8. 7.
n cf. Gen. 28. 15. cf. ch. 10. 28–30. cf. Rom. 8. 35–39.
o cf. ch. 5. 20–23. cf. ch. 17. 2.
p ch. 8. 42. ch. 16. 28.
q cf. ch. 17. 11. cf. ch. 20. 17.
r cf. Lk. 22. 27. cf. Phil. 2. 7, 8.
s cf. Matt. 20. 28. cf. Lk. 12. 37.

* Or, "to the uttermost."

t cf. Eph. 5. 26; cf. ch. 15. 3. u cf. Ex. 40. 30–32; cf. Ps. 119. 9. v cf. 2 Cor. 2. 6–8; cf. 1 Sa. 2. 7; cf. Ps. 23. 3.

SUBD. 4.

Israel has now fully manifested her unbelief, and the Lord has been dwelling upon His lifting up at their hands,—on their parts, the most complete and contemptuous rejection, though to be overruled of God for widest blessing. He was going back to the Father, the glorious work being fully accomplished for which He had come. That accomplishment has been indeed anticipated all through the Gospel, as we have seen. Apart from it no blessing at all could have been for man; and the hands to which it had been committed were fully competent. God could own from the beginning with the most open testimony His delight in Him, even as upon the Cross itself He could turn away His face from Him who in human weakness hung there, and leave Him unassisted to the struggle and the victory, upon which hung all the issues of eternity. He was to be thus the "Father of eternity" (Isa. ix. 6; Heb.) which was to take shape and pattern in the womb of the Cross.

Now He stood on the eve of His actual departure. One brief awful moment past, Heaven beckoned Him; the glory from which He had come was hailing Him back; the Father's greeting of His Royal Priest,—the Father's throne awaited Him: all things were in His hand; yet He has upon earth an interest that detains Him, which in the glory of God is to occupy Him still. He is leaving upon earth the chosen companions of His path; those indeed that have hardly ever understood Him,—whose lack of sympathy has been itself one of the bitterest trials, of those that made Him the "Man of sorrows" that He was. Yet they are His hard-won spoils from the hand of the enemy,—the first-fruits of the spiritual harvest coming in. They are His own, the gift of His Father, the work of His Spirit, the purchase of His blood, by and by to tell out and for the ages to come, divine love and power to all His intelligent creation. Nor, spite of their feebleness, can He forget how their hearts awakened by His call, have clung to Him in the scene of His rejection, how they have left their little all to follow Him. Now He is going to leave them in that world whose enmity they must for His sake incur, and in which they would fill up that which was behind of His afflictions for His body's sake, which is the Church (Col. i. 24). In human tenderness His heart overflows towards them, while in divine fulness; and this is what we find before us now. It is peculiar to John, and furnishes them for the way, and arms them for the impending conflict.

Then cometh he to Simon Peter. He saith unto him, Lord, dost [w]thou wash my feet? Jesus answered and said unto him, What I do thou [x]knowest not now; but thou shalt know* [y]afterwards. Peter saith unto him, Thou shalt never wash my feet. Jesus answered him, If I wash thee not, thou hast [z]no part with me. Simon Peter saith unto him, Lord, not my feet only, but also my [a]hands and my head. Jesus saith unto him, He that is [b]bathed needeth not save to wash his [c]feet, but is clean [d]every whit; and ye are clean, but [e]not all. For he knew who would deliver him up: therefore said he unto them, Ye are not all clean.

w cf. ch. 16. 21-23.
x cf. vers. 12, 36. cf. ch. 12. 16. cf. Heb. 12. 11.
y cf. ch. 21. 15-19. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 25.
z cf. Gen. 35. 2, 3. cf. 1 Jno. 2. 1, 2. cf. Eph. 4. 30-32.
a cf. Rom. 4. 4, 5. ctr. Ps. 26. 6.
b cf. Heb. 10. 22; cf. Tit. 3. 5. c cf. 1 Jno. 2. 6; cf. 2 Cor. 7. 1. d cf. 1 Cor. 6. 11; cf. 1 Cor. 1. 30; cf. 1 Jno. 3. 9. e ver. 18; ch. 6. 70.

* or, "understand."

This therefore is the true wilderness section of the Gospel,—not the history of the wilderness, but the preparation for it; what is to it as the early part of Numbers to the latter part. Alas, such a history was to follow,—and has followed; yet in which divine grace has abounded over human failure. So must it ever be.

Sec. 1.

The order of Scripture is a point of special importance. So we shall find it here. Grace reigns through righteousness. Righteousness must be maintained or God, who in all His acts must be consistent with himself, cannot give way to the love which is in His nature. This is seen in the Cross, but it remains a principle in all God's dealings with His people. We "call on Him as Father, who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's work" (1 Pet. i. 17). The Father's character must be maintained with His own children; and they must be taught to act in conformity with it. Our "Advocate with the Father" also is "Jesus Christ the righteous." One who can no more forget righteousness than He can forget the people He has redeemed. It is not, of course, as Advocate we see Him here; because plainly it is not with the Father that we see Him, but with His people. Yet He is anticipatively the Risen and Ascended One, with all things given into His hands. It is in this character He acts, in a love that cannot give up its objects, and which recognizes it as a first necessity for them that they should be conformed to His nature and ways.

They are to have part with Him; but what does this involve as to those in such a place of defilement as this world is, and with so great susceptibility to defilement in it? His action in view of all this is quite easy of interpretation, spite of the many who have seen in it only a lesson of humility, and indeed the institution of an ordinance to remind of this. But the Lord Himself assures us that there is a deeper meaning than this, for Peter certainly knew what the Lord was doing, if there were no more than this; but the Lord says that at present he did not know; but that he should know afterwards. The doing to others by the disciples as He had done to them would necessarily depend also upon their knowledge of what He had done; which, if it were to receive spiritual interpretation, would make what was enjoined on them to be of a similar character.

But Christ's cleansing of His Church is, as the apostle tells us, with washing of water by the Word (Eph. v. 26); and this at once throws light on the deeper meaning. It is as we well know, only as so cleansed that we can, as the Lord says to Peter again, "have part with Him." Thus all is as clear as can be. No ordinance could accomplish this; and we immediately perceive the primary importance of this for all that follows. Communion itself—which is "part with Him,"—fruitfulness, testimony, must all depend upon this.

When therefore he had washed their feet, and had taken his garments and had sat down again, he said unto them, Know ye what I have done to you? Ye Jesus rises therefore from supper, not when it was ended, as the common version represents, but while it was going on, leaving the place of communion, as if this were interrupted, until His necessary work for them should renew it once more. He rises therefore from supper, and girds Himself for a fresh service. His sacrificial work is over; the shedding of blood is no more needed, but only the washing of water; and here also not the "bath of regeneration, "(Tit. iii. 5), but simply, as He presently points out to Peter, the washing of the feet. It is defilement contracted in the walk that is in question; and He puts Himself at their feet to wash them. As of old Jehovah could say to Israel, "Thou hast made Me to serve with thy sins, "(Isa. xliii. 24,) so may He still say to us; but His unchangeable love is equal to all possible demands upon it. Notice here that all His disciples need it, and that thus He invites us all to-day to put our feet into His hands continually, that they may be cleansed according to His thought of what is cleanness, who alone is capable of judging according to the perfect standard of the sanctuary, of which He is indeed Himself the Light.

And again notice what is involved in this: for it makes clear that the Lord's significant action here does not simply point out to us the remedy for that defilement of which we may be conscious, while of course it does apply in the fullest way to this. The principle goes much further; for there is, as we all must be aware, a sad possibility of *un*conscious defilement and thus of slipping unawares out of communion with God; while conscience gives no sign of what is wrong, and may thus mislead us as to our condition. It cannot be too fully impressed upon our minds that conscience is not the standard of right and wrong, but the word of God alone is that. The testimony of the Word itself is, that "If a soul sin, and commit any of these things which are forbidden to be done by the commandments of the Lord, though he wist it not, yet is he guilty, and shall bear his iniquity" (Lev. v. 17). For who can truthfully say that he was necessarily ignorant of what the word of God declares?

But even where the thing is clear, conscience may be dull and indifferent. The common sights and sounds with which the world is full tend insensibly to dull us; the dust with which the air is full settles upon the mirror, we know not how, and it gives no more the clear witness that it did so short a time since: we need therefore continual recourse to Him whom the Psalmist invoked: "Search me O God, and know my heart: try me, and know my thoughts; and see if there be any wicked way in me" (Ps. cxxxix. 23, 24). Ah! what incompetent judges are we in our own case! and how thankful may we be to have such an One as is here before us to judge our case for us! It is involved in this, that we come into His hands, not for mere settlement of this matter or that; we do not say to Him, "Search out this or that," but, "Search me;" and thus, if we are perfectly honest in it, we are inviting the light to be poured into all the dark corners and crannies of our lives and hearts: we are with Him without reserve,—for self-judgment indeed, but as He manifests us to ourselves and thus enables us.

If there has been conscious failure, the mere confession of it is not the whole matter, perhaps not the half of it. Many from a misapplication of the apostle's words,* "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins," (1 John i. 9,) would make this a light and easy method of settling old scores which leaves them ever more lightly to be run up again. Others with a more serious but a legal spirit, are left groaning over their inability to determine how far they have fulfilled a condition which they cannot treat so lightly. Neither of these realize that the real remedy given by the apostle, "If any one sin," is the blessed Advocate with the Father, who here, as the necessary result of His being this, Himself assumes the responsibility of cleansing us after His own manner, that communion may be restored. Confession is not washing, and His words are, "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with Me." Washing is more than forgiveness. There is the searching out by the Word of the matter as in the Presence of God; where the steps which led into the evil come into review, as well as the end they led to, and the foundation of all is judged: so that the hold of the sin is broken for the sinner. We have a conspicuous example of the Lord's dealing with a soul for restoration in the history, soon to be given us, of Simon Peter. Not without significance is it, that the very one who resists the Lord's proffered service to him (however his motive may plead in his excuse) is the one who becomes in his failure the example of cleansing such as is before us in figure here.

* Which really refer to Salvation.

How the need we have of Him is emphazised all through Scripture! and how good and wholesome to be thus made to keep close to Him for all the length of our journey! Is it a hardship to be thus in continual company with Him? Look at Him here, and answer! He is at our very feet to wash them! And what His action here secures is that we should have part with Him. Is not all the misery of our lives but the result of losing sight of Him? When Israel entered their promised land, Jehovah went with them. There was given them continual access to Him, for guidance in every emergency that could arise. They seem to have interpreted this in such a way that they would not burden the Lord with too many of their matters. It was plain enough to them that Ai was so small a city that but a small number of them would be competent to take it. They tried that, and at little Ai found their first defeat. Israel had sinned; but it was hidden from them. How then were they responsible for that? Ah! they had followed their own thoughts, and had taken no counsel of the Lord. They did the same in the matter of the Gibeonites, and again the enemy succeeded against them. Now "these things were our types;" only the battle is for us a spiritual one: not therefore less arduous. How we need His cleansing grace, that we may be such as He can show Himself for in the day of conflict; that we may obtain possession of that land which is (in the fullest sense) our "part with Him!"

If it be restoration that is needed, how comforting the knowledge of the truth that nothing can shut us out of His Presence, if indeed our heartfelt desire is to be there; that we are welcome, just as we are, not needing any whole or partial cleansing to entitle us to come in at a door which is never closed against us. For indeed, if we did need this, we could never find it: His word is,—not, if thou art not washed,—but, "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with Me."

Thus of necessity the first step to be taken is to come back to Him, from whom to have got away is the first and saddest failure. If we come back, it is, of course, to put ourselves into His hands, that He may discover to us our need, and meet it with His grace. None but Himself can meet it. In the glory of His Presence the heart is softened, while the conscience is aroused. While He does not upbraid, truth in the inward parts is re-established, and power is found in the very consciousness of weakness, and confidence in the wreck of all self-trust. We have all this brought out in the story of Peter, which for its importance the Spirit of God has given us at length; we shall not, for this reason, dwell more upon it in this place.

Peter, when he learns that it is to have part with Christ that his feet are to be washed, goes immediately, after his ardent manner, to the opposite extreme. "Lord," he says, "not my feet only, but also my hands and my head." The Lord answers him, "He that is bathed needeth not, save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit." The "washing of regeneration," the cleansing which is effected in new birth, never needs to be repeated. Spite of all that tends to destroy it in this world, the effect is an indelible one. "Whosoever is born of God," says the same apostle who records this in his first epistle, "doth not commit"—or rather, "practise"—"sin; for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin"—be sinning—"because he is born of God." In how many ways we are reminded of the unfailing character of God's precious grace! The love

[f] call me Teacher and Lord, and ye say well, for so I am. If I then, your Lord and Teacher, have washed your feet, ye ought also [g] wash one another's feet. For I have given you an [h] example, that ye should do as I have done to you. Verily, verily, I say unto you, The bond-servant is no [i] greater than his lord; nor he that is sent* greater than he that sent him. If ye know these things, [j] happy are ye if ye do them.

* Literally, "the apostle."

[f] Matt. 23.8, 10. cf. Eph. 6.9.
[g] cf. Gal. 6.1. cf. 1 Pet. 5.5. cf. 2 Thess. 3. 14, 15.
[h] cf. 1 Pet. 2. 21. cf. Eph. 5.2. cf. Matt. 11. 29.
[i] Matt. 10. 24, 25. ch. 15. 20.
cf. ch. 21. 18, 19.
[j] Lk. 11. 28; cf. Matt. 7. 21; cf. Jas. 1. 22–27.

that has laid hold upon us for eternal glory is not going to be defeated in what it has taken in hand to do. The washing of the feet can be repeated indefinitely, but not the bathing of the whole person. The bathed person may defile his feet by walking, but nothing more. Only the feet need cleansing to be wholly clean.

The Lord now exhorts His disciples to imitate His example. They called Him Teacher: let this lowly grace of His then be their instruction. They called Him Lord: let them obey His command. He, their Teacher and Lord, had washed their feet: they might well wash one another's feet. Plainly it was no mere ceremony that he was proposing for their imitation, but the meeting of a deep spiritual need, as love alone could meet it. In a scene of defilement such as the world is, alluring even the hearts of disciples from their Lord, be it theirs to recover and cleanse those who were being drawn away by its allurements. Mere judgment of the evil would not do this, however righteous. Love alone has power to draw, and Christ must be the One drawn to or there is no restoration. How strangely do those who confess themselves debtors wholly to a Saviour's grace yet deal with one another on the totally opposite principle of law. He that would cleanse another's feet must be at his feet to cleanse them. The soul that has fallen into sin has done so because it has got away from the Source of holiness and strength. It is of small service to judge for such their sin; that is only the sign of how far they have departed. They need with this the confirmation to them of that grace which alone breaks the dominion of sin (Rom. vi. 14). People seem as if they argued as to failing Christians, that grace has failed with them, and now government, as they would say, must have its course. Now government is the government of grace. "Grace reigns through righteousness;" the government is a Father's government; while He truly "judges according to every man's work." God's electing love has pledged even, as to Abraham, (Gen. xv. 17,) the "smoking furnace" to do His work. He may thus permit Issachar, become the world's drudge for hire (Gen. xlix. 15), to gall his shoulder with the yoke of a hard service. A child of God may thus be allowed to eat of the fruit of his own ways, that he may learn, in the only way that he himself has rendered possible, the perfection of the ways of God. It is a painful method but a self-chosen one; and plainly through all grace is working,—governing. We can never oppose, for the child of God, His government to His grace. All through, His path is light; and it could not be grace that did not conform to this.

Manifestly, therefore, this does not shut out from His Presence the soul that seeks Him; whatever may be the distance to which it has wandered from Him. It may unbelievingly think itself shut out; it may take the eating of the fruit of its own ways, to which it may still be compelled, as the evident proof of this, which it is not: David's sin followed him all the rest of his life; but that in no wise set aside the fact of his full forgiveness.

It should be evident that we can never merit or work our way into that glorious Presence by getting cleansed from whatever evil we may by our wandering from it have fallen into. The grace which alone could open the door still keeps the door open, and only there, at the hands of Christ Himself, can cleansing be

SECTION 2. (Chap. xiii. 18–38.)
The enemy's work but adding glory to the humbled Son of man.

1 Forewarning of One, prescient and supreme, who identifies His sent ones with Himself.

1. I SPEAK [k]not of you all: I know whom I have chosen: but that the Scripture may be fulfilled, He that [l]eateth bread with me hath lifted up his heel against me. Now I tell you before it come to pass, that when it is come to pass, ye may [m]believe that I am he. Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that [n]receiveth whomsoever I send receiveth me; and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me.

k ver. 10. cf. ch. 17. 12.
l Ps. 41. 9. cf. Ob. 7. ver. 26.
m cf. ch. 14. 29. cf. ch. 16. 4.
n Matt. 10. 40. cf. Matt. 25. 40. cf. 2 Cor. 2. 14–16.

obtained. As long as we are away, we shall still only "stumble and stray," and therefore to be kept out would be to make all recovery impossible. But the weakening of faith by the evil course that has been pursued may indeed be a terrible hindrance; and here is a main point to be remembered by those who desire to have the happiness of which the Lord speaks, of doing to others that which He is doing so constantly for us, as far as it is possible for us to follow Him in it. We must remember that grace alone is the victorious breaker of sin's bonds, and is thus the holiest thing possible: there needs no modification of it at any time,—no guarding it by the mixture with it of something else. That which is not holiness is not grace, and it is not to skin over an ulcer slightly to maintain God's perfect grace for all that seek Him at any moment of time.

Just on this very account,—because grace is sovereign,—there must be, of course, the soul's full surrender to it; and this we must insist on. Christ cleanses after His manner: it must be full cleansing or not at all. As already said, we come near to put our feet in His hands: there is no other access at all, but for this purpose,—no possibility of having part with Him save as we submit ourselves to this. Christ must be "Teacher and Lord" absolutely, as He assures every one of His own. The terms of discipleship He has fully insisted on, and they never vary. Grace sovereign means Christ sovereign, and there is no other way. But with Him there is always, not simply light given, but strength ministered,—strength which is made perfect in our human weakness,—and a joy which is strength,—it is the atmosphere proper to it: "in Thy Presence fulness of joy."

Happy then are we if, knowing these things, we are found doing them. Abundance of need there is among the people of God for the ministry of such grace to the wandering and needy. It is the ministry of Christ Himself: there is no help, no restoration possible save as we can get them to Christ; and He, whatever the case may be, is all-sufficient. But we must pass on.

Sec. 2.

The shadow of what He has just said deepens upon His soul. Of those with Him now, in the intimacy to which His love has admitted them, there is yet one to whom that love itself can add but deeper perdition. The enemy is there and at work, where divine love has brought Him, upon a path descending now to the utter darkness only to be relieved by the consciousness that it is indeed love's errand that He is upon, and of the recompense that awaits it,—a "joy set before Him" for which "He endured the Cross, despising the shame."

As Seed of the woman, the conflict with Satan was part of His necessary work. By man whom he had overcome the adversary was to be overcome, and God vindicated in His latest creation-work. But the conditions of the conflict were far otherwise than at the beginning. Man, conquered in his strength, was to conquer in his weakness, cleaving, in the character which belongs to the creature and is his safeguard to maintain, to the might of God. Thus with the "heel" of His perfect Humanity He trod down the adversary; that heel bruised even to death in doing this. It was now the hour in which His assailant in the wilderness, then baffled and withdrawing for a season, would return as prince

2 (21-30): After the sop, Satan!

2. When Jesus had said these things, he was [o]troubled, and testified and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, that one of you shall deliver me up. The disciples therefore looked at one another, [p]doubting of whom he spake. Now there was, lying on the bosom of Jesus, one of his disciples whom Jesus [q]loved. Simon Peter therefore maketh a sign to him, that he should ask who it was of whom he spake. He then, leaning on Jesus' breast, saith unto him, Lord, who is it? Jesus answereth, He it is to * whom I shall give the sop, when I

o cf. ch. 12. 27. cf. Matt. 26. 37, 38.

p Matt. 26. 21-25. Mk. 14. 18-21. Lk. 22. 21-23.

q ch. 19. 26. ch. 20. 2. ch. 21. 7. cf. Gal. 2. 20.

* Or, "for whom I shall dip the sop and give it to him."

of this world with the power of the world behind him: and already had he found one of the chosen twelve, for the paltriest of bribes, willing to betray his Master. From the buffeting of the storm so arising the rest must scatter from Him or be overthrown: to His very face another would deny Him; He must be stripped of what comfort the faithfulness of His few intimates could secure Him; one partial but sweet exception being shown us in this Gospel and in no other. But all is allowed for His fullest triumph. He is to be uniquely perfect, in a unique place, God Himself leaving Him, until the time in which, the demands of righteousness being fully met, He will be able to appear in His behalf.

1. With the sense then of what is before Him, He foretells the defection of Judas. This yet only accomplishes the Scripture. It was written: "He that eateth bread with Me hath lifted up his heel against Me." His heel! the most contemptuous rejection possible: was it not such to sell the Lord of glory for the price of a slave? It was as if he would inflict upon Christ the serpent's predicted doom! But it was all foreseen and announced, and He afresh announces it, that faith might be strengthened in the rest by that which would naturally most severely try them. By His choice of them alone they were secured; and He who had prayed for Peter, that his faith might not fail, was even now watching over the weak faith of the rest.

Then He raises them up to fullest identification with Himself: "Verily, verily, I say unto you. He that receiveth whomsoever I send receiveth Me: and he that receiveth Me receiveth Him that sent Me." This is yet in the ears of Judas; which are dulling, however, into the hardened insensibility which only sin can produce. We are next called, for our instruction, to contemplate this tremendous spectacle,—to tread, as it were, the very antechamber of hell itself.

2. The Lord's soul is troubled: He is not roused to anger, as we might well expect to find. He is the One who has said and sworn, "As I live, I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth;" and the tears wept over Jerusalem seem ready to flow over once more. In all that passes between the Lord and Judas in these last scenes, another and more powerful feeling keeps back the anger which the baseness of his awful traffic in the blood of his Master would naturally arouse:—the appalling sight of one over whom were gathering, as it were, beforehand the lurid shadows of the pit. What must it have been for Him to have to say, "One of you shall deliver Me up"? The other disciples seem scarcely to have imagined the possibility of real treachery on the part of one of their own number; for after Judas is distinctly pointed out, and the Lord dismisses him with the significant words, "What thou doest, do quickly," not one of them thinks for what purpose he is gone out. They think perhaps of some unintentional disclosure, or at most of some break-down in weakness under too great a pressure; but a deliberate betrayal how can they imagine on the part of one who has been in His company? We recall naturally the words of the apostle afterwards,—the very one to whom the secret was communicated here,—as if they might account for the strange inability to comprehend what have dipped it. And when he had [r]dipped the sop, he taketh and giveth it to Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon. And [s]after the sop, then Satan entered into him. Jesus therefore saith unto him, What thou doest do [t]quickly. But none of those at table knew why he said this unto him: but they supposed, since Judas had the [u]bag, that Jesus said unto him, Buy those things that we have need of for the feast, or that he should give something to the poor. He therefore, having received the sop, [v]went immediately out; and it was [w]night.

r cf. Ru. 2. 14. cf. Gen. 43. 34.
s ver. 2. cf. Ps. 109. 4. cf. Heb. 10. 29.
t cf. Lk. 12. 50. cf. Matt. 23. 32.
u ch. 12. 6. cf. Lk. 8. 1-3.
v cf. Gen. 4. 16.
w cf. Lk. 22. 53; cf. Matt. 8. 12; cf. Jude 13.

had been declared so plainly,—"He that sinneth hath not seen Him neither known Him." True it is, Judas had never known the glory in the face of Jesus. What he had known we will not speculate upon; it needs not. So near, yet so far off; capable of casting out demons in Christ's name, yet one to whom, on His side, Christ must say, I never knew you,—this is the plain and awful conjunction, challenging all hearts.

"After the sop, Satan:" there is another terrible conjunction. The token of love becomes in its rejection that which hands over the unhappy man to the adversary of Christ. That morsel from the dish was, we may be sure, no mere sign for another, no semblance of a friendship that no more existed. On the side of Him who gave it, it was true, where all was true,—the token of love that even yet would fain be received as that, and that could warm even a lifeless soul to life. If, still rejected, it should be death instead of life, this is but the necessary transformation which sin indulged produces in the most precious gifts of God. Love with its own wonder-working brings out of death life; in the nature of things, the opposite will produce the opposite. It is the one law, by which like produces like.

And we have, in beautiful contrast here, the sweet assurance of how love welcomes where it is welcomed. The unnamed beloved disciple brought into the same view with Judas,—though we may elsewhere have his name revealed,—seems here to have given us a blank cheque, to which any other that desires may have leave—if he fulfil the conditions—to put in his name. Most certainly, here we find one whose love presses for recognition, and will never fail to answer to faith's utmost claim upon Him. "Drink," He says, "Yea, drink abundantly, O beloved!" How John has drunk in, his first epistle will bear witness for him. He is the apostle of love;—love that he has learned where one and all must learn it. "Hereby know we love, because He laid down His life for us." "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins." "Herein is love perfected with us, that we should have boldness in the day of judgment; because as He is so are we in this world." Thus John draws his arguments from where we all may draw them; but he has so abundantly drunk in, that the whole furniture of his epistle seems but the product of the assimilation of the words of Christ. Especially is this true of these last words before His being delivered up. But John's style, the aspect in which he sees things, is just what we find in the Gospel. All through you see his receptive character,—the man who leaned on the breast of Jesus; and thus he is the apostle of the divine nature and the life eternal; life, light, righteousness, love,—these are the themes of which he is never weary of speaking. And this is what so attracts the heart in John,—it is the heart of Christ that attracts us. Ah, it is this heart that seeks still vessels into which it may pour its fulness. And what we can appropriate we are still welcome to. Which is only to say, we are still welcome to lie on His bosom, as the beloved disciple did, and learn where he learned.

3 (31-35): The Son of man glorified, and God in Him.

3. When therefore he was gone out, Jesus saith, Now is the Son of man [z]glorified, and God is [y]glorified in him. [If God be glorified in him],* he will also glorify him in [z]himself; and will [a]straightway glorify him. Little children, yet a [b]little while am I with you. Ye shall seek me; and, [c]as I said unto the Jews, Whither I go ye cannot come, so now I say to you. A [d]new commandment give I unto you, that ye love one another; [e]as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all [f]know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another."†

4 (36-38): Man unable to follow Him now.

4. Simon Peter saith unto him, Lord, whither goest thou? Jesus answered him, Whither I go thou [g]canst not follow me now; but thou shalt follow me afterwards. Peter saith unto him, Lord, why cannot I follow thee now? I will [h]lay down my life for thee. Jesus answereth, Wilt thou lay down thy life for me? Verily, verily, I say unto thee, The [i]cock shall not crow till thou hast denied me thrice.

x cf. ch. 7. 39. cf. ch. 17. 1.
y cf. ch. 12. 28. cf. ch. 14. 13.
z cf. Heb. 2. 9. cf. ch. 17. 5.
a cf. Acts 2. 24. cf. ch. 12. 23. cf. Phil. 2. 9-11.
b cf. ch. 16. 16-22.
c ch. 7. 33. ch. 8. 21.
d cf. Rom. 13. 8. cf. 1 Jno. 2. 7, 8.
e ch. 15. 12, 17. cf. 1 Jno. 3. 11, 23.
f cf. 1 Jno. 3. 14. cf. ch. 17. 21.
g ver. 33.
h Matt. 26. 33-35. Mk. 14. 29-31. Lk. 22. 31-34; ctr. Phil. 3. 3.
i ch. 18. 17, 18, 25-27.

* Many omit this clause. † Literally, "among yourselves."

3. Out the traitor goes into the night,—a terrible night! but the heart of Jesus is relieved by his absence. He proceeds to enlarge upon the results of His Cross. The Son of man is to be glorified in it: is it not His glory to-day? God too, in every attribute, is glorified in Him. Where do we see God's righteousness as in the Cross? Where has His love been manifest as there? A sinner taken to heaven by its means is made the righteousness of God in Him! the riches of the glory of His grace are told out to eternal ages. Sin, which might seem to have brought everything into question, has been by its means made the occasion of His brightest, fullest, most marvellous revelation!

If God then has been so glorified in Him, He will respond by glorifying in turn Him who has done this. He is taken up to the right hand of God and sits upon the Father's throne. This is possible to Himself alone, and is so given, but the results for man are unspeakably great: a Man is in the nearest place to God that can be: God and man one in His Person! He does not follow this out here: in its fulness it waits for the interpreting Spirit.

But this involved for the disciples His going away. As He had said to the Jews so now He says to them, He is going where they cannot come. They are not now to be with Him, going out and coming in, as through the blessed time just at an end; let them cling all the more to one another as His representatives,—representatives thus of His love to each and all. The duty of love would thus be as a new commandment with the new light of His life laid down for them shining upon it. So would men also recognize them as His disciples,—as having practically learned a lesson so divinely set.

4. Peter full of love which the Lord's words have inflamed, but with no just estimate of himself, bursts out with the question, why cannot he follow Him now? If it were death that was before Him, he would follow Him through that,—was ready to lay down his life for Him. How little we think often in our well-meant zeal, of how much self-confidence may inhere in it and what it needs to follow the footsteps of Him who yet has left us an example to be followed! Peter was to be gratified in his desire when Christ should have prepared the way; and when he himself had learned by all the bitterness of failure his own incompetency. But how severe a teacher experience is! and how much might we escape of such necessity, if only we would learn from Scripture,—

SECTION 3. (Chap. xiv.)

Part with Him: the Father's House, and the Manifestation of the Father, in the Son and by the Spirit.

1(1-7): Abodes in the Father's House.

1. LET not your heart be [j]troubled: ye believe on God; believe also on me. In my Father's House are many [k]abodes; if it were [l]not so, I would have told you: for I [m]go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I [n]come again, and will receive you unto myself: that [o]where I am there ye may be also. And whither I go ye [p]know, and the way ye know. Thomas saith unto him, Lord, we know not whither thou goest, and how can we know the way?

cf. Phil. 3. 20, 21. o cf. 1 Thess. 4. 13-18; cf. ch. 17. 24; cf. ch. 12. 26; ctr. ch. 7. 34, 36; cf. ch. 11. 25.

j ver. 27. cf. 2 Thess. 2. 16, 17.

k cf. 1 Ki. 6. 5, 6. cf. Ezek. 41. 6. cf. Rev. 3. 12.

l cf. ch. 8. 40. cf. 2 Pet. 1. 16.

m cf. Heb. 9. 24 with Heb. 10. 19.

n cf. Acts 1. 11. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 23.

p cf. ch. 13.

"profitable for correction and instruction in righteousness!" How good is God, to supply us with such a teacher! How we fill our path with sorrow by not submitting to it!

Sec. 3.

We have now the "part with Him" of which He has already spoken. First its full consummation in the Father's House, the many abodes in glory, in which we shall dwell with Him. Then we have the present manifestation of the Father to us in Christ Himself, and by the gift of the Holy Spirit: so perfectly are we provided for on our way to that eternal Home. Father, Son, and Spirit are all employed in our behalf, on a path which shines with heavenly light upon it to the perfect day.

1. The Lord exhorts and encourages them in view of His departure from them. He is to be their sufficient resource whatever might be their trouble, as the sure though unseen object for faith, as God was. The Father's House was before them as before Him, the only full satisfaction for the heart, where rest will be eternal. That was the place to which He was going, and there of necessity His own would be with Him. Would He otherwise have encouraged an intimacy which was to end for ever? would He not have warned them? Ah, He was going up there to love and care for them with the same steadfast care as when on earth, and would prepare a place for them.

Until He finally left it, as rejected by Israel, the temple was for Christ His Father's House. Now He speaks of another,—that of which Israel's was but the figure: but therefore naturally using this to illustrate the higher meaning. The "holy places made with hands," says the apostle (Heb. ix. 23, 24) are "figures of the true," "the patterns of things in the heavens." The court of that house with its numerous chambers, in which the priests as they came up for service in their various courses found temporary lodgment, were indeed more a contrast than anything else with the glorious abodes which the Lord speaks of here. These are homes, not mere lodging-places; and in nearer relation to the Divine Father than such outside courts could indicate. The reality transcends all shadows. They who are here provided for are the happy children of One who transcends infinitely all other fathers. And this at once delivers us from the thought which has been attached to the simple language of the blessed Teacher,—as if "many" signified diversity of rank. The whole connection and the terms used are against such an interpretation. In the Father's House all are children; and all the children are in the nearness of such relationship. It is the fruit of Christ's work, and not the reward of our own. It ought to be plain at once to every one who knows anything of the place into which divine grace has brought him, that these things cannot be mingled. The apostle's words clearly state the incompatibility of these two principles: "If by grace, then is it no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace, otherwise work is no more work" (Rom. xi. 6).

Jesus saith unto him, I am the [q]way, and the [r]truth, and the [s]life: [t]no one cometh unto the Father but by me. [u]If ye had known* me, ye would have known* my Father also; and from [v]henceforth ye know* him, and have seen him.

*Two Greek words—the first and last γινώσκω, the second οἶδα.

[q] cf. ch. 10. 9. cf. Heb. 10. 20. [r] cf. ch. 1. 14, 17. cf. 1 Jno. 5. 20. cf. Eph. 4. 21. [s] cf. ch. 1. 4. cf. ch. 5. 26. [t] cf. Acts 4. 12; cf. Heb. 7. 25; cf. Eph. 2. 18. [u] ch. 8. 19. [v] cf. ch. 16. 25; cf. ch. 20. 17; cf. Rom. 8. 15.

The principles are incompatible, and in all that the work of Christ has accomplished for us, this needs and owns no help from man. Yet it is quite true that there are rewards, and that divine love will satisfy itself in thus owning all that has been done for love. Mercy will show itself also in this; but how? By cleansing away all that which has been mixed with it, and would make this impossible; and this is what is represented to us in the blood-washed robes of the book of Revelation. The righteousness which we have in Christ,—the best robe in the Father's House,—can never need such washing; but the robes that are spoken of in this way are the "righteousnesses," or, as the Revised Version has it, "the righteous deeds" of the saints: for the book of Revelation is the book of the Throne,—of government and recompense, and we must not be surprised if we have a very different view of things from that presented in Romans or Galatians.

But the whole context assures us that differences of reward are not in question. The Lord is not telling His disciples that "one star differeth from another star in glory,"—it is not indeed glory at all, of which He is speaking; He is comforting their hearts in the thought of His absence, that after all it is only a temporary one, and that the Father's House to which He is going has room enough for all, and is to receive them all eternally. The issues of responsibility do not come in here, as should be plain, and would only introduce an element of uncertainty where faith needed to have the clearest vision.

He had come amongst men, not merely to do a certain work among them, however great, and to be gone. He was going back; but as a Man, taking back with Him the nature He had assumed to the glory He had left,—the pledge of abiding fellowship with those for whom He now went up to take a place as their Representative before God. The communion to which He had admitted them on earth was there to be continued and perpetuated: if it were not so, He would have told them; He would not have bound their hearts to Himself by that dear, familiar intercourse to which He had encouraged them, if it were to have an end for ever. Not so; if He were going away, it was to prepare a place for them; and He would return again Himself to receive them to Himself,—to welcome them to His own eternal Home. His must be their first, best greeting.

He does not explain how the place in His Father's House should be prepared for them; nor were they yet, perhaps, able to understand. The epistle to the Hebrews will show us, if we turn to it, that the heavenly places had to be purified by the better sacrifice which He was to offer, in which all the sacrifices of the law would find their fulfilment. Ephesians speaks similarly of the "redemption of the purchased possession;" and Colossians of the reconciliation of things in heaven (Heb. ix. 23; Eph. i. 14; Col. i. 20). Such thoughts are, even now, strange to many a Christian; for we are slow to realize the extent of the injury that sin has inflicted, and equally, therefore, the breadth of the application of the work of Christ. This is not the place to enlarge upon it; but it is not difficult to understand that wherever sin has raised question of God,—and it has done so, as we know, in heaven itself,—the work of Christ, as bringing out in full His whole character in love and righteousness regarding that which had raised the question, has enabled Him now to come in and restore, consistently with all that He is, what had been defiled with evil. Thus our High Priest, to use as the apostle does the figures of Israel's day of atonement, has entered into the sanctuary to reconcile with the virtue of His sacrifice the holy

2 (8-14): Christ's witness to the Father.

2. Philip saith unto him, Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, Have [w] I been so long time with you, and hast thou not known me, Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father, and how sayest thou, Show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? The [x] words that I speak unto you I speak not from myself; but the Father who abideth in me, he doeth the * works. Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me; or else believe me for the very [y] works' sake. Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that

* Many read, "his."

[w] cf. Matt. 11. 27. ch. 12. 45. cf. ch. 1. 18.

[x] cf. ch. 7. 16. cf. ch. 8. 28.

[y] ch. 5. 36. ch. 10. 38. cf. Acts 2. 22.

places themselves, and make them accessible to us. Man in Christ has risen to the highest pinnacle of glory with the whole acclaim of heaven; and men redeemed by His blood can be associated with their Lord in glory, "made the (manifested) righteousness of God in Him" (2 Cor. v. 21).

They knew therefore whither He was going; they knew also the way. For they knew in fact more than they realized that they knew. When Thomas, thinking, as it would appear, of a kind of map of the road, which they had not, ventures to object their ignorance of this, the Lord shows him his mistake by assuring him that He Himself was the Way: through Him alone could any come to God. Nor only so; He was also the Truth,—the revelation of God. And since, even so, man was dead and unreceptive of the truth, He was the Life also, which men needed for this reception. The full treasury for man's need was here then to be found.

2. Philip's desire to be shown the Father brings out more fully the witness of the Son to Him. Where Philip was, many are still to-day. They know Christ as, in a sense, the way to God; but as yet they have not seen the Father in Him: Christ is rather to them a Saviour from God, than the manifestation of God. He is the Doer of the work which the Father, although they call Him this, simply receives. They are shielded from His wrath, but Himself they do not know. They are, in short, where the Israelite was the night of their first passover. Sheltered under the blood of the lamb, yet the wail of judgment was in their ears, and God for them was identified with what in reality is only His strange work,—unknown therefore in what is His true character.

The Lord's reply to Philip is an expression of pain at his want of apprehension. "Have I been so long time with you, and hast thou not known Me, Philip? He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father, and how sayest thou, Show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in Me? The words that I speak unto you I speak not from Myself, but the Father who abideth in Me, He doeth the works." His very presence here was to declare the Father, and that after all the Father should not be understood by disciples of His, wounds Him in the deepest way. "Believe Me," He says, "that I am in the Father, and the Father in Me,"—that is, that we are thoroughly identified,—"or else believe Me for the very works' sake." It is a tender but sad rebuke. Had Philip indeed not known that He was on the Father's mission? that He was Himself the Love-gift of God? But we are even less excusable, if now we know not. What, is the Father righteousness merely, and only the Son love? are there two Gods, or One Only God? If we have indeed come to Christ, we have not to go a further journey to reach the Father, but have got the very depth of the Father's heart told out. This is, as we have seen from the beginning, the constant theme in John. And oh, what a marvelous joy in simplicity of faith to take it in! Philip was right at least in saying, "It sufficeth us"; and nothing short of this can possibly suffice us.

And the Lord adds to this, that because He was going to the Father, in believeth on me, the [z] works that I do shall he do also; and [a] greater works than these shall he do, because I go to the Father. And [b] whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, this will I do, that the Father may be [c] glorified in the Son. If ye shall ask* anything in my name, [d] I will do it.

3 (15-27): The indwelling of the Spirit.

3. If ye [e] love me, keep my commandments. And I will request† the Father, and he will give you another

* Many insert, "Me."
† A familiar word, always used of our Lord's asking the Father.

z cf. Matt. 21. 21. cf. Acts 4. 9, 10.
a cf. Acts 2. 37-47. cf. Acts 16. 25-34.
b cf. ch. 15. 7, 16.
c ch. 13. 31. cf. ch. 15. 9.
d cf. ch. 16. 23, 24. cf. 2 Cor. 12. 8, 9.
e vers. 21, 23; ch. 15. 10; cf. 2 Cor. 5. 14, 15.

testimony of the Father's delight in that glorious work achieved, even these poor disciples of His should do greater works than He Himself had done. The thousands converted at Pentecost, compared with the "labor for nought" of which He complains through Isaiah as characterizing His own life-toil, already illustrate this; while beyond lay that Gentile harvest which, even while Israel was reaping the fruit of her rejection of Him, would anticipate the final world-harvest. These things are, no doubt, the "greater works," while the miracles that He did His disciples also did, even to the raising of the dead, the healing by the shadow of Peter, or the communication of curative power to handkerchiefs or aprons by the body of Paul. This was still the Son's own work, all things being put into His hand as the Fulfiller of the Father's purpose, and received by Him to glorify the Father in the accomplishment of His blessed will. Whatever therefore they should for this end in His Name ask of the Father, He, the Son, would do it; that in the Son the Father might be glorified. And He repeats again, to emphasize it, "If ye shall ask anything in My Name, I will do it."

This is indeed a large enough assurance. It is guarded and made right by the controlling purpose. He who is possessed by the desire that God may be glorified has in this assurance a wondrous possibility before him of successful prayer. Such a desire, just as it is whole-hearted, will clear the sight, and enable for such prayer as can be answered,—will lift up the heart with confidence to God.

We are taught by all this what praying in Christ's Name is:—that it is not a mere putting His Name at the end of one's prayer. It means that we are identifying ourselves in faith with Him who seeks ever the fulfilment of the divine purposes. How impossible to ask truly in Christ's Name that we may obtain the satisfaction of mere selfish cravings! And yet what confidence does it give, that in proportion as our desire is to fill aright the place which He has given us as His representatives upon earth, we may have all that we can possibly need to accomplish this. Here there need be no stinted expectation: here is a sphere in which coveting is fully in place. Alas, how we practise humility after the fashion of Ahaz, who, where God had bidden him make request according to His own greatness, assumes the garb of a piety which he does not possess, and says, "I will not ask, neither will I tempt the Lord." And how often do we remain content with a mere scanty pittance of spiritual good, when God has blessed us with "all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus,"—when He is glorified in our practical possession of them,—and when He has said to us, "Covet earnestly the best gifts," and, "Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it."

3. The Lord now proceeds to speak of the provision made for them, that they might not be left as orphans in the world in the time of His absence from them, but have Him manifested to them, and realize His presence with them in a better and higher way than even when He was with them upon earth. We have already been told of that gift of the Spirit which they that believed on Him were to receive in a new way after Jesus should be glorified (chap. vii. 35). But now the Lord teaches them distinctly that the Spirit is personally to come

[f] Advocate, that he may be with you for ever, the Spirit of truth, whom the world [g] cannot receive, because it beholdeth him not, nor knoweth him: ye know him; for he abideth with you, and [h] shall be in you. I will not leave you [i] orphans, I will [j] come unto you. Yet a f ch. 15. 26. ch. 16. 13. cf. 1 Jno. 2. 1.

g cf. 1 Cor. 2. 14.
h cf. ch. 7. 37–39. cf. 1 Cor. 6. 19; cf. 2 Cor. 6. 16; cf. 1 Jno. 3. 24.
i cf. Rom. 8. 15, 16; cf. Gal. 4. 6.
j cf. ver. 23; cf. Eph. 3. 17; cf. Col. 1. 27.

and take the place that He had filled among them. As the Spirit of truth He would lead them into all truth, giving them the full consciousness of their identification with Him and His with them. He would not leave them, but abide with them for ever. This is indeed the great characteristic of the time in which we live, that while Christ is above on high, our Advocate with the Father, we have "another Advocate" down here,—another glorious Person to take up our cause on earth, and be in us such power as Christ is for us at the right hand of God. Thus indeed is our weakness and emptiness ministered to by divine and perfect fulness and strength. How wondrous is this provision made for us! and what a testimony to the value of the work which has been accomplished for us! This divine Person comes to make us,—our very bodies,—His dwelling-place,—His temple. Yet we are fully conscious that evil also dwells in us: and thus there arises the very serious question, How can the Spirit of God dwell in such an abode? And this is the argument in some forms of perfectionism,—Christ and Belial, it is urged, cannot dwell in the same temple. Certainly the temple cannot be Belial's and yet Christ's; but how God could dwell in the midst of a sinful people was the lesson of the day of atonement in the old dispensation: "And (the priest) shall make an atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins: and so shall he do for the tabernacle of the congregation, that remaineth among them in the midst of their uncleanness" (Lev. xvi. 16).

For us the blessed work is accomplished of which Israel's sacrifices were but the mere figure, and it is in Christ that the believer is seen and accepted. The Spirit indwelling is the witness of the perfection of that offering which has "perfected for ever"—or, "in perpetuity"—"them that are sanctified" (Heb. x. 14). The right word here is "in perpetuity,"—which assures us that at no time—not for a moment—is the believer other than perfect before the eye of God, and that upon ground entirely irrespective of his personal behavior. With the Father—as such—it is very different: "the Father, without respect of persons, judgeth according to every man's work" (1 Pet. i. 17). But as between God and His creature all is once for all settled, and to take account of sin there would be to dishonor the covering blood. Thus "if any one sin," says the apostle, writing to Christians, "we have an Advocate with the Father.—Jesus Christ the righteous" (1 John ii. 1). The relationship in which we stand to God is not, and cannot be changed by that which yet becomes more evil in view of it. The Father's character is outraged by the ill-conduct of those who are of His family, and the Father's heart is wounded in the same proportion. His provision of atonement for it cannot make it less serious in His sight: the Cross has only revealed it in its abyss of horror.

The Lord's title in this passage is the same as that which in the Gospel He gives to the Spirit. In the common version it is translated "Comforter," and is quite capable of such a meaning; but when He says, "another Comforter" he is comparing the Spirit with Himself. The word in these two applications must therefore be rendered uniformly, and "Advocate" is perhaps its best, as it is its most usual rendering. Literally it means "one called to one's side,"—a helper, assistant; thence, an advocate, a legal assistant, in whose hands you leave your case. The Lord is He to whom God has committed His people,—on earth the true and faithful Shepherd of the sheep, who laid down His life for them. Now going on high, He still maintains in glory the same care over His flock; and thus their stumblings and wanderings engage Him still in their belittle while, and the [k]world beholdeth me no more; but ye behold me: [l]because I live, ye shall live also. At that day ye shall [m]know that I am in my Father, and ye in me, and I in you. He that hath my [n]commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me; and he that loveth me shall be loved of my [o]Father, and I will love him, and will [p]manifest myself unto him.

k ch. 7. 33, 34. ver. 17.
l cf. Rom. 5. 10. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 10, 11. cf. Heb. 7. 25.
m ver. 10. cf. ch. 16. 25.
n ver. 15.
o cf. ch. 12. 26; cf. ch. 16. 26, 27.
p cf. ch. 7. 4; cf. Heb. 2. 9; cf. 2 Cor. 3. 18.

half. He is their Advocate with the Father,—not because the Father Himself can fail in either love or power, but as the One who has had committed to Him the burden of them all. To Him they were left in the conflict of the Cross: His hand is to bring them through to glory.

Yet on earth, He having gone from it, they are to have another Advocate, the Holy Spirit; from the beginning the Worker in God's creation and then in His new creation work. The communication of life, the whole work of sanctification, the resurrection of the dead, is His to carry into effect; and this through all dispensations. But this very fact, while it suits well the nature of the place which He has come to fill, shows at the same time that the place itself must imply something other than the work that He has always done. He has come to form and indwell the House of God on earth, and to make the saints individually His living temples. He has come to unite the people of Christ to Himself in heaven, and thus to form also the Body of Christ, with destinies of wondrous blessedness. All this will only open up by degrees, John himself never speaking of the Church, but of the family of God,—of the life therefore which makes men His children. But that this also may have its full character, the Spirit of God must come: in this way the Lord now proceeds to speak of Him.

It is noticeable that it is to disciples who out of love to Him, and not in a spirit of legality, are seeking to keep His commandments, that the Lord promises the gift of the Holy Spirit. If the Spirit be come to dwell in us, the first requisite is readiness of obedience. Wondrous are the possibilities held out to us in this marvelous gift; but marvelous also is the possibility we have of belittling even a gift like this. The Galatians had it, who were giving up the gospel for the law. The Corinthians had it, who were carnal, and walked as men. It belongs to the mystery of our nature that we may have as though we had not. It belongs to the royalty of it that we may debase ourselves. Stranger still is it that the children of this world may be wiser in their generation than the children of light, and that the Lord should even have to put this as if a characteristic thing. Were we not unfaithful to ourselves and to God, how would the world be lighted up with the reflection of the glory that is in the unveiled face of Jesus! how we should go through the world as visitants from another sphere! Thus we need not wonder that the Lord should almost seem to put it as if the gift of the Spirit were dependent upon the reality of one's obedience. What! can we have God in us, and entertain Him so poorly? Nothing could make such a thing credible but the sad experience of so lamentable a fact. Yes, men who KNOW that Christ has died for them,—who KNOW that the Spirit of God dwells in them,—who KNOW that God's way is the only way of peace and joy and power,—can yet live and act as if nothing of all this were true. We can give up certainties of blessing for certainties of spiritual loss! Who can enough bewail the misery of such unaccountable folly?

Let us learn now from the Lord's lips what this gift is of which He is speaking to us; the fruit of the Son's entreaty with the Father, a divine Person with us,—in us,—never to leave us more! One who with perfect wisdom, perfect love, and perfect power, takes our case into His hand, leaving us nothing to do but to walk with Him in restful confidence and certainty of unfailing good. Yet not to be led blindly, or without exercise, but as one being trained in communion with the divine thoughts and affections, for eternal fellowship with the Father and the Son!

Judas saith unto him, not Iscariot, Lord, how cometh it that thou wilt manifest thyself to us, and not unto the [q]world? Jesus answered and said unto him, If any one [r]love me, he will keep my word; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our [s]abode with him. He that [t]loveth me not keepeth not my words: and the word which ye hear is not mine, but my Father's who sent me. These things have I said unto you while abiding with you: but the q cf. Gen. 5. 22.

cf. 1Jno.3.1.
*cf.*Col.3.3,4.
r ch. 15. 10.
cf. 1Jno.5.3.
s cf. ver. 2.
cf. Is.57.15.
cf. Rev. 3. 20.
t cf. Gal.5.6.
*cf.*Jas.2.14-17.

This Spirit is the "Spirit of truth:" the false halo of Satan's lure thrown over things, the mirage of the desert, is to depart; not to leave one with a mere sombre shadow in its place, but to substitute for it the true yet transfiguring light of an opened heaven, beckoning,—inviting us to the abodes of the Father's House,—the glory of God! Darkness there is still remaining, but it is passing away, as the apostle says, and the true light already shines (1 John ii. 8).

For the Spirit of truth is now to utter the "many things" of which the heart of Christ has long been full, but as yet unable to relieve itself; for there were none able to bear the things to be spoken. Think of it! all this is uttered now, to the very last we are to have of revelation; and the Revealer Himself is with us, to give spiritual capacity for its reception. The light is now come to illumine all the ages past with the glory of the ages still to come! light that is its own convincing witness to the soul flooded with its brilliance. Yet the world, alas! cannot receive the Spirit. It has rejected the Word manifest in flesh, and will not receive One whom it cannot see: "it beholdeth Him not, nor knoweth Him." But receptive, obedient souls have good cause to know Him: "for He dwelleth with you,"—as Christ had dwelt with them; but there was to be an intimacy even beyond this;—"He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you." This was to be the new blessedness,—God no more dwelling in temples made with hands, but man to be His temple.

After this manner then, Christ would still be with them; they were not to be orphans, left to the helplessness that His very presence had discovered to them. The Spirit would be for them the conscious link with the unseen but unforgetting Saviour. While the world would behold Him no more, they would still behold Him, with whose triumphant life in glory their life was bound up. This identification in life with Him is the connecting link with Paul's doctrine afterward, who developes from it the whole truth of Christian standing as we find it in Romans and Ephesians; as upon the basis of the Spirit's indwelling he builds the truth of the Church as the Body of Christ. If Luke in some sense approach nearest to Paul's gospel, as is so often, and not without cause, insisted on, yet John is most nearly related to him with respect to all his higher truths of Christian position. This we shall see better, if the Lord permit us to go on to the Epistles; but it should not be hard to realize already. So directly He assures us here: "At that day ye shall know that I am in My Father, and ye in Me, and I in you." We shall be better able, however, to apprehend the meaning of this when we come to His own development of it in the next section.

The Lord goes on to show that this manifestation of Himself will be necessarily dependent on, and therefore proportionate to the opening of the heart to receive it. The heart for Christ moreover is indicated not so much by emotional sensitiveness as by the spirit of obedience which has itself also higher or lower grades which require careful noting, though in themselves quite easy to be apprehended. In his first epistle John emphasizes the same thing. The apostle of love is careful to insist that the love of which he speaks is liable to very grave mistakes in men's estimate of it. It is not so simple as it would appear, to make the estimate. You have to distinguish between sentiment and practical reality;—the world in general easily does this;—and then you have to distin-

Advocate, the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall [u]teach you all things, and bring all things to your [v]remembrance which I have said unto you. [w]Peace I leave with you: [x]my peace I give unto you: [y]not as the world giveth give I unto you. Let not your heart be [z]troubled, nor let it be afraid.

u ch. 16. 13. cf. 1 Jno. 2. 20, 27.
v cf. ch. 2. 22.
w cf. ch. 20. 19. cf. Col. 1. 20.
x cf. ch. 16. 33. cf. Col. 3. 15.

cf. Matt. 11. 29. y cf. ch. 16. 22; cf. 2 Cor. 6. 10. z ver. 1; cf. 1 Jno. 4. 18.

guish, as the world can scarcely do, between the mere human quality and the divine. Thus love with John is characterized especially as love, not of men in general, but of the brethren: for he that loveth Him that begat loveth them also that are begotten of Him. And again, as here, it is love that keeps His commandments: for "this is the love of God, that we keep His commandments."

So the Lord says: "He that hath My commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth Me; and he that loveth Me shall be loved of My Father, and I will love him, and will manifest Myself to him." Here evidently, though a man have the Spirit, the fruits of the Spirit will be found only in the way of practical obedience. How else could we expect them? Can we think that God would comfort His people in paths of disobedience? That would be unholiness, and abhorrent to His very nature. No: love itself must walk contrary to us, if we will walk contrary: "he that spareth his rod hateth his son; but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes" (Prov. xiii. 24).

The question of Judas (the Lebbæus of Matthew, and brother of James the son of Alphæus),—although the Lord seems not to have distinctly answered it,—brings out the further assurance, "If any one love Me, he will keep My word; and My Father will love him, and We will come unto him, and make our abode with him."

This statement might appear at first sight to be only the equivalent of the former one; although it is plain that the latter is more emphatic. In each case it is the character of true love of which the Lord is speaking; and indeed it seems as if He would not suppose in His disciples a love less than such as He is speaking of. John follows his Master's style, when he bursts out in his impassioned way when speaking of the Lord, (which yet is truer than the most rigorous induction of facts could suggest) "he that sinneth hath not seen Him, neither known Him." It is the only thing to be said, to speak worthily; and he that falsifies it is in that measure not a true witness to his Saviour-Lord.

True also it is, that something of both characters of love, as Christ affirms them, will be found in all true Christians,—overborne so much by contrary influences that like Peter in the high priest's palace, only He who knoweth all things can detect the true disciple underneath the false. There is the false within us all, as well as the true; alas, in many, so often uppermost. The results cannot fail to follow: the blessing of which the Lord speaks attaches to that with which He here connects it. We find it in proportion as we answer to the character.

Looked at in this way, there is no difficulty in seeing the deeper nature of a love that keeps Christ's word, as compared with that which keeps commandments only. Not to keep a positive command is simple, rank rebellion,—nothing less. His "word" is wider, while it addresses itself with less positiveness of authority to the one whose heart and conscience are less prompt to the appeal of love. And the largeness of Christ's word involves for keeping it an habitual searching into it, with more than readiness to face all that may be thus discovered. Is it not to be feared that there are many who shrink from honest investigation of the Word, because they do not want to be "troubled" with such and such questions? Nay, is not this one of the commonest causes of the sad ignorance which is found so widely prevalent with regard to it? But were ignorance an excuse, and we were so unhappy as to desire one, it is plain that the deeper the ignorance the better off we should be; and the dullest searcher would be the most blameless also!

4 (28-31): Christ's departure and the failure of His own.

4. Ye have [a]heard that I said unto you, I go away, and come again unto you. If ye loved me, ye would have [b]rejoiced that* I go unto the Father: for the Father is [c]greater than I. And now I have told you before it come to pass, that when it is come to pass, ye may [d]believe. I will no longer speak much with you: for the [e]prince of the world cometh, and in me he hath nothing. But that the world may know that I [f]love the Father, even as the Father gave me commandment, so I do. Arise, let us go hence.

*Or, "because."

[a] ch. 13. 33, ver. 3.
[b] cf. ch. 17. 13 with Heb. 12. 2.
[c] cf. ch. 10. 29, 30. cf. Heb. 2. 7.
[d] ch. 13. 19. ch. 16. 4.
[e] ch. 12. 31. ch. 16. 11. cf. Lk. 4. 6. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 4. cf. Eph. 2. 2.
[f] cf. ch. 15. 10. cf. ch. 11. 41, 42. cf. ch. 12. 50.

But how the Lord delights in the one who with a true spirit of obedience welcomes the light of divine truth without any reserve or qualification whatever! Not only will He manifest Himself to him, but "My Father will love him, and We will come and make our abode with him." How much fuller and more permanent is the blessing here! To the two at Emmaus the Lord manifested Himself; but there was no tarrying of that coveted blessing. And how many of us are in like condition! Transient gleams there are of a glory that abides not, and which leaves the soul burning but mourning after it. But there is something more than this in our Lord's words here. "We will come," He says, "and make our abode with him." The result will be to manifest the competence of Scripture for the "man of God," to whom alone it is pledged as competent, —"able to furnish thoroughly unto all good works." Who is the man of God, but he who is out and out for God? and who else can expect to be furnished in this way, but he who is honestly intentioned to use his knowledge as before Him who gave it? The very passage which we are quoting here reminds us of where the profit is to be found: "all Scripture is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." If we do not mean to accept the reproof and the correction, where is the use of talking about the rest?

In God's ordered path alone can we find God. In His marked out way it would be impossible not to find Him.

"He that loveth Me not keepeth not My words:" here only is the decisive test. Feeling is right, but too sensitive to external influences to be a safe gauge of the man proper. The truest love is shy and sensitive to self-inquiry. Under its influence we are more apt to challenge and accuse ourselves than to congratulate. Nor need we this introspection: let us walk only in His ways, and we shall find the Lord's own acknowledgment. We shall find Him walking and talking with us, as has been always His manner with His own: we shall find Him treating us as those of whom He is not ashamed.

And this is communion with the Father and the Son: "for the word which ye hear is not Mine,"—not simply Mine,—"but My Father's who sent Me."

And now they were to receive the full revelation: the Advocate, the Holy Spirit,—sent too from the Father as He had been, but now in His Name which covered all of blessing for them,—He would teach them all things: leading them on, as well as reviving and giving them the full value of all that they had heard with Him. The effect for them would be peace in the heart, even as the legacy of His death was peace in the conscience. They would have the peace He Himself enjoyed,—the result of that unbroken communion in which He walked with God. For us it is restlessness of will disturbs this,—the strife with His will which this means, and the dissatisfaction of soul which follows every gain we may seem to make in this direction. Desiring but His will, there can be no proper doubt as to the issue. That is as sure as it will be blessed; and thus the true remedy for fear is found.

4. Now they should be able to face the fact of His departure which they knew to be but for a time. Nay, they should, if they loved Him, be able to rejoice

SECTION 4. (Chap. xv. 1-16.)

The incoming change from Judaism to Christianity, and the test of profession in practical walk.

1(1-8): Abiding in the vine the only sufficiency.

1. I AM the [g] true Vine, and my Father is the Husbandman. Every [h] branch in me that beareth not fruit he taketh away: and every branch that [i] beareth fruit he purgeth* it, that it may bear more fruit. Pure* are ye [j] already by reason of the word that I have spoken unto you. [k] Abide in me, and [l] I in you. As the branch [m] cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, so neither can ye, except ye abide in me. I am the g cf. Ps. 80. 8-11. cf. Is. 5. 1-7. cf. Jer. 2. 21. cf. Is. 42. 1. cf. Is. 63. 5.

h cf. Matt. 3. 10. cf. Rom. 11. 17, 21.

i cf. Matt. 13. 12. cf. Heb. 12. 5-11. cf. Rom. 5. 3, 4. cf. ch. 17. 17.

j cf. ch. 13. 10. cf. Eph. 5. 26; cf. Lev. 13. 6.

*The same root.

k vers. 5-7; cf. 1 Jno. 2. 28; cf. Heb. 10. 38, 39.

l cf. ch. 17. 23; cf. Eph. 3. 17.

m cf. Rom. 8. 10.

that He was going to the Father,—back to Him who abode in that exaltation which He, on His errand of love, had given up. Yet it would bring to an end for the time the intercourse that He had had with them. Nor was the world a place in which this could continue. The world!—its prince was coming; how different from Himself, its rightful Prince! Nay, there was nothing in common between them: the prince of the world had nothing in Him! Yet to the world He was giving proof, in that through which He was thus to pass, of His love to the Father. But the world being what it was, He was leaving it; and for those that were His also, it was no tarrying place: "Arise," He says, "let us go hence."

Sec. 4.

Christ is then leaving the world, and His own, who are still in it, are yet not of it. As a consequence, Judaism is given up, and part with Christ takes the place of part with the nation of Israel. This is, most evidently, the meaning of the Lord now proclaiming Himself the true Vine, and His disciples "branches" in this. The vine was the Lord's figure of Israel in Isaiah (chap. v.). It is as evident also that the vine is the symbol of what is looked to for bearing fruit, and that it is for bearing wild fruit that Israel is rooted out of her vineyard. In the Christianity which takes the place of Judaism on the earth, much more then is fruit the necessary requisite. And that is plainly what is insisted on here.

1. First, we see what is alone sufficiency for the fruit required. It is what is implied in the very nature of a branch,—to abide in the vine: apart from Christ we can do nothing. If the branch abide not in the vine, the vine—the vine-sap—cannot abide in the branch; and this is the reason of the connection and order which the Lord's words indicate: "Abide in Me, and I in you." "Abide in Me,"—that is the command,—the responsibility; "and I in you,"—that will be the assured result. But let us look in detail at what is here before us.

"I am the true Vine, and My Father is the Husbandman." We are looking evidently, at what has to do with the earth: and as evidently, the true Vine is in contrast with Israel, as already said. Christ now openly takes the place which was ever His, of the real Source of all fruitfulness for God. The legal system would have made Christ the topmost Branch of the national tree, but no more: for if man could have stood under it, he would have needed no Saviour: his fruitfulness would have been of himself. But this was a means of probation only: God giving abundant testimony of what He intended by it in plain words as to the issue, as well as in that sacrificial and typical ritual which accompanied it and pointed beyond it. It was to be by a new covenant that blessing was to come to the nation, and not by the old, Sinaitic one; which testified ever by its vail dropped over the face of God that none could on that ground see or stand before Him.

The vine too is the natural figure of dependence, and needs constantly the Vine: ye are the branches. He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same beareth much fruit: for [n] apart from me ye can do nothing. If any one abide not in me, he is [o] cast forth as a branch, and is withered: and they gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they [n] cfr. Phil. 1. 11, cfr. Phil. 4. 13.

[o] ver. 2. cf. Matt. 25. 30.

labor of the husbandman; and into such a dependent condition did the Son of God come down, that He might be the Producer of fruit for God, such as yet had never been, as well as the Pattern of fruitfulness also, wherever found. In Him was the life of faith seen in its perfection. If the branches are in Him, and so He in them, as the productive life-sap,—so does He speak also of being in the Father, and of the Father in Him:—"The Father who abideth in Me, He doeth the works." We see thus how the figure of the vine underlies all these expressions. The dependent Man, in whom the Father abides reproduces Himself in His believing people who abide in Him. He is the Vine, they are the branches: He is in them, not personally, but as life and nature: and they are in Him as products of His life, abiding in Him by that faith which is characteristic of it.

The Life is the Divine Life; and thus we hear in the Son's prayer which follows His request, "that they all may be one, as Thou, Father, art in Me, and I in Thee, that they may be one in Us;" and so also the apostle who so closely follows Him, declares: "If that which ye heard in the beginning abide in you, ye also shall abide in the Son, and in the Father."

But there is a never to be forgotten difference between the believer and His Lord, which these very words imply: if he can be said, as the apostle here affirms, to be "in the Father," and that seem to even him too much with the Son of God Himself, the preceding "in the Son" shows the way of it to be only through the Father's own love—the gift of His Son for men. We are in the Son, and thus in the Father: for us that is mediatorial wholly, which for Him was the necessary prerogative of His glorious Person. Only the Son Himself could be in this way in the Father; and thus His declaration of this as to Himself was the necessary claim of Deity.

Life, as we have it, is in the Son (1 John v. 11). He is the Eternal Life itself,—the Source of it for men; thus the "Last Adam" of the new creation. And here is the foundation of Paul's doctrine as to Christian position, as already said. John's is not position: for the Son's position cannot be ours; and John says "in the Father," as well as "in the Son;" where position cannot be thought of.

The figure of the vine and its branches thus clearly illustrates the truth of that vital connection between Christ and His people which is what in Christianity has replaced the formal and sacramental connection which obtained in Judaism. It is quite true that there is here supposed however a possibility of a connection which is still formal merely. There is the necessity dwelt upon of abiding in the vine. The one that abides not is cast forth as a branch, and is withered and burnt. In this case, of course, the one who comes to his end in such a way could never have been a branch in vital union with Christ; or the whole doctrine as to life in Scripture would be violated. But in what branch of a vine, it will be asked, has the sap never circulated? and in what other than vital connection could one speak of a branch in the vine?

The question is not answered here; and to answer it one must appeal to similar images elsewhere. We are most naturally reminded of the broken off branches of the olive, of which the apostle speaks in Romans xi. Here, without raising question as to the meaning of the olive itself, the branches are distinctly said to be broken off for unbelief, and those who stand to "stand by faith." The interpretation of the vine is so far confirmed, that those broken off are those who have no spiritual life at all. The principle of continuance is that of faith.

Nor only so; for the Gentile had no part in the olive at the beginning; he is are [p]burned. If ye abide in me, and my [q]words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you. Herein is my Father [r]glorified, that ye bear much fruit, and ye shall become [s]disciples of mine.

[p] cf. Matt. 13. 40–42. cf. Heb. 6. 8.
[q] cf. 1 Jno. 2. 14. cf. Col. 3. 16 cf. ch. 14. 13.

cf. 1 Jno. 5. 14, 15. [r] cf. 2 Cor. 9. 13; cf. Matt. 5. 16; cf. Tit. 2. 10. [s] cf. ch. 8. 31; cf. ch. 13. 35.

not a natural branch, but grafted in—as the apostle is careful to tell us, "contrary to nature"—into the good olive, out of the wild olive to which he naturally belonged. This "grafting" is common to all Gentiles; but where, as in the vine here, Christ is the stock, it is clearly true that there are no natural branches,—that every one must be grafted in. Now here it is plain that every graft does not abide, or, as we say, "strike." The "abiding" is just striking: it is the rooting itself in the stock,—a vivid image of faith's laying hold, which, looking at things from the human side of responsibility insisted upon in the exhortation in this case, makes us partakers in the preciousness of Christ our life.

"My Father is the husbandman,"—although it has been applied by some to the divine dealing with Christ Himself,—is applied by the Lord evidently to His dealing with His people. "Every branch in Me that beareth not fruit He taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit, He purgeth it, that it may bear more fruit."

The vine, as already said, is the ideal of a fruit-bearer. It is fit for nothing else. "Shall wood be taken thereof, to do any work?" asks the Lord by the prophet; "or will men take a pin of it, to hang any vessel thereon?" (Ezek. xv. 3). "I looked for it to bring forth grapes," He says again of Israel as His vine (Isa. v. 2). This is what still the Father looks for from us. And notice that it is not works, of which the vine speaks. Works may be fruit, assuredly, and blessed fruit; still, works are acts, which may have a certain character; fruit speaks more properly of the character itself. Thus "the fruit of the Spirit," says the apostle in Galatians (ch. v. 22, 23), "is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, temperance." These are things which show the life in the branch; in activities, no doubt; but they belong more to the person than do the activities. Moreover, the apostle speaks of them as fruit, not fruits: he dwells more upon the unity exhibited than the variety. And this is a blessed character of the Spirit's workmanship, that it is a complete harmonious development, in which every part is in evident relationship with the rest. Love that "seeketh not her own" shines out along the line of these jewels, pervading them all, and not merely stringing them together.

If, therefore, there is no fruit, there is manifestly no life: the branch that bears no fruit has no title to the vine; it can only be taken away. If it bear fruit, then comes the "purging" that it may bear more fruit. Whatever this may include beside, the Lord's words that follow show certainly that the Word is the effectual means by which this purging is accomplished. "Purged,"—or "clean,"—He says, "ye are already, by reason of the word that I have spoken unto you." The Word is that which judges all that is impure in God's sight, while by its sweet encouraging grace, it wins and divorces the heart from it. Any one who is in the least acquainted with vine-culture knows how much pruning it requires, to make a vine bear proper fruit. It is most instructive to realize that this pruning is not necessarily the taking away of what is merely, or in itself evil: leaves and branches,—even if fruitless branches, do not naturally speak of this. The injury that they do lies in squandering the precious sap; which again does not so much lessen the quantity of the fruit produced, as it affects the quality. The things by which Christian fruitfulness are most seriously affected are apt to be, not so much things positively evil: these bear their brand upon their face, for the most part: and the conscience, if it be not dull indeed, is roused against them. It is rather the negative than the positive quality which is dangerous. It is occupation with that which simply has not

2 (9-16): Communion in love.

2. As the Father hath [r]loved me, I also have loved you: [s]abide ye in my love. If ye [t]keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love. These things have I said unto you, that my [u]joy may be in you, and your joy may be full. This is my [v]commandment, that ye love one another as I have loved you. Greater love hath no one than this, that a man [w]lay down his life for his friends. Ye are my friends, [x]if ye r cf. ch. 5. 20. cf. ch. 17. 26. cf. ch. 10. 14, 15.

s cf. Gal. 2. 20.
t ch. 14. 15, 21, 23. cf. ch. 10. 17, 18.
u cf. ch. 17. 13. cf. ch. 14. 27. cf. ch. 16. 24.
v ch. 13. 34; 1 Jno. 4. 21. w cf. ch. 10. 15; cf. Rom. 5. 6-10; cf. 1 Jno. 4. 10. x cf. Matt. 12. 49, 50; ctr. Lk. 6. 46.

Christ in it, which (tolerated for its very harmlessness) insensibly steals away the vigor of spiritual life. Lawful things, as the apostle reminds us, may bring us thus under their power; and even the name of "duty" may be invoked to cover with its sanction what is in reality only the slipping of the heart away from its first duty to Him who has redeemed and purchased us with His blood.

The lesson of the vine is here that of the need of concentration; of which Paul, in his epistle to the Philippians, gives us so pregnant an example. His "one thing I do" is the only principle for Christian progress, or happiness either. It ensures both. The knowledge of the new man teaches him that "Christ is ALL:" and we cannot broaden or brighten the spiritual life by adding anything to Him.

"Abide in Me" is therefore what He exhorts to:—to realize our dependence, and cultivate that faith which is the acknowledgment of it, and which brought us to Him at first, as the Only-sufficient and All-sufficient Saviour in that hour of supreme distress. Saviour He is still, and all through; not least from our own will and way:—the principle of sin, and the sure road to disaster. To be true to what was our first happiness is to make permanent that happiness; to abide in Him is to find Him in His fulness abiding in us, and all His promises interpreted to us by their fulfilment in the experiences of a blessed and fruitful life. It is only, as has been already said, what is implied in our very Christianity itself: for he who does not abide in Christ in some true sense, is not a Christian. But, alas! we need the exhortation: who will say that Christians do not need to be exhorted to be Christians? "He that abideth in Me, and I in Him, the same beareth much fruit." We only need to be fully what we really are:—not to be untrue to our God, our Saviour, and ourselves.

Now comes the warning: "If any one abide not in Me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered:" that is the spiritual result, as the words "as a branch," indicate: but there follows the final judgment, in that figurative language in which it is so commonly described: "and they gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned." The change has been often noted in this place from "ye" to "any one." The Lord would not have it supposed that it might be possible for those who are truly His to be thus cast forth and to perish: therefore His altered speech. He returns, however, immediately now to His former direct address: "If ye abide in Me, and My words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." Here is a further condition, and which certifies, in the same manner as we have seen His language do elsewhere, the character of the prayer to which He pledges success. If His words abide in us, they will give shape to our desires and requests, so that He can answer them without injuring us or contradicting His own character. But if we thus drank in His words, what wondrous power would our prayers possess! Why do we not know more of it? There can be but one reply: we too little yield ourselves to be possessed by these precious words,—care often too little to face them. They demand too much of us. We would sooner pursue our own wills, giving Him what we may consider a fair proportion of what is His, and hoping He will not expect too much from such as we are. Of how do whatsoever I command you. I call you no longer [a] bondservants: for the bondservant knoweth not what his lord doeth: but I have called you friends: for all things that I have heard from my Father I have made [b] known unto you. Ye have not chosen me, but I have [c] chosen you, and appointed you, that ye should go and bear [d] fruit, and that your fruit should abide: that [e] whatsoever ye ask the Father in my name, he may give it you.

a cf. Rom. 8. 15. cf. ch. 8. 34–36.
b cf. ch. 17. 26. cf. ch. 16. 13.
c ch. 6. 70. cf. ch. 13. 18. cf. Eph. 1. 4.
d ver. 8.
e ver. 7.

much we rob ourselves, in thus robbing Him, we shall learn, it may be when it cannot be righted.

He would touch our hearts with another thought, that His Father will be glorified in our bearing much fruit: and we shall become such as He can count true disciples of His own. A precious inducement! in which He appeals to our hearts, and expects them to respond to affection so well proved. Have we not dropped out a good deal out of that term so full of meaning, except as applying it to these men of a by-gone day? Is it not perhaps significant, if we have done so?

2. The Lord goes on to speak of the new position in which, as delivered from the law, they were placed,—no longer servants, but friends,—and of the communion in love implied in this. The disciples of Moses were bondsmen of the law under which they were placed, and had even no access to God,—the way into the holiest not being yet manifested (Heb. ix. 8). Grace was now changing all. They had looked upon the glory of the Word made flesh,—the glory of the Only-begotten of the Father, in whom the Father Himself was declared and seen. God had come nigh: and now, if He who declared Him were going back to heaven, heaven could not be closed by this, but rather opened. God come nigh, for those who welcomed this, could be no transient vision. But, for one near God, bondservice is no more possible: communion in love must take the place of the former distance: and this is the subject here.

As Christ on earth had been the Object of His Father's love, so now were His people that of His. As to Him it was a love of complacent delight: walking as He did in His Father's commandments, the One Man answering to the heart of God; He would have them answering similarly to His own heart, walking in His commandments, so as to be partakers of the joy which He had tasted, even amid all the sorrow of His path. He desired for them fulness of this joy. And as He had loved them, even to the laying down His life for them, so was it His commandment that they should love one another: and so they would be still in fellowship with His love.

He was laying down His life for them,—His friends: how could they have greater proof that such they were indeed? Friends! and no longer servants: no more did He call them that: for, instead of mere messages of their duty, He had been opening to them all the truth as to those purposes of the Father with which He had been entrusted. And such is Scripture for us now: with a length and breadth and depth and height in it which befits such a communication from the Father to the Son as that of which the Son here speaks.

This love was at the foundation of all for them: and to it they owed, and we owe, that choice which was on His side, not on ours. "Ye have not chosen Me," He says, "but I have chosen you, and appointed you, that ye should go and bear fruit, and that your fruit should abide: that whatsoever ye should ask the Father in My Name, He may give it you." Thus in conscious weakness the power of God is with us: and as He sought us when lost,—when there was nothing but our misery to awaken His compassion, so we may count assuredly upon Him, whatever our helplessness, to perfect the work He has begun. What comfort lies for us in that royal word, "I have chosen you!"

But grace enables us to fulfill the conditions necessarily imposed by the holi-

SECTION 5. (Chaps. XV. 17-XVI. 27.)
A new place with God.

1 (17-25): Identified with Christ for love or hate.

1. THESE things I [f]command you, that ye love one another. If the world [g]hate you, ye know that it hath hated me, before you. If ye were of the world the world would [h]love its own: but because ye are [i]not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you. Remember the word that I said unto you, The [j]bondservant is not greater than his lord. If they have [k]persecuted me, they will also persecute you: If they have kept my word, they will keep yours also. But all these things will they do unto you for my name's sake, because they [l]know not him that sent me. If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had [m]sin: but now they have no pretext for their sin. He that [n]hateth me hateth my Father also. If I had not [o]done among them the works that no other hath done, they had not had sin, but now have they both seen and hated both me and my Father. But this is that the word may be [p]fulfilled which is written in their law, They hated me without a cause.

2 (26-XVI.3): His witnesses in the world.

2. When the [q]Advocate is come, whom I will send unto

[f] ver. 12.
[g] cf. 1 Jno. 3. 1, 13. cf. 2 Tim. 3. 12.
[h] cf. Gen. 39. 14. cf. Jas. 4. 4. cf. Gal. 1. 10. cf. 1 Jno. 2. 15.
[i] ch. 17. 14, 16. cf. Phil. 3. 20.
[j] ch. 13. 16.
[k] cf. ch. 16. 1, 33. cf. 1 Cor. 4. 11-13.
[l] ch. 16. 3. cf. ch. 8. 19. cf. 1 Cor. 2. 8.
[m] cf. ch. 9. 41. cf. Lk. 12. 47, 48.
[n] cf. 1 Jno. 2. 23. cf. ch. 5. 23.
[o] cf. ch. 12. 37-41. cf. Acts 2. 22, 23.
[p] cf. Ps. 35. 19. cf. Ps. 69. 4.
[q] ch. 14. 16, 26.

ness of the divine nature:—and cannot set these aside: therefore the closing words. They are in the same line with others that we have lately heard: which they emphasize only in a somewhat different way. Fruit that abides is that which alone satisfies God. How much that looks well has not that quality in it which ensures permanence. How much that seems truly of God reveals its character by its decay! This "abiding" connects itself, in the Gospel of John, with the divine side of things which is seen all through.

Sec. 5.

All this involves, as has been seen, a new place with God. We must not expect to have it presented as we find it done by Paul at an aftertime. Only by degrees could the full truth be made known: and for this the Spirit of truth Himself must come. What we have now before us is the result of Christ's departure from the world. His disciples being left in it as His representatives and witnesses, with the Spirit also in it, and the consequences of this, while with the Father there would be enjoyed a freedom of access in His Name before unknown. It is in fact a new place with God, but in practical life down here, which is so much the theme in all John's doctrinal unfolding.

1. The identification of His disciples with their Lord, whose representatives on earth they are now to be, is the first thing here. The world itself would identify them. The hatred with which it had followed Him it would now show to His people. They need not wonder at it. If they were separated from it in spirit and character, as also by His choice of them to be His own outside it, then there was consistency in such opposition. He could not commend Himself: how could they? His persecutors would, of course, be theirs: while those who kept His word would keep theirs also. The Object of their hatred was, above all, Himself, and ultimately the Father, who had sent Him. They had had fullest evidence of His mission in His words and works: works unparalleled by those of any other: so that the sin of their rejection of Him was manifest. They hated, alas! both Himself and His Father. Their own Scripture had been fulfilled, "They hated Me without a cause."

2. Amid all this opposition, they were not alone to be His representatives, you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, who goeth forth from the Father, he shall [r]testify of me: and ye [s]also shall bear witness, because ye are with me [t]from the beginning. These things have I spoken unto you, that ye may not be stumbled. They shall [u]put you out of the synagogues: yea, the time cometh when he that [v]killeth you will think that he offereth God service. And these things will they do, because they have not [w]known the Father nor me. But these things have I spoken unto you, that when their* hour cometh, ye may [x]remember them, that I told you [of them].

3 (4-15): The manifestation of the Spirit.

3. And these things I told you not at the beginning, because [y]I was with you; but now I go away to him that sent me: and none of you asketh me, Whither goest thou? but because I have said these

*Some read "the."

r 1 Jno. 5. 6. cf. Acts 5. 32. cf. 1 Cor. 12. 3.
s Lk. 24. 48. Acts 10. 39, 41.
t cf. Acts 1. 21, 22. cf. 1 Jno. 1. 1.
u cf. ch. 9. 34. cf. ch. 12. 42. cf. Acts 13. 50.
v cf. Acts 7. 58, 59. cf. Acts 22. 20. cf. Acts 26. 9.
w ch. 15. 21.
x ch. 13. 19. ch. 14. 29.
y cf. Matt. 9. 15. cf. ch. 17. 12.

but His witnesses: they and the Spirit whom He would send to them from the Father. There would be thus a double witness,—the unseen Spirit being known in the mighty works which would be done. He would be in this way also the Advocate, plead for God and for His people, even though it might be to deaf ears. As the Spirit of truth also, the truth would commend itself to the conscience, if the heart were closed. Their own testimony would be that of men in personal acquaintance with those details of His life and ways which they have, in fact, made known to us. The human witness would be a natural and needed supplement to the divine.

Spite of all, it was necessary to warn them that the opposition of the world to Him would not thus be overcome. They would be put out of the synagogues: nay, men's hearts would so pervert their consciences that they would kill them, and offer that to God as acceptable service. We find this conspicuously enough in such an one as Saul of Tarsus, "concerning zeal, persecuting the Church:" so little does a good conscience certify a soul to be right with God!

3. The Lord goes on to speak again of the coming of the Spirit, with regard to the character of His testimony. So important for them was it that it was even expedient that He should depart, that the Advocate might come. Again He speaks of Him by that assuring title, which declares how thoroughly He has made their cause His own. According to the divine purpose, Christ must go to the Father, or the Spirit would not come; for it is to a glorified Christ that He testifies. Christianity in its full character is, in fact, the fruit of His ascension, as Paul makes fully plain, who was Himself converted by the "gospel of the glory" (2 Cor. iv. 4, 6).

For this, however, we must yet wait: here we have, first, the result of the presence of the Spirit thus sent from the rejected One in glory, as the necessary demonstration of the world's sin, with the judgment of its prince, and the manifestation of the Father's righteousness. "He will convict" does not necessarily imply that men will receive the conviction. The guilty do not necessarily own the righteousness of their sentence. The world assuredly does not own it. None the less has God demonstrated the guilt of the world, and placed men under responsibility to receive His sentence. There lies the way into inconceivable blessing in that salvation for the guilty which the gospel proclaims.

Christ has been in the world: He has been rejected and cast out of it; it is too plain to be denied that He died a malefactor's death. Men may say for themselves, that individually they had no hand in it. This they do say: how is it possible they can be guilty of what was done by men of another race and of another time? Well, look at the Jew in the centuries that have elapsed since things unto you, [z]sorrow hath filled your heart. But I tell you the truth: it is [a]expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the [b]Advocate will not come unto you: but if I depart, I will send him unto you. And when he is come, he will [c]convict the world of sin, and of [d]righteousness, and of [e]judgment. Of sin, because they [f]believe not on me: of righteousness, because I [g]go unto my Father, and ye see me no more: of judgment, because the [h]prince of this world is judged. I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot [i]bear them now: but when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will [j]guide you into all truth: for he will not speak [k]from himself, but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will show you things to [l]come. He shall [m]glorify me, for he shall take of mine and announce it to you. All things that the Father hath are [n]mine: therefore I said that he taketh of what is mine, and shall announce it to you.

z ver. 22. cf. ch. 14. 1.
a cf. ch. 7. 38, 39. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 16.
b ch. 15. 26.
c cf. Acts 2. 37.
d cf. Acts 7. 52.
e cf. Acts 2. 19, 20.
f cf. ch. 3. 18, 19.
g cf. Acts 3. 13. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 21.
h cf. Heb. 2. 14. cf. ch. 12. 31. cf. Col. 2. 15.
i cf. Mk. 4. 33.
j ch. 14. 26. cf. 1 Jno. 2. 20, 21.
k cf. ch. 5. 19.
l cf. 1 Cor. 2. 9, 10; cf. Gal. 5. 5. m cf. ch. 7. 39; cf. Gen. 24. 35, 36; cf. Num. 8. 2-4; cf. 2 Cor. 3. 17, 18. n cf. ch. 17. 10; cf. Matt. 11. 27; cf. ch. 13. 3.

then: has not His blood been upon them, and on their children? Have they not bought for themselves "a field to bury strangers in" with the "price of blood?" If Christ was not what He claimed, was He not worthy of the sentence under which He suffered? If you do not believe in Him, do you not affirm that sentence to be righteous? Who were these Jews, who put Him to death? Were they not a people carefully prepared for centuries to receive the One they rejected? If you had been among them, would not you have rejected Him too?

Scripture at any rate affirms that "as in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man." It does not say that the life is the same, and the difference in this respect may be due to many causes: but it says, the heart is. And it speaks of Israel as a field specially cared for and cultivated, to show precisely what one may expect from the soil of the human heart. Their own law had given a dreadful description, drawn too from experience, of what God had found in them: and the apostle, quoting it, says, "We know that whatsoever the law saith, it saith to them that are under the law." Granted, you say perhaps, but that is Israel. See then how he concludes: what the law says it does indeed say to those who are under the law:—true, but for what purpose? why, "that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world become guilty before God" (Rom. iii. 19). That is, Israel is not an exception as to man's state before God, but rather, an unexceptionably perfect example. If Israel be found such as this, one need go no further,—the whole world is condemned.

This, though the sentence of the law, applies as well, as must be evident, to the rejection of Christ. The unbelief for which the world is condemned is naturally characteristic of us all: and those who are brought to receive Him are just those who will most fully own this; the language of the prophet will be theirs: "He was despised and rejected of men: a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief; and we hid, as it were, our faces from Him; He was despised, and we esteemed Him not." If there be difference as to any, it is the mercy of God that has made the difference.

But the presence of the Spirit convicts the world also of righteousness: "of righteousness, because I go unto the Father, and ye see Me no more." We hear in the prayer that follows, His appeal in this way: "O righteous Father, the world hath not known Thee: but I have known Thee: and these have known that Thou hast sent Me." Here He puts in contrast the world, which is about to demonstrate its ignorant hatred of the Father by the murder of the Son, with Himself, against whom they are showing their enmity. In this open conflict,

4 (16-22): The change from sorrow to joy.

4. A °little while, and ye no longer behold me, and again a little while and ye ᵖshall see me; because* I I ᵍgo to the Father. Some of his disciples said therefore to one another, What is this that he saith unto us, A little while and ye behold me not, and again a little and ye shall see me: and because I go to the Father? They said therefore, What is this that he saith, A little while? We ʳknow not of what he speaketh. Jesus knew therefore that they were desirous to ask him, and he said unto them, Do ye inquire among yourselves of this that I said, A little while and ye behold me not, and again a little while and ye shall see me? Verily, verily, I say unto you, that ye shall ˢweep and lament, and the world shall ᵗrejoice: and ye shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be ᵘturned into

o cf. ch. 7. 33.
p cf. ver. 22. cf. ch. 14. 19.
q cf. ver. 10, 28.
r cf. Mk. 9. 10, 32. cf. ch. 12. 16.
s cf. Lk. 23. 27, 28. cf. Matt. 9. 15.
t cf. Rev. 11. 10. cf. 1 Ki. 21. 16.
u cf. Lk. 24. 41. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 3. cf. Ps. 30. 5.

* Some omit this clause, but its recurrence in the next verse shows it should be retained.

with whom will He show Himself? His accusers dare to condemn Him in the Father's Name; and the bitter cry upon the Cross might seem to justify their accusations. He must come openly out and show with whom He is: and in resurrection from the dead God manifests Himself accordingly. He rises, and with abundant witness, but not to show Himself to the unbelieving world, but to return in glory to the Father. The world sees Him no more till He comes back to judge it. God and the world are in demonstrated opposition.

Righteousness has acted: and righteousness will act further in the nearing future, in taking out of the world which has rejected them also, those whom He has linked with Himself, as in His prayer. Resurrection and ascension will demonstrate as to them also with whom the Father is. In heaven they will be "made the righteousness of God in Him." A marvelous display! but the Lord does not here speak of it. It is of the testimony of the Spirit's presence in the world that He is here speaking.

But what remains, then, for the world itself? Judgment! and already the prince of this world has been judged. We must not understand this to mean that sentence has been executed upon him: which plainly is not the case. It is pronounced, but certainly he is not shut up in the abyss as yet (Rev. xx. 1–3); and still less in the lake of fire (ver. 10). Branded with his doom, he yet is suffered, in the wisdom of God, to be still abroad, the subtle tempter or the cruel persecutor of the disciples of Him whom he has, in both characters, assailed before.

The Lord turns to brighter themes: emphasizing once again that it is the Spirit of truth that is to come to them, to guide them into what as yet they could not bear:—in fact, into the whole range of truth, and to lead out into the blessed future. In all this the glory of the Son would be revealed: for all things that the Father hath being His, there remains nothing beyond this of which to speak. As Paul says by the illumination of the Spirit now, "All things were created by Him and for Him; and He is before all things, and by Him all things consist" (Col. i. 16, 17). Let us remember with adoring hearts, that we are "heirs of God and joint-heirs of Christ;" and let us seek to enter into the amazing grace of such a revelation with all the energy that the Spirit can give.

4. The Lord again speaks of His departure, in terms which His previous words might have enabled them to understand. He was indeed going to the Father; yet by the coming of the Spirit He would, as it were, again be with them: for, as He had said, in that day they would know as they had never known, that He was in the Father, and they in Him, and He in them. But

joy. A woman, when she is in travail, hath sorrow, because her hour is come; but as soon as she is delivered of the child, she remembereth no more the anguish, for joy that a man is born into the world. And ye now therefore have sorrow: but I will [s]see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy [t]no man taketh from you.

5 (23-27): Results in access to God.

5. And in [u]that day ye shall ask * me nothing; verily, verily, I say unto you, [v]Whatsoever, ye shall ask † the Father in ‡ my name, he will give it you. Hitherto ye have asked nothing in my name: ask and ye shall receive, that your [w]joy may be full. These things have I spoken unto you in [a]allegories: [but] the hour is coming when I will no more speak unto you in allegories, but will declare unto you [b]openly about the Father. In that day ye shall ask † in my name: and I say not unto you that I will ask * the Father for you: for the Father himself [c]loveth you, because ye have loved me, and have [d]believed that I came out from the Father.

SECTION 6. (Vers. 28-33.)

A note of victory.

I [e]CAME out from the Father, and am [f]come into the world: again I [g]leave the world and [h]go to the Father.

* ἐρωτάω. † αἰτέω.

‡ This clause is by many put at the end of the sentence.

s cf. ver. 16. cf. ch. 20. 19, 20.
t cf. ch. 14. 27. cf. 2 Cor. 6. 10.
u cf. ver. 30. cf. 1 Jno. 2. 20 with ver. 13.
v ch. 14. 13, ch. 15. 16. cf. 1 Jno. 5. 14.
w ch. 15. 11, ch. 17. 13. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 8.
a cf. ch. 10. 6. cf. Matt. 13. 11, 12.
b cf. ch. 20. 17. cf. 2 Cor. 3. 12-18. cf. 1 Jno. 2. 8.
c cf. ch. 14. 21, 23. cf. ch. 17. 26.
d cf. ch. 8. 69. cf. ver. 30, ch. 17. 8.
e cf. ch. 8. 14, 42.
f cf. ch. 1. 9-11.
g cf. ch. 12. 35.
h cf. ch. 17. 13.

His words only show them lost in the mysterious sorrow of His departure,—the departure again of Him who had come into the world to bring in the long-expected blessing, and was going back with His end, as it seemed, unachieved, to leave them with their failed hopes! The present sorrow was too heavy upon them for the hope beyond to be realized as yet. The sorrow was plain; the hope was a perplexity.

5. But the Lord goes on to the results Godward of the new place He was about to take, and again declares the value of His Name in access to the Father. It was not to be as if He stood between, and they must come to Him, that He might go to the Father for them. No, He had opened the way for direct approach. Moreover the Father Himself loved them for the love they had to Him whom they had received as come out from the Father. Let them prove for themselves the sweetness of this way of access, that they might realize the fulness of joy resulting from so wonderful a place of intimacy as would now be theirs. For as yet they had asked nothing in His Name: they had not learned to identify themselves with Him who as yet had not taken His place for them with God. But the sanctuary now stood open, the allegories in which He had hitherto spoken to them were to be exchanged for open speech that suited this. There was now to be in the nearest place with God a Man in heaven. Henceforth there is for men an entrance into that within the veil, whither the Forerunner has entered for us.

Sec. 6.

A brief note of triumph closes His speech with the disciples. He repeats finally that, having come from the Father into the world, He now goes back from the world to the Father. It might seem as if He was returning with His great purpose unaccomplished, and with regard to Israel, it was in some sense really so: "I have labored in vain, and spent My strength for nought," is His own complaint through the prophet (Isa. xlix. 4): yet, He adds, "Surely My

His disciples say unto him, Lo, now speakest thou plainly, and speakest no allegory. Now we [i]know that thou knowest all things, and needest not that any shouldst ask* thee: by this we believe that thou camest forth from God. Jesus answered them, [j]Do ye now believe? Behold, the hour cometh, yea, is come, that ye shall be [k]scattered every one to his own, and shall leave me alone: and yet I am [l]not alone, because the Father is with me. These things have I spoken unto you, that in me ye may have [m]peace. In the [n]world ye [shall] have tribulation, but be of good courage: I have [o]overcome the world.

i etc. ch. 14. 5, 8.
j cf. ch. 13. 38.
k cf. Matt. 26. 31. cf. Mk. 14. 50. cf. ch. 20. 10.
l cf. ch. 8. 16, 29. etr. Mk. 15. 34.
m ch. 14. 27.
n cf. ch. 15. 18–21. cf. Acts 14. 22. cf. Rom. 5. 3–5.
o cf. ch. 14. 30. cf. Heb. 12. 2. cf. Rev. 3. 21. cf. 1 Jno. 5. 5. cf. Rom. 8. 37–39.

SECTION 7. (Chap. xvii.)

The Melchizedek Priest: His work anticipatively completed.

1 (1-5): Authority over all flesh, to give eternal life.

1. THESE words spake Jesus, and lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, Father, the [p]hour is come: [q]glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may [r]glorify thee; as thou

* ἐρωτάω.

cf. ch. 12. 23. q cf. ch. 12. 28; cf. ch. 13. 31, 32; cf. 1 Pet. 1. 21. r cf. Phil. 2. 11; cf. ver. 4.

judgment is with the Lord, and My work with My God." The answer accordingly comes from God to Him: and we know how that Cross which was then the symbol of His rejection has become the symbol of a wider and higher triumph. New purposes were to be disclosed: mysteries hidden in God through all the former ages were to reveal the unsuspected wonder of His work, and fill heaven as well as earth with the display in them of the divine glory. The Lord is full, as we are permitted to see when He turns presently to His Father, with the light beyond the gloom; but the disciples are not ready for the communication of it to them. For a moment, indeed, a gleam seems to have pierced the darkness. As He speaks of going to the Father, they have got already, they say, beyond the allegories into the plain speech they longed for and of which He had spoken. But even in the words in which they say this, they show how far the gloom had shrouded them. "Now we know," they say, "that Thou knowest all things:—by this we believe that Thou camest forth from God." Patiently and sadly He replies to this: "Do ye now believe? Behold, the hour cometh, yea, is come, that ye shall be scattered every one to his own, and shall leave Me alone: and yet," He adds, "I am not alone, but My Father is with Me." Amid all, He knows that the victory is sure: and sure for them: "These things have I spoken unto you, that in Me ye might have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation: but be of good courage: I have overcome the world."

Sec. 7.

His discourse with them is ended, and He turns now to the Father, to put into His hand these poor and presently to be scattered sheep, of whom He is going to show Himself, in the very hour of their scattering, more than ever the good Shepherd. It is the Melchizedek, or Royal, Priest however, to whom we are privileged to listen in His intercession for His people, the work being anticipated as done, that puts Him in the place. We have seen this character attaching to much that He says, in all this part of John, as very largely to the doctrine of the Gospel as a whole. In this closing portion, we have seen Him at the commencement in the place of Advocate, or rather what connects with this, and which involves the same position as the Risen and Ascended Man in which we find Him here. So it is said,—"knowing that the Father had put all things into His hands;"—that is really His Kingship: He is Lord of all.

There is, of course, a special form of His Kingdom which He takes for a special purpose, when as Son of man He brings the earth from its disorder back to hast given unto him [s]authority over all flesh, that as to all that thou hast [t]given him, he might give them life eternal. And this is the [u]life eternal, that they should [v]know thee, the only true God, and [w]Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent. I have [x]glorified thee upon the earth: I have [y]finished the work which thou hadst given me to do. And now, O Father, [z]glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory that I had with thee [a]before the world was.

[s] cf. ch. 3. 35. cf. ch. 5. 27. cf. Matt. 28. 18.
[t] vers. 6, 9, 24. cf. ch. 6. 37, 39. cf. Heb. 2. 13.
[u] cf. ch. 3. 14-16. cf. ch. 10. 28, 29.

cf. 1 Jno. 5. 11, 12. [v] cf. 1 Jno. 2. 13; cf. 1 Jno. 4. 7, 8; cf. Gal. 4. 9. [w] cf. ch. 6. 29; cf. 1 Jno. 4. 14. [x] ch. 13. 31; cf. ch. 8. 29. [y] cf. ch. 13. 1; cf. ch. 4. 34; cf. ch. 19. 30. [z] cf. Rom. 6. 4; cf. Acts 3. 13. [a] ver. 26; cf. Prov. 8. 22-30; cf. Phil. 2. 6; cf. Col. 1. 15; cf. Heb. 1. 3.

God. Into man's hand it was put at the beginning, and by man's fall it was corrupted and ruined. By man's hand that ruin must be repaired: and thus that Kingdom is the Kingdom of the Son of man: but He is King already before this comes, sitting on the Father's throne, and we are "translated into the Kingdom of the Son of His love."

The Melchizedek Priesthood is supposed by some to contemplate simply the millennial kingdom;—that is, in its exercise; but the bread and wine of our Melchizedek should lead us into a wider application of the type. Indeed, as a type,—in which way alone we must view the application made of Gen. xiv.,—the whole action and the circumstances speak more distinctly of our blessing as Christians than they do of any other. For Sodom is not judged, and Abraham with his typical heavenly calling we may claim without hesitation as our representative: "Abram the Hebrew," (the "passenger,")—passing through a world by which he will not be enriched, "from a thread even to a shoe-latchet." No doubt, there is a right application to millennial times: and the Lord will be seen and will act in that character in relation to Israel and the earth. This is quite true: while it is clear that the argument of the epistle to the Hebrews shows us Christ after the order of Melchizedek now, though the type in relation to the "shadow of heavenly things" in the tabernacle brings before us necessarily the type of Aaron.

The relation to what we have in Hebrews is clear in the position taken by the Lord in the prayer He utters. We see Him in the first place with authority given Him over all flesh; then, as not praying for the world: that is, "separate from sinners." Lastly, He is shown as "higher than the heavens,"—in the glory given Him, to which (though a glory always His own) it is as Man He goes back. The mingling of blessing and prayer is quite characteristic. The Royal (and more than royal) Priest is manifest throughout.

1. The Lord's heart is free; He is no longer hindered by the unbelief of those about Him, nor occupied with them, but for them with God. He speaks as the Son of the Father, who has fulfilled the mission upon which He came, and is going back, to take the place belonging to Him,—to the glory which He had before; yet still as Man, to take it from His Father's hand, and to carry through in power what He had begun in suffering. He speaks in the consciousness and communion of the coequal Son, yet in entire devotion to the Father's glory:—"Glorify Thy Son, that Thy Son also may glorify Thee." Authority over all flesh is His; but it is His Father's gift, as His people are. He has ability to sustain what requires no less than divine power, and He gives eternal life,—a divine gift; but the power He uses is in obedience, and everywhere the mystery of His Person manifests itself in His utterances. He is God Himself, in the creature's place to make good the failure of the creature, and by His condescending love to win him from his ruinous path of self-will back to Himself. Who could henceforth refuse a path in which he saw before him the Son of God,—"Leader and Finisher of faith" in its whole course?

But it was His also to give to them eternal life,—a nature to receive and de-

2 (6-21): His prayer not for the world, but for His own.
1 (6-10): The Father's gift.

2. [1] I have [b]manifested thy name unto the men whom thou [c]gavest me out of the world; thine they were, and thou gavest them unto me, and they have kept thy word. Now they [d]know that all things that thou hast given me are of thee. For I have given unto them the [e]words that thou hast given me, and they have received them, and have known surely that I [f]came out from thee, and they have believed that thou didst send me. I pray with regard to them; I pray [g]not regarding the world, but regarding those whom thou hast given me; for they are thine. And all things that are [h]mine are thine, and all [i]thine are mine, and I am [j]glorified in them.

b cf. ch. 1. 18. cf. ch. 14. 9-11. ver. 26.
c vers. 2, 9.
d cf. ch. 16. 30.
e cf. ch. 3. 34. cf. ch. 8. 28. cf. ch. 15. 15. ver. 14.
f ch. 16. 28.
g cf. ch. 14. 22 with ch. 15. 19. cf. 1 Jno. 5. 19. ver. 25.
h cf. ch. 10. 29, 30.
i ch. 16. 15. j cf. 2 Thess. 1. 10; cf. Eph. 2. 7.

light in the revelation made. For "this," He says, "is eternal life, that they should know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent." This is not a definition absolutely of eternal life, but how it is known and realized, now that Christ is come. The Lord's words necessarily look on, not back; to make them rule out the possibility of eternal life in an Old Testament saint, because he could not say, "Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent," would be a very unwarranted deduction.

2. [1] Marked out by these characters, as He tells us distinctly His disciples were, (for He had made known to them the Father's Name, and they had received His words, and knew surely that He had come out from the Father,) He now presents them to the Father. As the Priest with God, He is the Intercessor for His own, and not for the world,—"separate from sinners," as we read in Hebrews. The priest supposes established relationship with those for whom he stands before God, although with Israel under the law all was but a shadow of the true. Our Priest goes into heaven in the value of an offering once offered, never to be repeated, by which He has "perfected for ever them that are sanctified."

"The only true God," whom Israel knew in contrast with the false gods of the heathen, was nevertheless, as such, in His innermost reality unknown. And this the veil of the sanctuary shutting men out from Him declared. Even by Moses His Face could not be seen. Thus the Lord speaks of "Thy Name which Thou hast given Me." It was His work to declare that Name; and He declares it as a name of relationship to Himself. The Son speaks of the Father: yet God had been spoken of as such before. Nay, He had, as we know, proclaimed Himself a Father to Israel; and we have heard the Jews boldly venturing upon it: "We be not born of fornication," they had said to Jesus Himself; "we have one Father, even God." But they were pushed into saying so: if you had asked them for the Name of Israel's God, you would have heard of Jehovah, or the Lord Almighty, but it is not likely that "the Father" would have leaped to any body's lips. Alas, Israel was no child by nature to such a Father; and God could be no right Father to such a child. On the lips of the Divine Son, sent in servant-form into the world for man's necessity, how different does it become!

It is an eternal relationship, not one of time. It is not relation contracted for a purpose, however blessed may be the purpose. It belongs to His eternity. Love has in Him an Object worthy of itself. Could it be imagined away without a loss so great as to be disastrous?

Think, then, of this, the Son of His bosom, here in the world, a world which He created, at His own personal cost to put away the evil, and bring those who had wandered from Him back to God! This as the manifestation to men of Him who could give His Son for such a purpose, and to be the Head of a new creation built up out of the old, the assurance to it of fullest and abiding blessing!

2 (11-16): Not of the world, and to be kept from the evil.

[2] And I am no longer in the world, and these are in the [k]world, and I come to thee. Holy Father, [l]keep them in thy name which thou hast given me, that they may be [m]one as we. While I was with them, [n]I kept them in thy name which thou hast given me. I have guarded them, and not one of them hath perished but the [o]son of perdition; that the scripture might be fulfilled. And now I come to thee; and these things I speak in the world, that they may have my [p]joy fulfilled in themselves. I have given them thy word, and the world hath [q]hated them, because they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world. I pray not that thou shouldst [r]take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the [s]evil. They are [t]not of the world, even as I am not of the world.

k cf. ch.13.1.
*cf.*1 Pet.5.8.
l ver. 15.
*cf.*1 Pet.1.5.
*cf.*Jude.24.
m vers. 21, 22.
*cf.*ch.10.16.
*cf.r.*1 Cor.1. 10-13.
n cf. Lk. 22. 35, 36.
*cf.*Lk.12.22-38.
o cf. ch.6.70, 71.
cf. Acts 1. 25.
*cf.*2 Thess. 2. 3.
p ch. 15. 11.
q ch. 15. 18, 19.
cf. Jas. 4. 4.
r cf. 1 Cor. 5. 10; cf. 1 Cor. 7. 20; cf. Gal. 1. 4. s cf. 1 Jno. 5. 18, 19; cf. Lk. 11. 4. t ver. 14; ch. 8. 23; cf. ch. 18. 36; cf. 1 Pet. 2. 11; cf. Heb. 13. 14.

Thus has He manifested to us the Father's Name; but He has done more even than this,—He has given us a place with Him as children, in the value of a life communicated to us, as those of whom thus He, taking as Man the First-born place among them, is not ashamed!

No wonder, therefore, that the authority given Him over all flesh should be for this as the fundamental and decisive exercise of it, to give eternal life to as many as are given to Him; thus of necessity separated from the world which has rejected Him. How dear are they to Him as the Father's gift! how dear as those of whom His grace can say, forgetting all that could be pleaded, however rightly, against them, 'They have kept Thy word!" He has taken fullest care that they should know, in all that He can speak of as His own, the Father as the Source of all. For He has given them but the words given Him, and in receiving them they know Him as the One come out from Him—the Sent One of God.

Here then are those with regard to whom He prays: the Father's own, the fruit of the Father's mission of the Son; those given Him of the Father and still the Father's; even as in the perfect communion of that relationship all things are. In these also, the fruit of His own work, He is glorified.

[2] Now He was no longer to be in the world, but they would be left in it, without that gracious, all-sufficient companionship which they had been enjoying. He commits them, therefore, to the care of that Divine Father, under whose guidance and government the children of God still walk (1 Pet. i. 17); He abiding as the Lord who directs their service (Eph. iv. 5, 6; 1 Cor. xii. 5). For all things are in His hands, to work out in power, as has been said, what He has in suffering laid the foundation for; but the relation of the Father to the children is as plainly to be recognized. He prays, therefore, to the Holy Father, to keep them in the power of that Name which He has manifested to them. The power of it would be to keep them near to Him: for the sanctuary of His Presence is the only refuge from self and sin. At a distance from the Light, evil and good become soon merged and indistinguishable. With Christ the atmosphere in which He lived was God, and into it He brought all others:—"While I was with them, I kept them in Thy Name, which Thou hast given Me." Alas, there was one who was repelled by it: "I have guarded them, and not one of them has perished but the son of perdition; that the Scripture might be fulfilled."

He was going to God, but would leave them, not in sorrow, but in joy. "The joy of the Lord is strength;" and He had spoken to them as He had, that they might have that joy which had been His own, in the midst of a scene of sorrow such as the world would all the more be; for in proportion as they had

[3] (17-21): He sanctifying Himself, that they may be sanctified.

[3] Sanctify them by the [u]truth: thy [v]word is truth. As thou hast [w]sent me into the world, I also have sent them into the world. And in their behalf I [x]sanctify myself, that they also may be sanctified in truth. Neither do I pray with regard to [y]these alone; but also regarding those believing on me through their word; that they all may be [z]one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one* in us: that the [a]world may believe that thou hast sent me.

u cf. ch. 8. 32. cf. 2 Thess. 2. 13. cf. Eph. 4. 24.

v cf. Eph. 1. 13 with Eph. 5. 26. cf. Ps. 119. 160.

w ch. 20. 21.

x cf. ch. 10. 36. cf. Heb. 7. 26. cf. Col. 3. 1.

* Some omit "one."

y cf. Acts 2. 39; cf. Rom. 9. 23, 24. z cf. ch. 10. 16; cf. Eph. 2. 13-19; ver. 11. a cf. ch. 13. 35; cf. Acts 5. 12-14; ctr. Rom. 2. 24.

their joy in God, would it be realized how far it was away from Him, and it would hate them as not of it. The light would bring its shadows, and they would be identified with Himself in sorrow and in joy alike. Yet He did not pray that they should be taken out of the world: the wilderness would have for them its harvests, to be reaped through all eternity. How Israel's feast of tabernacles tells of that! He prayed only that they might be kept out of the evil in it. From the world itself He had entirely separated His own; they belonged to it, in the appointment of God and in the nature He had given them (inconsistent as they might be with this) no more than did He Himself.

[3] The truth was to be the means of sanctification to them,—"Thy truth," He says, that is, the truth as characterized by that revelation of the Father of which He has been speaking. Now, sending them into the world, as He was doing, the open glory of heaven into which He had introduced them was to be henceforth characterized by a new Object in it,—a Man, set apart there to God (as "sanctified" means),—sanctified by Himself, as none other ever was, to be for Him His image in human form (2 Cor. iv. 4). Divine glory shining out in the face of Jesus.

We have here another instance of the foundation of Paul's doctrine being in this Gospel. The "gospel of the glory of Christ" was that by which the apostle of the Gentiles was turned to God, and this was the light in which he henceforth walked. Christ in glory was the power over him, the joy within him. Here was his eye fixed; here was the goal of his course, which in his ardor was a race. The passion of his soul was to "win Christ, and to be found in Him." And he states but his experimental knowledge of the Lord's words here when he says that "Christ is made unto us wisdom from God, even . . . sanctification" (1 Cor. i. 30). The Object before him detached him from the world, and drew him heavenward. It absorbed and inspired him. Generalizing his experience, he affirms for Christians at large the result as he had realized it: "We all, beholding the glory of the Lord with open face,"—it is the Lord's face that is "open," or without a veil,—"are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Lord the Spirit" (2 Cor. iii. 18).

This is an inspired comment upon the words before us in the Gospel. We shall find them developed for us by the apostle in various ways, which at present we shall not attempt to follow. Every Christian heart should know for itself this central glory of the gospel, in which God and Man meet, and meet for ever; in which Christ gone in to God, with His work achieved, our Forerunner, invites us to abide where He abides. Who shall deny Him what His soul has wrought for?—or refuse to go in out of the night, where there is no night more?

Where this light falls, it is glory: "from glory to glory," says the apostle. The least degree is that; and where it shines it brightens to the endless day. "That they may be sanctified in truth," says the Lord; and the touch of these rays is the dispelling of all illusion. What is the world? it ignored, insulted, crucified Him!—a world in which He could serve, but not reign! and yet even the life here is lifted into glory, when we can say, "The life which I live

3 (22-26): Manifested glory.

3. And the [b]glory which thou hast given me I have given them; that they may be [c]one, as we are one; I [d]in them and [e]thou in me, that they may be [f]perfected into one, that the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast [g]loved them as thou hast loved me.

Father, as for those* whom thou hast given me, I desire that where I am they also may be [h]with me; that they may [i]behold my glory which thou hast given me; for thou [j]lovedst me before the foundation of the world.

O [k]righteous Father, the [l]world hath not known thee, but [m]I have known thee, and [n]these have known that thou hast sent me. And I have [o]made known to them thy name, and [p]will make it known; that the [q]love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them, and [r]I in them.

*Many read, "that which."

b cf. Rom. 8. 17, 30. cf. Eph. 2. 6, 7. cf. Phil. 3. 21.
c cf. vers. 11, 21.
d ver. 26. cf. Rom. 8. 10. cf. 1 Jno. 4. 16.
e cf. ch. 14. 10, 11.
f cf. 1 Jno. 4. 12. cf. Eph. 4. 15, 16.
g ch. 16. 27. cf. ch. 14. 21, 23.
h ch. 14. 3. cf. 1 Thess. 4. 17. cf. 2 Tim. 2. 11, 12.
i cf. 1 Jno. 3. 2; cf. Rev. 22. 4; cf. Tit. 2. 13.
j cf. ver. 5; cf. Prov. 8. 30; cf. ch. 1. 18.
k cf. ver. 11; cf. Rev. 16. 5.
l ch. 15. 21; cf. ch. 1. 10; cf. 1 Cor. 1. 21.
m ch. 8. 55; cf. ch. 10. 14, 15.
n ch. 16. 27-30; ver. 8.
o ver. 6; cf. ch. 14. 9.
p cf. ch. 20. 17; cf. Rom. 8. 15; cf. 1 Jno. 2. 13.
q ch. 15. 9; ch. 16. 27.
r cf. Eph. 3. 17.

in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave Himself for me."

And here the Lord explicitly assures us of our interest in all this: "Neither pray I regarding these alone, but also regarding those believing on Me through their word; that they may be one, as Thou, Father, art in Me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in Us: that the world may believe that Thou hast sent Me."

This is a unity of practical life, oneness of heart and mind, such as subsists between the Father and the Son: a unity which the world is to be able to see, so as to be led by it to faith. It is not, of course, that the world as a whole will believe, but men of the world have been at all times wrought upon by it. It is not the Church that is meant,—in John we have not this; although, no doubt, every breach of Church unity has begun as a breach in the practical life. The life has its character from the truth entered into; and "one in Us" shows it to be a life of fellowship with the Father and the Son. How glorious such a witness! What a testimony to Him who can work it in such as we are!

3. The prayer now passes into blessing pronounced,—the expression of His will with regard to His own, and in which He goes beyond the time of His absence to that in which His glory will be openly revealed. The change is suited to this, and to the Melchizedek character as well; though we have no reason to limit this to the time of open manifestation.

The glory given us we shall be seen in together when the Lord appears, and it will be the glory in which He will appear as Son of man. Then the world therefore will know,—it will be no question of faith any longer, but of sight,—that Jesus was sent of the Father. In that day He will come "in His own glory, and that of His Father, and of the holy angels" (Luke ix. 26).

But it is not said, "in the glory of His saints," although they have glory; and the reason is here apparent, that it is in His glory they will come. His is the glory which they reflect, and so the Lord says, "I in them," and the apostle, that "He cometh to be glorified in His saints, and to be admired in all them that believe, . . . in that day" (2 Thess. i. 10). The glory will be seen to be His, but they will share it; and being thus "perfected into one,"—in a unity of glory such as shall be worthy of Him, the world shall know, He says, "that Thou hast sent Me, and hast loved them as Thou hast loved Me." Words these are indeed, which none but Himself would have dared to use;

DIVISION 3. (Chaps. xviii.-xxi.)

The Perfected Offering and the Resurrection of the Life.

SUBDIVISION 1. (Chaps. xviii.-xix. 16.)

Sovereign Lord and Willing Offering.

SECTION 1. (Chap. xviii. 1-11.)

Obedient to the Father's will.

WHEN Jesus had said these things, he [s]went forth with his disciples beyond the torrent Kedron, where was a [t]garden, into which he entered and his disciples. And Judas also, who delivered him up, knew the place, for Jesus ofttimes resorted thither with his disciples. Judas, therefore, having received the [u]troop and officers from the chief priests and Pharisees, cometh thither with lanterns and torches and weapons.

[s] Matt. 26. 30, 36. Mk. 14. 26, 32. Lk. 22. 39.
[t] cf. Gen. 2. 8. cf. ch. 19. 41.
[u] Matt. 26. 47. Mk. 14. 43. Lk. 22. 47.

but we stand before God in the value of what He is: grace finding in this way its ability to manifest itself so as to bring out all the depths of His nature. He is going "in the ages to come" to show the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness toward us in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 7). Need we say of anything, it is too great to show forth this?

But there is a glory His which is greater than that in which He is to be seen with His people, and which can only be seen in His own eternal dwelling-place; therefore He desires that we may be with Him, to behold it there. It is glory which as Man He enters, and in that sense "given" glory, and yet as the recognition of the love which was eternally His. Thus it is Divine glory, as far as the creature can be strengthened to behold it. There are necessary limits here,—limits which forbid even our defining them further. And the whole of what we have here is of a nature which requires rather prayer than study to apprehend it. We must be where He is, to realize the vision.

The Lord appeals now to the "Righteous Father," as One who, in the midst of a world "alienated from the knowledge of Him," has known Him; and He links His disciples, spite of their feebleness, with Himself, as those who at least have known Him as sent of the Father. To them He had made known His Name, and would go on to make it known; for (they and we) must here be learners still. The love of the Father to the Son is, as we have seen, part of that manifestation; and so this becomes an inward realization in the soul; and He, the Object of the Father's love, in whom therefore the Divine nature in its glory revealed itself,—He becomes in them the necessary Object also, and the One in whom fellowship with God is henceforth found.

DIV. 3.

We have reached now the third division of the Gospel, in which we see the perfected offering, and that resurrection from the dead which is its manifest acceptance. John gives, as has been already said, the burnt-offering aspect of the Lord's work, which would alone suit the view of His Person as the Only-begotten of the Father. "Lo, I come to do Thy will" is here the characteristic; and as the Mighty Worker He carries it to completion. As the free-will sacrifice He freely lays down His life. Throughout it reads like a triumphal progress. There is no agony in the Garden, no cloud upon the Cross. He testifies Himself that the work is finished; and this is confirmed by the threefold witness of the Spirit, the water, and the blood. The resurrection of the Lord is, as we might expect, more fully opened up in its consequences for us than in the other Gospels.

SUBD. 1.

In the first subdivision His sovereignty is shown over all circumstances, which makes Him, therefore, the free and willing Offering that He is. There Jesus, therefore, [v]knowing all things that were coming upon him, went forth and said unto them, Whom seek ye? They answered him, Jesus the Nazarene. Jesus saith unto them, I am he. And [w]Judas also, who delivered him up, stood with them. As soon then as he said unto them, I am he, they went backward and [x]fell to the ground. Again therefore he asked them, Whom seek ye? And they said, Jesus the Nazarene. Jesus answered them, I have told you that I am he: if therefore ye seek me, [y]let these go their way: that the saying of Jesus might be [z]fulfilled, As for those whom thou hast given me, I have not lost one of them. Simon Peter, therefore, having a [a]sword, drew it, and smote the servant of the high priest, and cut off his right ear: and the servant's name was Malchus. Jesus therefore said unto Peter, [b]Put up the sword into the sheath: the [c]cup which the Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?

v cf. ch. 13. 1, 3.

w ver. 7. ctr. ch. 1. 38. ctr. ch. 20. 15.

x cf. Matt. 26. 53. cf. ch. 10. 18.

y cf. ch. 10. 28.

z ch. 17. 12.

a cf. Matt. 26. 51, 52. Mk. 14. 47. cf. Lk. 22. 35–38, 50, 51.

b cf. ver. 36.

c Matt. 27. 39, 42.

is the complete fulfillment of His own words: "No man taketh My life from Me, but I lay it down of Myself; I have authority to lay it down, and authority to take it again; this commandment have I received of My Father." How perfectly the freedom and the constraint unite together here!

Sec. 1.

The first section beautifully exhibits both characters. He goes over the "black" winter-torrent Kedron, so significant of the "brook in the way" of which He had to drink, in order that He might with His work accomplished "lift up the head." For the refreshment that He procured for others was that which was His own; and it broke out of the dark abyss of suffering which was now before Him. Over Kedron, then, He passes to the garden, carrying with Him His disciples; He was carrying them indeed, though by a way they knew not, to the paradise of God.

But He is clearly going forward with perfect knowledge of all, on His own part: Judas, we are significantly told here, knew the place as one of frequent resort by the Lord with His disciples. He is not shunning but seeking now the "oil-press" of sorrow. Eternal joy is to be the sure result.

How pitiful, in view of this, the array mustered to take the One who comes forward to meet it! "Whom seek ye?" He asks; and when He tells them, He is the One they are seeking, as if fulfilling the divine decree as to that supreme Name of Jesus, they all go backward and fall to the ground. Then, being warned, He gives them leave, if still they will, to take Him; but with the stipulation (blessed Shepherd of the sheep!) that they must let His followers go. And they let them go! even though Peter, out of harmony with His Lord's mind as so frequently he is, uses his sword against them! What of them all? Alas, the poor tools of their own enemy! will He contend with souls that He has made? No, all is settled for Him entirely apart from any thought of them or of their master: He does not speak in John of the twelve legions of angels ready to take the place of the twelve,—twelve now no more!—who are soon to forsake Him. The Son is in the presence of the Father only; and "The cup which My Father hath given Me, shall I not drink it?" is His unanswerable, all-sufficient argument.

Sec. 2.

They bind Him who is bound already, the meek Lamb of sacrifice; and now we have a scene how different in the high priest's court. The questioning before Annas is only given by John; who on the other hand does not relate, though he

SECTION 2. (Chap. xviii. 12–27.)
The deceit of an enemy and the denial of a friend.

THE troop, therefore, and the captain, and the officers of the Jews, took Jesus and [d] bound him. And they led him away to Annas first: for he was [e] father-in-law to Caiaphas, who was high priest that year. Now it was Caiaphas who gave [f] counsel to the Jews, that it was expedient that one man should die for the people. And Simon Peter [g] followed Jesus, also [h] another disciple: that disciple was known unto the high priest, and went in with Jesus into the court of the high priest; but Peter stood at the door without. Then went out the other disciple who was known unto the high priest, and spake unto her that kept the door, and brought in Peter. The 'maid-servant, therefore, that kept the door, saith unto Peter, Art thou also one of this man's disciples? He saith, I am not. And the servants and officers were standing there, having made a [j] fire of coals, for it was cold; and they were warming themselves; and Peter stood [k] with them and warmed himself. The high priest therefore asked Jesus about his disciples and about his doctrine. Jesus answered him, I have spoken 'openly to the world; I taught always in the synagogue and in the temple, where all the Jews come together, and in [m] secret have I said nothing. Why askest thou me? ask those who have heard, what I have spoken unto them; behold, [n] they know what I have said. And as he said these things, one of the officers that stood by struck Jesus on the [o] face, saying, Answerest thou the high priest so? Jesus answered him, If I have spoken evil, bear [p] witness of the evil; but if well, why smitest thou me? Annas therefore sent him bound to Caiaphas the high priest.

[d] cf. Gen. 22. 9.
[e] cf. Matt. 26. 57, ver. 24. cf. Acts 4. 6.
[f] ch. 11. 49-53.
[g] Matt. 26. 58. Mk. 14. 54. Lk. 22. 54.
[h] cf. ch. 13. 23. cf. ch. 20. 2-4. cf. ch. 21. 20.
[i] cf. Acts 12. 13.
[j] ver. 25. cfr. Heb. 11. 25. cfr. 2 Tim. 2. 3, 4.
[k] cf. 2 Cor. 6. 14-17. cf. Prov. 13. 20.
[l] Matt. 26. 55. Lk. 4. 15. ch. 7. 26.
[m] cf. Is 48. 16. cf. Matt. 13. 10-17.
[n] cf. ch. 7. 28, 46. cf. Matt. 26. 59, etc.
[o] Matt. 26. 67. ch. 19. 3. cf. Is. 50. 6.
[p] cfr. Acts 23. 1-3.

implies, the trial before Caiaphas. As father-in-law of the latter, and one who had been at a former time, high priest himself, he may have been, as Lange suggests, regarded by the Jews as still the true one; his relationship to the present one giving him his opportunity also to affect a position which he could not openly take. The Romans set up one after another as it pleased them,—a thing rightly enough offensive to the upholders of the law, and which seems to appear as this in the remark twice made, that Caiaphas was the high priest for that year (ver. 13; chap. xi. 49). The two seem to have occupied even the same house. Caiaphas, we are reminded, was the man who had given counsel to the Jews as to the expediency of one man dying for the people, which God overruled to be a prophecy of a Saviour, but which showed him as a judge prepared with his verdict. Annas is as much allied to him in spirit as in flesh. His whole aim here is to ensnare the Lord with questions as to His disciples and His doctrine, for which Christ refers him to what He had taught everywhere with the greatest publicity. It was for His accusers to make their charges, and prove them against Him. To the one who smites Him for want of reverence for the high priest He only replies with a quiet remonstrance.

Annas is baffled, though not turned from his malignity, and sends Him bound to Caiaphas; of the trial before whom the evangelist takes no further notice. It was a trial scarcely in form, and, as we have seen, decided before it was commenced. It is left a blank, as in fact was that of Annas.

But Simon Peter was standing and warming himself. They said, therefore, unto him, Art thou also one of his disciples? He [q]denied and said, I am not. One of the servants of the high priest, being a kinsman of him whose [r]ear Peter had cut off, saith, Did I not see thee in the garden with him? Peter then denied again: and immediately a [s]cock crew.

[q] ver. 17.
[r] ver. 10.
[s] ch. 13. 38. Matt. 26.69–75. Mk. 14. 66–72. Lk. 22. 55–62.

SECTION 3. (Chaps. xviii. 28–xix. 16.)

Hearts made manifest.

1 (xviii. 28–32): The word of Jesus governing.

1. THEY lead, therefore, Jesus from Caiaphas into the [t]prætorium: and it was early: and they themselves went not into the prætorium, that they might not be [u]defiled, but might eat the passover. Pilate, therefore, went out unto them, and said, What [v]accusation bring ye against this man? They answered and said unto him, If this man were not a [w]malefactor, we would not have delivered him up to thee. Pilate, therefore, said unto them, Take ye him and judge him according to [x]your law. The Jews said unto him, It is not [y]permitted us to put any one to death; that the [z]word of Jesus might be fulfilled, which he spake, signifying what death he was going to die.

[t] Matt. 27.2, etc. Mk. 15. 1, etc. Lk. 23. 1, etc.
[u] cf. ch. 11. 55. cf. Acts 11. 3. ctr. Deut. 21. 7.
[v] cf. ch. 19. 7.
[w] ctr. ver. 30.
[x] ctr. Rom. 3. 21.
[y] ctr. ch. 10. 31. ctr. Acts 7. 59.
[z] cf. ch. 12. 32, 33. cf. Gal. 3. 13. cf. Matt. 20. 19.

With Peter's denial we are sadly familiar, and John appears to add nothing to it; but he himself, though unnamed, surprises us with the quiet boldness of faith and love which carry him through untouched and unquestioned, where the apparently bolder disciple breaks down so helplessly. He is known to the high priest, and to the keeper of the gate, and known as a follower of Christ too, as her question to Peter shows, "Art thou also one of this man's disciples?" Afterwards we shall find him in the same open way with the mother of Jesus at the cross, and obtaining a precious recognition, and a precious charge, from the dying Saviour: and through all he is untouched and unquestioned. Blessed it is to see him who speaks so of love an example of it: unquestioned by men, he is unquestioned also by the Lord: there is plainly no need of it; and happy is he who is in such a case. Let us seek for nearer acquaintance, and we shall be truer to Him; here is the soil in which faith rooting itself will grow vigorously. Let us get nearer to His heart, that we may be qualified to walk evenly and undisturbed through the world's allurements and its threats alike, armed against each by the secrets learned there.

Sec. 3.

1. In the third section the Lord answers for Himself before Pilate; and this is proportionately much dwelt upon, and particulars given which we do not find elsewhere. It is evident that what we are shown is the searching out of the Roman's conscience in the light of the Presence before which he stands. Judge and accused change places; and, hard as the governor may be,—a man stained with many crimes, he yet compares favorably with Israel's leaders, blinded and darkened with the light they have shut out. That Pilate shrank, though vainly, from what the insane fury of the Jews forced upon him is plain in all the Gospels; but John shows us the under-workings of a convicted soul, as no other does, and the Lord's compassionate faithfulness towards the miserable victim of his own self-treachery. Hearts are made manifest all through, and the Light shines upon all the clouds that would obscure it. Even the refusal of the people to take the matter into their own hands, when Pilate would put it in them, only works, as is noted, for the fulfillment of the word of Jesus. Crucifixion was not a Jewish punishment. The "hanging upon a tree" was with them

2 (xviii. 33-38): Judgment for the judge.

2. Pilate, therefore, entered again into the prætorium, and called Jesus, and said unto him, Art thou the [a]king of the Jews? Jesus answered, Sayest thou this of thyself? or did others say it to thee concerning me? Pilate answered, Am I a Jew? thine own nation and the chief priests have delivered thee unto me; what hast thou done? Jesus answered, My kingdom is [b]not of this world; if my kingdom were of this world, my servants* would have fought, that I might not have been delivered up to the Jews; but now is my kingdom not from hence. Pilate said, therefore, unto him, Thou art then a king? Jesus answered, Thou sayest it, for I [c]am a king. For this I have been born, and for this

3 (xviii. 38-xix. 7): People and judge transformed and manifested.

have I come into the world, that I might bear [d]witness to the truth: every one that is [e]of the truth heareth my voice. Pilate saith unto him, [f]What is truth?

3. And when he had said this, he went out again unto

* Gk. "officers."

a Matt. 27. 11.

b cf. ch. 17. 16. cf. Matt. 4. 8, 9. cf. ch. 6. 15. cf. Matt. 25. 31, etc.

c cf. Ps. 45. 1. cf. Zech. 9. 9. cf. Rev. 19. 16.

d cf. Rev. 1. 5.

e cf. ch. 8. 47. cf. ch. 10. 26. cf. 1 Jno. 4. 6.

f cf. ver. 37. cf. ch. 19. 8. cf. 1 Cor. 1. 21, 26.

after death, and not a mode of inflicting this: but with death all was ended for the Lord; and the rich man's sepulcre begins His vindication.

2. Before Pilate the Lord answers at once, when He is questioned, that He is King of the Jews. But He asks, Is this his own question?—has he personal interest in it? Of Messiah he must have heard, and of all the hopes that were connected with it; more surely still, of a reign of righteousness and truth to replace the long oppression, and bring peace at last to a weary, if not sin-weary world. Was the intervention of God anything,—even an alarm perhaps, to one of the world's rulers? But Pilate puts off the question as a mere Jewish one: let him look at how his own case stands as a man accused by his own people; what reason had they? The Lord answers him, but keeps His steady pressure upon the conscience, already uneasy, of the real criminal before Him the real Judge. He lets Pilate know that His Kingdom is not of this world,—has not its origin or nature from the world: else would He not have been left, unarmed and without a struggle, to the merciless hands that had been laid upon Him. Had His followers,—out of all the crowds that had gathered round Him,—been organized into such a force as would be needed for the establishment of a kingdom such as Rome could fear or take into account? His Kingdom plainly was not like one of these.

But then He really was a King? the Roman questioned. And the Lord answers that indeed He is a King: that His birth and coming into the world (and here a gleam of His divine nature flashes out) was to bear witness to the truth. Truth, in a false and hollow world, to establish this was the purpose of His life and mission. By this would He establish also His kingdom over the hearts and minds of men. Truth is one, decisive, imperial: he that would learn it must be subject to it. And here Christ drops a word for the conscience of His hearer, "Every one who is of the truth heareth My voice."

Pilate answers like the sceptical Roman that he is, "What is truth?" Alas, their Pantheon of captured gods had had bitter fruit in their rough conquerors. They had learned to believe in gods no more, save in him who had overtopped them all, their emperor; and in him the farce was but too transparent. And yet here was a word to get behind even such defences: for, if he knew not what was truth, he could know, at least, whether he was "of" it. And, if to be true were needful for such knowledge, was the lack of this, perhaps, what made truth appear such an unattainable thing?

3. Something, at least, makes Pilate uneasy; he stays for no answer, but goes off to the multitude, to declare that he can find no fault with Jesus. His busi-

the Jews, and saith unto them, I find [g] no fault in him. But ye have a custom that I [h] release unto you one at the passover, will ye therefore that I release unto you the king of the Jews? They all * cried out, therefore, again, saying, [i] Not this man, but Barabbas. Now Barabbas was a robber.

Then Pilate therefore took Jesus and [j] scourged him. And the soldiers plaited a [k] crown of thorns, and put it upon his head: and put a [l] purple robe on him: and they approached him and said, Hail, [m] king of the Jews! and they [n] smote him on the face. And Pilate went out again and saith unto them, Behold, I bring him out unto you, that ye may know that I find [o] no fault in him. Jesus, therefore, came forth, wearing the crown of thorn and the purple robe. And he saith unto them, [p] Behold the man! When, therefore, the chief priests and the officers saw him, they cried out, saying, [q] Crucify! crucify him! Pilate saith unto them, Take ye him and crucify him; for I find no fault in him. The Jews answered him, We have a law, and by our law he ought to die, because he [r] made himself the Son of God.

g cf. Matt. 27. 24. Lk. 23. 4. ch. 19. 4.
h Matt. 27 15, etc. Mk. 15. 6, etc. Lk. 23. 17, etc.
i cf. Acts 3. 14.
j Matt. 20. 19. Matt.27.26. Mk. 15. 15. Lk. 18. 33. cf. Is. 50. 6.
k Matt. 27. 29. Mk. 15. 17. cf. Gen. 3. 18. *cf.*Gal.3.10, 13.
l *cf.*Matt.27. 28. cf. Ex.26.1.
m cf. Ps. 69. 12.
n ch. 18. 22.
o ch. 18. 38. *cf.*Deut.32. 31.
p ver. 14. cf. Is. 40. 9.
q Matt. 27. 22.

* Some omit "all."

r ch. 5. 17, 18. cf. ch. 10. 30, 33; cf. Matt. 26. 33; cf. ch. 9. 35

ness was, in that case, only to release Him; but he seeks compromise with his conscience, instead of yielding to it, and, in what seems to him a way of escape from a difficult situation, puts the whole matter into the people's hands. Thus he makes it almost impossible to return to the path of righteousness from which he has departed, and proclaims himself openly as not of the truth.

But the people reveal themselves in a worse fashion still, and do what even a Pilate believes impossible. It is this impossibility upon which he reckons, only to find that he has shut for himself the door of escape which he had hoped to find. They immediately avail themselves of the opportunity to show their preference of a robber and murderer to their own glorious King. We have noticed elsewhere how strangely yet significantly this name Bar-Abbas, "son of the father," comes in here. It was the Son of the Father,—just as that,—whom they were refusing now; but of what father was this lawless one the son? A shadow it is, surely, of their awful apostasy to come, when they will receive him who comes in his own name, true child of the rebel and "murderer from the beginning" of whom the Lord had warned some before, in words which had cut deep into those who heard them, that they were the spiritual children. The works of their father they were indeed now doing.

Pilate, now in their hands, gives up Jesus to be scourged; hoping, however, as it would seem, by this, according to his former proposal (Luke xxiii. 22), to appease the people, that he might then release Him. In every compromise of this sort he only and miserably fails. John does not dwell upon all this: he mentions the scourging, the crown of thorns, the mockery of the purple robe; but these very briefly. By all this, Pilate vainly endeavors to awaken sympathy in behalf of the One whom again, to his own condemnation, he declares to be without fault. We may be sure, from his known character, he would have gladly found what would have justified him in pursuing with good will the course upon which he was now being urged unwillingly. Yet he emphatically reiterates that he finds no fault in Him. Israel it is who hound Him to the death; crying out what death,—the most cruel and ignominious one,—they have chosen

4 (xix. 8-11): Impotence of the one who has once yielded.

4. When Pilate, therefore, heard that word, he was the more [s]afraid, and went into the prætorium again, and saith unto Jesus, [t]Whence art thou? But Jesus gave him [u]no answer. Pilate, therefore, saith unto him, Speakest thou not unto me? Knowest thou not that I have [v]authority to release thee, and have authority to crucify thee? Jesus answered, Thou wouldst have no authority against me, except it were [w]given thee from above: therefore he that delivered me up to thee hath the [x]greater sin.

5 (xix. 12-16): A self-pronounced, but divine sentence.

5. Upon this Pilate [y]sought to release him; but the Jews cried out, saying, If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend: every one that maketh himself a king declareth [z]against Cæsar. When Pilate, therefore, [a]heard these words, he brought Jesus out, and sat down in the judgment-seat in a place that is called the Pavement, but in Hebrew Gabbatha. And it was the [b]preparation of the passover: it was about the sixth hour; and he saith unto the Jews, [c]Behold your king! But they cried out, [d]Away, away with him, crucify him! Pilate saith unto them, Shall I crucify your king? The chief priests answered, We have [e]no king but Cæsar. Then [f]delivered he him up therefore to them to be crucified.

s cf. Matt. 27. 19. cf. Acts 24. 25.
t cf. ch. 7. 27-29.
u cf. Is. 53. 7.
v cfr. 2 Sam. 23. 3.
w cf. Rom. 13. 1-7. cf. Dan. 2. 21. cf. Gen. 31. 29.
x cf. ch. 9. 41. cf. Matt. 21. 38.
y cf. Acts 3. 13. cf. Acts 24. 27.
z cf. Lk. 23. 2. cf ch. 18. 36.
a cf. ch. 12. 42, 43. cf. Prov. 29. 25.
b ch. 18. 28.
c ver. 5.
d Matt. 27. 22, 23. ver. 6.
e cfr. ch. 6. 15. cfr. Ps. 45. 1. cf. ch. 14. 30.
f cf. Acts 2 23. cf. Acts 4. 27, 28.

for Him. "Take ye Him and crucify Him," Pilate answers; "for I find no fault in Him." Then they bring out their real accusation: "We have a law, and by our law He ought to die; because He made Himself the Son of God." He must die, because He is what He is, and affirms it. He must die for the grace which has made Him become Man!

4. But Pilate is stricken again by such an accusation: for the legends of heathen superstition are revived at the suggestion, and he remembers, no doubt, that gods and sons of the gods had visited men, according to current beliefs, which he had perhaps too rashly discredited. Did He not carry Himself as if indeed divine? And there were other influences, as the dream of his wife, to make him tremble. He calls Him once more before him, and with an unaccustomed awe upon his spirit, asks Him, "Who art Thou?" He is not a weak man (save as the slave of his own lusts is weak); he is not easily moved to pity; nor is it pity now. He had mingled the blood of the Galileans with their sacrifices, and could have trampled these Jews down now remorselessly, had he not been in hands for the moment stronger than his own. So the Lord plainly and compassionately tells him now. He would have had no authority at all against Him, had it not been given him from above. God, (though moved in a way far different from men,) God had delivered Him up; and, alas! the Jew had found in this his opportunity, misconceive it as he might, to pour out the enmity of his heart upon the very One of whom all the ages prophesied, and whom he had been prepared by the voice of heaven's messengers continuously uttered to expect. The Jew had then, indeed, a greater sin than Pilate's: the actual traitor was but the representative of his nation then.

5. Pilate is shaken more than ever by the Lord's words, and again seeks to release Him; but he is not master of himself, and cannot be of others. The Jews know the man, and know their opportunity, and bring to bear upon him an argument that makes him plastic in their hands at once. God is a possibility indeed, but Rome is a certainty, and nearer at hand. "If thou let this Man go," they cry, "thou art not Cæsar's friend; every one that maketh himself a king declareth against Cæsar."

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chap. xix. 16-42.)

Humbling Himself to the cross.

SECTION 1. (Chap. xix. 16-30.)

Obedience perfected.

1 (16-18): Into the kingdom of death.

1. THEY took Jesus, therefore, and led him away; and he went forth, [g] bearing his cross for himself, to the place called the [h] place of a Skull, which is called in the Hebrew Golgotha, where they crucified him; and with him two others, on this side and on that side [one], and Jesus in the [i] midst.

g cf. Gen. 22. 6 cf. Mk. 15. 21, etc.

h Lk. 23. 33. cf. Rom. 5. 14.

i Matt. 27. 38 Mk. 15. 27, 28. cf. Lk. 23. 39-43.

"Pilate's playing with the situation," observes Lange, "is now past; now the situation plays with him. First he said—not asked,—What is truth? Now his frightened heart, to which the emperor's favor is the supreme law of life, says, What is justice?" He takes his place on the judgment-seat, therefore, and with what seems something between a taunt and a faint, final plea, says to the Jews, "Behold your King!" But they are only stung to madness: "Away! away with Him!" they cry, "Crucify Him!" "Shall I crucify your King?" he asks again; and now they are made in divine government to pass upon themselves the judgment under which they have ever since been lying: the chief priests answer, "We have no king but Cæsar."

It was not the verdict of the Jews alone, and they have not suffered alone. The whole world has been lying under the yoke which they have preferred to the easy yoke of Christ. They have often got very tired of Cæsar,—true; and, as we see by their fitful movements every now and then, would fain be rid of him. They are always crying, "Give us better government;" but all they can do is, with doubtful betterment, to divide him up into many little Cæsars; better, as they think, because weaker, and with divided interests, so that the balance of power may secure the even weights of justice. That is still an experiment, some think; but this chronic war is never peace, nor can be; and the reason is, men have refused the Prince of peace. Modify it, rename it, disguise it, as you please, the reign of Cæsar is the only alternative.

The struggle on Pilate's part is ended; he consents to the people's verdict; the Lord of life is adjudged to death,—to the death of the Cross.

SUBD. 2.

We have come now to the last step in this unequalled humiliation,—to the death of the Cross. We have seen the character of this in this Gospel to be that of the burnt-offering, which emphasizes on the one side His free obedience, on the other, our acceptance in the value of this. Both these will be found accordingly in what is before us now.

Sec. 1.

The first section shows us then His obedience unto death completed. John's presentation of all this is unique, both in what he gives and in what he omits. Details are little dwelt upon; a few points are brought into prominence, every one of which has its manifest bearing upon the general presentation. The simplicity and depth that everywhere pervade the Gospel are nowhere more conspicuous than they are here.

1. First, He comes, bearing His cross, to Golgotha, the place of a skull,—the place of the kingdom of death. This is plainly what the world is because of sin,—death being the stamp of the government of God upon it. For this the Lord sought it: here His love to men brought Him; only He could lift this burden from them, and for this He must come Himself under it. Those two others whom we well know, to whom death is clearly such a penalty, are on either side of Him, and He in the midst. Penalty it is He is taking; Himself on the division line

2 (19-22): His contested title maintained.

2. And Pilate wrote a [j]title, and put it upon the cross. Now there was written, JESUS THE NAZARENE, THE KING OF THE JEWS. Many of the Jews therefore read this title; for the place where Jesus was crucified was near to the city; and it was [k]written in Hebrew, Roman, Greek. The chief priests, therefore, said unto Pilate, Write not, The king of the Jews, but that he [l]said, I am king of the Jews. Pilate answered, [m]What I have written I have written.

3 (23, 24): Exposed and displayed.

3. The [n]soldiers, therefore, when they had crucified Jesus, took his garments and made four parts, to each soldier a part, and the coat:* now the coat was [o]seamless, woven from the top throughout. They said therefore to one another, Let us not [p]rend it, but cast [q]lots for it, whose it shall be: that the [r]scripture might be fulfilled which saith, They parted my garments among themselves, and for my vesture they cast the lot. These things therefore the soldiers did.

4 (25-27): Human & still.

4. Now there [s]stood by the cross of Jesus his mother and his mother's sister, Mary the wife of Clopas, and

* Or, "tunic."

[j] Matt. 27. 37. Mk. 15. 26. Lk. 23. 38.
[k] cf. ch. 4. 42. cf. Acts 2. 7, 8.
[l] cf. ver. 7. cf. ch. 18. 37.
[m] cf. Num. 23. 19, 20.
[n] Matt. 27. 35. Mk. 15. 24. Lk. 23. 34.
[o] cf. Ex. 28. 31, 32. cf. Heb. 7. 26. ctr. Gen. 3. 7.
[p] cf. Lk. 5. 36. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 17.
[q] cf. Prov. 16. 33. cf. Eph. 1. 4.
[r] Ps. 22. 18.
[s] cf. Matt. 27. 55, 56. Mk. 15. 40, 41. Lk. 23. 49.

between the saved and the unsaved, the Transformer of death into that which effects the transition from penalty to Paradise.

2. He comes thus into death as King,—"King of the Jews," indeed, but which in its full rendering implies so much. It faces the Jew, the Greek, the Roman, affirming to each in his own language, with a positiveness which His enemies vainly strive to set aside, a meaning for each one. Here is indeed God's King,—King in death as in life,—here in a peculiar way affirmed; His Cross henceforth to be the very sign of His power, the sceptre under which they bow, in adoring homage.

3. Now we see what indeed recalls the burnt-offering. This was flayed, that all beneath might be exposed, and its perfection seen. So now they strip the Lord, and expose Him. Here, in this Gospel alone, His seamless robe is spoken of, in figure that robe of righteousness which in Him was indeed seamless, but which now human hands have stripped from off Him, giving Him the malefactor's place instead. But how fully is He displayed by it in a righteousness which glorifies the righteousness of God itself, by penalty owned and taken in grace for others! It is not relaxed or modified, as many would teach, but taken in its full intensity of suffering; which alone would maintain the perfect righteousness of it. But thus He has a righteousness acquired as Man, which as Man He needs not. It is not His personal obedience in life, but in stooping to that which, because of His righteous life, could be no due of His. Thus it remains for the lot (which refers the whole disposal of it to the Lord) to decide whose it shall be. God has decided that it shall belong to the man of faith; and so the best robe in the Father's house is reserved for the returning prodigal; keeping nearer to what is before us here, let us say, to those who pierced His hands and feet, or drove the spear into His blessed side.

4. Amid it all, He has still the human tenderness which shows unchanged the Man Christ Jesus. His mother, standing by His cross, He commends to the care of His beloved disciple, the spiritual link being more than the natural, even while the natural is being recognized. Here, with one exception in the first chapter of Acts, we part with Mary; she is not mentioned in the after-books. In all the doctrine of the epistles she has no place. Blessed among women as she is surely by her connection with the human nature of our Lord, the entire Mary of Magdala. Jesus, therefore, seeing his mother, and the [t]disciple whom he loved standing by, saith unto his mother, Woman, [u]behold thy son! Then saith he to the disciple, Behold thy mother! And from that hour the disciple took her to his own home.

5 (28-30): "Finished."

5. After this, Jesus, knowing that all things were now finished, [v]that the Scripture might be accomplished, saith, I thirst. There stood there a vessel full of [w]vinegar: so, binding to hyssop a sponge full of vinegar, they raised it to his mouth. When Jesus therefore received the vinegar, he said, It is [x]finished; and he bowed his head and [y]delivered up his spirit.

[t] ch. 18. 15.
[u] cf. ch. 2. 4. cf. ch. 21. 15-17.
[v] ver. 24, etc.
[w] cf. Ps. 69. 21.
[x] cf. ch. 4. 34. cf. ch. 17. 4. cf. Heb. 10. 5-10. cf. Rom. 10. 4. cf. Gal. 3. 13. cf. Rom. 4. 4, 5.
[y] cf. Matt. 27. 50. cf. Mk. 15. 37; cf. Lev. 1. 1-9.

silence of Scripture as to her in that fulness of Christian truth which it was the office of the Spirit of truth to communicate is the decisive overthrow of the whole Babel-structure of Mariolatry which Romanism has built up upon a mere sand-foundation. She remains for us in the word of God, a simple woman rejoicing in God her Saviour,—a stone in the temple to His praise, and with no temple of her own. To use the grace of the Redeemer in taking flesh among us by her means to exalt the mother to the dishonor of Christ her Lord is truly a refined wickedness worthy of the arch-deceiver of mankind.

5. We find now the divine end reached, and as it only could be, by the divine way; the Lord Himself here declares the perfect accomplishment of all that Scripture has foretold, save one thing only, and in death, as in life, Scripture is for Him the authoritative word of the living God. As in the temptation He had refused to minister to His own need, apart from that by every word of which, He declared, man lives, so now, on the same principle, He makes known that need, not that it might be ministered to, but that Scripture might be fulfilled. He does not Himself fulfil it; God can be trusted to take care for that; but He gives utterance to the distress which will as uttered occasion the fulfilment. The terrible thirst of crucifixion is upon Him; but that is not enough to force the parched lips to speech; but it is written, "In My thirst they gave Me vinegar to drink:" this opens them. He will show Himself, as ever, in active obedience to the will of God, which He came to accomplish. He simply says, "I thirst:" and by the unsympathetic hands of those around His cross, the vinegar is tendered, and the prophecy fulfilled.

All is finished: and His own lips declare it. The very smallness, apparently, of this last matter cared for is absolute proof that no scripture whatever could be left as of no importance. The entire body of Old Testament prophecy is confirmed and certified with all the weight of Christ's authority. He had said before, "Scripture cannot be broken:" and we know exactly what for Him was "Scripture." Here, amid the intense sufferings of the cross, we see how completely He owned and was guided by it. That will of God which He came to do was here marked out for Him. The Law was in His heart; and in the very replacing of the Old Testament sacrifices by His one supreme sacrifice, (of which the psalm referred to speaks,) every part of this was honored and upheld. The Antitype necessarily confirmed the type He was displacing, and we have seen this in all the detail given us in the Gospels.

It is to His sacrificial work that the Lord undoubtedly has reference here. All scripture as to Himself was certainly not yet fulfilled; but the work of propitiation was accomplished, His words, of course, anticipating (as we have seen to be so much the character of the Gospel of John) the death which was now just before Him. The cup of wrath was, in fact, already drained, as the comparison of Mark and Luke fully assures us. The awful cry of forsaken sorrow which we find in the former has been already exchanged for the cry of "Father," with which the enjoyment of all that this endeared relationship implies has returned

SECTION 2. (Chap xix. 31-42.)
The Witness of Salvation.

1 (31-33): His righteousness affirmed.

1. THE Jews, therefore, since it was the [z]preparation, that the bodies might not remain upon the cross upon the sabbath (for that sabbath-day was a [a]great day) besought Pilate that their [b]legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away. The soldiers, therefore, came and brake indeed the legs of the first and of the other who was crucified with him; but when they came to Jesus and saw that he was [c]already dead, they brake not his legs.

2 (34-37): Expiation and cleansing in a dead Saviour.

2. But one of the soldiers with a spear [d]pierced his side, and immediately there came out [e]blood and [f]water. And he that saw it bare [g]witness, and his witness is true, and he knoweth that he saith what is true, that ye might [h]believe. For these things came to pass that the scripture might be fulfilled, A [i]bone of him shall not be broken. And again another scripture saith, [j]They shall look on him whom they pierced.

[z] ver. 42.
[a] cf. Ex. 12. 16. *cf.*ch.16.20.
[b] cf. Deut. 21. 23.
[c] *cf.*ch.10.18.
[d] cf. ch. 20. 25-27.
[e] cf. 1 Jno. 1. 7. cf. 1 Jno. 5. 6, 8.
[f] cf. Tit. 3.5. cf. Eph. 5. 26.
[g] *cf.*1 Jno.1. 1-3. *cf.*ch.21.24.
[h] ch. 20. 31.
[i] Ex. 12. 46. Num. 9.12. *cf.*Ps.34.20.
[j] Zech.12.10. *cf.*Rev.1.7.

also. Death remains yet, before full atonement is completed; for death and judgment are the double penalty upon man. Death, however, is governmental, not the necessary expression of divine holiness as against sin. Men may, therefore, die in the full favor of God; while the wrath of God would be impossible to be felt by one enjoying it. Death and the cup of wrath were both taken by the Lord; the latter first,—death following to complete the work; and thus now, at the moment of death, the Victor's cry, "It is finished." (See Introduction pp. 26–28.)

So He delivers up His spirit to the Father. We do not find Him, as in Luke, actually saying, "Father;" and this would seem more suited an utterance in the Gospel of the Manhood, than here, where (though not exclusively) the Only-begotten is set before us. Yet it is, as we know, to the Father that He commends it. Here He does not commend it, but delivers it up; He has power over it, as mere man has not; and the expression is stronger in this respect than that in Matthew, where the proper rendering is that "He dismissed" it. The expression in each Gospel is in the most perfect accordance with the character of each.

Sec. 2.

In the second section we have immediate witness to the salvation wrought; not the witness of men, as in the centurion in the other Gospels, but that of the divine word, that is, God's own testimony. This is what best suits John, as should be evident; the witness of the Spirit also being given in a special way: the Spirit, the water, and the blood unite together to declare that "God hath given us eternal life: and this life is in His Son."

1. First, we have the testimony of His perfect righteousness: He is the One fulfilling absolutely the Psalmist's words as to the righteous (Ps. xxxiv. 20), that Jehovah "keepeth all his bones; not one of them is broken." The shield thrown over Him is made more manifest by the commandment given as to those crucified here, that their legs should be broken, and they should be taken away. This is carried out as to the two malefactors; but with the Lord, His work accomplished, men have no more power over Him; there must be now no marring of even the outward form that has enshrined the symmetry of the spirit within. But this connects also with the paschal ordinance concerning the lamb, that "they shall not break a bone of it." Here the rough, untutored hands of lawless men religiously respect the legal ordinance, and declare the Christ they know not the Fulfiller of this redemption type. It is a testimony to His Person,

3 (38-42): Worshipping remembrance.

38. Now, after these things, [k]Joseph of Arimathea, being a disciple of Jesus, but [l]secretly for fear of the Jews, besought Pilate that he might take away the body of Jesus, and Pilate gave him leave. He came, therefore, and took away his body. And there came also [m]Nicodemus (who at first came to him by night) bringing a mixture of [n]myrrh and aloes about a hundred pounds weight. They took therefore the body of Jesus, and [o]wound it in linen clothes with spices, as is the custom of the Jews to bury. Now there was in the place where he was crucified a [p]garden; and in the garden a new sepulcre, wherein was man [q]never yet laid. There, therefore, they laid Jesus because of the Jews' preparation, because the sepulcre was near at hand.

k Matt. 27. 57-61. Mk. 15. 42-47. Lk. 23. 50-56.
l cf. ch. 7. 13. cf. ch. 12. 42.
m ch. 3. 2. ch. 7. 50.
n cf. Ps. 45. 8. cf. Song. 4. 14.
o cf. ch. 11. 44. cf. ch. 20. 7.
p cf. Gen. 2. 8. cf. ch. 18. 1. cf. Rev. 2. 7.
q cf. Mk. 11. 2. cf. Josh. 3. 3, 4. cf. Is. 53. 9.

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chaps. xx., xxi.)

The Apocalypse of Resurrection.

SECTION 1. (Chap. xx. 1-10.)

Alive!

20. AND on the [r]first day of the week cometh [s]Mary of Magdala early, while it was yet dark, unto the sepulcre, and seeth the stone taken away from the sepulcre. She runneth, therefore, and cometh to Simon r Matt. 28. 1, etc. Mk. 16. 1, etc. Lk. 24. 1, etc.

s cf. Mk. 16. 9.

as the next to come before us is a testimony to His work. It is the unblemished lamb that can alone be offered, and therefore the order is perfect here as elsewhere.

2. That which is bidden is not done; while that which is not bidden is done: for all is under higher government than man's. The word of God rules everywhere among and by means of those ignorant and those hostile. The thrust of the soldier's spear certifies the death so necessary to us against all docetism, while the act of hatred brings forth the answer of divine love,—the certification of redemption wrought. Out of Christ, as the riven Rock, flow the streams of spiritual healing; not water alone, as the apostle comments for us, but water and blood. The miraculous nature of the flow is clear from the way that it is insisted on,—the positive truth of it reiterated, the observation of the beloved disciple certified to us in his epistle afterwards as the witness of the Spirit of God. We want, therefore, no naturalistic explanations of a divine work on our behalf, "that ye might believe." Cleansing as well as expiation for men requires the death of Christ. The fulness of spiritual meaning we must seek where the apostle developes it, in his first epistle.

Israel are yet to look upon Him whom they have pierced, as the evangelist reminds us; and then a fountain will be opened to them for sin and for uncleanness. When they find the rift in the Rock, they will find the stream that flows from it; for them as for us, out of the heart of Christ.

3. No wonder that His body is wrapped in the spices now. Soon to rise, as He is, yet His death abides ever in the remembrance of His own in sweet and sacred significance. Blessed it is to see the timid becoming bold under its influence. Nicodemus is here with his hundred pounds of myrrh and aloes, to rival Joseph in his testimony of honor and affection for Him who has transformed death by His subjection to it. Only John mentions the great amount of spices, and that it is a garden in which is sown this seed of immortal life. While He is in the tomb, the Jews have their "preparation day," and a mockery of sabbath-rest. Of the reality of rest that has been wrought out for them, they are ignorant altogether.

Peter, and to the other disciple whom Jesus loved, and saith unto them, They have [t]taken away the Lord out of the sepulcre, and we know not where they have laid him. Peter therefore went forth, and the other disciple, and came to the sepulcre. And they ran both together, and the [u]other disciple outran Peter, and came first to the sepulcre. And, stooping down, he seeth the linen clothes lying, yet went he not in. Simon Peter cometh therefore also, following him, and [v]went into the sepulcre, and beholdeth the [w]linen clothes lying, and the [x]napkin that was upon his head, not lying with the linen clothes, but wrapped together in a place by itself. Then went in therefore the other disciple also, who came first to the sepulcre; and he saw and [y]believed; for yet they knew not the [z]scripture, that he must rise from among the dead. So the disciples [a]went away again unto their own home.

t vers.11-13. *cf.*Lk.24.21.
u ch. 21. 20.
v cf. ch.21.7.
w ch. 19. 40. *cf.*Eph.4.8.
x ctr. ch.11. 44.
y cf. ver. 31. cf. ch.21. 7.
z cf. Lk. 24. 24-26. ctr. Acts 2. 24-32.
a *cf.*ch.21.3.

SUBD. 3.

We may well entitle this last portion of the Gospel "the Apocalypse of Resurrection." No evangelist dwells upon this as John does. And though the cloud of unbelief is seen, which, in fact, clung to the disciples in these days of sorrow, and through which the glory dawning had to make its way, yet we are not allowed to be in the shadow of it, as is so much the case in Luke. We are not left so much at the threshold of the blessing, but conducted in. And thus, as it would seem, John, rather than Peter, is to abide with us, (though not, as the disciples thought, in personal presence, but in the truth committed to him) until the Lord's return.

Sec. 1.

The sabbath of the old creation passes in gloom and sorrow; the first day of the new week comes, and with it the First-born from among the dead, the Head of a new creation, abiding in the power of His immortal life. We have nothing of the futile guarding of the tomb, unworthy of record even here. The stone is rolled away; the sepulcre empty! No thought of the truth, however, flashes upon the mind of the early visitor who marks it all only as announcing a new calamity. They have taken her dead Lord out of the sepulcre; still and ever her Lord, though her heart be buried with Him. She runs with her burden of grief to pour it out to those as credulous in unbelief as she is; and Peter and John run back to the tomb, to find in the peace and order there the assurance that the absence of Christ's body from the place where reverent hands had laid it is not the work of man at all, but that He is truly risen from the dead. Scripture doctrine as to it they know of none:—only a resurrection at the last day, which was the orthodox faith that we have heard expressed by Martha. They themselves had questioned, as to what He had said about Himself, "what the rising from the dead should be." Still such a distinct special resurrection was a mystery to them; but the fact they were now convinced of: He was risen. They have thus lost interest in the sepulcre with its shadow,—still perplexed as they may be:—they go home.

But the first day of the week has found significance in a new beginning, beyond death which is the stamp upon the old creation,—the brand upon a fallen world. Man in Him has entered upon a new scene free from this; and they are linked with Him in it, though as yet they may not be able to define the place they have, or the nature of their link with Him. Nor have they as yet seen Him; nor has a word reached them from that unseen region into which He has entered.

SECTION 2. (Chap. xx. 11-18.)
Relationship in the new life.

BUT Mary stood [b]weeping at the sepulcre, outside; so, as she wept, she stooped, [and looked] into the sepulcre, and beholdeth two [c]angels in white sitting, one at the head, and one at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain. And they say unto her, Woman, why weepest thou? She saith unto them, Because they have [d]taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him. And having said these things, she turned back, and beholdeth Jesus standing, and [e]knew not that it was Jesus. Jesus saith unto her, Woman, why weepest thou? [f]whom seekest thou? She, supposing that it was the gardener, saith unto him, Sir, if thou hast borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away. Jesus saith unto her, [g]Mary. She turned and saith unto him in Hebrew, Rabboni: which is to say, Teacher. Jesus saith unto her, [h]Lay not hold upon me; for I have not yet [i]ascended to my Father; but go unto my [j]brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto [k]my Father, and [l]your Father, unto my God, and your God. Mary of Magdala cometh and bringeth [m]tidings to the disciples that she had seen the Lord, and that he had spoken these things unto her.

b ver. 13.
c cf. Lk. 24. 4.
d cf. Song 3. 2.
e cf. Lk. 24. 16.
f cf. ch. 1. 38. ctr. ch. 18. 4.
g cf. ch. 10. 3.
h ctr. Matt. 28. 9. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 16.
i Lk. 24. 51. cf. Heb. 4. 14, 15.
j cf. Heb. 2. 11.
k cf. ch. 17. 11.
l cf. Gal. 4. 6.
m cf. Lk. 24. 10, 11.

Sec. 2.

They go home, cheered though perplexed, to await what needs must follow. But there is one who cannot leave the place where she had last seen (though in what circumstances of distress) her Lord and Saviour. She has followed back to the sepulcre the quicker steps of the two men: coming too late, as it would seem, to learn from them the confidence they had gathered. Her own sight is too much dimmed with irrepressible tears, to gather it where they have done. Of resurrection, save at the far-off end-time, she has no expectation. But her heart clings, with a tenacity that nothing can divert or weaken, even to the Dead, by whose death she is desolate, but who survives in those indestructible memories which support and sadly light her through the gloom. Now she stands weeping outside the sepulcre, and, stooping down, looks into it. Was it a sight to prepare her for what would else have been too overwhelming a joy? Two angels in white are sitting, one at the head, the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain. They sit in peaceful contemplation of the place now vacant, and ask why she should be weeping, and whom she was seeking there. Absorbed with her one object, however, she seems scarcely to recognize the strangeness of the vision, but answers with the same story she had brought to the disciples, that men had taken away her Lord! Then she turns away again on a quest from which the presence of angels cannot distract her, to find, though she knows it not, Jesus Himself before her.

Spite of her ignorance,—spite of the unbelief which was in that ignorance,—Mary it was who was to be the first witness of His resurrection, the first evangelist of the new order of things which is established by it. A woman's heart had anointed Him for His burial; and this He would proclaim wherever the gospel should go out. Now again a woman's heart, more devoted than His foremost disciples, is to carry, in the energy of its new-born gladness, the message that has gladdened it to these, and to become, as it were, the apostle to apostles! How it tells us of the way in which the heart becomes the leader of the

SECTION 3. (Chap. xx. 19-23.)
The heavenly company, and their spiritual endowment.

WHEN, therefore, it was evening on that day, the [n] first of the week, and the [o] doors being shut where the disciples were, for [p] fear of the Jews, Jesus came and stood in the [q] midst, and saith unto them, [r] Peace be unto you. And having said this, he [s] showed unto them both his hands and his side. The disciples there-n cf. Acts 20. 7. cf. Rev. 1. 10.

o cf. Gen. 45. 1. cf. Rev. 1. 9. p cf. ch. 19. 38. cf. Acts 12. 12-17.
q ver. 26.
r ch. 14. 27; cf. Eph. 2. 17.
s cf. Col. 1. 20; Lk. 24. 40.

mind into the truth of God, and of the displacement of mere officialism in the Christian order.

Yet, after all, how little had Mary appreciated the One she loved with such heart-felt devotion! and her unbelief it is that, as with those upon the road to Emmaus afterward, holds her eyes when at first she sees the so eagerly desired object. He has to repeat to her the angels' question, why she is weeping, and whom she is seeking there among the dead. Can she indeed be so dull? Can we, alas, who have so much less excuse than Mary? How much of our sorrow which seems most to spring from our love of Him, is yet due in fact to our little appreciation of Him? Do we not also seek the Living One as if He were dead, and dishonor Him in our very worship of Him? Thus Mary repeats her wail to her unknown Lord Himself, and can take Him for the gardener, whose Voice had freed her once from the sevenfold power of the enemy which held her. Yet withal what a right she doubts not she has in Him, whom she seems to think the whole world must know at once: "Sir, if thou hast borne Him hence, tell me where thou hast laid Him, and I will take Him away!" But the Good Shepherd calls His sheep by name, and they know His Voice. He recalls her to herself, and so to Himself: "Mary!" and her heart is at rest. "Rabboni," she says; that is, "Teacher!" How blessed to learn, at His feet, like this!

She learns, not only that He is risen, but of a relationship that His resurrection has brought His people into. He is not ashamed to call them "brethren," and in the recognition of that which His work has done for them, and which is theirs in the life they have in Him, He ascends to His Father and their Father, to His God and to theirs. Mary must not, therefore, think to hold Him, as her love would desire; while the purpose of God is revealing itself in fuller and higher blessing than ever known before.

He had never yet called His disciples "brethren;" although this was the fulfillment of what had been prophetically announced long since. The sin-offering psalm (Ps. xxii.), which so fully depicts the sufferings through which Messiah was to pass, gives us from the lips of the same Sufferer, when delivered, the assurance, "I will declare Thy name unto My brethren; in the midst of the assembly I will praise Thee." We have heard, accordingly, already that declaration of the Father's name, on which, in His final prayer before His betrayal, He so dwells. The relationship to Himself, and so to the Father, which is implied on their part, is only now for the first time explicitly made known. Himself as man the "First-born among many brethren," yet, except the Corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone. Thus He is straitened till it be accomplished, and only now can the full reality be told out. As has been often noticed, He cannot, however, put them upon the same level with Himself. He does not say, "Our Father," but "My Father and yours;" He maintains the place which of necessity belongs to Him, while giving them their own upon the basis of this.

Sec. 3.

It is practically, therefore, as the First-born among many brethren that Mary's message announces Him. And now we find Him in the midst of the assembly, the blessing still enlarging as He declares it to them. There is nothing indeed about the Church in this Gospel, whether as the House of God or the Body of fore were [t]glad, when they saw the Lord. Jesus said therefore unto them again, Peace be unto you: [u]as the Father sent me forth, I also send you. And having said this, he [v]breathed into them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the [w]Holy Spirit: whosesoever sins ye [x]remit, they are remitted unto them: whosesoever ye [y]retain, they are retained.

t ch. 16. 22. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 3, 8.
u ch. 17. 18. cf. Matt. 28. 18-20.
v cf. Gen. 2. 7. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 45.
w cf. ch. 7. 39. cf. Lk. 24.

49. x cf. Matt. 16. 19; cf. Matt. 18. 18; cf. Acts 22. 16. y cf. Acts 5. 3-10; cf. 1 Cor. 5. 11-13.

Christ. In John we have only the Family of God, as far as doctrine goes, the line of truth which is plainly in natural connection with that of eternal life so characteristic of the Gospel. With this is found that of the indwelling Spirit, which gives to the life itself, always belonging to the children of God, its "abundant" blessedness. These are the connected truths all through, which connect with every other. We shall find them in this closing portion as elsewhere.

The evening of the first day of the week is come, and the disciples are gathered together. Let us note that this is either not reckoned in the Jewish manner, or else it is the closing evening of the Jewish day, which was from the decline of the day to sunset. Sunset was thus "between the evenings," which was the time when the passover lamb was offered, as well as the daily evening sacrifice (Ex. xii. 6; xxx. 8). At this time, then, were the disciples gathered; the doors being shut for fear of the Jews; the world being armed against the Prince of peace. But no shut doors can keep Him from His own; and presently He is among them: "Jesus came and stood in the midst, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you." More than words, even of the Son of God, were needed to convey this. His word had created the worlds: but for redemption, He had said Himself, "the Son of man must be lifted up." That divinest work of all had been accomplished, and He can show them still the proofs of it in His hands and side. John says nothing of their unseemly fear, but of the joy into which it passed: "then were the disciples glad, when they saw the Lord."

And again He says, "Peace be to you," and sends them out into the world, to represent Him in it, as He had been sent into it to represent the Father. They belonged no more to it, as He had said to them before:—no more than He did. The world could not be at peace, nor those whose hearts were in it. They had been delivered from the corruption that was in it through lust, by the knowledge of Himself whom the world had rejected. Their portion was outside of it with Him: and thus they would be competent witnesses of that better part, and for Him who had enriched them with it from His voluntary poverty.

He follows these words with a significant action, breathing into them, and saying, "Receive ye the Holy Spirit;" with regard to which both the words and action have received various interpretation. We must, therefore, examine them with some care, the more because the symbolic action seems undoubtedly to point to something beyond the present capacity of the disciples to understand,—something, therefore, left to come to light afterwards. He does not Himself interpret His action, except the words accompanying are that interpretation. And this they can hardly be, much as they throw light upon it. We are left, therefore, to the natural significance of what is given us, seen in the light of truth revealed elsewhere, remembering that no parable can be authority for doctrine.

After all, the Lord's breathing into them carries us necessarily back to the inbreathing of God into the first man. The very word used here, and which occurs nowhere else in the New Testament, is that used in the Septuagint for this primal act, by virtue of which Adam became a living soul. Here then should be a new beginning of life, which, as such, must be from God, but from God incarnate; and with this we are already familiar, as truth that He Himself has taught us, that "as the Father hath life in Himself, so hath He given to the

SECTION 4. (Chap. xx. 24-31.)
A glance at the earthly company.

BUT [s]Thomas, one of the twelve, called Didymus, was not [a]with them when Jesus came. The other disciples, therefore, said unto him, We have seen the Lord. But he said unto them, Except I [b]see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and put my hand into his side, I will not be-

s ch. 11. 16.
a cf. Num. 9. 13. cf. Heb. 10. 25.
b cf. ch. 4. 48. cf. Zech. 12. 10.

Son to have life in Himself;" so that, "as the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them, so the Son quickeneth whom He will" (chap. v. 21, 26). The Son is thus a true fountain of life for men, and, as the words declare, a divine life.

We cannot but connect this with a title given to the Lord, though not in John, of "Last Adam" (1 Cor. xv. 45): "The Last Adam is made a quickening Spirit." The contrast between the first and the Last, which we realize in His present action, is recognized and emphasized here. He is not Himself breathed into, as was the first man, but breathes into others. As the quickening Spirit, He communicates spiritual, divine life, such as we have seen to be the essential element in new birth. He is thus the Author of what is a new creation, higher in character than the old; and this is clearly what is symbolized in His present action.

Its place with reference to His work now finished is just as evident. He has told us already that, "except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit." Here, then, is this now from the other side declared. It is not, as sometimes put, a question of union, but of what is more fundamental than this. The fruit of the corn of wheat is that of life communicated, but which passes through what both the Lord and His apostle afterwards call "death" to produce it (chap. xii. 24; 1 Cor. xv. 36). It is now, therefore, that He takes openly the place of the Last Adam. Life must come to man out of death, and in no other way; for death is the penalty of sin, and he is a sinner. But thus also, as springing out of this, vicariously endured, it comes accompanied with the efficacy of atonement made: he who receives it "hath eternal life, and doth not come into judgment, but is passed out of death into life" (chap. v. 24). The fundamental truths of the Gospel of John are thus embodied in this inbreathing by the risen Saviour.

But then it is, necessarily, of something that His disciples have before received that He is speaking to them in it. The giving of life could not actually wait for His resurrection. The Cross, standing amid the ages, looks backward as well as forward. And the Lord, in speaking of His communication of the life in Him, takes care to assure us of this. "The hour is coming," He says, "and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live" (chap. v. 25). And when afterwards He speaks of what is (now) characteristic of eternal life,—that they "know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent," He declares at the same time that this knowledge they already had (chap. xvii. 6-8). There can be nothing plainer, then, than that the Lord is not here communicating to His disciples what they had not received before, but that He is simply putting together in this symbolic manner things that were, in fact, already theirs. Every thing is emerging now from the obscurity of Moses' veil (2 Cor. iii. 13) into the open glory of Christ's face unveiled.

Now when the Lord goes on to say in plain speech, "Receive ye the Holy Spirit," it should be as plain that He is not interpreting the past, but speaking of something they had not yet received. The evangelist, when reporting to us His words at the feast of tabernacles as to the "living water," remarks that "this spake He of the Spirit, which they that believed on Him should receive;" and then he adds, "for the Holy Spirit was not yet, because Jesus was not yet glorified." Here, as far as words can show it, the same reception of the Spirit lieve. And after eight days, his disciples were again within, and Thomas with them: Jesus cometh, the doors being shut, and stood in the midst, and saith, [c]Peace be unto you. Then saith he to Thomas, [d]Reach hither thy finger, and see my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and put it into my side; and be not faithless, but believing. Thomas answered and said unto him, [e]My Lord and my God! Jesus saith unto him, Because thou hast [f]seen me thou hast believed; [g]blessed are they who have not seen, and yet have believed.

c ver. 19.
d cf. ver. 20.
e cf. ch. 1. 1, 49. cf. ch. 9. 35-38. cf. Phil. 2. 10, 11.
f ver. 25.
g cf. Rom. 4. 18-20.

is spoken of. But here also a time is given before which the Spirit could not be received. Jesus must be first glorified, says the apostle. If, then, the Lord was not yet glorified at the time in which He uttered the words we are considering, these must still have had a reference to the future: that is, to that Pentecostal gift of the Spirit, to which, perhaps, we should be naturally inclined to refer them.

Now, when we remember the Lord's previous declaration that He must go away to the Father, or else the Advocate would not come to them (chap. xvi. 7), there can be no right question that this glorifying of Jesus was His being glorified with the glory which He had with the Father before the world was (chap. xvii. 5). The fact, then, that He was upon earth when now speaking to them would be sufficient proof that the reception of the Spirit, of which He was speaking was, in fact, Pentecostal. Yet it has been imagined even that the Lord had already ascended to the Father between the time when He had said to Mary that He had not yet done so and His being here in the midst! For, they say, He forbade Mary to touch Him, because not ascended, while here and elsewhere He freely permits it. But this is simply a misinterpretation of His words to Mary, and His going to the Father is always spoken of as implying His absence from His people during the present time. Such an imaginary ascension, for which not a single direct scripture can be quoted, and which would displace that which is always spoken of as such, cannot possibly, therefore, be maintained.

But, we are told by others, the article should be omitted in the Lord's words here, and therefore they intimate, not the Spirit as personally coming at Pentecost, but a bestowment of spiritual energy simply, which raises the life communicated to its proper resurrection power. We are not yet arrived where this question can be fully discussed, which can only be in Romans, but the lack of scripture for it is the most fatal objection. As to the absence of the article, it is absent also in that which was just now quoted from the seventh chapter, where we must read, according to this, "for Holy Spirit," or, as many read, simply "Spirit was not yet." But this would then deny the possibility of any such bestowment before the Lord's ascension. This would be altogether fatal to any such interpretation. Besides which, the Holy Spirit, (or, if it be preferred, simply Holy Spirit) cannot be shown to be anywhere identified with life, or any degree of it. I am aware that "the Spirit is life" (Rom. viii. 10) may be cited against me; but that is plainly the personal Spirit. The only proper force of the words, therefore, is that the Spirit is life potentially,—is the Source of it,—to the children of God. The Spirit does not stand there for the life: nor for any grade or character of life; all the more surely, that it gives it character.

"Receive ye the Holy Spirit," means, then, simply what it says, and cannot be the interpretation of the inbreathing which precedes the words, and which do evidently speak of the giving of life; not, however, of a communication of it there and then, but of one they had already received, and by which they had become a new creation. Creation is not an increase of life, but a beginning of it, as is plain. They had received life, as we have seen, and eternal life. It is now seen as bringing them into new creation, delivering them therefore from

Yea, and many [h]other signs also did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book; but these are written that ye may [i]believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have [j]life through his name.

[h] ch. 21. 25.
[i] cf. ch. 11. 15.
[j] ch. 3. 15, 16. cf. 1 Jno. 5. 10-12.

the old; and so from sin and judgment, as connected with it. Now they are qualified to receive the Spirit, to be the power indeed of the new life as resurrection life, with the value of Christ's blessed work for God attaching to it.

Sin is thus for them put away: they belong to a Kingdom of life and not of death, and of righteousness as inseparably connected with this. They are to be representatives of this now upon earth, remitting or retaining sins in His Name, and by His authority; not, surely, in relation to heaven and its blessedness, as has been monstrously claimed by the false church; but in relation to the sphere of His earthly interests. This is a seal upon the higher blessing into which He has introduced them; the reception of the Spirit being their qualification for it, and the condition therefore implied that they act in the power of that endowment.

Sec. 4.

Here then we have the heavenly company:—not exactly the Church; at least, not as the Body of Christ, or the House of God; things which are not in the line of the apostle's teaching. But the Spirit which they are to receive sufficiently marks them out as those who, in fact, belong to that which is the gathering together of the children of God, before scattered abroad (chap. xi. 52). But we have seen also that John cannot forget (or the Spirit of God as speaking through him) that there are promises of blessing for the earth, and therefore to an earthly people, which He will fulfil in their entirety to them. We have had glances at this already, again and again, and now we have another. Thomas, called Didymus, (both names meaning "a twin,") though one of the twelve, was not with them when Jesus came. We may easily believe that the unbelief which he so conspicuously exhibits, may have hindered his being with them at that memorable time. How many glorious opportunities do we not lose from such a cause? Not even the testimony of all the others is sufficient to make him credit so marvelous a tale. Like Israel, he must look upon the Pierced One, or he will not believe. The week passes, therefore, with Thomas unbelieving still; just as the present time with Israel. But on the eighth day, the first of the new week, the disciples are again together, and now Thomas is with them: Jesus comes once more, the doors again being shut, and stands in the midst, and says again, "Peace be unto you." And now Thomas may satisfy himself; but he is broken down in adoring wonder: "My Lord and my God!" he exclaims, as, thank God, at last the nation will; but to find that he has lost, not time alone, but the higher blessing: "Thomas," says the Lord, "because thou hast seen Me, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed."

The apostle adds here that the object of his writing was to awaken and encourage faith in Jesus as the Christ, the Son of God; that thus men might have life in His Name. For this purpose, he had not attempted an impossible relation of all the signs that Jesus had done. These were innumerable; nor is a faith founded merely upon miracles a sufficient faith (chap. ii. 23–25). His aim had been that the divine glory of the Lord should appear; so that His Name—the display of Himself, might prove its power for this, as it alone could do. Acquaintance with the Son of God! Ah, is not this, indeed, the need we have, one and all? is it not here all need shall be supplied?

Sec. 5.

After the Jew is brought into blessing and the appearing of the Lord in their behalf, blessing will, as we know, go out to the nations, the judgments that are

SECTION 5. (Chap. xxi. 1-14.)
Man as man—the Gentile—with God.

AFTER these things Jesus manifested himself again to the disciples at the [k]sea of Tiberias: and in this manner he manifested himself. There were together Simon Peter, and Thomas called Didymus, and Nathanael who was of [l]Cana of Galilee, and the sons of Zebedee, and two others of his disciples. Simon Peter saith unto them, I go a [m]fishing. They say unto him, We also go with thee. They went forth and entered into the ship, and that night they caught [n]nothing. And when the [o]morning was already coming on, Jesus stood on the shore: the disciples however [p]knew not that it was Jesus. Therefore Jesus saith unto them, Children,* have ye any thing to eat? They answered him, No. And he said unto them, [q]Cast the net on the right side of the ship, and ye shall find. They cast therefore, and now they were not able to draw it for the multitude of fishes. Therefore that disciple whom Jesus loved saith unto Peter, It is the [r]Lord. When, therefore, Simon Peter, heard that it was the Lord, he girded on his outer garment, (for he was naked) and [s]cast himself into the sea; and the other disciples came in the boat, (for they were not far from land, but only about two hundred cubits), dragging the net of fishes.

k ch. 6. 1.
l ch. 2. 1.
m cf. ch. 20. 10. cfr. Acts 6. 2.
n cf. Lk. 5. 3-7.
o cf. 1 Jno. 2. 8.
p ch. 20. 14.
q cf. ch. 9. 7.
r cf. Lk. 24. 30, 31.
s cf. ch. 20. 6. cf. ch. 13, 37.

* The form of the question suggests a negative answer.

inflicted upon the world preparing the way for this, as the prophet says, "When Thy judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness" (Isa. xxvi. 9). Restored Israel will then be the centre from which living waters will go forth to water the earth; and, as their casting away has been for the reconciling of the world, the receiving of them shall be, in the words of the apostle, "life from the dead" (Rom. xi. 15). To this the closing scenes in this Gospel now carry us on, in what has evidently the character of a supplementary part. For, as another has remarked, here "we find ourselves upon the ground of the historic Gospels; that is to say, that the miracle of the draught of fishes identifies itself with the work of Christ on earth, and is in the sphere of His former association with His disciples. It is Galilee, not Bethany. It has not the usual character of the doctrine of this Gospel, which presents the divine Person of Jesus, outside all dispensation, here below; raising our thoughts above all such subjects. Here, at the end of the Gospel, the Evangelist comes for the first time on the ground of the synoptics, of the manifestation and coming fruits of Christ's connection with earth. Thus the application of the passage to this point is not merely an idea which the narrative suggests to the mind, but it rests upon the general teaching of the Word." (Synopsis.)

As in the final parable of the seven in Matt. xiii. the net is cast into the waters of the nations, those of the disciples in one way or another most prominently connected with Israel being foremost among the fishers now. Thus Peter, the leading apostle to the circumcision, is conspicuous all through. Next to him, we have Thomas named, and then Nathanael, both typical representatives of Israel in the latter days. The connection of Nathanael with Cana of Galilee, where the water was made wine, is noted also for the first time. Only the sons of Zebedee are named besides. Peter leads, but there is unsuccessful

As soon, therefore as they went on shore, they saw a 'fire of coals there,* and fish lying thereon and bread. t cf. ch. 18. 18.
Jesus saith unto them, Bring of the fish which ye have now caught. Simon Peter, therefore, went on board and drew the net to land full of great fishes, a hundred and fifty and three; and although there were so many,
the net was "not rent. Jesus saith unto them, "Come u ctr. Lk. 5. 6.
and dine.† But none of the disciples durst inquire of v cf. ch. 6. 10.
him, Who art thou? knowing it was the Lord. Jesus therefore cometh and "taketh the bread and giveth w cf. Lk. 24. 30, 31.
them, and the fish likewise. This is now the *third x cf. ch. 20. 19, 26.
time that Jesus manifested himself to the disciples,
after that he was risen from among the dead.

* Literally, "lying." † Literally, "break your fast."

toiling through the night, until with the morning Jesus stands upon the shore. Then at His "Cast the net upon the right side of the ship, and ye shall find," they do find, acting upon His word, a great multitude of fishes. Yet it is noted that the net holds together: "Christ's millennial work is not marred. . . . That which He performs does not rest on man's responsibility as to its effect here below: the net does not break. Also, when the disciples bring of the fish that they have caught, the Lord has some already there. So shall it be on earth at the end. Before His manifestation He will have prepared a remnant for Himself upon the earth; but after His manifestation He will gather a multitude also from the sea of nations;" which "the sea of Tiberias," bearing the name of the Cæsar whom man has chosen for his king, may fitly image.

Peter, prominent all through, not only presents, as already said, the Jewish ministry which will be used in this, but it is to be remarked how in keeping with it is the work of restoration needed in his own soul. He also has denied his Master, as Israel has, and has to be brought back after such terrible failure, yet is put again into the place he might seem irretrievably to have lost.

Thus we see in this section man as man, apart from all covenant privilege, brought to God. Judgment itself will work out the purposes of grace; and thus also will it be seen that grace truly reigns: although that which is for God a "strange work" must still, alas! have its place, as we shall see clearly in the day that comes.

Sec. 6.

What follows now to the end of the Gospel takes a different turn. In it we may see, not obscurely, the foreshadow of the passing away of the ministry to the circumcision, Peter being still the representative of this, in contrast with John, who in his covers the whole interval until Christ's return. This requires to be looked into, however, while upon the surface may be seen the instructive history of a soul exercised under the tender but searching eye of Christ,—the exemplification of that process of cleansing to have part with Him, which He Himself has depicted for us under the symbol of feet-washing. This is fully in the line of John's special teaching, and its importance may well claim from us most earnest consideration.

The searching of Peter's soul which comes now before us is not the first step by any means towards his recovery. Evident as this is, it needs to be emphasized because of a very general mistake that is made with regard to it. The Lord's words to him in view of his sin, not yet committed, disclose, on the other hand, that which is the fundamental need of one who has fallen as he had. "I have prayed for thee," says He, "that thy faith fail not." With our hand in His, in the self-distrust which is the fruit of true self-knowledge, we should be surely guided and safely guarded. In Peter we see, at the very time when the Lord's warning words are uttered, the indications of his danger: "Though

SECTION 6. (Chap. xxi. 15-19.)
Peter; the shortened Jewish Ministry.

SO WHEN they had dined,* Jesus saith unto Simon Peter, [y]Simon, son of Jonas, lovest† thou me more than these? He saith unto him, Yea, Lord, thou [z]knowest that I have affection‡ for thee. He saith unto him, [a]Feed my lambs. He saith unto him again the second time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? He saith unto him, Yea, Lord, thou knowest that I have affection for thee. He saith unto him, [b]Tend my sheep. He saith unto him the third time, Simon, son of Jonas, hast thou affection for me? Peter was [c]grieved because he said unto him the third time, Hast y cf. Matt. 26. 33.

z cf. ch. 2. 25.
a cf. 1 Pet. 2. 2. cf. Is. 40. 11.
b cf. 1 Pet. 5. 1-3. cf. Acts 20. 28.
c cf. ch. 13. 38.

* Literally, "breakfasted." † Αγαπας, a strong term.
‡ φιλέω, the love of friendship.

all should be offended," he says, "yet will I never be offended. I am ready to go with Thee to prison and to death." This is a condition which not only exposes one to fall, but for which the fall itself may be the only remedy. We have to learn that when we are weak only are we strong; and that Christ's strength is made perfect in weakness. Peter's case is a typical one; and thus it is so valuable for us. The Lord Himself, in such a case as this, cannot pray that Peter may not fall, but that he may be "converted" by it,—turned from that dangerous self-confidence to consciousness of his inability to trust himself, even for a moment. Here Satan is foiled and made to serve the purpose of that grace which he hates and resists. He can overpower this self-sufficient Peter; but only to fling him for refuge upon his omnipotent Lord. Just as "the messenger of Satan to buffet" Paul works for what he in no wise desires, to repress the pride so ready to spring up in us, and which the lifting up to the third heaven might tend to foster. Here there had been no fall, and all was overruled for fullest blessing; in Peter's case, on the other hand, Satan's effort would be to assail the fallen disciple with suggestions of a sin too great to be forgiven,—or, at least, for restoration to that eminent place from which it would be torture to remember he had fallen. What he needed to meet this was faith; and this, therefore, the Lord prays might not fail with him.

How careful is He to revive and strengthen in the humbled man the practical confidence so needful! The knowledge of it all given him before-hand,—of the prayer made for him,—of the exhortation addressed to him when restored, to "strengthen his brethren,"—all this would be balm indeed for his wounded soul; but even this was not enough for his compassionate Lord. The first message of His resurrection has to be addressed specially "to Peter," (Mk. xvi. 7,) and "to Cephas" himself He appears, before the twelve (1 Cor. xv. 5). Thus he will not shrink back when they are all seen together. When we find him now at the sea of Tiberias, it is easy to realize that all this has done its work. Told that it is the Lord who is there upon the shore, he girds on his outer garment, and casts himself into the sea, impatient to meet his Lord. But now it is he is ready, only now, for that so necessary dealing with his conscience, when his heart is fully assured. On the shore a fire of coals is burning, the only other time when we read of such a thing beside being when he had warmed himself at a similar one at that time which he never will forget. Yet it would seem as if Christ had forgotten it. He adds no word, but makes him sit down there in company with Himself and it,—a silent preacher, not the less effectual.

They have dined, and now the living Voice begins. Where does it begin? where the preacher to his conscience left it? No; not a word of this. Nothing is said for a moment about this fall; there is no charge,—scarcely, one would thou affection for me? And he said unto him, Lord, thou [d]knowest all things; thou knowest that I have affection for thee. Jesus saith unto him, [e]Feed my sheep. Verily, verily, I say unto thee, When thou wast young, thou girdedst thyself, and walkedst whither [f]thou wouldst, but when thou shalt be old thou shalt [g]stretch forth thy hands and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldst not. And this he said, [h]signifying by what manner of death he should glorify God. And when he had spoken this, he said unto him, [i]Follow me.

[d] cf. 1 Cor. 4. 3, 4.
[e] ver. 15. cf. ch. 10. 9.
[f] cf. vers. 3, 7.
[g] cf. ch. 19. 18.
[h] cf. 2 Pet. 1. 14.
[i] cf. Matt. 4. 19. cf. Matt. 16. 24.

say, a reminder—of what the preacher before had taken for his text. A quiet and a tender question it is now, and from One whose love has been more and more rising upon him, till now it is full day, brightness and warmth together. "Simon, son of Jonas," says the Voice now, with its familiar and yet ever growing fulness of meaning for him, "Simon son of Jonas, lovest thou Me more than these?"

One cannot help but see that the Lord is recalling to Peter, and yet not as if He would recall them, his fervent but boastful words, that, though all should be offended, yet he would not be. He will not charge him with them, but only let him himself recall them in the light of what deeper knowledge he has acquired, that he may now give judgment as to them. But Peter simply declines the comparison. He is content with affirming his love, though not in the terms of the question put. The Lord cannot allow it, therefore, to rest there, but repeats His question in a briefer and more pointed way. Peter again affirms, and again the Lord presses him upon his own chosen ground; and now Peter's heart bursts out: "Peter was grieved because He said unto him the third time, Lovest thou Me? And he said unto Him, Lord, Thou knowest all things; Thou knowest that I love Thee." This threefold repetition connects Peter's boastful affirmation with his repeated denials in the high priest's palace. Root and fruit are connected together, so that he may the better trace that connection, and Peter's answer testifies of the omniscience that has searched him out. "Lord," he says, "Thou knowest all things!" but that only deepens the conviction that while he had signally failed to manifest his love in outward act, yet He who knew all could read it in his heart.

The Lord's questions vary, however, more than we have yet taken into account. In the first two He uses a different word for "love" from that which He uses the third time, but which is that which Peter uses throughout. The latter is the term for affection, ardent and heartfelt, but, it may be, unintelligent and unappreciative also. The former is a love guided and sanctioned by a deliberate judgment. Both terms are used in a bad sense as well as a good, and the more discriminating and deliberate love is, the worse it is, if set upon evil. Yet this intelligent love which can give a reason to itself is otherwise the higher quality. It is the love of the spirit, as Scripture would put it, as Peter's word expresses that of the soul; and although the Father is said in both ways to love the Son, yet when it is said, "God is Love," the word used is necessarily the former.

The Lord then uses this higher term first, and descends afterwards to the lower, thus searching out Peter more and more. In the first place too, He adds, "more than these do," (the other disciples,) but then asks, "Dost thou love Me?" as if He would say, "at all?" And when Peter still urges his, "Thou knowest I have affection for Thee;" He at last takes him up even there, and asks, "Hast thou affection for Me?" Then the disciple's heart gushes out. Even this slighter "affection," alas! might be questioned now:—for had not mere friend braved and done more for friend than he for his Lord and Saviour? Yes, but He who knew all things would not judge him as men might. He dares not

SECTION 7. (Chap. xxi. 20-25.)
John completing the interval till the coming of Christ.

PETER, turning about, seeth the [j]disciple whom Jesus loved following, who also leaned on his breast at supper, and said, Lord, who is he that delivereth thee up? Peter, therefore, seeing him, saith unto Jesus, Lord, and [k]what as to this man? Jesus saith unto him, If I

[j] ch. 13. 23.

[k] cf. Rom. 4. 14. cf. Gal. 2. 7-9.

now say that he loves more than others,—dares profess nothing as to the quality of his love at all: let the Lord judge, who would not too severely;—who has not been driven from him by all that He has seen in him: yet, be it what it may, he has affection.

His self-judgment is complete. Searched out under the divine eye, he is found and owns himself, not better but worse than others, so self-ignorant that he cannot claim quality for his love at all; only something he is conscious of, which even so, in his utter failure to manifest it, omniscience alone might see.

The needed point is reached, the strong man converted to weakness is now fit to strengthen his brethren; and, as Peter descends step by step the ladder of humiliation, step by step the Lord follows him with assurance of the work for which he is destined. "Feed My lambs," He says, "tend My sheep," "feed My sheep." He, the faithful Shepherd, who could give His life for them, could yet confide these sheep, so dear to Him, into the hands of this humbled, ruined man. How sweet and assuring this grace to Simon Peter, as to us all! Now indeed he answers to his name: he is the "hearkener, son of the Dove," and is risen out of the ruin which will yet abide with him in cherished memory for ever. God, who is the God of resurrection, has performed this.

But the Lord does not even stop here. He goes back to that fervent protestation that Peter is ready to follow Him to prison and to death. He has missed his opportunity, but he shall retrieve it yet, and show what divine grace has indeed made Christ to be to him. Sealing it with His strong manner of affirmation, He declares, "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, When thou wast young, thou girdedst thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldst; but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldst not." "This spake He," says he who had been witness of it, "signifying by what death he should glorify God. And, when He had spoken this, He saith unto him, Follow Me."

In the strength of nature he had not been competent. Mere flesh and blood will ever fail in the battles of the Lord. Yet He who has enjoined upon us the taking forth the precious from the vile, knows how to discern amid whatever may be mingled with it that which is truly of Him. Peter shall regain his lost opportunity, and yet have the privilege accorded him of dying for his Saviour. As a veteran in such warfare, he shall die upon the battlefield, and follow Christ through the gateway by which He left the conflict for the eternal joy.

It is in the contrast with John which follows we are made to realize that Peter is here also the representative of that ministry to the circumcision which was, as we know, in a principal way committed to him. That ministry ended as a distinct thing with the scattering of the people when Jerusalem was taken and destroyed by the Romans. The times of possible restoration held out to them by the reception of the Crucified One, lengthened out by the longsuffering mercy of God for many years, though more and more realized as hopeless, was then ended in terrible judgment. Henceforth to the end of the times of the Gentiles, as our Lord announced, Jerusalem would be trodden down by them. While it is, of course, true that the gospel goes out to men everywhere, without distinction of persons, and that only "blindness in part" is happened to Israel, the nation as such is for the present set aside. The testimony characteristic of the time of God's longsuffering is therefore set aside also.

will that he abide [t]until I come, what is that to thee? Follow thou me. This saying therefore went abroad among the brethren, that that disciple [m]was not to die; yet Jesus said not unto him, He is not to die; but, If I will that he abide until I come, what is that to thee?

This is the disciple who [n]testifieth of these things, t cf. ch. 14.3. cf. 1 Thess. 1. 10. cf. 1 Thess. 5. 23.

m cf. 1 Cor. 15. 51. cf. 1 Thess. 4. 15, 17.
n ch. 15. 27. cf. ch. 19. 35.

Sec. 7.

We come now to the Lord's words as to John, which have for us a deeper concern. Peter, turning about, sees John following; and with a natural, but perhaps too merely human interest, asks, "Lord, and what as to this man?" He answers, "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? Follow thou Me." This saying, we learn, though put only in the form of a question, was taken by the disciples as intimating that that disciple therefore would not die; but that this was not really what the Lord had said. The apostle who writes this, and of whom it is written, knew apparently no more than the rest: he simply guards against what might be a misconception. That is impossible now; but it leaves the question for us still, what then did the Lord mean? Was it only a rebuke to Peter? Either it is that, or there must be, one would say, some way by which John could live on, other than personally, and which may explain the mysterious words.

It is simple enough to say that John lives on in his writings. But then it might be urged, that is only what all the inspired writers will; still it cannot but come to mind that, in fact, John's writings not only predict circumstantially the Lord's return, but stretch over all the intervening time till then. While he does not take us up into heaven, as Paul does, and show us our place in the glorified Man up there, yet all the more he seems to abide with the people of God on earth until Christ's return, as a human presence watching and caring for them. John may be thus truly said to be waiting with those on earth for his absent Lord in a way in which we could not speak of any other inspired writer.

Even his epistles declare the last time to be here, and while watching over the development of the life (which is, as we know, his great subject) in babes, young men, and fathers, gives them instruction as to Antichrist. His doctrine, in the Gospel and epistles, is a connecting link between Paul on the one hand, and those who treat of the practical walk, as do the writers of the other General Epistles. But he fills this, as no other, with the personal glory of Christ, the Only-begotten Son in the bosom of the Father.

He is thus really a conservative presence: binding Scripture and the brotherhood of Christians also into a unity that is power to "abide,"—a favorite word of his, and which the Lord uses as to himself. We need not wonder to read upon his golden belt the words which most of all are fundamental to a unity of life, a living unity,—

Light, and Love!

The apostle closes his Gospel with another reminder of the inadequacy of all human words to tell out His glory, of whom he has been speaking. If it were attempted to tell out all, the world would be unable to contain the books that would be written. It would be an impracticable load to lift, rather than a help to clearer apprehension. How thankful we may be for the moderation that has compressed what would be really blessing to us into such a moderate compass! which yet, as we all must know, develops into whatever largeness we may have capacity for. Our Bibles are thus the same, and quite manageable by any. On the other hand, are we burning to know more? we may go on without any limit, except that which our little faith or heart may impose. May God awaken our hearts to test for themselves the expansive power of Scripture, and whether and wrote these things; and we know that his testimony is true. And there are also [o]many other things that Jesus did, which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the [p]world itself could not contain the books that would be written.

o ch. 20. 30.
p cf. Eph. 3. 19. cf. 2 Cor. 3. 3 with Eph. 1. 22, 23.

we can find a limit anywhere! Like the inconceivable immensity of the heavens, ever increasing as the power of vision is lengthened, we go on to find that the further we go only the more does the thought of infinity rise upon us; but this infinity is filled with an Infinite Presence; in every leaf-blade, in every atom, yet transcending all His works; and "to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we for Him; and one Lord, Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by Him."

THE BIBLE TRUTH PRESS, NEW YORK.

Date Due

BS491 .G761 v.5
The numerical Bible. : being a revised Princeton Theological Seminary-Speer Library
1 1012 00057 5698

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY

THE

NUMERICAL BIBLE

BEING

A REVISED TRANSLATION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES WITH EXPOSITORY NOTES:

ARRANGED, DIVIDED, AND BRIEFLY CHARACTERIZED

ACCORDING TO THE PRINCIPLES OF THEIR

NUMERICAL STRUCTURE

F W Grant.

FOURTH EDITION

V. 6

ACTS TO 2 CORINTHIANS

NEW YORK
LOIZEAUX BROTHERS, BIBLE TRUTH DEPOT
1 EAST 13TH STREET

ORDER AND DIVISIONS OF THE BOOKS

THE OLD TESTAMENT.

1. THE BOOKS OF THE LAW:—
   1. Genesis.
   2. Exodus.
   3. Leviticus.
   4. Numbers.
   5. Deuteronomy.

2. THE COVENANT-HISTORY:—
   1. Joshua.
   2. Judges.
      Ruth.
   3. Kings:—
      First Book (Samuel).
      Second Book (Kings).
   4. Captivity-Books:—
      Ezra.
      Nehemiah.
      Esther.
   5. Chronicles.

3. THE PROPHETS:—
   1. Isaiah.
   2. Jeremiah.
      Lamentations.
   3. Ezekiel.
   4. Daniel.
   5. The Book of Minor Prophets:—
      1. Hosea. Amos. Micah.
      2. Joel. Obadiah. Jonah.
      3. Nahum. Habakkuk. Zephaniah.
      4. Haggai. Zechariah. Malachi.

4. THE PSALM-BOOKS:—
   1. The Psalms.
   2. Job.
   3. Solomon's Song.
   4. Ecclesiastes.
   5. Proverbs.

THE NEW TESTAMENT.

1. THE GOSPELS:—
   1. Matthew. Mark. Luke.
   2. John.

2. THE ACTS.

3. THE PAULINE EPISTLES:—
   1. Romans.
      Galatians.
      Ephesians.
      Colossians.
      Philemon.
      Philippians.
   2. Thessalonians.
      First Epistle.
      Second Epistle.
      Corinthians.
      First Epistle.
      Second Epistle.
      Hebrews.
      Timothy.
      First Epistle.
      Second Epistle.
      Titus.

4. THE CATHOLIC EPISTLES:—
   1. Peter.
      First Epistle
      Second Epistle.
   2. James.
   3. John.
      First Epistle.
      Second Epistle.
      Third Epistle.
   4. Jude.

5. REVELATION.

PRINTED IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

PREFACE

AFTER an interruption which threatened a complete setting aside of the NUMERICAL BIBLE, as far as I at least could have personally to do with it, the Lord has graciously permitted me to see the second volume of the New Testament at last ready for what readers He may give interest in it. Realizing the imperfection that cleaves to all that is of man, I have yet no doubt that the value of the numerical structure to the interpretation of the word of God will be found here still by others as by myself. It has never (to me) failed to witness to the integrity, harmony, and perfection everywhere pervading this: the evidence of which will not fail to be found by those who care to look for it. As for the rest, it remains only to say that I have sought to make the outline of the divine truth in the Scriptures contained in this volume—mere outline as it must necessarily be—as full as space and ability permitted. Nor have I sought anywhere to hide my convictions upon any subject whatever that came fairly before me, but have taken my readers fully into my confidence, as the nature of my task demanded. "He that hath My word, let him speak My word faithfully," is a direct command which has given me no liberty, where a prudent reserve might have commended my work to a much wider circle. Alas, for the distractions of Christendom! which show how far Great Babylon has thrown its shadow beyond itself. But God would use even this for blessing to those absolutely sincere before Him, and not willing to give up any of that truth, into all which His Spirit would fain guide us. The exercise necessitated cannot fail to be for more establishment and deeper apprehension of that about which there has been exercise; and to "prove all things" is everywhere needed in order to "hold fast that which is good." But Christians will find here no departure from the fundamentals of the common faith as expressed in the three great creeds which are a legacy from the early centuries.

Alas, that already we miss from them the clear ring of the gospel: "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved"!

The last volume of the New Testament is almost entirely in manuscript already.

It is due to Mr. Ridout, as well as to those who may miss the usual fulness of the references in the later epistles, to say that he is not responsible for these, having himself also been for some months laid aside from all work of this kind by the prostration of severe illness, from which he is now happily recovering, so that the next volume will show, as we trust, once more the marks of what has been to him so long a labor of love.

F. W. GRANT.

Plainfield, N. J., August 17th, 1901.

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE NUMERALS.

The reason for the significance must be sought in previous volumes, especially in Appendix II. to the Volume on the Psalms.

ONE.

Soleness, singularity, uniqueness; solitariness, barrenness.
Sufficiency, power, independency, pride, rebellion.
Identity, unchangeableness, consistency, perpetuity, truth, knowledge.

(UNITY.)

Unity, at-oneness, harmony, congruity, integrity, righteousness, obedience, concord, peace.

(PRIMACY.)

Supremacy, headship, rule; beginning, cause, occasion, source, foundation, ground, plea.

(COMBINATIONS OF MEANINGS.)

Life, personality, will. Choice, election. Grace.
God, Almighty, Eternal, Jehovah, Father.

TWO.

(RELATION.)

Help, support, confirmation, assurance, competent testimony.
Seconding, preservation, deliverance, salvation. Service, ministry.
Addition, increase, growth; progress, movement, activity.
Attachment, love, desire, prayer. Association, partnership, fellowship.

(SECOND.)

Dependence, faith. Inferiority, lowliness, humiliation, subjection.

(DIFFERENCE.)

Diversity, contrast; contradiction, opposition, conflict, enmity.
Double-mindedness, duplicity, deceit.

(DIVISION.)

Separation, analysis, differentiation, discernment; judgment, wisdom; sight.
Decay, death, dissolution.
Christ, Second Person, God and Man, Second Man, Word of God, Witness, Saviour, Servant, Minister. Cross. Soul. Woman.

THREE.

(THREE DIMENSIONS.)

Solidity; reality, realization, fulfilment, fulness; manifestation. Sanctuary; glory, praise. Name.

(THREE STRAIGHT LINES INCLOSE A SPACE.)

Setting apart for purpose; specialization, sanctification, holiness; transformation. Dwelling-place, possession, portion. Marriage. Ban.

(THIRD LINE OF A TRIANGLE RETURNS TO THE FIRST.)

Resurrection; return, revival, recovery; reproduction. Spirit.

FOUR.

Yieldingness, weakness; meekness, mercy. Failure, testing; experience; transitoriness, change.
Creature, earth, walk on earth, world.

FIVE.

God in government; capacity, responsibility, exercise, way and end; conditions.
Weak with the Strong; Man with God; Immanuel.

SIX.

Manifestation or fulness of evil. Work-day week; limit, discipline; mastery, overcoming.

SEVEN.

Completeness, perfection; rest.

EIGHT.

New in contrast with the Old.

TEN.

Simply a 5 by 2.

TWELVE.

The manifest rule of God.

SCOPE AND DIVISIONS OF THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES

IN the New Testament Pentateuch, there is no question possible that the book of the Acts fills the Exodus place. It is the story of the going forth of the people of God from a servitude the "yoke" of which, as the apostle of the circumcision himself declares, neither they nor their fathers were able to bear (chap. xv. 10). To the conscience quickened by the entrance of divine light, what can be more unendurable than the bondage of law? And the Light had come into the world. Christ had swept away the things permitted for the hardness of men's hearts; He had drawn with absolute precision the line between right and wrong; He had followed it into the secret chambers of the heart, and condemned as adultery the lustful look, denounced causeless anger as subject to the judgment, the calling a brother "fool" as worthy of hell fire; He had required men to love their enemies, pray for those that cursed them, return good for evil, live a life which men have at large judged to be as impracticable as beautiful. Make all this into a legal system, and it is indeed an intolerable one. The apostle Paul has told us how the very prohibitions of the law stirred up within him the lust which it condemned, so, that "holy, just, and good" as the commandment was, when it came to him in the reality of what it was, the sin, of which he had been before so little conscious that it seemed as if it were dead, revived and he "died" (Rom. vii. 9). This is the powerlessness of law, and this is at the same time its strength: its powerlessness is its strength; for it is the impotence of man's own self-devised way (for all natural religion is law in some form) to meet God and stand before Him. The veil unrent before His face, the way into the holiest still unopened, the plain declaration that (upon that footing) no man can see Him and live,—all these unite to speak the hopelessness of confidence in human effort of any kind. None can rise up to the measure of divine requirement, nor can the holiness of God permit the modification of the requirement. The old covenant, then, must be done away, and the glorious new covenant of God's "I wills" must be substituted for that to him so fatal of "Thou shalt."

"There is," therefore, "verily a disannulling of the commandment going before for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof (for the law made nothing perfect), and the bringing in of a better hope, by which we draw nigh to God" (Heb. vii. 18, 19). Hagar, who "gendereth to bondage," must, according to the apostle's inspired "allegorizing" of

Abraham's history, be cast out of the house (Gal. iv. 30). "The law is not of faith," and the contradictory principles of grace and of works cannot subsist together (Gal. iii. 12; Rom. xi. 6).

But with Hagar Ishmael also must be cast out; and here we have to read, as the apostle also teaches us, the rejection of Israel nationally, cleaving to law and refusing grace, and Him in whom alone grace can be offered and is found. This is what we have in the book of Acts: the weaning time of Isaac, the child of the freewoman, the "mocking" of Ishmael, the setting aside of unbelieving Israel as involved in that of the legal covenant, to which with all the spirit of bondage that it breathes, they yet adhere. With this, as its necessary corollary, we find the gathering together of the children of God who were scattered abroad,—the widening of the publication of the gospel, first to Samaria, and then to the uncircumcised nations, the opening of the "mysteries" in the gospel given to Paul, the special features of the work among the Gentiles. The final portion shows Jewish enmity bringing the great apostle of the Gentiles to a Roman prison: a close in sorrow which we may find to have significance in relation to the Gentile work at large, and to be a prophecy of the failure of what we speak of (somewhat loosely perhaps) as the Christian dispensation.

Into the doctrines of Christianity the book of Acts does not enter largely: it is a history, and apart from what we have already seen, scarcely treats as we might have expected of the new truth which has come to gladden and bless and sanctify the redeemed. We have a certain development in connection with Paul's ministry which we shall have to trace, from forgiveness of sins to justification and a place in Christ, the Spirit being all through the witness to Christ glorified and the seal of the disciple. The Church as the House of God or the Body of Christ is only seen here by the help of what is given us elsewhere; it is rather seen here as a communion of believers in an exalted Saviour, expecting His return, and meanwhile enjoying the consciousness of the salvation He has wrought.

The main divisions of the book have been in some measure indicated:—

1. (Chaps. i.–vii.):—The beginning of the Church: the call of Israel alone.
2. (Chaps. viii.–xii.):—Israel rejecting, but the Church enlarging.
3. (Chaps. xiii.–xx.):—The Proclamation of the Mysteries.
4. (Chaps. xxi.–xxviii.):—Into the Roman prison.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

DIVISION 1. (Chaps. i.–vii.)

The Beginning of the Church: the call of Israel alone.

SUBDIVISION 1. (Chap. i. 1–11.)

The Foundation.

1 (1-3): The Living Lord.

1. THE [a] first account indeed did I make, O Theophilus, concerning all things which Jesus [b] began both to do and teach, until the [c] day in which he was taken up, when he [d] by the Holy Spirit had

[a] cf. Lk. 1. 1-4.
[b] cf. Jno. 17. 4 with Jno. 20. 21. cf. Mk. 16. 20.
[c] Lk. 24. 50, 51. ver. 2. cf. 1 Tim. 3. 16.
[d] cf. Matt. 3. 16 with ch. 10. 38. cf. Jno. 20. 21-23.

NOTES.—DIV. 1.

ISRAEL has rejected her Lord and Saviour: the Son of God has come to His own, and His own have not received Him. Tested under law, they had been proved "ungodly and without strength;" the coming of Christ had now more completely tested them, with a more terrible result: the Cross had now manifested as to them that the mind of the flesh was enmity against God.

It is true that this was not the condition of Israel only. "As in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man;" and we have learned nothing right, if we have not learned to identify ourselves with the privileged nation, and to see in their condemnation the judgment passed upon the whole world. This we shall have put before us fully by the apostle of the Gentiles in that epistle in which he declares a salvation needed alike by all as being without difference guilty before God. But this is not what we have to do with here; here it is as yet Israel alone that is before us; Israel, over whom the heart of God is still yearning, and for whom, therefore, as a nation, there is to be a first offer of grace, if perhaps the demonstration of their guilt and danger in the crucifixion of the Son of God may work upon them to receive it. "Repentance and remission of sins" was indeed to be "preached among all nations," but "beginning at Jerusalem," (Luke xxiv. 47), and from thence, if even yet they would repent, the living streams were to flow forth.

Accordingly at the Cross itself there is heard the intercession, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do;" words which Peter takes up in his address to the multitude upon the healing of the lame man at the beautiful gate of the temple: "And now, brethren, I know that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers;" and thereupon he assures them that, if now they repented, the times of refreshing would come from the presence of the Lord, and He would send Jesus Christ to fulfil to them all that the prophets had foretold of blessing (chap. iii. 17–21).

With this offer and its results the first division mainly is taken up; the end being reached in the trial and stoning of Stephen, who fulfils his name in receiving the "crown" of martyrdom, and is, according to the Lord's parable the messenger of the unhappy people sent after Him, to say they will not have this Man to reign over them. Until this time there is no going out whatever to the Gentiles. Although the risen Saviour has declared that the apostles are to be His witnesses "in Samaria, and to the end of the earth," not even Samaria, though so near at hand, and having, in fact, upon one memorable occasion, heard, not without precious fruit, the gospel from His own lips, gets any further testimony. All seems in suspense while the issue of Israel's call is yet to be seen. A Gentile centurion has already proclaimed the Crucified to be the Son of God; yet we hear of no Gentile added to the Church; and this, though formed by the descent of the Spirit at Pentecost, has not displayed therefore its distinctive given commandment unto the apostles whom he had chosen; to whom also he [e]presented himself alive after he had suffered, with many sure proofs, being seen by them during [f]forty days, and [g]speaking of the things concerning the kingdom of God.

[e] vers. 21, 22. cf. Jno. 20. 19, etc. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 4-8.
[f] cf. Matt. 4. 2.
[g] cf. Lk. 24. 25-27.

characteristics. It is a remnant of Israel merely, and has heard nothing apparently whatever of its own high calling. From this point it is that a notable change begins.

SUBD. 1.

It is striking that, while Luke's is one of the two only Gospels closing with the ascension of Christ, he yet should begin what is in some sense, as he declares, a continuation of his former work, with another account. The reason of this, however, is not hard to discover. In Matthew He has announced that upon that "Rock" which Peter had just confessed He would build His assembly (chap. xvi. 18). And He Himself, as Peter assures us, is the foundation upon which this "spiritual house" is built up (1 Pet. ii. 4–6). Resurrection it is that has marked out the Son of the Living God (Rom. i. 4). His work is there manifestly accomplished and accepted; that upon which all rests for us is finished, and here alone can there be an unchangeably secure foundation laid for any blessing. But the Church as the "spiritual house" is the House of God; and it is made so by the indwelling of the Spirit within it; while, if we think of it as the Body of Christ, it is by one Spirit that we are all baptized into one body (1 Cor. xii. 13). This the Lord presently assures us, was at Pentecost: Pentecost then was the beginning of the Church, and the Spirit given at that time was the fruit of Christ's departure to the Father (John xvi. 7); and it is as there set at the right hand of God that He is made Head over all things to the Church, which is His Body (Eph. i. 20–23).

It is plain, then, why the story of the assembly as related here should have for its introduction the ascension of Christ. It was fitting that this should end the Gospel; it is as fitting that it should begin the history of the Acts: in both connections its place is perfect, yet it is neither from the Gospel nor the Acts that we are made to realize this. Scripture as a whole is the product of one Mind alone.

1. It is the writer of the Gospel of the Manhood who gives us here, distinctly as linked with it, the story of that which He has specially associated with Himself as Man. The body is that by which the spirit of man which is in him takes its part in the world and is able to express itself in a scene like this. The Body of Christ is in the same way the "epistle of Christ," the expression of the absent One who as Head guides and governs it. To be feet and hands and mouth for Christ, as representatives of Him, seems fittingly and naturally to explain our position in this respect, which the opening of the Acts may well confirm. "Acts of the Apostles" is the title given by the MSS., which is confirmed by writers as early as Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian, while Luke himself might appear to furnish another. For he calls his Gospel a "first account" of things which "Jesus began both to do and teach until the day in which He was taken up." The "Acts" he leaves us to infer to be a second account, of things Jesus went on to do after His ascension, somewhat as Mark speaks of the disciples going forth and preaching everywhere, "the Lord (in heaven) working with them, and confirming the word with signs following." Here in Luke it would be, not the Lord working with, but in and through; and this would be completely that which the members on earth of the Christ in heaven would seem to suggest.

A company like this the world had never seen before. It implies an intimate fellowship with the mind of Christ (1 Cor. ii. 16), and a unity of loving obedience to His will, which, empowered by the Spirit of God, would be indeed an epistle of Christ upon the earth; and such truly was the Church at its commencement. They were a force among men which was recognized alike by

I (4-8): His witnesses.

2. And being assembled together with them, he [h]charged them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but [i]wait for the promise of the Father, which, [saith he,] ye have heard from me. For [j]John indeed baptized with water, but ye shall be [k]baptized with the Holy h Lk. 24. 49.

i cf. vers. 13, 14. cf. Lk. 2. 25–29.
j cf. Jno. 1. 26–33. cf. Matt. 3. 11.
k ch. 2. 1-4; ch. 11. 15, 16; cf. 1 Cor. 12. 13.

enemies and friends. As they became known, indifference ceased regarding them; there remained but sympathy or opposition, friendship or bitter hatred. They experienced the truth of the Saviour's words, "If they have persecuted Me, they will also persecute you; if they have kept My saying, they will keep yours also." And, while persecution did not fail to follow, the word of God ran and was glorified; the light shone; the heavens through which Christ had gone were pouring out radiance through that open door.

Luke writes once more to his friend Theophilus, who, we notice, has lost his title of honor on the world's roll,—a sign, perhaps, of advance in honor on a better one; perhaps the world had promoted the "friend of God" after its fashion with such. At any rate, Luke was sure of Theophilus' continued interest in such matters as he cared to write about. In him Jesus had begun both to do and teach,—a beginning which would have a glorious ending and a sure one. He is not able to go on in the truth, for whom the world is not dropping off the more in proportion as he goes on with this; and such an one, we may surely believe, was he to whom Luke the evangelist,—must we not say, Luke's glorious Master also?—was able to pour out his heart.

Of that which Jesus goes on to do and teach, Luke devotes himself, as we have seen, to the activity, rather than the doctrine. It has never been the method of the Spirit to confide what He has to communicate to a single teacher. No one vessel could be found competent to hold all the truth;—a thing to be marked at all times, when the Spirit is communicating. Humility is better served, communion is more realized, God is more fully exalted, in the use of various instruments, not tied to any, working sovereignly as He will. But Luke has a very distinct line of his own, as, more or less, every inspired writer has. He is the historian of the Spirit's energy in a world of sin and of Satan's power manifested;—the historian, therefore, of a mighty conflict, the world side of that which in Ephesians is seen upon its heavenly side. Here it is the struggle to save men from his sway on earth; there it is to lay hold against all his wiles of our inheritance in heaven.

It is the commandment of the Lord to which all are subject here; He, as true and typal Man, speaking by the Holy Spirit upon Him to the apostles He had chosen; to whom as witnesses of His resurrection He shows Himself alive after His suffering with many sure proofs. For the resurrection, as the sign of His acceptance, and of ours in Him, is the basis of the whole gospel, and of our heavenly position, as well as of the Church; and thus the resurrection chapter closes the first epistle to the Corinthians, the epistle of Church fellowship and activity, the doctrinal counterpart of the Acts itself.

Again and again, therefore, during forty days the risen Lord is seen by them, and as no mere apparition, but freely speaking to them of the Kingdom of God, to the interests of which they were now devoted. This is the general term for that which meets the condition of a world away from God, which has thrown off allegiance to Him, and wandered in the tortuous labyrinths of its false wisdom and the misery of its self-will. For God being no longer in His place, all else is out of its place necessarily when that to which all is in relation has ceased to be.

Thus the news of the coming of the Kingdom of God is indeed gospel; and the faith of Jesus, as it prevails, establishes of necessity the Kingdom. The full rest of the soul is only gained when the apprehension of sovereign Love has subjected the will of man to entire acquiescence in its blessed ways.

2. It is not by the knowledge of His resurrection merely that they are qualified to bear testimony for their Lord. The promise of the Father is to be ful-

Spirit not many days hence. They therefore, who had come together, asked him, saying, Lord, dost thou at [t]this time restore the kingdom to Israel? He said unto them, It is not for you to know [m]times and seasons which the Father hath placed under his own authority. But ye shall receive [n]power when the Holy Spirit hath come upon you, and ye shall be my [o]witnesses, both in [p]Jerusalem, and in all [q]Judea and [r]Samaria, and to the [s]end of the earth.

t cf. Lk. 24. 21. cf. Lk. 19. 11. cf. ch. 3. 19–21.
m cf. 1 Thes. 5. 1, etc. cf. Mk. 13. 32–37.
n cf. ch. 4. 33.
o ver. 22. cf. Jno. 15. 26, 27.
p cf. ch. 2. 14.
q cf. ch. 8. 1. r cf. ch. 8. 5. s ch. 13. 46, 47; cf. Col. 1. 23.

filled, and they are to be baptized with the Holy Spirit within a few days from that time. It is sorrowful enough, after all the pains that the Lord has taken to make known the true nature of the coming of the Spirit, and even in spite of the apostle's declaration that "by one Spirit we are all baptized into one body," that Christians should still be ignorant of the character of that which then took place,—should confound Person and influence, the Gift with the gifts! The Lord has fully shown us that it was the Spirit Himself who then would come in place of Him who was now going away: "another Comforter" or Advocate, to be with them, as Christ had been, but in them also, making their bodies by His Presence temples of God. As the Spirit of adoption He taught them to cry, "Abba, Father!" As dwelling in the Church, this became also the House and Temple of God; as united by Him to Christ, His Body. The various gifts are qualifications for various place in this, as its members.

It is not so much denied that such things are, as that it was ever otherwise than now, at least from Abraham, with whom by most the Church is thought to have begun. All that has taken place since is, for those who hold such views, merely an increase of light and power; the coming of the Spirit merely a strong term for a larger outpouring than heretofore; and such "a Pentecostal shower" should "precede every sermon." This treatment of Scripture evacuates it of its proper meaning. Its language becomes loose, indefinite, incapable of precise significance. We escape from this fog easily by giving the same credit to the statements of the word of God that we should to those of any honest man not given to exaggeration, nor liable to confusion of speech. However, this is not yet the place to discuss the doctrine of the Church, for the simple reason that we have not yet the scripture as to it, and the Church is born, like many another child of destiny, without the knowledge of its God-given dignity.

But we should notice that the Lord, after His resurrection, has acknowledged in His disciples brethren of His own, and that the "promise of the Father" of which He here speaks characterizes well the Spirit of adoption which is at hand. The children of God which have been scattered abroad are now to be gathered together, and this involves that they shall be known to themselves and one another. Baptism with the Holy Spirit, whatever else it may mean, is the introduction into this acknowledged family of God, and as the Holy Spirit, the introduction accomplished by it is no formality but a true and enduring change. John's baptism of water is only mentioned, as he himself mentioned it, to be put in contrast with the gift now to be given by the Son of God. It is a true initiation into a spiritual state, never to be confounded or mixed up with any baptism of water: there the line is clearly drawn by the Lord's own conduct as to the latter: "Jesus Himself baptized not, but His disciples" (John iv. 2).

Those gathered round Him now, as risen from the dead, are still, however, Jews, and with little ability to enter into that which the Lord is putting before them. We hear, at least of no question pointing in this direction. They have another, "Lord, dost Thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" The answer to this we can easily see now they were not prepared for; nor did it accord with the offer which was to be made through them to the nation, to be told the final result. "It is not for you," He says, "to know times and seasons which the Father has placed under His own authority." Yet, with reference to 3 (9-11): Ascending, but to return.

3. And having said these things, while they beheld, he was [t]taken up, and a [u]cloud received him out of their sight. And while they were gazing into heaven, as he was going, behold, [v]two men stood by them in white garments, who also said, Ye men of Galilee, [w]why stand ye looking into heaven? This Jesus, who hath been taken up from you into heaven, shall so [x]come in like manner as ye have seen him going into heaven.

t ver. 2. cf. Eph. 4. 10. u cf. Ex. 13. 21. cf. Matt. 17. 5. cf. 1 Thess. 4. 17. cf. Rev. 1. 7. v cf. Lk. 24. 4. w cf. Joo. 20. 17.

cf. Lk. 24. 5; cf. 2 Cor. 5. 16. x cf. Matt. 24. 3; cf. Heb. 9. 28; cf. Tit. 2. 13; cf. Zech. 14. 4.

Israel in the days preceding her entrance into the blessings promised her, such times are not only given, but it was distinctly declared to the prophet of them that, while the vision was shut up and sealed to the time of the end, yet that then the wise shall understand (Dan. xii. 9–11). The Lord's words therefore are an intimation that they stood not in such relation to the coming blessing. And as they were, so are we still. A heavenly people, waiting to be caught up to heaven, "days and months, and times, and years" are not for those who are not of the world, but detached from the stream of the world's history. That which to the wise in Israel, in such a crisis as Daniel shows they are to pass through, will be of the greatest importance for them to know, would have been to Christians, through all the intervening centuries of their history, a knowledge which would have put far off from them the One for whom they wait. We still watch because we know not what hour our Lord doth come (Matt. xxiv. 42).

But if times and seasons were not for them to understand, there was a glorious testimony to be given, for which the Spirit's coming would empower them. They were to be His witnesses far and wide, even to the end of the earth; and of this testimony Jerusalem would be the beginning and the centre. How great a glory indeed the Light that arising out of Israel illumines already with its beams every heart that will receive it in! "A Light," says Simeon, "for revelation of the nations, and the Glory of Thy people Israel." But not as yet would Israel receive the message sent.

3. Now in open sight of all, He is taken up. The cloud that receives Him out of their sight is surely the "bright cloud" of the Transfiguration. It is the Man Christ Jesus welcomed by the Glory into which He is taken; and no vision of angels would be as fitting as is this. Nay, angels have here no place: we are made to think rather of the apostle's words, that being perfected, He was "saluted of God a High Priest after the order of Melchizedek" (Heb. v. 10). The Glory salutes Him here, now perfected; and His priestly office is that upon which depends all the outflow of divine grace with which the book is filled.

Upon earth the angels have their message of comfort: this Jesus is to return as He went up; the beginning and end of the day of atonement are here brought together. As Priest He departs, and as Priest He will return to bless the people of Israel. As yet it is of Israel that they are specially thinking; and His coming for the Church is not revealed. The disciples are in heart an Israelitish remnant still, and the revelation of the purposes of God proceeds only gradually. But heaven is where He is; and the angels' message comforts the home-sickness of their hearts as they see Him depart. Up, then! to serve Him in His absence. Not in contemplation merely, but in active energy of devoted labor will they be in fellowship with Him, who even upon the throne of heaven is serving still.

SUBD. 2.

We have now the inroad that Satan has made upon their ranks repaired, and Matthias substituted for Judas in the number of the twelve apostles. Dreadful was the apostasy of one in such a position: and it could not be permitted that men should have the least apparent cause to blaspheme on this account; it must be shown that sin in its extremest manifestation had not yet exceeded the bounds ordained by God for it;—that in its worst uprising He was Master still.

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chap. i. 12-26.)

Matthias added to the Eleven Apostles.

1 (12-14): A new beginning.

1. THEN they returned to Jerusalem from the mount called Olivet, which is near Jerusalem, a [y]sabbath day's journey off. And when they entered it, they went up to the [z]upper room where were staying both [a]Peter and John, and James, and Andrew, Philip and Thomas, Bartholomew and Matthew, James [the son] of Alphæus, and Simon the Zealot, and Judas [the brother] of James. These all continued with one accord in [b]prayer, with the [c]women, and [d]Mary the mother of Jesus, and with his [e]brethren.

2 (15-22): The guidance of Scripture.

2. And in those days Peter stood up in the midst of the brethren, (the multitude of names was about a [f]hundred and twenty of those together) and said, Brethren, it was necessary that the [g]Scripture should be fulfilled, which the Holy Spirit forespake by the mouth of David, concerning Judas, who became [h]guide to those who took Jesus: for he had been [i]numbered amongst us, and

[y] cf. Jno.11. 18.
[z] cf. Jno.20. 19. cf. ch.20.8.
[a] cf. Matt. 10. 2-4. cf. Mk.3.16 -19. cf. Lk.6.14-16.
[b] cf. ch. 6. 4. *cf.*ch.16.16. *cf.*ch.20.36.
[c] cf. Lk. 8.2, 3.
[d] cf. Jno.19. 26, 27.
[e] ctr. Jno.7. 5.
[f] *ctr.*ch.2.41.
[g] cf. Jno.17. 12.
[h] Jno. 18. 2, 3.
[i] cf. Jno. 6. 70, 71.

1. They return from the mount of Olives to Jerusalem: Olivet is their spring of power; Jerusalem the sphere of their ministry: they break no sabbath-rest by journeying between the two. Olivet is their Gilgal, for their new conquest of the land; but they are a small company for so great a work, and realize their weakness. Gathering in the upper room where the eleven are staying, they continue with one accord in prayer, waiting for the fulfilment of the promise made. This conscious weakness is a main element of strength. The work being so entirely beyond them, they are delivered from the necessity of calculating their own resources, and are left to the unobstructed view of God as their sole argument and their sufficient resource.

Mary the mother of Jesus is seen here for the last time in Scripture. She takes her place simply with the rest, humbled, no doubt, rather than exalted by God's grace towards her. What a grief it would have been to her to have known the place in which an apostate church would set her in the time to come! She is neither prayed to, nor even leads in prayer, but remains as in the beginning "the handmaid of the Lord," and with this passes out of the history. In the doctrine of the epistles she has no place, and is never mentioned. Blessed and honored she is, and always will be; by none so dishonored as by those who would force her into a place impossible for a creature, that of a Pagan goddess rather than a Christian saint.

2. We see now the authority of Scripture over these disciples of the Lord Jesus, in which they are true followers of their Master. We have traced His ways in the Gospels, and know how fully the principle that "by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God doth man live" was acted upon by Him. Scripture that "cannot be broken" had for Him, therefore, all the authority of unalterable truth. "But how, then should Scripture be fulfilled, that thus it must be?" He gives as a convincing reason for not taking Himself out of the hands of those who came to seize Him. On the Cross, "that the Scripture might be fulfilled, He saith, I thirst." Twice over He speaks of the course and end of Judas as needful "that Scripture might be fulfilled." Peter, therefore, does but follow his Lord, when now, standing up amongst the brethren, he declares that "it was necessary that the Scripture should be fulfilled which the Holy Spirit spake before by the mouth of David concerning Judas, who became guide to those who took Jesus." How blessed to realize the control of the Word of God in the darkest events, as in those most evidently displaying the had obtained his lot in this [j]ministry. Now this man purchased a [k]field with the wages of iniquity, and [l]falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out. And it was known unto all the dwellers in Jerusalem, so that that field is called in their dialect, Aceldama, that is, the field of [m]blood. For it is [n]written in the book of Psalms, Let his camp* be desolate, and let no man dwell therein; and his office let another take. Wherefore of the men who have companied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the [o]baptism of John until the day in which he was taken up from us, there must one be with us a [p]witness of his resurrection.

3 (23-26): The lot manifests.

3. And they appointed two, Joseph called Barsabbas, who was surnamed Justus, and Matthias. And they [q]prayed and said, Thou, Lord, who [r]knowest the hearts

*Or, habitation.

j cf. Matt. 10. 5. cf. Matt. 7. 22, 23.
k cf. Matt. 27. 5-8.
l cf. 2 Sam. 17. 23.
m cf. Matt. 21. 38, 39. cf. 1 Ki. 21. 19. cf. Rev. 14. 17-20. n Ps. 69. 25. Ps. 109. 8.
o cf. Jno. 15. 27. cf. ch. 13. 24.
p ver. 8. ch. 2. 32. ch. 4. 33. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 3-8.
q ver. 14. ch. 6. 6. ch. 13. 3.
r cf. Jno. 6. 70 with Jno. 13. 18. cf. 1 Sa. 16. 7.

signs of His handiwork! How dark they would be, if we had not in this way the assurance of His perfect oversight of every circumstance! But the Cross is, above all, this assurance, as the speaker here will presently point out to us. What a blaze of prophetic light is concentrated upon it! and how the worst evil the world ever saw is there gloriously overruled to be the greatest good! And what is true of this is true of every evil that has stained man's history: "He maketh the wrath of man to praise Him; and the remainder of wrath He will restrain."

So, then, with Judas, whose terrible descent is spoken of here, from his reception of the lot of his apostleship to his suicide in the field of blood, which he had purchased with the price of his iniquity. The apparently discordant accounts as to this purchase have been reconciled in a manner well-known and probable enough. Begun by the traitor, we have only to suppose it closed by the leaders of the people; Judas returning to it to hang himself in his despair, as Matthew relates; the judgment of God ensuing, as related here. That the character of the purchase-money should combine with the horror of his death to give its name of Aceldama to the potter's field, is in no wise difficult to understand.

Peter in his quotation connects two psalms (lxix. 25; cix. 8); the first fulfilled in the judgment at which his own hands had doubly wrought, the second as defining the duty which now pressed upon them. The office which he has shamed and cast aside is not to be left vacant to bear witness of the enemy's victory. All has been provided for,—all has been specified beforehand in the prescient wisdom of God, which cannot be taken by surprise or overmatched by Satan's subtlety or power. Nay, the Word is shown by his apparent success only the more fully master in all circumstances. It lies with them now to see filled up their broken ranks,—not by the appointment of a fresh apostle, for which plainly they have no authority, but by choosing out from among themselves those who had the necessary qualifications for one who was to be a witness of that wondrous life which had shone out among men, and then referring to the Lord Himself to determine which of these was according to His mind.

3. Scripture had settled for them what His mind was as to the place being filled; for the determining of the individual there was the lot, used so often in Israel for a matter like this. They had even the scripture for this, that, if "the lot is cast into the lap, the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord" (Pro. xvi. 33). They had no reason to doubt, therefore, that they would have His guidance of all men, show which of these two thou hast chosen, that he may take the lot of this ministry and apostleship, from which Judas turned aside, to go to his [s]own place. And they gave [t]lots for them, and the lot fell upon Matthias, and he was numbered with the eleven apostles.

[s] cf. Jno. 17. 12. cf. Rev. 22. 11, 15.

[t] Prov. 16. 33. cf. Gal. 1. 1, 12, 15. cf. 1 Tim. 1. 12.

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chap. ii.)

The Promise of the Spirit fulfilled.

1 (1-4): Power.

1. AND when the [u]day of Pentecost was now accomplishing, they were all [v]together in one place. And suddenly there came from heaven a sound as of a mighty [w]rushing wind, and filled all the house where [u] ch. 20. 16. 1 Cor. 16. 8. Ex. 34. 22. Lev. 23. 15-21. Num. 28. 26. Deut. 16. 9-12.

[v] ch. 1. 14. ver. 46.

[w] cf. Ezek. 1. 4; cf. Ezek. 37. 9 with Jno. 3. 8.

in acting on such an assurance; the Spirit had not yet come; and this, which some have taken to cast doubt upon the issue, and to dispute Matthias' right to the apostleship, they had no ground for believing to be a cause for delay when Scripture was thus clear. They acted in obedience, not in self-confidence; we never find their act disputed afterwards, and we have surely no right to dispute it now. It would be a totally different thing to imitate their conduct, now that the Spirit of God is come.

It is true that we have nothing of Matthias afterwards; but the same could be said of most of the apostles; nor of the fancied substitution of Paul for him at a later time have we any proof whatever. We have no reason for believing Matthias to have been other than his name imports, "the gift of the Lord" to them, according to their faith; and it is a happy thing to see faith acting in them in such simplicity and confidence, the word of God being its justification as always,—in this case before the Spirit has come. When He comes, it will not be to render us less subject to the Word, but on the contrary, to give us the fulness of it, even of the Old Testament; and the new dispensation which is now being introduced, with all its higher blessing, will confirm the old.

SUBD. 3.

The fulfilment of the promise is not long delayed, and we come now to the real commencement of the Church of God on earth. In saying this it must be remembered we are simply using the familiar word, which has so long retained its place that it would be now almost affectation to change it. Every one knows that the strictly accurate term is the "assembly," and that this also needs to be further defined as the assembly which is Christ's Body, or we shall fall into confusion. And this is the good of adhering to the common phraseology, negative enough in character to receive meaning from Scripture, but which, understood in this way, may become as definite as we can desire. The word "Church" in itself means only something belonging to the Lord, and so may apply to an assembly or a building, as in fact, people apply it. The Scripture-word "assembly" cannot be confounded in this fashion, but yet in itself would not distinguish the Jewish "assembly in the wilderness" from the Christian one so widely different, or even that heathen assembly which the town-clerk at Ephesus dismissed (chap. xix. 41). The word "Church" has the advantage that it does not really occur in Scripture; so that in using it invariably for the Christian assembly we can make it definite without any confusing with a scriptural word. Thus it will be easily understood if we use it here.

As already said, for the doctrine of the Church we need not look in the Acts. We have to go further now, and say, that for the doctrine of the Spirit we must not look in the Acts. It is important to recognize this, that we may retain the truth of the doctrine. In the Acts we shall not find "sealing," "anointing," or the "earnest" of the Spirit, or any terms equivalent with these. Of the

they were sitting. And there appeared unto them divided [x] tongues, as of [y] fire, and it sat upon each one of them. And they were all [z] filled with the Holy Spirit, and began to [a] speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance.

x cf. Matt. 3. 16. vers. 4, 32.
y cf. Jer. 23. 29.
z cf. 1 Cor. 12. 13 with ch. 1. 5, 8.
cf. ch. 4. 31. a cf. Mk. 16. 17; cf. ch. 19. 5, 6.

baptism with the Spirit we do hear, but without the help of Corinthians should not be able to understand it. On the other hand, of the Spirit being poured out, coming and falling upon men we hear in the Old Testament, as well as in the book before us. These things have been urged in various interests, and we must not ignore them: Scripture is as perfect in its form as in its matter, and it is only by strict attention to such things as these that we honor its perfection and obtain its deepest secrets. The Spirit is also spoken of as given and received; we have the "gift" of the Spirit, as elsewhere the "gifts."

Now the absence of certain terms which speak of the Spirit's inward operation is not to be wondered at in what is an historical account. As the public Witness to Christ, it is natural that the outward manifestations should be dwelt upon, rather than the inward, more really important though these last might be. Thus also the gift of tongues is specially noticed. When the Spirit fell or came upon men in the Old Testament times, it was seen similarly in works of power put forth; and the coming upon men speaks naturally of enduement with power. Of the work in the heart no spectator could be witness, save as this showed itself in fruit in the life in due season. And this does not lack in what is before us now, as is most evident; but it does not give us insight into the character of the Spirit's outpouring seen at Pentecost.

It is to the Gospel of John that we must turn, in fact, to know the real significance of the Pentecostal gift; although, as we have seen in going through this, even John does not speak of the Church. That it is the Spirit Himself who comes, the Lord there makes very plain to us; but the effect as declared is the perfecting of the truth and of the individual life; the circle into which you are brought by it is that of the acknowledged family, or, as Paul would say, the sons. The Spirit is the "Spirit of adoption"; the "gift" of the Spirit is to individuals; and, while producing necessary oneness of mind and heart, does not in any other way seem to imply the formation of a "body."

Yet that it was the baptism of the Spirit that was received at Pentecost, does not admit of question; and "by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body." Thus the Church, the Body of Christ, came into being,—a body such as never had existed before. It was not proclaimed at its birth, however, nor for a good while afterwards. It was Christ that was proclaimed,—Christ come into the world, crucified by men, raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, ascended up to God, and now Lord and Christ, a Prince and Saviour, to give remission of sins. The present revelation opens gradually, developing out of Old Testament Scripture fulfilled, and as a message also to the people of the Old Testament; and only as it is seen that Israel will still refuse the grace of God, is there a widening of the sphere of the proclamation, and new characters begin to be assumed by the assembly. The present division does not go beyond the first form of the message.

1. Pentecost is named from its connection with the Sheaf of Firstfruits, being the fiftieth day from this which speaks of the resurrection of Christ from the dead. Upon this day two loaves of firstfruits, the beginning of the harvest, were offered to God. Their typical application is shown very clearly by the fact that they are baken with leaven, and therefore can represent nothing but men in that condition to which the fall has brought them, although the action of the leaven has been stopped by the fire,—that is, the holiness of God which has its effect in self-judgment. They are a "new meal-offering to the Lord," the fruit of, and in character akin to that "corn of wheat" which, that it might not abide alone, fell into the ground and died (John xii. 24); the presence of the leaven being

2 (5-13): Strange yet familiar utterances.

2. And there were [b]dwelling at Jerusalem Jews, reverent men, from every nation of those under heaven. Now this rumor* having come abroad, the multitude came together, and were confounded, because each one heard them speak in his [c]own dialect. And they were

*R. V. with many reads, "when this sound was heard," but this is unnatural, and not required by the original.

b cf. Is. 2. 3. cf. Is. 49. 21, 22.

c ctr. Gen. 11. 1-9. cf. Jno. 19. 19, 20 with ch. 1. 8. cf. 1 Cor. 14. 11, etc.

met by a sin-offering, which is followed by two lambs for a peace-offering, with seven lambs, a bullock, and two rams, for a burnt-offering. There is adequate witness to peace accomplished, with a full realization of acceptance with God,—the work of Christ in its completeness for the soul. This, of course, does not give the Church in its unique character as that, but rather in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel which began with it; consequently, all the more in the character in which, in fact, we see it in the Acts. The "feast of weeks," as they called it, fulfils its typical significance, as Passover and the sheaf of first-fruits had fulfilled theirs.

Pentecost finds the disciples gathered once more together. In those days of expectancy, it seems to have been habitual with them, and not as if any premonition of what was to take place had brought them at this time. But suddenly there comes from heaven a sound rousing them all to instant attention. It is like that of a powerful sustained breathing: so I think the words should be understood; it is confessedly "blowing" or "breathing" rather than "wind" as in the ordinary versions; and the latter of these two words should have the preference. It is not a storm that can furnish us with the symbols here; and in consistency with this, "rushing" is better replaced with "sustained." The simple force is "carried on"; it is not intermittent, as breathing might otherwise be taken to be. The idea suggested is that of inspiring, animating agency, though beyond human,—a heavenly power; not fitful or (as we say) impulsive, but lifting and bearing on with divine energy. It is the "power from on high," which the Lord promised, that has manifested itself; and, as the savor of the ointment once poured upon Him at that time filled the house, so now the house is filled with that which is poured out upon those whom divine grace has identified with Christ risen and gone up to God. Upon Him when in the world the Spirit had come to abide, the testimony to Him who was not of the world; so now upon those not of the world, because chosen by Him out of it, yet sent into it as His representatives, the Spirit comes to abide. Upon Him it was the seal of His perfection; upon them it is the seal of their perfection in Him.

The sound is not alone; a light as of fire appears in the form of tongues parting themselves, which rest upon each one there; and they all, filled with the Spirit, begin to speak in the diverse languages into which sin has divided the tongues of men. Grace is pursuing man with its testimony wherever his sin has carried him; as a consuming fire to his sin, but as light for his darkness, and in love which testifies by those who, themselves once the servants of sin, now speak with tongues enfranchised and given utterance by the Holy Spirit.

For the Spirit in man, not occasionally merely, nor, as one may say, officially, but characteristically and abidingly, so that it may be pressed as a part of one's responsibility to "be filled with the Spirit," (Eph. v. 18,) is indeed the perfect witness of how grace has come in for us, and therefore of the value before God of Christ's precious work. This is what we have insisted on in the Acts, rather than the doctrine—any doctrine—of the Church of God. This is the key to the missionary activity which so pervades it, as the coming into the realization of it from out of legal shadow makes it the New Testament Exodus. The height of Christian position we must wait for in Paul; for to him is the administration of the mystery committed.

2. The great word, as we see now, is testimony. The gift of tongues is prominent from the first; and this it is that attracts the multitude. It was indeed a all amazed and wondered, saying, Behold, are not all these that speak [d]Galileans? and how hear we them, each in our own dialect in which we were born? [e]Parthians and Medes, and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, both Judea and Cappadocia, Pontus and Asia, both Phrygia and Pamphylia, Egypt and the parts of Libya beside Cyrene, and sojourners from Rome, both Jews and proselytes, Cretans and Arabians, we hear them speak in our tongues the [f]great things of God. And they were all [g]amazed and in perplexity, saying one to another, What may this be? But others, mocking, said, They are full of new [h]wine.

3 (14-36): The proclamation of Christ risen and glorified.

3. But [i]Peter, standing up with the eleven, lifted up his voice and spake out to them, Men of Judea and inhabitants of Jerusalem, let this be known to you, and give ear to my words. For these are not full* of wine, as ye suppose, for it is (but) the [j]third hour of the day; but this is that which was spoken through the prophet [k]Joel: And it shall be in the [l]last days, saith God, that I will pour out of my Spirit upon [m]all flesh: and your

* Drunken.

d ch. 1. 11. cf. ch. 4.13.
e cf. Rev.5.9. cf. Rev.7.9.
f cf. ch.10.36 –42.
g ver. 7. cf. ver. 43.
h cf. ch. 17. 32. *cf.*ch.26.24, 25. cf. Eph. 5. 18.
i cf. ch.3.12. cf. ch. 10. 5. *cfr.*Jno.18. 25-27. *cf.*Matt.16. 19.
j *cf.*1 Thess. 5. 7. cf. Eccl.10. 16, 17.
k Joel 2. 28-32. *cf.*Is. 32.15. *cf.*Ezek.39. 29. *cf.*Zech.12. 10.
l cf. Is. 2. 2. *cf.*Num.24. 14-25.
m cf. Is. 40. 5; cf. Jer. 31. 33, 34; cf. Is. 54. 13.

new thing in Israel, and its significance is at once manifest. Tongues were not needed for Jews in Palestine. The gift said at once, "Here is something to go forth." The scattering of the Jews, the privileged possessors of a revelation from God, was in His providence a preparation for the evangelization of the nations, and had, as we find abundantly in the Acts itself, been the scattering of seed widely among them. The Hellenistic Jews, with whom we shall soon be brought in contact, had taken up with some earnestness, if with less intelligence, the questions arising from their necessary relations with the paganism around. But, although there were thus many proselytes, yet there could not be said to exist any true missionary spirit, and the temper of the stricter Jews towards those who turned to them from the idolatry on all sides was not encouraging. Now had come the breath of change; and a new message must come with the new spirit. God was claiming His creatures, far as they might have wandered from Him; the miraculous gift was at once a trumpet to call the mass together, and a means of reaching personally all who should come.

There is no need for noticing the strange and differing versions that have been given by interpreters of what, though a miracle, is so simple a fact. It is plain that this crowd of people of many languages heard these men who were evidently Galileans speaking in these tongues. The miracle, as one of old remarked, was with those that spoke, not with those that heard; and therefore they were real languages the speakers used. Not even the "great things of God" that they heard them utter seem to have made such an impression upon the multitude, as this wonder of their use of unfamiliar speech. The Jews, unacquainted with these dialects, mocked the disciples as men who were drunken with new wine; but the rest marvelled.

3. It is specially to these uncomprehending ones, men of Judea and inhabitants of Jerusalem, that Peter, standing up with the eleven, addresses himself in explanation. They were, in fact, the guilty ones to whom yet, first of all, the gospel was to be preached. He gravely remonstrates against their groundless thought, of men being drunk so early in the day. The third hour of the day was that of the daily sacrifice, the custom prevailing being to abstain from food and drink, specially upon the feast-days, until this was offered. This is only a means, however, of gaining the hearing that he seeks: for explanation of what sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams; moreover upon my bondmen and upon my bondwomen will I pour out of my Spirit in those days, and they shall [n]prophesy. And I will show [o]wonders in heaven above and signs on the earth beneath; blood and fire and vapor of smoke: the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the [p]great and glorious day of [the] Lord come. And it shall be that [q]whosoever shall call on the name of [the] Lord shall be saved. Men of Israel, hear these words: Jesus the [r]Nazarene, a man [s]pointed out of God to you by mighty works and wonders and signs, which God wrought by him in the midst of you, as ye yourselves [t]know: him, delivered by the determinate [u]counsel and foreknowl-n cf. ch. 10. 44-46. cf. ch. 11. 28. cf. ch. 21. 9, 10.

o cf. Matt. 24. 29. cf. Rev. 6. 12-17.
p cf. 1 Thess. 5. 2. cf. 2 Thess. 2. 2-12. cf. Is. 13. 9-11. cf. Mal. 3. 2 with Mal. 4. 1-3. cfr. Rev. 3. 10.
q Rom. 10. 13. cf. 1 Cor. 1. 2.
r cf. ch. 3. 6. cf. Jno. 1. 45, 46. s cf. Matt. 3. 17 with ch. 10. 38; cf. Jno. 3. 2; cf. Jno. 5. 36. t cf. Jno. 11. 47. cf. Jno. 12. 37-40. u cf. Matt. 26. 24; cf. ch. 4. 28; cf. ch. 13. 27.

was taking place he refers them to their own scriptures. Joel had spoken of an outpouring of the Spirit in the last days which would affect young and old, men and women, after this manner. The apostle cannot mean indeed that this is the proper fulfilment of this prophecy, which speaks definitely of what shall take place after Israel's deliverance, when Jehovah should be openly dwelling in the midst of her, as now too surely He was not. But what if already these things which they were witness of were the premonitory signs of the incoming of those last days? We have only to remember that the time of the restoration of the kingdom to Israel had been a matter of enquiry on the part of the disciples with their risen Lord, and that He had definitely refused them satisfaction. Peter could not then say that the days of Joel were upon them. Yet he could warn them that such times were coming, which, with all their blessing, involved antecedently the "great and glorious day of the Lord," which for man's sin would not be light for all, but might be darkness (Amos v. 18). And he reminds them of the darkening of sun and moon that would precede it: what if already the things they witnessed might be signs of this great day? By and by we shall find a definite promise given that, if there were nationally repentance and the reception of Him whom they had crucified, He would return, and bring in that time. Plainly, then, as far as Peter knew, it might not be far away; and it was in the mind of God that Israel should thus have the offer of all that He had promised, without any drawback to the mercy so declared.

But Joel had added the necessary condition of salvation in the trial of those days:—a condition which could hardly be called one indeed, so naturally would it be the resource in trial to "call upon the Name of the Lord," (that is, "of Jehovah.") Yet even here, alas, might the unbelief of man make this a stumbling-block over which to fall and perish: for, in fact, Jehovah had come to them already, and they had rejected Him!

From this point, then, Peter begins to preach to them Jesus. He does not shun the title of Nazarene which was such an offence to them. Had not God borne witness to Him by mighty works and signs, which He wrought by Him in their very midst? Could they deny it?—an unbribed witness, surely.

What then had been the issue? They, the men of law, had used the hands of lawless men—of the Gentiles, to crucify and slay Him. That might seem, at least, the effectual disproof of His claims; nay, nothing had been accomplished but what had its place in the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God by which He had been delivered up; all man's attempts would indeed have been futile, apart from this!

Spite of the Cross, God had shown His estimate of Him by resurrection from the dead. The Firstfruits from the dead, He had broken bands which yet had edge of God, ye, by the hands of [u]lawless men, have crucified and slain. Whom God hath [v]raised up, having loosed the pains of death, because it was not [w]possible that he should be held by it. For [x]David saith regarding him, I saw the Lord always before me; because he is at my right hand, that I should not be [y]moved. Therefore did my heart rejoice, and my [a]tongue was glad; moreover also my flesh shall dwell* in [b]hope: because thou wilt not leave my soul in [c]hades; thou wilt not suffer thy pious one to see [d]corruption. Thou hast made known to me the paths of [e]life; thou shalt make me full of joy with thy counte-

*Literally, "tabernacle."

cf. Ps. 40. 13-17. a cf. Ps. 40. 1-3; cf. Heb. 2. 12. b cf. Jno. 16. 20-22; cf. Rom. 4. 18. c ver. 31; cf. Ps. 30. 3; cf. Ps. 102. 23-28; cf. Ps. 21. 1-4. d ch. 13. 35; ctr. Gen. 3. 19; ctr. Job 7. 9; ctr. 1 Cor. 15. 42. e cf. Rom. 6. 9; cf. Rev. 1. 18.

u cf. Jno.19. 11-16. cf. ch. 3.13. 14.
v cf. 1 Cor. 15. 4. cf. Rom. 4. 25. cf Rom.6.4. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 21.
x cf. Lk. 24. 5, 6. cf. John 10. 18. cf. Rev. 1. 18.
y Ps. 16. 8-11. *cf.*ch.13.34.
z cf. Is.50. 8, 9.

released no one besides after this manner. Others had been indeed raised up, but at last to return again and moulder in the dust to which man is sentenced. Not so with Him: it was not possible for Him to be held by it.

Peter cites their scriptures in proof of this; and as sufficient witness, David, of whose line Messiah was to come: in the sixteenth psalm, David, though speaking in the first person, speaks evidently of Another than himself, who, perfect in a perfect pathway, Jehovah always before Him, always therefore for Him, gave unwavering steadfastness to all His steps. It was a pathway of life, therefore, even though it led through death; in which His flesh dwelt in confident hope, that He would not abandon His soul to hades, nor suffer piety such as His to see corruption. Beyond, the face of God was the brightness before Him. Of David himself certainly, all this could not be said. Not to him could this perfection be ascribed; and his monument amongst them showed him to have seen corruption, like all others. Not of himself, then, did he speak; and there was but One of whom it could be spoken. As a prophet he looked forward to Him whom God had sworn, as the fruit of his loins, to set upon his throne, King of the final Kingdom; final, because perfect, as necessary in the perfection which He manifests here.

But David's throne, would the Jew have argued, where is David's throne today? Did He take it? Is He filling it,—the Nazarene? And Peter could never have replied, as so many since have done for him, that the throne of heaven was, as the greater, inclusive of the less! No, his argument is a very different one. He has been in death, as this perfect One was to be; He has come up out of it, His flesh even not having seen corruption. That God has raised Him up, all the disciples there were witnesses. But more, the Spirit with its tongues of fire was His witness. "Being by the right hand of God exalted," says the apostle, "and having received from the Father the promise of the Holy Spirit, He has poured out this which ye now see and hear."

But that is not the argument: he is coming to it; and again he draws from David's arsenal. The weapon is one with which the Lord has before met and silenced the scribes; now it is to do the happier work of bringing the unbelieving to the faith of the gospel. David has shown, he would let them know, that there was to be for that Son whom he owns to be his Lord, a time of waiting for the Kingdom, with enemies opposing. He shows also that this waiting time would be while He was personally exalted at the right hand of God. "Jehovah said unto my Lord, Sit Thou on My right hand, until I make Thy foes the footstool for Thy feet." Thus the pause before the taking of David's throne is itself a proof of the Messiahship of Jesus, instead of being an argument against it; and David himself it is who testifies to this.

Thus His enemies are to be put down, and those who call upon Jehovah's nance. Brethren, I may speak freely to you of the patriarch David, that he is both [f]dead and buried, and his monument is with us unto this day. Therefore, being a [g]prophet, and knowing that God had sworn to him with an oath that of the [h]fruit of his loins one should sit upon his throne, he, [i]seeing (this) before, spake of the [j]resurrection of Christ, that he was not left in hades, neither did his flesh see corruption. This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are [k]witnesses. Therefore, being by* the right hand of God [l]exalted, and having received from the Father the [m]promise of the Holy Spirit, he hath [n]poured out this which ye behold and hear. For [o]David hath not ascended into the heavens; but he saith himself, [p]The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my [q]right hand until I put thy foes for the [r]footstool of thy feet. Therefore let all the [s]house of Israel know assuredly that God hath [t]made him, this Jesus whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ.

4 (37-40): Mercy for Israel yet.

4. Now, when they heard this, they were [u]pricked in heart, and said to Peter and to the rest of the apostles, Brethren, [v]what shall we do? And Peter said unto

*Or, "at."

f ch. 13. 36. 1 Ki. 2. 1, 10. cf. Neh. 3. 16. cf. Zech. 1. 5.
g cf. 2 Sam. 23. 2. cf. 2 Pet. 1. 21. cf. Ps. 22. 1, etc. with 1 Pet. 1. 10, 11.
h cf. Ps. 89. 3, 4. cf. 2 Sam. 7. 12-17. cf. Rom. 1. 3. cf. Ps. 132. 11.
i cf. Ps. 72. 1, 17, 20.
j cf. Ps. 40. 1-3. cf. Ps. 110. 1.
k ch. 4. 33.
l cf. ch. 3. 13. cf. Phil. 2. 9-11.
m cf. ch. 1. 4 with Jno. 14. 16, 17, 26.
n ver. 17. cf. Tit. 3. 5, 6.
o cf. Prov. 30. 4. cf. Jno. 3. 13.
p Ps. 110. 1.
q cf. Heb. 1. 3; cf. Eph. 1. 20, 21.
r cf. Heb. 2. 8, 9; cf. 1 Cor. 15. 25-28.
s ver. 22; cf. ch. 3. 25, 26; cf. ch. 13. 26, 46.
t cf. Ps. 45. 3-8; cf. Is. 53. 12.
u cf. Gen. 42. 21; cf. Zech. 12. 10; cf. ch. 7. 54.
v cf. Lk. 3. 10-14; cf. ch. 22. 10. cf. ch. 16. 30, 31.

Name and find salvation in the last days must accept as Saviour Him whom Israel has rejected: for, "let all the house of Israel know assuredly," concludes the apostle, "that God has made that same Jesus whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ."

4. The proof is conclusive, and the arrow of conviction is winged by the Spirit to the hearts of the listeners there. "Brethren," they cry out in alarm, "what shall we do?" And the grace that meets them is full and immediate. Let them in true repentance give up their sinful opposition to the Christ of God, and be baptized, each one, in dependence on the name of Jesus, for the remission of sins, and they should themselves receive the gift of the Holy Spirit; for the promise was to them and to their children, and to those afar off, even as many as the Lord (Jehovah) their God should call. But we must look at this more particularly.

In the Lord's commission to His disciples, as we have it in Luke's Gospel, repentance and remission of sins are to be preached in the Name of the risen Christ to all the nations, beginning at Jerusalem. This is accordingly what we find here,—repentance and remission of sins; though with an addition which has to be taken into account.

The Name of Jesus Christ has been proclaimed by the apostle to the sinners of Jerusalem; faith in that Name, if real, will of necessity produce repentance in the hearts of His rejectors hitherto. What a discovery of the state of man is the cross which he has given to the Christ of God! "Pricked in the heart" they may well be; but the apostle declares the mercy of God as pledging itself to those who, undoing their former rejection, take their place now as loyal subjects of the Crucified One. As the open sign of this, they must be "baptized in dependence on the Name of Jesus Christ:" baptism being the authoritative way of discipling (Matt. xxviii. 19), and His Kingdom being a Kingdom of truth (Jno. xviii. 37). Peter is using thus the two keys of the Kingdom (Matt. xvi. 19; see the notes).

them, [w]Repent, and be [x]baptized, each one of you, in dependence on* the name of Jesus Christ, for the [y]remission of sins, and ye shall receive the [z]gift of the Holy Spirit. For the [a]promise is for you and for your [b]children, and for all who are [c]afar off, as many as [the]

*It is not "in" the name, as generally translated, but "on" (ἐπί). One may say, "on account of," but it is feeble, and the word is used as given above. The Name of Christ gives character and motive to the baptism.

w Lk. 24.47. ch. 3. 19. ch. 20. 21. cf. Ps.51.3,5.
x cf. Matt. 28. 19. cf. ch.22.16. cf. Gal.3.27, 28.
y cf. Jno. 20. 23. cf. Rom.10. 9. cf. Rom. 6.
3, 4. z cf. ch. 5. 32; cf. ch. 10. 44, 45; cf. Eph. 1. 13. a cf. vers. 17, etc; cf. ch. 19. 2-6. b cf. Is. 54. 13; cf. ch. 16. 31. c cf. ch. 11. 15-18; cf. ch. 1. 8; cf. Is. 49. 1.

The connection of baptism with the remission of sins is a difficulty with many. It has been so much abused in the interests of sacramentalism, that it is no wonder if the very allowance of any connection should be abhorrent to those who, rightly refusing the mediatorship of sinful men between the soul and God, identify such a thought with any connection of the kind. But it is not faith to be afraid of Scripture; and, in some sense, Scripture does make baptism, not a prerequisite to the washing away of sins, but the actual doing of this. If Peter here bids his hearers be baptized for the remission of sins, Ananias clinches the two things together in his words to Saul of Tarsus: "Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the Name of the Lord." It is not the place yet to examine this particularly, but it cannot fairly be denied that the washing away of sins of which he speaks is put as the effect of baptism. If we are to meet Romanism effectually, we must frankly own the truth that is in it. It is not possible to maintain the ground that here a remission of sins by men is not intended. Did not the Lord, in fact, say to His disciples, "Whosesoever sins ye remit, they are remitted to them"? He certainly did. To be able to illustrate this by the example of baptism cannot surely endanger the gospel with those who know it. Nor can any limiting the power to remit sins to the apostles avail to alter the conditions of the case. We can only affirm that the question of the Jews, in the sense in which they made it, is simply unanswerable: "Who can forgive sin, but God alone?" We must answer: As before God, none! He does not give His glory to another.

On the other hand, to apply a text like this to the preaching of the gospel, as if this were the power of the keys, as is so often done among Protestants, is to weaken the cause which it is intended to defend. Whose sins do I remit, when I preach the gospel? Clearly, none! And it is just here, where the question is of sins being put away from before God, that it is utterly impossible for men to do anything. Neither baptism nor anything else that can be done by man, can cleanse a soul for heaven; nor has it to do with admission there at all, but with discipleship, and therefore with the earth, and not with the heaven. It does not even admit into the Church; for there another baptism, that of the Spirit, perfectly distinct from it, takes its place, as we have seen. He who as Creator has given everything its place from the beginning does not override this, and confound all our thoughts by making matter do the work of Spirit, any more than He puts man into His own place. We must keep these lines clear, or everything falls into confusion. But there is a sphere of things on earth, which is in a peculiar way that of His interests, in which He has put man in responsibility to have things after His own mind, and where therefore a certain authority is necessarily committed to him. Here things are to be kept clean for Him; and therefore he must be able to pronounce within fixed limits between clean and unclean; therefore to cleanse for that sphere. Admission to fellowship or readmission after the suspension of this, these are examples with which we are all familiar. Baptism for the remission of sins is not difficult to understand in this way,—an authoritative, governmental remission, which testified on God's part to a soul His disposition towards it, if, on its side, there were no dishonesty of heart, but truthful response to the divine approach to it.

Lord our God shall [d]call. And with many other words did he testify and exhort them, saying, Be saved* from this [e]perverse generation.

5 (41-47): Results

5. Those, therefore, who [f]received his word were baptized; and in that day there were added about [g]three thousand souls. And they persevered in the apostles' [h]doctrine and [i]fellowship, in the [j]breaking of bread and [k]prayers. And [l]fear came on every soul, and many [m]wonders and signs took place through the apostles.

d cf. ch. 13. 48. cf. Rom. 9. 23-26.
e cf. Matt. 3. 7. cf. ch. 7. 51.
f cf. ch. 17. 11, 12. ctr. Jno. 1. 11.
g cf. ch. 1. 15. cf. Jno. 12. 24. cf. Jno. 14. 12.

* Or, "save yourselves."

h cf. 2 Tim. 3. 14; cf. Col. 3. 16. i cf. 1 John 1. 3. j cf. ch. 20. 7; cf. 1 Cor. 11. 23-29. k cf. ch. 3. 1. cf. ch. 6. 4. l cf. Heb. 12. 28; cf. 1 Pet. 1. 17-19. m ch. 5. 12-16.

The Gift of the Holy Spirit is promised to every one who turns to God after this manner in true subjection to Jesus Christ as Lord. We must, of course, distinguish this one Gift common to all from the various "gifts" (charismata,—a different word) which were imparted variously. These will come to be considered in another place. Where the Spirit is, the gifts of the Spirit will, more or less, be found. The one is the Source; the other the stream; and, amid the changing forms of the latter, the fundamental Gift, without which is no Christianity, abides the same.

The apostle closes with assuring them of Israel's interest in the blessing, even though it had a wider range, as Joel had declared as to the day of which he spoke. The promise, he tells them, is for you and for your children; but beyond these, for all that are afar off,—the Gentiles; yet not as claim; even Israel could have no claim; it depended for all entirely upon the call of God's grace: "to as many," he adds, "as the Lord (that is, Jehovah) our God shall call."

We shall have to notice in its place that, when we come to the reception of the Spirit on the part of the Gentiles, the insistence upon baptism as a condition drops. God takes things into His own hands, as one may say, and the Spirit falls upon Cornelius and those with him while they are yet listening to Peter's address, and before ever a hint of baptism has been given. Saul of Tarsus, again, is baptized first, and so are the disciples of John at Ephesus. In the case of the Samaritans, again, even when they have been baptized there is still delay; and they have to receive the Spirit from the apostles' hands. Thus the order of reception is conditioned upon the persons: for the Jews who had openly rejected the Lord, baptism is always a pre-requisite; they must openly own Him whom they had disowned. The varying order, but above all, the entire setting aside of ordinances in the case of the Gentiles (which is our own case, for the most part now,) at once destroys the ritualistic teaching as to baptism. According to this, Cornelius must have received the Spirit while in an unregenerate condition! for he had not yet received the "sacrament of regeneration." Thus do the simple facts of history of themselves refute the whole system of error. Scripture is in all its parts prophetic; and the wisdom of God has given ample warning against the inroads of evil, for those who have hearts open to receive instruction. We shall see this more and more, as we go on with the inspired writer.

"With many other words," he adds, "did (Peter) testify, and exhort them, saying, Be saved from this perverse generation."

5. God is at work, and the harvest is large and immediate: three thousand souls in one day! Nor was this temporary emotion; but the effects were permanent as they were deep. "They persevered in the apostles' teaching and fellowship,—in the breaking of bread and prayers." In this enumeration, that to which they owed all—the teaching—comes necessarily first, as the root of all the rest. Here was what gave them their fellowship; it was in the truth: participation in that drew them together. They had nothing of the poet's liberalism,—"for forms of faith let graceless zealots fight;"—grace had come to them in inseparable companionship with truth, which they found not in the world,

And all that believed were [n]together, and had all things [o]common, and [p]sold their possessions and goods, and distributed them to all, according as any one had [q]need. And they, continuing daily with one accord in the [r]temple, and [s]breaking bread at* home, received [their] food with [t]gladness and singleness of heart, [u]praising God, and having [v]favor with all the people; and day by day the Lord [w]added together those being saved.

*This may be rendered, "from house to house."

n cf. ch. 4. 23. cf. 1 Cor. 12. 13.
o cf. ch. 4. 32-35. cf. 1 Jno. 3. 17, 18 with 2 Thess. 3. 1-12.
p cf. Lk. 12. 33. cfr. Lk. 18. 22 with 2 Cor. 5. 14, 15.
q cf. Eph. 4. 28.
r cf. ch. 3. 1.
s ver. 42; cf. Heb. 13. 10-13.
t cf. Neh. 8. 10-12; cf. Eccl. 9. 7.
u cf. Eph. 5. 18-20.
v ch. 5. 13; cf. Prov. 16. 7; cf. 1 Pet. 4. 12-16.
w ch. 5. 14; cf. ch. 9. 31 cf. 1 Pet. 2. 4, 5; cf. Rom. 15. 7.

but which had exposed the world and set them apart from it to Him whom the world had crucified and by whose cross they were crucified to it. Of the Church they knew little yet; but they had found Christ; and the force of that irresistible attraction which drew them as to a common centre, drew them to one another. The Church began as the spiritual creation of that Spirit which had come to bear witness of Christ; and it knew Him before as yet it had learned to know itself.

These things find illustration in that which follows next,—"the breaking of bread,"—which from its first application to a common meal, we see here set apart to its sacred use in reference to that which the Lord had instituted for a remembrance of Himself. It is strange that any should dispute this application in the place before us, where certainly we are not meant to understand that the disciples "persevered" in partaking of food, nor in coming together for this, (which they never did,) nor in the "love-feasts," of which we read in Jude, but which were not an institution of Christ at all, and probably a later practice. The preliminary meal, of which the disciples had partaken with their Lord before the Last Supper, was the passover, which could not be thought of in this connection. And if, as is very probable, it was at the end of a common meal that they remembered the Lord's death, there could be no reason for so unlikely a thing, and so repulsive to the warm Christian hearts of those who are here spoken of, as naming the meal with which the Supper was associated, while forgetting that which alone made it worthy of mention.

The breaking of bread, in the mention thus made of it, shows the Lord as the Centre of His people, the Object before them, the Sustenance of their true life, the Effecter of their communion with one another: this realized in that precious Death, passed for ever, yet ever abiding in that which it has wrought and that which it has displayed. Lastly, prayer manifests the sense of constant need which the nearer we are to God is always the more realized.

The effect upon the outside multitude was that of fear; signs and wonders being continually wrought by the apostles as the special witnesses to the Risen Saviour. The people in the mass seemed with them, as in His early life with the Lord Himself. They were, in fact, at present in that border land, so hopeful, yet so unsafe, which will presently empty itself either into the fixed abodes of conviction and faith, or with more likelihood, into the seats of alienation and rejection.

Among those who believed was manifested a unity of heart and interest, in which the natural selfishness of the fallen condition was swallowed up in the fulness of a love which the sense of divine love had begotten. They were together in such sort that all they had was held in common; not by any law or outward constraint, which would have spoiled it all, but in the consciousness of what they were all to Christ, and what Christ was to each and all of them. Enriched by Him with a blessing which nothing could diminish, but the more they ministered it, the more they had it, "they sold their possessions and goods, and

SUBDIVISION 4. (Chaps. iii., iv.)

The Testing of the Nation.

1 (iii. 1-11): The power of Jesus' Name.

1. NOW Peter and John were going up into the [x] temple at the hour of prayer, being the ninth hour. And a certain man, [y] lame from his mother's womb, was being carried, whom they placed daily at the temple gate which is called [z] Beautiful, to ask [a] alms of those who went into the temple; who, seeing Peter and John about to enter into the temple, asked an alms. But Peter, fastening his eyes upon him with John, said, Look on us. And he gave heed unto them, expecting to receive something from them. But Peter said, [b] Silver and gold have I not; but what I have I give thee:

x ch. 2. 46. cf. Lk. 24. 53. ctr. ch. 21. 26-30.
y cf. ch. 14. 8. cf. Jno. 5. 5. cf. Rom. 8. 3. cf. Heb. 7. 18, 19.
z cf. He. 10. 1.
a cf. Jno. 9. 8. cf. Lk. 18. 35. ctr. Rom. 8. 32. ctr. 1 Cor. 3. 21-23.
b cf. 2 Cor. 6. 10. cf. 1 Cor. 4. 11-13. cf. Phil. 4. 11-13.

distributed them to all, as any one had need." So by more than miracles was the power of the Spirit displayed among them. As for the rest, they were in their own consciousness but a remnant of Israel who had received Messiah. And though by the indwelling of the Spirit the House of God after a new manner had begun upon earth, yet their daily resort was still to the temple; and this was in the love that still waited upon His ancient people, permitted and used of God for testimony to the nation. But the temple after all was not where they could enjoy what was peculiar to themselves. The bread in which they remembered what had made all new to them was broken at home. In spite of the ambiguity of the expression, and the reference to the ordinary meal which follows it here, this is the most natural application of the breaking of bread in this place also. There seems scarcely need to tell us that they ate their meals at home! and to refer it, as has been done, to their having no longer part in the peace-offering or other sacrifices, has everything against it, at so early a date as this. Long afterwards we hear that the many thousands of the Jews who believed were all zealous of the law; and Paul even is persuaded to enter purified into the temple with men who were distinctly to have an offering offered for every one of them (chap. xxi. 20, 26). It is vain, therefore, to seek to transfer these new-made Christians to a later time than that to which we have, in fact, arrived. God bore long with the continuance of that which had been His own institution, and it would be many years before the epistle to the Hebrews would be written. The statement here seems certainly to have its only proper application to the Lord's Supper, while it would be not unsuited in such connection to speak of how even the common meals were taken with the gladness which the Christian feast had communicated to them.

Thus the happy days went on; and day by day the Lord added together those that were being saved. Israel would not yet turn to the light vouchsafed her; but a remnant were being marked off, in which would be found the nucleus of a new testimony: to the principalities and powers in heavenly places was to be made known in the Church the manifold wisdom of God.

SUBD. 4.

We are now to see the testing of the nation by the offer of divine grace to it as a whole,—the distinct promise that, even yet, if they will now repent and receive Him, Jesus, though in heaven, will return, and the blessing prophesied for them shall be fulfilled. The commission already given as to the Gentiles lies, therefore, still in abeyance, because the question of relation between Jew and Gentile in the new condition introduced will be affected by the answer given to such an offer. The hostility of the leaders is apparent from the outset; but that which ends hope is that the people as a whole more and more identify themselves with the position of the leaders; and by and by it is from the Jewish element that even in far-off cities the bitterest opposition comes to be found.

in the [c]name of Jesus Christ the Nazarene, rise up and walk. And he took him by the right hand and raised him up; and immediately his feet and ankles became strong, and [d]leaping up he stood and [e]walked, and entered with them into the temple, walking and leaping, and [f]praising God. And all the people saw him walking and praising God; and they recognized him that it was he who sat for alms at the beautiful gate of the temple, and they were filled with [g]wonder and amazement at what had happened to him. And, as he held fast to Peter and John, all the people ran together to them in the porch that is called Solomon's, greatly wondering.

[c] ch. 4. 7-10. ver. 16. cf. ch. 16. 18.
[d] ch. 14. 10. cf. ch. 16. 24, 34. cf. Is. 35. 6. cf. ch. 10. 44.
[e] cf. 1 Thess. 2. 12. cf. Gal. 5. 25. ctr. Matt. 13. 20, 21.
[f] cf. Lk. 18. 43. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 9.
[g] ch. 2. 12.

2 (iii. 12-16): Conviction as to the denial and death of Jesus.

2 And Peter seeing it, answered to the people, Men of Israel, why marvel ye at this? or why look ye so intently upon us, as if by our [h]own power or piety we had made him walk? The God of Abraham, and of [h] cf. Gen. 41. 16. cf. 2 Cor. 12. 9. cf. 1 Cor. 3. 6, 7.

This is specially roused by the reception of the Gentiles on equal terms with Jews, by which, of course, these forfeit the exclusive privileges they have really so little valued. But this does not fall to be considered yet.

1. A man, lame from his birth, was accustomed to be carried and laid down at the temple gate which was called Beautiful, to solicit alms from those who went into the temple. He cannot but remind us of the similarly impotent man at the pool of Bethesda upon whom the Lord Himself works a like miracle of healing; and as in that case, we cannot but see here the condition of the nation, impotent at a door which impotence could not enter. The dwelling place of God, however nigh, and however beautiful the approach to it might be, was powerless for blessing, and indeed now vacant,—a seemly formalism only. They praised the gate indeed by which none really entered, great as might be the throng of worshipers, into the presence of God. The beggarly, maimed condition, for those who had eyes to see, characterized all who sought that way of approach.

It is in the consciousness of such a state that the power of the Name of Jesus makes itself known. At the ninth hour, being the third hour of prayer, the hour of the evening sacrifice,—the time when the answer to Daniel was vouchsafed, God manifests Himself in answer to that Name by Peter, who with John is going up still among those of whom they are not. Poor in that world in which his Lord had become poor, he has in the One despised by Israel as the Nazarene the secret of a power still available to them, if like the beggar they will but ask an alms. First lifted, he then leaps up and stands, and now enters into the temple a true worshiper. How simple and natural a picture of such an one, to whom, released from his life-bondage, every movement is a new joy, a leap of the heart to God. The people recognize with amazement this transformation from impotence to exuberant life, and seeing the man holding Peter and John, run to them in the porch called Solomon's, greatly wondering. Sad reminder of that ruin, from which they would fain believe they have emerged! well will it be if they let this preach to them their need of a Saviour, while they listen to the assurance that He indeed is come.

2. But this involves the story of their sin, which is charged home upon them. They need not look so earnestly on them, (the apostles say,) as if by power of their own, or by reason of their great piety, they had made the man to walk. No, it was the God of their fathers,—of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, from whom they had wandered so far as to be unconscious of His doings, who had acted for the glory of His Servant Jesus whom they had delivered up and even forced His condemnation at the hands of the Gentile governor, when he had

Isaac, and of Jacob, the God of our fathers, hath [e]glorified his Servant* Jesus; whom ye delivered up, and [f]denied him in the presence of Pilate, when he had adjudged to [k]release [him]. But ye denied the Holy and Righteous One, and demanded a [l]murderer to be granted unto you, and [m]killed the Author of life; whom God hath [n]raised from among the dead, whereof we are [o]witnesses. And his name, through [p]faith in his name, hath made this man strong, whom ye behold and know; even faith which is by him hath given him this perfect soundness in the presence of you all.

3 (iii.17–26): Yet He may return and the restitution of all things be fulfilled.

3. And now, brethren, I know that ye did it in [q]ignorance, as also your rulers; but God hath thus [r]fulfilled the things which he had fore-announced by the mouth of all the [s]prophets that his Christ should suffer. [t]Repent therefore, and be† converted, that your [u]sins may be blotted out; so that [v]times of refreshing may

*Greek παις, household servant, not δουλος, bondman.

†Or, "turn again."

e cf. 1 Pet. 1. 21. cf. Matt. 28. 18. cf. Jno. 2. 11.
f cf. Lk. 23. 5. ctr. Matt. 26. 70. cf. Gal. 1. 23.
k cf. Matt. 27. 24.
l cf. Lk. 23. 13–25. cf. Jno. 5. 43. cf. 2 Thess. 2. 8–12.
m ch. 2. 23. Acts 7. 52. cf. Jno. 10. 18.
n ch. 2. 24.
o ch. 4. 33.
p cf. ch. 14. 9. cf. ch. 15. 9. cf. Mk. 9. 23, 24.
q cf. 1 Cor. 2. 8. cf. 1 Tim. 1. 13. ctr. Matt. 21. 38; cf. Lk. 23. 34; cf. Rom. 11. 25–27.
r cf. ch. 13. 27; cf. Matt. 26. 54, 56; cf. Lk. 24. 46.
s cf. Is. 53; cf. Ps. 22; cf. Zech. 13. 7; ch. 17. 3; cf. 1 Pet. 1. 11, 12.
t ch. 2. 38; Lk. 24. 46, 47.
u cf. Is. 43. 25; cf. Jer. 33. 8; cf. Ps. 85. 1, 2.
v cf. Ps. 65. 12, 13; cf. Ps. 72. 6; cf. Hos. 6. 1–3; cf. Zech. 10. 1; cf. Is. 35. 1, 2.

given judgment in His favor. They had chosen instead of the Author of life, a murderer! but God had raised Him from the dead; and His Name, through faith in it, had wrought this miracle.

3. Hopeless indeed might their condition seem who had killed the Author of life! That which was their fundamental need they had put from them in a manner seeming to forbid all hope. As the Servant of God, He had come to minister to them, and they had struck down the ministering Hand. The Gentile would have saved whom the Jew put to death: Him whom they knew as the Holy and Righteous, and from whom mercy flowed out still, as it had flowed out in His life.

But the City of Refuge stood open still, as now divine grace assured them. As at the cross He had prayed for them as ignorantly doing what yet they had so heartily done, so now the apostle grounds still upon their ignorance, as the only possible argument in their behalf, an offer once again of mercy. God too had overruled for the accomplishment of His determinate purposes of good this wickedness itself. Messiah needs must suffer; and this suffering is of grace on His part. Grace then can manifest itself by its means. Did they repent now, nationally, and turn to God, not only would their sins be blotted out, but the presence of Jehovah would be again manifested in their midst, the unfailing sign of the Spirit's renewing influence, and He would send once more their appointed Messiah,—Jesus. Not till His return from heaven would come the long expected blessing for the earth, the time to which all prophets have ever been looking forward,—times of restoration physical as well as spiritual. These cannot be, then, while Israel is still in unbelief; and the long season that has elapsed since the offer made to them by the apostle here has been but a time of suspension of the earthly promises. God has, however, in the meanwhile been revealing and carrying into effect other purposes, and of fuller, higher blessing, —of grace therefore more wondrous, the unfolding of which we shall see gradually beginning, as soon as it is clear that Israel as a nation is still going to reject the grace yet being extended towards her, with the full testimony of the Spirit also, to make it good. In what is here before us, the trial is now upon her, and our eyes are directed to the result of this.

The apostle goes on to show the emphatic witness of Moses himself to Christ.

come from the presence of the Lord, and that he may [w]send the Christ fore-ordained to you, Jesus; * whom heaven must indeed receive [x]until the times of restitution of all things, of which God hath [y]spoken by the mouth of his holy prophets since time began. Moses indeed said, A [z]Prophet shall [the] Lord your God raise up unto you from among your brethren like unto me; him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you: and it shall be that every soul that shall not hear that prophet shall be [a]destroyed from among the people. And indeed [b]all the prophets, from Samuel and those following, as many as have spoken, have announced also these days. Ye are the [c]sons of the prophets, and of the covenant which God appointed to our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy [d]seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed. To you [e]first, God, having raised up his Servant, sent him to bless you, in [f]turning every one of you from his iniquities.

4 (iv. 1-22): The failure under test.

4. But while they were speaking to the people, the [g]priests and the captain of the temple, and the Saddu-

w cf. ch. 1. 11. cf. Ps. 96. 12, 13.
x cf. Ps. 110. 1. cf. Hos. 5. 15.
y cf. Is. 1. 25, 26. cf. Jer. 23. 5-8.
z Deut. 18. 15-19. cf. Lk. 24. 19. ch. 7. 37.
a cf. Jno. 16. 9. cf. ch. 13. 41.
b cf. 1 Sam. 15. 26-28. cf. 2 Pet. 1. 19.
c cf. Matt. 23. 31. cf. Rom. 9. 4, 5.
d Gen. 12. 3. Gen. 22. 18.
e cf. Lk. 24. 47. cf. ch. 13. 46. cf. Ro. 1. 16.
f cf. Matt. 1. 21. cf. Is. 59. 20.
g cf. Matt. 27. 1.

* Or, "Christ Jesus fore-ordained for you."

A Prophet like to himself he had declared that Jehovah would raise up to them: One whose authority he strongly affirms; not a mere expounder of what had been spoken before, but the Originator of a new dispensation, as was Moses, and necessarily, therefore, in advance of that which he had inaugurated. In the passage in Deuteronomy from which Peter quotes, it is after the inability of the people to draw nigh to God has been demonstrated, and the Lord has acquiesced in their own statement of it,—"They have well said that which they have spoken," —that He declares that He will raise up to them a new Prophet. Had Moses sufficed, there would not have needed to be another; but the Law must necessarily fail to bring nigh to God. "There shall no man see Me and live" had been His word to the lawgiver himself; and the veil before the holiest bore witness to it throughout the dispensation. But in this failure all fails for man's blessing; and on this account, as the apostle tells us, God finds fault with the law. There must be, then, another Prophet and a different message. If He be heard, then there opens for the recipient of it that otherwise inaccessible way to God; while, if He be not heard, there is indeed no remedy: "every soul that shall not hear that Prophet shall be destroyed from among the people." Thus has Moses spoken of One greater than himself. Thank God, though Israel as a nation rejected Him, as we know, in the days to which we are now looking back, yet "Him shall ye hear" is declared in her favor with regard to days to come. The blessing has been long delayed; but in the meanwhile the gospel has risen up above these human barriers to only a more wondrous height, to overflow to the nations with a fuller blessing.

But thus then had Moses spoken; and from Samuel, through a succession of witnesses raised up, the same things had been constantly uttered. The apostle urges them now upon His hearers, as the legitimate heirs, the sons of the prophets, and of the wide-reaching covenant of promise given before the Law, and not crippled by its ineffectiveness. In Abraham's Seed all the families of the earth would indeed find the blessing. To them, therefore, had Jesus come first of all, to bring it to them, in turning them every one from the iniquities which now were the true hindrance.

4. A sinister interruption here takes place,—the first note of warning from cees came upon them, being grieved that they taught the people, and preached in Jesus the [h]resurrection from among the dead. And they laid hands on them, and put them in ward until the morrow; for it was already evening. But many of those who had heard the word [i]believed; and the number of the men came to about five thousand.

And it came to pass upon the morrow that their rulers and elders and scribes in Jerusalem, and Annas the high priest, and Caiaphas, and John, and Alexander, and as many as were of the high-priestly family, were [j]gathered together. And when they had set them in the midst, they enquired, By what power, or by what name, have ye done this? Then Peter, [k]filled with the Holy Spirit, said unto them, Rulers of the people and elders of Israel,* if we are to-day being examined on the ground of a good deed done to an impotent man, by what means he hath been made whole, be it known

[h] ver. 33. cf. ch. 26. 23.

[i] cf. ch. 2. 41.

[j] cf. Jno. 11. 47. cf. Jno. 16. 1-3.

[k] cf. ch. 2. 4. cf. ch. 13. 51, 52. cf. Matt. 10. 20.

*Many omit "of Israel."

the heads of the people. While the lower classes listened, the religious leaders felt the preaching in the Name of Jesus to be a direct attack upon themselves. The most forward now and henceforth were the Sadducees, with whom the resurrection of the Saviour was the overthrow of their nihilistic creed. How happy might they have been to have their dread negations penetrated by this glorious light from heaven! but, in fact, the more complete the proof of the truth of the gospel, the more they were stirred up against it. Had it been less complete, they would undoubtedly have acted in a milder fashion; but when argument is made impossible, the will that lurks in it stands out from under the cover with the more stubborn energy to win the already decided battle. Of all men, the hopeless Sadducee should have been the most ready for the gospel; but in reality he was more indifferent than hopeless; his creed was positive in the present rather than negative as to the future; a fair world balanced in his mind the dimness of heaven. Thus he might in any wise not have troubled himself about the enthusiasm of the disciples, had not the miracles brought God too near and preached too alarmingly to the conscience. That should have broken him down before God, but that here the fanaticism of the rebellious spirit was aroused to get rid of the truth with the witness to the truth. But the truth not only abides, but sustains the witness also which it has called forth. The apostles are imprisoned; but the number of the converts rises to five thousand men. It seems as if the narrator were thinking, in this manner of statement, of the camp and battle-field.

The morrow comes, and with it the whole council is gathered together. They who have slain the Master now face the disciples, to find them very unlike the timid men they had been. Now it was not they that spoke, but, as it had been promised, the Spirit of their Father that spoke in them. The foremost now in the confession of Christ was he who had, in the very recent past, denied Him; and with none of them was there any hesitation or tremor of soul. They were "in nothing terrified by their adversaries," which the apostle speaks of afterwards to the Philippians in like case as "to them an evident token of perdition, but to you of salvation, and that of God" (Phil. i. 28).

Were they not afraid to put their idle question, when the "power" which had wrought was manifest and before their eyes, and manifestly divine? And did they not tremble to hear—so attested—the Name of Him whom they had slain? Had they heard of Peter's old denial? and did they dream that even then he might repeat it? Vain hope indeed, if it was theirs! The "Spirit of

to you all, and to all the people of Israel, that by the [l]name of Jesus Christ the Nazarene, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from among the dead, by him doth this man stand here before you whole. This is the [m]Stone set at naught by you the builders, which is become the head of the corner. And there is [n]no salvation in any other; for there is none other name [o]under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved.

Now when they saw the [p]boldness of Peter and John, and perceived that they were [q]illiterate and home-bred* men, they wondered; they [r]recognized them also, that they had been with Jesus. And beholding the man who was healed standing with them, they had no [s]reply. But when they had commanded them to go out of the council, they conferred among themselves, saying, What shall we do to these men? for that indeed an [t]evident sign hath been done by them is manifest to all that dwell in Jerusalem; and we cannot deny it. But that it [u]spread no further among the people, let us [straitly] [v]threaten them that they speak no more to any in this name. And having called them, they charged them not to speak at all nor teach in the name

l ch. 3. 6, 16.
m Ps.118.22. Matt.21.42. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 6-8.
n cf. ch. 13. 26. cf. 1 Tim. 2. 5. cf. Jno.14.6.
o cf. Gal. 1. 7, 8. cf. Rom. 3. 19. *cf.*Col.1.23.
p cf. vers.29 -31. cf. Rom. 1. 16. *ctr.*Jno.18. 25-27.
q *cf.*1 Cor.1. 26-29. *cf.*Jno. 7.15 -17.
r cf. Lk. 22. 56.
s ver. 16. cf. Jno. 11. 47. cf. Jno. 15. 24.
t *cf.*ch.13.31. cf. ch. 7. 51.
u ctr. Mk.1. 44, 45.
v ch.5.28,40.

* The word suggests the thought of "private persons," in contrast to those who had been in public life.

glory and of God" was filling Peter now; and they had to hear their guilt charged home upon them, and Jesus Christ the Nazarene declared, as His own lips had once intimated, the "Stone" rejected by the builders, as prophecy had forewarned would be the case. Yes, the building of living stones upon this Corner-stone was already taking place, as thousands in Jerusalem were now witness; by which their office of builders had plainly passed from them. Nay, more; there was no salvation either in any other; none other name under heaven given among men, whereby they could be saved!

They do not, in the presence of their persecutors, as before the people, append to this the promise of Christ's return. This hard-trodden ground must be plowed up, before such good seed as this could be safely committed to it. But they preach salvation, as to perishing men, Sanhedrists as they might be, and doctors of the Law; they themselves in possession of the only security for life and blessing, which they offer with a conscious certainty which, as we know, the teaching of the scribes had not, but which had always characterized their Master's teaching. Still, as of old, it causes astonishment; illiterate, home-bred men as they plainly were. And there stands with them their voucher, a crippled beggar restored, with a new gladness greater than for his physical healing! Among themselves, when the accused have been for awhile sent aside, the council admit their perplexity. An evident sign has been done which they can as little deny as they choose to accept; and the worst of it is that it has laid hold of the people;—for men with their strong faith in the present an argument most difficult to resist; for such faith seeks no martyrdom. Truth also they seek not, these leaders of the people, but that which is convenient and will preserve their valued authority. They decide therefore that they will threaten the disciples, and forbid their speaking any more in the name of Jesus. If they cannot refute, they can yet forbid. They can make wrong by edict what they cannot prove to be wrong by any argument they possess.

But they find the men intractable beyond their expectation: men to whom God is the fountain of all authority, and whose consciences are, without fear of results, before Him alone. Their course is fixed, to obey God rather than of Jesus. But Peter and John answered and said to them, Whether it be right before God to hearken unto you [w]more than unto God, judge ye; for we [x]cannot but speak what we have seen and heard. But when they had further threatened them, they let them go, finding no way they could punish them, on account of the people; for they all were [y]glorifying God for that which was come to pass. For the man was more than forty years old, upon whom this sign of healing had come to pass.

5 (iv.23-36): God with His own.

5. And being [z]let go, they went to their own [company], and reported all that the chief priests and elders had said unto them. And when they heard it, they [a]lifted up their voice to God with one accord, and said, [b]Sovereign Lord, thou art He who hath made heaven and earth and sea, and all things in them; who by the

w ch. 5. 29.
x cf. 1 Cor. 9. 16.
cf. Jer. 20. 9.
cf. Am. 3. 8.
cf. 2 Cor. 5. 11-15, 20, 21.
y ch. 3. 10.
cf. ch. 5. 26.
z cf. ch. 14. 26.
cf. Heb. 10. 25.
a cf. ch. 1. 14.
cf. ch. 12. 5, 12.
b cf. Ps. 114. 7.
cf. Ps. 124. 8.
cf. ch. 17. 24.

man; and they dare even to appeal to the consciences of their judges in behalf of such a determination. With the council the fear of men is in proportion to the absence of their fear of Him; and this deters them from going further at the present time. They threaten and let them go. For the wave of popular feeling on account of the miracle that has been done is at present not safely to be resisted.

5. The disciples return to their own company;—to how different an atmosphere! The opposition of the enemy had failed, and was destined to fail; it had only given opportunity to set before the whole council of the people the blessed Name which it was their happiness to make known. It had thus furthered their work, not hindered it; and this was but the type and prophecy of all the future,—"He maketh the wrath of man to praise Him, and the remainder of wrath He will restrain." The threatenings only show the restraint actually put upon those whose will for harm could not be doubted, and strengthened in going forward those whom they were intended to intimidate. All this they now report among those greeting them on their return, who answer with an outburst of praise, lifting up their voices to God with one accord, as Sovereign Lord of all that He has created, and who has fulfilled what long He had declared in overruling the conspiracy of Jews and Gentiles against Jehovah and against His Christ. The quotation is from the second psalm, which, according to the common belief among the Jews, they ascribe to David. With strange and terrible unanimity, indeed, had all the world (Jews and Gentiles together) combined against Him with whom was all the hope of the world. But this is only the proof of the thorough sameness of man everywhere,—not only one blood, as God made them, but of one spirit, such as the Fall has made them. Only divine grace has anywhere brought in a difference, and then by a change so great and sovereign that the Spirit of God speaks of it as "new creation." Israel's rejection of her Lord was indeed a perfect witness of how all help that could be given him, short of that, must be unavailing, when the Jew it was who clamored for His crucifixion from the unwilling Gentile. So too it was the Jew who was to hound on the heathen persecution of His followers in the time soon to come.

They had accomplished their evil will. There was no resistance. The Light of the world had seemed to be quenched in darkness; but only to rise again in unsetting glory. There had been done just what God's hand and counsel determined before to be done!

What then could His disciples ask, save for boldness to proclaim and follow Christ? He had been more than content through all to be the Servant of that unique and glorious will. They pray only for the stretching out of God's mouth of thy servant * David hath said, [c]Why did the nations rage? and the peoples meditate vain things? The [d]kings of the earth set [themselves], and the rulers were gathered together, against the Lord and against his Christ. For of a truth, against thy holy Servant† Jesus, whom thou hast [e]anointed, were gathered together in this city both [f]Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the nations and the peoples of Israel, to do [g]whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done. And now, Lord, [h]look upon their threatenings, and grant unto thy servants,‡ that with all [i]boldness they may speak thy word, in that thou stretchest out thy hand to heal, and that signs and [j]wonders may be done through the name of thy holy Servant† Jesus. And when they had prayed, the place was [k]shaken where they were gathered together; and they were all [l]filled with the Holy Spirit, and spake the word of God with boldness.

c Ps. 2. 1, 2. cf. Ps. 46. 6, 7.
d cf. Ps. 48. 4. cf. Is. 52. 15.
e cf. Matt. 3. 16, 17. cf. ch. 10. 38.
f Lk. 23. 7-13.
g cf. ch. 13. 27. cf. ch. 2. 23. cf. Jno. 19. 11.
h cf. 2 Ki. 19. 16. cf. 2 Sa. 16. 12. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 21-23.
i cf. Eph. 6. 19. cf. Phil. 1. 20.
j ch. 5. 12-16.
k cf. ch. 2. 2.
l cf. ver. 8.

* Παῖς. Many read, "by the mouth of thy servant, our father David, through the Holy Spirit."

† Παῖς; and always when referring to our Lord.

‡ Literally, "bond servants," δοῦλοι.

hand in such a way as to give them power and courage; and that signs and wonders may be done in Christ's Name, to carry on that blessed service.

How certain is the answer, when the Lord and His interests are the burden of the prayer! and there is no reserve of self-seeking to give unsteadiness to the faith that would lay hold of Omnipotence! The assurance of being heard is immediately granted them, the place being shaken in which they were gathered together. It is the answer of the Creator, as appealed to, and who will yet "shake the heavens and the earth and the sea and the dry land, and shake all nations," to bring in Christ (Hag. ii. 6, 7). But also they are all filled with the Holy Spirit, and speak the word with boldness.

Lest we should sigh and say, These are but records of far-off days, let us remember that we are exhorted, and it is part of our responsibility, therefore, to "be filled with the Spirit" (Eph. v. 18.) This is no question of gifts lost to the Church, nor even of exceptional blessing. We may make it, alas, exceptional; but that is another thing. It is but, in fact, a question of devotedness: for the Spirit is here to glorify Christ, not to give impossible brightness to lives lived in the circle of our own petty interests; which, indeed, so far as they answer to this character, are not in any true sense our interests; for these are all secured with Christ on high. We are identified with Him as our Representative before God, to have resting upon us the favor in which He dwells; and He is identified with us as His representatives on earth, for a life for Him as thus sent into it. We see then how fully and simply in place is what we have here. The disciples are full of His interests. How could it be otherwise than that the Witness for Christ on earth should fill them as vessels of testimony for Him? The same argument will always hold good; and the Spirit can never be indifferent to His glory. To suppose any thing else would be to dishonor Him who is come to abide with us forever, and who is yesterday, to-day, and for ever the same. For us also, every thing else must be shaken, until He is made supreme over all.

There follow also, as surely, the fruits in practical life. The innate selfishness of the heart is surmounted by the influx of spiritual blessing which expands while it overflows it. There was no communistic law among these gathered saints; it would have spoiled all, if there had been; it was a unity of

And of the multitude of those that believed, heart and soul were [m]one; and not one said that any of the things that he possessed was his own, but all things were common to them. And with great power did the apostles give [n]witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus; and great [o]grace was upon them all. For neither was there any in [p]want among them; for as many as were possessors of lands and houses sold them, and brought the price of the things that were sold, and [q]laid them down at the apostles' feet; and distribution was made to every one, according as he might have need.

m ch. 2. 44, 45. cf. 1 Cor. 12. 13.
n ch. 1. 8. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 5-8.
o cf. ch. 2. 47. cf. 1 Pet. 3. 13.
p cf. 2 Cor. 8. 14, 15. cf. Rom. 12. 13. cf. 1 Jno. 3. 17, 18.
q ver. 37. cf. ch. 6. 2-4.

SUBDIVISION 5. (Chap. iv. 36–v. 11.)

The Government of God over those with Him.

AND [r]Joseph, who by the apostles was surnamed Barnabas (which is, being interpreted, A son of consolation), a Levite, by birth a man of Cyprus, being possessed of land, sold it, and brought the money, and laid it at the apostles' feet. But a certain man named Ananias, with Sapphira his wife, sold a possession, and [s]appropriated [part] of the price, his wife also being [t]privy to it, and brought a certain part, and laid it at the apostles' feet. But Peter said, Ananias, why hath [u]Satan filled thy heart to lie to the Holy Spirit, and to appropriate [part] of the price of the land? While it remained did it not remain thine [v]own? and r ch. 11. 22, 23, etc. cf. ch. 15. 39.

s ctr. ch. 4. 36, 37. cf. Josh. 7. 1. cf. Lev. 23. 17. ctr. Deut. 26. 12-14.
t cf. Prov. 11. 21. ctr. 1 Pet. 3. 7.
u cf. Jno. 13. 2, 27. cf. 1 Tim. 6. 10.
v cf. ch. 4. 32. ctr. 2 Cor. 9. 1-9.

heart which allowed none of them to say that what was really his belonged to him. The sale of lands and houses was optional and unsolicited, as we see by the very specification of those who did this. There was therefore no general renunciation of personal title; but a love that knew no holding back from the need of another. It was the instinct of hearts that had found their real possessions in that sphere into which Christ had risen. The glorious fact of resurrection to which testimony was being given now with power took them of necessity out of the world; and great grace was on them all. The deeper need which could not be thus met found still the means to meet it in the actual sale of possessions on the part of those that had them; so that there were none that lacked: the money being laid at the apostles' feet. It is not necessarily that all sold all they had; but that this was the way in which the need was met: the history following, and which grows out of this, seems to make this plain.

SUBD. 5.

We have now to see the government of God over His own, now separated as a distinct company from the mass of Israel, although one could not say, as yet, from Israel itself. The trial of the nation as such is not yet ended. Meanwhile we are called away from this to see the attempt of the enemy against this new beginning, and the solemn judgment of God by which it is defeated. Yet on the other hand, we are not to overlook the divine appreciation of the fruits of the Spirit, where they are found, as in the case of Joseph, surnamed Barnabas, who by his ministry in self-sacrificing love to the need of the saints "purchases to himself a good degree" (1 Tim. iii. 13), and we hear of him accordingly, in the after history. His name answers to his character here,—"one who adds,"—and he becomes indeed a "son of consolation,"—meriting his surname.

In terrible contrast to him is Ananias ("Jah has shown grace") but who abuses grace to his own destruction. The good report of Barnabas, if we may when it was sold, was it not in thine own power? why hast thou conceived this thing in thy heart? thou hast not lied unto [w]men, but unto God. And Ananias, hearing these words, [x]fell down and expired: and there came a great [y]fear upon all that heard. And the young men arose and wrapped him up, and carried him out and buried him.

And it came to pass about three hours afterwards, that his wife, not knowing what had happened, came in. And Peter answered her, [z]Tell me whether ye sold the land for so much? And she said, Yea, for so much. And Peter said unto her, Why have ye [a]agreed together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord? Behold, the feet of those who have buried thy husband are at the door, and they will carry thee out. And [b]immediately she fell at his feet and expired; and the young men came in, and found her dead, and carrying her out, buried her by her husband. And great fear came upon all the assembly, and upon all that heard these things.

w vers. 3, 9.
cf. 1 Thess. 4. 8.
cf. Lk. 10. 16.
ctr. 1 Thes. 2. 13.
cf. 1 Cor. 3. 16, 17.
x cf. Lev. 10. 1–3.
ver. 10.
y ver. 11.
cf. Heb. 12. 28.
z cf. Ezek. 18. 20.
cf. 1 Tim. 5. 22.
a ver. 2.
ctr. Matt. 18. 19.
b ver. 5.
cf. 1 Tim. 5. 24.
ctr. 2 Cor. 12. 20, 21.

judge by the connection, seems to have moved him; but only with an ungodly emulation. He covets the reputation and influence; with perhaps much greater things following, as the movement spreads; but he has no thought, even for this, of making the sacrifice demanded. Outwardly he must do it, while his heart refuses, and thus, in conjunction with his wife, he forms a deliberate plan to deceive,—leaving God out. He actually sells his possession, and professedly brings the whole purchase-money, to lay it down at the apostles' feet. But he has not brought the whole: he reserves a part for himself, and in the midst of the divine power working (only in grace as yet, which probably he misinterprets, to his ruin,) does not fear to offer this imitation of the fruit of divine love,—in fact, a fraudulent attempt to buy for himself what alone he values. Satan was thus working from inside the assembly, to destroy truth and holiness, and thus early to introduce into it the worldly elements which, by and by, alas, were to gain open allowance. But the Spirit of God, as yet ungrieved, forbids the intrusion of the evil; and judgment swift and terrible smites down the transgressor. His unhappy wife, coming in afterwards, and deliberately reaffirming her husband's falsehood, shares his punishment. And fear falls upon all the assembly, and upon all that hear these things.

Thus we have indicated to us the evils which, from within as well as from without, threatened the infant Church. It is in a hostile world. It carries the fatal seeds of corruption in its own bosom. For in this respect the community can only be as those who compose it. The exercise as to evil and the struggle with it we are not yet, in the wisdom of God, delivered from; although the final deliverance is completely secured. God is training us for eternity, and to bring us into full participation in His apprehension of it. For this He would have us see it as those who are partakers of the divine nature, and yet linked with that flesh in which "dwelleth no good thing." Responsible to be its masters, we may yet degrade ourselves to do its will, and need at all times to be on the watch against it; while the world around appeals to it, and incites it to activity, and Satan with all the cunning of four thousand years' acquirement is "the prince of this world," proved so by the Cross! So thoroughly are we intended, it is plain, to learn the painful—and yet, it must be, salutary—lesson of the nature of that which exhibits the ruin of the creature fallen away from God! But this is also the background of the divine glory in redemption, in which He is displayed in His mastery over it, and thus we are held fast to Him forever.

SUBDIVISION 6. (Chap. v. 12–vi. 7.)

Triumph within and without.

1 (v. 12-16): Constant power.

1. AND by the [c]hands of the apostles many signs and wonders were done among the people; and they were all with one accord in Solomon's porch. And of the [d]rest dared no man join himself to them; but the people magnified them; (and [e]believers were more and more added to the Lord,—multitudes both of men and women;) insomuch that they even carried out the sick into the streets, and placed them on beds and couches, that at the least the [f]shadow of Peter, when he came, might overshadow some one among them. And the multitude also came together from the [g]cities round about unto Jerusalem, bringing sick persons, and those troubled by unclean spirits, who were all healed.

2 (v. 17-33): Persecution and deliverance.

2. And the [h]high priest rose up, and all that were with him, being the sect of the [i]Sadducees, and were filled with jealousy,* and [j]laid hands on the apostles, and put them in public ward. But an [k]angel of the Lord opened the prison doors by night, and brought them out, and said, Go, stand in the temple, and [l]speak unto the people all the words of this life. And when they heard it, they entered into the temple about daybreak, and taught. And when the high priest was come, and they that were with him, they called together the [m]council, and all the elderhood of the sons of Israel, and sent to the prison to have them brought. But when the officers came, they found them not in the prison;

c ch. 2. 43.

d cf. Ex. 12. 31-33. ver. 11. cf. 1 Cor. 14. 25.

e cf. ch. 6. 1, 2. cf. ch. 9. 31.

f cf. ch. 19. 11, 12. cf. 1 Jno. 1. 7 with Heb. 12. 13.

g cf. Matt. 4. 24 with Jno. 14. 12.

h cf. Jno. 11. 47 with Jno. 15. 20.

i Matt. 22. 23.

j ch. 8. 26. ch. 12. 7-11.

k cf. ch. 1. 8. cf. ch. 4. 20, 21.

l ch. 6. 12.

* Or, "wrath."

SUBD. 6.

The inspired historian does not detain us long with this now, but passes on to speak of the Church's triumph over this double evil, within and without.

1. There is the constant display of divine power at the hands of the apostles; so the crowds follow, and the people magnify them; while the fear of what has taken place deters those from joining them who are not joined to the Lord in living faith. But multitudes are thus added to Him, both of men and of women. Consciences are brought into serious exercise, with the sure result of many believing. The place which is habitually frequented, and in which we have found them before, is Solomon's porch; the testimony of their ruin under the old covenant, whatever may have been the pains to cover it up since, and even to decorate that which covered it. Jerusalem thus becomes a centre to which men flock from all the districts round, bringing the sick and those oppressed by demons,—two classes always carefully distinguished in the word of God; and the very shadow of Peter is sought to for its power to heal; nor do we read of disappointment even in this. The masses all are healed. So fully is the prayer of true and devoted hearts for the glory of Jesus answered of God.

2. Persecution arises again, and from the same quarter as before; the high priest being foremost, with the sect of the Sadducees, to which he belonged. But when the apostles are once more shut up in prison, an angel of the Lord (that is, of Jehovah) opens the doors by night, and bids them enter again into the temple, to preach there unto the people "all the words of this life." In the morning, therefore, the prison being securely shut, they are found in the temple at their and returned and reported, saying, We found the prison shut with all [m]security, and the guards standing at the doors; but when we had opened them, we found no one within. And when they heard these words, both the captain of the temple and the chief priests, they were much perplexed concerning them, what this would come to. And there came one and told them, Behold, the men whom ye put into the prison are standing in the temple and teaching the people. Then went the captain with the officers, and brought them, not with violence, for they [n]feared the people, lest they should be stoned. And they brought them, and set them in the council. And the high priest asked them, saying, We straitly [o]charged you not to teach in this name, and behold, ye have [p]filled Jerusalem with your teaching, and intend to [q]bring upon us this man's blood. But Peter and the apostles answered and said, We must [r]obey God rather than men. The God of our [s]fathers hath raised up Jesus; whom ye [t]slew and hanged upon a tree. Him hath God with his right hand [u]exalted [as] Founder* and Saviour, to give [v]repentance to m cf. Jno. 20. 19.

n cf. Matt. 21. 26.
o ch. 4. 18-21.
p ch. 4. 4.
q cf. Matt. 27. 25. cf. Matt. 23. 35.
r cf. Ex. 1. 17. ch. 4. 19.
s ch. 3. 13. cf. ch. 13. 17.
t ch. 2. 23.
u ch. 2. 33.
v cf. Lk. 5. 32. cf. ch. 11. 18.

* Or, Leader.

blessed work. The council is perplexed, and wonder what will be the end of it; but the issue raised is become so serious for them, that they will dispute it with God Himself. So they command them to be brought once more, though it has to be done quietly, lest the excited people should stone the officers; and for the second time the council of the nation, in answer to their charge of violating the prohibition they had given, have to listen to the statement of their crime. The rulers had made obedience to them impossible by their own vain conflict with the God of their fathers. Him, whom they had put to death with the greatest indignity, God had raised up, and with His right hand exalted Him to be Founder* and Saviour, to begin that new temple to God's praise, of which they had before proclaimed Him the Foundation-Stone. But for this it was necessary that every one who should form part in it—for the temple was to be, as Peter explains from his own name, a building of "living stones" (1 Pet. ii. 4, 5)—should be cleansed and sanctified. The Founder must therefore be a Saviour, and give repentance and remission of sins. The apostles say, "to Israel," and this He will yet do. It was the nation that was at present before them, and to whom their message was. The Church had not emerged into distinct thought, although it was in existence in fact, but as a babe that had not yet learned to know itself. But Christ,—Christ was their absorbing occupation and delight; no higher could be, though they were to learn much more of their own relationship to Him. "And we are witnesses of these things; and the Holy Spirit also, which God hath given to them who obey Him."

But it is not proof which they were wanting,—these leaders of the people; just the reverse; and to be reminded of the proof which was all too demonstrative only throws them into a passionate rage that would quench itself in the blood of those who so fearlessly maintain this testimony. Had they not quenched this light once? Could they not again do so? Had they not put out of their way the Master? Could they not deal with the disciples?

* The word here is the same as that in the first answer of the apostles, and there translated "Author,"—"Author of life." It does not seem practicable to give a uniform rendering, except, with the common version, we use the very meagre word, "Prince." The meaning is, "one who begins, or originates;" thus, leader and author in one. "Founder," which is also given by the lexicons, unites these thoughts, and seems the best adapted to the sense in this place.

Israel, and [w]remission of sins. And we are [x]witnesses of these things, and the Holy Spirit [y]also which God hath given to them that obey him. But they, when they heard this, were [z]cut to the heart, and took counsel to slay them.

3 (34–42): Sheltered.

3. But there stood up in the council a [a]Pharisee named Gamaliel, a teacher of the law, had in honor among all the people, and commanded to put forth the men for a short time. And he said unto them, Men of Israel, take [b]heed to yourselves as regards these men, what ye are going to do. For [c]before these days rose up Theudas, professing to be somebody, to whom a number of men—about four hundred—joined themselves: who was slain, and all, as many as obeyed him, were dispersed and came to nothing. After this man rose up Judas the Galilean in the days of the [d]census, and drew away people after him. He also perished, and all, as many as obeyed him, were [e]scattered abroad. And now I say unto you, Refrain from these men, and let them alone: for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will

w cf. Lk.24. 47, 48.
x ch. 1. 8.
y cf. Heb.10. 15-17. cf. Eph. 1. 13.
z ch. 7. 54. ctr. ch.2.37.
a cf. ch.22.3. cf. ch.23. 6.
b cf. ch. 23 9. cf. Matt.12 30.
c cf. ch. 21. 38. cf. Jno.10.8.
d cf. Lk. 2.2.
e cf. Jno. 10. 12. ctr. Jno.11. 52.

So impossible is it for His enemies to understand the patience of God, which is oftentimes so great a trial to His people even. If He has indeed this power, how is it that, as the Psalmist puts it, He does not "pluck His hand out of His bosom," and deal more openly with His adversaries? Will He use it in healings and raising up crippled beggars, and let His people lie so defenceless in the hands of their persecutors? Can this gentle zephyr ever grow into a tornado blast? They cannot believe it, however great at times the evidences may seem to be. Did not the prison doors unaccountably open? Yes; but that did not deliver out of their hands after all! Balance this against that: even their Master did not come down from the cross; and the cross seems ordained for His disciples also. Yes; the Cross! and how little yet do we understand its glory!

3. Thus, even if He interferes for His own, there is generally a veil over His Face: "Thy way is in the sea, and Thy path in the great waters, and Thy footsteps are not known!" Still, for all that, "Thou leddest Thy people like a flock" (Ps. lxxvii. 19, 20).

Christ's witnesses are now to prove this; they are to be sheltered, yet by no apparent intervention of the divine Hand. One of the councilors themselves, a Pharisee and not a believer, though brought by all he has seen and heard into the neutral position which his advice indicates, is the instrument which God uses at this time to shelter the witnesses of His grace to men. Gamaliel, a man of great weight among the Jews, and grandson of the celebrated Hillel, having caused the apostles to be put forth for a little while, remonstrates against any violence. The case before them, he urges, was no solitary one; and the examples they had had of impostors who had arisen showed how surely these pretensions of men came to nought. He mentions two of these: one well-known,—"Judas of Galilee, in the days of the census,—the other a Theudas,* only conjecturally taken to be either a Judas, in the reign of Archelaus, as Archbp. Ussher thought, or else a Matthias, about the close of that of Herod. Both attempts ended dis-

*There having been another Theudas, resembling this one of Luke, but some fifty years too late, mentioned by Josephus, this has naturally been used by infidelity to discredit the Scripture narrative. But, as the name was common, so the insurrections of the time were many; "the Theudas, whose defeat by Fadus he places a dozen years later" than Gamaliel's speech, "seems to have had a far larger following than the four hundred men of whom our Evangelist writes." (W. Kelly on the Acts.) Ussher speaks of Theudas as only the Syriac form of Judas; while Koehler (in Herzog's Real Encyclop.) makes it the Greek translation of Matthias, the "gift of Jehovah" or of God.

be [f]overthrown; but if it be of God, ye will not be able to overthrow them;—that ye be not even found [g]fighters against God. And they were persuaded by him; and having called the apostles, they [h]beat them, and commanded them not to speak in the name of Jesus, and let them go. They therefore departed from the presence of the council, [i]rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer dishonor for the Name. And every day, in the temple and the house,* they [j]ceased

[f] cf. Ps. 2. 1-3.
[g] cf. ch. 9. 4, 5. cf. r. ch. 11. 17. cf. 1 Cor. 10. 22.
[h] cf. ch. 22. 19.
[i] cf. Matt. 5. 12. cf. 1 Pet. 4. 12-16. cf. ch. 21. 13.
[j] cf. Eph. 6. 20. cf. 2 Tim. 2. 9.

*Or, "at home."

astrously, as Gamaliel reminds his hearers, and so would this, if it were not of God. The possibility of this he warns them of, and the result in that case of being found fighting against God. A tremendous possibility, indeed!

His advice is conformable to such a suspense of judgment: "Refrain from these men, and let them alone." To which they agree, with a strange modification of their own; for while they acknowledge they may be fighting against God, and so give up their murderous intent, they contradict themselves, and show the malice of their hearts, by beating these possible witnesses for God, before they let them go! and again forbidding them to speak what they cannot venture to say may not be truth! Such a being is man!

But Gamaliel himself, though impressed, and right in his refusal to act in the dark as if in the light, is otherwise wrong in his principles, and untrue to the truth. His judgment by the issue leaves him a doubter till that issue; and when, and what, may that issue be? If one could look far enough, no doubt the end would be seen to be in accordance with the righteousness of God who governs. But who will undertake to trace this with any infallibility through those ways which the Psalmist confesses are in the sea, and His footsteps are not known? Who will pierce the clouds and darkness that are about Him, and give a trustworthy account of all His doings? The Psalmist complained of the prosperity of the wicked, and had to pursue them to the other side of death, in order to find satisfaction (Ps. lxxiii.). The friends of Job argue like Gamaliel here, and are rebuked by the sufferer as speaking deceitfully for God (Job xiii. 7); for he also has seen the wicked spend their days in prosperity (chap. xxi. 13). The Preacher too sees it as among the vanities of earthly things, "that there be righteous men to whom it happeneth according to the work of the wicked; and again there be wicked men, to whom it happeneth according to the work of the righteous" (Eccl. viii. 14). While Habakkuk complains to Him who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity that yet He looketh upon them that deal treacherously, and holdeth His peace when the wicked swalloweth up the man that is more righteous than himself (Hab. i. 13). And Jehovah answers him that "the just shall live by faith" (ii. 4).

And this is what Gamaliel with his temporizing policy has left out. He would wait and watch, and go down to the grave perhaps unconvinced; and so there is reason to believe he did; while a bolder and more hasty spirit might catch more quickly his conclusion, and decide,—but decide wholly wrong. For it would be hard upon his principles to accept in his way as the witnesses for God men "as it were, appointed unto death, a spectacle to the world, and to angels, and to men;—hungry and athirst, and naked, and buffeted"! Must not those who laid their stripes upon the apostles now have fancied they were helping to disprove these fanatical teachings with every stroke of their lash? The meaning of the Cross would be, for them and for their teacher both, an impossibility to comprehend.

But God none the less had sheltered His people; and, as for the rest, they departed from the presence of the council, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer for the Name! And still, every day, in the temple and in the house, they ceased not to teach and tell the glad tidings that Jesus was the Christ.

not to teach and tell the glad tidings that Jesus was the Christ.

4 (vi.1-7): Trial from weakness.

4. Now in these days, when the number of the disciples was [k]multiplying, there arose a murmuring of the [l]Grecian Jews against the Hebrews, that their widows were overlooked in the [m]daily ministrations. And the twelve called the multitude of the disciples, and said, It is not right that we should [n]leave the word of God, and serve tables. Look out, therefore, brethren, from among you seven men, [o]well reported of, full of the [Holy]* Spirit and of wisdom, whom we will [p]appoint over this business; but we will give ourselves up to [q]prayer and to the ministry of the word. And the saying pleased the whole multitude; and they [r]chose Stephen, a man [s]full of faith and of the Holy Spirit, and Philip, and Prochorus, and Nicanor, and Timon, k ver. 7. cf. Deut. 32. 15.

l ch. 9. 29.
m ch. 4. 34, 35.
n cf. Ex. 18. 17-26.
ver. 4.
o cf. ch. 16. 2. cf. 1 Tim. 3. 7-10. cf. 1 Thess. 4. 12.
p cf. ch. 14. 23. cf. Tit. 1. 5.
q cf. ch. 13. 2. cf. Col. 2. 1, 2.
r ver. 8.
s cf. ch. 11. 24.

* Some omit.

4. Another trial was at hand; and now again from within: a difficulty had to be met, which the very growth in numbers tended to produce, the natural selfishness of man's heart showing itself amid all the power and joy of the work of the Spirit constantly progressing. "There arose a murmuring of the Grecian Jews," or Hellenists, "against the Hebrews," (the native Jews,) "because their widows were neglected in the daily ministrations." It does not say, they were neglected, but that this was affirmed. In fact, although grace was here dominant above it, there was always a certain jealousy existing between these two classes. The Jews born in foreign countries tended to more liberal views than those of Judea, and indeed to a liberality as far from the truth on one side as the Pharisaism of the Rabbinistic teachers was upon the other. It was upon the side of the Hebrews, however, that jealousy was rather to be expected. Here it was on that of the Hellenists; but perhaps a reaction resulting from the knowledge of such a spirit generally existing, which would give rise to suspicions such as we find actually manifested now. But there is grace to meet them effectually, as has been often pointed out; for the names of those chosen on account of the complaints, to take charge of the whole matter of the ministry of the common fund are Greek, every one; and thus, presumably Hellenistic. Those who murmured should have the distribution in their own hands; and those who cannot trust their brethren shall find that nevertheless their brethren can trust them. How lovely is divine grace! and how effectual is such a settlement! The thought that some have had, that there had been already men appointed to this charge, but who were all Hebrews, and that the seven now chosen were only an addition to the previous number to satisfy the foreign element by giving them representation which hitherto they had not had, is as totally without foundation in Scripture, as it destroys all the beauty of the act itself. In this case, it was but a mere act of tardy justice, or at least the reparation of an actual oversight, which might have given some apparent ground for the complaint. But there is no truth in it; for it is the apostles who have hitherto been in charge of that which we have seen laid at their feet for that purpose; and who now take occasion to relieve themselves of what was become a burden, distracting them from their own proper work. The disciples are now to choose those in whom they can have confidence for the management of that which they had themselves contributed; the apostles, however, giving them appointment, as being the divinely constituted leaders, and representatives of the absent Lord.

The word of God is that which we see they recognize as their true sphere of service, and that to which they desire wholly to devote themselves; joining with this prayer, which they put first, as the necessary prerequisite. Without and Parmenas, and Nicolas, a [t]proselyte of Antioch, whom they set before the apostles, and when they had prayed, they [u]laid their hands upon them. And the word of God [v]increased; and the number of the disciples [w]multiplied in Jerusalem exceedingly; and a great company of the [x]priests were obedient to the faith.

t cf. ver. 1.
u cf. 1 Tim. 4. 14. cf. 1 Tim. 5. 22. ctr. Eph. 4. 11, 12.
v ch. 19. 20.
w ctr. ver. 1.
x ctr. Jno. 7. 48.

SUBDIVISION 7. (Chap. vi. 8–vii.)

Completion of the Testimony to the Nation.

1 (vi. 8–15): The occasion.

1. NOW Stephen, [y]full of grace and power, did great wonders and signs among the people. And there arose certain of those who were of the synagogue which is called [the synagogue] of the Libertines, and of Cyreneans, and Alexandrians, and those who were of

y ver. 5.

that link of conscious dependence, what gift,—even the greatest,—could at all avail? But here we realize the exceeding importance attaching to it in their minds: "We will give ourselves up to prayer and to the ministry of the word." Is it not here, in fact, that we fail so much, and the ministry of the word fails correspondingly?

Even for such work as serving tables men are to be sought full of the Holy Spirit, and of wisdom; and the first two that are among the number of those appointed are to be owned and honored of God afterwards in very different ways. One of them also is a proselyte,—of a class thoroughly despised by the Hebrews in general; even while they would do much to gain them. But the grace of God was removing already these unspiritual estimates,—merging all human distinctions in the consciousness of a common relationship to Christ and to God. They are set apart, not without prayer, and by the imposition of hands, as a token, doubtless, of the fellowship with them in their new office. Thus the brief trouble ended; and all was overruled for blessing and the display of the new spirit which animated the new company of believers. The power of it was felt in the increased power of the word of God. The number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem exceedingly; and even of the priests a great company became obedient to the faith. The expression made use of in their case lays stress upon the greater difficulty, speaking humanly, to be surmounted by those whose office it would set aside; and of this, although the full light of Christianity had not yet dawned, there were already many intimations.

SUBD. 7.

In fact, the whole system of Judaism is tottering to its fall; and the nation is ready to give its last, emphatic answer to the grace that has visited it. The number to which the converts had increased could only arouse hostility proportionately more, as the leaders felt their authority compromised, themselves personally attacked, and all ranks being swept away into an opposition continually gathering strength, with its arguments which could be met only by force, and its signs and wonders which could neither be denied nor imitated. Only the fear of the people had hitherto restrained, as we have seen, the outbreak of fury on the part of the council twice before. And now it is increasingly being felt that a struggle cannot be averted; it is in fact a death-struggle. The occasion of its coming on is now shown us by the inspired historian; and with this the offer to the nation as such ends. Stephen, "full of grace and power," becomes, on that very account, the object of special enmity to the enraged people, and as the first martyr, receives the "crown" of which his name speaks.* He becomes the messenger sent after the Lord, to say, "We will not have this Man to reign

*The meanings of the seven names are no doubt significant:—1. Stephen—A crown. 2. Philip—A lover of horses—a racer. 3. Prochorus—A leader of praise. 4. Nicanor—A victor. 5. Timon—Honorable. 6. Parmenas—Enduring. 7. Nicholas—Conqueror of the people.

Cilicia and of Asia, [z]disputing with Stephen. And they were [a]not able to resist the wisdom and the Spirit in which he spake. Then they [b]suborned men who said, We have heard him saying blasphemous things against Moses and against God. And they stirred up the people and the elders and the scribes, and they came upon him, and seized him, and [c]brought him to the council. And they set up false witnesses who said, This man ceaseth not to speak words [d]against the holy place and the law: for we have heard him say that this Jesus the Nazarene will [e]destroy this place, and [f]change the customs which Moses delivered unto us. And all that sat in the council, looking intently upon him, saw his [g]face as the face of an angel.

z cf. ch. 13. 45.
a Lk. 21. 14, 15. cf. Jer. 1. 8, 9. cf. Ps. 119. 98–100.
b cf. 1 Ki. 21. 9–13. cf. Mk. 14. 55–59.
c ch. 5. 21.
d cf. ch. 21. 28. cf. ch. 7. 47–60. ctr. Matt. 21. 12, 13.
e cf. Matt. 23. 38, 39. cf. Matt. 24. 1, 2.
f cf. ch. 15. 10, 11; cf. Gal. 6. 12–16.
g cf. ch. 7. 55, 56 with 2 Cor. 3. 13, 18.

over us." The glory of Christ shines upon the face of His witness, and makes it radiant with the light of heaven, where the Son of man stands at the right hand of God. Earth has cast out the Light; but to earth's outcasts heaven is opening, as it never opened yet. We have an intimation, indeed, of Paul's "gospel of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ;" although not yet is Paul come to proclaim it. He is there! yes; keeping the garments of those that stone that glory from the face of Stephen!

1. We do not read hitherto of any miracles wrought by other hands than those of the apostles; but now the "power" that is in Stephen manifests itself in great wonders and signs among the people. There is commencing, apparently, a wider bestowal of gifts of this kind, such as was, at any rate, found afterwards. The "faith," of which we have been told that he was full, doubtless coveted, as the apostle exhorts at a later time, the best gifts, and these, although not so valuable in themselves as that of prophecy, were of great importance for the crisis then approaching. The saints had prayed, on the first return of the apostles from the council, that God would glorify the name of Jesus by stretching out His hand to heal; and Stephen's endowment is found in connection with most earnest testimony. Hellenist himself, the men of the Hellenistic synagogues to whom he had been probably formerly well known, undertake disputation with him, but are unable to resist the wisdom and spirit by which he speaks. This rouses all their malice against him; and as with his Lord, to whom through this closing scene he is in growing likeness, they suborn men to bear false witness against him. They could easily pervert his words, no doubt, into blasphemies against Moses; and those against God could be, with not much more difficulty, reasoned from the other. And now we find what is deeply significant for the issue with regard to the nation; the people, who had hitherto been favorable to the disciples, now join the outcry against them. Henceforth, save as the direct action of the Spirit still produces faith in a remnant of them, rulers and people are one. Persecution can now therefore begin in earnest, and the door of repentance as yet held open to them begins to close. This gives character to the last testimony of Stephen, as we shall see directly: it is a full summing up of the case against them, and adds to their crime in the death of the Lord Jesus, the witness that they always resist the Holy Spirit. The last hope is gone when this can be said.

They come upon him, and seize him, and bring him before the council,—at last with their wolfish ferocity unbridled. And here the false witnesses can amplify their assertions: "He does not cease," they affirm, "to say things against the holy place, and the law: for we have heard him say that this Jesus the Nazarene will destroy this place, and change the customs which Moses delivered unto us."

Matter enough indeed to stir the dullest of those who have no greater boast

2 (vii. 1-53): The charge: Israel has always resisted the Spirit, and rejected her deliverers.

1 (vers. 1-8): Abraham at the beginning.

2. And the [a]high priest said, Are these things so? And he said, Brethren* and fathers, hearken:

[1] The God of [b]glory appeared unto our father Abraham when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Haran, and said unto him, [c]Go forth from thy [d]land, and from thy [e]kindred, and come into the land that I will [f]show thee. Then went he out of the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in Haran. And from thence, when his [g]father had died, he removed him into this land, wherein ye now dwell. And he gave him [h]no inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on: and he [i]promised to give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, when he had [j]no child. And God spake on this wise, that his seed should [k]sojourn in a strange land, and that they would bring them into [l]bondage, and treat them evil, four hundred years. And the nation to which they are in bondage will I [m]judge, said God; and after these things they shall [n]come forth, and serve me in this place. And he gave him the covenant of [o]circumcision. And so he [p]begat Isaac, and circumcised him the eighth day; and Isaac [begat] [q]Jacob, and Jacob the [r]twelve patriarchs.

* Literally, "men, brethren."

a cf. Matt. 26. 62. cf. ch. 23. 1, 2.
b Gen. 12. 1, cf. 2 Pet. 1. 3. c cf. Heb. 11. 8.
d cf. Heb. 13. 13, 14.
e cf. 2 Cor. 5. 16, 17.
f cf. Ezek. 20. 6. cf. Heb. 11. 9, 10.
g Gen. 11. 26.
h cf. Heb. 11. 9, 10.
i Gen. 12. 5.
j Gen. 15. 7. Gen. 17. 8.
k Gen. 15. 3. Gen. 18. 10. cf. Heb. 11. 11, 12.
l Gen. 15. 13, 14. Gen. 47. 11, 12.
m Ex. 1. 8-14. cf. Ex. 12. 40, 41.
n Ex. 3. 19, 20.
o Ex. 14. 29, 30.
p Gen. 17. 9-14.
q Gen. 21. 1-4.
r Gen. 25. 24-26.
s Gen. 29. 31, etc.

than to be Moses' disciples! They look intently upon the man so accused, to see how he will bear himself, or what he will answer to such an accusation, and lo, as if he were himself Moses, his face brightens with an angelic glory! As if not seeing the lowering gloom around him, he is in the light, under the smile of God!

2. Stephen is not upon his defence. He is not answering for himself, nor pleading at all. He is the judge giving sentence. He is the still, small voice of the national conscience roused by the power of the Spirit of God. He is the memory of the people, edged and sharpened, as when called into the Presence of God. The long roll of the centuries obeys his summons, and comes forth; its record of the simplest, but with a strange new utterance; a voice of challenge and conviction, impossible to resist. If, even now, they had but hearkened to it! But man is capable of turning from known, incontestable realities, and of saying in the pride of his heart that things are as he will have them to be. Thus Israel once more turns her back upon God, and abides still under the doom which it has brought upon her.

[1] Stephen goes back to Abraham, to the father in whom they boasted, but in whom God had set before their eyes the principles which He would have them ever remember,—principles which, while the world continues what sin has made it, must ever abide as principles owned of Him and necessary for a path according to His mind. Back of law they must go to find the one in whom they had the promises,—a man justified by faith, and thus a perfect example of the grace which they so steadily refused.

"The God of glory," begins Stephen, "appeared unto our father Abraham when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Haran." Thus all for him was found in One who by this marvelous vision drew him to Himself. We know that he and his were serving other gods in that land beyond the flood, (that is, Euphrates, Josh. xxiv. 2). They were involved in the idolatry in which, even then, the whole land was immersed; and there and thus grace met him. He was not the heir of privilege; and for him the glory dwelt not in any place

2 (vers. 9-16): Joseph rejected by his brethren.

2 And the patriarchs, [x]envying Joseph, [a]sold him away into Egypt; and God was with him, and [b]delivered him out of all his afflictions, and gave him [c]favor and wisdom before Pharaoh king of Egypt; and he made him [d]governor over Egypt and all his house. And there came a [e]famine over all Egypt and Canaan, and great affliction; and our fathers found no sustenance. But when Jacob heard that there was corn in Egypt, he [f]sent out our fathers the first time. And at the [g]second time, Joseph was made known to his brethren, and Joseph's [h]family became known to Pharaoh. And Joseph [i]sent and called his father Jacob to him, and all his kindred, [j]seventy-five souls. And Jacob [k]went down into Egypt, and died, he and our fathers, and [x] Gen. 37. 11. [a] Gen. 37. 28. [b] Gen. 39. 2, 21-23. [c] Gen. 41. 14-16. [d] Gen. 41. 38-44. Ps. 105. 17-22. [e] Gen. 41. 54, etc. [f] Gen. 42. 1-3. [g] Gen. 43. 2-15. Gen. 45. 1-15. [h] Gen. 45. 16. [i] Gen. 45. 21-27. [j] cf. Gen. 46. 26, 27. [k] Gen. 46. 5-7.

cf. Ex. 1. 6; cf. Deut. 10. 22.

made with hands, but apart from the world, in which he became by the revelation henceforth a pilgrim. From the land of his birth God called him out, and from his kindred; and the land to which He called him was one unknown. Faith every way was a necessity to him; slow as he might be, and was, to sever the ties of nature, which were but hindrance to him. After his father was dead, God removed him to the land which was to be his own.

Yet here also the discipline continued, and by faith alone was the land ever enjoyed by him. Promised it was, but no foot of it made good to him; and the seed which was to inherit it came late and slowly on. Of grace, then, and of faith in the unseen, was Abraham's life a constant witness to them; and this was the life so approved of God, so honored by themselves, who yet knew so little of it!

A long sorrow also was made known to him in relation to his seed. They were again to leave the land which was theirs by promise, and to dwell in another, ill-treated, and in bondage, until 400 years had run their length. Then God would judge their oppressors, and they should come out, and serve Him in the inheritance destined for them. But for so long a time still discipline and the need of faith! They grew to a nation in that stern Egyptian school. But why the furnace covenanted to them thus? Why this need of the Refiner's fire?

It all hangs perfectly together: man under this patient but strong hand of God, ever to be watched, never to be reckoned upon. On the other hand, faith in God always therefore the one necessity, always sure amid all changes. With this, as the apostle shows, witnesses that covenant of circumcision of which Stephen thereupon speaks. Abraham is near a hundred years old, "his body now dead," nothing more to be expected from it. Just there it is that God, as the "Almighty" God, comes in to renew His assurance of what He will do, when Abraham can do nothing. Circumcision is "the putting off the body of the flesh" (Col. ii. 11); and thus it was to him "the seal of the righteousness of faith which he had, being yet uncircumcised" (Rom. iv. 11). Where then is the law, and all the work of man in which Israel so trusted, in the covenant given to a man with a "body now dead"? And this sign is now to be put upon all the seed of Abraham: "And so he begat Isaac, and circumcised him the eighth day; and Isaac begat Jacob, and Jacob the twelve patriarchs" or tribe-fathers.

Here are the principles which would have carried Israel through to blessing. Had they sat patiently at the feet of Moses even, they would have learned them from the other side. God never left Himself without witness of the characteristic marks of all that comes from Him: "Had ye believed Moses," said the Lord to them, "ye would have believed Me." And this was as true of His indirect, as of His direct testimony.

2 Stephen goes on to another part of well-known history, in which not only the fundamental untrustworthiness of man displayed itself, but in a way which they were [l]carried over to Sychem, and laid in the [m]sepulchre which [Abraham]* bought for a sum of money from the sons of Emmor, the [father]† of Sychem.

[s] (vers. 17–50): Moses: to whom they were set apart; the revelation and the Sanctuary.

[3] But when the [n]time of the promise drew nigh, which God had promised‡ to Abraham, the people grew and [o]multiplied in Egypt; until [p]another king arose over Egypt, who knew not Joseph. This man dealt [q]subtly with our race, and evil entreated our fathers, so as to cause their infants to be cast out that they might not live. At which time [r]Moses was born, and was fair §§ unto God; and was nourished three months in his father's house. And when he was cast out, Pharaoh's daughter [t]took him up, and brought him up for her own son. And Moses was [u]instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in his words and deeds. And when a period of forty years was fulfilled to him, it [v]came into his heart to look‖ upon his brethren, the sons of Israel. And seeing one of them suffer wrong, he defended him, and avenged him that was being oppressed, smiting the Egyptian. And he thought that his brethren would [w]understand that God by his hand was giving them deliverance, but they understood not. And the [x]next day he appeared unto them as they strove, and urged them to peace, saying, Men,¶ ye are

*See the note below. † Or, in Sychem. ‡ The word suggests the thought of free and willing promise. §§ Or, "very fair." ‖ Or, "visit." ¶ Or, "Ye are men, brethren."

l Gen. 50. 4-13. 25.
m Gen. 23. 19, 20. cf. Gen. 33. 19. cf. Josh. 24. 32.
n cf. Ex. 2. 23-25.
o Ex. 1. 7.
p Ex. 1. 8.
q Ex. 1. 10-22.
r Ex. 2. 1-4. cf. Heb. 11. 23.
s Ex. 2. 5-10.
t cf. Dan. 1. 4, 17. cf. Is. 19. 11, 12 with 1 Cor. 1. 20.
u Ex. 2. 11, 12.
v ctr. Jno. 2. 4. cf. Lk. 24. 49.
w Ex. 2. 13.

was but too significant of their later rejection of their God-sent deliverers. Indeed, their latest and worst was in so many ways pictured in it that the least sensitive conscience should have been aroused by it. And this took place in the history of the first fathers of the nation, who yet wrought out in it unwittingly the purposes of God. Who could forget the envy of Joseph's brethren! which yet helped to fulfil the very premonitions of his greatness which had caused their envy. They sold him into Egypt, (did those before Stephen not remember their own thirty pieces of silver?) but God was with him, spite of those afflictions in the meantime, out of which God so signally delivered him, and made him governor over all the land. Then came the famine which compelled his guilty brethren to have recourse to him whom they had rejected and cast out. And this again led to the fulfillment of the prophecy to Abraham. Man, working freely and, alas, away from God, nevertheless wrought out His purposes as if designedly seeking their accomplishment.*

[3] And now the speaker proceeds to Moses himself,—Moses whose disciples they all claimed to be, as indeed God had made him their deliverer and lawgiver; but had he in fact fared much better at their hands? Through Moses also they had received the "living oracles," and the house of God (which they had brought into his indictment) had received its initial form through him. What was the brethren; why do ye wrong one another? But he that did his neighbor wrong thrust him away, saying, [x]Who set thee over us as ruler and judge? Wilt thou kill me, as yesterday thou killedst the Egyptian? And Moses [y]fled at that saying, and became a sojourner in the land of Midian,* where he [z]begat two sons.

*There is a well-known difficulty in connection with what is said of the burial of Jacob and his sons. The simplest rectification is by omitting "Abraham" from the text; which would then read "which he bought,"—referring to Jacob, and "they were carried over to Sychem" would refer to Jacob's sons alone; of whom we only know that Joseph was, but the tradition among the Jews was that the rest were also. "Jerome states that Paula saw the sepulchres of the rest; and Wetstein quotes Syncellus and two Jewish writers to the same purpose. The omission of Abraham is given credit to by this—that one uncial MS., ancient and of good authority, has an addition here which gives strong ground to suppose Abraham to be an interpolation." (The Irrationalism of Infidelity: being a reply to "Phases of Faith;" p. 140.)

And when [a]forty years were fulfilled, there appeared unto him in the wilderness of Mount Sinai an angel in a [b]flame of fire in a bush. And when Moses saw it, he wondered at the vision: and as he drew nigh to behold it, there came the voice of [the] Lord, I am the God of thy fathers, the God of Abraham and of Isaac and of Jacob. And Moses [c]trembled, and durst not behold. And the Lord said unto him, [d]Loose the sandal from thy feet; for the place where thou standest is holy ground. I have surely [e]seen the ill-treatment of my people in Egypt, and have heard their groaning; and I am [f]come down to deliver them. And now come, I [g]send thee into Egypt. This Moses whom they [h]denied, saying, Who

* Gk. "Madiam."

x Ex. 2. 14 cfr. Lk. 12. 14.
y Ex. 2. 15 cf. Heb. 11. 27.
z Ex. 2. 22; Ex. 18. 3, 4
a cf. Nu. 14. 33, 34. cf. Matt. 4. 1, 2. b Ex. 3. 1-3 cf. Lk. 20. 37, 38.
c cf. Heb. 12. 21. Ex. 3. 6. d Ex. 3. 4, 5 cf. Josh. 5. 15
e Ex. 3. 7. Ex. 2. 23-25
f Ex. 3. 8. cf. Jno. 6. 38-40. cfr. Gen. 11. 5-7.
g Ex. 3. 10 Ps. 105. 26
h ver. 27. cf. Judg. 11. 7. cf. 1Sa. 17. 28

testimony of history again as to all this? He brings forward no reasoning of his own; nothing that they could for a moment deny: the facts are a sufficient argument. But he goes more leisurely through these, as if he would have them marshal their cumulative evidence well, and compel the attention of his unwilling listeners. It is as if, not he, but Moses himself had turned to be their accuser; as the Lord had before declared to them that he was; and that they were going on with such an adversary to the judgment. The judgment now was really come, and the Judge was about to deliver them to the officer, that they might be cast into prison:—a prison from which (although the doors are about to open) they have never come forth yet.

The birth of Moses was in one of the disastrous times of Israel's history. The destruction of their male children threatened their very existence as a nation; and as one of these doomed ones, he was only saved by the signal interposition of God, who shelters him in the bosom of the persecutor. As the adopted son of Pharaoh's daughter he is taught all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and becomes mighty in words and deeds. Scripture says nothing elsewhere of this education of his, but much of the divine discipline by which he became the fit ruler of the people of God. Stephen mentions, perhaps, his greatness, to exhibit the more the power of that love which made him renounce it all to identify himself with a rabble of serfs, and set himself in opposition to all the wealth and power and civilization of the foremost nation of the day. Perfectly he knew all that his choice implied; but he saw Him who was invisible, who was lost to the Egyptians amid their bestial deities; and "it came into his heart to look upon his brethren, the sons of Israel." God was looking upon them, as he was; and the spirit of the deliverer awoke within him. Seeing one of them suffer wrong, he defended him, and avenged him that was being oppressed, and smote the Egyptian. He thought that his brethren would understand that by him God was giving deliverance to Israel; but they understood not. The love that had brought him to renounce for their sakes the place in which he had been so wonderfully put by God, was not appreciated; and when he would have united and set them at one, he was in their mind only assuming without warrant the place of a ruler and judge over them. He had to flee with his work unaccomplished, and become a sojourner in the land of Midian, where he found other attachments, and became the father of children.

set thee as ruler and judge? this man did God send as a ruler and redeemer, with the hand of the [h]angel who appeared to him in the bush. He brought them out, having done [j]wonders and signs in Egypt, and at the [k]Red Sea, and in the [l]wilderness forty years. This is that Moses who [m]said unto the sons of Israel, A Prophet will God raise up unto you from among your brethren, like unto me.* This is he who was in the [n]assembly in the wilderness, with the [o]angel who spake unto him in the Mount Sinai, and with our fathers; who received [p]living oracles to give unto us. To whom our fathers would not be [q]subject, but thrust him from them, and in their [r]hearts turned [back] unto Egypt; saying unto Aaron, Make us [s]gods who shall go before us; for this Moses who brought us out of the land of Egypt, we know not what hath happened to him. And they made a calf in those days, and brought a sacrifice to the idol, and [t]rejoiced in the works of their own hands. And God turned, and [u]delivered them up to serve the host of heaven; as it is written in the book

* Or, "as He raised me." Some add, "Him shall ye hear."

[h] cf. Ex. 14. 19.
[j] Ex. chs.7-12. Ps.78.43-51.
[k] Ex. 14. Ps. 106. 9.
[l] Deut. 8.15. Ps. 78. 15, etc.
[m] Deut. 18. 15. ch. 3.22, 23.
[n] cf. Ex.16.1. ctr. Eph. 1. 22, 23.
[o] vers.35,53. cf. Is. 63. 9.
[p] cf. Rom.3. 1, 2. cf. Rom. 9. 4, 5.
[q] cf. Ps. 95. 8-11.
[r] cf. Gen.19. 17. cf. Ex.16.3.
[s] Ex. 32. 1, etc.
[t] Ex.32.6,18. ctr. Ps.66.6.
[u] cf. Judg.2. 11-14. cf. Rom. 1. 24, 28.

No doubt there was that in Moses that needed the discipline; and at the backside of the desert he got training that he needed for the work which after all he was to do. God is over all, and through all, and in all. Thus all can be accepted as of Him, and one can see His hand in that which is nevertheless the sin of man, and done in opposition to Him. In the people there was no preparedness of heart, no generous response to the devotedness that would have served them, no perception of the mind of God at all. Their appointed deliverer they drove out among strangers, as Israel were doing now with One who had come down from a more wonderful height, with attestation from God beyond all that ever had been given before, and to accomplish a much mightier deliverance. But the warning was plain that that Moses in whom now they boasted had been for forty years an outcast from the people who had yet to own that God indeed had raised him up to be their ruler and their judge.

Stephen pursues the story of how to that rejected man there came the commission from God, sealed with the broad seal of wonders and signs which accredited in that day to another generation what now no miraculous signs, with how much that went far beyond them, could accredit. In the flame of fire in a bush unburnt, Jehovah had manifested Himself to him, tremble though he might as he stood barefoot in His presence, to send him back, His messenger, into Egypt. How unlike indeed to the glory that had so lately been displayed among them, where He who was sent was One with Him who sent Him,—the glory of the Father's Son!

Yet Moses accomplished His work; as Egypt and the Red Sea and the desert witnessed. They believed in Moses now! Was it not he who said, "A prophet will God raise up unto you from among your brethren, like unto me"?

From him came the living oracles,—the voice of Him who had been speaking to them ever since. He whom they rashly accused of blasphemy against Moses, clears himself from any possible imputation of irreverence as to what had spoken to his own soul as that. But for Israel, alas! how had Israel, encompassed with all those daily manifestations of divine power and grace of which their history bore witness,—how had Israel treated Moses? How had they treated that Greater Presence that went with them then? It was all written in those records of theirs, so well-known by them, so little fruitful in them. Were they subject?

of the [u]prophets, Have ye offered me victims and sacrifices, O house of Israel, forty years in the wilderness? Yea, ye took up the [w]tent of Moloch, and the star of [your] god Remphan,† the figures which ye made to worship them; and I will [y]carry you away beyond Babylon. The [z]tent of testimony was with our fathers in the wilderness, as he that spake to Moses commanded to make it after the [a]pattern which he had seen. Which also our fathers, receiving from their predecessors,‡ [b]brought in with Joshua, when they took possession of the nations, whom God [c]thrust out from before the face of our fathers,—until the days of David, who found [d]favor before God, and asked to find a tabernacle§ for [u] Am. 5. 25-27.

[w] ctr. Ex. 25. 8. cf. Lev. 20. 2, 3.
[x] ctr. Ex. 13. 20, 21. ctr. Nu. 24. 17.
[y] cf. 2 Chro. 36. 11-21. cf. Jer. 25. 9-12.
[z] Ex. 40. 1, etc.
[a] Ex. 25. 9, 40.
[b] Josh. 18. 1.
[c] Josh. 23. 9. ch. 13. 19.
[d] cf. 1 Sam. 13. 14. cf. 1 Sam. 16. 1. cf. Ps. 132. 1-5.

* Some omit. † Or, Rephan.

‡ This is one word in the original, διαδεξάμενοι, "receiving by transmission."

§ A different word from "tent," suggesting a permanent abode.

Let their molten god bear witness! Let Jehovah's neglected altars, all those forty years, while those of Moloch and Remphan steamed with profane offerings! And there, as Amos declares in the name of the Lord, their captivity had already been decided.* How this shows the unity of the nation morally all through their history! for their heartfelt turning to God at any time would have brought about the rescinding of that judgment which the prophet thus declares had been continually impending over them.

The tent of testimony began also in the wilderness the history of that dwelling-place of God among them, which furnished another count in the indictment of the fearless disciple. Moses had received the pattern, and made it as directed; and it had come into the land with Joshua, when God cast out the nations from before His people. Of how much might the mere mention of its tarrying time remind them, until David prepared for, and Solomon built the House which with its chequered history, and so long now in its tenantless condition, they clung to yet. But whatever it might be, did they think it, then, so adequate a dwelling for the Creator of all? Solomon himself had asked with wonder, whether He whom the heaven of heavens could not contain could be indeed contained in the house that he had builded. And God Himself had asked by the prophet a similar question. How poor and unworthy was in fact that reverence for the house by those who had cast out and slain the Son of the Father,—Him whose glory Isaiah had seen filling it!

At the thought of that, the light upon that radiant face seems to kindle into an awful glow of fire. The love of God poured out upon the people of His choice, met but by the enmity of apostate hearts, which had tasted only to harden themselves against it, stirs to passionate outbreak a heart that has with its whole energy responded to it. He rebukes them as not the Israel of God, but stubborn and uncircumcised Gentiles in heart and ears. They had always,—and now how fatally,—resisted the gracious strivings of the Holy Spirit, in one unbroken succession of ungodly men. Had he spoken to them by prophets? which of these had not been the victims of their malicious rage? They had slain the messengers who had but announced the coming of the Righteous One; and He having come, they had now gone on to be His betrayers and His murderers! Law!—they might talk of law! They had received it, indeed, at the hands of angels; but they had never kept it.

* Amos v. 25-27. Stephen follows, in general here, the text of the Septuagint, which substitutes Remphan for the "Chiun" of the Hebrew; for what reason seems not to be clear. For "beyond Damascus," in the prophet, Stephen, interpreting by the history, says "beyond Babylon."

the God of Jacob. But Solomon built him a [c]house.
Howbeit the Most High [f]dwelleth not in [places] made with hands; as saith the [g]prophet, Heaven is my throne, and earth is my footstool: what is* the house that ye will build me, saith [the] Lord; or what is the place of my rest? hath not my hand [h]made all these things?

Ye [i]stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears!
ye do always [j]resist the Holy Spirit; as your fathers did, so do ye. Which of the [k]prophets did not your fathers persecute? and they have slain those who foretold the coming of the Righteous One, of whom ye are now become the betrayers and the [l]murderers! who have received the law as ordinances of [m]angels, and have not kept it.

3 (54-60): Heaven opened, and Jesus in the glory of God.

3. And when they heard these things, they were [n]cut to the heart, and they gnashed upon him with their

c 2 Sam. 7. 1-13. 1 Ki. 8. 20.
f ch. 17. 24.
g Is. 66. 1, 2. cf. 1 Ki. 8. 27.
h Ps. 102. 25-27. Ps. 104.
i Ex. 32. 9. cf. Is. 48. 4.
j cf. Gen. 6. 3. ctr. Eph. 4. 30.
k Jer. 2. 30. Matt. 23. 34-36. Lk. 20. 9-15.
l ch. 2. 23.
m cf. Ps. 68. 17. cf. Gal. 3. 19.
n ctr. ch. 2. 37. cf. 2 Cor. 2. 15, 16.

* Literally, "what kind of house."

3. Was it not true? There was nothing in it all, but the simplest facts of history, the unimpeached, unimpeachable testimony of writers held by themselves for inspired men. Not even a comment had been given, not an application made, until the full tale to which they had listened was complete. Then at last the verdict had been pronounced, none other than which could possibly have been given. Their consciences bore witness in the lightning flash of conviction which cut them to the heart. Yes, it was true; that was the maddening, if not the overwhelming reality: and stubborn with Satanic pride, they were not overwhelmed, but maddened: "They gnashed upon him with their teeth." It was like a defiant hell; though hell will not be defiant.

On the other side, heaven opens upon its martyr —surely martyr now! Filled with the Spirit, he looks up with eager intentness, out of the fast darkening earth to the place whence the light of God, breaking through the mists, had lighted up his face with radiance. But now, as he looks, there is no mist at all, but a way opened through to the uttermost glory; and there He of whom he had testified is revealed to him, standing at the right hand of God. There are no receptive hearts to which to utter it; but he cannot keep back the closing testimony vouchsafed him. Hear it or not, the testimony must be given. Eager, impassioned, triumphant, "Behold," he says, "I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing at the right hand of God."

They will have no more! As out of the mouth of the pit, comes the shriek of frenzied opposition: "they cried out with a loud voice, and stopped their ears, and rushed upon him with one accord, and cast him out of the city and stoned him." Israel has given her answer to the appeal of God, and in the light of the open heavens, they slay His witness. The trial of the nation with this is ended.

Yet out of the darkness there is permitted to us here one reminder of transcendant grace: "the witnesses laid down their clothes at a young man's feet, whose name was Saul."

There is nothing to be said of him yet; we are turned from him to him who has now fought the good fight, and has finished his course, for whom his crown of victory is reserved: "They stoned Stephen invoking and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!" Witness he is to the last; and most so when wholly unconscious of it he has beheld the glory of his Lord with open face, and is changed by it into the same image, from glory to glory:—undying glory in a dying face! "And kneeling down, he cried with a loud voice, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge! And having said this, he fell asleep."

teeth. But he, [o]being full of the Holy Spirit, looked up steadfastly into [p]heaven, and saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing at the right hand of God; and he said, Behold, I see the [q]heavens opened, and the [r]Son of man standing at the right hand of God. And they cried out with a loud voice, and [s]stopped their ears, and rushed upon him with one accord, and cast him [t]out of the city, and [u]stoned him. And the [v]witnesses laid down their clothes at a young man's feet, whose name was Saul. And they stoned Stephen, invoking,* and saying, Lord Jesus, [w]receive my spirit! And kneeling down, he cried with a loud voice, Lord, [x]lay not this sin to their charge! And having said this, he [y]fell asleep.

o ch. 6. 5.
p cf. ch. 1. 10, 11.
q cf. Matt. 3. 16.
cf. ch. 9. 3.
cf. Heb. 2. 9.
r cf. Jno. 12. 34.
cf. Matt. 25. 31.
s cf. Matt. 13. 15.
cf. ch. 22. 22.
t cf. Lk. 4. 29.
cf. Heb. 13. 12.
cf. Jno. 9. 34.
u Matt. 21. 35.
cf. Lev. 24. 13-16.
v cf. Deut. 13. 9, 10.
cf. Deut. 17. 7.

* There is no object after this, but the thought is, "Calling upon the Lord Jesus as God."

ch. 8. 1; ch. 22. 20. w cf. Lk. 23. 46; cf. 1 Pet. 4. 19. x cf. Lk. 23. 34; cf. Matt. 5. 44. y cf. Lk. 8. 52; cf. 2 Tim. 1. 10; cf. 1 Thess. 4. 13-18.

How plainly through all this is the fore-gleam of what is just at hand! Only in the language of Saul, the present persecutor,—of Paul, the apostle as he is soon to be,—do we find adequate expression for the spiritual interpretation of the last moments of the dying Stephen. He was to see for himself, through the wondrous grace of God, what Stephen had seen and testified. But in Stephen himself he had seen that transforming power of the glory of Christ, of which he speaks in the words that have been quoted from him. Was he not looking back in them to such a scene as we know never passed from his remembrance? True, he had raged against it then. All the deeper would be his remembrance of it now. Paul is in many ways Stephen revived; and thus what the imprint of Stephen's death would make him. Certainly there was here the anticipation of that "gospel of the glory of Christ" (2 Cor. iv. 4), which was, in a special sense, his gospel. Fitting it was that the awful cloud which closed in darkness Israel's day of grace, should be handed with the brightness of the day that was to follow. The fulness of God's grace, and His manifold wisdom were to be told out now in the Church in its new and heavenly relationships,—mysteries that had been hid from ages and generations, but are now made manifest to the saints (Col. i. 26). In Stephen's vision we have not as yet, of course, the Church, but the Son of man in heaven, which He has opened by His presence there; Heaven fixing the gaze and beckoning the feet of the saints by the Object revealed there. Judaism is thus ended for us; the law with its unrent veil is set aside; and the way is opened for Jew and Gentile to be brought together as heirs of a better inheritance than the law could speak of.

But even now this will only gradually be realized; and the riches of grace will only by degrees pass into the actual possession of those to whom they are destined.

Div. 2.

The death of Stephen was the definite rejection of Christ on the part of the nation. It closed on God's side the last attempt to get fruit from the fig-tree of the vineyard, according to the parable (Luk. xiii. 8, 9). There was no remedy now, nor hope of averting the sentence pronounced, that it should be cut down; and for this the Roman axe had long been sharpening. There remained still—and remain—the promises of God to be made good to a future generation; which grace will fulfil, but of which no particular one can claim fulfilment. Meanwhile He has other purposes, for the accomplishment of which even the blessing of the earth (inseparably bound up with Israel's) may well wait,—purposes which are to show forth the exceeding riches of His grace in Christ,

DIVISION 2. (Chaps. viii.–xii.)

Israel rejecting, but the Church enlarging; the barriers between Jew and Gentile broken down.

SUBDIVISION 1. (Chap. viii. 1–25.)

The free choice of the Spirit: individuality and independence.

1 (1-4): The overruling hand of God.

1. AND [z]*Saul was in agreement with his taking away. And there arose at that time a great [a]persecution of the assembly that was in Jerusalem; and they were [z] ch. 7. 58. [a] ctr. ch. 2. 47.

* agreeing to.

and His manifold wisdom, to the principalities and powers in heavenly places (Eph. ii. 7; iii. 10).

Thus the setting aside of Israel only leaves room for the increase and development of the Church already formed, but needing yet to know itself as the vessel of this display. The unfolding begins now at once; although with a slowness, for which the history of all previous revelations might well have prepared us. Successive communications, and by various instruments, have always been the method which God has employed, as Scripture, in every part of it, is witness to us. We may be able to see but little the reason of this; although we may be sure that there is profoundest wisdom in it. Nor is this the place to enquire as to the general meaning of the divine ways in this respect. In the case before us, however, we may easily discern how gently, one by one, the bonds are broken which held the people of God to a system such as Judaism was; a system of divine institution, although in accommodation to the need—in fact the self-sufficiency—of man, and not the expression of what was in His own heart. These ties to it are therefore hindrances, which a deeper apprehension of God, or even of themselves, would bring deliverance from, and which the lack of deliverance will make formidable, and yet, with their apparent sanctions they cannot be too rudely broken through. We shall see how thoroughly yet how tenderly this is done; although the history here does not complete the deliverance; above all, does not give the full spiritual account of it, for which we must go to the epistles.

The present division shows the breaking down of the partition wall between Jew and Gentile, by the reception of Gentiles into the assembly; although questions will come up for settlement afterwards, as we find in the fifteenth chapter with regard to the observance of the law of Moses. We see too the freer action of the Spirit of God, in those outside the original apostles. There is another reason for this in the need of the initiative being plainly taken by God Himself, in some sort even apart from these, who are very plainly under the influence of Jewish prejudices which the younger disciples, and perhaps less weighted with the responsibilities of their position, are the more ready to break through.

SUBD. 1.

The Spirit, as we know, has come, and in signs and miracles of power is testifying to the Risen Christ. But until Stephen, and apart from speaking with tongues and prophesying, these seem to have been confined to the apostles themselves (chap. ii. 43; v. 12). With Stephen, who is used of God to give the final testimony to the rulers of the Jews, and in whom appears the anticipation of the impending change, the "wonders and great signs" seem more the fruit of faith and grace with which he is filled. Yet even in Stephen there might appear to be a connection of these with the office given to him, to which he had been set apart by apostolic hands. Now this is to be quite manifestly altered; the time for the free action of the Spirit has come; and He is to be seen as the true Vicar of Christ upon earth, not only energizing, but disposing and directing. Although there has been no doctrine of it yet, the Body of Christ is formed;

all [b]scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judea and Samaria, except the apostles. And [c]devout men buried Stephen, and made great lamentation over him. But Saul [d]ravaged the assembly, entering into every house,* and dragging off both men and women, deliv-

* Or, "house after house."

b ch. 11. 19. cf. ch. 1. 8 with Phil. 1. 12.
c cf. Lk. 23. 48, 50.
d ch. 9. 1. ch.26.10,11. *cf.*1Cor.15.9. cf. 1 Tim.1. 13.

and the various gifts which this implies manifest themselves under the constraint of divine love, in the various ability of which their possessors become conscious in the ministry to which love moves. For the possession of the gift brings the responsibility to use it;—a responsibility which is, first of all, to God. The gift is a "manifestation;" and "the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal" (1 Cor. xii. 7). The simple rule, intelligible to all, of imparting for the need anywhere what each might have to supply it with,—the adaptation in spiritual things of the rule with which they began in temporal things,—this they found amply sufficient, under the Spirit's guidance, as the general principle of service; which the apostle formulates for them afterwards in the exhortation that "as every one has received the gift," they were "so to minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God" (1 Pet. iv. 10). This is the principle of a "body,"—a living organism; in which there is no useless member, but the individuality of each one is maintained; individuality without independency,—things which are contradictory of one another: to affirm the latter, as to deny the former, is equally to destroy the thought of the body altogether.

There was no doctrine of the body of Christ as yet. The love that united these disciples to one another taught them the practice doubtless; just as it taught them in temporal things not to say that anything was their own. There was no law to prohibit such ministry as any one was capable of; and they would no doubt have thought such a law as unreasonable in one case as in the other.

While all were thus free to minister, there was of course an inspired teaching which was carefully distinguished from all other. "They continued," it was said of these early disciples, "in the apostles' doctrine." There were men accredited as appointed and qualified of the Lord to lay the foundations on which, and according to which, all the building was to be. As yet there were probably not even the rudiments of any New Testament Scriptures; although one could not say that there was no beginning of such attempts at relation of things most surely believed as Luke afterwards refers to, encouraging his more perfect account. Who can say when Matthew began to write? But all must be the merest conjecture as to this. While yet at Jerusalem, with so many living witnesses as were around them, the need for written records would not be felt as afterwards; and yet it is hard to think that with the intense interest attaching to events then fresh in so many memories, there would be even then no effort to preserve these with the accuracy that writing alone could ensure.

But God had taken care that "scriptures" the infant Church should possess from the beginning; scriptures by which the words of the primitive evangelists would be, and were (with the emphatic approbation of the inspired historian) carefully tested. These Old Testament Scriptures had, as we know, been opened by the Lord Himself after His resurrection to others beside the apostles, and their understandings also opened to understand them. Under such teaching, and with this divine assistance, how much of New Testament truth would they be able to anticipate in those "living oracles" of which Stephen speaks, and which, all through His life on earth, the Lord so constantly referred to and upheld. It is not even yet needless to insist upon the honor which God has always put upon His written Word, even in days in which there were inspired teachers in the Church; who themselves, as we see, constantly referred to it. The Church never taught: it was rather that which was to be profited by teach-ered them to prison. They, therefore, who were scattered abroad went through [the countries] telling the [e] glad tidings of the word.

8 (5–13): The Samaritans believe.
2. Now [f] Philip went down to [the]* city of Samaria,

[e] ver. 1.
[f] ch. 6. 5.

* Or, "a": though MSS. differ.

ing. It was at all times in subjection to Scripture, not above it; as were also its inspired teachers. What cause have we for thanksgiving for that which puts into every hand that by which alone the apostolic rule can be observed, to "prove all things, hold fast that which is good!"

1. At this juncture, when the Church is beginning, (as yet, one may say, unconsciously,) her exodus from the Jewish limitations in which, as yet, she had been held, God manifests His overruling power in a very striking way. The tiger-spirit in people and rulers, which had been restrained hitherto, that the new-born child might gather strength, is permitted now to manifest itself; and having tasted blood in Stephen's martyrdom, rages against the followers of the Lord. The Church at Jerusalem is scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judea and Samaria, with the notable exception of those whom the priests and rulers had most cause to dread! The apostles, guided of God, no doubt, alone remain. The seed of the gospel is thus scattered abroad, presently to spring up with plentiful fruit; while the absence of the apostles necessitates the rising up of new leaders in these various movements. All are cast with more simplicity upon God alone, to learn as the unfailing consequence, each for himself, the resources that are in Him. The weaning-time of Isaac is fairly begun; though unbelieving Ishmael may mock the more; all which will only hasten the casting out of the bondwoman and her seed.

On the other hand Saul is seen in the very forefront of the persecution, ravaging the flock. Who could have foreseen that here the great apostle of the Gentiles was also getting his education in the omnipotent wisdom of God? But so it was. A Pharisee of the Pharisees was learning in himself, in the most effectual way possible, the spirit of Pharisaism; while he was sharpening the axe which was to smite his self-righteousness to the ground, and prepare him as the chief of sinners to be the humblest of scholars in Christ's school of grace. Thus God works! How marvelous are His workings! How well we may trust Him to carry out His purposes for the glory of Christ! Saul is already helping to scatter the seed which by and by he will be foremost in sowing. Now he is in agreement with Stephen's being taken away; yet the glory in Stephen's face is to have its part in his own transformation into another witness to the Son of man at the right hand of God; himself converted by the gospel of that glory!

The martyr too is buried by devout men, who without being as yet Christians, are penetrated with the sense of the mockery of all justice in his cruel death, and are thus brought into indignant opposition to the heads of their own nation. We may see in them how the blood of the martyrs will be the seed of the Church, as after-generations have proved abundantly. Here too God is working: defeat is victory, and the dead are workers still. They have not failed, who have fertilized the soil of the gospel with their life-blood. The Church is scattered; and those who are thus sent abroad proclaim, with all the emphasis of their suffering undergone for Him, the value to them of the Christ to whom they testify. Who could bribe these tongues to silence, when the Spirit of glory and of God rested upon the confessors of His Name, the more endeared to them? How could the "glad tidings of the Word" find better evangelists?

2. It is in this connection that another of the Seven comes before us, Philip, next named after Stephen, whom we find now, his office at Jerusalem having come to an end by reason of the persecution, preaching Christ in Samaria, among a people with whom (as another has said) law had failed utterly as always. The Gospel of John has shown us the Lord already there, and many believing through His word; while in the beginning of the Acts itself He names and preached unto them the Christ. And the multitude with one accord gave [g] heed to the things spoken by Philip, when they heard and saw the signs that he did. For from many who had [h] unclean spirits, they came out,* crying with a loud voice; and many who were [i] paralysed, and who were [j] lame, were healed. And there was great [k] joy in the city. Now there had been before in the city a certain man named Simon, who [g] ctr. ver. 11, cf. ch. 16. 14, cf. Jno. 4. 36–38.

[h] cf. Mk. 16. 17, cf. ch. 16. 16–18.
[i] cf. Lk. 5. 18, etc.
[j] cf. ch. 3. 2, etc.
[k] cf. Lk. 19. 37, cf. ch. 16. 34.

* If the stronger reading is to be followed, the literal rendering would be a broken sentence, the subject changed—"many of those who had unclean spirits—they came out."

distinctly, after Jerusalem and Judea, Samaria as a place in which the apostles were to be His witnesses (chap. i. 8). Hitherto, however, it had not been visited by them; and we can understand how the reception of disciples from that schismatic region, with which the Jews had not even ordinary dealings, as the woman of Sychar reminded the Lord, would have created difficulty which it might have been hard for Jews to meet. Now, when driven out from Jerusalem, the opposition there seemingly hopeless to be surmounted, these circumcised worshippers of the One God could hardly fail to be among the first thought of, with the Lord's example and His word before them. Samaria accordingly is the first place now to be evangelized.

"The opinion," says Lechler, "that this Philip was one of the twelve, was entertained already by Polycrates in the second century, by the authors of the Apostolical Constitutions, in the third century, and by others; it was suggested not only by the sameness of the name, but probably also by the special character of the labors of Philip, since these appear to be such as the apostles exclusively performed. This latter view seems, indeed, to be sustained by the expression, 'he preached (ekerusse) the Christ;' inasmuch as it was originally applied to the proclamation of a herald, and denotes therefore here that a public declaration was made in a more than ordinarily solemn manner, and by special authority, while in the case of others, merely the terms euangelizesthai [evangelizing] (viii. 4; xi. 20) and lalein ton logon [speaking the word] were employed. The evangelizing labors of Philip, therefore, undoubtedly seem to be of a different kind from those of the latter. But they do not on this account assume a decidedly apostolical character, in which case didaskein or didache [teach, teaching] would have been the term employed, as in iv. 2, 18; v. 25, 28, 42; comp. ii. 42. The word kerussein, in the present verse, constitutes, as it were, an intermediate grade, or occupies a position between the specifically apostolical didaskein and the general Christian euangelizesthai, or lalein ton logon. This view is in the strictest accordance with the opinion that Philip was one of the Seven, as these men really did occupy an intermediate position in their respective relations to the apostles, and to the disciples in general." (See Lange's Commentary: the Acts).

If such, indeed, is the language of the Word, it is right that we all should understand it. We must agree with Lechler that the Philip here spoken of is not the apostle, and for the double reason that the connection shows that the apostles were at this time all at Jerusalem, and because the visit of Peter and John to Samaria afterwards is inexplicable if Philip were of the same standing with themselves. As to the rest, there is no ground for the attempted distinction. Apostles "taught" indeed, and with peculiar authority; but they also "preached" (chap. ix. 20; x. 42; xx. 25, etc.), "evangelized" (chap. viii. 25; xiv. 7, 15, 21, etc.), and "spoke the Word" (viii. 25; xiv. 25, etc). The word used with regard to Philip here, and which means "to publish, or proclaim," is used with regard to those who preached Christ of envy and strife, supposing to add affliction to Paul's bonds (Phil. i. 16); and also with regard to the leper's publication of his leprosy which the Lord had healed, but where assuredly he used [l]magic arts, and astonished the nation of Samaria, saying that he himself was some great one. To whom they had all given heed, from small to great, saying, This is the [m]power of God which is called great. And they gave heed to him because that for a long time they had been astonished at his magic arts. But when they [n]believed Philip preaching the glad tidings concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, they were [o]baptized, both men and women. And Simon also himself [p]believed; and having been baptized, remained constantly* with Philip, and was

* Or, "gave strict heed to."

[l] cf. ch.13.6-11. cf. ch.19.13-16. cf. 2 Thess. 2. 7-12.
[m] cf. Matt. 24. 24. cf. Jno.5.43.
[n] cf. ch. 13. 38, 39.
[o] ch.2.38,41. vers. 36,38. ch.10.47,48.
[p] cf. Jno. 2. 23-25. cf. Matt.13. 20, 21.

had no "special authority" to do so, but on the contrary, was expressly forbidden by the Lord (Mk. i. 45). While as for the "teaching," said to be "specifically apostolical," it is the word used when Christians generally are exhorted to be "teaching and admonishing one another" (Col. iii. 16). It seems even impossible to believe that Lechler means to assure us that there were no rightful teachers except the apostles! Yet his words seem to have no meaning, if they do not mean this.

The whole interest of such arguments clearly is in support of the claim which used to be more openly advocated than at present, that all preaching should be in the hands of a special class of men ordained for this, to which Philip could be then assigned, because of apostolic hands laid upon him; ignoring the fact which is so plain in the history here, that Philip was set apart, with the rest of the Seven, to "serve tables," and that there is no such thought as that of ordaining to preach or teach,—by apostles or any other,—in all the New Testament. We are not going out of our way now, to take this up; but we must not shun what purport to be arguments from the word of God, as to this or any other matter.

The signs which accompanied Philip's preaching were never granted to all; and as intended to bear witness to the Risen Lord, naturally would go with the proclamation of the Word. At first, they seem, for the same reason doubtless, to have been confined to the apostles, to whom was confided a special testimony to the Resurrection. The wider sphere in which now this testimony was going out would imply a corresponding enlargement in the range of such conferments. There is nothing apparently in this which demands very special explanation. God was acting in all this for the glory of Christ, and in behalf of the gospel of His grace which was now about to shine out in deeper, fuller, sweeter significance than it had ever exhibited before.

The miracles at once gain the attention of the people; but only as making way for the Word, which holds them. The power over unclean spirits is marked; and Samaria appears in more than this respect as largely under the power of the enemy, spite of its professed worship of the true God. It may well be that the truth which had begun to work among them had stirred up special resistance on the part of one who knew its power; and Simon the sorcerer had been his special agent to distract and turn away the minds of the Samaritans from the truth. He had dazzled them with a wonder-working, the source of which he was content mysteriously to hint at as some preternatural greatness in himself, which left their imaginations to go further than his cautious claim. For them he came to be "The power of God which is called great;" but before the true power of God all this collapsed, and a great mass of the people followed Christ, and were baptized, both men and women.

A more notable thing follows. The stronghold of Satan's power is itself shaken, and Simon the sorcerer becomes by conviction and profession a disciple of Christ! Simon also himself believed, and having been baptized, remains astonished, [q]beholding the signs and great works of power that took place.

3 (14-17): The Spirit given.

3. Now when the [r]apostles who were in Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John, who, having come down, prayed for them that they might receive [the] Holy Spirit. For as yet he was [s]not fallen upon any of them; only they were baptized unto the name of the Lord Jesus. Then they [t]laid their hands on them, and they received [the] Holy Spirit.

q cf. Jno. 4. 48. cf. Lk. 16. 31.

r ver. 1. cf. Jno. 4. 22.

s ch. 2. 38.

t cf. ch. 19. 6. cfr. ch. 10. 44-48.

constantly with Philip, as much astonished as he had astonished others, beholding the signs and great works of power taking place. So, apparently, the gospel had triumphed everywhere; in a sense, had done so; but it had to be realized that even victories of the truth in a world fallen away from God, are not always or wholly the triumphs that they seem.

3. Spite of the power manifested, and the joyful reception of the gospel in so many hearts, there was still a lack among these baptized believers which must have been felt greatly. The testimony at Jerusalem had been, "Repent, and be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit." And so it came to pass. But at Samaria, where the conditions then announced had been evidently fulfilled, the effect did not follow: "as yet the Spirit was not fallen upon any of them." It was not simply an absence of the signs that then followed those who believed. It was not only that the gifts failed, but the "Gift." Manifestations of the Spirit regularly declared the Spirit's presence; but here they were absent; and the inconceivably greater Gift—that of the Spirit itself,—had not been conferred.

That this was the Pentecostal gift none can surely doubt; and the Lord Himself defines this as the Baptism of the Spirit (chap. i. 5). The apostle Paul assures us that by this we are brought into the Body of Christ (1 Cor. xii. 13). This is certainly neither the effect nor the accompaniment of water baptism, as with the ritualists: for at Pentecost the hundred and twenty were not baptized with water, and the converts here in Samaria had all both faith and baptism, yet had not the Spirit. Moreover, while in Jerusalem baptism was a prerequisite, in the case of the Gentiles afterwards the Spirit fell on them before the baptism (chap. x. 47). Thus every way there have been distinguished for us things which should never have been confounded. The analogy between them manifestly is, that as water-baptism introduces into the outer sphere of profession, so that of the Spirit introduces into the inner circle of the Church of God.

With new birth or conversion it would again seem almost impossible to confound the Pentecostal Gift. The apostles were neither converted nor born again at Pentecost, but long before; and the Samaritan believers were likewise, as in every other case, converted first.

Finally, the gifts received for testimony were quite distinct from that indwelling of the Spirit personally which the Lord emphasizes for us in the Gospel of John as that which would be the result of His going to the Father (Jno. xiv. 20; xvi. 7). Signs and works of power the disciples had been commissioned to do before (Matt. x. 8), and many others had done them in Old Testament times.

It only remains to enquire why the gift of the Spirit should be delayed in the case of the Samaritans, and why it should have been communicated by means of the apostles. We have not heard of the latter at Jerusalem, nor do we in the case of Cornelius and his friends; a thing which again quite overthrows the ideas which ritualism has associated with it. We find nothing like an ordinance which could only thus be administered, but on the contrary, a quite exceptional dealing with the Samaritans, repeated, as far as we know, but in one case (chap. xix. 6). The rule among Gentiles seems to have been different (Gal. iii. 5).

¢ (18-25): Simon exposed.

4. But Simon, seeing that through the laying on of the apostles' hands the [Holy]* Spirit was given, offered them "money, saying, Give me also this authority that, on whomsoever I lay hands, he may receive [the] Holy Spirit. But Peter said unto him, Thy money go with thee to "destruction, because thou hast thought that the gift of God might be obtained by money. Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter; for thy "heart is not u cf. Matt. 26. 14-16. cf. ch. 3. 6.

v cf. 2 Kl. 5. 16, 26, 27. cf. Heb. 13. 5, 6.

w cf. Matt. 15. 8, 19. cf. Jude 4.

* Some of the earliest MSS. omit.

And if apostles' hands were indeed necessary for such a communication, where are the apostles, authenticated as the early apostles were, by whose hands alone it can be effected? Thank God that He has not tied His grace to anything of this kind!

With regard to Gentiles also, the necessity of baptism as a prerequisite is done away. Who will assert that in the very first case of their admission to the Church the link between things which God intended to be kept united could be thus broken through? Baptism for those who had openly rejected the Lord as come to them would be there an open reception of Him,—the fit accompaniment of that repentance which was now preached to them in His Name. Here also, where there had been a long schismatic denial of the city and house of God at Jerusalem, that this should be ended by the acknowledgment on their part of Jerusalem in those who had to come from Jerusalem to communicate the Gift which they so imperatively needed, seems in keeping with His ways. For, as the Law pointed forward to the gospel, the necessity of which it so distinctly showed, so does the gospel in its turn confirm the Law. God's dispensations have one common Author, who is to be acknowledged in them all. The Gentiles were a people "without God in the world" (Eph. ii. 12), but a circumcised and orthodox nation must own the institutions of the God they worshiped. All seems here consistent and in place.

4. But the wondrous Gift, while perfecting the true disciples in what they lacked, unveils the unhappy Simon as still in the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity. Wondering at this new power displayed, he covets for himself the ability to bestow it, and would make merchandise of the divine vouchsafement; it was in full reality,—even in the extremest form of it,—the "trader in the House of the Lord" (Zech. xiv. 21),—the sin of which Christ had indignantly purged His Father's House, and of which Judas himself was but the highest expression. What was afterwards called "simony" was necessarily a feebler manifestation of the same spirit, which may take forms, moreover, not covered by this word. The carnal mind intruding into divine things will necessarily seek to use them for fleshly advantage;—necessarily, for it knows nothing better: the only full victory over it is with him who has found in Christ Himself the satisfaction which frees him from self-enslavement, and makes it a delight henceforth to pour out upon His feet its most precious ointment.

The fervid heart of Peter bursts forth at this offer on the part of a professed disciple, and he denounces it with terrible severity, as if to prevent the possibility of any recurrence of so great a crime. "Thy money go with thee to destruction," he says, "because thou hast thought that the Gift of God might be obtained with money." It was indeed a bold attempt on the part of Satan, if it were not too foolish to be taken as one of his, to regain the ground that he had lost in Samaria. He had in fact insulted the Lord in as evil a fashion in the temptation in the wilderness; and in his worst malice his utter folly is most manifested too. And this poor tool of his, who had seemed to have escaped from his hand, had only demonstrated now how near it was possible to come to the Saviour and His salvation without ever having really "part or lot in the matter" of the Holy Spirit at all. The apostle urges upon him, therefore, repentance and supplication to God, if perhaps the thought of his heart might be upright before God. [x] Repent therefore of this thy wickedness; and supplicate the Lord, if indeed the thought of thy heart may be forgiven thee: for I see thee to be in the [y] gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity. And Simon answered and said, Do ye supplicate the Lord for me, that [z] nothing may come upon me of the things of which thou hast spoken.

They, therefore, having testified and spoken the word of the Lord, returned to Jerusalem, and preached* the glad tidings to [a] many villages of the Samaritans.

x cf. 2 Tim. 2. 25, 26.

y cf. Deut. 29. 18, 19. cf. 2 Tim. 3. 5.

z cf. Ex. 9. 28. cf. Lk. 16. 24. cf. 2 Cor. 7. 10.

a cf. ch. 1. 8.

* Or, "continued preaching."

forgiven. The doubt arises, not from the limitation of divine mercy, but rather from the hardened condition of the man himself, whom he cannot but regard as in the bitterness of gall itself, and as in the bond (some would say, "bundle") of iniquity. Nothing of all that he had seen and owned as to the power of God manifest there, and bowing so many souls before God, had changed him from the sorcerer he had been before, who would now but use the wondrous power he was witness to, to bring men under his own control and make himself to others the centre which he was to himself! This is man still, with the devil's deceit clinging to him, "Ye shall be as God;"—which was in this way, that, as there cannot be two Gods, man must displace God, and reign himself in the empty throne! Antichrist at the end will be the full exemplification of this; and, as the Lord intimated to the Jews, for those who refuse Him who comes in His Father's Name, the alternative must be that they will receive Antichrist. He is only the incarnation of their own desires, although like Saul of old he may be a head and shoulders taller than any of his followers.

Simon's answer to the apostle shows that, though alarmed, there is no repentance with him. He asks that they would supplicate the Lord that nothing of the things of which they have spoken may come upon him. He is alarmed as to what may come, and that is all; there is no consciousness of his great inward need, no confession that we read of. Like the devils, he believes and trembles, but he does not turn to God on his own account. And so he passes out of the inspired history. There is a legendary one about him, which speaks of him as returning to his old arts as a magician, but with inveterate hatred of that from which he has turned; but there is no certainty about anything beyond what is written here.

The apostles help on the work in Samaria with their own testimony, and themselves evangelize many other villages; but there is no record given as to the success of their labors. The work is confirmed by their visit to Samaria, and fellowship established between this and what has been the headquarters of the Jewish work. A great step forward has plainly been accomplished.

SUBD. 2.

We are carried off to other scenes, in company with the fruitful preacher at Samaria; who is taken from the work in which he has been blessed and honored, upon a journey which would seem naturally a strange one, announced to him as it is beforehand as to an indefinite place upon a desert road,—the road to a Philistine city. But God claims obedience as a first requisite for blessing; which surely follows it: the labor of believing simplicity shall not go unblessed. In fact he is to be now the evangelist of far-off lands.

A man of Ethiopia has been to Jerusalem to worship, and is returning by that desert road. We may be confident that Jerusalem had not much at that time to reward a pilgrimage. The road might well be to him a dreary one. With a heart for God, such as he surely had, the contact with priests and rulers of the stamp of Caiaphas and his Sadducean company must have thrown a shadow upon his soul. He was besides an outcast religiously, spite of a high position

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chap. viii. 26–40.)

The Word still going further, and the Old Testament conducting to the New.

BUT an [b]angel of [the] Lord spake unto Philip, saying, Arise, and go southward, upon the way which goeth down from Jerusalem unto Gaza, which is [c]desert. And he arose, and went. And behold, a man of [d]Ethiopia, a eunuch, a man in power under Candace, queen of the Ethiopians, who was over all her treasure, had come to [e]worship at Jerusalem. And he was [f]returning, and sitting in his chariot, and was reading the prophet Esaias. And the [g]Spirit said unto Philip, Draw near, and join thyself to this chariot. And Philip ran thither, and heard him reading the prophet Esaias, and he said, [h]Understandest thou what thou readest? And he said, How should I be able, except some one should guide me? And he invited Philip to come up and sit with him. And the passage of the Scripture which he read b cf. ch. 5. 19, 20. cf. ch. 10. 3. cf. ch. 12. 7. cf. ch. 27. 23, 24.

c ctr. vers. 6–8. cf. ch. 16. 23, 24. cf. Rev. 3. 7.
d cf. Jer. 38. 7, etc. cf. Ps. 68. 31.
e cf. 1 Ki. 8. 41, 42. cf. Jno. 12. 20.
f cf. Lk. 24. 13, etc. cf. Is. 1. 11–14.
g ch. 10. 19. cf. ch. 13. 2. cf. ch. 20. 23.
h cf. Lk. 24. 45. cf. 2 Cor. 3. 15. cf. Rom. 10. 14, 15.

and his heart for God. As a eunuch, (if we are to take that literally, as I doubt not,) he could not come into the congregation of the Lord (Deut. xxiii. 1); whatever precious assurances there might be for him of future blessing (Isa. lvi. 3–5). Sitting in his chariot, on his return from the city of hollow forms and barren solemnities, he turns naturally to the pages of the prophets, and of Isaiah most of all, to find consolation; but here too he was met by sorrow, and of a kind also that he could not penetrate,—the sorrows of One from whom Israel, it seemed, had turned, of One led as a sheep to the slaughter, and as a lamb dumb before its shearers, His judgment taken away, His life from the earth. He is reading this aloud as he overtakes Philip upon the road, as if he would impress himself with something which should have significance for him, but has not; the cloud is over it hopelessly, as it seems to him, without some guide; and he has none. How could he think of finding an interpreter upon that desert way, his back upon Jerusalem, and after his useless visit there?

How the voice of the evangelist, cheery with its message ready, the Voice of the Spirit astir in him to deliver it, must have made his heart leap in response to the question which penetrated already with a ray of light the gloom of his perplexity, "Understandest thou what thou readest?" "How should I?" he answers simply; "except some one should guide me?" And immediately there springs up in his soul the eager hope that in this unknown stranger, God may have sent him help. He asks Philip, therefore, to sit with him in his chariot, and soon is an enwrapt hearer of the gospel of Christ.

Philip's text has been already found for him: from the prophet's picture of the Servant of Jehovah he begins to preach Jesus as the fulfilment of Old Testament prediction; and the good seed sinks into soil prepared. The eunuch finds that he too can have his place in the congregation of the Lord; and he finds One who can do for him what Jerusalem and the law have been unable to do. He takes his place without hesitation as owning in baptism Jesus as his Lord; and, Philip being immediately caught away by the Spirit of the Lord, he goes upon his way with the living Saviour, who is to be henceforth his Guide and Friend, rejoicing.

This story closes here; too soon to satisfy the interest that has been awakened in it. We would fain follow this simple-hearted traveler, and learn whether he is permitted to become the evangelist of the land to which he is returning,—whether, or in what measure, Ethiopia will now stretch out her hands towards God: but nothing of all this is made known to us. If we find in it a hint of the gospel now to go out to the nations afar off, yet it is but a hint, and not an was this: [i]'He was led as a sheep to the [j]slaughter, and as a lamb before its shearer is dumb, so he [k]openeth not his mouth. In his humiliation his [l]judgment was taken away; his generation who shall declare? for his [m]life is taken from the earth. And the eunuch answered and said to Philip, I pray thee, of [n]whom speaketh the prophet this? of himself or of some other? And Philip opened his mouth, and beginning from [o]this scripture, preached unto him Jesus. And as they went on their way, they came upon a certain water; and the eunuch saith, Behold, water! what doth hinder me to be baptized?* And he commanded the chariot to stand still; and they went down both into the water,—both Philip and the eunuch; and he [p]baptized him. And when they had come up out of the water, the [q]Spirit of [the] Lord caught away Philip, and the eunuch saw him no more; for he went on his way, [r]rejoicing. But Philip was found at Azotus; and passing through, he [s]preached the glad tidings to all the cities, until he came to Cæsarea.

i cf. Is. 53.7, 8.
j ch. 2. 23.
k cf. 1 Pet. 2. 23.
l cf. Phil. 2. 8. cf. Lk. 23. 41, 47.
m cf. Ps. 102. 23, 24. cf. Dan. 9. 26.
n cf. ch. 2. 30, 31. cf Rev. 19. 10. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 10, 11.
o cf. Lk. 24. 27. cf. ch. 17. 2, 3, cf. ch. 10. 43.
p ch. 16. 33, etc.
q cf. 1 Ki. 18. 12. cf. 2 Ki. 2. 16. cf. Ezek. 3. 12, 14.
r ver. 8.
s cf. ver. 25. cf. ch. 21. 8.

* The thirty-seventh verse of the common version is omitted in nearly all the earliest MSS. and versions.

assurance. The apostle of the Gentiles is not yet raised up, and it is his work that we are to pursue in this connection, though there are preliminaries, as we are now to see. But if this be the purport of the story here, it does not seem completed as we might expect. There must be, one would say, another purpose in it; and we are naturally led to look at it again, to see if we may not discover this.

And here at once it strikes us, that this is a child of the old dispensation, in whom its necessary limitations and failure to satisfy those to whom it ministered are plainly set forth, and to whom it is but a hand pointing forward to Him who alone can do this. It is, in short the Old Testament leading on its disciples to the New, that we have before us here; an important point in the history of these times we are considering. We have but just now seen in Samaria how the New Testament takes care to vindicate the Old. Now we have the converse of this; it is the Old Testament seen awakening the longings of the heart after that which it cannot itself supply, while it does testify to the Living Source of it. With this meaning all the details of the story agree: the appearance of the angel of the Lord—that is, of Jehovah*—to Philip, to make known to him his commission. When his work is accomplished, again, it is "the Spirit of Jehovah" who snatches away the messenger. This is both Old Testament speech and action. The Spirit of Jehovah occurs once in the Gospels (Luk. iv. 18), and once before in the Acts (chap. v. 9); it never occurs in the New Testament again. Jehovah also, or what stands for it here, the Name for Israel's covenant God, is naturally found also in Old Testament connection, or in that part of the New in which it is not yet decided whether Israel is or is not to be the special people of God. The Gospels have it frequently, and the first eight chapters of the Acts; after this, except for special reasons in the twelfth chapter, it occurs but twice, or possibly thrice (chap. xiii. 10, 11; xv. 17). The Old Testament has in fact handed over its disciples to the New; and in the

*In the Septuagint, as in our common version of the Old Testament, from which (with the apparent vindication of it in the New) the practice is derived, "the Lord" is commonly substituted for the "Jehovah" of the Hebrew. It is distinguished in the New from the general reference to the Lord Jesus (except where it is a direct quotation from the Greek version) by the omission of the article, bracketed in our text,—"[the] Lord."

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chap. ix. 1–30.)

The Gospel of the Glory of Christ.

1(1-9): Grace to the chief of sinners.

1. BUT Saul, [t]still breathing out threatening and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, went unto the high priest, and asked of him [u]letters to Damascus, unto the synagogues, that if he found any who were of the [v]Way, whether men or women, he might bring them bound to Jerusalem. And as he

[t] ch. 8. 1, 3. ch.26.10,11.

[u] ch. 22. 5.

[v] ch.19.9,23. ch.24.14,22.

Epistles we find it only in such references as before mentioned, or two or three times in those written to believers of the circumcision, as in James and Peter. A very few times (again most naturally) it occurs in Revelation. The significance here is therefore plain.

The eunuch is a man in high position, a man of wealth, and of an earnest heart. He is therefore one in whom the character of the Old Testament can be most conspicuously seen; while we see also the care of God for His own to relieve the darkness for those who in their perplexity sought to Him. The Psalms illustrate abundantly both the darkness and the relief. Now the dawn of a brighter day had begun; and the Old Testament hails with gladness its coming so long delayed. It was yet but the dawn, though how bright a one!

Philip is caught away; the mere human teacher is not to take the place of the Divine. His coming and his departure are both well fitted to assure the new disciple how safely he may rest in the all-sufficiency that has thus met and ministered to him. Philip on his part is found at Azotus, the Philistine Ashdod; and from thence, with the joy in his heart of one who is taking the spoil* from the strong one whom a Stronger has overcome, he evangelizes all the cities as far as Cæsarea.

SUBD. 3.

In perfect order of development, we are now to see the conversion of the apostle of the Gentiles; who receives grace and apostleship from the ascended Lord. We have noticed already the connection between Stephen's witness and that of Paul. In Stephen Israel has definitely rejected the Messiah, and thus put from her the blessing to be brought in by Him; the blessing for the earth at large being identified with that of the earthly people. But God has other and higher purposes,—the display of a fuller grace which shall both stoop lower and lift up higher. Man having been thoroughly shown out, not merely impotent and rebellious under law, but in the cross of Christ the mind of the flesh being manifested as enmity against God, He will now act for Himself, to display Himself; and since He is Love, it must be in love that He is displayed,—love in answer to enmity; which is, therefore, grace: of which the messenger is in himself also the perfect exponent. Saul has shared in the national sin of Christ's rejection, is of the party that could be quoted as to an individual in opposition to Him (Jno. vii. 48), was in agreement with the murder of Stephen, and is only roused by it to greater violence; he is the apostle of Jewish malignity, pursuing the disciples even to strange cities, at the very time when he is smitten down by the light from an open heaven, and transformed from the persecutor of Christ into His most devoted follower,—ever afterwards the apostle of the grace that has transformed him. Here, where there could be no possible thought of claim, heaven, closed to man's righteousness, opens to its central, infinite glory, to display in the midst of it, whence the light came, the One whom as yet Saul knew not, but who identified Himself with His suffering saints on earth. The gospel of the glory of Christ was henceforth his gospel.

It is evident that here the meaning of Stephen's radiant face is now made plain. Heaven is really opened,—a Man gone in there, but occupying a place that no mere man could occupy. Paul preaches Him from the first, that He is the journeyed, it came to pass that he drew [w] near unto Damascus; and suddenly there flashed around him a [x] light out of heaven. And he [y] fell to the ground, and heard a voice saying unto him, Saul, Saul, why [z] persecutest thou me? And he said, Who art thou, Lord? And he [said], I am [a] Jesus, whom thou persecutest.* But rise, and enter into the city, and it shall be [b] told thee what thou must do. And the men who journeyed [w] cf. ch. 22. 6-17. cf. ch. 26. 10-18. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 9, 10 with Zech. 3. 2. [x] cf. 1 Jno. 1. 5. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 6. [y] cf. Job 42. 5, 6. cf. Phil. 3. 7, 8. cf. Lk. 18. 13.

*Ashdod means "spoiler."

* That which follows here in the common version is found in no Greek MS.

[z] cf. Zech. 2. 8; cf. Jno. 15. 20, 21; cf. Eph. 5. 29, 30. [a] cf. ch. 2. 33-36; cf. Heb. 2. 9. [b] cf. ch. 10. 30, 31; cf. Gal. 1. 12-16.

Son of God (ver. 20). Yet he sees Him none the less the Representative of His people, and the bringing men to see and fill their place in Him is henceforth to be his effort,—that for which the Spirit of God has taken him up and uses him. We may not find it come fully out in the Acts, but the necessary first consequence is that Jew and Gentile have no more any separate standing. It is not a Christ after the flesh that he sees, but a Christ in heaven; and that is not the place of a Jew's blessings, nor one from which, if grace bestow it, he can exclude the Gentile. The apostle of the Gentiles is here prepared.

1. Grace is the foundation of all,—free, sovereign grace. Of what use his privileges as a Jew to one taken red-handed on his mission of blood, as Saul is now! It is not a mere repentant sinner suing for and finding mercy. He is an enemy, when as such he is reconciled to God. Legality is an impossibility to one in his position. He cannot dream of any of those half-gospels with which men delude themselves first, and then their hearers. He, at least, had not done his best, save to be lost. His Pharisaism tumbled in one rag-heap at his feet, his cry was now that he was "chief of sinners;" and under no legal system whatever could the chief of sinners possibly have hope. But he, met and conquered by divine love, was given no room to dishonor it by a single question. And "in me," he says, "did Christ Jesus show forth all long-suffering, for a pattern to them that should hereafter believe on Him, to life everlasting." (1 Tim. i. 16). Thus was Paul's doctrine prepared for him at the start; and he also, even in his unconverted state, for it.

"Concerning zeal, persecuting the Church," was Paul's own account afterwards of the state in which divine grace found him (Phil. iii. 6). It did not alter his conviction that he was the chief of sinners; "the least of the apostles," he says elsewhere, and "not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the Church of God" (1 Cor. xv. 9). A man's religion may be the worst thing about him; and his sincerity in it will not hinder its effect upon him, but rather make it the more sure. In this case, how solemn to realize that Saul's religion was zealous law-keeping; the law being that which God Himself had given: it was one of Moses' disciples, of whom they could rightly say, "We know that God spake by Moses," who was in that character attacking Christ!

"Touching the righteousness of the law, blameless;" this is another thing that, looking back at himself with full Christian enlightenment, he says of his unconverted state. That was what his conscience said: it did not condemn or accuse him; and that was undoubtedly what in his case made him the zealous persecutor that he was: he had a zeal for God and for that law under which he had fared so well, and deserved so well of Him who gave it! Thus all that seemed so favorable in Saul's case was what was most against him: his own good character, his zeal for law, and, as he allows with regard to his nation at large, his zeal for God even (chap. xxii. 3); and that God was the true God, not a false one: whom yet he was bitterly against, and knew it not, and who was therefore, in so far, against him, even while He pursued in His love this zealous antagonist. What confusion is here! And this is the confusion which with him stood speechless, [c]hearing the voice,* but beholding no one. And Saul arose from the earth, and when his eyes were opened, he [d]saw no one;† and they led him by the hand, and brought him to Damascus. And he was [e]three days without sight, and neither ate nor drank.

c cf. Dan. 10. 7. cf. Jno. 12. 28, 29. cf. 1 Cor. 2. 14.
d ch. 22. 11. ctr. ch. 9. 40.
e cf. Lk. 24. 7 with Col. 2. 12.

*The "voice," but not the words, (as shown by the genitive here) in contrast with xxii. 9, which implies the words.
†Many read, "nothing."

springs out of all self-justifying efforts: "for they, being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God "(Rom. x. 3). Paul will tell us himself in his first epistle, how the scales fell from his eyes in this respect. At present it is with the consequences that God faces him; and on the road to Damascus he suddenly finds himself smitten down by the light of a glory shining in the face of Him against whom the full current of his legal prejudices, with his traditionalism and his strong passion for his nation, all combined to carry him.

It is striking that, while we know from Paul's own statements afterwards, and even from the words of Ananias to him in the present chapter, that Jesus Himself appeared to him, we hear in this first account only of the Light and of the Voice; light out of heaven, in which, certainly for the first time, he stood revealed to himself; a Voice along with it, which fastened his eyes upon himself, even then to raise with himself the question, rather than to accuse, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou ME?"

There could, of course, be no answer. Under the power of that glory which had transfigured Stephen, the very throb of the heart must have been hushed, called to expectant stillness in the presence of God. No need for answer! Had he not helped to batter out that glory from a human face with stones? Now a Human Voice from the midst of that glory was appealing to him, claiming these persecuted ones as His own—Himself! Yet he is drawn,—not repelled. Even now he can seek from Him who is speaking the anticipated answer which condemns—but HE has not condemned—him: "Who art Thou, Lord?" And the Royal Voice answers, "I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest."

Thus they come together—Lord and follower; never to be separated more! How grand and wonderful is the simplicity of it all! The chief of sinners and the Lord of saints come together in a manner which has cost how great a price to effect; and the grace shown is as implicit as it wakes up implicit confidence to receive it. Has not this smitten sinner been in the outshining glory of God, unsmitten?—in the radiance shining on Stephen himself? There are other accounts, but they do not alter this; one can only say, the grace of it is perfect: and when we learn that he is to be the teacher of grace to others, we realize how completely fitted for such a purpose is that of which the history is recorded here. But it is the same grace which meets all of us.

We can see too, that the identification of Christ with His people is here, which is to be developed on two sides, as "ye in Me and I in you." And in this Jew and Gentile disappear, and the way for the mystery of the Church is prepared. Heaven is opened: God has come out to men; and Man—how glorious a MAN!—has gone in to God. Who that knows what was committed to Paul to teach us, but must see how the Pauline truths begin to appear in Paul's conversion? We must not expect to reach their development in the Acts; and it is not yet, therefore, the time to follow their development. We must wait for Romans, Ephesians, Corinthians, Hebrews, to have the working out.

The words that follow, in the common version, this declaration of Himself upon the Lord's part are borrowed from the other accounts of what is here. Luke gives us in this place only the direction to the new disciple to enter into the 2 (10-16): The mission of Ananias.

2. Now there was a certain disciple in Damascus, by name Ananias; and the Lord said unto him in a *f*vision, Ananias. And he said, Behold, [here am] I, Lord. And the Lord [said] unto him, Arise, and go into the street which is called Straight; and seek in the house of Judas one by name Saul, of Tarsus: for, behold, he *g*prayeth, and hath seen a man named Ananias coming in, and laying his hands upon him, that he might receive sight. But Ananias answered, Lord, I have *h*heard from many of this man, how much evil he hath done to thy saints in Jerusalem; and here he hath authority from the chief priests to bind all who call upon thy Name. But the Lord said unto him, Go; for he is a *i*chosen vessel unto me, to bear my Name both before the *j*nations and *k*kings, and the *l*sons of Israel; for I will show him how many things he must *m*suffer for my Name.

f cf. ch. 10.3 17.
cf. ch. 2. 17
g cf. Lk. 18 13.
cf. Lk. 15.7
h vers. 1, 2
cf. Gal. 1.23
i cf. Gal. 1 15, 16.
cf. Rom. 1.1
j cf. Rom. 11 13.
cf. Eph. 3 7, 8.
k cf. 2 Tim 4. 16, 17.
cf. ch. 26. 1 2, etc.
l cf. ch 21.40
cf. Rom. 1 16.
cf. Rom. 9 1-5.
m ch. 20. 23
cf. 2 Cor. 11 23-28.
cf. Gal. 6. 17

city, and there it shall be told him what he is to do. The men accompanying him stand speechless, hearing the sound of the voice, but nothing more; the significance is for Paul. He on the other hand remains blinded by the light, and has to be led by the hand into Damascus; in which condition he continues three days without food or drink. He needs this, doubtless, for the tempest aroused within him to subside,—for the review of the now terrible past, and the realization of the new beginning. The resurrection number may well have its significance here in the apprehension of the old things now for him passed away, and all things become new. Shut up in darkness, amid his now uncongenial associates, he is made to realize his entire dependence upon God to bring him forth, and to accomplish in him the purposes of His marvellous grace.

2. We have now a lovely picture of the free intimacy between our Lord and His disciples in those yet unclouded days of early freshness. Saul is to take his place among the followers of the Crucified in the lowly way of baptism at the hands of those who had preceded him as such. A disciple named Ananias ("Jah has shown grace") is chosen by the Lord for the introduction of Saul. He is simply termed a "disciple," and yet is chosen, not only for the administration of baptism, which is in keeping with all that we have elsewhere in relation to this, but also for that which at Samaria just now required a special visit of apostles from Jerusalem—the communication of the Spirit. We have not yet come to this, however, here; but simply to consider the choice of Ananias to minister in the way we see him do to one designed to be the special apostle of the Gentiles. In Paul we see, as he himself declares to us, any Jewish thought of succession from the original twelve broken through. Paul is an "apostle, not of men, nor through man;" and on this account confers not with flesh and blood, nor even goes up to Jerusalem in the first place, to those who were apostles before him, but to Arabia, to the "backside of the desert" (Gal. i. 16, 17). The living and abiding Spirit is to be Himself the Source of supply; and the warrant for what is said is, first of all, the truth of it, intertwining with, confirmed by and confirming, all that is truth elsewhere.

Ananias is therefore, as a simple disciple, all the more suited to be sent to Saul; and the Lord accordingly appears to him in a vision, bidding him go and seek in the house of Judas this man who has seen him in a vision, in answer to his prayer, laying his hands upon him, that he may receive his sight. Thus he who is to be in such a large and blessed way, the minister to others is to learn himself, first of all, his own need of ministry, and to receive it. How suited a messenger must this Ananias, with his significant name have seemed to the thankful and humbled man! "Grace" was, indeed, his new-

3 (17-22): Filled with the Spirit.

3. And Ananias went away and entered into the house; and, [n]laying his hands on him, he said, Saul, Brother, the Lord hath sent me,—Jesus, who appeared unto thee in the way by which thou camest,—that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be [o]filled with [the] Holy Spirit. And immediately there fell from his eyes as it were scales, and he received his sight. And he arose, and was [p]baptized; and having taken food, he was strengthened. And he was with the disciples that were in Damascus certain days. And immediately he preached Jesus in the synagogues, that he is the [q]Son of God. And all who heard him were astonished, and said, [r]Is not this he who in Jerusalem destroyed those who called upon this name, and came hither for this purpose, that he might bring them bound unto the chief priests? But Saul [s]increased more and more in strength, and confounded the Jews who dwelt at Damascus, proving that [t]this is the Christ.

n ver. 12. cf. Mk. 16. 18. cfr. ch. 8. 17-20.
o cf. ch. 10. 44.
p cf. ch. 16. 33, 34.
q cf. Rom. 1. 4. cf. Jno. 9. 35. cf. Heb. 4. 14.
r vers. 13, 14. cf. 1 Tim. 1. 12-17.
s cf. 1 Tim. 4. 14, 15.
t cf. ch. 17. 3. cf. ver. 20.

found joy. But Saul's reputation has gone before him, and Ananias shrinks from his task, and ventures even to remonstrate with his Lord. Do we, who perhaps wonder at his foolish faint-heartedness, never imitate it, and reason with Omniscient Love as to His ways with us? But the Lord replies by letting him know that Saul was a chosen vessel unto Him, to bear His Name in testimony of the widest range,—to Gentiles and to Jews both; but the Gentiles here come before the Jews. That which he is to suffer also is proportioned to the breadth of his testimony; to bear the Name of Jesus implies suffering; witness and martyr are to be the same word.

3. There can be no more demur, but Ananias departs upon his errand; and entering the house, lays his hands upon Saul, acquainting him with his commission. It is remarkable that Ananias here joins his being filled with the Spirit as that for which he is sent, while yet it is not mentioned when, or in connection with what, Saul receives the Spirit. With Jews, as having openly rejected Christ, the order elsewhere was that they owned him in baptism, by which they received public remission of their sins, and then they received the gift of the Holy Spirit. At Pentecost nothing is said of the laying on of hands for this, which is first recorded as done in Samaria; but at Ephesus also John's disciples are first baptized, and then they still wait for the Spirit until Paul's hands are laid upon them. In the case of Cornelius and his friends, there is no previous baptism, and no laying on of hands at all. Was there any laying on of hands for this by Ananias? Two things would argue for it,—the words of Ananias himself, and the case of John's disciples. On the other hand, on the imposition of hands all we hear of as following is the healing of Saul's blindness; there is nothing said of the Spirit being given at that time; nor of any imposition of hands at a later time. The insistence upon baptism first in the case of the Jew seems likewise against it; though the apostle of the Gentiles is so exceptional a case, and seems so to reflect the gospel that he carries, and the change in regard to the Gentile is so marked, that one is inclined to read his saying, "Christ sent me not to baptize," back into his own history here. In this unsatisfactory way, it seems, we have to leave it.

"Filled with the Holy Spirit," however, he is indeed; immediately preaching in the synagogues to which his letters of authorization are addressed that very Jesus, whose followers he is commissioned to destroy. He preaches Him also as yet the twelve, as far as the history goes, have not done, in the very character in which Israel had rejected Him, as Son of God. This is the fullest reversal of his own mad unbelief, and the completest challenge of that of Israel.

4 (23-30): Tribulation.

4. Now, when many days were fulfilled, the Jews took [u]counsel together to slay him; but their plot became known to Saul. And they watched also the gates day and night, that they might slay him; but the* disciples took him by night, and [v]let him down through the wall, lowering him in a basket. And when he was come to Jerusalem, he essayed to join himself to the disciples; and they were all [w]afraid of him, not believing him to be a disciple. But [x]Barnabas took him, and brought him to the apostles, and related to them how he had seen the Lord in the way, and that he had spoken to him, and how he had spoken boldly at Damascus in the name of Jesus. And he was with them [y]going in and out at Jerusalem, speaking boldly in the name of the Lord. And he spake and disputed with the Grecian Jews; but they went to work to kill him. And when the brethren knew it, they brought him down to [z]Cæsarea, and sent him away to Tarsus.

u ch. 5. 21. cf. ch. 7. 57, 58.

v 2 Cor. 11. 32, 33. cf. Josh. 2. 15. cf. 1 Sa. 19. 12.

w cf. vers. 13, 14.

x ch. 4. 36. cf. ch. 11. 22-26.

y cf. ch. 22. 17, 18.

z ctr. ch. 23. 31-35.

* R. V. reads, "his," but this is not required by the text, and does violence to the teaching of scripture.

The missionary of their own enmity is suddenly become the very champion of the "Way" he persecuted. Astonishment, which for the moment must have been dismay, falls upon those who hear him and know that which has wrought this change, to which his companions on the road could but bear witness as far as that strange interruption of their journey was realized by them. And Saul increased more and more in strength, and confounded the Jews dwelling at Damascus, proving that the One whom he confessed was indeed the Christ.

The preaching of Jesus as the Son of God we should naturally have expected to have heard in the first place from the lips of John, whose writings are, as we know, so full of this. In Paul's epistles, if Hebrews is, as I doubt not, to be included among these, we have the Lord spoken of in this character twenty-nine times; but in John's epistles (of only seven chapters) there are twenty-three occurrences. In one passage alone in the rest of the General Epistles, where Peter quotes the Voice from the "excellent glory" (2 Pet. i. 17), do we find this title; this, although Peter is in the Gospels the first of the inspired writers to own Christ openly in this way. The kinship between Paul and John is thus plainly declared. The connection with Paul's doctrines we must consider later, as we take up his epistles.

4. The visit to Arabia, of which the epistle to the Galatians speaks, takes place evidently during those "many days" at the end of which the persecution breaks out, in which first Saul has to taste of the same cup of which he had been compelling others to drink in the dark days forever ended. At first the wonder of his conversion had discomfited the adversaries; but this naturally terminates in a violent reaction on the part of those who have not been brought by it to God; and now they join together in a plot to slay him: but He who in so extraordinary a way had brought him to Himself had no intention of leaving him in the hands of his enemies. The plot became known to Saul; and the gates being watched day and night, the disciples let him down in a basket through a window in the wall by night, and he escapes their hands.

So ends Saul's testimony at Damascus; nor is he rescued by a miracle from the death designed for him, but escapes in a lowly manner enough, more suited to the way of the Cross which he had begun to tread. It is but the beginning of those many sufferings which the Lord had said that He would show him that he was to endure for His sake. The Glory which was henceforth his guiding star did not light up the earth for him, but drew him out of it. His was to be in a

SUBDIVISION 4. (Chap. ix. 31–43.)
Remnant mercy in Israel.

1 (31): Peace.

1. THEN had the assembly* [a]peace throughout all Judea and Galilee and Samaria, being [b]edified; and, walking in the [c]fear of the Lord, and in the [d]comfort of the Holy Spirit, was [e]multiplied.

*So the earliest MSS. and versions; but many read, "assemblies."

a ctr. ch. 8. 1.
b cf. Eph. 4. 16.
c cf. Heb. 12. 28. cf. Ps. 34. 9.
d cf. Phil. 2. 1, 2. cf. Jno. 14. 16.
e cf. ver. 42. cf. ch. 16. 5.

peculiar sense a heavenly testimony, and the power of it that by which the world was crucified to him, and he unto the world.

Driven from Damascus, Saul goes up to Jerusalem, according to his own statement to see Peter (Gal. i. 18); for what purpose we are not told; but he abode there only fifteen days. Although three years had elapsed from the time of his conversion, the report of it which had reached the disciples there had yet found no credit in the scene of his former "ravages" upon the flock of Christ. In Arabia he had been for some time probably away from observation, and his recent testimony again in Damascus seems not to have been known. Thus when he essayed to join himself to those whom he had helped to scatter, and who had, no doubt, many of them, vivid remembrances of those unhappy days, there was a general recoil. "They were all afraid of him, not believing him to be a disciple." At this juncture the future companion of his labors, Barnabas, appears as mediator. He took and brought him to the apostles; that is, as Paul himself tells us, to Peter and James, the Lord's brother, and represents to them the whole matter. The cloud is cleared away, and Saul remains with them going in and out at Jerusalem, and speaking boldly in the name of the Lord.

He takes up now the work of the first martyr, disputing with the Hellenistic Jews, who go to work to give him Stephen's portion; but in an ecstasy (chap. xxii. 17, 18) the Lord appears to him, and bids him depart from the city, assuring him that they will not hear his testimony, and that he is to be sent far off to the Gentiles. The brethren thereupon bring him down to Cæsarea on the sea-coast, and send him forth to Tarsus, his native city. There for awhile we leave him.

SUBD. 4.

Israel is thus casting out the messengers sent to her, and filling full for herself the cup of wrath, which at a later time we know that she drank to the uttermost. But God is slow to anger, and of great mercy; and while the threatened judgment lingers, His long suffering is salvation to a remnant, in whom may be seen the promise yet abiding of final blessing to Israel as a whole. This remnant is as the sap of a cut down tree, in which is the hope of revival for the tree. The history of the development of the divine ways in the Church pauses for awhile here, to give us such an intimation of the faithfulness of a Saviour God.

1. We have first, as the result of the dealing of God with the chief persecutor, peace to the assembly throughout Judea, Galilee, and Samaria;—the whole extent, as far as yet enjoyed, of Israel's land. It is but a remnant, this assembly, as already said, and the mass are rejecting; and so it will be even in the last days: a remnant will become the nation; God having to purge out the obstinate rejectors from among the people, as prophecy shows abundantly. Here it is only a hint of what will be; yet we see in it Judea and Jerusalem maintained in their central place, Samaria owning it, in Galilee of the Gentiles God's heart towards His scattered ones. Outwardly there is peace; inwardly the fear of the Lord and the comfort of the Holy Spirit. How blessed to realize when for Israel at last all this shall be fulfilled!

Let us notice what are here put together for us: first of all, not the comfort, but the fear of the Lord,—hearts in subjection to the Ruler of His people. With Him, if grace reigns, as it does, the reign is not less absolute, but more.

2 (32-35): Æneas healed.

2. And it came to pass, as Peter went [f]throughout all parts, he came down also to the saints who dwelt at Lydda. And he found there a certain man named Æneas, who had kept his bed eight years, [and] * was [g]paralysed. And Peter said unto him, Æneas, Jesus the Christ healeth thee: arise, and make thy bed. And he arose immediately; and [h]all that dwelt in Lydda and the Sharon saw him, and† turned to the Lord.

[f] cf. ch. 8.25.

[g] cf. Matt. 9.2, etc. cf. Mi. 4.6, 7.

[h] cf. Ps. 126.1, 2.

3 (36-43): Dorcas raised up.

3. Now there was in Joppa a certain disciple named Tabitha, which being interpreted is called Dorcas;‡

* Literally, "who." † οἵτινες: "who also." ‡ "Gazelle."

When grace has not for its effect the fear of the Lord, in the same proportion is grace really unknown, and the comfort of the Holy Spirit will be unenjoyed. The Spirit is here to glorify Christ; and, as the Holy Spirit, refuses absolutely all touch of evil; legality and license are both in uttermost extreme from Him, and further by far than they are from one another. The slave may at times make up for his slavery by license; the child's happy service needs no compensation for its offering of love.

Here in a soil like this the seed of divine truth will fructify; for it is love that edifieth; and the assembly walking in such a spirit will be surely multiplied. Where an opposite spirit exists, multiplication will be but a multiplication of the evil; it is a good law that forbids such unhappy growths to go on, whose sap, against nature, is poisonous to themselves.

2. We now follow Peter, who with the growth of the work is no more confined to Jerusalem, but is passing through the land. He comes down to the saints who dwell at Lydda, a still existing town in the plain of Sharon, and finds there a certain man, who from the description and the apostle's words to him seems not yet to be a disciple, named Æneas, eight years paralyzed. Immediately, upon Peter's declaration, "Jesus the Christ healeth thee, arise, and make thy bed," he is healed and rises up; and all that dwelt in Lydda and the Sharon" (the Plain, stretching from Joppa to Cæsarea on the sea-coast), "saw him, and turned to the Lord."

Conversion so widespread shows indeed that God has not cast away His people whom He foreknew (Rom. xi. 1); and Lydda well fulfills its name, as the "birthplace" of so many souls. We naturally ask ourselves, Is this all that we are intended to find in it? or is there here, as in so many other cases, a hidden meaning? If the Lord is assuring us in this of what the apostle declares that Israel's remnant according to election preaches to us, would it be strange to find in it a further assurance as to God's purposes towards His ancient people? Here too, would be the very place in which we might expect to find this: here, where we are just at the point at which, the natural branches being broken off for unbelief, the Gentiles are being graffed into the olive. Certainly all is in harmony in this way. Æneas means "praise"; and in the case of Israel, a paralysis of praise is truly come upon her. She is a reproach instead of praise, but is yet to be a people formed for Himself, to show forth His praise. Æneas is thus yet to be healed, and as it were in a moment, by Jesus the Christ; and Lydda may well speak of a new "birth" by which this will be effected. Nothing else will accomplish it; for the nature of man is fallen, and the Lydda of natural birth is in the "plain,"—the common level of humanity. Christ alone can renew it; so that in the end Sharon shall be a fold of flocks (Isa. lxv. 10), a type of which this remarkable ingathering of converts there may speak. For when Israel is that praise to God which she never yet has been, then will the time have come for such a turning to God as the earth has not yet witnessed. Israel's eighth year will have come,—her new covenant time.

3. If this, then, be the deeper view of the healing of Æneas, the raising up of Dorcas must, one would say, be in the same line of application, and have its she was [i]full of good works and almsdeeds which she did. And it came to pass in those days that she fell sick and [j]died; whom having washed, they laid in an [k]upper chamber. And as Lydda was nigh unto Joppa, the disciples, hearing that Peter was there, sent two men to him, entreating him, Delay not to come on to us. And Peter arose and went with them; whom, when he had arrived, they brought up to the upper chamber. And all the [l]widows stood by him, weeping, and showing the coats and garments which Dorcas made, when she was with them. But Peter put them all forth, and kneeled down and prayed; and turning to the body, he said, Tabitha, arise. And she opened her eyes, and seeing Peter, she sat up. And he gave her his hand, and raised her up; and calling the saints and widows, he presented her [m]alive. And it became known throughout all Joppa, and many believed on the Lord. And it came to pass, that he abode many days in Joppa, with one [n]Simon, a tanner.

[i] cf. 1 Tim. 2. 10.
[j] cf. Jno. 11. 3, 14. cf. Rm. 1. 3, 5.
[k] cf. ch. 1. 13. cf. ch. 20. 8.
[l] ctr. ch. 6. 1.
[m] cf. Lk. 8. 51–55. cf. Rom. 11. 15.
[n] cf. ch. 10. 6, 28.

own story to tell, different, yet connected. And here one thing is plain: Æneas presents to us the healing of a sinner; Dorcas, on the other hand, the resurrection of a saint. If both of these speak of Israel, it must be in these contrasted ways: and in both ways it is clear that Israel may be spoken of, or her history would be a very different one from what we know it to be. Israel as astray from God is how the centuries long have known her, the enemy of Christ and of His cause, and for many this has almost blotted out the remembrance of the long debt we owe her, and of the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles that have sprung from her. But God does not forget: "I remember thee," He says, "the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, when thou wentest after Me in the wilderness, in a land not sown. Israel was holiness unto the Lord, and the firstfruits of His increase: all that devour him shall offend; evil shall come upon them, saith the Lord" (Jer. ii. 2, 3). And for us, how is it possible to forget that from Israel we have obtained, through the mercy of God, almost the whole of the precious volume of inspiration, out of which we have, so to speak, been fed and clothed, not for centuries merely, but for the life that is to come? Here as a picture of Israel, this woman full of good works and almsdeeds is surely no unfitting one. The more we consider, the more we shall realize its perfect appropriateness.

It is in Joppa, anciently Japho, that we find her.—a name which means, as I take it, "fair to Him." (See notes on Josh. xix. 46.) This agrees entirely with that view of Israel which is presented to us here. Tabitha's name is given us in two languages, as if there were importance in it, and means "beauty," in Daniel (chap. xi. 16, 41), twice applied to the land of Israel, "the glorious land." Its secondary meaning, in which we are to take it here, is "gazelle," so named from its beauty, one of the clean animals of Scripture, both chewing the cud and dividing the hoof (Lev. xi. see the notes). If we realize the typical meaning of these, we shall understand its application to one who "ruminates" upon the Word, the walk corresponding to this. Israel as represented by the psalmists, and especially the writer of the 119th psalm, answers fully to the name; and in this character they were suited to be vessels of inspiration, as in fact they were. The double name gets in this way its significance; for these two languages, Hebrew and Greek, were those of the Old and New Testaments, for both of which we are indebted to the Jew.

Tabitha is dead, and there is no human hope of recovery for her. We may weep and lament, but she is gone from us; yet those possessed with the spirit

SUBDIVISION 5. (Chap. x., xi.)
The Gentile brought to God.

l (x.-xi. 18): Jew and Gentile at one.
l (x. 1-20): God Himself the Mover.

1. [l] NOW [there was] a certain man in Cæsarea, Cornelius by name, a [o] centurion of the band called the Italian band, a devout man, and one that [p] feared God with all his house, who gave much alms to the people, and prayed to God continually. He saw in a [q] vision, openly, as it were about the ninth hour of the day, an angel of God coming in unto him, and saying unto him, Cornelius. And he, fastening his eyes upon him, and being afraid, said, What is it, Lord? And he said unto him, Thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a [r] memorial before God. And now [s] send men to Joppa, and fetch one Simon, who is surnamed Peter; he lodgeth with one Simon, a tanner, whose house is by the

o cf. Lk. 7. 2-10.
p ver. 35. cf. ch. 16. 14.
q cf. ch. 9. 10. cf. vers. 10-17.
r cf. Matt. 26. 13. cf. Heb. 6. 9, 10.
s ch. 11. 13, 14.

of Peter may still pray, not without hope, for Israel's resurrection. It will surely come, as it did in the case before us here, and Israel live in far more than all the glory of her past. The effect too, as in the healing of Æneas, will be the bringing many more to faith. Joppa or Japho will again fulfill its name, and "the Lord of hosts shall be for a crown of glory and for a diadem of beauty unto the residue of His people" (Isa. xxviii. 5).

How fitting and comforting an assurance with which to turn to see the incoming of the Gentile, as we find it now in the pouring out of the Spirit on Cornelius and his company at Cæsarea!

SUBD. 5.

The quiet and gradual way in which preparation has been made for the disappearance of the barrier between Jew and Gentile must be apparent to all. Israel has had full and patient trial, all possible proof given her of its being God who was appealing to her, God whom she was resisting, fully displayed in goodness ready to forget all past offences,—the very death of His Son, if only now at last, they would turn to Him. When it is manifest that they will not, then the door is opened to Samaria, a circumcised people, not without Jewish admixture, partially obedient to the law, and who are compelled to own Jerusalem in the reception of the distinct characteristic of the new faith that has gladdened them. Then God Himself leads on in a special way to the reception of the eunuch, with whom the grace of Christ goes out to lands afar off. After this it is that the apostle of the Gentiles is raised up, although only very slowly does his mission become known; he himself only slowly awaking to it; himself a "Hebrew of the Hebrews," yearning over his kinsmen after the flesh, and but now a rigid Pharisee. But even so, he is not to lead in the admission of the Gentiles; but an unexceptionable instrument is provided for this,—no less than the foremost of the apostles of the circumcision, Peter himself.

In this also now God manifests His will with unmistakable plainness in the double vision, at Joppa and Cæsarea; then by the outpouring of the Spirit in view of all who came with Peter: those who are ready to oppose at Jerusalem have to own that God has granted to the Gentiles repentance unto life.

After this the way is opened by which certain disciples without any prominence of gift or position can speak at Antioch to the Gentiles, and gather an assembly there; and this becomes a new point of departure from which the first direct mission to the Gentiles is sent out; but this by a special revelation of the Spirit, which sets apart Barnabas and Saul for the new work.

1. The first section here manifestly takes in the work at Cæsarea, by which the principles are established which henceforth govern the Assembly. It is in effect constituted by them as now outside the Jewish fold. The exodus is really sea.* And when the angel who was speaking to him was departed, he called two of his household servants, and a devout soldier, of those who waited upon him continually, and having related all things unto them, he sent them to Joppa.

And on the morrow, as 'these were journeying, and drawing near to the city, Peter went up upon the housetop to pray, about the sixth hour. And he became hungry, and desired to eat. But while they

t cf. ch. 8.26–39.

* The words following in the common version are wanting in all the best MSS.

complete, though there may be an effort afterwards really to undo this, and bring all the disciples under the law of Moses. This is resisted, however, on the very ground of what has been established here.

[1] All through this fresh movement, as already said, God is Himself the Mover. He begins, with the care which we see manifested all through, with an unexceptionably good example of the Gentile, a man "borne witness to by the whole nation of the Jews," and therefore, not perplexing the matter by any extraneous question. He is moreover a devout man, a worshiper of the true God, and one that truly fears Him, all his house participating with him also in this. Although not outwardly united in any way to Israel, yet his heart necessarily united him to the people of Him he worshiped, and he manifested this by his almsgiving. He was a man of prayer; praying to God continually. But all this, true as it was, and the fruit of faith, (without which it would not have been true, nor could God, as He presently does, have owned it,) had not sufficed to set him where grace sets the believer now, in conscious salvation. God was now "preaching peace by Jesus Christ"; and to those far off, and to those that were nigh, He had to preach it (Eph. ii. 17).

At the ninth hour of the day, the Jewish third hour of prayer, God owns and answers the man that seeks Him, and an angel of God visits him. The fear that falls on men so naturally in the presence of the supernatural, falls upon him, but the message is one of grace alone, and he is assured that his prayers and alms have come up for a memorial before God. He is directed therefore to send for Peter from Joppa, who shall tell him words (it is added in the account afterwards given at Jerusalem), whereby he and all his house shall be saved.

In such a declaration, if we are to understand it aright, we must remember that we are here in the overlapping of two dispensations. It is as evident, on the one hand, that Cornelius was already a believer, as that, on the other, he had not yet the faith of Christ. In the midst of Christendom to-day, such a condition would be perfectly anomalous and unintelligible; and so for most it would be to talk of a soul having life and being still unsaved. Cornelius undoubtedly had life; he was one of those sheep not of the Jewish fold, of which the Lord had spoken, whom He would bring and unite with those of Israel, and there should be one flock, one Shepherd (Jno. x. 16). He was in fact now causing these to hear His voice, and this accounts for what is strange apparently in the Gentile here, but which is at once intelligible when we consider his position between the dispensations. And though Cornelius was a believer of that which was passing away, yet for final salvation he needed to receive the Christ who had come, and would do so if the Shepherd's voice fairly reached him: for His sheep hear His voice. If it be final salvation that is spoken of here, all difficulty disappears as to the words used. Of a present salvation Judaism, as a legal system, could know nothing; much less, if possible, a Jewish proselyte, or one like the Roman centurion, converted to God, and yet outside the law. Into the precious assurance of this nothing but Christianity could bring him.

Let us notice, before we pass on, the blessed announcement, "who shall tell thee words whereby thou and all thy house shall be saved." They are in fact the made ready, an ecstasy came upon him; and he beheld [u] heaven opened, and a certain vessel descending, as it were a great sheet, [tied]* at the four corners, [and]* let down to the earth; in which were [v] all the fourfooted beasts and creeping things of the earth, and birds of the heaven. And there came a voice unto him, Rise, Peter; kill and eat. But Peter said, Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten anything [w] common or unclean. And the u cf. Eph. 3. 5, 6. cf. ch. 7. 56.

v cf. Rom. 3. 9–18.
w cf. Lev. 11. 1, etc. cf. Ezek. 4. 14. cf. Is. 66. 17.

*Omitted in some MSS.

paschal announcement of Christianity. Of the Jewish feasts, as we have them given in the twenty-third chapter of Leviticus, only those of the seventh month, in their typical significance, belong to Israel nationally,—the number seven being, as we know, the sign of completion—the complete time reached. Passover, the Sheaf of Firstfruits, Pentecost, were all offered to Israel, but rejected by them, and are become the peculiar Christian feasts, a silent gap of time intervening between these and the national seasons—the Blowing of Trumpets, Day of Atonement, Tabernacles—of the seventh month.

Passover is not national, in the sense in which the offerings of the Day of Atonement covered all Israel. It was kept by families, and might be held a second time by those who were hindered by defilement or a journey at the first celebration: just as now it is not nations that are contemplated, but believers from among the nations; however freely the gospel is addressed to all. Yet here nevertheless God would assure us of a grace that would not forget the links of relationship by which He has bound us together. "Thou and thy house" reminds us still of the family ordinance, though unbelief, in a dispensation whose principle is, "Thou standest by faith," may make all this void. For there is, of course, no possible reason for so wild an imagination as that the comforting promise to Cornelius' house, or any other, is "irrespective of faith." Rather, if faith be in any sense the gift of God, are we assured by this, and the general thread of such intimations woven into Scripture, that He is ready to bless the households of His people still, wherever the Abrahamic faith shall be accompanied with that Abrahamic diligence of heart which seeks God's blessing in His appointed ways. However much the gospel might be preached to Cornelius' household, such an assurance would mean very much for him. We all have the comfort of knowing that it is the same gracious God with whom we have to do to-day, who has given us too, as some of us have the consolation of believing, in other ways, an assurance akin to that here vouchsafed the centurion; but which only faith can have and plead with Him aright. Here is not the place further to enlarge upon it.*

The angel does not preach the gospel to Cornelius, but sends Peter to him for this; so thoroughly does the Lord cleave to His own methods and appointments. Peter moreover, as we have seen, is specially needed here; and that need is seen the more in the means taken to prepare the apostle for what is before him. The Lord goes in advance of the messengers from Cæsarea to the house of Simon the tanner † by the seaside; and that house is the lowly birthplace of a wide and far-reaching movement in His ways with men.

*The name Cornelius is no doubt significant as all is here, though we may not see its significance. It was the name of a prominent Roman family—the Cornelian—and this, with his being the centurion of the Italian band, seems to emphasize the fact of his being absolutely a Gentile. The word Cornelius means, "pertaining to a horn." S. R.

†The occupation of tanner was considered unclean by the Jews. A large part of the tanning was the preparation of skins for water bottles. May there not be a suggestion here of the passing of that ceremonial uncleanness which is brought out in the history of Cornelius? Peter was already lodging at the house of this Simon, a preparer of unclean things to be vessels for holding pure water. That his house was by the seaside seems also to suggest the sea of the Gentiles,—a familiar thought in Scripture—upon whose border Peter indeed was. S. R.

voice [came] again to him the second time,* What God hath [x]cleansed, make not thou common. And this took place thrice, and the vessel was immediately [y]taken up into heaven.

Now as Peter doubted in himself what the vision he had seen might be, behold, the men that were sent by Cornelius, having made inquiry for Simon's house, [z]stood at the gate, and called, and asked whether Simon who was surnamed Peter, was lodging there.

x cf. 1 Cor. 6. 9–11. cf. Eph. 2. 11, etc.

y cf. Eph. 5. 25–27. cf. 1 Thess. 4. 17.

z cf. ver. 9.

* Plural.

The vision sent to Peter is founded on that distinction of clean and unclean meats which operated so largely in keeping the Jew apart from the Gentile. The Gentile was himself in fact the unclean liver with whom the one who sought conformity to the mind of God could not indeed go far without danger of pollution. The law, entirely apart from the typical significance in which so much of the interest attaching to it is found by us to-day, served as a useful barrier to unlimited intercourse with the idolatrous world around, which in these very things had upon it, as we know, the stamp of its idolatry. The question of meats offered to idols could in this way become a serious one for Christians themselves, though now for the uninstructed only (1 Cor. viii). But Judaism as a rule for a people in the flesh, externally rather than spiritually set apart to God, was of necessity negative and prohibitory in its requirements,—a fold shutting in, rather than a principle of liberty: for liberty would be in their case concession, instead of victory over opposing forces. Christianity with its spiritual power alone could permit liberty. It was a sign of weakness for Judaism that it had no missions, preached no evangel: how could the word, "No man can see My Face and live," be this? So the Jew went beyond the law in his restrictions, built the fence higher and higher, but found none sufficient.

With Christianity a new power had come; Godward and manward there was a significant change. The Jew himself was gone morally: what use of a fence to keep from contamination the crucifiers of the Son of God? It was not merely that the mind of the flesh was not subject to the law of God; it was enmity to God Himself. And what the end of this long experiment proved as to the Jew, it proved really as to man at large; there was nowhere any betterness. Jew and Gentile had been united at the Cross; they had no need to separate after this: for the believer in Christ, the world was crucified by it, and he crucified to the world.

From that side the fence had gone; but from God's side it was gone also. For those who had crucified Christ, it must be now either judgment wholly, or else pure grace. But Christ need not have died to ensure man's condemnation; nor would He have died to increase man's doom. Thus, if there is to be any fruit of His death whatever, it must be grace. If God then means by it to show His grace, how great will that grace be!

In fact man by the murder of the Son of God has consummated his sin, and demonstrated his condition; but on the other hand Christ gave Himself for our sins, and grace reigns through righteousness unto eternal life. Thus the fence is down from God's side; the veil that hid His blessed face is rent from top to bottom, and to all men, guilty alike, and with no pretension to title, Jew or Gentile, God has come out, and whosoever will is welcome in.

In such light as this, then, the contention of Jew with Gentile is at an end; to maintain it is mere self-righteousness. The vessel that Peter sees comes down from heaven; and as seen thus the distinctions made by Judaism are ended and over. "He that believeth on the Son hath eternal life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life." "He" too "that believeth that Jesus is the

And while Peter pondered over the vision, the Spirit said unto him, Behold, three men seek thee; but arise, and go down, and go with them, nothing [a]doubting; for I have sent them.

2 (21-43): The testimony received.

[2] And Peter went down, and said unto the men, Behold, I am he whom ye seek; [b]what is the cause for which ye are come? And they said, [c]Cornelius the centurion, a just man, and one fearing God, and borne witness to by the whole nation of the Jews, was divinely instructed by a holy angel to send for thee to his house, and to hear words from thee. So he called them in, and lodged them. And on the morrow he arose and went forth with them, and certain of the [d]brethren from Joppa went with him. And on the morrow he entered into Cæsarea. And Cornelius was [e]waiting for them, having called together his kinsmen and his near friends. And when Peter was now coming in, Cornelius met him, and [f]fell at his feet, and worshiped him. But Peter raised him, saying, Stand up; I myself also am a man. And talking with him, he went in, and found many come together: and he said to them, Ye [g]know how it is unlawful for a Jew to keep company or come unto one of a strange race; and to me hath God [h]shown that I must call no one common or unclean; wherefore also, when I was sent for, I came without gainsaying. I ask therefore, with [i]what intent ye sent for me. And Cornelius said, [j]Four days ago, I had been fasting* unto this hour; and* the ninth [hour] I was praying in my house; and behold, a man stood before me in bright clothing, and said, Cornelius, thy prayer is heard, and thine alms are remembered before God. Send therefore to Joppa, and fetch Simon, who

a cf. ch. 16. 9, 10.

b ver. 29. cf. Lk. 18. 41.

c vers. 1-6.

d ver. 45. ch. 11. 12. cf. 2 Cor. 13. 1.

e cf. Lk. 8. 40. cf. Mk. 5. 19. cf. Jno. 4. 29.

f cf. ch. 16. 29. cf. Rev. 19. 10. cf. Rev. 22. 8, 9. cf. ch. 14. 11-18.

g ver. 14. ch. 11. 3. ctr. Gal. 2. 12, 13.

h ver. 15. cf. ch. 11. 15-18.

i ver. 21.

j vers. 1-8.

*Some of the oldest MSS. leave out "fasting," "and," but they are well supported, and seem necessary.

Son of God overcometh the world;" there is a new power, and with it a new liberty: the true Shepherd is calling His sheep out of the sheep-fold, and with Him, His hand over them, His voice in their ears, liberty is safe.*

The vessel comes down from heaven and returns again there: it is the Church, heavenly in origin, and heavenly in destination; and those within it are alike those whom God has cleansed, and who must not be called common.

But Peter still doubts the meaning of the vision, until the three men sent by Cornelius are at the door, inquiring after him, and the Spirit bids him rise and go with them, for He has sent them.

[2] Upon all this history the inspired writer dwells, not heeding repetition, for the heart of God is pouring itself out in this getting back to it now of those so long self-banished. The Gentile is truly the prodigal here restored; and we as Gentiles may well be touched at the interest displayed in those for whom the ring and robe are waiting. Things are told out at length, and we realize

*The unclean beasts and creeping things contained in the net were forbidden in Leviticus (chap. xi). The food of a clean people must be clean. But as man is assimilated to that upon which he feeds, we see here the character of all men—no doubt Jew as well as Gentile, though prominently the latter. The heavenly vessel is seen to be full of that which is represented by these unclean beasts and creeping things, the foul, vile, violent sinners—cleansed by grace and made meet for heaven. "And such were some of you." S. R.

is surnamed Peter; he lodgeth in the house of Simon, a tanner, by the sea; who, when he is come, shall speak to thee.* Immediately therefore I sent unto thee; and thou hast done well, that thou art come. Now therefore we are all here [k]present before God, to hear all things that have been commanded thee of the Lord.

And Peter opened his mouth, and said, Of a truth I perceive that God is [l]no respecter of persons: but in [m]every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is acceptable to him. The word† which he sent unto the sons of Israel, preaching [n]peace by Jesus Christ (he is Lord of all) ye know;—the word‡ which came throughout all Judea, beginning from Galilee, [o]after the baptism that John preached: [even] Jesus who was of Nazareth, how God [p]anointed him with the Holy Spirit and with power; who went about [q]doing

* A few of the oldest MSS. omit this clause.
† λογος ‡ ῥῆμα.

k cf. Lk. 8. 18. cf. Gal. 4. 14. cf. 1 Thess. 2. 13.
l cf. Rom. 2. 11. cf. Deut. 10. 17. cf. Rom. 3. 29, 30. cf. Rom. 10. 12, 13.
m cf. ch. 15. 7–11. cf. Rom. 2. 27–29. cf. Ps. 15. 1, 2. n cf. Eph. 2. 17. cf. Lk. 2. 14. cf. Col. 1. 20.
o ch. 1. 22. cf. Matt. 4. 12–17.
p cf. Ps. 2. 2. cf. Matt. 3. 16, 17. cf. Ps. 45. 7.
q cf. Matt. 11. 2–6.

the response upon the other side, as we learn of the company which without prompting, save of a heart opening to the grace that greets him, Cornelius gathers to hear what, if he know not yet, he knows, so heralded, is good news from God. Upon all these, gathered up in the stretched out Arms, the Father's kiss is pressed in the Spirit presently outpoured,—the Spirit of adoption! What a scene to melt the last bit of legal ice out of the soul of Peter, as he realizes how impossible it is for him to withstand God! Truly it is impossible! the flood-gates are giving way, and all the fulness of divine love, long kept back by the requirements of divine righteousness, is hastening to manifest itself. The ages to come are to bear witness of the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness towards us in Christ Jesus. Nothing can keep back now what all the sin of man in its worst display has only shown in its supreme and glorious power.

Arrived at Cæsarea, Peter rebukes his would-be successors of to-day by raising up him who had fallen at his feet as the messenger of God; and having explained how God had delivered him from his Jewish prejudices, preaches Jesus as Christ and Lord to those assembled. He now fully realizes that in every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is acceptable to Him. How could He indeed ignore what is but the fruit of His own work in the soul, wherever found?

They were not unaware of the word which He had sent to Israel, preaching peace by Jesus Christ. As a word to Israel they had only as yet known of it; but He is Lord of all; and as that they were also now to have to say to Him. Of His mighty works they could not indeed be ignorant, who through all Judea and Galilee went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil. How plain was it that in all this God was with Him! Yet what they had done to Him was as well known also; they had slain and hung Him on a tree! There for the nation He had disappeared: they indeed had seen Him no more; but God had raised Him up the third day, and manifested Him to chosen witnesses, who (as the one who stood before them now) had eaten and drunk with Him after He was risen from among the dead. From Him had these commission to proclaim Him to the people, and that as One divinely appointed to be Judge of the living and the dead.

There was a breach, then, as to the nation; Israel had rejected the Lord: God had answered it by setting Him high above all, and putting judgment into His hands; yet the testimony of it was already an intimation of grace. How far, and in what manner would that grace be shown? Here Peter brings in the wit-good, and [r]healing all that were oppressed* of the devil; for [s]God was with him. And we are [t]witnesses of all things that he did, both in the country of the Jews and in Jerusalem; whom also they [u]slew, hanging him on a tree. Him God [v]raised up the third day, and gave him to be manifested, not to all the people, but to [w]witnesses chosen before of God,—to us who [x]ate and drank with him after he was risen from among the dead. And he [y]charged us to preach unto the people, and to testify that it is he who is appointed of God the [z]judge of the living and the dead. To him do all the [a]prophets witness, that through his Name every one who believeth on him shall receive [b]remission of sins.

3 (44-48): The Spirit poured out.

[3] While Peter yet spake these things, the Holy Spirit [c]fell upon all who heard the word. And they of the circumcision who believed were [d]astonished, as many as came with Peter, because that upon the nations also the gift of the Holy Spirit was poured out. For they heard them [e]speak with tongues, and magnify God.

r cf. Lk. 8. 27, etc. cf. Lk. 13. 16. cf. 1 Jno. 3. 8.
s cf. Jno. 3. 2. cf. Jno. 8. 29. ctr. Matt. 27. 46.
t ch. 1. 22. ver. 41.
u ch. 2. 23. ch. 13. 27, 28.
v ch. 2. 24.
w ch. 13. 30, 31. cf. ch. 1. 22. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 5-8.
x cf. Lk. 24. 30, 41-43. cf. Jno. 21. 9-13. cf. 1 Jno. 1. 1.
y cf. ch. 1. 2-8. cf. Jno. 20. 21.
z cf. Jno. 5. 21-29. cf. ch. 17. 31. cf. 2 Tim. 4. 1.
a cf. ch. 26. 22, 23; cf. Rom. 3. 21; cf. Lk. 24. 25-27.
b ch. 5. 31; cf. ch. 13. 38, 39.
c cf. ch. 2. 2; ctr. ch. 8. 15-17.
d cf. ch. 11. 18; cf. ch. 15. 12.
e cf. Mk. 16. 17; cf. ch. 19. 6.

* Literally, "Held under the power."

ness of the prophets, by whom from the beginning God had been speaking to men. It could not be, in fact, that such things should take place without having been anticipated and announced in the ages of which they were the consummation. That which affected the whole world could not be isolated from all its previous history. Central in their relation to all human things, the Cross and the Resurrection are in reality their explanation. With the testimony of the ages the glory of the miracle was only in harmonious correspondence. Its exceptionality was its fitness for the place it occupied.

They knew (the men whom the apostle was addressing) the testimony of the prophets, which, just as being Gentiles, would have for them an attraction of a special kind. Did it not speak of nations upon whom the Lord's name would be called? (Amos ix. 11, 12.) And in Abraham's Seed were not all the families of the earth to be blessed? But Peter more definitely interprets and applies the gospel of their predictions, that through the name of Jesus whosoever believed on Him would receive remission of sins. According to such a principle, the Gentile who believed had equal assurance of this with the Jew. If even to the Jew acceptance were by faith alone, then for the Gentile who had faith there was acceptance also.

[3] Thus far had the apostle reached,—and he tells us himself, that it was but the beginning of what he intended to say (chap. xi. 15)—when he was arrested by a sign of precious significance: without the administration of baptism, as with the pentecostal audience,—without the imposition of apostles' hands, as at Samaria,—the Holy Spirit fell on all who heard the word! God again was the Mover; and in anticipation of every question that might be raised, setting aside all thought of human succession, or of sacramental endowment,—"by the hearing of faith" alone (Gal. iii. 2), the Gentiles received the Spirit, and were thus gathered into the assembly. The barrier between Jew and Gentile had been removed by the hand of God Himself, and the Church had assumed the character it was hereafter to retain. In Christ there was to be now neither Jew nor Gentile. The bond was not to be that of nationality nor of legal observance, but of the One Spirit uniting into one body. Not that the body of Christ was yet known doctrinally; nor even of the House of God have we yet heard, though the indwelling of the Spirit would give rise to a growing consciousness

Then answered Peter, Can any one forbid water, that these should not be [f]baptized, who have received the Holy Spirit as well as we? And he commanded them to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ.* Then prayed they him to [g]tarry certain days.

[f] *cf.*ch.2.38. ctr. ch. 19. 5, 6. cf. Eph. 1. 13.

[g] cf. ch. 11. 23. *cf.*ch.18.27, 28.

4 (xi. 1-18): The place of the Gentile conceded.

[4] And the apostles and the brethren who were throughout Judea heard that the nations also had received the word of God. And when Peter went up to Jerusalem, they of the [h]circumcision contended with him, saying, Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and didst eat with them. But Peter began, and set it forth in order unto them, saying, [i]I was in the city of Joppa, praying; and in an ecstasy I saw a vision, a certain vessel descending like a great sheet, let down by four corners out of heaven; and it came even unto me: upon which when I had fixed mine eyes, I considered, and saw the fourfooted beasts of the earth, and [j]wild beasts, and creeping things, and birds of the heavens. And I heard also a voice saying unto me, Rise, Peter; kill and eat. But I said, Not so, Lord; for nothing common or unclean hath ever entered into my mouth. But the voice answered the second time out of heaven, What God hath cleansed make thou not common. And this took place thrice, and all were drawn again into heaven. And behold, immediately three men stood before the house in which we were, having been sent from Cæsarea unto me. And the Spirit [k]bade me go with them, [h] *cf.*vers.29, 30. *cf.*ch. 15. 1, etc.

[i] ch.10.9-22.

[j] *cf.*Tit. 3. 3. *cf.*Is. 65.25.

[k] *cf.*ch.15.7-10.

*Some substitute, and a few add, "the Lord."

of this which would soon find support in the Lord's words to Peter, with the name given to him. In his first epistle we have the development of this, to which Paul, however, gives completeness. The fact anticipated the doctrine; and that which hindered the development of this had now given way (Eph. ii. 14, 15).

Baptism takes here, therefore, another place from that which it had before this. It follows, instead of preceding, the reception of the Spirit. Peter makes this a manifest reason why baptism cannot be denied them: "Can any one forbid water," he asks, "that these should not be baptized, who have received the Holy Spirit as well as we?" It was not necessarily the place which this was to take henceforth; for after this we find the Jewish disciples of the Baptist (chap. xix. 5, 6), having not only to be baptized, but to have the imposition of hands, in order that they may receive the Spirit. The Gentiles, on the other hand, having had no legal status hitherto, are dealt with in pure grace alone; the ground upon which they are met is manifestly this, and this only: hence God can give way to His love with more simplicity; and He does so, to the astonishment of "those of the circumcision," who find all their own scruples and hesitation set aside with a decisive authority, against which they have no power to protect. To do aught but accept it would be plainly to "withstand God," as Peter himself says. He commands, therefore, that they should be baptized in the Name of Jesus Christ, and, accepting frankly all the consequences of this, stays with them at their desire for some days.

[4] The history is pursued further, and with the same carefulness of detail, to the recognition of this place given to the Gentiles at Jerusalem itself, notwithstanding the objections on the part of the disciples there. In fact, the eating with men uncircumcised seems to have been heard of, before the way of the grace of God. Peter gives an account of all, therefore, from the beginning;

nothing doubting. And these six [l]brethren also accompanied me; and we entered into the man's house, and he [m]told us how he had seen the angel in his house, standing and saying, Send to Joppa, and fetch Simon, who is surnamed Peter, who shall speak unto thee [n]words, whereby thou shalt be saved, thou and all [o]thy house. And as I began to speak, the Holy Spirit [p]fell on them, even as on us at the beginning. And I [q]remembered the word of the Lord, how that he said, John indeed baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Spirit. If God then gave unto them the [r]like gift as also unto us, when we believed on the Lord Jesus Christ, [s]who was I, that I could withstand God? And when they heard these things, they held their peace, and [t]glorified God, saying, Then indeed hath God given to the nations also [u]repentance unto life.

2 (xi.19-30): A Gentile assembly.
1 (19-21): The free work of the Spirit, independent of the apostles.

2. [1] They then who were [v]scattered abroad upon the tribulation that arose about Stephen, travelled as far as Phenicia and Cyprus and Antioch, speaking the word to none save [w]only to the Jews. But there were some of them, men of Cyprus and Cyrene, who when they came to Antioch, spake [x]also to the Greeks,* preaching the glad tidings of the Lord Jesus. And the hand of the Lord was with them; and a great number [y]believed and turned to the Lord.

*The larger number of the MSS. have "Hellenists"; but this is quite against the context.

l ch. 10.23,45.
m ch. 10.30-32.
n cf. Jno. 6. 63. cf. Eph. 1. 13. cf. Rom. 10. 17.
o cf. ch. 16. 31.
p ch. 10. 44.
q ch. 1. 5. cf. Jno. 14. 26.
r cf. ch. 15. 9. cf. 1 Cor. 12. 13.
s cf. ch. 10. 47, cf. Rom. 9. 20.
t cf. ch. 21. 19, 20.
u Lk. 24. 47. cf. ch. 20. 21.
v ch. 8. 1-4.
w cf. ch. 10. 28.
x cf. Jno. 10. 16. cf. ch. 13. 46-48.
y cf. Rom. 10. 12, 13.

and all resistance is silenced by the simple narration. The question with which he ends it is quite unanswerable. They needs must glorify God that He has granted to the Gentiles repentance unto life. Not even a breath is heard about the need of circumcising them to keep the law of Moses; the act of God is too conspicuous; He is so completely in it from end to end. And thus the all-important transformation is effected without a dissenting voice.

2. [1] The principle being now established, the free action of the Spirit is seen in raising up at Antioch what becomes characteristically a Gentile assembly. For this there is not even the putting forth of a man like Philip. None are allowed to be conspicuous in this work, for the eye to fasten upon: God would make it manifestly His own. Scattered by the same persecution which had been already made to minister to the need of Samaria, Phenicia, Cyprus and Antioch are visited by those whose hearts, filled with the grace which they have themselves experienced, lead them out to minister to the need of others. But at first it is to Jews only that the good news is proclaimed; the effect also is not apparent,—certainly seems in marked contrast with the success among the Greeks, to whom at last they turn. The hand of the Lord is with them, and a great number of converts is the result of their evangelistic labor. It is remarkable how officialism is discredited in all this. We do not know the name of a single person used in the work. The great apostle of the Gentiles is yet in comparative obscurity in his native city; Barnabas is not yet upon the scene: God is acting in conspicuous sovereignty by what instruments He will; and this in the case of the first Gentile assembly is surely designed to attract our notice. Antioch is to "stand over against" Jerusalem, as even its name may imply, as identified with such freer action; and it is noticeable that the disciples are first called Christians here in Antioch. In Jerusalem they were but "the sect of the Nazarenes."

2 (22-26): Confirmation and building up.

2 And the [z]report concerning them came to the ears of the assembly that was in Jerusalem; and they [a]sent forth Barnabas, that he should travel as far as Antioch; who when he had arrived and seen the grace of God, was [b]glad, and exhorted them all, that with [c]purpose of heart they should cleave to the Lord; for he was a good man, and [d]full of the Holy Spirit, and of faith; and a great multitude was [e]added to the Lord. And he went forth to [f]Tarsus, to seek Saul; and when he had found him, he brought him to Antioch. And so it was that for a [g]whole year they were gathered together in the assembly, and taught a great multitude; and that the disciples were [h]called Christians first in Antioch.

z ver. 1.
a cf. ch. 15. 22.
b ver. 18. cfr. ch. 13. 45.
c cf. Phil. 3. 13, 14. cf. Ps. 86. 11. cf. Dan. 1. 8. cf. Eph. 4. 14, 15.
d ch. 6. 5. cf. ch. 4. 36, 37.
e cf. ch. 5. 14.
f ch. 9. 30.
g ch. 18. 11. ch. 19. 10. cf. ch. 17. 2. cfr. ch. 8. 39.
h ch. 26. 28. 1 Pet. 4. 16; cf. Jas. 2. 7.

[3] Still the new work is not to drift into independence of the old, but to be acknowledged and accepted at Jerusalem itself, as in the case of the reception of Cornelius and his company at Cæsarea. The report, therefore, reaching the Jewish capital, Barnabas is sent forth to go as far as Antioch,—a well-chosen representative. He does not go with authority, nor seek to exercise it; nor has he in hand, as the apostles in their visit to Samaria, to supply any deficiency in the condition of these Syrian brethren, who have evidently received the Spirit, as they did at Cæsarea, without need of apostles, or of imposition of hands. Barnabas sees the grace of God in them, and is glad, and simply exhorts them all, that with purpose of heart they should cleave to the Lord;—a word never uncalled for. It is his character that is dwelt upon in this connection, not his office: "he was a good man, full of the Holy Spirit, and of faith;" and this is seen in its effect, doubtless, in the progress of the work there: "a great multitude was added to the Lord."

It is Barnabas who is the means of introducing Saul into this field of labor. We may naturally suppose that he recognized in him a special fitness for the great work now beginning; but we see how simply his connection is brought about with the field to which from the commencement of his apostleship he is destined. God is not in haste, and His purposes are worked out often in what we may call the homeliest ways. The man who had introduced him to the apostles at Jerusalem, and who there had been witness to his energy and power, now seeks him out at Tarsus, no great distance off, and Saul returns with him to Antioch. There the work still progresses; and there the Christians get what is henceforth their distinctive name. We are not told whence it came; but the argument is just that Jews who refused Jesus as the Christ could not have given it to them; and that we only find it elsewhere, either in the mouth of those outside, as king Agrippa, or where the thought is of one suffering as such from the hands of unbelievers, as Peter uses it (1 Pet. iv. 16). It was therefore given by men outside, as one would infer, and in connection with the notable work accomplished at this time. The disciples were no more looked at as a mere Jewish sect. The weaning-time of Isaac was accomplished; and, while the children of the bondwoman "mocked" at the feebleness of the true heirs of grace, and cast them out, it was really they themselves who were being cast out. The Church's unity in Christ was being proclaimed, even by the lips of unbelievers; the One Name covering alike Jew and Gentile, while it separated them from all, whether Jew or Gentile, who did not confess Him.

[3] The Spirit of God gives a little glimpse, in closing this portion, of the recognition on the part of the assembly at Antioch of their relationship and obligation to those from whom they had received spiritual blessings so great. Indeed it is from a prophet from Jerusalem that they have warning of the approach of the famine which occasions this ministry, and which seems especially ii (27-30): The return ministry.

27 In these days prophets came down from Jerusalem to Antioch. And one of them, by name [i]Agabus, stood up, and signified by the Spirit that there would be a great famine over all the inhabited earth; which came to pass in the days of Claudius. And the disciples, every man [j]according to his ability, determined to send relief to the brethren dwelling in Judea: which also they did, [k]sending it to the elders by the hand of Barnabas and Saul.

i cf. ch. 21. 10

j cf. 2 Cor. 9. 6, 7. cf. ch. 4. 34, 35.

k ch. 12. 25. cf. Rom. 15. 26, 27.

to have affected the province of Judea. It is the first time that Christian prophets are mentioned in the New Testament; although they seem not to have been few in number, and are placed second only to the apostles themselves in the enumeration of gifts bestowed by Christ upon the Church. Prophecy also, as we shall find elsewhere, is in a special way characteristic of Christianity. Unsuccessional, springing out of close intercourse and communion with God, the disclosure of His mind so as to bring souls into His Presence,—it should be and is, in closest relation with the rent veil of the Sanctuary and the ability to draw near to God which mark the present period. Prediction was never more than a comparatively small and variable part of it; although this is what we find in the prophesying of Agabus upon the only two occasions in which he appears in the history. Indeed he is a prophet of sorrow at both times, although of that which God overrules for good; but then, of what sorrow may not this be said?

The disciples do not think little of this ministry of means, when they choose the two most prominent among them to administer it; and Barnabas and Saul, on the other hand, do not think it a matter that they should not be burdened with. Indeed, we know from the epistles of the latter what he thought upon the subject. In those fresh days, when it could be said that every one gave "according to his ability," how much love—divine love—was there not expressed in it! How different when it would have rather to be said, as in many of the sad days of decline since then, "every one a little of his superfluity, and the richest in proportion least of all!" Everything is degraded or spiritualized by the heart that is in it,—or is not in it.

We hear, too, for the first time, of "elders" in the Jewish assemblies, who, though doubtless an adoption from what was an immemorial custom in Israel (for we have no account of any distinct origin), yet seem from the epistle of Peter to be hardly officially appointed (1 Pet. v. 1), but rather the natural result of wisdom and experience attaching to age, which would make the "elder" the natural leader in the counsels of a people. In the Gentile assemblies we read of their appointment afterwards, where (and perhaps because) the patriarchal custom did not have the same recognition; and there with some restrictions which were only necessary to right "oversight," which (and not preaching) was that which was their work. The incidental notice here hardly requires the examination of the subject of eldership which it must receive when we come to the epistle to Timothy. It is well to note, however, that neither was it a gift, nor did it need one for qualification, which was almost wholly moral; while for preaching or teaching there needed no authorization from man, but the gift entailed the responsibility of using it, and manifested itself wherever there was an ear to hear. But all this must wait for its development elsewhere.

SUBD. 6.

1. While the Church is thus being enlarged, unhappy Israel becomes only more hostile to the followers of Him whom they have crucified, and a new king (Herod Agrippa I.) rises up to give their enmity effect. Though we may be little able to interpret the details, yet the circumstances undoubtedly suggest an anticipation of the last days, when the lawless king will exalt himself against

SUBDIVISION 6. (Chap. xii.)

Israel in full unbelief under their apostate king; but with God's hand over it.

1 (1-17): In God's hand, not the king's.

1. NOW about that time Herod the king put forth his hands to do [t]hurt to some of the assembly. And he slew [m]James the brother of John with the sword. And when he saw that it was pleasing to the Jews, he went on to take Peter also; (and they were the [n]days of unleavened bread;) whom having [o]seized he put in prison, delivering him to four quaternions of soldiers to guard him; intending after the passover to bring him out to the people. Peter therefore was kept in prison; but [p]prayer was made unceasingly* by the assembly to God for him. And when Herod was about to bring him forth, the same night Peter was sleeping [q]between two soldiers, bound with two chains, and guards before the door kept the prison. And lo, an [r]angel of [the] Lord stood by him, and a light shone in the prison; and he smote Peter on the side, and awoke him, saying, Rise up quickly. And his chains 'fell off' from his hands. And the angel said unto him, Gird thyself, and bind on thy sandals. And he did so. And he said unto him, Cast thy garment about thee, and follow me. And he went forth, and followed him; and knew not that it was true, which was done by the angel, but [t]thought he saw a vision. And when they were past the first and second guard, they came unto the iron gate that leadeth into the city; which [u]opened to them

t cf. ch. 8. 1. cf. Jno. 16. 2.
m cf. Matt. 20. 20-23.
n ch. 20. 6. cf. Ex. 12 34, 39 with 1 Pet. 1. 6, 7.
o ch. 4. 3. ch. 5. 18. 23. ch. 16. 23, 24.
p cf. 2 Cor. 1. 10, 11. cf. Phile. 1. 19. cf. Phil. 22.
q cf. ch. 21. 33.
r cf. ch. 5. 19. cf. Ps. 34. 7. ctr. Matt. 26. 53, 54.
s cf. ch. 16. 26. cf. Ps. 116. 16.
t cf. ch. 10. 17. cf. Ps. 126. 1. cf. 2 Cor. 12. 2, 3.
u ch. 5. 19. cf. Mk. 16. 3, 4.

* Literally, "intensely."

God, assuming for himself divine honors. We have here, also, in effect, the slain and the spared remnant represented in the opposite lot of James and Peter: the one given up, as it might seem, so strangely, his service but begun, to a violent death, while for the other an angel must be sent from heaven, to rescue him in a wonderful manner "from all the expectation of the people of the Jews," about to glut their evil desire with the death of another apostle of Jesus. Yet James was one of the three specially in the Lord's confidence, along with John and Peter. His life is to us a blank, and his day went down at noon! How little can we see of the divine ways! and, if we judge a course merely by its results, how surely shall we misjudge! In the events to which we seem to be looking forward here, those that are martyred under the beast have their part in the first resurrection (Rev. xx. 4-6); while the spared remnant has but its portion on earth: and thus will eternity reverse our present apprehension of how many things!

The story of Peter's deliverance is told vividly and in detail; but while it yields much food for meditation, it scarcely requires an interpreter. It may appear even too far out of the usual course of God's ways to find ready application to our common lives; yet it is the same God with whom we have to do; and, if we had but skill to trace His ways with us more, we might find more reason to wonder at the essential resemblances than to be perplexed at the apparent differences. The veil is over His governmental dealings, for it is a dispensation of faith and not of sight; but it is yet the part of faith to take away the veil, and through all disguises to recognize the well-known features of the Love that seeks to be apprehended by those who are the objects of it;

of its own accord; and they went out, and passed on through one street; and immediately the angel departed from him. And when Peter was come to himself, he said, Now I know of a truth, that the Lord hath sent forth his angel and [v]delivered me out of the hand of Herod, and from all the expectation of the people of the Jews. And when he had become conscious [of it], he came to the house of Mary the mother of John who was surnamed Mark, where many were [w]gathered together and praying. And when he knocked at the door of the gate, a maidservant came to listen, by name Rhoda. And when she knew Peter's voice, she opened not the gate for joy, but ran in, and told that Peter stood before the gate. And they said unto her, Thou art [x]mad. But she confidently affirmed that it was even so. And they said, It is his [y]angel. But Peter continued knocking, and when they had opened and saw him, they were amazed. But he, beckoning to them with the hand to hold their peace, related to them how the Lord had brought him out of prison. And he said, Tell these things to [z]James, and to the brethren. And he [a]departed, and went unto another place.

v cf. Dan. 3. 17, 28. cf. 2 Tim. 4. 17, 18.

w ver. 5. cf. Matt. 18. 19, 20.

x cf. Is. 65. 24. cf. ch. 2. 13.

y cf. Matt. 18. 10 with 2 Cor. 5. 8. ctr. Lk. 24. 36–43.

z ch. 15. 13. ch. 21. 18. cf. Gal. 1. 19. cf. Mk. 15. 40. cf. Jas. 1. 1. cf. Jude 1.

a cf. Jno. 8. 59. cf. Matt. 10. 23.

2 (18-23): The destruction of the adversary.

2. Now as soon as it was day, there was no small [b]stir among the soldiers what had become of Peter. And when Herod had sought for him and found him not, he examined the guards, and commanded that they should

b cf. ch. 5. 22, 23.

and that before the veil is drawn away, as soon it shall be, and we shall know, even as we are known.

The angels too are still "ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to those who shall inherit salvation;" and we easily remember how in Elisha's day the eyes that God opened could see the "chariots and horses of fire" round about the man who to common sight looked absolutely unprotected. Did we seek with more longing that intercourse with the unseen which surely we may attain, how would our spiritual vision gain in clearness, what recompense should we have from Him, who still as of old, "satisfieth the longing soul, and filleth the hungry soul with goodness"! There are other prison-doors, and better guarded than these that could not hold Peter, which may need to be loosed for us, that we may go forth into the great spiritual world around us! and the prison perhaps is one out of which, in reality, we have hardly been, or not been,—then most secure, of course, when we scarcely recognize that we are shut in at all, or, therefore, think of deliverance! Perhaps the gates would open to us of their own accord, if we on our part were not so well satisfied to have them shut.*

2. Israel, as we see, is going onward to doom; yet they have a king under whom now the whole land is once more united. They will in fact have a political revival at the end, when all will seem to be theirs except the life from God without which all is death still, and only worse corruption. The picture of the wilful king is, no doubt, here, as has already been remarked, though it may be slightly drawn. Solemn it is to see, that whether faintly or plainly to be seen, wherever Christ is rejected Antichrist appears. So it ever is: "I have

* For some reason, the Spirit gives the name of the damsel who announces Peter's deliverance. It is Rhoda—a rose.

Peter's angel is evidently to be understood as his spirit, without his body. They thought he had been put to death. S. R.

be [c]put to death. And he went down from Judea to Cæsarea, and tarried there. Now he was highly displeased with them of Tyre and Sidon; and they came to him with one accord, and having made Blastus the king's chamberlain their [d]friend, they asked for peace, because their country was [e]nourished by the king's. And upon a set day, Herod [f]arrayed himself in royal apparel, and seated himself upon the throne, and made an oration unto them. And the people shouted, saying, The voice of a [g]god, and not of a man! And immediately the angel of [the] Lord [h]smote him, because he gave not God the glory; and he was [i]eaten of worms, and expired.

[3] (24, 25): The return.

3. But the [j]word of God grew and multiplied. And Barnabas and Saul returned from Jerusalem, when they had [k]fulfilled their ministration, taking with them [l]John who was surnamed Mark.

c cf. ch. 18. 27. ctr. Matt. 28. 11-15.
d ctr. ch. 24. 26.
e cf. 1 Kl. 5. 11. cf. Ezek. 27. 17.
f cf. ch. 25. 23. ctr. Lk. 23. 11.
g cf. Dan. 4. 29-33. cf. 2 Thess. 2. 3-12. cf. Rev. 13. 11-18.
h cf. 2 Kl. 19. 35. cf. 2 Chro. 26. 16-21.
i cf. Is. 51. 7, 8. cf. Is. 14. 11. cf. 1 Tim. 5.

24. j ch. 6. 7; ch. 19. 20. k ch. 11. 29, 30; cf. ch. 14. 26; cf. Rom. 15. 28. l ver. 12; ch. 13. 5.

come in My Father's Name, and ye receive Me not; if another come in his own name, him ye will receive." In every individual case, such is the spiritual law: and there is nothing arbitrary or strange about it; in it men are but a law to themselves, in fact: there are but these two alternatives; not to choose the one is in itself to choose the other.

Of all this one can say little, however, as to its bearing upon what is before us in the Acts. It is easy to see that we have in this part the divergence of two roads that never can meet. Israel and the Church here part. Save for a moment to reaffirm the freedom of the Gentile from the legal yoke, the history returns no more to Jerusalem, until the last sad days of Paul's arrest and imprisonment from which he escapes only by the appeal to Cæsar, which carries him eventually to Rome itself. Jerusalem and Rome are alike the prisons of the gospel, however much it be true nevertheless, that "the word of God is not bound." But this lies yet a good way before us.

3. This portion does not close with the death of Herod, but with the increase and multiplication of the word of God; which in fact is now not merely to have large fruit among the Gentiles, but to expand into a glorious revelation of things hitherto kept secret—the manifold wisdom and the marvelous love of God, which is to make the Church for all eternity the temple of His praise.

It is Paul, as we know, who is to be in this respect the "completer" of the word of God (Col. i. 25); and it is Paul whose course we are now especially to follow, himself the most perfect display of grace towards the "chief of sinners," and now to proclaim that grace in an unequalled manner, the record of which we have in his fourteen epistles. The Acts does not give us indeed, in any sufficient manner, the doctrine of Paul. It presents us rather with the character of his work, as we shall see, together with the reception given it by the legalist and by the world,—a lesson for the days since then, by which we must seek to profit, as God may give.

From Jerusalem Barnabas and Saul now return. The ministers of Gentile love to their brethren of the circumcision, the opposition that we shall but too soon see springing up comes from no failure upon the part of him who once wished himself accursed from Christ for his kindred according to the flesh (Rom. ix. 3). That they would not receive his testimony he had been already warned (chap. xxii. 18); yet his heart could not be kept back in its overflowing affection for them. We are to see how it was repaid,—alas! and yet no wonder; was it not Christ, and Him crucified, whom Paul proclaimed? and to the people who had crucified Him? Such is man! and in the sovereign grace of the God of grace alone is there hope for any.

DIVISION 3. (Chaps. xiii.–xx.)
The Mysteries Opened.

SUBDIVISION 1. (Chaps. xiii., xiv.)
Foundation principles.

1 (xiii. 1-3): The divine call.

1. NOW there were in Antioch, in the [m]assembly that was there, [n]prophets and teachers: [o]Barnabas, and Symeon who was called Niger, and Lucius the Cyrenian, and Manaen, [p]foster-brother of Herod the tetrarch, and [q]Saul. And as they were [r]ministering to the Lord

[m] cf. 11. 19-24.
[n] cf. Eph. 4. 11; cf. 1 Cor. 12. 28, 29.
[o] ch. 4. 36, etc.
[p] cf. 1 Cor. 1. 26-29.
[q] ch. 8. 1, etc.
[r] cf. ch. 6. 4.

The mention of Mark as accompanying the return to Antioch has a moral with it, which develops later. He was sister's son to Barnabas (Col. iv. 10); and this touch of nature prevails in the end to separate the two zealous laborers with whom he is for the present united. And yet Mark—here the failing servant—is by and by the one who records the Lord's own unfailing service in the second Gospel; and of whom the untiring Paul will one day say, "He is profitable to me for the ministry" (2 Tim. iv. 11). How will grace triumph at the last over all our failures!

DIV. 3.

It has been already said that we must not expect to have any full opening of the mysteries here, as we have in the epistles. The New Testament is characterized by them: "Let a man so account of us," says the apostle, "as ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God" (1 Cor. iv. 1). There are "mysteries of the Kingdom" (Matt. xiii. 11), as the Church also is one. Even the "blindness in part" which "is happened unto Israel" is a mystery (Rom. xi. 25); and the partaking of the Gentile in the promise in Christ on equal terms with the Jew (Eph. iii. 6) is a mystery also. Thus we can speak of mysteries being opened here without implying that the truth of the Church is declared as Paul elsewhere declares it. The mystery is the one assembly of Jew and Gentile, and Christ's epistle in the world, with the ministration of righteousness and life, and of the Spirit, in contrast with the legal ministration of death and of condemnation. As this, we shall not wonder if the enemy would use the Jew in his unbelief against it, and the legal principle which God, having accomplished His end with it, has set aside. This will appear, in fact, as Satan's great endeavor from the beginning. We have even a typical presentation of this as an enforcement of warning, in Elymas. The attempt of the Pharisaic converts to put the yoke of the law upon the Gentiles is a more open endeavor, and from within. The "ministration of righteousness" we find at the Pisidian Antioch.

SUBD. 1.

The first subdivision here naturally comprises the account of the first mission from Antioch, constituted thus, instead of Jerusalem, the center of the new work. It gives us evidently the foundations laid by one who was a "wise master-builder," and with this the reception accorded to the grace proclaimed. This lies upon the surface; how much that must be underneath may the Spirit of God disclose to us as we take up what is here!

1. We have first the divine call, which must in some way be repeated, wherever profitable labor is to be done after this fashion. The Spirit of God is here pleased to make known to us that all the separation and guidance of the Lord's servants and messengers is from Himself. How strange and incongruous is the thought of "ordination" which so attaches to it in the minds of many! For, in the first place, both Barnabas and Saul are expressly named among the "prophets and teachers" ministering to the Lord in Antioch at this time. They were not, then, to be ordained to such an office, who had already been a good while in it; and surely not by men who could not be supposed to be any way and *fasting, the [t]Holy Spirit said, Separate to me now Barnabas and Saul for the work to which I have [u]called them. Then, having *fasted and prayed, and [w]laid hands upon them, they [y]let [them] go.

s cf. ch. 10. 30. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 7. t cf. ch. 8. 29. cf. ch. 16. 6, 7. u cf. 1 Cor. 12. 4-11. v cf. ver. 2. x ch. 14. 26.

cf. Phil. 3. 3. w cf. Gal. 2. 9; cf. ch. 15. 40; ctr. ch. 6. 6; ctr. 1 Tim. 4. 14. y ch. 14. 26.

superior, if equal, to themselves! One would surely say that the idea of equals lifting equals to a higher position than themselves, and which after all was only the position they had held before, would be too contradictory to be entertained by any serious mind. But if not, this was no ordination to an office at all.

Again, there was only one degree higher than those of these prophets and teachers, and that was the apostle's. Paul was an apostle, as all admit, in the fullest and most eminent way; but he distinctly declares himself (Gal. i. 1) "an apostle, not of men, nor through man;" men neither called him, nor ministered in this in any way. It was not then to this that he and Barnabas were called at Antioch.

We are told, moreover, to what it was they were called: for, at the end of the special work to which in fact they immediately set out, they return to Antioch, and there it is added, "whence they had been committed to the grace of God for the work which they fulfilled." It is as certain, therefore, as Scripture itself can make it, that the work in question was not an apostle's, prophet's, or teacher's office, but simply an evangelistic mission to the needy fields of Asia Minor.

Indeed, by this separation of Saul and Barnabas from their number at the Spirit's word, is only made more distinctly apparent that free and necessary work on His part which has been continually coming into more prominence in this book. He chooses, He sends; nothing is rightly done apart from this. Fit it was, the Spirit being come to take charge of all that should be done in the Name of Christ on earth, that this choice and will of the Spirit should now be emphasized in the strongest way. Judaism was a system of law, with a strong principle of succession in it; where in the most sacred things, as in the priesthood, son succeeded father; where the elders ruled as elders (though in this there was a right and necessary element, as has been said, and as we shall have more fully to see hereafter); the only exception to this (and it is a streak of blessed light through all the darkness of the history) is in the reservation of the prophet's office in the hand of God alone. Elsewhere, with the succession of kings, priests, elders, the flesh came in to defile and mar in every shameful and terrible way possible; while the prophets, with God's call and message, were the men of God in their several days. Each could say, after the pattern of Paul, "neither of men nor by man." Prophecy in this character of it, as has been already said, is of the very spirit of Christianity. It breathes of intercourse with God. And with God manifested in Christ, the sanctuary opened, who can wonder that the apostle should say, "I would that ye all spake with tongues, but rather that ye prophesied; for greater is he that prophesieth than he that speaketh with tongues;" "covet spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy;" for "ye may all prophesy" (1 Cor. xiv. 1, 5, 31).

In the shadow of Judaism, (as we see in the disastrous return to it, now for so many centuries,) succession—that is, dependence upon flesh and blood—comes in naturally everywhere. The simple rule of God—the conscience before Him alone—cannot be permitted. The prophet call, the prophet voice,—these have less room for them in such legal systems than in Judaism itself: naturally, again; for this is the veil reintroduced, and therefore darker than anything that God could ever have permitted. At the time to which we have come in the book before us, Christianity was coming into her proper freedom from the yoke of bondage, the last remains of the shadow passing from her spirit; and in the new freedom, that it might be freedom, the rule of God was to be recognized in its full and sweet reality. The Christian was "not in the flesh, but in the Spirit," which meant both of these two inseparable things. Thus, of necessity, in the highest department of Christian work, the rule of the Spirit must be above

2 (xiii.4-12): The conflict with the enemy in the Jew.

2. They, therefore, being [y]sent forth by the Holy Spirit, went down to Seleucia; and from thence they sailed to [z]Cyprus. And having arrived at Salamis, they announced the word of God in the [a]synagogues of the Jews; and they had also [b]John as [their] attendant. And when they had gone through all the isle as far as Paphos, they found a certain magian, a [c]false prophet, a Jew, whose name was Bar-jesus, who was with the [d]proconsul, Sergius Paulus, a man of understanding.

y ver. 2. cf. ch. 16. 6, 7.
z ch. 4. 36. cf. ch. 15. 39.
a ver. 14. ch. 14. 1. ch. 17. 1, 2. cf. Rom. 1. 16.
b ch. 12. 25.
c cf. ch. 8. 9-11. cf. ch. 19. 13-20.

cf. 2 Thess. 2. 9, 10; cf. Rev. 3. 9. d cf. ch. 28. 7; ctr. ch. 18. 12-17.

all emphasized. It was only the assertion of what was now to be the universal principle; but it is here expressed in a manner the most distinct; not by a Voice within the soul itself merely, but by one that demanded and obtained the obedience of the gathered company,—to which they openly set their seals; for the imposition of hands was the sign of identification and fellowship with those to whom the call was—with their obedience to it.

They were all in all seriousness of spirit waiting upon the Lord when the word came; and afterwards when they laid their hands upon them, prayer and fasting accompanied the action. But those who acted with this true and earnest interest assumed no authority in it: they "let them go,"—not "sent them away." The "sending forth," as now directly said, was of the Spirit.*

2. The journey through Cyprus has but one point in it upon which the historian dwells. Salamis is only mentioned to state that they announced the word of God there in the synagogues of the Jews. The rule, "to the Jew first," was observed in this case; nor have we any record of work among the Gentiles. Among the Jews also the fact of the preaching is not accompanied by any statement as to the effect; there may have been such; it would be natural, under such preachers, and on a mission directed by the Spirit of God, to reason that there must have been; but it is certain that it is only the fact that is given us here, and not its consequences. The Jew is still sought by divine grace, and sought in an especial manner also. The giving up of the nation as such does not mean any turning away of the offer of salvation from them. The first step upon the road here makes plain that the love that has been with them seeks them still. The breach is upon their side, not on His.

This seems to connect morally with the account which is now given of the Jew at Paphos; scarcely a Jew indeed, one would say, so perverted, heathenized, demonized, is he. All the more, however, is he the true picture of the Jew, or of Judaism, fallen by opposition to Christ into the power of the enemy, and then becoming the most virulent of foes. Such is this Bar-jesus, with his fair name and his practice of occult arts, false prophet through and through. He is the worst hindrance to the Gentile inquirer, stout refuser of salvation on his own account; and that, whether outside the professing church, or (as he will be by-and-by) within it. He is to be the great antagonist of Paul all through, bringing him at last into the Roman prison, in which for so many generations he was shut up; for without the Jew the Roman could have done little.

Plainly, it is not the opposition of the moment at which we are looking here, but something far deeper and more lasting;—lasting until the "mist and darkness," come upon the Jew for his opposition to the truth, shall pass away, in the dawn of a day beyond the present. Bar-jesus, living reality as he was, is

* While the names of the prophets and teachers are given, it is not to be inferred that the ministry and fasting were only by these, but rather that the whole assembly at Antioch was engaged. Some of the gifts are mentioned, and these were doubtless the channels of the Spirit's communication, but on their return we find Paul and Barnabas gathering the whole assembly to rehearse the accomplishment of the work to which they had been committed (chap. xiv. 26, 27). It would thus seem that all was done with the fellowship of the entire assembly; and this seems to agree with the teaching as to the local assembly being the habitation of the Spirit. S. R.

He called to him Barnabas and Saul, and desired to hear the word of God. But Elymas the magian (for so is his name interpreted) [e] withstood them, seeking to turn the proconsul from the faith. But Saul, who is also Paul, filled with the Holy Spirit, fastened his eyes upon him, and said, O full of all deceit and recklessness,* [f] son of the devil, enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease perverting the Lord's right ways? And now, behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thee, and thou shalt be [g] blind, not seeing the sun for a season. And immediately there fell upon him a mist and darkness; and he went about, seeking some to lead him by the hand. Then the proconsul, seeing what was done, [h] believed, being astonished at the doctrine of the Lord.

[e] cf. ver. 45. cf. 1 Thess. 2. 14-16.

[f] cf. Jno. 8. 38-44.

[g] cf. Gen. 19. 11. cf. John 9. 39 with Rom. 11. 7-10, 25.

[h] cf. Jno. 4. 53.

*Or, "subtlety."

nevertheless a type of something far more enduring than himself, and to us all more important. It will be good for us to stand still a little, and contemplate that to which our attention is here by the Spirit of God pointed,—the universal foe of the grace of the gospel.

"God gave man the law." This, which is almost the universal cry (hardly accurate as it is), is an argument which no one can contest, and which, it is thought, makes it really heresy to take seriously what Paul says about a Christian being "dead" to it. You may put in a word, and say, "dead to the (ceremonial) law." Then it will be all right to say so. But unfortunately the apostle, no matter what his apologists may invent for him, will not permit this. For the law of which he is speaking in the very place in which he says this (Rom. vii. 4–7), is at any rate that which said, "Thou shalt not covet," the last commandment graved upon those tables of stone shown, it is argued, by their very material to be absolutely permanent.

If this be true, then, as undoubtedly the Jew thought, he has certainly matter of contention with Paul about it. But the Jew went further than this, and upon the same warrant of "This do and thou shalt live," denied Paul's whole gospel of "righteousness without works" (Rom. iv. 6), spite of his testimonies from Abraham and David. We shall find all this carefully gone through in the epistles, and we have no intention of taking it up here; but here is the fundamental controversy through the Christian centuries, within, more than with those outside the profession. Ritualism, Romanism, (how much more than these!) are just Judaism come into Christianity; but yet not purely that,—not Judaism as God gave it,—but with an element introduced which is of the enemy. Judaism was not an enemy to the truth of God; the law was a handmaid—Hagar. It pointed to Christ its end and fulfilment, not only in its types, but also by its own manifest incompetence to bring to God. Its "ministration" was of death and condemnation, with the veil before the face of God! The word from His lips was "None can see Me and live." Thus the finger of hope could only point forward to the "new covenant," which in the mere announcement of it made the first old (Heb. viii. 13). But in the new ritualism of Rome and of her daughters, while the shadows of Judaism are darker than of old, no finger is found pointing beyond itself,—no glory of Christ illumines them. He is come and gone, and has left still a closed up sanctuary, and a gospel of doubt! The glory is still in the face of Moses; the veil is upon His own! But this is Judaism with its heart dead within it, and the light that plays over it weird, fantastic, demonic. Its mysteries are magic; the power it craves oppressive, not protective; its yoke is tyrannous, and its burden heavy. It is Elymas the sorcerer, courting the powers of the world, and opposing the gospel of grace in the apostle. It is Paul of all men whom this does oppose.

3 (xiii. 13-41): The proclamation.

3. Now [g]Paul and his company, having sailed from Paphos, came to Perga of Pamphylia; and John [h]departed from them and returned to Jerusalem. But they, passing through from Perga, came to Antioch of Pisidia; and they went into the [i]synagogue on the sabbath-day, and sat down. And after the [k]reading of the law and the prophets, the rulers of the synagogue sent unto them, saying, Brethren, if ye have any word of exhortation for the people, speak. And Paul stood up, and beckoning with the hand, said, Men of Israel, and ye that [m]fear God, hearken! The God of this people Israel [n]chose our fathers, and exalted the people when they sojourned in the land of Egypt, and [o]led them forth with a high arm out of it. And for about [p]forty years of time he nursed * them in the wilderness.

*The common text, with many MSS., reads "bore their manners."

g cf. ver. 9. cf. Phil.3.7. cf. 2 Cor.12. 11.
h cf. ch. 15. 37-39. cf. Col.4.10. cf. 2 Tim.4. 11.
i ver. 5.
k ch. 15. 21. cf. Lk.4.16-27.
m ver. 26. cf. ch. 10. 2.
n cf. Deut.7. 6-8. cf. Ps. 105. 6, 43.
o Ex. 13. 14, 16. cf. Ps. 105. 37.
p Ex. 16. 35. ch. 7. 36.

The conflict with the Jew manifests Saul as Paul, the name which he henceforth retains. The contrast between the two is such as could not escape notice. Saul, the man of Benjamin, necessarily brings up the figure of that other Saul, the king of men, such as the people "asked," head and shoulders above the common stature, in contrast with Paul, the "little," the man "less than the least of all saints," and only the chief of sinners. But this is he who can now be "strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus," "a good soldier of Jesus Christ." Paul is the fittest name possible for the man who is to be taken into the third heaven, and lead us into the open sanctuary, and present us "perfect in Christ Jesus."

It is not from the converted Sergius that Paul derives his name, the most unlikely thing possible for one so free from all human dependence. While, at the same time, it is quite in keeping with all else here that the man who escapes from the snare of the Jew should be also a Paul—a "little" one. "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the Kingdom of heaven." In Scripture, while the history is ever truth, the fullest reason of things is always the spiritual one; for He who is Infinite Wisdom governs all, and with an absolute control of all material, which if we accredited it, and realized the service of love in which it is made to work, we should see the glory of God indeed.

Upon the opposers of truth the mist and darkness of error must surely settle down. Woe to him who resists at any point the light of God! It is by the cover of darkness alone that he can do it; and he who shuts his eyes to any part of truth will find that he can make no terms with the error to which he surrenders. In the purport of his act he shuts out everything; and it is only the mercy of God which can put limit to the terms of an absolute surrender to the "authority of darkness."

3. The conflict at Paphos is thus but a typical introduction to what follows it; in which we are now to find what the reception of the gospel of Christ will be in a world so needy of it, so ignorant of its need. The conversion of the proconsul is all that we hear of in this way in Paphos; for we have not all that took place, but all that the Spirit of God saw fit to communicate. Cyprus is now left behind, and "Paul and his company" cross over to the mainland, to Perga in Pamphylia, on their onward way. There John their assistant leaves, when the work is just beginning, and returns to Jerusalem. With the general reticence of Scripture in such matters, we are told nothing of his motives. We may infer, as it is usual to do, and as the point at which he leaves and his return home naturally would indicate, that the difficulties of the way were making themselves felt with one whose strength was not sufficiently in God for

And when he had [q]destroyed seven nations in the land of Canaan, He gave them their land for an [r]inheritance; and after these things he gave them [s]judges [to the end of] about four hundred and fifty years,* till [t]Samuel the prophet. And then they [u]asked for a king; and God gave them [v]Saul, the son of Kish, a man of the tribe of Benjamin, for forty years. And when he had [w]removed him, he raised up [x]David for [their] king; to whom also he testified and said, I have [y]found David the son of Jesse, a man after my heart, who shall do all my will. Of this man's [z]seed hath God brought† unto Israel, according to promise, a Saviour, Jesus, when [a]John had proclaimed before his coming in person‡ a q ch. 7. 45. Josh. 12. 1, etc.

r Josh. 14. 1, etc. Ps. 78. 55.
s Ju. 2. 16. Ju. 3. 9, etc.
t ch. 3. 24. cf. 1 Sa. 7. 6, 17.
u 1 Sa. 8. 5, 19, 20.
v 1 Sa. 10. 1, 24.
w 1 Sa. 15. 23. cf. Hos. 13. 11.
x 1 Sa. 16. 1, 11-13.
y Ps. 89. 20. 1 Sa. 13. 14. z Matt. 1. 1. Rom. 1. 3.
a Mat. 3. 1-3.

*The time is in some of the earliest MSS. put in connection with "He gave them their land" etc.
†Or "raised up;" which has the consent of many MSS. and the Syriac versions.
‡Literally, "the presence of his entry,"—the presence which his coming made actual.

the demand. The path of faith will surely be too severe a test for all that is not faith; and all may not be faith that at first seems so. Faith is strengthened in the path, and does not fail because of difficulties which it supposes, and by which it is exercised: but the unreal is sifted out, and the true state of things is made apparent. Not that there was not reality in John, as we realize in his recovery afterwards. He needed, no doubt, the lesson, to learn which Paul's faithfulness also might be requisite, when again he offered himself for what he failed in now. How good when we truly learn by our failures the way not to fail! A different thing, indeed, from the constant failure to which so many seem only to become habituated, and easily plead their weakness, as if they found no more strength in God than in themselves.*

With the sorrow of this defection on them, the travelers pass on from Perga; and next we hear of them at Antioch in Pisidia, where we have the proclamation of Paul's gospel, in a way that "stands over against" the proclamation to the Jews by Peter at Jerusalem. Antioch of Pisidia ("the well-watered plains?") may give us a hint of this, as the other Antioch (of Syria—Aram, the "high" or "exalted") has been seen to "stand over against" Jerusalem in another respect. The address here is indeed to Israelites, and in the synagogue also, but taking in the proselytes in a distinct way, too,—"ye that fear God." The announcement, besides, of justification for every one who believeth in Jesus gathers in the Gentiles in numbers the next sabbath, inflaming, alas! the jealousy of the Jews. As a consequence of this, the turning to the Gentiles is definitely announced. Peter declares forgiveness of sins to those who repent and are baptized. Paul, justification in Christ for the believer. No apostle except Paul in terms declares this; although John here, as in other ways, comes nearest to him; indeed, the difference in this respect is scarcely more than verbal. The bold assurance as to the impotence of Moses' law, in the face of the synagogue, is characteristic of Paul.

The apostle begins by reminding them how God had brought Israel out of Egypt, and planted them in the land. After this, while through their sins the time was indeed disastrous, He had raised them up judges to the end of about 450 years, till Samuel—another memorable deliverance. There was more disaster, for the people would have a king; but here also, after forty years of trial, God overtopped their failure with the gift of one after His own heart; with him

*May there not be a suggestion too that Mark shrunk from the evident tendency to reach Gentiles? This is the theme of this part of the book, and the mention of his return to Jerusalem is significant. S. R.

baptism of repentance to all the people of Israel. And as John was fulfilling his course, he said, What suppose ye that I am? I am not he; but behold, there [b]cometh one after me, the shoes of whose feet I am not worthy to unloose. Brethren, children of the stock of Abraham, and those among you who fear God, to us* is the word of this [c]salvation sent. For they that dwell in Jerusalem, and their rulers, because they [d]knew him not, nor the voices of the [e]prophets which are read every sabbath, [f]fulfilled them in condemning him. And though they found [g]no cause of death [in him], they besought Pilate that he might be slain. And when they had [h]fulfilled all things that were written of him, they took him down from the tree, and placed him in a [i]tomb. But God [j]raised him from the dead, and he was [k]seen for many days, of those who came up with him from Galilee unto Jerusalem,—men who are now his [l]witnesses unto the people. And we declare to b Jno. i. 26, 27.

c cf. ch. 4. 12. cf. ver. 47.
d cf. Jno. i. 10, 11. cf. ch. 3. 17.
e cf. ch. 26. 22, 23, 27. cf. Rom. 3. 21.
f cf. ch. 2. 23. cf. ch. 17. 3. cf. Jno. 19. 11.
g Mk. 14. 55. cf. Mk. 15. 10.
h cf. Lk. 18. 31. cf. Jno. 19. 30.
i Matt. 27. 59, 60. Jno. 19. 41, 42.
j ch. 2. 24. cf. Rom. 6. 4.
k ch. i. 3. cf. I Cor. 15. 5-7.
l ch. i. 8. ch. 2. 32.

* While this is the better supported reading, "you" is not a weak one and certainly agrees with the context.

the promise of a Saviour in his line. There was then a weary interval, which for his purpose the speaker can pass over; at last, after a needed baptism of repentance proclaimed to Israel, the Saviour came. All had known John; and he had borne public witness to the coming after him of One with regard to whom he was not worthy to do a menial's office. His salvation whom John had heralded was now being declared to the residents at Antioch.

A strange story indeed, of a smitten and slain Saviour! slain in accordance with their prophecies, by a people who refused the testimony of the prophets. Causelessly slain, yet His death had broken the bonds of death, and God had raised Him in an exceptional manner from among the dead: a thing borne witness to by many witnesses.

The apostle had testimony of his own which he could have added, as we know; but he prefers to make his appeal to what they had in their hand, the Scriptures which, thank God, are in our hand also. He appeals to three special texts as to the fulfilment of this promise.

The first is the second psalm, to which Peter also had appealed. God had owned a Man on earth—His anointed King on Zion—as His begotten Son. This was the claim which, as made by Jesus, the scribes so stoutly resisted. That any man should dare, in that sense, to call God his Father, was in itself, whatever he might offer in proof, incredible and monstrous. All His glorious works were nullified by this claim. Yet there it was, upon the face of their own scriptures, true certainly as to some Man: so that, if He had not claimed it, He could not have been the Christ of God! Thus the very objection that they made was proof rather for, than proof against Him. Jesus was in fact the One raised up of God to them in fulfilment of the promise. Did they but recall that psalm,—and how could an Israelite forget it?—they might see how the very controversy of Israel and of the kings of the earth with Him was recorded in it,—the vain attempt "against Jehovah and against His Christ." Did not He who sat in the heavens laugh? What could they do with Him they had safely guarded in His sepulcre?—with the Risen One whom they had helped so manifestly to proclaim? If they had His body, they had only to produce it, to quench all this joy that had so strangely arisen over the grave of a Crucified Man. But everywhere that Cross itself became a triumph! The Crucified had become glorified on earth; was it not the reflection of a brighter and heavenly glory?

you glad tidings,—the [m]promise made unto the fathers, that God hath fulfilled this unto us their children, in that he raised up Jesus; as also it is [n]written in the second psalm, Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee. But that he raised him from among the dead, [o]no more to return to corruption, he hath spoken thus, I will give you the [p]faithful mercies* of David; wherefore he saith also in another [psalm], [q]Thou wilt not suffer thy Pious* One to see corruption. For David, having in his own generation served the counsel of God, [r]fell asleep, and was laid unto his fathers, and saw corruption: but he whom God raised up saw [s]no corruption. Be it [t]known unto you, therefore, brethren, that through this man is announced to you [u]remission of sins; and from all things from which in

m ch. 26.6,7. cf. Gal. 3.16.
n Ps. 2. 7. Heb. 1. 5. Heb. 5. 5.
o cf. Rom. 6. 9, 10. cf. Heb. 9. 25–28. cf. Gen. 24. 5, 6.
p Is. 55. 3. cf. Ps. 89. 33–37.
q Ps. 16. 10. ch. 2. 27.
r 1 Ki. 2. 10. cf. 2 Sa. 7. 12.
s ch. 2. 29–31. ctr. Gen. 3. 19.
t vers. 32, 33. cf. ch. 2. 36.
u ch. 5. 31. ch. 10. 43. cf. Eph. 1. 7. cf. Heb. 10. 17, 18.

* ὅσια, ὅσιος, the connection cannot be made apparent in English without a paraphrase; but see the Notes.

The second psalm does not, however, speak of resurrection; for that the apostle adduces a singular text from Isaiah (chap. lv. 3), "I will give you the sure (or faithful) mercies of David." These mercies, as every one knew, were to be in a Person (as the next verses also show), a Son of David, greater far than he. And of Him the sixteenth psalm, next quoted, plainly speaks. David it is; and yet was it fulfilled in David? Here was a Pious One, who on account of what He was, though His soul would be in hades, would not be suffered to see corruption in the grave. That was not true of David, as they all knew. Of One whom they could not deny to be the Son of David it was true. In Him those mercies were deposited in a way which rescued them from peril evermore.

The connection between the "mercies" and the "Pious" One is not seen in English. The words are really the same—and this both in Greek and Hebrew; and some would make them so in English, by translating, "Thy Merciful One;" but I do not take this to be the connection. It is not as being merciful that God could not suffer Him to see corruption: nor for anything that He is towards men. As "Thy Pious One" is undoubtedly a good translation, so it is one that suits the place in which we find it here. But the word used in relation to Jehovah, as in the first case, cannot mean this; we cannot speak of Jehovah's "piety"; and here the alternative rendering as "mercies," "benefits," is evidently right. The word in Hebrew, in its radical meaning, speaks of affection abundant and ready to flow out, whether Godward or manward, and needing therefore to be variously expressed. In the One before us, the true David, or "Beloved," is found the abundant outflow in both directions; and here is the connection between the passages as far as this word is concerned. In the Mediator standing between God and man, both God and Man are found in full, ideal relationship. And it is in the Risen Man that this is clearly established, never to be disordered any more.

The effect is now that there is a gospel: "Through this Man is announced to you remission of sins;" and that in a complete way which not only witnesses mercy on God's part, but righteousness,—as justification manifestly does. The wail of the Jobs of ancient time is answered, "How shall man be just with God?" though in a way transcending all ability on man's side; for now God is just, and the Justifier of the ungodly, through faith in Jesus. The justification of a sinner—the righteousness of God put fully upon his side—in the only way in which it could possibly be accomplished, will be the wonder and delight of eternity. What indeed could Moses' law do in such a matter? It was only for sins done inadvertently that it provided (Lev. iv. 2, 13, 22, 27); for any other it

[v] Moses' law ye could not be justified, in him is [w] justified every one who believeth. See then, that there come not upon you that which is spoken in the prophets, Behold, ye [x] despisers, and wonder, and perish; for I work a work in your days, a work which ye will in no wise believe, if one declare it unto you.

4 (xiii.42–52): The Jews rejecting, the apostles turn to the Gentiles.

4. And as they went out, they [y] besought that these things might be spoken to them the next sabbath. Now when the synagogue broke up, many of the Jews and of the worshiping proselytes followed Paul and Barnabas; who, speaking to them, persuaded them to [z] continue in the grace of God. And on the next sabbath almost all the city was gathered together to hear the word of God. But when the Jews saw the multitudes, they were filled with [a] jealousy, and contradicted the things spoken by Paul, and railed. And Paul and Barnabas spake out boldly, saying, It was necessary that the word of God should be spoken [b] first to you. Since ye thrust it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of eternal life, lo, we [c] turn to the Gentiles. For so hath the Lord enjoined us, [d] I have set thee for a light of the nations, that thou shouldst be for salvation unto the end of the earth. And the Gentiles hearing [this] were glad, and glorified the word of the Lord; and as many v cf. Rom. 3. 19, 20. cf. Rom. 10. 3-11. cf. Gal. 3. 10-14. cf. Heb. 7. 18, 19.

w cf. Rom. 3. 28. cf. Ro. 5. 1. cf. Gal. 2. 16.
x Hab. 1. 5. cf. Is. 29. 14. cf. 2 Cor. 2. 15, 16.
y cf. Matt. 13. 20, 21.
z cf. Col. 1. 23. cf. Jude 21. cf. Heb. 10. 38, 39.
a cf. 1 Thes. 2. 16. cf. Matt. 23. 13. cf. ch. 22. 21, 22.
b cf. Lk. 24. 47. cf. Rom. 1. 16.
c cf. ch. 28. 26–28. cf. Ezek. 3. 4-7.
d Is. 49. 6. cf. ch. 15. 16, 17; cf. Rom. 11. 25.

was incompetent. And if "without shedding of blood is no remission," "the blood of bulls and goats could not take away sins" (Heb. ix. 22, x. 4–7). Of something beyond itself it was ever speaking; yea, of Him whose death for sinners was now an offence everywhere to the Jew.

The apostle adds the warning which the prophet had already given; or rather, God by him; an intimation not to be carried away by the unbelief of their leaders,—an unbelief so plainly foretold. Alas, it was soon to be seen that they needed the warning, and yet that it was to be, except to a remnant, given in vain!*

4. The history of this follows; in which we see the pride of the Jew in his exclusive privileges making him refuse the most precious blessings, if he is to share them with the Gentile. The simple condition of faith which the gospel imposes sets the believing Gentile upon the same footing with the Jew; and on the next sabbath almost the whole city comes together to hear news like this. The sight of the multitudes stirs up the Jews to jealousy, and they contradict Paul with open railing. This in turn rouses the two evangelists to declare their express commission to the Gentiles; and that, since they who had been privileged to have the first invitation of divine grace had put it from them, they would turn to these. And again they produce the undeniable statement of the Word, that Christ was set to be a light to the nations, a salvation even to the end of the earth.

It is, in fact, to One whose labor has been in vain in Israel that God speaks after this manner (Isa. xlix. 4–6). If Israel were not gathered, this even would be a small thing, compared with the work in which He should be glorified, of wide blessing among the Gentiles. This shows it contemplated, at least, that there might be a time when Israel would reject while the Gentiles would receive Him. What serious question would not such a suggestion raise in the mind of

* This address of Paul has something in common with that of Stephen, in that it is a historic summary. It differs from that however, and resembles Peter's at Pentecost, in showing from Scripture the death and resurrection of Christ. S. R.

as were *e*ordained to eternal life believed. And the word of the Lord was *f*carried abroad through all the country. But the Jews excited the *g*women of the upper classes who were worshipers, and the chief men of the city, and stirred up persecution against Paul and Barnabas, and *h*cast them out from their borders. But they *i*shook off the dust of their feet against them, and came to Iconium. And the disciples were *j*filled with joy and with [the] Holy Spirit.

e cf. Rom. 8. 29, 30. cf. Jno. 6. 44. cf. Rom. 9. 15, 16.
f cf. ch. 19. 10.
g cfr. ch. 17. 4, 12.
h cf. 1 Thes. 2. 15. cf. Jno. 16. 2. cf. ch. 8. 1.
i Matt. 10. 14.

5 (xiv. 1-7): The Strong with the weak.

5. And it came to pass in Iconium that they entered together into the *k*synagogue of the Jews, and *l*so spake that a great multitude of both Jews and Greeks believed. But the Jews who were disobedient *m*stirred up the souls of the Gentiles, and made their minds ill-affected against the brethren. Long time therefore

cf. ch. 18. 6.
j cf. ch. 16 25. cf. Col. 1. 24. cf. Matt. 5. 12. cf. 1 Thess. 1. 6.
k ch. 13. 5, 14.
l cf. 1 Cor. 2. 1-5.

cf. Rom. 15. 19; cf. Gal. 3. 1. m ch. 13. 50; ver. 19.

a Jew! And these prophets were read continually in their synagogues! but unbelief gets through the plainest testimonies. The Gentiles are glad, however, and glorify the word of the Lord; and in the sovereign grace of God many believe; and the word of the Lord is carried abroad throughout all the country.

But an opposition is now roused, which follows the apostles through all their labors in these parts. Those who will not themselves receive the truth will not, if they can help it, suffer the truth to be received; and the Jews have influence enough with the Gentiles to turn them against those whom they hate for bringing blessing to the Gentiles! Such is man! So the bringers of good news are cast out for the news they bring; but the disciples are filled with joy and with the Holy Spirit.

5. The work at Iconium does not present much difference from that at Antioch; only that here a larger number of the Jews believe. The end is similar; the unbelieving Jews stir up the Gentiles, and the apostles have to flee. What is emphasized in the account given is certainly the help found in God, who links Himself to human weakness so as to make it "mighty through God." First, in the synagogue they "so spake that a great multitude of both Jews and Greeks believed." Here, spite of its being clearly the work of God to bring men to Himself, yet none the less is He pleased to give effect to the words of His people in such sort that it can be said, they so spake as to produce faith. There is a right fitting of words to such an end which must not be overlooked; a skill which only a wisdom begotten of love can enable with, and which disdains not diligence for the attainment of its ends,—"And because the preacher was wise, he still taught the people knowledge; yea, he pondered and sought out, and set in order many proverbs. The preacher sought to find out acceptable words, and that which was written uprightly, even words of truth" (Eccl. xii. 9, 10).

There are many who seem to think that the teaching of the Spirit of God should set aside all this. They speak slightingly of the "study" even of the word of God. They no longer "cry after knowledge," nor "lift up the voice for understanding;" they do not "seek her as silver," nor "search for her as for hid treasures." Yet they doubt not to "understand the fear of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God" (Prov. ii. 3–5). Without sowing of seed, they expect harvests, and that negligence now shall do the work of diligence, and find the blessing it has never sought.

But the man of God is to be furnished unto all good works; and from Scripture only is this furnishing. If we are to be "as new-born babes, desiring the sincere milk of the Word," how much does a new-born babe desire milk? Alas! the careless way in which the word of God is read to-day shows little of the they tarried, speaking [n] boldly in dependence on the Lord, who bare [o] witness to the word of his grace, granting signs and wonders to be done by their hands. But the multitude of the city was [p] divided; and part held with the Jews, and part with the apostles. And when an effort was made, both of the Gentiles and of the Jews, with their rulers, to use them ill, and stone them, they became aware of it, and [q] fled unto the cities of Lycaonia, to Lystra and Derbe, and the surrounding country; and there they evangelized.

6 (xiv.8-20): Touching the boundaries.

6. And there sat a certain man in Lystra, [r] impotent in his feet, lame from his mother's womb, who had never n cf. ch. 4.29, 31. cf. ch.28.31. cf. Rom.1.16.

o cf. Mk.16.20. cf. ch. 5.32 with ch.10.44-47.
p cf. ch. 17.4-8.
q Matt. 10.23. cf. Matt.12.15.
r cf. ch.9. 25. cf. ch.3. 2-8.

teaching of the Spirit of God; and thus with each new wind of doctrine, the anchors of so many drag at once!

Here we are speaking rather of the ability to affect others; and for this the need of gift from God must not be forgotten. But the possession of whatever gift does not render one superior to the rules which are common to all Christians, and which are plain moral rules, every one. The servant serves with what the Christian has acquired; and this is a most important rule indeed! We acquire and prove in our own souls what we can then use for the souls of others; and the very fact that we are to serve others with it shows the need all have of it, and not servants only. There is no part of the word of God that is not intended for all the people of God; and we all learn as learners, not as teachers. Oh for the longing from the heart of every Christian for that which has all come from the heart of God for all His own!

Those so speak as to make men believe, who have themselves received with a living and joyous faith what they impart to others; and who impart it therefore, not according to the rules of an artificial pedagogy, but from such full hearts as alone can reach hearts.

So the apostles spake, and so the Iconians believed. But all the more it stirred the souls of some to faith, the more would it awaken opposition in the hearts of its rejectors. Again it was the Jews who evil affected the Gentiles towards the brethren, newly become such. Here too, however, the weak are with the Strong, who protects them and enables them to continue in the midst of the opposition, by means, perhaps, of the signs and wonders which He grants them to do, and of which at Antioch we hear nothing. They seem by no means, therefore, a necessary accompaniment of the gospel, but rather an occasional help,—in this case, seemingly, to quiet opposition, and make men realize with whom they had to do.

The city was divided; but at last a determined attack was to be made,—a combined attempt to stone them on the part of Jews and Gentiles both. Acting then upon the Lord's words to the disciples, they flee to Lystra and Derbe, in the wilder parts of Lycaonia, and there pursue their work.

6. As at Iconium there was seen the power of Him who was with His word, so now at Lystra is demonstrated the fickleness of the multitude, who presently stone the man whom at first they would have worshiped as a god. The healing of the impotent man suggests the latter; yet is all incompetent to commend to the mass the blessed truth brought to them by the healer, which should have been its own commendation; while the tale of his traducers finds its way to the very bottom of their hearts! Both ways one touches boundaries here, but finds good nowhere. Men will idolize you, perhaps; for God has lost His place with them, and it is easily given to another. They will destroy their idol too, as easily. This is the creature, man, to whom nevertheless God has sent a message of infinite grace, the story of a work more wonderful than ever blessed before the ears that hear it; but over this he has the greatest difficulty! What walked. This man heard Paul speaking; who, fastening his eyes upon him, and seeing that he had [s]faith to be made whole, said with a loud voice, Stand upright upon thy feet; and he [t]leaped up and [u]walked. And the multitudes, seeing what Paul had done, lifted up their voices, saying in the Lycaonian [tongue], The [v]gods are come down to us in the likeness of men. And they called Barnabas Jupiter, and Paul Mercury, because he took the [w]lead in speaking. And the priest of Jupiter, who was before the city, brought bulls and garlands to the gates, and would have done [x]sacrifice with the multitudes. But when the apostles Barnabas and Paul heard of it, they rent their garments, and sprang forth among the multitude, crying out and saying, Sirs, why do ye these things? We also are men of [y]like passions with you, and bring you glad tidings, that ye should [z]turn from these vain things unto the living God, who [a]made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein; who in the past generations [b]suffered all the nations to walk in their own ways. And yet he left not himself without [c]witness, in that he did good and gave you rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling your hearts with food and gladness. And with these words they scarcely restrained the multitudes from sacrificing to them.

But there came Jews from Antioch and Iconium; and, having [d]persuaded the multitudes, they [e]stoned Paul, and dragged him out of the city, supposing that he was dead. But while the disciples surrounded him, he stood up, and [f]entered into the city; and on the morrow he [g]went away with Barnabas to Derbe.

7 (xiv.21-28): The completion of the work.

7. And when they had evangelized that city, and made many disciples, they [h]returned to Lystra, and Iconium and Antioch, confirming the souls of the disciples, exhorting them to [i]continue in the faith, and that through

s cf. Matt. 9. 2, 28, 29.
t cf. Is. 35. 6. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 23.
u cf. 1 Thes. 2. 12 with Is. 40. 31. ctr. Gal. 5. 7.
v cf. ch. 8. 10. cf. ch. 28. 6. cf. ch. 12. 22.
w ch. 13. 13, 16.
x cf. ch. 10. 25, 26. cf. Dan. 2. 46. ctr. ver. 19.
y cf. Jas. 5. 17. cf. Rev. 19. 10.
z cf. 1 Thess. 1. 9. cf. ch. 15. 19. cf. Gal. 4. 8-11.
a cf. ch. 4. 24. cf. ch. 17. 24. cf. Col. 1. 16.
b cf. ch. 17. 30. cf. Gen. 15. 16. cf. 2 Pet. 3. 9, 10.
c cf. Rom. 1. 20, 21. cf. Matt. 5. 45. cf. Ps. 65. 8-13.
d ch. 13. 50. cf. Mk. 15. 11.
e cf. ch. 7. 58. cf. ch. 9. 16. cf. 2 Cor. 11. 25.
f cf. Jno. 11. 7-10. cf. ch. 20. 24.
g cf. ver. 6.
h cf. ch. 15. 36.
i ch. 13. 43. cf. ch. 2. 42.

but the power of the Spirit could one trust to make way for the gospel in a world like this?

Preserved from it at Iconium, Paul is permitted to be stoned at Lystra; how, amid it all, his mind must have gone back to Stephen! but that he should abide in the flesh was needful yet for many; and this, and not the wills of lawless men, governs all: while the disciples stand round him, he rises up, and returns into the city. "Fear would have said, Go anywhere else just now. Self would have said, Stay there, and see what a future triumph for the gospel! But the thoughts of man are in neither suggestion the mind of Christ; and this the apostle had and acted on." (W. Kelly.) "On the morrow he went away with Barnabas to Derbe."

7. The limit of their journey at the present time is now reached. At Derbe there are many disciples made, with no record of after-persecution; and thence they return to Lystra, Iconium and Antioch, "confirming the souls of the disciples, exhorting them to continue in the faith, and that through much tribulation we must enter into the kingdom of God." Such words for the mass seem idle now, though assuredly they should still have meaning. The lives of the speakers were in this case an illustration in full of what they declared, and it was many [j] tribulations we must enter into the kingdom of God. And having chosen them [k] elders in each assembly, having [l] prayed, with fastings, they [m] commended them to the Lord, on whom they had believed. And having passed through Pisidia, they came unto Pamphylia; and having spoken the word in Perga, they went down to Attalia; and thence they sailed to Antioch, whence they had been [n] committed to the grace of God, for the work which they had fulfilled. And when they had come, and gathered together the assembly, they [o] related to them all that God had done with them, and how he had [p] opened a door of faith unto the Gentiles. And they remained no little time with the disciples.

[j] cf. Rom. 5. 3. cf. Phil. 1. 29. cf. 1 Pet. 4. 12, 13.
[k] cf. ch. 11. 30. cf. ch. 20. 17. cf. 1 Tim. 3. 1, etc. cf. Tit. 1. 5–9.
[l] cf. ch. 13. 3.
[m] ch. 20. 32.
[n] cf. ch. 13. 2–4.
[o] ch. 15. 3, 4, 12. ch. 21. 19.
[p] cf. ch. 11. 18; cf. 1 Cor. 16. 9.

not possible for any to dissent from a principle so manifest as these had made it.

Now for the first time we come to the appointment of elders in the assemblies; a class of officers of which we have heard hitherto only among the assemblies in Judea. Unless age and experience are to count for nothing in the affairs of the assembly, an eldership must naturally obtain recognition everywhere, practically if not formally; and in the Jewish assemblies it seems to have been simply a natural growth (1 Pet. v. 1, 5), officialized by antique and patriarchal custom. Yet all would not be ready to take their part in the responsibilities implied, and many would become in different ways disqualified. The eldership would thus become more restricted than the term properly would argue for.

In the assembly also, in contradistinction from Judaism, all terms had a spiritual significance. The "babes, young men, and fathers" were spiritual grades primarily; even though by no means wholly severed from their natural representatives. Years would count, and yet not simply as time and nothing else. That would be true even in nature, that men might be older or younger than their age; but spiritually much greater and more significant would such disproportion be. Thus there would be disqualifications for eldership, and mainly moral, though not wholly. If any one examines the apostle's qualifications of an overseer (which was the official status of the elder), as given in the first epistle to Timothy, he will easily discern the moral character on which all is based, and that it is that of the "father" (chap. iii. 1–7; comp. v. 1). A specific gift was quite another matter; and though it might and should develop, no age or experience could communicate it. But it was just the experience of one spiritually a "father" which would enable him for oversight in the family of God.

In the case of the assemblies here, the apostles choose elders for them; they are not able, therefore, to do it for themselves: and this is confirmed by the express commission given to Titus to appoint elders in those of Crete, as by the directions as to them given to Timothy; where the fact of his being at Ephesus, where there were already such (chap. xx. 17) makes their inability to appoint also as evident as that of the assembly. It was an office which apparently any might desire, and to which, therefore, one would say, all who had the needful qualifications might be appointed. The appointment conveyed an authority which the exercise of special gift did not require; that of the preacher or teacher being simply that of the word he ministered, and not of office.

Things being thus set in order in these young assemblies, with prayer and fasting they commended them to the Lord, in whom they had believed; and passing back along the road by which they had come, having reached the sea-coast, sailed to Antioch. There they had been committed to the grace of God for the work now fulfilled; and there they related how God through them had opened a door of faith to the Gentiles. There they remained no little time.

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chap. xv. 1–35.)
Is the Law to be added to the Gospel?

1 (1-6): The occasion of the question.

1. AND certain persons who had come down from [q] Judea taught the brethren, Except ye shall have been circumcised after the custom of Moses, ye cannot be saved. A commotion therefore having taken place, and no little [r] debate with them by Paul and Barnabas, they arranged that Paul and Barnabas, and some others of them should go up to [s] Jerusalem to the apostles and elders about this question. They therefore, having been brought on their way by the assembly, [t] passed through both Phœnicia and Samaria, declaring the conversion of the Gentiles; and caused great [u] joy to all the brethren. And being arrived at Jerusalem, they were [v] received by the assembly and the apostles

q cf. Gal. 2. 12. cf. ch. 10. 45.
r ver. 7. cf. Gal. 2. 1-10. cf. Gal. 5. 2-12. cf. Gal. 6. 12-16.
s cf. ch. 11. 2. cf. ver. 1.
t cf. ch. 14. 27.
u cf. ch. 11. 18, 23.
v cf. ch. 21. 17.

SUBD. 2.

We have already seen abundantly, and as emphasized in the Cross itself, that it is the men of law who are to be the special opponents of the way of grace. That which God gave for the cure of self-righteousness is that which the perversity of man uses in the interest of it. And this we are to find both outside and inside Christianity, adapting itself in various grades and modifications to what is its mere opposite; as a parasitic growth twines itself round and sustains itself upon that from which it draws the nutritive juices which are its life.

The law was given for the cure of legality; but its mode of dealing with this (perhaps the only, and thus the absolutely necessary way) being that of experiment, it seems at first sight, and on a superficial view, to favor it. God gave the law, say men, and think they need go no further. Would He say, "Do this," without meaning that you are to do it? That its real purpose should be to stop every one's mouth, and bring all the world in guilty before God,—that is an intolerable thought. And when, convicted and undone, we must needs cast ourselves upon Christ entirely for the righteousness which in ourselves we cannot find, still, for most of us, if not all, the same weary round must be pursued in the interests of holiness and practical life; conscience goading us on a road which to the most conscientious is most impracticable, until we break down with the despairing groan, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me?" The least conscientious get on best here; and they find provided for them all along the road certain helps for travelers—mere evasions of the truth, or opiates for the conscience—which enable them to tread it with apparent ease, or lead them off unwittingly upon a convenient bye-path. With these inventions we have not as yet to do; we are here at the beginning of the history of Christianity, and things meet us in their first and simplest forms. Here therefore, those of the sect of the Pharisees who believe have only in a straightforward manner to declare that it is needful to circumcise the Gentile converts, and to enjoin them to keep the law of Moses. And by this they mean, not certain moral essentials, but the law as a whole: what a Jew would call that. This question—already settled as it might seem, and indeed really was—comes up nevertheless again for settlement. It cannot be suffered to be decided in default merely of advocates for Moses; it must be taken up distinctly, raised and argued out; and this is accordingly what we find now.

1. Those who are the occasion of the question being raised do not themselves make a question of it. They preach boldly and without a doubt their legal doctrine, as is usual with men of their class. "Except ye be circumcised after the custom of Moses, ye cannot be saved." It need not, one would think, have raised much alarm; for they could quote neither scripture nor apostle for it; but

and the elders, and they [w] announced to them how great things God had done with them. And there rose up some of the [x] sect of the Pharisees who believed, saying that it was needful to circumcise them, and enjoin them to keep the law of Moses. And the apostles and the [y] elders were gathered together to see about this matter.

2 (7-21): The witness of God.

2. And when there had been much debate, Peter stood up and said unto them, Brethren, ye [z] know how, long ago, God made choice among you, that by my mouth

w ch. 14. 27. ver. 12.

x ver. 1. cf. ch. 26.5. cf. ch. 23. 6.

y cf. vers. 2, 4, 22. cf. ch. 14.23. cf. 1 Pet. 5.1.

z cf. chs. 10, 11. 1-18.

the sheep of Christ are, alas, a timid folk, and a loud voice and a confident tone are apt to dismay, if not to carry them. A commotion thus is easily excited, which even Paul and Barnabas are unable to put an end to. Behind these persons from Judea looms the shadow of Jerusalem and the twelve, the primal seat of authority; and in fact it is of God that this matter shall be settled there, so that there may be no possibility of cavil any more. Jerusalem is to be the place of settlement, just because the Jewish yoke is to be finally and for ever taken off the necks of the Gentiles, and no other hands could do it so well. It is an act of abdication of supposed rights that is to be accomplished, and those must do this who are thought to have the rights. After all, the decision really is that God has settled the matter, and that they have nothing to do but to bow to what He has done.

It is in a very different interest that this first "council" is quoted and appealed to, namely to give sanction to a hierarchical government of the Church. The patriarchate of Jerusalem is thus made to have its beginning from the earliest times, with James as its head and oracle giving sentence, even in the presence of the whole conclave of the apostles themselves! A small foundation indeed, upon which to build the immense system that has been built upon it. The moral suitability of all here is as plain as the *un*suitability for the purposes of ecclesiastical pretension which it is made to serve. And this will be more evident as we proceed to consider it.

The discordant voices that have been heard have come from Judea. There is the seat of what may be a growing and fatal heresy. The place for it to be met is there where it has had its origin, and with the full agreement of those who are leaders in the Jewish assemblies. Paul and Barnabas, with others from Antioch, it is arranged, shall go up there; and the assembly, in testimony of their fellowship with them, conduct them on the way. Everywhere, as they pass through Phenicia and Samaria, they carry with them the news of the Gentile work now fairly beginning, and of the wonderful power of God which has shown itself in this: a fitting introduction to bring hearts into accord with Him in the grace He has already manifested, and to make them fear to cloud it by the bringing in of a principle so contradictory to that first free action of the Spirit as that which men would now fain introduce.

So they come to Jerusalem, and in full assembly, before the apostles and elders, announce the same joyful news of the blessing that has been given,—the first-fruits of a great harvest to come in. God has wrought; will they dictate to Him the terms of continuance of that which without condition He has so begun? Here the Pharisees among the disciples echo the voice which has been heard at Antioch, and in the same positive way. We cannot be saved by the law, indeed, but can we be saved without the law?—a question existing to-day, apart from the crude form in which it is uttered here; and urged with the same heedlessness of the answer of God already fully given, as well as of the imperative needs that lie hid in their souls who ask it.

2. It is noticeable that not the apostles only come to consider the matter. Those set in the place of founders of Christianity—Christ's special gifts to the Church for that purpose—do not assume on that account to sit in a conclave of their own, and simply let others know the decision they have arrived at. Just the Gentiles should hear the word of the gospel and believe. And God, who [a]knoweth the heart, bare them witness, [b]giving them the Holy Spirit, even as to us, and put [c]no difference between us and them, [d]cleansing their hearts by faith. Now then, why [e]tempt ye God, in putting a [f]yoke upon the disciples' necks, which [g]neither our fathers nor we were able to bear? But we believe that through the [h]grace of the Lord Jesus we shall be saved in the same manner as they. And all the multitude kept silence; and they hearkened unto Barnabas and Paul [i]relating how great signs and wonders God had done among the Gentiles by their means.

a cf. Jno. 2. 24, 25. cf. ch. 1. 24. cf. Rom. 8. 27. cf. 2 Tim. 2. 19.
b cf. ch. 10. 44-47. cf. Gal. 3. 2. cf. Eph. 1. 13.
c cf. Rom 3. 22-24, 29, 30. cf. Rom. 10. 12. cf. Eph. 2. 11-22. cf. Col. 3. 10, 11. d cf. 1 Cor. 6. 11; cf. 1 Pet. 1. 22; cf. 1 Jno. 3. 9; cf. Ps. 51. 10. e cf. Heb. 3. 9, 10. f ver. 28. cf. Gal. 5. 1; cf. Gal. 4. 8-11; cf. Col. 2. 16-23. g cf. Matt. 23. 4; cf. Gal. 3. 19, 23, 24; ctr. Matt. 11. 28-30; ctr. 1 Jno. 5. 3. h cf. Rom. 11. 6; cf. Eph. 2. 8, 9; cf. Gal. 1. 6. i vers. 3, 4.

so much the more as the Lord has endowed them with special gift, so much the less need have they to fence themselves round with the claim of authority which after all is found in the word they bring, and must have its confirmation in the conscience and heart of those that listen to it. Those whose history we have before us here are evidently men who believe in full light and fresh air,—who allow discussion, and appeal themselves both to Scripture and reason. Reason is not a revelation, and must be subject to revelation; but which will enlighten, not contradict it. The more they were persuaded of the truth they had being indeed from God, the more freely could they take the ground of one of these apostles, "I speak as to wise men,"—sensible men, as we speak commonly—"judge ye what I say" (1 Cor. x. 15). The cry against the mind so often made by assumed spirituality is most contrary to God, who has made us altogether for Himself, and claims us altogether. Mind is not a product of the fall, though the fall has darkened and enfeebled it. We need God here as everywhere, to deliver from the power of sin which has enslaved naturally all our faculties; but a man without mind is simply an idiot, and the lack is one which no spiritual work that one ever hears of provides substitute for. Mind is a gift of creation, not of new creation. The new-creative work is spiritual, and not mental, however much the whole man is enlarged and blessed by it.

The naturalness of all here is refreshing. Debate goes on freely with the apostles in presence; the arguments of the law-advocates are allowed to have full hearing, although they are not recorded for us. At last Peter stands up and narrates the story we have listened to before, of how God had settled this matter a good while since, when by his mouth the Gentiles first heard the gospel and believed. God had testified in their behalf, putting the seal of His Spirit on them though uncircumcised, purifying them not by circumcision but by faith. Had He then spoken anything of any supplementary work to be effected in them by Moses? And what did their own experience tell them of the yoke of the law? Would they put that upon these fresh disciples, which they and their fathers too had found no ability to bear? It would be tempting God, not pleasing Him to impose that upon them which He in His ways had conspicuously left aside. And they themselves trusted for salvation, not to legal righteousness, but to the grace of the Lord Jesus.

The clear and sufficient argument goes further than they yet were able or disposed to carry it. Was God indeed freeing the Gentiles' necks from such an intolerable yoke, still to leave the Jewish believers under it? But they keep to the point in hand: God had certainly spoken with sufficient plainness as to it, and the silence following testifies to the effect produced. To have resisted would have been resisting Him. They are silent therefore, while Barnabas and Paul—we see how naturally here at Jerusalem Barnabas, best and longest known, returns to his old precedence—once more relate the signs and wonders with which it had pleased God to confirm their work among the nations. It was in fact

And after they had held their peace, [j]James answered, saying, Brethren, hearken to me: Simon* hath related how God first visited the Gentiles, to [k]take out from them a people for his Name. And to this [l]agree the words of the prophets, as it is [m]written, After these things I will return, and [n]build again the tabernacle of David which is fallen: yea, I will build again the ruins of it, and set it up, so that the [o]residue of men may seek out the Lord, even all the nations upon whom my Name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth these things [p]known from eternity.† Wherefore I judge that we

j ch. 12. 17. ch. 21. 18. cf. Gal. 1. 19. cf. Gal. 2. 9, 12.
k cf. ch. 13. 48. cf. Rom. 15. 9–12.
l cf. ch. 2. 16.
m Am. 9. 11, 12.
n cf. Hag. 2. 9.
o cf. ch. 17. 26, 27. cf. Is. 49. 1, 6.
p cf. Is. 45. 21, 22. cf. Gal. 3. 8.

*Symeon. †MSS. vary as to the exact words; but the meaning is little changed.

Peter's argument extended and amplified; and thus God had been bearing witness to what was in His heart: who should gainsay Him? It was a different—a strange work compared with anything that the law could show, the heart of God breaking through all barriers with its message of divine reconciliation and peace for all;—God the God of all His creatures once again; sin and its estrangements overcome for all who would have it so!

This story of grace ended, James adds a final word; not, surely, as president of the conference, any more than Patriarch of Jerusalem, but as led of the Spirit, who has the controlling place all through, and therefore just the most suitable person to show the complete harmony that prevailed. It is, no doubt, as commonly understood, not James the apostle, the son of Alphæus, but James the brother of Jude, the writer of the epistle which we have under his name. Everything that we know of him shows him to have been himself one of the most zealous of the law, which indeed all the thousands of believing Jews could a good while afterwards still be claimed to be (chap. xxi. 20). If James gives his judgment in agreement with Peter, then there is really no more to be said. In that sense his judgment is final; but Peter's had already settled all. Rather, it was God who had done so; and James continues but his argument by an appeal to Scripture to show that the blessing of the Gentiles as Gentiles had been before announced by God Himself. For this purpose, while he refers generally to the prophets he is content to quote Amos (chap. ix. 11, 12), in proof that there would be nations upon whom God's Name would be called. He does not at all say that the fulfilment of this was now taking place, or therefore, that the tabernacle of David was now being raised up. It is sufficient for him that such a thing as Gentiles being owned as God's was in full accord with God's ways announced. The prophecy clearly looks on to millennial times, and not to Christian; but that which God can do at one time cannot be in itself inconsistent for Him to do at another.*

James concludes that those are not to be troubled who from the nations are turning to God. Whoever desires to know the law can hear it every sabbath in the synagogues. Let them only abstain from pollutions of idols, from fornication, and from things strangled, and from blood. And to this the whole assembly agree without further discussion.

We have no difficulty as to the first two things specified here. The last two are connected together, and go back beyond Moses to God's covenant with Noah and his posterity,—therefore are not simply Jewish, though incorporated in the Jewish law, but apply to the whole present race of men. "The blood is the

*The quotation here of the Septuagint version, where it so decidedly differs from the Hebrew, cannot but impress one. James does not seem the man to favor Hellenism, and the whole character of the proceedings shows the manifest guidance of the Spirit of God. A very slight change of the Hebrew letters would reproduce the text which the Alexandrian translators must have had before them. The meaning thus obtained seems also better than that of the present text.

should not [t]trouble those who from the Gentiles are turning unto God; but that we write unto them that they abstain from [u]pollutions of idols, and from [u]fornication, and from that which is [u]strangled, and from [u]blood. For Moses, from generations of old, hath in every city those who preach him, being read in the [v]synagogues every sabbath.

3 (22-35): The publication.

3. Then pleased it the [w]apostles and the elders, with the whole assembly, to send men chosen from among them, unto Antioch, with Paul and Barnabas,—Judas, who q ver. 10. cf. Rom. 7. 22-24. cf. Gal. 5. 17.

r ver. 29. cf. 1 Cor. 8. cf. 1 Cor. 10. 19-22. cf. Rev. 2. 14.
s cf. 1 Cor. 5. 1, 13. cf. 1 Cor. 7. 2, etc. cf. 1 Thess. 4. 3-8.

t cf. Gen. 9. 4; cf. Lev. 22. 8. u cf. Lev. 17. 14. v cf. ch. 13. 15; cf. 2 Cor. 3. 15. w ver. 28; cf. Matt. 18. 20.

life," and life belongs to God: the recognition of this in so open a way as is here enjoined is surely seemly; and in a world of strife and bloodshed such as sin has made this,—where, too, the creatures subjected to man are in danger of ruthless extirpation at his hands, not even limited by his own interest in their preservation, is (or would be, if it were maintained) every way for good. Man has, of course, set it aside, and the world at large has forgotten it; but the good of that which is from God abides, and this it is the duty and privilege of the Church to maintain,—the rights of the Creator, as well as the grace of the Redeemer. Another has said with regard to this decree:—

"It is a direction which teaches, not that which is abstractly good or evil, but that which was suitable to the case presented. It was 'necessary,' not 'righteous before God', to avoid certain things. The things might be really evil, but they are not here looked at in that way. There were certain things to which the Gentiles were accustomed, which it was proper they should renounce, in order that the assembly might walk as it ought before God in peace. To the other ordinances of the law they were not to be subjected. Moses had those who preached him. That sufficed, without compelling the Gentiles to submit to his laws, when they joined themselves, not to the Jews, but to the Lord.

"This decree therefore does not pronounce upon the nature of the things forbidden, but upon the opportuneness—the Gentiles having in fact been in the habit of doing all these things. We must observe that they were not things forbidden by the law only. It was that which was contrary to the order established by God as Creator, or to a prohibition given to Noah when he was told to eat flesh. Woman was only to be connected with man in the sanctity of marriage, and this is a very great blessing. Life belonged to God. All fellowship with idols was an outrage against the authority of the true God. Let Moses teach his own laws; these things were contrary to the intelligent knowledge of the true God. It is not therefore a new law imposed by Christianity, nor an accommodation to the prejudices of the Jews. It has not the same kind of validity as a moral ordinance that is obligatory in itself. It is the expression to Christian intelligence of the terms of man's true relations with God in the things of nature, given by the goodness of God, through the leaders at Jerusalem, to ignorant Christians setting them free from the law, and enlightening them with regard to the relations between God and man, and to that which was proper to man,—things of which, as idolatrous Gentiles, they had been ignorant. I have said, addressed to Christian intelligence: accordingly there is nothing inconsistent in eating anything that is sold at the shambles; for I acknowledge God who gave it, and not an idol. But if the act implies communion with the idol, even to the conscience of another, it would be provoking God to jealousy; I sin against Him or against my neighbor. I do not know whether an animal is strangled or not, but if people act so as to imply that it is indifferent whether life belongs to God or not, I sin again; I am not defiled by the thing, but I fail in Christian intelligence with regard to the rights of God as Creator." (Synopsis.)

3. For the publication of the decree, the assembly choose out men from among them to send back as their representatives with Paul and Barnabas to is called Barsabbas, and Silas, leading men among the brethren; and they [x]wrote thus by them: The apostles and elder brethren,* to the brethren from among the Gentiles at Antioch and in Syria and Cilicia, greeting: Forasmuch as we have heard that [y]some who went out from among us have troubled you with words, unsettling your souls, [saying that ye must be circumcised and keep the law,]† to whom we gave no commandment, it seemed good unto us, having come to a common mind,‡ to send [z]chosen men to you, with our beloved Barnabas and Paul,—men who have [a]given up their lives for the Name of our Lord Jesus Christ. We have sent therefore Judas and Silas, who shall tell you the [b]same things by word [of mouth]. For it [c]seemed good to the Holy Spirit and to us to lay upon you no [d]burden more than these [e]necessary things, to abstain from idol-sacrifices, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornications; from which if ye keep yourselves ye shall do well. Farewell. They therefore, being let go, came down to Antioch; and having gathered the multitude, delivered the epistle. And

x ch. 16. 4.

y vers. 1, 5. cf. Gal. 2. 12, 13.

z ver. 22. cf. ch. 13. 2.

a cf. ch. 14. 19, etc. cf. ch. 20. 24.

b cf. 2 Cor. 13. 1.

c ver. 22. cf. 1 Cor. 2. 14-16. cf. ch. 16. 6, 7.

d cf. ver. 10. cf. Gal. 5. 10.

e ver. 20.

* Or, "elders and brethren." † Many omit the bracketed portion.
‡ Or, "being assembled with one accord."

Antioch, to confirm all by word of mouth that they were writing, that no suspicion should by any possibility arise; expressing also in their letter, in strong terms their thorough confidence in those who had been the leaders in this work among the Gentiles. It is striking that in the letter the "elder brethren" (which is generally accepted now as the true reading) are associated with the apostles. It confirms what has been already said as to the character of eldership in the Jewish assemblies, while showing how little jealous as to their prerogatives as such were the genuine apostles. The place they had, and which was given them by the Lord, the Spirit of God maintained in the spiritual power which was theirs—the gift which they used to serve with. In seven out of fourteen of Paul's epistles we find a similar association of others with himself; and such style is truly apostolic. The men of those days were yet in remembrance of the Lord's pattern of greatness being a little child, and that He Himself had been among them as one that serveth.

When they say, "It seemed good to the Holy Spirit, and to us," it has to be remembered that the Spirit coming upon Cornelius and his company was indeed to Peter and to those with him the incontrovertible proof of God's acceptance of men uncircumcised; and that thus we can easily see why they should speak of the Spirit first and apart from themselves. The same seal had everywhere been put upon the Gentile converts; how then could they do otherwise than obediently follow as the Spirit so manifestly led? Their decision had been called for: they declare themselves therefore, as they could not do otherwise, in obedient harmony with what the Spirit Himself, apart from them, had done. The witness of the prophets, to which James had appealed, was also His witness; and the command given to Noah was of course no new enactment, but what Scripture had handed down. Really there was the fullest reason, therefore, for the language which they use, which separates what the Spirit Himself had led in from their own following as thus led of Him.

Nor is it in the least probable that they would have thought it necessary in announcing a decision of this character, to assure men that they were acting by the Spirit in such terms as they use here. That they had the Spirit, no one questioned; their actual guidance would not be better proved by the assertion, if when they had read it, they f rejoiced for the consolation. And Judas and Silas, being g prophets also themselves, comforted the brethren with much discourse, and established them. And having tarried awhile, they were let go in peace from the brethren to those who sent them. [But it seemed good to Silas to abide there.*] But Paul and Barnabas remained in Antioch, h teaching and announcing the glad tidings of the word of the Lord, with many others also.

f ch. 11. 23.
g cf. ch. 13.1. cf. 1 Cor. 14. 1–5.
h cf. ch. 11. 26.

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chaps. xv. 36–xx. 38.)

Transformations: the moral result.

SECTION 1. (Chaps. xv. 36–xvi. 12.)

The fundamental principle the sovereign will of God.

1 (xv. 36–41): Faithfulness.

1. BUT after some days Paul i said to Barnabas, Let us j return now, and visit the brethren in every city in which we have announced the word of the Lord, [and see] how they go on. And Barnabas advised that they should take with them also k John, called Mark. But Paul thought it not fit to take with them him who had fallen off from them from Pamphylia, and had not gone with them to the work. A very l warm feeling i ctr. ch. 13.2.

j cf. ch. 14.21–23.
k ch. 12. 12, 25. ch. 13. 5, 13. cf. Col. 4. 10. cf. 2 Tim. 4. 11.
l cf. Gen. 13. 7, 8. cf. 1 Cor. 11. 19.

*The majority of MSS omit the verse in brackets, but verse 40 would seem to show Silas had remained, or returned again.

any were disposed to question that. The apostle Paul does indeed, on one occasion, when he had been giving a judgment as to what it would be happier for one to do, remind us that he had the Spirit of God (1 Cor. vii. 40). But that is just because he is not speaking authoritatively, but simply tendering advice. He is not, as it were, in this case, the apostle, but the man; and we might need to be reminded that he was yet a man endowed (in how singular a way) with the Spirit of God. But what is before us now is a very different thing from this; and the authority of their decree would not be enhanced by a claim which the fact of its emanation from the apostles of the Lord and Saviour rendered quite unnecessary. On the other hand it would not be out of place to point out, against those who were troubling that the Spirit had already decided the whole matter. The case of Cornelius could not be unknown to them; in which the lack of circumcision had been definitely a question, and at Jerusalem itself. They had been taking up again what had been before sufficiently threshed out. In fact it was the enemy's work, however overruled of God for blessing; and in other and more subtle forms was to be again and again renewed.

For such need as all this implied, the testimony of Judas and Silas, prophets themselves, would be all-important; and thus in fact we hear of the comforting and establishment of the brethren by their means. Peace and unity were perfectly preserved; and as yet the adversary had gained no advantage. It is noted that, after they had tarried awhile, they are "let go in peace" to those who sent them; while the word of the Lord makes progress still in Antioch, and the number increases of those who labor in it.

SUBD. 3.

The part of the Acts to which we have now come, and which seems to include all the remaining labors of Paul, in Europe and in Asia, until his last journey to Jerusalem, where the malice of the Jews delivers him, after the pattern of his blessed Master, into the hands of the Gentiles, is from its largeness and variety hard to characterize. It can hardly be doubted, however, to give the moral result of the publication of the gospel in the Gentile world. The record arose therefore [between them], so that they separated from one another, and Barnabas taking Mark sailed to [m]Cyprus; but Paul chose Silas and went forth, being [n]commended by the brethren to the grace of the Lord.* And he passed through Syria and Cilicia, [o]confirming the assemblies.

m cf. ch. 4. 36. cf. ch. 13. 4.
n cf. ch. 13. 3 with ch. 15. 26.
o ch. 16. 5. cf. Rom. 1. 11.

* Or, "of God." MSS. differ.

presents carefully selected types of its working in the midst of a people far enough away from God to worship in Athens one unknown, and in Ephesus to have it slander to assert that "they are no gods that are made with hands." Where God is thus lost the whole anchorage of the soul is lost, and all things must be in drift; but it is hard for us to realize how openly evil stalked abroad in the old heathen world. The remedy provided by the gospel was no superficial one, but met the condition in what was its source, by the revelation of God in Christ, and the establishment of abiding relationship in peace between Him and all who in faith received the word of reconciliation.

Sec. 1.

The character of the message is seen in the messenger, as Paul elsewhere urges. A yea and nay preacher would not commend his preaching as a trustworthy "yea." (2 Cor. i. 17–19.) A man himself insubject could not expect to lead others into subjection to God. And this is what we start with here in him who is the pattern worker set before us in the scenes in which we are now to accompany him. For him to live was Christ; and that means obedience absolute: that God must be God was his fundamental principle; and this gave him, not freedom from exercise, but assurance as to a path which he could walk in in faith as God's path—the only thing that can give ability for it. Christ as his Lord alone, the Spirit was for him, as for all others then, sole Guide and Interpreter of his Lord's will. His conscience was before God and not man, as a right conscience ever must be. Nothing is more plainly seen here than the positive way in which the Spirit guided, often in opposition to the human wisdom and will of the apostle himself. Being forbidden to speak the Word in Asia, they attempt to go into Bithynia, but the Spirit suffers them not. Then follows the vision of the man of Macedonia, and they pass over into Europe. Guidance is by no means in any uniform way; one needs to be on the alert, as well as instructed in the Lord's mind. Guidance with the eye requires the eye to be in waiting for the look that is to guide; and so Elijah stood before the Lord his God.

