Scripture on the face of it is not at all like this. Though there are blessed statements of the gospel, as we very well know, and many a page of Christian exhortation, yet these are not put together as we might imagine they would be, and they are mixed with much else and various matter very different from all this. Things are not so definitely stated that there should be no possible mistake about them, as witness the conflict of Christian men over their meaning. What a help to a common understanding would be at least a divine summary of faith and practice, such as the various churches have adopted and which for this purpose they find so useful. But then these articles of faith separate: they are but the expression after all of the judgment of a section of Christendom; suppose there had been given us by divine inspiration as plain a creed as any of these, would it not have united instead of scattering us? if the Westminster Confession had been written by apostles instead of theologians of the seventeenth century, would we not have all subscribed it? and would not Arminianism have been effectively excluded from the minds of all honest-minded and believing men?

But such help as this it has not pleased God to give us; and we have to hunt up even texts upon any given subject—not always sure even that we have got the right ones—from every part of Scripture! Does not God care for the poor? Does He not know the dullness of our minds at best, the multifarious occupations that we have to be engaged in, the trouble and anxiety caused by our many differences, the darkness in which true-hearted saints grope often after His will, the tendency we have on account of all this, to follow the men who will do our thinking for us, and in whom in some way or other we have concluded to put confidence?

Yes, surely: all this and more God knows; and, knowing it, has written Scripture as He has, a book so large, so various, so needing to be searched, studied; so certain to exercise most the most careful, earnest, conscientious, God-fearing. His thought then for us, whatever it may be, is not to save us from thought,—not to let us off from the necessity of labor for what we get from it. It was not to a class of theological students, but to men so poor that they could follow Him for the loaves with which He fed them, that He said: "Labor not for the meat that perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give unto you." (John vi. 27.) Notice, therefore, that this applies not merely to the more hidden things of the Old Testament, but to the plain speech of the New as well, that it calls for labor—for more earnest and untiring labor than our daily food does; and that not from a special class of selected, capable workmen, but from all who need and desire such spiritual food.

Evidently the Lord distinguishes the thing that is to be labored after in the way He does in order to challenge our interest by the exceeding importance of it. "Meat that endureth to everlasting life" is a very significant title indeed, and one that we shall do well if we seek to realize what we can of the depth of its meaning. I have seen it interpreted as signifying "food that will give you entrance into everlasting life,"—by which you will become possessors of it: and that is true enough as a thought, and afterwards affirmed also: "he that eateth of this bread shall live for ever." It is a true thought in itself, and a thing justly worthy of all the emphasis that can be put upon it. And yet, if that were all, for the Christian, who has already the possession of eternal life, the urgency of the exhortation would necessarily pass out of it. He is not to be persuaded that he needs labor to get what he has already got, or to keep what it is as certain he can never lose.

Here too, it may be pleaded that the Lord is actually speaking to men who were not believers; but it is plain all the way through the chapter that there were disciples also among them, while in the open synagogue He is not hindered from speaking of such things and in such a way as to test disciples themselves. Here in seeking to attract men to Himself He might, as with the woman of Samaria, speak of things the depth of which they would not yet be able to penetrate, and yet of what they would understand to be a blessing set before them; and those who sought it would not be stumbled to find at last greater than at first they had realized.

After all, the truth itself is not so difficult to conceive, and the Lord's words to the Samaritan are strictly parallel. To her He speaks of "living water springing up unto eternal life," and under this figure of the Spirit's presence, permanent and operative ever, not to bring one into life, but throughout it. So here with the bread of life, the living bread, it too abides unto eternal life, in opposition to the "meat that perisheth." Not only the life is eternal, but all that ministers to it partakes of the same eternity. Christ abides, and abides as the unfailing support of a life which though eternal is dependent too, and which never ceases to realize its dependence.

An image of this, and to which the Lord also, in His epistles to the churches, refers us, was that "hidden manna," which was preserved in the golden pot and carried into the land, the type of our glorious heritage, that the children of Israel might see the food with which Jehovah had fed them in the wilderness. (Ex. xvi. 32.) Thus the food of the wilderness abode, but abode simply as a memorial, to be seen. To the overcomer at Pergamos on the other hand, the promise is: "I will give him of the hidden manna" (Rev. ii. 17): he shall partake of it, not simply see it. Christ as enjoyed in the wilderness shall be enjoyed afresh in the glorious land to which we are going: more perfectly, surely, for all shall be perfect there, and yet, let us mark it well, the very wilderness-food itself. For the manna is Christ in His humiliation, and in heaven He is no longer in humiliation, yet it is the hidden manna of which the saint in heaven still partakes.

A serious consideration presses upon one here, that, if this be the food partaken of,—and since one cannot call up again the wilderness-condition, save in memory,—he who has not had the wilderness experience cannot have the repetition of it in heaven: he cannot recall what he has never known. Thus, too, there must be some correspondence between the measure of apprehension of Christ here and the measure of such apprehension of Christ there. Take an angel's knowledge: it could not in this respect be the knowledge of the redeemed from among men. There is no sin in the angel, and it is not sin that limits his view; nay, his very freedom from it—his never having had the experience of it—would be a necessary limitation. And so would it be with the babe, only coming into the world to be taken out of it. The perfecting of its faculties in another scene would not give it experiences of a state in which it had never been.

Perfecting of experiences that we have had is, of course, another thing. This there will surely be: for we shall look back with eyes purged from the films of earth, and with memories that will themselves be perfected. But the knowledge will still be measured—finite, not infinite; and with limitations, whatever may be the enlargement of its scope.

If Christ then be the "meat that endureth unto everlasting life," and the manna so laid up must be manna gathered here, how important must this gathering of the manna be! Surely there can be no "meat that perisheth" to be compared with it; and one can no longer wonder at being called to seek it with proportionate earnestness.

Now it is Scripture that is to give us this knowledge of Christ, though of course there is in Christ more than can be justly spoken of as manna. This will not make Scripture of less importance to us surely. Christ it is that is the knowledge of the "new man," and Christ is "all" that knowledge. (Col. iii. 11.) God has "predestinated us to be conformed to the image of His Son, that He may be the First-born among many brethren." (Rom. viii. 29.) The "edifying of the body of Christ" also is "till we all come unto the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." (Eph. iv. 13.) We are now growing up to this; and for this it is that the word of God is given to us, not simply that we may be saved, or even live here a life of piety and good works, but to form in us the mind of Christ, that "we may grow up unto Him in all things." (ver. 15.) No wonder Scripture is as large, therefore, as it is: communion with God, though we talk quietly enough about it, yet if it be realized in the depth and fullness of its meaning, how immense a thing it is! Communion with God, realized in this way would be nothing less than sharing all His thoughts as He has revealed them to us; thoughts which have Christ as centre and circumference; for "all things were created by Him and for Him." (Col. i. 16.)

Here then is what we are called to enter into: here is a field to be worked which will call for all our faculties in all their energy to be engaged with. God does not tell us that it is easy work: how could it be? delightful work it is, and that increases all the energy that it demands. But it requires that we yield ourselves unreservedly to it, subordinating everything else to God's great purpose with regard to us. Christ must come to fill the whole range of our vision; but, so filling, to enlarge and rectify and illumine it with divine glory.

Here the nature of man finds what it craves, and expands in all parts and in equal proportions. Mind, heart and conscience develop together. Scripture, while it makes men of might, produces no monsters: no men of intellect without heart; no conscience urging one to self-devised torment; and yet no self-complacent egotism either: "I live, not I," says one who is without question a competent witness to us; "but Christ liveth in me." (Gal. ii. 20.)

This is not simply doctrine, nor even faith in a doctrine. A glorious truth underlies it, but this is more; it is the apprehension of the truth, and the experience which flows from it. He who spoke this had accepted what Christ had done for him, the death in which he himself for faith had died, and which enabled him to turn away from himself, the man down here, to the One with whom he was now identified before God, and with whom he had in the joy of his heart accepted identification.

His old life had ended therefore: he was now a man in Christ; though realizing that there was still upon earth a "self" in which he could not glory, save in the infirmity which made him conscious of the need, —a need continually met as realized,—"that the power of Christ should rest upon" him. (2 Cor. xii. 5, 9.) This for the pursuit of Christ's interests on earth to whom he belonged, while, beholding Him above, he was "changed into His image" (chap. iii. 18.)

I believe that a most false and limited idea of the design of Scripture is shutting masses of Christian people out of the very desire to possess themselves of what our gracious God has given them in it. It is a book larger by far than they have any use for. To find salvation and to live a good life on earth, these are the ends they have before them, and which they suppose to be all that God has in His mind for them. But for these ends, I say again, Scripture is too large; I may say boldly, it is very much too large. Did they think that they had any particular responsibility about it, they would perhaps even be distressed to know what to do with it all. As it is they read it more or less, perhaps conscientiously all through, but with a languid interest in much of it at best, and with a wonder which they scarcely like to admit, why it should have been written.

Of searching it for themselves, save certain parts, they know very little. They get light here and there upon it through others, and read books, if they are not too deep. They have really no thought that what God means by it all is to form in them the mind of Christ—to give them fellowship with Himself—to train them for co-heirship with His Son; and that all this means not a little need of teaching, not a little exercise, as well as the disciplinary dealings of His hand by the way;—"exercised to discern both good and evil,—"suffering that they may reign with Him."

To accomplish this the word of God is not too large; though that of course, does not imply but that it will always be beyond us. It is plain that He means us to be busy with it,—would not let us off thinking,—would not leave any vacuity with us for the thorn and thistle-seed always floating in the air, to plant themselves in and spring up. To His people of old He spoke earnestly about this: "And these commandments that I command thee to-day shall be in thy heart; and thou shalt teach them diligently to thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thy house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt bind them as a sign upon thy hands, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes; and thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house and upon thy gates" (Deut. vi. 6–9). All this implies a constant keeping the words of God before themselves and others, constant confession of them and meditation upon them. And how thoroughly a saint of old could respond to this, the delight he could have in it, and the fruit he could find, the 119th Psalm alone is sufficient to assure. Is it to be supposed that God would have us less fully occupied or give us less joy or profit from the occupation?

The whole heart also, if it be this we bring to it, needs the whole Word. How could it do less than this, if only because God has given it? Has He misjudged our need, or put upon us useless labor? Certainly He does not mean to have it drudgery for us, nor does He give us mere chaff to thresh out for the granary. If there be what may seem strange to be from Him, would He not have us inquire the more because of its strangeness? If we seem sometimes to be laying up useless store, we should find, if we keep it long enough, occasion for it. We have (if we are Christians) the Spirit of God as our Teacher; and He, let us remember, "searcheth the deep things of God." (1 Cor. ii. 10). If the heart is only enough engaged, and the throne of grace is yet accessible, we need not despair of learning because things are "deep."

I have found too that one of the most fruitful causes of not understanding or *mis*understanding a portion of Scripture is just the lack, as the man of science would say, of a perfect induction. That is to say, something—perhaps obvious enough—has escaped me. It was there, but I was too careless, too much in a hurry,—perhaps too doubtful of being able to find any meaning—actually to find it. The key too may be some distance off, and in a part I have not read or remembered. Hence the necessity of storing the mind with Scripture. It is all valuable—too valuable yet perhaps, for me to appreciate, just as a savage might have no use for a sewing-machine. Let us be assured that in Scripture there is nothing barren or unprofitable anywhere.

The whole Word, then; and all to be honestly thought upon and sought into. But even so, we have not got all the riches God designs for us. There is the great book of Nature, wide open, and inviting us by its appeal to all our senses. Here again, if we have minds that work, we shall find what will give them full activity. "Too much," perhaps, you may say; "there is no end to it." No, truly: no end to all God's wonders, nor to the riches He has spread around us.

But here, also, is a field which has been much worked of late in man's interests, and he is very proud of what he has done in it. It has for the most part to do with a world which has been put under the dominion of man, as meant for his use, and he has only lately begun to find how rich is his inheritance.

But God has taken care, also, that this world with which man has so much to do should be full of witness to His power who is above him, as well as the love that has strewn this munificence around him: a witness he can never lose, never escape. It shines upon him from the lights of the spangled sky above him; it breathes in the whisper of the gentle breeze around, which before night may have increased to a hurricane; the various voices of the day and night preach it in melody and in dissonance: and everywhere man has acknowledged this witness to be divine, and worshiped.

Scripture has brought nigh God and perfected this witness. In the mirror of Nature every spiritual truth has its reflection; and these images appear throughout Scripture and become the familiar language in which its doctrines are conveyed. In the New Testament the Creator Himself is declared to be the Word—thus the Revealer—of God, and creation therefore by implication to be a revelation. God's witness is twofold; and on the face of heaven and earth Scripture again is written out in incorruptible signs that may be appealed to. Not in vain, surely, has God done this: He can still "call to the heavens and to the earth that He may judge His people" (Ps. l. 4.); and rebuke the unbelief which uplifts itself against Him in the very face of such tokens.

Now, if Christ be indeed the One by whom and for whom all things were created, it is only the one to whom Christ has become what we see He was with the apostle, who can be at the centre of any branch of knowledge. All roads must lead to Him. The spiritual must everywhere underlie the natural, give meaning to it, make it really what it is meant to be, clothe it with the power that should belong to it. No science but must run into theology. All the analogies of nature become but witnesses of this inner reality, without the knowledge of which the savant and scientist becomes indeed but a pitiful agnostic; all his utterances but broken fragments of sentences,—the stammerings of infirmity and impotence itself.

And if this be true, what must be the value of Scripture, what must be its comprehensiveness? what field of knowledge will you shut off from it? what shall we think, for instance, of the so readily accepted dictum, that Scripture was not intended to teach science? and which is meant—not to assert of it that it is infinitely beyond a mere primer or text-book of science, but—to rule it out as incompetent in this sphere, as without help or authority as regards the visible, and to relegate it to the sphere of the invisible alone.

The effect is that as to the immensity of nature round us we may think what thoughts we please, unhindered by anything in Scripture. Guesses we may have, and theories, and "working hypotheses" ad libitum, which even palpable self-contradictions shall not destroy,* and they must not be even limited by any intrusion of the divine. Thus practically we get a world—yea, a universe as far as man has explored it—Christless, if not godless; to which Scripture, with its old-time child-notions of miracles and a God nigh at hand, is in plain opposition.

Take the common theory of evolution in proof of this. It has been lately said of it that "Whatever differences of opinion as to this theory may still exist, few naturalists can feel reluctant to acquiesce in Wallace's statement that 'Darwin did his work so well that descent with modification is now universally accepted as the order of nature in the organic world.'"†

Now, if this be so, open your Bibles at the second chapter of Genesis, and ask yourself how on the principle of "descent with modification" Eve could have have been by any possibility evolved out of Adam! That is evidently not in the order of nature: it is the exact opposite of it; it is miracle and nothing else. Apply to it the slow successive changes demanded by Darwinism, and the absurdity is heightened at every step; but the absurdity is there at the beginning in the male producing

* See as to Ether and the Wave-Theory of Light, Prof. J. P. Cooke's "Credentials of Science the Warrant of Faith," pp. 223, seq.

† Prof. Calderwood: "Evolution and Man's Place in Nature," p. 1.

the female for the continuance of the race. It is not even the poetry some have claimed for it. It is simply absurdity, or miracle and divine truth.

Let us take our stand then with Scripture, or give it up: compromise is impossible. If the account of creation is not true, Scripture opens with falsehood in its face. It asserts knowledge of what only revelation could make known; or else gives conjecture, and then how much else of the same sort follows it, who shall say?

In fact the history has been amply safe-guarded. I venture to say that the proofs of divine inspiration in it can challenge the world to refute them; and thank God, the evidence is of a sort as accessible to the non-scientific as to the scientific mind. If it can be shown that according to the Genesis account the story of the restoration of the earth out of its "waste and desolate" condition is but the symbolic picture of the restoration of the same earth morally to God, as history and prophecy combine to picture it;—a picture also of the restoration of an individual soul to God, but in terms which we have to go to the New Testament to make clear to us;—if we can show a numerical symbolism running through the whole, uniting the physical, dispensational and individual aspects of the history together, and uniting itself to a symbolic numerical structure running through other parts of Scripture;—then assuredly we have a threefold cord which shall not be broken, binding it into a wondrous whole which can only be from God. This has been already done in measure,* but deserves to be done in a much more thorough and painstaking way. The whole is a many-linked proof of the underlying of the natural by the spiritual of which I have already spoken, and of which every parable in Scripture speaks, to which every one of those analogies of which we all so confidently and as it were instinctively avail ourselves, bears witness.

This analogy, if it be real,can be used also in another and a reverse way from that in which we usually employ it: a fact which deserves the most attentive consideration. If the spiritual and the natural run thus in parallel lines, why should we not trace the natural by means of the spiritual, as well as the spiritual by means of the natural? Take, for instance, once more, the first chapter of Genesis. If it be indeed a picture of either the soul or the world being restored to God, then we cannot possibly miss what is here so plain, that this restoration implies a fall having taken place, which the waste and desolate condition of the earth, darkness upon the face of the deep, so strikingly symbolizes. May we not see in it, then, physically, a lapsed condition of the earth, the effect of some cataclysmic overthrow, instead of the condition in which it was originally created, as many believe? This can be proved, I am sure, otherwise; but that therefore proves that such a conclusion would, in this case, lead us aright. Would it not in every case in which the grounds of the conclusion were as plain as this?

* See "Genesis in the Light of the New Testament;" "Numerical Bible," vol. i. notes; and the last "Appendix."

But if so, again how valuable must Scripture be for the knowledge of Nature! It should be in every way the firm ground of the naturalist, and induction be here as reliable as that directly from nature; the microscope also being as great a revealer in one case as in the other. Ah, how little patient, believing work has been done in this direction with regard to Scripture: a neglect which has shut us out so much from the light it could have given, just in the very matters hidden from the mere man of science. The beginnings of things and their points of connection with the unseen, are things largely thus hidden: how good would it be to have all the light that Scripture can give thrown into those dark inmost recesses of the constitution of things. What a thing it would be to have a faithful company of devout explorers giving themselves to explore nature with the light of Scripture, and Scripture also, one may reverently say, in the light of nature. For both are God's books and both alike truthful, and Christ the theme of and the key to both.

"The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof." In every corner of it He is to be found; upon every part of it His Name stands written. Oh for the students that shall make His glorious sanctuary their college, and see in nature that which only the anointed eye can see, and hear the worship of the things we call inanimate, but through which the Life of life is pulsating everywhere.

If we desire this, we must bring the word and the work of God together in a way that yet, it seems to me, we nowhere see. It seems almost as if we had here believed that we had the incompatible service of two masters, to one of which whosoever clings will despise the other. And so it will be until we discern that the Master is in fact only One, not two at all. And when Christ reigns over the whole of science—over all that is worthy to be called knowledge,—then we shall have an education in which heart, mind, and moral nature, shall find equal and true development; and in the heart and mind of those so taught there shall be no distraction between secular and sacred, no divided life from one half of which God is banished; but for these "there shall be," as the prophet says, "One Lord over all the earth; in that day there shall be One Lord, and His Name One."

APPENDIX V

CHRIST IN THE BOOK OF PSALMS

THE Lord's own words to His disciples assure us of "things written in the Psalms concerning" Him. (Luke xxiv. 44.) In the New Testament sixteen psalms are quoted as referring to Him;* and there is nothing to show us that this is the whole number, although all the fundamental ones are doubtless in this list. Outside of it, the Rabbinic writers, though blind to Christ, rightly emphasize the twenty-first and seventy-second psalms also as Messianic;† and the twentieth psalm can hardly be separated from the twenty-first. The tendency with some Christian writers has been to see Christ almost everywhere in them, while naturally the drift of the so-called "higher criticism" is all the other way: the effort to imagine the circumstances under which they were written, as well as the intention of the writers, necessarily leading them away from the divine intention, which is all-important. And when it can be boldly questioned, as by Cheyne, whether David was the writer of any of them, the apostle's comment, "he being a prophet . . . spake of . . . Christ (Acts ii. 30, 31) may be dismissed, as "contemporary Jewish exegesis," from all consideration.

It is only the knowledge of the structure of the book of Psalms as a whole that can show us how fully in place the Messianic psalms are, and define clearly their limits. They will then be seen in clear relation to those surrounding them, and in fact as the life-centre of the whole. As long as the individual psalms are looked at as in no particular order or relation to one another, or the order a merely artificial one, so long, of course, it will be possible to find a Messianic psalm in any position whatever in the book. The divisions and their meaning once ascertained, each psalm will be found to have its place, from which it could not be removed without a gap resulting. The numerical structure is everywhere also a test and confirmation of the reality of this. My purpose now is very briefly to trace the connection of these Messianic psalms, both among themselves and with those in the midst of which they are,—certainly not scattered at random, nor without divine meaning in these connections.

* Ps. ii. viii. xvi. xviii. xxii. xl. xli. xlv. lxviii. lxix. xci. xcvii. cii. cix. cx. cxviii.

† The list given by Edersheim in his ninth Appendix to "The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah," contains five psalms accepted throughout as Messianic: Ps. ii. xxi. xlv. lxxii. and cx., and seven others partially so, xviii. xxii. xl. lxi. lxviii. lxxxix. xcii. Other psalms are contained in the list, but not as having personal reference to Messiah.

The first book, as we have seen, is the largest in scope, and necessarily the introduction to all the rest. Its theme is in fact mainly Christ Himself, and that as the Source of blessing to His people. This people is Israel; and we must not forget this, which, so far from depriving us of our portion, only reminds us continually of the larger character of this, as "blessed with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ." (Eph. i. 3.) There cannot therefore be a spiritual blessing from which we are shut out; while their being ours in heavenly places lifts us into the sphere to which Christ Himself belongs, and where we possess a relationship to Him of which the Psalms know nothing.

But our intelligence as to Scripture depends upon our taking it as it is written, and our spiritual profit also largely upon our distinguishing things that differ, that both we may have what is our own unmixed, and that Christ also may be seen in all His glories, and in connection with all the interests which are His. And these we must learn, not from any preconceptions of our own about them, but patiently and humbly as led of Scripture. God's thoughts are not as our thoughts, but deeper and higher every way.

In the first book there are three subdivisions, of which the first and third alike speak of Christ; while the second shows us rather the circumstances of the latter days, to which we find ourselves in the Psalms so constantly carried forward. The first subdivision (Ps. i–viii) speaks of Christ's dominion, King in Zion (Ps. ii), and Son of Man, the creation put under Him (Ps. viii). The first is His open claim, though resisted by man. The second is a secret told into the ear of faith alone.

The King! that is the first and last thought in the Psalms, whatever else may grow up around and unite itself to this: a King with power, although long patience may be exercised before it is put forth. Power: for not only is God for Him, but He is Son of God. Thus it is in the right hands; out of which it will never slip and never can be forced; and being divine power, it is a revelation. How long the world has been waiting wearily for this, without knowing for what it waited; nay, rejecting Him when He came in fulfillment of this very prophecy, to claim His right.

The King! because obedience is the very thing from which man has broken away, and to which he must return in order to blessing. Thus the very first psalm is the psalm of obedience, while in the second is the One to whom it must be rendered; who as the Son of God is the Revealer of God; faith in whom turns back the heart to Him, and finds the blessing. We see why, then, it should be the first thought of Christ in the Psalms that He is King:—the proclamation of the King.

That this is not all, when the heart turns back to its allegiance, the psalms, that follow (iii.–vii) are proof enough. The remnant of true followers, amid the mass of those that reject Him, learn in the very trials that ensue from their true-heartedness the need of mercy because of sin; from whence but a little, and a new figure rises before them, not now of the Son of God, though with links of unmistakable connection with Him. It is now of a Son of man in whom both God is glorified and the dominion of man is restored; while along with this, there are thoughts of humiliation and the mysterious joy of a trodden wine-press,—intimations of fruitful suffering, by and by to be more at large declared.

The meaning here Israel as yet has not recognized, and will not until the day that they look upon Him whom they have pierced. But, united with the first picture—the Son of God joined to the Son of man—we have emphasized the two parts of a wondrous whole, in which a glory of God is manifested above the heavens, as His name is declared by it in all the earth: to us at least a clear outlining of what is to be filled up in the psalms that follow,—an inscription on the door of the temple of praise to Messiah's Name.

To this the second subdivision has nothing that I am aware to add. But with the third we come at once to the heart of our subject. Here we have Christ before us, not simply in His glory, but also in the path of suffering leading up to it, and in which we learn His perfection and the fullness of His grace toward us also. We find Him identifying Himself with His people, making their cause His own, and the consequences of this in the unequalled sorrow of the Cross; but as that in which the Son of man was glorified, and God was glorified in Him. His inmost heart is seen: we learn to know Him as we know no other, and are made His doubly, redeemed by His blood, and won by the perfection we have found in Him.

First of all in the sixteenth psalm, we see Him as a pilgrim on the way; as a servant also for the need of His people. His heart is with the saints; and the obedience, so new a thing for Him to render, is not to avail for Himself to spare Him one drop of the cup of sorrow He is to drink for others: it is an obedience by which they are to be made righteous. On the other hand, and none the less on this account, God is His all, "the measure of His portion, and of His cup;" and we find Him guided by His counsel, and maintained by Him in human weakness, perfect Leader in a path of faith in which we are to follow Him. We see Him in it, down to death itself through which the "path of life" passes on up to the presence of God, whence the light also shines for us by the way which He has gone.

In the next psalm (xvii) we find Him, spite—nay, because of all that He is, the object of the hatred of the men of the world, and His pleading against this which, though made as in His own behalf, we find to be intercession for others, with whom He identifies Himself.

In the eighteenth, we have the answer of God to Him, which lifts Him into the place of power. Delivered from the strivings of the people, He is made the head of the nations. Here, of course, we are brought evidently to the latter days. Judgment has its course upon earth, the rod of power being in the hands of the rejected One, and long-suffering patience no longer holding back what is needed for the deliverance of His people and the blessing of the earth at large. For in result He praises among the nations, as the anointed King of all the earth. This is the close of the first series; and these psalms are all subjective—the utterances of the Messiah Himself.

In the next three, on the contrary, we have the utterances of faith as to Him, and thus the nineteenth psalm is accounted for as coming where it does in this series: creation and the law being now seen by it as the introduction to Christ. Thus the glory of the sun is dwelt upon—the typical picture of the Lord from the beginning of Genesis; and then the law is seen in its effects, by its own perfection convicting the soul of sin, beyond even the knowledge of the one who as the servant of the Lord seeks to be admonished by it. This prepares, as is evident, the way for sacrifice; but it is not to the sacrifices of the law that we now turn. No: the next psalm does indeed speak of sacrifice; but it is Another that offers it, and that other the King Himself. In His salvation His people shall rejoice, for it is the Name of the God of Jacob that is declared in it: as we should say, the God of Grace. The whole psalm is a prophecy of Christ and of His work, though in relation (as all through) with Israel, and the following psalm speaks of Him in His glory.

These are but hints of what atonement is. In the third series, however, it is fully declared with its blessed effects; and the twenty-second psalm returns once more from the objective to the subjective: no voice but His own can declare to us worthily the inmost heart of it.

The link with the day of atonement is shown in the third verse. The sufferer is undergoing what no righteous man ever did beside. A martyr for God, He is forsaken of God. And why? He answers His own question: it is because He who is the Holy One would dwell amid the praises of His people; and this was what (typically and governmentally only,) the blood of the sin-offering accomplished on the day of atonement. Here we see, then, the reality of what that sin-offering meant, and all other sufferings are as nothing compared with this. But the latter part of the psalm shows the glorious results in blessings welling out in wider and wider circles to the ends of the earth. The name of God is newly declared to those in new relationship to Him who has accomplished the wondrous work, and His righteousness is declared in it to generations following.

The sin-offering psalm gives character in a certain way to all the remaining psalms of this first book. The twenty-third psalm shows us now the great Shepherd of the sheep brought again from the dead, and the pleasant pastures in which He leads His flock. The twenty-fourth, Jehovah's house established on the earth, and the people who enter it. Jehovah Himself enters it as King of glory to take His place among His ransomed ones.

This ends the nine psalms which are characteristically Messianic, and the fifteen psalms following are "remnant" psalms, or such as show us the exercises and experiences of the faithful in Israel, the background being circumstances of the latter days. But the apprehension of divine grace enters into them in a different manner from anything before. Sin is confessed, and God for His name's sake forgives as promptly as the confession is made. The twenty-fifth and thirty-second psalms are especially characteristic, and have much of the New Testament style, if they do not reach its standard. After these the first book closes with two psalms (xl. and xli), both of which speak once more of atonement, though in a different manner from before.

The fortieth psalm is the burnt-offering aspect of the cross, the Lord seen as come to do the will of God, His law (which man has continually broken) in His heart, and its provision of sacrifice realized as written of Him. The awful burden of sin is experienced; but not the forsaking of God endured.

It is striking that this comes at the end, as if it were almost an appendix to the book, and does not seem to be the basis of other experience psalms, as does the sin-offering psalm (xxii.). In fact, is not the value of the burnt-offering that which rather belongs to Christianity, though not altogether lacking in Israel's blessing? At any rate, there must be a reason for the supplementary place here occupied by the burnt-offering psalm.

The forty-first, as the closing psalm of the book, depicts the cross as the stumbling-block to unbelief, while faith, penetrating the disguise assumed by love in this "poor man's" humiliation, finds blessing from Jehovah: a natural and solemn admonition at the close of the book. Thus we see throughout how the Messianic psalms govern it, and that it has a fullness and completeness of its own in this respect, no main feature being altogether omitted, though some may be more fully developed elsewhere.

The second book is more limited in scope and more external in character. Though redemption be a leading feature of it, it is more a redemption by power than by purchase, and seen rather in its effects for man therefore, than from the divine side of what sin is before God. The sixty-ninth is its psalm of atonement, and presents the trespass-offering side of it. But here again Christianity had to bring out the full character of this, and the "fifth part more" of the trespass-offering cannot be as yet developed. The Kingship of Christ is, of course, the prominent feature in the psalm which speaks of Him.

The structure resembles that of the first book, the Messianic psalms being found in the first and third subdivisions, the second being devoted to psalms of experience, which are not however, excluded from the other parts.

The first subdivision opens with the cry of the remnant in their distress, in answer to which in the forty-fifth psalm we have the glorious picture of Christ as King. Still more plainly than in the second psalm, God and man meet in Him; and for the first time, and the only one in the Psalms, He is seen as Israel's Bridegroom. His rule is righteous and eternal: all enemies are put down, and the nations worship. This is the only view of Christ in the first part.

The second gives the circumstances of the last days, the rule of Antichrist and not Christ, and then the exercises of the people, looking on toward deliverance. The third closes the book with a series of psalms which put before us Christ as the Restorer of the nation: first, as the King of Israel, taking up their cause as their Representative before God to bring them to blessing; and then in His work on the cross as involved in this.

In the first series, the sixty-first psalm shows us the King's vows as heard by God, and the possession of those that fear God's name given to Him in consequence. He sojourns in the Tent which God had pitched among men, and dwells there as King in the presence of God forever, the eternal link between God and man.

The sixty-second psalm has in it no clear evidence of Messianic character, except its place in this series between two psalms of the King. As the experience of the Leader and Finisher of faith it is, however, perfectly suited; being the utter rejection of all other dependences than God Himself. And after this the sixty-third psalm breathes after God as seen in the sanctuary, whose loving-kindness is better than life. Thus the soul follows hard after Him, while its enemies drop off and are destroyed. The next psalm is but a lament over the folly and wickedness of man; but the sixty-fifth with its single and plural voices points to the settlement of the deeper question of how the iniquities of those for whom their Head has undertaken are purged away, and through the Chosen One of God now dwelling in the Sanctuary, they too are satisfied with the goodness of God's house established in their midst. The blessing following runs through two more psalms; then in the sixty-eighth there bursts out a strain of glory and triumph, in which God is celebrated under all His Names, which have all been illustrated and endeared to them through Him who has gone up on high, leading captivity captive, and receiving gifts for men: yea, (they acknowledge in humble gratitude) even for the rebellious, that Jah Elohim, might dwell among them. Now the dove's wings are over them, the beauty of Christ is seen upon them; and under the leadership of their glorious and divine King, Israel's tribes throng up to the sanctuary. Thus the first series of psalms ends.

The second bases the blessing on the sacrifice of Christ—on atonement, which here, in connection with Israel's restoration has its restitutive aspect, as in the trespass-offering. As the result of this, in the seventy-first psalm Israel is seen reviving, taking hold of Jehovah's strength alone, and making mention only of Jehovah's righteousness. While in the seventy-second psalm the whole earth comes under the rule of the Saviour-King, who is seen in character as a true Melchizedek. Thus the salvation-book of the Psalms is completed. That it is Jewish and in sphere earthly is plain, and may be a disappointment to us; but we may be sure that inspiration has made no mistake: the limits of the law are too narrow to contain the fullness of the Christian gospel, and the divine side of the work of Christ has been more fully expressed already in the opening book. The essential outlines are, of course, preserved.

The theme of the third book, as we know, is holiness. Much briefer than either of the preceding, the Messianic psalms are in the same proportion, while they are also much fainter sketches of the commanding figure for which we are looking.

Very much as in the first subdivision of the second book, the first appearance of Christ here is in answer to the cry of distress on the part of the people. The earth and all its inhabitants are dissolved, but at the appointed time for which He has been waiting, He sets up the pillars of the earth once more. It has been dissolved by its corruption: He establishes it by just judgment carried out. He is the divine Interpreter, and with God alone it is to abase or to exalt. For this, however, that any may be exalted, grace must come in, and not merely judgment. Grace is His delight, judgment His strange work: and so we find here. "I will psalm," He says "unto the God of Jacob: the God of Jacob is the God of grace. All this is in character with the third book.

In the eightieth psalm, which is again the third psalm of a second section of the same division, there is just an appeal to God to act in their behalf through Messiah, "the Man of Thy right hand, the Son of man whom Thou madest strong for Thyself." Here they have found the secret of blessing, and the next psalm shows the light of divine favor beginning to shine upon them.

The cry of the eighty-fourth psalm is quite similar to this: "Behold, O God our shield, and look upon the face of Thine Anointed;" and in the next psalm we find all the attributes of God united in the salvation of His people. While in the next two psalms, but more mysteriously, we have Christ in the form of a Servant, owned, in the last, by God and by His people: all their fresh springs found in Him.

But one other psalm in this book speaks of Christ,—the eighty-ninth, —in which He is seen as the One contemplated in the covenant with David. Here we have typical prophecy, and again the King, though to be made of God His first-born, supreme as to the kings of the earth.

The fourth book has two psalms of special importance, and is remarkable for the development of its blessed theme. It begins with a psalm of Moses, a lament over the generation dying in the wilderness, which is but a typical example of man's doom as man. The reason of it is, he has lost the knowledge of God, who has always been a habitation for men, but men have turned their backs upon Him. Of this departure from Him death is the universal witness. With God is the fountain of life; turning from Him, man has accepted death as His portion, but which as an admonition God would have him lay to heart.

But he cannot find the way back: first, man is helpless to recover himself. The second psalm of the book (the ninety-first) introduces us, therefore, to the Second Man.

Here is One who has never wandered. He has "made Jehovah, even the Most High, His habitation," and He can claim, therefore, all the consequences of this. Dwelling in His secret place—secret, alas, now to man at large—He abides therefore under the shadow of the Almighty. Plague and pestilence pass by Him harmless; the young lion and serpent He can trample under foot. The angels have Him in charge, lest He should dash His foot against a stone. Here is a Man, in short, with whom (as in the next psalm) earth can enjoy once more a Sabbath-rest; and the world be established on immovable foundations. (Ps. xciii. 2.)

But this shows no title as yet for the failed children of the first man; and though there are assurances given as to the righteous, that leaves, as we know, Job's question unanswered. Meanwhile Jehovah's kingdom is seen as coming, then as come, and the second subdivision ends amid the praises of the whole earth (Ps. c.); and still this vital question remains unanswered.

With the third subdivision again a Messianic psalm appears, the old refrain, sounding through the whole book, of a King of righteousness. The King after Jehovah's heart is come; and we readily connect Him with the Second Man of the ninety-first psalm: He is King of Israel now; and when we go on to the 102d, Israel's time has come for blessing, and Zion's to be built up once more: the throne is ready for the King, but in this psalm where is the King?

The voice here is of One not in power but in weakness—in extreme distress. Nay, Jehovah's hand is upon Him and in wrath: He is dying, His days shortened, and He contrasts these shortened years with God's eternity in His cry to Him. Is this the King of Israel? Nay, is this the glorious Man who has the secret of life and of enduring blessing?

The answer is an amazing one, and it is God Himself who gives it. He is not only King of Israel: He is not only the Second Man, over whom death has no title: He is God Himself; He is Creator of heaven and earth; He is the deathless One, the fountain of Life Himself. "The Second Man is the Lord from heaven;" and in the sacrifice which is here accomplished, divine-human arms hold us fast to God.

Although the fifth book is the longest of the whole five, there are but six psalms that are Messianic; and this is to be accounted for, no doubt, by its deuteronomic, governmental character.

The 109th and 110th go together as the divine ways with the Perfect Man. They are complete contrasts: the first being One who for His love finds only hatred; until love itself can only pronounce the doom of its rejectors. The 110th is that which speaks directly of His Melchizedek Priesthood. He is exalted to God's right hand, and waiting for His enemies to be made His footstool, and for an obedient people to be made willing in the day of His power. Here the principle in divine government is contained in the last verse, though not apart from the psalm before it. The path of humiliation and suffering has ever been the way ordained of God to lead to glory, a principle which our Lord distinctly enunciated for His disciples, as He accepted it for Himself, drank only of the brook in the way—took but the refreshment provided of God in the common way of faith and patience in which He led His followers. His trials have enabled Him to be the true Priest, the sympathetic Intercessor that His people crave, as well as the truly human King, the succorer of the needy.

The 118th psalm shows us the Stone which the builders rejected becoming the Head of the Corner: and here His humiliation is nevertheless the stumbling-stone to men: the Stone was low enough for them to stumble over, and yet thus for the foundation-stone upon which faith builds, and the temple to God's praise alone can stand.

Among the "songs of degrees," three short psalms alone remain. The first (Ps. 132d) turns upon the history of David and the house of God, and David is here plainly a type of a higher King. The promise as to his house is connected with that as regards Zion and the dwelling-place of God in it.

In the next psalm we have not David but Aaron, and the unity of brotherhood in Israel at last established among her jarring tribes: a spiritual unity now produced by the Spirit out-poured upon the head of her true High-priest, of whom it is here implied that Aaron was but a figure. In these two psalms, therefore, the Melchizedek Priest-King is again before us; and the following brief psalm gives us the blessing of God by man and of man by God which is the glorious work of the true Melchizedek.

Brief as this outline of the Messianic psalms is, it is surely enough to show the divine order in which they are arranged, and the fullness of the presentation of Christ which is found in them. His peculiar relation to us, of course, will not be found. Throughout the Old Testament times it was a "mystery hid in God." (Eph. iii. 4–9.)

DATE DUE

GAYLORD

PRINTED IN U.S.A.

BS491 .G761 v.3
The numerical Bible. : being a revised Princeton Theological Seminary-Speer Library
1 1012 00057 5672

THE NUMERICAL BIBLE

BEING

A REVISED TRANSLATION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES WITH EXPOSITORY NOTES:

ARRANGED, DIVIDED, AND BRIEFLY CHARACTERIZED

ACCORDING TO THE PRINCIPLES OF THEIR

NUMERICAL STRUCTURE

EZEKIEL

The Text of the whole book and the Notes on Chaps. 1 to 37
by the late F. W. Grant.

Notes on Chaps. 38 to 48, with a Historical Chart of the Prophets, Plans illustrating the Temple, and the Future Division of the Land, by J. Bloore.

NEW YORK
LOIZEAUX BROTHERS, BIBLE TRUTH DEPOT
19 WEST 21st STREET

[PRINTED IN U.S.A.]

ORDER AND DIVISIONS OF THE BOOKS

THE OLD TESTAMENT

1. The Books of the Law:—
   1. Genesis.
   2. Exodus.
   3. Leviticus.
   4. Numbers.
   5. Deuteronomy.

2. The Covenant-History:—
   1. Joshua.
   2. Judges.
      Ruth.
   3. Kings:—
      First Book (Samuel).
      Second Book (Kings).
   4. Captivity-Books:—
      Ezra.
      Nehemiah.
      Esther.
   5. Chronicles.

3. The Prophets:—
   1. Isaiah.
   2. Jeremiah.
      Lamentations.
   3. Ezekiel.
   4. Daniel.
   5. The Book of Minor Prophets:—
      1. Hosea. Amos. Micah.
      2. Joel. Obadiah. Jonah.
      3. Nahum. Habakkuk. Zephaniah.
      4. Haggai. Zechariah. Malachi.

4. The Psalm-Books:—
   1. The Psalms.
   2. Job.
   3. Solomon's Song.
   4. Ecclesiastes.
   5. Proverbs.

THE NEW TESTAMENT

1. The Gospels:—
   1. Matthew. Mark. Luke.
   2. John.

2. The Acts.

3. The Pauline Epistles:—
   1. Romans. Galatians. Ephesians. Colossians. Philemon. Philippians.
   2. Thessalonians. First Epistle. Second Epistle. Corinthians. First Epistle. Second Epistle. Hebrews. Timothy. First Epistle. Second Epistle. Titus.

4. The Catholic Epistles:—
   1. Peter.
      First Epistle
      Second Epistle.
   2. James.
   3. John.
      First Epistle.
      Second Epistle.
      Third Epistle.
   4. Jude.

5. Revelation.

PREFACE

After many years Ezekiel has at last been printed. The yellowed pages of the MS. have passed through many hands; much labor and prayer have been spent on them; many eyes have pored over them — besides the author, those of Mr. Ridout, P. J. L., T. O. L., and others engaged in the typing, composition and proof-reading. Most have now entered into that presence of which Ezekiel's closing sentence speaks: "The name of the city from that day shall be, The Lord is there." Their work is left to His hands to bless.

This book was F. W. G.'s last labor, showing as Mr. Ridout has said, no less brilliant work than his previous volumes. He completed the text, but in compiling his Notes laid down his pen at the 38th chapter, at the threshold of the city which he longed to enter. From that point Mr. Bloore has ably taken up the Notes,which point out the great lesson which the temple and the holy city with their precise measurements are intended to impress upon the people of God: "Show the house, that they may be ashamed of their iniquities; and let them measure the pattern." It brings to a focus the continued repetition through the prophecy to each nation of the purpose of God's dealings with them: "They shall know that I am the Lord."

We confess to a first feeling of disappointment when we came to the Notes on the last sentence of the book, expecting an elaboration of all that could be said of that wonderful closing. But it was best to leave it in its grandeur and beauty—"Jehovah is there." The statement stands alone. The only thing that could be added is its New Testament correlative which widens out the blessing of that glorious presence beyond Israel, "And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them, and they shall be His people, and God Himself shall be with them, and be their God. And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away" (Rev. 21: 3, 4).

That years have passed since the Notes were written has not lessened their value, but rather added to it, for Ezekiel speaks of eternal and unchanging principles, and time has only brought us nearer to their full display. Since Mr. Grant laid down his pen momentous changes have taken place in the countries that once formed part of the old Roman Empire, and the stage is set for the fulfilment of Ezekiel's later prophecies, as Mr. Bloore has shown in his Notes on the land. We are living in days when History is rapidly being made, days when events are occurring whose result is foretold in Ezekiel's prophecy, and which make such books as the present one so interesting to every student of Scripture. People desire to know the future; in the prophets it is unfolded for them, written by the Holy Spirit.

We place the pages of Ezekiel beside the History of the World and trace what has been fulfilled of the prophecies. Kingdoms and nations have passed away, leaving such memorials of the glory that has been that remind us most of their ruin, for they belong to man's day and his glory. Ezekiel directs our attention to this, for God's judgments fall upon the nations, and the glory of man is humbled to the dust. But another glory has filled the prophet's vision. His book opens with the description of "the brightness of the likeness of the glory of Jehovah;" he speaks of that glory departing from Israel, yet lingering as though loth to go; but the closing sentence of the book shows, "The glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof." This is the glory that abides, nevermore to be removed. —E. F.

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE NUMERALS

The reason for the significance must be sought in previous volumes, especially in Appendix II. to the Volume on the Psalms.

ONE.

Soleness, singularity, uniqueness; solitariness, barrenness.
Sufficiency, power, independency, pride, rebellion.
Identity, unchangeableness, consistency, perpetuity, truth, knowledge.

(UNITY.)

Unity, at-oneness, harmony, congruity, integrity, righteousness, obedience, concord, peace.

(PRIMACY.)

Supremacy, headship, rule; beginning, cause, occasion, source, foundation, ground, plea.

(COMBINATIONS OF MEANINGS.)

Life, personality, will. Choice, election. Grace.
God, Almighty, Eternal, Jehovah, Father.

TWO.

(RELATION.)

Help, support, confirmation, assurance, competent testimony.
Seconding, preservation, deliverance, salvation. Service, ministry.
Addition, increase, growth; progress, movement, activity.
Attachment, love, desire, prayer. Association, partnership, fellowship.

(SECOND.)

Dependence, faith. Inferiority, lowliness, humiliation, subjection.

(DIFFERENCE.)

Diversity, contrast; contradiction, opposition, conflict, enmity.
Double-mindedness, duplicity, deceit.

(DIVISION.)

Separation, analysis, differentiation, discernment; judgment, wisdom; sight.
Decay, death, dissolution.
Christ, Second Person, God and Man, Second Man, Word of God, Witness, Saviour, Servant, Minister. Cross. Soul. Woman.

THREE.

(THREE DIMENSIONS.)

Solidity; reality, realization, fulfilment, fulness; manifestation. Sanctuary; glory, praise. Name.

(THREE STRAIGHT LINES INCLOSE A SPACE.)

Setting apart for purpose; specialization, sanctification, holiness; transformation. Dwelling-place, possession, portion. Marriage. Ban.

(THIRD LINE OF A TRIANGLE RETURNS TO THE FIRST.)

Resurrection; return, revival, recovery; reproduction. Spirit.

FOUR.

Yieldingness, weakness; meekness, mercy. Failure, testing; experience; transitoriness, change.
Creature, earth, walk on earth, world.

FIVE.

God in government; capacity, responsibility, exercise, way and end; conditions.
Weak with the Strong; Man with God; Immanuel.

SIX.

Manifestation or fulness of evil. Work-day week; limit, discipline; mastery, overcoming.

SEVEN.

Completeness, perfection; rest.

EIGHT.

New in contrast with the Old

TEN.

Simply a 5 by 2.

TWELVE.

The manifest rule of God.

SCOPE AND DIVISIONS OF EZEKIEL.

EZEKIEL, as the third of the greater prophets, most evidently fills this place. His prophecy is as much related to Jeremiah on the one side as it is to Daniel on the other. Jeremiah sees the historical breaking of the link between God and His people—"Lo-ammi" written upon them; while Ezekiel is already among the captives, and enters in detail into the causes of the terrible breach.

The prophet's name, "the Mighty One makes strong" or "firm," is characteristic of the book, there being a manifest application of it at the outset, where God giving him his charge against a people "hard of brow and stiff of heart," declares that He has made his face hard against their faces, and his forehead hard against their foreheads. This implies not merely the strengthening necessary for his difficult position, but much more the attitude of Jehovah Himself towards them. The prophet with his message of wrath is indeed Ben-Buzi, "the child of my contempt," as God would declare with regard to him. They have treated Jehovah with the scorn which He must now needs recompense in judgment.

Thus also we have constantly throughout the book that characteristic expression, scarcely used elsewhere, "The hand of the Lord was upon me;" and again, "The hand of the Lord God fell upon me" (chap. viii. 1), and even, "The hand of the Lord was strong upon me," where the same Hebrew word chazaq is used (chap. iii. 14). Thus Jehovah abides, and His word abides, though it be now in judgment. "That ye may know that I am Jehovah," rings through almost every part, and this is a striking link with the book of Leviticus—the place of which Ezekiel occupies in the Pentateuch of the Prophets. In Leviticus we find appended again and again to the commandments there which enforce the holiness of their Deliverer, "I am Jehovah." Here His dealings with them affirm what He is as such, the Unchangeable, true to His own nature at all times, without the possibility of swerving from it. Thus with a people such as Israel have manifested themselves to be, judgment must have its course.

Judgment is therefore largely the theme here, though the end is grace. Sin has first to be manifested in order to be put away. Here again is an echo of Leviticus: it is the priest dealing with the leper. Ezekiel is emphasized for us as the priest-prophet, and the whole book is the expansion of the enjoined dealing with leprosy which Leviticus insists upon. Everything is in place here. It is in the presence of the glory of God that the condition is judged; and being plainly discovered, the glory leaves. The leper is thus put outside the camp. Yet this is not the end, for God "hateth putting away," and if He does this, it is but for a time, until His dealing is effectual in the souls of His people. This being found at the time of the end, the glory returns. It is noteworthy that it is the sanctuary in Israel which is seen to be defiled with the abominations of the people, and the book ends with the restored sanctuary and the divine wings brooding once more over the city, whose very name is now Jehovah-Shammah, "Jehovah is there."

Thus if there is judgment, it is the judgment of the priest: not only in necessary holiness, but the judgment of one who desires to justify, and not to judge. Ezekiel is thus all through the book the "son of man," a term by which only once elsewhere another prophet—Daniel—is addressed (Dan. viii. 17). Daniel is also the one who sees upon the throne of final empire, "One like unto a Son of man" (chap. vii. 13). Here also, how beautiful it is to see that on the heavenly throne is the "appearance of a man" (chap. i. 26). It is the Lord Himself who declares to us that the Father "hath given Him authority to execute judgment also, because He is the Son of man" (Jno. v. 27). It is by a Man that man is to be judged. It is by One who knows thoroughly all that pertains to man, who has been no stranger to a path of obedience amid all the conditions that have been brought in by the fall, in human weakness facing the full power of the enemy, bearing too the burden of sin, felt as none else could feel it, and drained the cup of wrath to its very dregs. Ezekiel is but the mere shadow of such an One in whose hands judgment is safe, and the divine pity shines all through it. Yet is the title divinely given to him, the assurance of a Heart that thus appeals to man's heart all the way through the long detail of that which has provoked a judgment inflicted only when even divine patience has reached its limit, and further delay could only be dishonor. These details are but the necessary vindication, before the eyes of His creatures, of Him who judges. Thus Ezekiel is the book of manifestation; but in which not man alone, but God also is manifested, and in the love at last to which He is then able to give way.

Judgment has however in Ezekiel a peculiar character. It is not upon the great final judgment (upon which the eyes of the other prophets are so fixed) that Ezekiel dwells; although at the close we do in measure find this; but a nearer one, executed by the hands of men—of Nebuchadnezzar as the main instrument of it—whether upon Israel or upon the surrounding nations. Nebuchadnezzar introduces us, as we know, to a new period, which it is the part of Daniel fully to bring before us, "the times of the Gentiles"—of Gentile supremacy over Israel—and which lasts during the whole time of God's indignation against her. In Ezekiel we have not this as yet, but the preliminary clearing of the field upon which the new world-empires are ready to display themselves. Thus the judgment is not simply upon Israel, although in the first place there: the nations round come under it, and Nebuchadnezzar for thus executing it is awarded compensation (chap. xxix. 18–20).

The nations so visited in judgment are those who have had largest opportunity to learn of God, as having been in nearest connection with Israel: that is, with the revelation of God, however the nation has failed in its own testimony. If, then, she is herself judged, the nations around must not exalt themselves against her. There must be clean work made of the surrounding people before the new beginning. This forms the second part of the book, the judgment being seen to come upon Ammon, Moab, Edom, Philistia, Tyre, Sidon, Egypt—seven nations; a complete survey of the field, beginning with the peoples kindred to Israel themselves, as Ammon, Moab and Edom; then the strangers in the land, Philistia, Tyre and Sidon; and then their old land of bondage, Egypt, out of which God delivered them in so signal a manner but which has been so long a snare to them in various ways. All these are related, though in different manner, to the chosen people. The view is complete, and its purpose obvious.

In the third part of the book, Israel is at last restored, and finally, to the favor of God. Theirs is a real resurrection, a revival out of a state of death, such that their very bones are dry and scattered abroad, impossible, as one would think, to come together again. Theirs is then a true resurrection, with the new life from God accordant with this, and the blessing for the earth which they are destined to be—have indeed already been, through God's overruling grace, in spite of themselves—but are yet to be with their whole hearts His, thankfully filling the place which grace has given them. With this we have, as the type of the general work, the healing of the curse, as seen in the streams which, issuing from the sanctuary, renew the sea of death itself.

The divisions of the book are therefore manifest:

In the 1st Div. (Chaps. i.–xxiv.) Israel's rebellion is brought into the presence of Jehovah's unchangeable righteousness. God Himself appears, as it were, to plead His cause against a rebellious people; and Israel is brought into the light of the awful Presence, every detail of her wanderings perfectly exposed.

Div. 2 (Chap. xxv.–xxxii.) gives the judgment at the same time upon the surrounding nations, the enemies of the people of God as such, while—

Div. 3 (Chaps. xxxiii.–xlviii.) gives the prophetic history of Israel's resurrection and restoration.

NOTES

How little can those who are away from God measure the distance they have gone from Him! Away from Him who is Light, and the only light, the soul is in necessary darkness. And even with one who has a memory of the light, there is a lack of responsive energy to overcome the oppression of the existing darkness. For this God Himself must come in, and this is one meaning of the opening vision. Even then we are reminded of the Lord's words that "to them that are without, all these things are done in parables." It is what they complained of in the prophet's speech (chap. xx. 49), and there was so much truth in this as to enable them to put away the conviction it should have forced upon them. The Lord's answer to a somewhat similar thought on the part of His disciples did not ignore the fact of the parabolic form, but asserted the competence they should have had to understand it: "Know ye not this parable?" He asks, "and how then will ye know all parables?" (Mk iv. 13). Yet He adds, "To you is it given to know;" which does not deny their responsibility, for God's gifts are not arbitrarily withheld, but casts us upon Himself for competence. It is good for us to realize all sides of truth like this when we take up Ezekiel. Though it be all of grace, yet we must remember that to see what Ezekiel saw we must be in some sense where Ezekiel was. Grace does not release from the conditions which holiness demands, but enables for them. Oh then that we might realize this vision as He who searcheth the deep things of God can give ability!

Subdivision 1.

The charge is given to the prophet, as we have seen, by Jehovah Himself, and in a marvelous revelation of Himself as the holy Governor of the world which He has made The awful solemnity of wills in opposition to such an One is here emphasized. The glory of Jehovah is revealed, though in terms necessarily symbolical, as in fact all visions of divine glory apart from "Christ come in flesh" must be. How blessed to have here the deepest revelation, in the sweet and tender speech of Him who has become Man in order to bring it to us! Yet, even in Ezekiel, as we have already seen, there is, as it were, "the appearance of a Man upon the throne." God is drawing near in a way which in many respects cannot fail to remind us of the vision of Patmos. Ezekiel himself is truly in Patmos—in a place of isolation in the midst of a world hostile to God; and here with the awful sorrow added of the just judgment of God upon a people in revolt from Him. All the more do we see here how all creation works in harmonious obedience to Him This is what the living creatures speak of; and not only they, but the cycles of earthly history, as represented by the wheels, show fully the same thing. All creation, all events, display His glory, and it is in the presence of such an One that Israel's sin must be brought in order to give it its full character Yet for the soul of the saint what comfort in such a revelation! No wonder that Ezekiel is strengthened by it to stand under the weight of his commission. How thus, in times of greatest failure and apostasy, God comes near to those who have a heart for Him! Thus it is with Ezekiel; thus it is with Daniel; and even the beloved John in his blessed vision stands amid a people who have already begun to depart from God

Ephesus, to whom is committed the highest view of the Church which is given us has left its first love, and the voice now is to overcomers — not merely with regard to the world, which opposes its darkness to the divine light, but in the Church over which the same darkness is ominously stealing. Yet, in the face of all, it is the God of all encouragement who always speaks to us. To hear His voice indeed is to receive "not the spirit of cowardice, but of power and of love and of a sound mind."

1. The opening verses, as an introduction to the whole book, should be of the deepest significance. As we look at them, at first they may seem but a mere record of dates and places; but we may be sure that underneath we shall find a true introduction, every word of which bears upon that which is to follow. It is thus only that we can read these scriptures aright when we willingly pass over nothing, assured that everywhere the word of God will vindicate itself as that, and that to make one word from the divine mouth idle, is the insult of unbelief to Him who speaks in it. There is a studied emphasis here, manifestly put upon that which we might overlook. This 30th year, this 4th month, this 5th day of the month, are manifestly specifications full of purpose. The 30th year is, no doubt, as it is generally considered, the year of the prophet. It was the period at which the priest entered upon his office; it was the year in which it pleased Christ, Himself the true Priest, to begin His public ministry. This 30th year has in it as one of its factors that number 5 which we shall find accompanying us remarkably through the book: We have thus the 5th day, the 5th year of Jehoiachin's captivity. Five is the number of man in relation to God. It is the number, therefore, which speaks of responsibility under His government, and that is most suited in the book of Ezekiel. Yet we must not forget that there is another side to it, and that the weak with the strong, the $4 + 1$, we have found many times to speak of Immanuel. The New Testament is thus a 5th Pentateuch, and of what does it speak? Certainly the burden of its message is not responsibility, but the blessed way in which the weakness of humanity and the strength of Deity have come together in the Person revealed.

Then let us notice that 10 is but a twice 5, and that this number 2, which is the additional factor, is the number which speaks directly of, and therefore emphasizes, relationship. Here is a 3×10, the number of manifestation and of the Spirit alike, and in connection with man, thus in company with God. And when the Lord came up from Jordan, in His 30th year, from His pledge to that ministry in which the river of death was indeed the point to which it guided, and the end for which it marked Him out, it was to be manifested and approved of God as the perfect Mediator, His beloved Son, upon whom then the Dove from heaven descends. Thus He becomes in full reality the Christ, anointed for His work of bringing God and man together. And here also, in what is now before us (though we must modify a good deal the proper force of the words), we may say that the prophet is anointed for the work upon which he enters, where man's relationship to God is that which is in question, which he is to realize in his soul in its tremendous consequences, yet where in the end God will indeed be seen to unite Himself to man in His own manner, and according to what has been ever in His heart.

This 30th year is now in its 4th month, speaking manifestly of that season of trial to which everything under God must come, which for mere fallen man

EZEKIEL

DIVISION 1. (Chaps. i–xxiv.)

Israel's rebellion brought into the presence of Jehovah's unchangeable righteousness.

SUBDIVISION 1 (Chaps. i.–vii.)

The charge given to the prophet.

SECTION 1 (Chap. i.)

Jehovah the Almighty whom all creation, all events, harmoniously obey.

1 (1-3): The person of the prophet and the occasion of the prophecy.

1. NOW it came to pass in the [a] thirtieth year, in the fourth [month], on the fifth of the month, as I was amidst the [b] captivity by the river Chebar, the [c] heavens were opened, and I saw visions of God. In the fifth of the month, which was

[a] Num. 4. 3. 1 Chron. 23. 3.
[c] cf. Lk. 3. 23.
[b] 2 Ki. 17. 6. 2 Ki. 24. 8-16.
[c] cf. Dan. 10. 5.
[c] cf. Rev. 4. 1.

proves necessarily disastrous, but which for those who accept the searching out is but "for a season, if need be," and the end, blessing. Meanwhile the prophet is one among a band of captives by the river Chebar—the "great" or "abundant" river—evidently reminding us of Isaiah's language when God declared by him that He would bring upon Israel "the waters of the river, strong and many, even the king of Assyria and all his glory" (Isa. viii. 7). Here it is indeed another spoiler, for the land of Israel is already a land that the rivers have spoiled (Isa. xviii. 2). Babylon has succeeded Assyria, but with no relief in the oppressing hand; yet, though the judgment be not removed, here it is, that over the head of one who, bowed under it, accepts the divine judgment, the heavens are opened and there are "visions of God." How blessed to know, by the voice of nature itself, that it is night and not day that opens the heavens; and here, whatever the message that may be given, the first thing for the prophet's soul is that there are "visions of God"

With God coming in, how everything changes, even though nothing may be changed! For there is no desolation like the absence of God; and there is nothing to lack with His presence realized. Thus the end is, as it were, seen from the beginning. These visions of God will be, at the end, visions of exceeding comfort The word that is to come is yet unspoken. First of all God is seen, and by and by there will be His word. But the sentence closes for a moment here, that the sweetness of the vision may be taken in without distraction, for here we have something that had never before occurred. Never before could it be said that the heavens were opened. Over this poor, lone man they opened, into whose soul the pang of the captivity of the people of God had entered in a way unrealized by his fellows around him. Isaiah had seen the glory of the Lord in the temple, and everywhere of course it is the same glory. That vision had closed, and the sanctuary on earth was desolate; but God remained and is seen in the higher sphere where His throne abides untouched by all the sin and sorrow of earth It is the preparation for that which we find in Daniel, where in contrast with that which was said when the ark,

[in] the fifth year of King [d]Jehoiachin's captivity, the [e]word of Jehovah came expressly unto Ezekiel the [f]priest, the son of Buzi, in the [g]land of the Chaldeans, by the river Chebar; and the [h]hand of Jehovah was there upon him.

2 (4-21): The chariot of Deity.

2. And I [i]saw, and behold a [j]stormy wind came out of the north, a great [k]cloud and a [l]fire infolding itself, d 2 Chr. 36. 9, 10.

e cf. Jer. 1. 2, etc.
cf. Lk. 3. 2.
f cf. Jer. 1. 1. with Lk. 1. 5, 13.
cfr. 1 Sam. 3. 1.
g cf. Is. 39. 6, 7.

h ch. 8. 1; ch. 37. 1; cf. 2 Pet. 1. 21. i cf. Rev. 1. 2, etc. cf. Rev. 21. 1. j cf. Job 38. 1; cf. Is. 21. 1; cf. Ps. 148. 8. k Ps. 97. 2; cf. Rev. 1. 7. l cf. Heb. 12. 29; Hab. 3. 5; Ps. 97. 3.

the throne of "the God of all the earth," passed through the dry bed of Jordan to its place in the land, it is now "the God of heaven" who is constantly before us. A higher point of view, and therefore a wider view also, is reached; and these opened heavens have now disclosed for us things that were in the time of the prophet a secret in the heart of God. Yet he who has reached the vision of God Himself has reached that beyond which there can be no height higher. He Himself is the realized pledge of all blessedness to come, and there can be nothing else but this. Thus Ezekiel may well be strengthened for all further disclosures. They can only disclose Him more whom the soul knows and recognizes as its security and rest.

And now we are carried on to look at another side of things; for on this "5th day of the month, which was in the 5th year of king Jehoiachin's captivity, the word of Jehovah came expressly unto Ezekiel the priest, the son of Buzi, in the land of the Chaldeans, by the river Chebar: and the hand of Jehovah was there upon him." Notice the change of person. We have here, so to speak, the official account, as before we had the personal; and the message is necessarily one of sorrow and judgment. This 5th year of king Jehoiachin's captivity shows us how Israel's present relationship to God has been marked by the taking away of him whose name falsely prophesied of "establishment by Jehovah." "Shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with Thee, which frameth mischief by a law?" (Ps. xciv. 20). The false confidence must be taken away before God can come in for blessing, and when His "judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness" (Isa. xxvi. 9). These are principles of God's very nature which no grace that He shows can ever alter. Grace itself can only reign through righteousness, and the word that now comes is the word of Jehovah, this unchangeable God, to Ezekiel the priest, whom "the Mighty One makes strong" to proclaim it. The son of Buzi, "my contempt," marks the fruit of that contempt of God which all that had passed and was passing now in Israel, so completely manifested on the part of the people. Thus he was in the land of the Chaldeans (perhaps "the robber-like" or "the encroachers"), by the river Chebar; and now, molding him to His will, while sustaining him for all that that will may involve, the hand of Jehovah is there upon him.

2. He looks, and now, out of the north, there comes "a stormy wind," "a great cloud and a fire infolding itself" with a brightness round about it, "and out of the midst, as the look of brass and gold out of the midst of the fire." The north is not simply the quarter from which the invaders come—though the judgment of God it truly is which is executed by them—but it is rather, as always in its deeper meaning, the place of darkness, of mystery therefore, but a mystery which the coming in of God must needs dispel. The judgment itself declares Him—vindicates His nature, answers the questioning suspense of the and it had a [m] brightness round about, and out of the midst thereof as the look of [n] brass [and] gold, out of the midst of the fire. And out of the midst thereof [came] the likeness of four [o] living creatures. And this righteous perplexed by His long patience in the presence of evil. Thus it is a storm-wind, a whirlwind, in fact, as we see by the fire infolding itself, "taking hold of itself," as it is literally, something which answers to what we shall see in the whirling wheels afterwards; and, as fire is ever sustained by that on which it takes hold, here it takes hold upon itself—it is sustained by its own nature. This fire is not pure wrath; it is rather, as a symbol, the holiness of God of which it speaks, a consuming fire indeed, therefore, to iniquity, but judgment is not its essence, not what it seeks or delights in, but what is necessitated by the perfection of God Himself. Judgment is rather seen in the whirl of the wind, such a whirl as the preacher saw in nature (Eccl. 1: 6), and it is but part of the ordained circuit of events as seen in those succeeding generations in which each repeats what has been before it, and yet does not repeat it wholly; for there is progress, a purpose working through it which is but the purpose of God; though in strange forms to which the sin of man has compelled it. But if there be a great cloud, there is yet a brightness round about, a brightness which necessarily must be when we know Him whose that purpose is; and lo, "out of the midst of it as the look of brass and gold, out of the midst of the fire." Thus the nature of God Himself is seen, what is at the heart of the judgment, and which, therefore, while it has in it the fixedness which is always symbolized by the brass, is the display of the glory of God, such as the gold ever signifies.* All this is but a first and distant view of that which is seen approaching, but there are already in it the elements of that which presently is seen in detail. The first thing indeed is that in the form of judgment, God it is who is enwrapping Himself; but in such a way that He Himself can be discerned—nay, is made known and glorified. With Him, that which makes Him known is necessarily that which glorifies Him.

[m] Ps. 97. 4 cf. Ps. 18. 12. cf. 1 Tim. 6. 16.
[n] cf. Rev. 1. 15 with Dan. 10. 6.
[o] Gen. 3. 24; Ps. 18. 10; Ps. 99. 1. cf. Is. 6. 2; cf. Rev. 4. 6 8.

The first and distant view already gives the character of that which is approaching. It is storm—the divine wrath—but God revealed in it, and therefore, brightness round about, which presently we shall find, moreover, putting on the iris-hues in which the light breaks out into a band of various glory which once more reveals Him in the storm when it is passed, and now in covenant with the earth, enfranchised and renewed. It is the anticipation of what we find in Revelation, the rainbow round the throne. As now it rapidly draws near, and the details develop, this agreement with Revelation is marked in such a manner as to be recognized at once; for out of the fire there comes the likeness of four living creatures.

They are, strictly, "living ones," creatures not being expressed, though surely implied in the four forms of man, lion, ox, and eagle, in which they appear. The human form however predominates and gives character to them; while

* The word hashmal in the original is translated electron in the Septuagint, or amber, as in the Authorized Version. It is, according to Wilson, a compound word, formed apparently of the Hebrew word nahash, brass, and another root meaning "to be smooth." In this way it suggests the similar word χαλκολίβανον of Rev. 1: 15. These are the two characteristics of judgment, as seen in the brass, and of glory, as seen in the other smooth bright metal, probably gold. Thus it is glory in judgment that is displayed.—S. R.

was their appearance; they had the likeness of a [p]man;
and every one had [q]four faces, and every one of them had four [r]wings. And their [s]feet were upright* feet;

* Or "straight," not like those of a man. See notes.

r cf. Lk. 17. 37; ctr. Ps. 68. 13 with Jno. 12. 47. s cf. Hab. 3. 19; cf. Rom p cf. ch with c 8. cf. Jn 27 wi Matt. q cf. G 10.

yet each one has four faces and four wings corresponding to these. Thus is not a likeness of God that they present; and all likeness of Him is ex pressly forbidden. They are creatures of His—no more; in His hand, obedien to His will, and used for His purposes; in fact, as we shall see, instrumen of His government; in Revelation seen in the midst of and around the Throne here underneath, it for here the view is from earth, and there in heaven. The have in general the likeness of a man, but their feet are like the feet of an ox "upright," and not extended, as is man's foot. They sparkle, giving the loo of glowing brass, reminding us once more of Revelation, but there of Him wh appears to John, and who is the Lord Himself, "His feet like unto fine (o glowing) brass, as if they burned in a furnace." The treading down in wrat is clearly indicated. The sole of the foot is like that of a young bullock, fo patient labor is manifest in the exercise of righteous judgment.

They had human hands under their wings: implying doubtless their posse sion of that delicacy of touch and power of manipulation which the lower ex tremities lacked: thus they were not quadrupedal, but human; their hand being moreover under those wings which showed them to be fitted for a high sphere than that of earth.

Their wings joined together, so that there was perfect unity of action amon the whole four living ones, the face guiding in a straightforward course i which was no deviation; a higher Spirit than that of the living creature itse in fact guided and governed all.

In the vision of Revelation the four forms are separate, which here we fin united in each living creature. They are given also in another order from tha given here, and plainly suited to what is contemplated in the second pa of Revelation where the Lion of Judah takes the seven-sealed book. There, th lion comes first therefore: the emblem of the resistless power which is fun damental to perfect government. A government without power to execute i will is plainly none. We might expect from this that swift decisiveness o action which we so naturally look for in view of the almightiness of God an His holiness as against evil; and indeed such action is drawing near at tha time of the end which John is looking on to. Yet the cry of the martyre saints, when the fifth seal is opened, tells how long has been the delay of judg ment for which they wait, and for which they are still told to wait. But ther is a patience which results from the very consciousness of strength; and wit everything completely under His control, there is no haste in the execution of th divine purposes of God. Thus the patient-working ox follows the lion, t supply what is needed to the first thought; the ox too being the worker for con ing harvest, as this patience of God is to have fruit in blessing to His creature The long-suffering of the Lord is for salvation. Then, the human-face cherub at once reminds us of how He has come in to manifest Himself i manhood for the accomplishment of this, and how He is seeking to be known intimately, to lead us into fellowship with Himself. And with this ther will be necessarily exercise of heart and conscience, as the man's face sti and the sole of their feet was like the sole of the [t]foot of a young bullock: and they sparkled like the look of burnished [u]brass. And they had the [v]hands of a man [w]under their wings on their four sides; and they

[t] cf. Deut. 25. 4.
[u] cf. Lev. 26. 19.
[v] cf. Is. 6. 6. ch. 10. 8.
[w] cf. Rev. 4. 8.

reminds us: for of these different forms the man alone speaks of a moral agent. And this exercise under divine government is none the less, but the more thorough and solemn, because His ways in this, as the final figure of the eagle comes to assure us, are ways that often soar beyond our knowledge: God were no God if there were not depths in His nature and a wisdom in His ways inaccessible to man. He dwelleth in the light unapproachable; One whom no man hath seen, nor can see; though, blessed be His name, in what we know of Him, better known after all than we are to ourselves.

Thus these four forms, while certainly not meant to attract engagingly the eye, still less in their fourfold complexity as represented in Ezekiel, nor to convey to us the idea of any actually existing spiritual beings, are manifestly suited to intimate to us the characters of a government which God exercises continually, with a plenitude of power in subjection to which all creation works. Thus in the apocalyptic vision the living creatures are seen from a heavenly standpoint, "in the midst of the throne and round about the throne." Here they are under it; for we are looking at them from the world-side, whence they naturally appear more complex in their forms, and with the world-number, four, emphasized in the four faces and four wings of each. The faces are in a different order also from that in which the forms are represented in Revelation.

But here, in Ezekiel, the human form in general is dwelt upon; it is the human face that comes to the front; and this suits well the tenderness of God's approach to His people when in trial, which Scripture everywhere exhibits. How good to see that, just here, when judgment is impending, yet to the prophet's view, the lion is not first, but the man first. The human form invites, as by and by we see even upon the throne itself. The lion is seen next, upon the right hand (yamin), which is the Hebrew also for the south: opposed thus to all the soft, relaxing influences which are naturally implied under this, for the judgment of God must no more be treated easily and with indifference, as hitherto. The ox is on the left, or as it might otherwise be rendered, the north, to meet with patient resistance the dark and evil forces proceeding from the kingdom of darkness, which must not be allowed to oppose or ally themselves with the holy judgment of God. While finally, behind all is the eagle, to remove from the earth the corruption which defiles it (Luke xvii. 37), that as of old He may bear His people upon eagles' wings, and bring them to Himself (Ex. xix. 4).

The creature-forms are not separate from one another here, as seen in the heavenly vision of Revelation, but each living being unites in itself these diverse characters, as on earth we see the acts of divine government displaying, though not in equal prominence, the whole.

As to the wings of the living creatures, they are four, not six as in Revelation. With only two of these they fly; and these are joined one to another in perfect unity of action; while two cover their bodies, as in a higher Presence. In the seraphim of Isaiah's vision, who have six wings like those of Revelation, two cover the face and two the feet, while with two alone they four had their faces and their two wings [thus]: Their wings were [x]joined one to another; they [y]turned not when they went; they went every one [z]in the direction of its face.* As for the likeness of their faces, they had the face of a [a]man, and they four had the face of a [b]lion on the right side: and they four had the face of an [c]ox on the left side; they four had also the face of an [d]eagle: and [thus] were their faces, and their wings were spread out upward, two of each joined to one another and two [e]covering their bodies. And they went every one in the direction of its face: whither the [f]spirit was to go, they went; they turned not when they went. As for the likeness of the living creatures, their appearance was like burning [g]coals of fire, as the appearance of torches: it went up and down among the living creatures; and the fire was [h]bright, and out of the fire went forth lightning. And the living creatures [i]ran and returned as the appearance of a flash of lightning. † x cf. Rev. 4. 13.

cf. Rev. 12.
y ver. 12.
cf. Lk. 9. 5 with Isa. 50. 7.
z cf. Prov. 25.
a cf. Rev. 4. 6-8.
cf. 1 Cor. 2. 11.
b cf. Prov. 30.
c cf. Ps. 14. 14.
d cf. 2 Sam. 1. 23.
cf. Is. 40. 3
e cf. Is. 6. 2 with 1 Ki. 19. 13.
f ver. 20.
cf. Heb. 1.
g Ps. 18. 12. h Ps. 97. 3, 4
i cf. Dan. 9. 21.
cf. Mt. 24.

* Or "straight forward"—literally, "unto beyond his face," i. e., in the way he was looking.

† "Flash of lightning" is one word, bazak, different from the word in the previous verse, barak.

fly. Can there be any true work for God, or wisdom for it, where in the presence of His glory the creature takes not its place of nothingness before Him? Thus there was no unsteadiness or fickleness in their movement, they went each one in the direction of its face: and, obedient to the spirit that dwelt in them, they lacked no ability for the attainment of their end, whither the spirit was to go they went with simple directness of purpose—they turned not when they went.

The likeness of the living creatures as a whole bears witness of the coming of unwilling judgment which the people have provoked, but which still is not of the essence of what is here. Their appearance is indeed like burning coals of fire, which nevertheless is not identified with the living creatures, but as the appearance of torches (not simply destroying, but enlightening also) goes up and down among them. But the judgment is manifest: the fire is bright, and out of the fire goes forth lightning; and to this the motions of the living creatures agree: they go and return as the appearance of a flash of lightning.

Now we have another thing, which is altogether outside the vision of Revelation. For there, as already said, it is as seen by one in heaven. Here the prophet is on earth, and the wheels are seen upon earth also, and have a more intimate connection with it than the living creatures themselves. Yet they move in unison with these, nay, are moved by them, for the spirit of the living creatures is in the wheels, and their character is thus reflected in them. But the wheels are moreover gem-like. their appearance and their work is as the look of a topaz; for there is in them the display of the attributes of God, as in the jewels of the high priest's breastplate, which are the Urim and Thummim, the divine "lights and perfections," the glory of the refracted light, which God is.

The four wheels are alike, and have one fundamental meaning; their appear-

Now as I beheld* the living creatures, behold one [j] wheel upon the earth beside the living creatures for the four faces thereof. The appearance of the wheels and their work was like unto the look of a [k] topaz: and they four had one likeness, and their appearance and their structure was as it were a [l] wheel in the midst of a wheel. When they went they went upon their four sides; they [m] turned not when they went. As for their rims, they were so [n] high† that they j ch. 10. 9–13. cf. Ps. 68. 17.

k Dan. 10. 6. cf. Mt. 28. 3.

l ch. 10. 10.

m vers. 12, 17. cf. Gen. 3. 24. cf. Jas. 1. 17.

n cf. Is. 40. 22, 26.

* Literally, "And I saw."

† Perhaps the literal rendering is even more striking: "And their rims and their height, and to fear for them."

ance and their structure is as it were a wheel in the midst of a wheel; so that they go upon four sides, the one wheel being set into the other, which it crosses at right angles; thus, like the living creatures, having no need to turn, to whatever quarter they may go.

The wheel speaks naturally, primarily, of the revolution of time, marked as it is for us by those luminaries which God appointed for "signs" as well as "seasons;" and most significant signs they are: heaven putting thus the stamp of vanity upon the fallen creature, whose dependence upon God it reveals for that renewal of life ever needed by it. "To everything there is a season," and no more; nothing continues at one stay: the day comes out of the womb of night, only to go back into it again. The winter swallows up the autumn fruits. So the generations of men follow one another; and even "history," as is often said, "repeats itself." "The thing that has been is that which shall be, and there is nothing new under the sun." Yet with all this repetition there is a certain progress also: the wheel is moving; not only so, but it is moving on. Whither? There is often a certain betterment as it moves, which is apt to fill us with only too exuberant a hope. The wheel has eyes, in which there seems the light of purpose. And indeed, purpose of a sort is easily seen: the spirit of the living creature at least is in the wheels; the living creature taking on also, as Ezekiel sees, the human form preeminently, as the course of events plainly shows, the large control of things man has, though not alone: for with him, constantly carrying, often controlling, often thwarting him, there works a force, itself under the constraint of law, without which he can do nothing.

And here the wheel rises so high that it is dreadful: he can see but a brief portion—follow but a short way; and if he sees no more, the light dies out again; for what of this spirit of man which counts for so much, and is yet so little? which passes so readily as a breath that cometh not again? Whither does it pass? as the preacher asks: "Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth?" Even the spirit of the living creature seems thus but part of the machinery itself. The wheel it is that controls, and the spirit of man is under this law which so utterly abases him, and carries him down at last into a darkness out of which no one sees him emerge. He then is no master of the wheel, but the wheel is master: he dies as the beast dies; and how is he then greater than the beast? Thus death baffles him. The earth abides, and things that seem passed away return again; but the generations do not return. Progress there may be, and were dreadful; and the four had their rims [o]full of eyes round about. And when the [p]living creatures went, the wheels went beside them: and when the living creatures were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up. Whithersoever the spirit was to go, they went; thither [their] spirit was to go: and the wheels were lifted up along with them, for the [q]spirit of the living creature was in the wheels. When those went, these went, and when those stood, these stood, and when those were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up along with them, for the spirit of the living creature was in the wheels.

o cf. Zech. 3. 9.
p ch. 10.16,17 cf. Ps. 103. 20, 21.
q cf. Rev. 16. 4, 5.

fruitful thoughts take root and spring up, but it is upon the graves of those who have wrought to produce the harvest. Yet here is precisely that which has in it purpose of its own, and the highest, that is moral, purpose. In the mystery of this sentence, as it surely seems, upon him—which the voice within him interprets so persistently and bodingly as sentence—the wheel begins to put on the topaz look, and the "lights and perfections" of God reveal themselves in it. The supreme control which is not in man's hands can still less be in the wheel itself. The eyes in it after all speak of a wisdom which is alien to mere mechanism; and if the wheel be but the ordinance of God, we may learn hope of Him whose heavens proclaim to us their control over the earth, and how He can bring light out of darkness, summer out of winter, life out of death.

Resurrection is indeed the full display of God's thought. Without it there is no proper revolution of the wheel; and God Himself is not seen, who cannot be seen in judgment merely. That is His "strange work," and His heart cannot be seen in it. But this "sore travail which God has given to the sons of men to be exercised with it," is but God's travail with man so exercised for a new birth, which is to make him, beyond all that the first creation made him, a child of God, the heir of a glorious purpose, of which revelation has been preaching to him from the beginning, even in the story of those primal days to which the Scripture-record carries us back. For these, even then, were in a manner new-creative days—days of resurrection for that earth not created in that state of desolation into which it had now lapsed under those whelming waters, the records of whose work the earth has been little by little disclosing to us. The "days" of Genesis 1, with deeper lessons than ever geology could in the nature of things give us, reveal indeed the work of Him who has alone the power, not only to "renew the face of the earth," but to renew also man's moral nature. Spite of all resistance, He carries on step by step to their complete development those purposes of His grace which the dispensations are disclosing, which are all here wrapped up, in a way which went far beyond the knowledge of him who wrote, not by traditional inspiration, but by the teaching of the Spirit of God.

Thus, in the record of the first day, if God calls the darkness which He is displacing "night," yet "the evening and the morning" are the day, as He would interpret to us; a day which does not therefore begin with the night and end with the night, as we have sadly chosen, if for our common purposes conveniently, to reckon it. Nor does it begin with the day and end with the night either. No; the evening begins, and the morning follows. The light which a

3 (22-28): The heavenly throne and glory of Jehovah

3. And over the heads of the living creature was the likeness of an [r]expanse as the look of the terrible crystal stretched forth over their heads above. And under the expanse were their wings spread the one toward the other; every one had two which covered, even every one had two which covered their bodies. And when they went, I heard the sound of their wings as the sound of many [s]waters, as the voice of the Almighty, as the noise of a multitude, as the sound of a [t]host: when they stood, they let down their wings. And there was a [u]voice from above the expanse which was over their heads; and they stood, and let down their wings.*

* Or "when they stood, they let down."

[r] ch. 10. 1. cf. Gen. 1. 6 & with Ex. 24. 10.

[s] cf. Dan. 10. 6. cf. Rev. 1. 15. cf. ch. 43. 2. cf. Ps. 18. 13.

[t] cf. 1 Chr. 14. 15. cf. 2 Ki. 7. 6

[u] cf. Ps. 29. 3-10 with 1 Ki. 19. 12

the call of God has just appeared, thus seems at once to be disappearing again, and the darkness to triumph over it. But it has not really done so. The day is only being conformed to the type of resurrection which will be recognized by faith on the part of His people in coming generations as the inimitable, unmistakable pattern of His workmanship. In the victory over sin and evil which are coming in, God is to be known as the God of resurrection. Death is the brand of vanity upon the evil, the leveling of the pride which is the rebellion of the creature against the Hand that formed it. But it is in that Hand also the weapon by which the arch-enemy is defeated and spoiled; and through death, for those who accept the humiliation of it, there is found the way of life. The revolution of the wheel, though it be high and outside the ken of sense merely, is that in which it puts on its topaz look and reveals its mystery.

3. Thus Ezekiel does not see merely the wheels, or the living creatures; he sees over their heads the likeness of an expanse as the look of the terrible crystal, stretched forth over their heads above. And again, above the likeness of the expanse itself there is the likeness of a throne; and upon the likeness of the throne there is, what indeed is strange and wonderful to see, the appearance of a Man above upon it. As soon as we look up thither we become conscious, in the attitude of the living creatures, that they are themselves in profound subjection to the higher power that is there. The harmony in which they act with one another is manifested as only the result of a common subjection to One who controls all. Their wings are spread out in full activity, their bodies remaining however always covered by their wings, as we have already seen them, and as is emphasized here by the repetition. And now the sound of their wings is heard as the sound of many waters—a cataract of sound, which presently is realized as the voice of the Almighty—the noise indeed as of a multitude, but not tumultuous—the sound of a marshalled host. This is the plain interpretation of the living creatures themselves; which the heathen, as the monuments of Babylon have shown us, worshiped in such forms (there indeed grotesque), seeing what was under the firmament only, and not able to pierce to the Throne that was above it, and turning thus "the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like unto corruptible man, and to birds and four-footed beasts, and creeping things" (Rom. i. 23). Here they are in their place, and serving; at His voice moving, wing-enwrapped, before Him; at His voice stilled to absolute rest, with their wings let down.

And above the expanse that was over their heads was the likeness of a [v]throne, as the appearance of a [w]sapphire stone: and upon the likeness of the throne was a likeness as the appearance of a [z]man above upon it. And I saw as the look of [y]brass [and] gold, as the appearance of [z]fire within it round about from the appearance of his [a]loins and upward, and [v] ch. 10. 1. Ps. 103. [*] 9.

[w] cf. Ex. 24. 10. cf. Rev. 4. 3.
[x] cf. Is. 6. 1 with Phil. 2. 9 11.
[y] cf. ver. 4. ch. 8. 2.
[z] cf. Heb. 12. cf. Is. 11. 5.

29. [a] cf. Rev. 19. 12, 16. cf. Ps. 45. 3, 4.

But we are permitted not alone to behold the throne, and hear the voice of the Eternal, but to see Him who sits upon it. First, however, as to the throne: it is as the appearance of a sapphire stone. This does not seem to be what we now call the sapphire. That of the ancients was, as Pliny testifies, "refulgent with spots of gold—azure, never transparent:" that is, the lapis lazuli. And when we hear God's own voice claiming the heavens as His throne, how suited is the likeness of a sapphire stone! The word is derived from one (sephar) which means "to number," and hence "to tell, declare," and this is the word used when it is said that "the heavens declare the glory of God" (Ps. xix. 1). This sapphire throne, then, is symbolically just the starry vault, which is seen similarly in the vision of God upon Mt. Sinai (Ex. xxiv. 10) when "they saw the God of Israel; and there was beneath His feet as transparent sapphire-work, even as the heavens themselves for clearness" This seems to have been taken by some to prove that the ancient sapphire was itself transparent; but in fact there is no occasion from this to suppose so. There is, in what is seen, the general appearance of a sapphire stone, but with this the added character of a transparency such as there is in the heavens themselves: words which show plainly that it is the starry heavens that are here symbolized.

Upon this throne then, there is "the likeness as the appearance of a Man above upon it." We are warned by the language here to be careful how far we go in the way of exact application. There can be no doubt indeed for the Christian that Christ exactly fills the picture; even as Daniel (Ezekiel's contemporary) sees in his vision "One like unto a Son of Man come in the clouds of heaven," and dominion given to Him (Dan. vii. 13). Yet, no doubt, the time is not come even yet in which this will be fulfilled. This does not however prevent the ultimate reference to Christ which is such an imperative necessity. Christ on the throne is God's ideal of government for a world departed from Him, and He it is who is thus to subdue all things to God. Thus it is not strange if the divine throne ever puts on the human character. And it surely does so. Is God a man that He should repent? It is human essentially to do so; yet governmentally God "repenteth Him of the evil;" nay, announces this as a principle in His dealings with men (Joel ii. 13; Jer. xviii. 8). His threatenings, therefore, no less than the blessings He holds out to them, are for the proving of what is in their hearts, as again He declares (Deut. viii. 2; xiii. 3; Ps. vii. 9; Jer xvii. 10). But why should He thus try the creatures He has made, who knows them perfectly, and the whole issue of every trial? Ah, it is the need of man himself and not of God, and a need on the part of all His creatures, who throughout the universe are spectators of His dealings with men, and who are learning in the Church His manifold wisdom; from the appearance of his loins and downward I saw as it were the appearance of fire, and there was brightness round about it. As the appearance of the [b] bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain so was the appearance of the brightness round about. This was the brightness of the likeness of the [c] glory of Jehovah. And when I saw it, I [d] fell on my face, and heard a voice of one that spake.

b cf. 2 Sam. 23. 4 with Gen. 9. 13-16 Rev. 4. 3.
c cf. Ex. 33. 18-23. ctr. 2 Cor. 3. 18.
d ch. 43. 3. Dan. 8. 17. Rev. 1. 17.

and to learn "in the ages to come, the exceeding riches of His grace, in His kindness toward us through Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 7; iii. 10).

In connection with this, the dispensational changes show us the "likeness of the appearance of a Man upon the throne." Not only has the trial of man been constantly going on, but new methods of trial have been instituted as the old ones seemed to show themselves inefficacious. Thus after the fall, there was at first the appeal to conscience, and men were suffered to do what was right in their own eyes. What men now desire, as anarchy, has had its full trial at the very beginning of things. Even Cain, the first murderer, was not to be slain; and there were no kings or potentates of any kind; but the result was the deluge; the earth had to be washed thoroughly clean, and everything to start afresh. Then human government was ordained; and that was a step in advance from which there has been on God's part no return; nor has there been since such utter disaster as with those early generations. Yet human government soon manifested its incapacity to meet the deeper need of those whose hearts were departing from the living God. Men manufactured gods to suit themselves; and thus, out of a world given over to idolatry, God had to call a people among whom the truth could be maintained—the written Word taking the place of traditions which human imaginations darkened and perverted, and fresh revelations by the mouths of prophets whom He raised up giving constantly increasing light as the world's darkness deepened. We need not enter into more detail of those interventions which culminated in the rising of that Light of the world, whose beams to-day illumine all who have eyes to see. But this succession of various appeals to man, how human, if indeed much more than human, they are in that appeal! How plainly is to be seen in them the "appearance of the likeness of a Man" upon a throne which is in the heavens!

But here it is we find what had been seen by the prophet at the outset, giving character to the whole, "the look of brass and gold," the manifestation of unchangeable holiness in that which comes as judgment, but with the display in it of the glory of God. From the loins upward this appears in the fire—the glory of the Person who is thus revealed; while from the loins downward it is more His acts that are in view; where it is more the pure fire, but with a brightness round about, in which are seen the hues of the bow of promise, the work of righteousness executed being peace, "and the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance for ever" (Isa. xxxii. 17).

"This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of Jehovah."

The prophet falls prostrate before his God, and then there comes to him a voice which raises and energizes him, and sends him forth Jehovah's messenger to a rebellious people.

SECTION 2 (Chaps. ii.-iii. 11.)

God's words to be spoken to those who would not hear.

And he saith unto me, Son of man, [e] stand upon thy feet, and I will speak with thee. And the Spirit entered into me when he spake unto me, and [f] set me upon my feet, and I heard him that spake unto me. And he said unto me, Son of man, I [g] send thee to the children of Israel, to Gentiles, the [h] rebellious who have [e] Dan. 10. 11. Mt. 17. 6, 7.

[f] ch. 3. 24.
[g] Is. 6. 8 10. Jer. 1. 7. cf. Jno. 20. 21.
[h] Dan. 9. 5,6. cf. Rom. 10. 21.

Sec. 2.

We have now the charge given to the prophet, which, as we see at once, is to speak to a people who will not hear, of whom it can only be hoped that here and there ears may be open to receive it. There is no encouraging hope with regard to the success of the message; yet, whether they would hear or whether they would forbear, they should know that there had been a prophet among them. All the more if there is not to be the encouragement of conscious success, is he to find it in the consciousness of the Lord with him, whom Israel would reject in rejecting His messenger.

He is addressed at once by the title which we have already seen to be characteristic of his prophecy: "Son of man," says the Voice, "stand upon thy feet, and I will speak with thee." The title given him is itself a proof that the people to whom he goes have lost their special distinctive place with God, but at the same time that if Israel will not hear, grace will not be thwarted in its object. The message will only go out the more widely, and indeed, with a deeper, sweeter, fuller message, as we abundantly prove to-day. This title is in itself the foreshadow of One who when standing in the midst of Israel in a day which was then future, would adopt it for His own. The Son of Man would be the Seeker of men, and Himself a man in all the conditions of humanity—Himself the perfect, because unfallen, Man. The Lord's adoption of this title is, however, distinct in its significance from the use of it by God in His address to the prophet. God never addresses Christ as the Son of Man, but as His own Son; man indeed, but as it is said in Zechariah: "The Man that is my fellow, saith the Lord of hosts" (Zech. xiii. 7). But the Lord's adoption of it for Himself is peculiar, and characteristic of the uniqueness of His personality. Who but Himself could say, "I the Son of man?" No mere man could claim distinctively to be what all men are. Man indeed He is thoroughly, nor only man, but Son of man, entering into manhood by the door ordained, by its lowliness, to hide pride from man. To the weakness of infancy He is no stranger. He grows and learns as other men, His kinship with whom this name discloses; yet while it discloses this, it distinguishes Him none the less from all else among men—distinctive even because of its universality; for who could distinguish himself by a title that was not distinctive? He was thus Son of man in some sense peculiar to Himself—Son of man, while much more than this. With Ezekiel the term speaks, on the other hand, simply of his identification with men. He is not the son of man, but reminded of the lowliness of his condition, while at the same time this only magnifies the grace which has taken him up; and thus also there is in him a peculiar suitability to convey the message with which he is charged—not an angel, but with human sympathies, and a human intelligence rebelled against me: they and their [t]fathers have transgressed against me unto this very day. And the children are [j]impudent of face and hard of [k]heart. I am sending thee unto them, and thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the Lord * Jehovah. And they, [l]whether they will hear or whether they will forbear (for they are a rebellious house), yet shall [m]know that there hath been a prophet among them. And thou, son of man, be [n]not afraid of them and be not afraid of their words, though [o]briers and thorns are with thee and thou dwellest among scorpions; be not afraid of their words and be not dismayed at their faces, for they are a rebellious house. And thou shalt [p]speak my words unto them whether they will hear or whether they will forbear; for they are [most] rebellious. And t cf. Ezr. 9. 7. Jer. 3. 25.

j ch. 3. 7. cf. ch. 16. 3. cf. Is. 48. 4.
k cf. Is. 46. 12. cf. Zech. 7. 12. cf. ch. 11. 19.
l ch. 3. 11. cf. 2 Cor. 2. 15, 16.
m ch. 33. 33. cf. Lk. 10. 11. n cf. Jer. 1. 17, 18. Mt. 10. 28.
o cf. 2 Sam. 23. 6, 7. p Jer. 1. 7, 8, 17, 18. cf. Acts 23. 11. cf. 1 Cor. 9. 16.

* Hebrew, Adonai.

acquired and exercised amid human conditions; himself thus the proof of the heart of God behind the hand of Him who is love and cannot change His nature, even when He is executing judgment.

The feebleness of the instrument is recognized, and thus calls forth Jehovah's might to sustain it. We see this at the outset here: "Son of man, stand upon thy feet and I will speak with thee." And not only so, but the Spirit enters into him to make him stand. He cannot even listen to the message in that prostrate condition which, while it may rightly express the nothingness of the creature in the presence of God, at the same time cannot suitably express the divine grace towards him. We see this everywhere in the history of the prophets, as notably in the prophet Daniel, and as again also in the case of John the beloved. God cannot utter His thoughts to one prostrate in the dust before Him. This does not suit the blessed Speaker; and this is already the foretaste of that which enables us to say we have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but the Spirit of adoption whereby we cry, "Abba, Father." That cry is not yet come in Ezekiel's case, belonging as he does to a previous dispensation, but none the less the spirit of fear is bidden to depart, in order that the divine communications may have their suited character; for if God is enwrapping Himself in the cloud of judgment, nevertheless there is, as we have seen, the manifestation of One to whom judgment is a strange work, and those iris hues of promise are about the cloud. The messenger must in his spirit reflect this, that he may be fit as a messenger; and whether they hear or whether they forbear, the prophet must be witness in his own person that if "justice and judgment are the habitation of His throne," "mercy and truth" yet "go before His face."

But Israel have, in fact, already thoroughly proved themselves, and are no other (except in the privileges which they have perverted) than the nations around. Thus the divine Speaker marks them here: "I send thee to the children of Israel," He says—to Gentiles—for they are none other than these. They are but "the rebellious who have rebelled against Me. They and their fathers have transgressed against Me unto this very day." Thus they are children as "impudent of face" as "hard of heart." Their heart spoke in their faces in such a way that there could be no more concealment, and God sends thou, son of man, hear what I say unto thee. Be not [q] thou rebellious like that rebellious house: [r] open thy mouth, and eat that I give thee.

And I looked, and behold, a [s] hand was put forth toward me, and lo, a roll of a [t] book therein, and he spread it before me, and it was [u] written within and without. And there were written in it [v] lamentations and mournings and woe. And he said unto me, Son of man, [w] eat that thou findest. Eat this roll, and go, speak unto the house of Israel. So I opened my mouth, and he caused me to eat this roll. And he said unto me, Son of man, cause thy belly to eat, and fill thy bowels with this roll that I give thee. And I ate it, and it was in my mouth as [x] honey for sweetness.

q cf. Acts 26. 19, 20. cf. Jonah 1. 3, etc.
r Rev. 10. 9. cf. Jer. 15. 16
s Jer. 1. 9. cf. ch. 10. 7, 8.
t Rev. 10. 10.
u cf. Rev. 5. 1, 7, 8.
v cf. Jer. 36. 4, 23, 32. cf. Isa. 3. 11.
w ch. 2. 8. cf. Mt. 4. 4. cf. Job 23. 12.
x cf. Ps. 19. 10. with Rev. 10. 9, 10.

to them in the full recognition of this, putting against their blasphemous words the speech of the Unchangeable whom they have refused. Thus they shall know, if it be learned by the judgment executed, that there has been a prophet among them. Among such a people does the prophet dwell; as briars and thorns wound and entangle those who come in contact with them, as scorpions poisonous in their sting; yet he who has been admitted to see the glory of Jehovah need not be afraid among them. How unseemly indeed would be any fear of man on the part of such an one, and how ill would he represent the majesty of Him with whom they had to do! How ill, alas, do we represent Him if in any wise we manifest this, into whose mouths God has put a sweeter message, and to whom the glory of the Lord has been more wondrously revealed than even as Ezekiel saw it here!

And now the prophet is instructed to make thoroughly his own that which he is commissioned to proclaim amongst them. The vision character of what is here, one would think, ought to be plain to us, and an indication of the character of much that is to follow in the prophecy. "I looked," he says, "and behold a hand was put forth toward me, and lo a roll of a book therein: and he spread it before me, and it was written within and without, and there were written in it lamentations and mournings and woe. And he said unto me, Son of man, eat that thou findest. Eat this roll, and go, speak unto the house of Israel. So I opened my mouth, and he caused me to eat this roll." The meaning is perfectly clear, which any literal construction would rather obscure than add any force to. Again we are reminded of the visions of the Apocalypse. The roll of the book is written within and without, which does not simply speak of the fulness of its contents, as it is taken, but rather, one would say, speaks of things outward and manifest as well as of things of a deeper and more hidden nature. That which is manifest is needed by a condition of soul that can see nothing except that which is external; while, on the other hand, there are things within, which for those who have hearts to realize, are beyond all this. Even so for the prophet himself there is something that answers to this; for while what was manifest was simply matter for "lamentations and mournings and woe," yet in the mouth of the prophet there was as the taste of honey for sweetness, and this corresponds with what we have already seen throughout the vision, where the judgment does not stand alone, but the glory of the Lord is revealed in it, and in result, the accomplish-

And he said unto me, Son of man, go, get thee unto the house of Israel and speak with my words unto them. For thou art not sent to a people of [y] obscure language and difficult speech,* but to the house of Israel; not to many peoples of obscure language and of difficult speech, whose words thou canst not understand. Had I sent thee unto them, they [z] would hearken unto thee: but the [a] house of Israel will not hearken unto thee, for none of them will hearken unto me: for all the house of Israel are [b] hard of forehead and stiff of heart. Behold, I have made thy [c] face hard against their faces, and thy forehead hard against their foreheads. As an adamant, harder than flint have I made thy forehead: fear them not, neither be dismayed at their faces, for they are a rebellious house. And he said unto me, Son of man, [d] all my words which I shall speak unto thee, receive in thy heart and hear with thine ears, and go, get thee to the [e] captivity to the children of thy people, and speak unto them and tell them, Thus saith the Lord † Jehovah—whether they will hear or whether they will forbear.

y cf. Is. 1. 3. cf. Jno. 1. 11.

z cf. Acts 28. 28.

a cf. Lk. 4. 23-27. cf. Jer. 2. 13.

b Is. 48. 4. Ex. 32. 9. Deut. 31. 27.

c Jer. 1. 18. cf. Acts 4. 13.

d Jer. 26. 2. cf. Acts 20. 27. cf. Rev. 22. 18, 19.

e ch. 1. 1.

* Literally, "deep of lip, and heavy of tongue." † Adonai.

ment of counsels which are in His heart and which display His heart. Alas, the message might seem such as if it must be addressed to peoples of obscure language and difficult speech, to men of foreign tongues, strangers such as those among whom they were already being scattered. No, these were strangers in heart alone, all the more terrible in their enmity and misconception of the words of God, which above all should have been familiar. The difficulty of foreign speech might have been overcome, but here was a difficulty which no words that the prophet could utter would overcome. "But the house of Israel will not hearken unto thee, for none of them will hearken unto Me." There was the stubbornness of a condition upon which mercy itself could wait no longer, and the prophet's brow must be made hard against their brazen front, and his face against their faces. Already, the wrath to be poured out was foreshown in their condition, captives as they were to the heathen around them, who were themselves more capable of hearing the words of God, had they been addressed to them, than those who had been nursed up with them. It is the solemn lesson which we are constantly receiving, that not the lack of opportunity condemns men to judgment, but the fearful mystery of hearts that depart from the living God, who themselves invite the unwilling judgment, and can be constrained by nothing but the doom which in their case is the last touch of mercy which they are capable of receiving.

Sec. 3.

The prophet has been now qualified and energized for his work. He is accordingly inducted into it: "The Spirit lifted me up, and I heard behind me the sound of a great rushing, Blessed be the glory of Jehovah from its place; and the sound of the wings of the living creatures that kissed one another, and the sound of the wheels beside them was even the sound of a great rushing."

SECTION 3 (Chap. iii. 12-27.)

Set apart to be Israel's watchman, the voice of God to the people.

And the *Spirit [f]lifted me up, and I heard behind me the sound of a great [g]rushing [saying], [h]Blessed be the glory of Jehovah from its place; and the sound of the wings of the living creatures that kissed one another,† and the sound of the wheels beside them, [was] even the sound of a great rushing. And the *Spirit lifted me up and took me away; and I went in [i]bitterness, in the heat of my spirit, and the [j]hand of Jeho-

[f] ch. 8. 3. Acts 8. 39.
[g] cf. ch. 1. 24. cf. Acts 2. 2.
[h] cf. Is. 6. 3. cf. Heb. 1. 6.
[i] cf. Jer. 1. 6. cf. Jer. 9. 1. cf. Phil 3. 18.
[j] 2 Ki. 3. 15. ch. 37. 1.

* The article is omitted. † Literally, "a woman her sister."

This sound is heard behind him, at his back, because in the path in which God leads, the movement of the living creatures, the whole machinery of government, as it were, follows him who is in it, and thus becomes articulate in praise of the outshining glory, whatever the place from which it shines. It was seen, in fact, now, not in what had been its dwelling place upon earth, not in Israel's temple consecrated to it for so many generations, neither yet in its own proper home in heaven, but in an activity to which not simply its own nature calls it, but the needs of man, of the creature, and thus of creation everywhere, which if touched in one point is touched in all. It is everywhere the creation of God, and He is manifested in it. Thus it can take no place, but its glory shines from it so as to awaken (not, alas, the praise of man now fallen, but) the praise of all that is symbolized here by the living creatures and the moving wheels upon the earth, which will at last utter His praise so that it shall be re-echoed throughout the universe.

Here is again another connecting link with the book of Revelation, where it is said of these same living creatures that "they rest not day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come" (Rev. iv. 8). Beautiful it is to see the perfect harmony here as their wings, in the emphatic language of the prophet, "kiss" one another. On earth the pall of night may be hanging, and the lightnings quiver from the threatening storm; nevertheless here there is no storm, no conflict, but emphatically peace; the wings taking on, according to the Hebrew here, even a tender feminine character, as that of "a woman with her sister"—harmony and subjection united in one, or, in fact, but one and the same thing.

So, impelled by the same energy, the prophet says: "The Spirit lifted me up and took me away; and I went in the bitterness of my spirit, and the hand of Jehovah was strong upon me." The bitterness of God's judgment upon His people is still felt; and this is no discord, when we know the heart that is behind the judgment—not slackened by it, but rather impelled; the anger against the rebellion of the people of God burning all the more within him who realizes that these are the people of God, and that God is robbed of His glory in them. The hand of Jehovah, of the unchangeable One, known as the Unchangeable in His very covenant name, this hand is strong upon him to enable him for the execution of the commission which has been given him.

Thus he goes to those of the captivity at Tel-abib, who dwelt by the river Chebar. Tel-abib means "the mound of green corn." How vividly is pictured in this name the hopes springing up afresh, as it were, in this land of captivity —a mere green mound though it be by the waters of the desolating river. Here vah was strong upon me. And I came to [them of] the captivity at Tel-abib that dwelt by the river Chebar, and to where they dwelt, and I [k]sat there astonished among them seven days. And it came to pass at the end of seven days that the [l]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, I have given thee as a [m]watchman to the house of Israel, and thou shalt [n]hear the word from my mouth and [o]warn them from me. If I say unto the wicked, [p]Thou shalt surely die, and thou givest him [q]not warning, and speakest not to warn the wicked from his wicked way that he may live, he, the wicked, [r]shall die in his iniquity, but his [s]blood will I require at thy hand. But [t]if thou warn the wicked, and he turn not from his wickedness nor from his wicked way, he shall die in his iniquity, but thou hast [u]delivered thy soul. And when a [v]righteous man turneth from his righteousness and commit-k cf. Dan. 4. 19.

l ch. 1. 3, etc.
m ch. 33. 7. 9. cf. Is. 21. 11. cf. Is. 52. 8. cf. Heb. 13. 17. cf. Acts 20. 28.
n cf. Acts 4. 20.
o cf. Jer. 6. 17. cf. Col 1. 28.
p cf. Gen. 2. 17. cf. Deut. 28. 45. q cf. Jer. 8. 11.
r cf. ch. 18. 4, etc.
s ctr. Acts 20. 26. cf. Acts 18. 6.
t ctr. Gen. 4. 9.
u cf. Lk. 17. 1-3. v ch. 18. 24; ch. 33. 12, 13; cf. 1 Jno. 2. 1; cf. Jno. 10. 38.

they have come into a land of vagabondage like Cain of old, to build their city and rest, if they may rest. The sight smites upon the prophet's heart and overwhelms him with astonishment seven days. How complete is the ignorance, how puerile the self-confidence of this hope against hope, but which has no faith for its support! Tel-abib by the river Chebar is the very sign of their condition, around which the circling storm of the divine wrath is moving for its overthrow.

The prophet is allowed full time for the realization of these true human feelings; the weight of his charge not pressing him unduly, but permitting the perfect realization of it all in his soul before, at last, he takes it up. Only at the end of the seven days does the word of Jehovah come to him, saying: "Son of man, I have given thee as a watchman to the house of Israel, and thou shalt hear the word from my mouth, and warn them from Me." But we see in what follows that as a nation there is no hope at all. The case as to them is closed. His mission, for the mass, is only to declare the certainty of the judgment coming; but which is, because God is in it, a discriminative judgment, which separates a remnant of those who do hear from the unheeding mass.

The divine words are now, however, first of all to himself, set in charge as God's watchman for the people to put every individual soul upon his responsibility before God, his own responsibility remaining unaffected, whatever the result or apparent want of result. Warned or unwarned, the wicked, obstinate in his wickedness, will die; he also who turns from his righteousness to commit iniquity, whether or not the warnings were uttered which should have preserved him in the path of righteousness. This is an important point for us at all times: so apt as we are to argue from mere results which can never rightly be our guide, as results cannot precede but follow, and cannot affect the question of duty for those who are to walk by faith and not by sight, who are to be in the divine Hand for the execution of His purposes with whom the result is.

Let us notice here that, in all that which is now before us, we are upon the plane of God's outward, manifest government, so conspicuous and fitting in the prophecy of Ezekiel. Thus the death threatened to the wicked is not simply teth iniquity,* and I lay a [w]stumblingblock before him, he shall die: because thou hast not given him warning, he shall die in his sin,* and his righteousness† which he hath done shall [x]not be remembered, but his [y]blood will I require at thy hand. And if thou [z]warn the righteous man that the righteous sin not, and he sinneth not, he shall certainly live; for he hath [a]taken warning, and thou hast [b]delivered thy soul.

And the [c]hand of Jehovah was there upon me, and he said unto me, Arise, go [d]forth into the plain, and there I will talk with thee. And I arose and went forth into the plain: and, behold, the [e]glory of Jehovah stood there, [f]like the glory which I saw by the river Chebar, and I [g]fell on my face. And the Spirit entered into me and [h]set me upon my feet, and he spake with me and said unto me, Go, [i]shut thyself within thy house.

* Two different words. † Or, righteous acts; literally "righteousnesses."

[w] cf. Jas. 1. 13. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 8.
[x] ctr. Heb. 6. 10 with Heb. 8. 12.
[y] ver. 18.
[z] cf. 2 Cor. 1. 13.
[a] cf. 2 Cor. 7. 9 11.
[b] ver. 19.
[c] ch. 1. 3.
[d] ch. 8. 4.
[e] ch. 1. 28.
[f] ch. 1. 1. ch. 10. 15, etc.
[g] cf. Rev. 1. 17. cf. Mt. 17. 6.
[h] ch. 2. 2. cf. Zech. 4. 1.
[i] cf. Jno. 12. 36.

that under which we all are: nor, is it, as commonly supposed, eternal death as the doom of every unrepentant soul; but it is a removal from earth, under the government of God, which even for the present makes for blessing to the upright with Him, as the apostle also tells us, that "godliness hath the promise of the life that now is," as well as "of that which is to come." The deeper question is not raised here—it is not what is put before us; not even as the law raised it, appealing to the outward government of God which levels all pretension to righteousness on the part of any, and shuts up to grace alone, of which the law is everywhere the handmaid.

This charge being given him, the prophet is now summoned into the valley that Jehovah may speak with him. The word used here is "cleft," though it is sometimes used for a plain, as in Genesis xi. 2, "plain of Shinar;" yet even there seems to have reference to what is its strict meaning, as a cleft between the mountains. It is used for the valley of Jericho, the deep Jordan-cleft through which it enters the Dead Sea. Its significance here should be plain. In all that we have seen, God is cleaving indeed the mountains of man's pride, bringing in a breach upon all that seems most stable, wherein those who are really His own are made to recognize a judgment which abases them before Him, but where the glory of God can appear to them, as now it does to the prophet. One must ever be abased in order to be exalted; and because of what we are, we must abide in that abasement in order to abide in the exaltation itself. God thus abides for us in all that He is, as the apostle realized after his being taken into the blessedness of the paradise of God, the third heaven; yet, because of the flesh in him, needing the thorn for the flesh, which love itself could not remove, while it could enable him to glory in it.

Prostrate the prophet falls again; for who can stand before this holy, holy, holy God? But again the Spirit raises and sets him upon his feet, and with an injunction now, which at first seems almost in contradiction to the call he has received, but which is in fact to guide him in obedience to it. He is to shut himself in his house. There is no readiness on the people's part to receive the divine communication. Thus their condition will, as he is told, put bands upon him, and he can only speak amongst these obdurate people as the

And thou, son of man, behold they shall put [j] bands upon thee, and shall bind thee therewith, and thou shalt not go out among them: and I will make thy [k] tongue cleave to the roof of thy mouth that thou shalt be dumb, and shalt [l] not be to them a reprover, for they are a rebellious house. But when I speak with thee, I will [m] open thy mouth, and thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the Lord * Jehovah: He that [n] heareth, let him hear; and he that forbeareth, let him forbear; for they are a [o] rebellious house.

[j] cf. Jer. 38.6
[k] cf. ch. 24.27, cf. ch. 33.22.
[l] cf. Mk. 8.11, 12.
[m] cf. ch. 24. 27. cf. ch. 29. 21, ch. 33. 22.
[n] Mt. 13. 9. cf. Rev. 2. 7, etc.
[o] ver. 9. cf. Acts 7. 51-53.

SECTION 4 (Chaps. iv., v.)

Delivered to the nations as worse than they: the four signs.

1 (1-3): First sign: God Himself in the siege against Jerusalem.

1. And thou, son of man, take thee a [p] brick, and lay it before thee, and portray upon it a city—Jerusalem; and lay [q] siege against it, and build forts † against it, and cast up a mound against it, and set camps against it, and place battering rams against it round about, and take thou unto thee an [r] iron plate, ‡ and set it for a [p] cf. Gen. 11. 3 with Isa. 9. 10.

[q] cf. Lk. 19. 43.
[r] cf. Jer. 1. 18, 19.

* Adonai. † Or, "a fort." ‡ Or, "pan."

way is opened for him irresistibly, the Spirit of God refusing to be hindered. We cannot but realize that what was true of Israel in that day is true now of the world at large; and that is why the apostle says that we must "redeem the time," (Eph. v. 16)—"the opportunity," as it really is—take the opening or opportunities which God makes in speaking His message amongst men, "because the days are evil." For it is He who "openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth." And while the commission of His grace is world-wide, yet he who would be fruitful in it must realize entire dependence, and watch for the doors that open under the Hand that guides.

Sec. 4.

1. The language of parable is now taken up again, the significance of which is so fully declared to us by the Lord in relation to His own use of it (Matt. xiii. 13). It is only the remnant from whom anything can now be expected. The call of the parable is to "him who hath ears to hear." And thus we have now four signs, in which the prophet is to address himself to those about him.

The first sign is a simple, but what a significant one! He is instructed to take a brick,* and lay it before him, and portray upon it a city—Jerusalem, in fact, and lay siege against it, and place battering rams against it round about. All simple enough, surely, in view of what was actually threatening the people at that time. But there is a deeper significance: "Take thou unto thee an iron plate, and set it for a wall of iron between thee and the city, and set thy face against it, and it shall be in siege; even thou shalt lay siege against it." A sign indeed this, for the prophet is the representative of God Himself, and it is God who is at work through these strange hostile hands of His people's enemies. There is, as it were, indeed a wall of iron between the prophet and the

* The brick may suggest Babylon, as the tower of Babel (Gen. xi. 3) was made of bricks. It would thus suggest that Jerusalem had morally become assimilated to Babylon, and therefore would be subjugated by it.—S. R.

wall of iron between thee and the city, and set thy [s] face against it, and it shall be in siege, and thou shalt lay siege against it. This [is] a [t] sign to the house of Israel.
2 (4-8): The second sign: The bearing of their iniquity.
2. And [u] lie thou on thy side,* the left one, and lay the iniquity of the house of Israel upon it. [According to] the [v] number of the days that thou liest upon it thou shalt bear their iniquity. Even I have appointed thee the years of their iniquity according to the number of the days, [w] three hundred and ninety days, and thou shalt bear the iniquity of the house of Israel. And

* Or, "thy left side."

[s] cf. ch. 6. 2
[t] cf. ch. 12. 3-7, 11. ch. 24. 24. cf. Is. 8. 18. cf., Lk 2.12
[u] cf. Is. 20. 2 3. cf. Jer. 27.2 cf. Jer. 28. 10-14.
[v] cf. Num.14 33, 34. cf. Dan. 9. 24-27.
[w] cf. 2 Chron 10. 16 with 2 Chron. 36 17-21.

city. The separation which their sins had caused is not too vividly pictured here. But more: for separation from God cannot be with any indifference on the part of Him who is the living God, ever moving in the activity of His own nature; and if He separates Himself from the people it is not simply to cast them off, but to "lay siege" Himself against them. In Jerusalem centre the hopes of the people and the promises of God. For Jerusalem to be in siege, and God, as seen in the attitude of the prophet, Himself to lay siege against it, is indeed a sign to the house of Israel which should stir them to the very depth.

2. But another sign quickly follows. He is to lie upon his side, the left one, and lay the iniquity of the house of Israel upon it. He is to bear this 390 days, each day of penalty corresponding to a year of their iniquity. But this is not all. When he has accomplished this, he is to lie again upon his side, the right one, and now bear the iniquity of the house of Judah 40 days, each day once more given for a year. The siege of Jerusalem is through all, we may say, the object-lesson, and as he lies under the burden of their sin, his arm is to be uncovered, and his prophecy to be against it. He is not to turn from one side to the other until the days of the siege are accomplished.

What we have here has been a cause of great perplexity to all commentators. The separation between the house of Israel and the house of Judah has been supposed to refer, and quite naturally, to the two kingdoms, of Judah and of the ten tribes; and thus the 390 years have been attempted to be applied to the separate kingdom of Israel, already in the prophet's time long and completely overthrown. The separate kingdom of the ten tribes lasted about 254 years, and that of Judah about 134 years, at least, afterwards. The lying upon the left side, which, according to the common use of the right hand for the south, might refer to the position of the northern kingdom (and which probably does refer to this), yet if it be taken as applying exclusively to Israel, as separate from Judah, breaks down entirely. There were no 390 years of the separate kingdom, and these cannot be read into it in any intelligible way. If you carry them back from the taking of Samaria by the Assyrians and the deportation of the people, they would reach into the times of the Judges; and thus it has been contended that the number of years can be only allegorically significant. This, however, surely seems impossible as an interpretation of what is here. The 390 days, a day for a year, is the time of the remembering of the sins of the people, which the prophet, as representative of the remnant according to God (and in this way inferring the attitude of God Himself), has been so long suffering under. The allegorical reckoning of the number 390 itself is hard to make out, and in order to justify it at all, when thou hast accomplished these, thou shalt also lie upon thy side,* [x] the right one, the second time, and bear the iniquity of the house of Judah [y] forty days; each [z] day for a year have I given thee. And thou shalt x cf. Ps. 60. 7.

y cf. Jer. 30. 11.
z ver. 5

* Or, "thy right side."

the 40 years of Judah have sometimes been added to these, in order to reproduce, as it were, the 430 years which was the limit of Egyptian bondage; but such a reference confounds two periods which are certainly meant here to be distinguished, as well as the connection of the house of Israel with the one, and that of Judah with the other. But the years also must surely be years of sin, of actual sin which is provoking the punishment, and no 430 years have ever been marked out in this way at all.

What then are we to say with regard to it? It is plain that only the separate notice of the house of Judah here seems to require the application of the 390 years to the separate Ephraimitic kingdom. If this can be otherwise explained, then there is no reason why the 390 years should not be those of divine forbearance as to the nation as a whole; and if we date them from the separation of the kingdoms under Jeroboam to the fall of Jerusalem under Nebuchadnezzar, we have, as closely as possible, exactly this time. This separation was the break-up, under God, of a time of unexampled prosperity, and it was the break-out of man's will at the same time; judgment thus already beginning while yet the long-suffering of God tempered it during all this period. The separation of the northern kingdom may thus have fully its place here, and be that which, as it were, weighed heavily on that side the nation as a whole, which never recovered itself from that great disaster. It is striking also that the actual siege of Jerusalem lasted for about the 390 days of the prophet's burden. It lasted from the 10th day of the 10th month of the 9th year of Zedekiah to the 9th day of the 4th month of his 11th year; and this, says Schroeder, "can very simply be made to correspond by making a deduction for the temporary raising of the siege on account of the Egyptians" (Jer. xxxvii 5). The reference to the actual siege of Jerusalem is thus strictly in conformity with the actual fact.

With regard to the forty years of the house of Judah, the difficulties have been considered great. The symbolism of numbers has been very naturally invoked in this case, and there is no need at all to deny that there is a significance of this sort in them. Nevertheless it is impossible to make this the whole matter. But where are these 40 years then? The 390 having already run on from the beginning of Rehoboam's reign to the fall of the city (thus including all Israel, not the ten tribes only), makes it impossible to put the period for Judah anywhere among these. It has been thought, therefore, that we must go back for them to the time of Solomon. Solomon's reign was just forty years; it was a time, it is said, in which Judah had necessarily a special prominence. It was also a time in which the remarkable prosperity which God gave them tested them as to their real condition. The departure of the people into idolatry, Solomon himself drawn into it through his wives, was the sad answer to a test like this. Thus, it is considered, that this is what is pointed to, as significant of their whole history, and through which their captivity was already assured.

But, as already said, this application is entirely against the order here, in which the prophet is distinctly told that when he had accomplished the 390 set thy face toward the siege of Jerusalem, and thine arm shall be uncovered, and thou shalt [a] prophesy against it. And, behold, I lay [b] bands upon thee, and thou shalt not turn from the one side to the other, [c] until thou hast accomplished the days of thy siege.

[a] cf. ch. 34
[b] ch. 3. 25
[c] cf. Lk. 1.

days, each standing for a year, he was to lie again upon his side, the right one, to bear the iniquity of the house of Judah. This is emphasized, then, as coming after the injunction concerning the house of Israel. If, therefore, this period is to be reckoned chronologically at all (as everybody would say it should, but for the difficulty of finding it) we must go forward and not backward for its discovery.

Now it is undeniable that from the time of the destruction of the temple to its rebuilding, according to Ezra iii. 8, there elapse just 40 years; and they have reference distinctly to Judah, whose captivity was then at an end.* The ten tribes never did return. Judah, it is true, only partially; nevertheless the temple was built once more, and the city; and here they were permitted to abide that according to the divine promise the Messiah might come to them. Accordingly the post-captivity prophets, especially Haggai and Zechariah, are full of the coming of Christ. Their very names point to this. Haggai means "festive;" Zechariah, "Jehovah has remembered." Those also who come forward to rebuild the temple, as Zerubbabel, the prince of Judah, and Joshua the son of Josedech, the high priest, are, according to the latter prophet, the double type of Christ as Priest and King. Thus the air is full of the rays of the coming dawn, and the very names breathe the music of it. All seems prepared; and in their prophecies the present is the prelude of a glorious future into which it seemed ready to develop. All seems prepared—except, alas, once more the people; and here the significance of the number puts its impress upon the result. Those 40 years of their captivity should indeed have convinced them where their only hope lay; and under the solemn teaching of men like Ezekiel, they should surely have received the sentence of death in themselves that they should not trust in themselves, but in God who raiseth the dead. To such grace as is in God, had they had hearts to receive it, no power upon earth could be an impediment. But the issue proved how little, in fact, they had learnt by the long story of their past; and Malachi, with whom the voice of prophecy closes, points once more to the needed separation of a remnant, to whom alone the Sun of Righteousness should arise with healing upon His wings. After this, therefore, their history is a mere blank. The prophetic

* The text of the notes presents a difficulty which cannot be solved. The reference to Ezra iii. 8 does not seem to help matters. Our beloved brother is no longer here to explain his meaning. It has therefore been thought best to let the text stand as he wrote it, and to add this note.

The following is suggested as a possible explanation in line with the author's thought. The first deportation to Babylon was in B. C. 606 (2 Kings xxiv. 14). The second and main deportation was in B. C. 598 (2 Kings xxv. 11). This was probably when Ezekiel was carried away—Ezek. i. 1, 2. The Temple was destroyed (Jer. lii. 28–29) in the third deportation, B. C. 588. There seem to be two ways of counting the 70 years' captivity: from the first deportation 606 B. C., to the Edict of Cyrus (Ezra i. 1), B. C. 536; and from the destruction of the Temple, B. C. 588, to its rebuilding, B. C. 518. Thus there is a general as well as a specific meaning to these 70 years. If we consider them as general, not from one date to the other we have, then, from 598 to 588, ten years in which Judah is not completely in captivity; and twenty years from 538 to 518, during which they are in their land. If these 30 years are deducted from the 70 we have the 40 of complete captivity which the prophet expressed.—S. R.

3 (9-17): The third sign: Defilement instead of holiness.

3. And [d]take thou unto thee wheat, and barley, and beans, and lentils, and millet, and spelt, and put them in one vessel, and make thee bread thereof [according to] the [e]number of the days that thou liest upon thy side; three hundred and ninety days shalt thou eat thereof. And thy food that thou shalt eat shall be by [f]weight, twenty shekels a day. From time to time shalt thou eat it. And thou shalt drink [g]water by measure, the sixth part of a hin. From time to time

[d] cf. Dan. 1. 12. cf. Dan. 10. 3.
[e] vers. 4, 5.
[f] ch. 12. 18, 19.
[g] cf. Jer. 2. 13. cf.r. Jno. 4. 13, 14.

voices cease; then a long silence, and the 40 years have proved, as far as the people are concerned, the determination of the whole matter.

Christ comes indeed, as we know; comes to His own according to the promise, but only to be decisively rejected by them, so that they are finally scattered for the whole time in which, already for so long, the Jebusite, "the treader down," has held Jerusalem. Thus the significance of these 40 years is unmistakable; they are seen to be at once symbolical and chronological, and filling their proper place with regard to the 390 years at the close of which they come. There is no contradiction between a symbolical and a chronological import. God is constantly showing His control over human history in giving the facts of history such deeper significance.

3. The third sign follows—some features of which corroborate the view which has just been taken. The prophet is to take wheat and barley and beans and lentils and millet and spelt, and put this miscellaneous material into one vessel, and make bread of it according to the number of the days that he has been lying upon his side. But, notice, the limit is plainly given here as that of 390 days only, not 430 as we should have imagined. Thus there is a distinction of some sort plainly between this period and the 40 days following it. It says, "390 days shalt thou eat thereof." This was, as has already been said, probably at least, the exact time of the siege of the city, which according to the first sign given has fundamental relation to all that is here. The siege of the city is, on the part of the people, their bearing the iniquity of the previous time. Yet, as we know, this is not the whole of the matter. Scattered then among the nations by which they were led captive, they are, in fact, still bearing their iniquity before God; and this extension of the character of the siege to the time following is intimated in what we have here; for the unclean bread which they eat under the pressure of the siege is to be eaten also among the nations whither Jehovah drives them. Thus, while the days of the siege are distinguished in one sense from the period following, yet, in another, they are connected with it. Thus, the 40 years are distinguished from the time of siege, while yet some of the character of that time still attached to them. All seems thus plain enough; and that which at first sight is a difficulty, brings in its solution the solution of other difficulties.

This third sign, indeed, shows the state of the people more than the distresses of the siege themselves do, for here is signified the destruction of their sanctification as a separate people. This polluted bread that is eaten among the Gentiles is no longer the consequence of being shut up within the walls of the besieged city. As we have already seen, they can have, after all, their Telabib by the desolating "river," and rally, alas, all too soon, from the hopelessness of such a condition as the siege of the city implies. But their new hopes shalt thou drink [it]. And thou shalt eat it [as] barley cake, and thou shalt [h] bake it in their sight with dung that cometh out of man. Jehovah hath even said, [i] So shall the children of Israel eat their bread unclean among the [j] nations whither I will drive them.

And I said, Ah, Lord Jehovah, behold, my soul hath not been polluted: for [k] from my youth up, even until now, have I not eaten of that which [l] dieth of itself or of that which is torn, neither hath there come [m] abominable flesh into my mouth. And he said unto me, Behold, I [n] give thee dung of cattle for dung of man, and thou shalt prepare thy bread therewith. And he said unto me, Son of man, behold, I am [o] breaking the staff of bread in Jerusalem; and they shall eat bread by weight and in anxiety, and they shall drink water by measure and with astonishment, because bread and water shall [p] fail them, and they shall be dismayed one with another and [q] pine away in their iniquity.

h cf. Isa. 3 12.
ctr. Ex.19
ctr. Lev. 25, 26.
i cf. Deut. 64 68.
j cf. Hos. 9 3.
k cf. Acts 14.
l Ex. 22. 3 Lev. 11. 3 40.
m Lev. 11. Is. 65. 4. ctr. Phil. 4 n cf. Lev. 19, 20.
o Lev. 26. Ps. 105. 1 Is. 3. 1. cf. Amos 11-13.
p ctr. Jer. 13-16.
q Lev. 26. Deut. 28. 48.

only reveal more deeply their condition, despising as they do the chastening of the Lord, and building themselves up on hopes which, instead of encouraging them to a true separation of heart to God, practically reduce them in God's sight to the level of the nations around them. In fact, the contamination of contact with the heathen, in more ways than their captivity would necessarily involve (for an Ezekiel and a Daniel were among the captives too), is shown, as we have already seen, most signally on their return from captivity. If after their return they learned to build themselves up in a proud isolation, such as we find in the Rabbinism which soon began, and which found its perfect expression in the pretentious hypocrisy of Pharisaism, this was at the farthest extreme from any return to God. Their bread, in fact, become most thoroughly defiled, when, instead of the precious Word which God had given them, they taught "for commandments, the doctrines of men," and once more substituted for that Word by which men live, "statutes that were not good, and judgments whereby man could not live." For a remnant among those that had returned from Babylon it was a period in which there was a famine of the word of God itself; and their association with those that had returned from the captivity must have become a thing less endurable than the captivity itself.

4. A fourth sign closes the series here. As in the last we have already got beyond the siege of the city, so in the present we are manifestly beyond it, but with no revocation of the sentence upon them. Ezekiel was now to take a sharp sword, using it as a barber's razor to put upon himself the brand of shame upon his head and beard—thus manifestly in the sight of all. This was forbidden to the priest (which Ezekiel was), and thus the loss of the priestly character is made apparent. But this enforced shaving of the hair is used with a further significance, to show the fate of Israel's scattered multitudes, thus smitten. A third part was to be burnt in the midst of the city when the days of the siege were fulfilled, most evidently referring to the slaughter of the multitude when the city was taken. A third part was to be smitten about with the sword, the sword drawn out after them in the land of their captivity itself. The final third part was to be scattered to the wind, and of these, only a few in number were to be bound in the prophet's skirts for preservation;

4 (1-4): The fourth sign: reduced to a few.

4. And thou, son of man, take thee a sharp [r]sword, [as] a barber's [s]razor shalt thou take it unto thee, and cause it to pass over [t]thy head and over thy beard, and thou shalt take [u]balances, and weigh, and divide [the hair]. A [v]third part shalt thou [w]burn in the fire in the midst of the city, when the days of the siege are fulfilled; and thou shalt take a third part [and] [x]smite about it with a sword; and a third part shalt thou [y]scatter to the wind, and I will draw out a sword after them: and thou shalt take thereof a [z]few in number and bind them in thy skirts; and thou shalt take of [a]these again, and cast them into the midst of the fire, and burn them in the fire. Therefrom shall fire go forth to [b]all the house of Israel.

5 (5-17): The summing up of judgment.

5. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, This is Jerusalem. I [c]set her in the midst of the nations, and [the] lands were round about her, and she hath [d]rebelled against my judgments for wickedness [e]beyond the nations, and against my statutes more than the lands which are round about her. For my judgments they have [f]despised, and have not [g]walked in my statutes. Therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Because ye have been [h]turbulent more than the nations which are round about you, [and] have not walked in my statutes nor kept my judgments, nor have [even] done [i]according to the judgments of the nations that are round about you, therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Behold, I, even I, am [j]against thee, and will execute judgments in the midst of thee in the [k]sight of the nations, and I will do in thee that which I have [l]not done, and the like of which I will not do any more, because of all thine abominations. Therefore [m]fathers shall eat [their] sons in the midst of thee, and sons shall eat their fathers, and I will execute judgments in thee, and [n]scatter the whole remnant of thee to all the winds.

r Isa. 51. 19.
s cf. Is. 7. 20.
t ctr. Lev. 21. 5 with ch. 44. 20.
u cf. Is. 40. 12, 15. cf. 1 Sam. 2. 3.
v cf. Dan. 5. 27.
w cf. Zech. 13. 8, 9. ver. 12. ch. 4. 1, 8.
x ch. 4. 8, 9. Jer. 7. 20.
y Lev. 26. 25. ver. 17.
z Lev. 26. 33. Deut. 4. 27. Jer. 9. 16.
a Lev. 26. 22. Deut. 28. 62. cf. Is. 1. 9.
c cf. Jer. 41. 2. cf. Jer. 41 28.
b cf. Jer. 9. 26. cf. ch. 22. 18-22.
c cf. Deut. 32. 8. cf. Ps. 48. 2. d cf. Is. 1. 2.
e cf. Mt. 11. 21-24. cf. ch. 36. 20. cf. ch. 16. 47.
f cf. Prov. 1. 25.
g Is. 2. 5.
h cf. Jer. 2. 10, 11. ch. 16. 47. cf. 1 Cor. 5. 1.
i ctr. Mi. 4. 5.
j cf. Am. 3. 1. ctr. Rom. 8. 31.
k ctr. Ps. 98. 2.
l cf. Dan. 9. 12. cf. Mt. 24. 21.
m Lev. 26. 29. Jer. 19. 9.
n Lev. 26. 33. Deut. 4. 27. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 1.

while again even of these also some are taken and cast into the midst of the fire to be burned. It is the awful fire of the wrath of God which is thus going forth to all the house of Israel. The significance here is so plain that it hardly needs comment. There is, as we see, the sparing of a feeble remnant—alas, how feeble now! But this is all that even the voice of mercy has any longer to say to them.

5. We have now the summing up of the judgment in general, along with the solemn declaration of that for which the judgment comes. Jerusalem is still taken as the sign of the state of the people as a whole, the city in which the house of God was: to lose which was to lose the only place in which the atoning blood could be presented to God; so that for Jerusalem to be set aside was for the nation to be left to the full burden of its sins. But for what a purpose had God set them in this place of privilege—this people alone in all the earth the recipient of divine revelations? In the midst of the nations, as we have seen abundantly, it should have been theirs to maintain a testimony for

Therefore, as I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, verily because thou hast [o]defiled my sanctuary with all thy detestable things, and with all thine abominations, therefore will I also [p]withdraw* mine eye that it may not spare, neither will I have [q]pity. A third part of thee shall die of the [r]pestilence, and shall be consumed by the famine in the midst of thee, and a third part shall fall by the [s]sword round about thee, and I will [t]scatter a third part to all the winds, and draw out a sword after them, and mine anger shall be accomplished, and I will cause my wrath† to [u]rest upon them and will comfort myself, and they shall [v]know that I, Jehovah, have spoken in my jealousy when I have accomplished my wrath† upon them, and I will make thee a [w]desolation and a reproach among the nations that are round about thee, before the eyes of every [x]passer by; and it shall be a [y]reproach and a [z]taunt, and a [a]warning and an [b]astonishment unto the nations that are round about thee, when I shall execute judgments in thee in anger and in fury and in furious rebukes.‡ I, Jehovah, have spoken. When I send upon them the evil [c]arrows of famine which are for destruction, which I send to destroy you, I will even increase famine upon you and break for you the staff of bread, and I will send upon you famine and evil [d]beasts, and they shall bereave thee, and pestilence and blood shall pass through thee, and I will bring the sword upon thee. I, [e]Jehovah, have spoken.

o 2 Chr. 36 cf. Lev. 16.
p cf. Hos. 8. cf. Jer. 4
q ch. 9. 10
r ver. 2. Jer. 15. 2 Deut. 28.
s ch. 6. 12 Lev. 26.
t Lev. 26. Deut. 28 Zech. 2.
Ps. 44. 1
u ch. 21. cf. Is. 1. cfr. Zeph. 17.
v ch. 6. 1
w Lev. 26 Jer. 4. 7. Lam. 1.
x Lam. 1. cf. 2 Chr. 20. 21.
y Ps. 79.
z cf. Zeph. 8.
a cf. 1 Ki. 8. 9.
b cf. Jer. 9.
c Deut. 32. 24.
d Lev. 26 cf. ch. 34.
e ver. 15.

* Or, "Diminish [thee], and mine eye shall not spare."
† Literally, "Heat." ‡ Literally, "Rebukes of wrath."

God amongst those that had turned their backs upon Him—a testimony which might appeal to every heart that sought God in the lands around. But what was the result? Israel had gone beyond the very nations themselves in wickedness, refusing His judgments and rebelling against His statutes; copying the manners of those from whom, because of their condition, God had separated them, they became all the more (as would necessarily be the case, for the abuse of their privileges) aliens from God and devoted to their abominations. God therefore had to make their judgment as unique as their iniquity had been. Even here the tenderness of His love is shown in the very announcement of His judgment; and we see indeed again the "appearance as of a Man upon the throne." "I will withdraw mine eye," He says, "that it may not spare thee." The eye affects the heart, and it is as if He said that, if He allowed Himself but to let His eye rest upon them, He could not bear to execute the judgment. This is the Heart behind the Hand; but the Hand does not on that account really falter in the carrying out of that which righteousness now so imperatively demands. If, on the one hand, He has a pitiful eye that would spare, yet on the other there is that in His character which makes Him speak of the wrath which He causes to rest upon them as that in which He will "comfort Himself."

Yet even here there is a lesson, as we know, for every susceptible heart

SECTION 5 (Chap. vi.)

The sinful people in Jehovah's hands.

And the [f]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, set thy face toward the [g]mountains of Israel, and prophesy against them and say, Ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Lord Jehovah: Thus saith the Lord Jehovah to the mountains and to the hills, to the water channels and to the [h]valleys, Behold, I, even I, am bringing upon you a sword, and I will [i]destroy your high places, and your altars shall be desolate, and your [j]sun-pillars shall be broken, and I will cast down your [k]slain before your idols. I will even lay the [l]carcasses of the children of Israel before their idols,* and [m]scatter your bones round about your altars. In all your dwel'ing places shall the cities be [n]laid waste, and the [o]high places become desolate; that your [p]altars may be laid waste and made desolate,† and your idols may be [q]broken and cease, and your sun-pillars be [r]hewn down, and your [s]works be abolished. And

f ch. 7. 1.
g ch. 20. 40. ch. 36. 1. cf. Is. 40. 4.
h Lev. 26. 30. cf. 18. 2. 18. ver. 6. Lev. 26. 30. 2 Chr. 14. 5. Is. 17. 8.
i 2 Ki. 23. 20. 1 Ki. 13. 2. 2 Chr. 34. 5.
j cf. 2 Ki. 23. 15, 16. cf. Ps. 53. 5.
k cf. Is. 1. 7.
l cf. 2 Chr. 14. 3. cf. Lev. 26. 30.
m cf. Hos. 8. 11. cf. Hos. 10. 8.
n cf. 1 Sa. 5. 4. cf. Is. 46. 1, 2. cf. Is. 2. 18.
o cf. Is. 10. 33. cf. Judg. 6. 25–28.
p cf. Jer. 25. 6.

* Or, "abominations." † More literally, "become guilty."

amongst them, as there is a terrible lesson of holiness for the nations around. "They shall know that I, Jehovah, have spoken in my jealousy when I have accomplished my wrath upon them. And I will make thee a desolation and reproach among the nations that are round about thee, before the eyes of every passer by; and it shall be a reproach and a taunt and a warning and an astonishment to the nations that are round about thee." This is sealed again and again by the solemn asseveration: "I, Jehovah, have spoken."

Sec. 5.

The word of Jehovah now comes afresh to the prophet with the distinct count in the indictment against Israel. The mountains are here specifically addressed because of their connection with the people's idolatrous foreign worship which had its location there. The channels of water and the valleys, as dependent upon them, have a necessary place here also. In contrast with Egypt, the land of independence—watered by its river, whose sources were so far off that practically they could forget all about them—Israel's land was a land of mountains and valleys, drinking the water of the rain of heaven, a land essentially dependent, and its dependence manifest, but a land which, as thus cast upon God, was such as He specially chose for a people that were in like manner to be dependent upon Himself, and thus to realize His gracious and continual care. Thus it was "a land that the Lord thy God careth for," where the eyes and the heart of Jehovah were continually. It is noticeable that Shinar was, like Egypt, nourished by its rivers, and in distinct contrast with the mountains from which those who colonized it had come down. "They found," Scripture says (what exactly suited them), "a plain in the land of Shinar, and they dwelt there." Here, therefore, as so constantly in Scripture, the material thing is significant of the spiritual condition. Israel's mountains were in this way like a constant prayer to God, upon which the dews of heaven settled, and brought down the rain so continually needed. At the same time, the [t]slain shall fall in the midst of you, and ye shall [u]know that I am Jehovah. Yet will I [v]leave a remnant,* in that ye shall have some [w]escaped from the sword among the nations, when ye shall be scattered in the countries. And they that escape of you shall [z]remember me among the nations whither they have been carried captives, how that I have been broken† with their [y]lewd heart which hath departed from me, and their eyes which play the harlot after their idols,‡ and they shall [z]loathe themselves in their own sight for the evils which they have committed in all their abominations, and they shall know that I am Jehovah. Not in [a]vain have I said that I would do this evil to them.

Thus saith the Lord ⁊ Jehovah: [b]Smite with thy hand, and stamp with thy foot, and say, Alas, because of all

[t] ver. 13. cf. Jer. 2 33.
[u] ch. 7. 4, e cf. Ps. 9.
[v] ch. 5. 2, 6 Rom. 9.
[w] ch. 14. 2 cf. Is. 4.
[x] cf. Lev. 40-42. cf. ch. 16.
[y] ch. 44. 7. cf. ch. 16.
[z] ch. 20. 4 ch. 36. 31.
[a] cf. Gal. 6
[b] ch. 21.14 cf. Nu.24 cf. Amos 1.

* This clause is expressed by one Hebrew word.
† Others, including Hengstenberg, translate, "when I have broken."
‡ Or, "abominations." ⁊ Adonai.

and beautifully, these mountains were also the fortifications of the land which would derive its strength in the same way in which it preserved constantly its dependence upon and appeal to heaven. This distinguished and separated them from the nations around which had got far enough away from God to identify Him with the mere creatures of His hand.

Thus Israel's land was to be a protest against the heathenism which everywhere else prevailed, and in this way suited to be the depository of a continually growing revelation, the blessing of which is ours to-day. But, alas, what had Israel done? They had made these very mountains to be but heathen altars with which to insult their gracious Protector, the Source of all their blessing. Upon the tops of those mountains, the idolatrous altars that were so conspicuous there were now the sad witnesses of their own departure from Jehovah, their covenant God, who had signified Himself such in the very name which they thus insulted. They must, therefore, by judgment be made to recognize Him as the Jehovah that He was. And thus, as if the people themselves were unworthy to be addressed, the word by the prophet comes to the mountains, to the hills, to the water channels and to the valleys: "Behold, I, even I, am bringing upon you a sword. And I will destroy your high places, and your altars shall be desolate, and your sun-pillars shall be broken, and I will cast down your slain before your altars. I will even lay the carcases of the children of Israel before their idols, and scatter your bones round about your altars." Thus were they to prove now by experience, as bitter as God would have made it sweet to them, that He was Jehovah indeed.

Yet a remnant is to be left, to be His witness on the one hand of the grace in which He would for His own sake at last fulfil His promises; "a remnant," as the apostle says, "according to the election of grace;" on the other hand a remnant that must witness in sorrow and brokenness of spirit the judgment which had come in because of the abominations practised, and from which grace alone could exempt any. "Yet will I leave a remnant," He says, "in that ye the evil abominations of the house of Israel, for they shall [c]fall by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence. He that is [d]far off shall die of the pestilence; and he that is near shall fall by the sword; and he that is [e]left and is preserved * shall die by the famine; and I will accomplish my wrath upon them. And ye shall [f]know that I am Jehovah, when their slain shall be among their idols round about their altars, upon [g]every high hill, upon all the tops of the mountains, and under every green tree, and under every thick terebinth, the places where they offered sweet savor to all their idols.† And I will [h]stretch out my hand upon them and make the land desolate, yea, more desolate than the [i]wilderness of Diblath, in all their dwelling places. And they shall [j]know that I am Jehovah.

[c] ch. 5. 12. cf. Jer. 15. 2. cf. Jer. 21. 9.
[d] cf. 1 Ki. 21. 24. cf. Am. 3. 10.
[e] cf. ch. 5. 2–4.
[f] ch. 5. 13. ver. 7.
[g] cf. Jer. 2. 20. cf. Is. 57. 5, 7. cf. Hos. 4. 13.
[h] Is. 5. 25. Is. 9. 12.
[i] cf. Jer. 48. 21, 22.
[j] ver. 7. ch. 20. 38.

* Or, "besieged." † Or, "abominations."

shall have some escaped from the sword among the nations, when ye shall be scattered through the countries. And they of you that escape shall remember Me among the nations whither they have been carried captives; how that I have been broken with their lewd hearts which have departed from Me, and their eyes which play the harlot after their idols." But here the judgment should have its desired effect: "And they shall loathe themselves in their own sight for the evils which they have committed in all their abominations, and they shall know that I am Jehovah." Alas for the people, to whom God had revealed Himself after so abundant a manner, who now needed to be called back to the recognition of the blessed Person Himself who had delivered and blessed them!

But, for the mass, no judgment could avail: "Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Smite with thy hand, and stamp with thy foot, and say, Alas, because of all the evil abominations of the house of Israel! for they shall fall by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence." Nothing but a complete emptying of the land as to the living could now suffice—leaving it a mere sepulchre of their multitudinous dead, reeking with the unburied corpses which would make it desolate, "more desolate than the wilderness towards Diblath." This last word, though there is question about it, probably means "fertility." Such indeed should have been the condition in every way of Jehovah's land, which was now to be so utter a desolation. In all their dwelling-places, as scattered amongst the nations, they were at last to know, without any peradventure, that their God was Jehovah.

Sec. 6.

The final word is now addressed through the prophet to the land of Israel, the very soil itself, to which the end is come, in all the four corners of it. Thus, clearly, there is no hope of anything more. There is no soil to produce fruit. The limit of forbearance is reached, and there is no limit to the wrath, save only that there are those in whom grace manifests its power still, as there always will be. Otherwise the end was upon the whole land, an end in God's anger, the condition of things in it being the manifest proof of all the abominations of its inhabitants. The earth at large, as we well know, suffers every-

SECTION 6 (Chap. vii).

The limit of forbearance reached.

And the [k]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying. And thou, son of man, thus saith the Lord* Jehovah unto the land† of Israel: An [l]end, the end is come upon the four corners of the land.† Now is the end upon thee; and I will send mine [m]anger upon thee, and will judge thee [n]according to thy ways, and will bring upon thee all thine abominations. And mine eye shall [o]not spare thee, neither will I have pity: but I will bring thy ways upon thee, and thine abominations shall be in the midst of thee: and ye shall [p]know that I am Jehovah.

k cf. ch. 1. ch. 6. 1.
l vers. 5, 6. cf. Am. 8. cf. Mt. 24.1
m cf. Ps. 21.
n cf. Ps. 28. cf. 2 Cor 10.
o ch. 5. 11. ch. 8. 18. ch. 9. 5, 10 p ch. 12. 2 etc.

* Adonai. † Two different words.

where because of the sin of man, both by the desolations which sin itself naturally produces, and by the judgments which are upon it from God. Thus the places of highest privilege may become necessarily the places of most marked desolation. God's own pitiful eye can spare no more "I will bring thy ways upon thee, and thine abominations shall be in the midst of thee:" that is, there is no deliverance, no ability to roll off the burden. The unchangeableness of Jehovah Himself certifies and assures the continuation of the punishment.

Thus He declares that that which has come is evil, and only evil. It is unmixed calamity. The "turn"—that is, the revolution of the wheel—is come to the dweller in the land. Much difficulty has been made of an expression which is very simple in view of what forms so large a part of Ezekiel's vision—those wheels that are so high as to be terrible, that do a terrible though needful work in the abasement of man, and even in view of final restoration. The privileged people of God thus become subject to the mutability which is the law of all things merely human. They could claim no exemption; and even the higher they had been lifted, the more terrible would be the fall. The time had come for this—not the day which in false hope they had been prophesying for themselves, but of consternation and confusion; the battle lost, not won; no joyful tidings of victory to announce from the mountain-tops, as there will be even yet in the future for them (Isa. xl. 9); for the wrath of God was now to be poured out wholly, and His anger consummated, although it would be no more than just the fruit of their ways, the equal demonstration of divine righteousness in their case; taken, as they were, with the evidences of their guilt in their midst, in all the idolatry which polluted them and which we shall soon have exhibited in full detail.

It is a solemn thing to realize that God permits full consummation of human iniquity before the judgment falls. As it was in Israel, so it will be in Christendom. God does not come in to judge in a day of reformation, even partial as this may be. If He sees even an Ahab putting on sackcloth and walking softly before Him, He refrains from judgment (1 Kings xxi. 27–29). With Ahab it was mere fear, of course—nothing that God could really accept; and yet it was enough to avert, for the moment, the imminent wrath; and thus the abominations that are everywhere under the surface in Christendom must be allowed to come out openly before the full judgment comes.

Thus saith the Lord* Jehovah; An [q]evil, an only evil! behold, it is come. The end is come, the end is come; it awaketh against thee; behold, it cometh, it cometh. The turn† of the [r]wheel is come to thee, O dweller in the land; the time is come, the day is near—a tumult, and [s]not a joyful shout upon the mountains. Now will I soon pour out my fury upon thee, and accomplish mine anger against thee; and I will judge thee according to thy ways, and I will bring upon thee all thine abominations. And mine [t]eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity: I will render to thee according to thy ways, and thine abominations shall be in the midst of thee; and ye shall know that it is I, Jehovah, that smite.

Behold, the [u]day; behold, it is come! The turn of the wheel is come forth; the [v]rod hath blossomed; [w]pride is full blown. [x]Violence is risen up into a rod of wickedness; there [shall remain] [y]none of them, nor of their multitude, nor of their wealth, nor shall there be [z]wailing for them. The time is come, the day [a]draweth near: let not the [b]buyer rejoice nor the seller mourn; for wrath is upon all the multitude thereof. For the seller shall [c]not return to that which is sold, though he‡ were yet among the living: for the q cf. Jer. 1. 14. cf. Amos 3. 6. with Is. 45. 7.

r ver. 10. cf. Ps. 83. 13. cf. ch. 10. 13. cf. Dan. 7. 10.
s cf. Is. 2. 12-17. ctr. Is. 44. 23. ctr. Is. 52. 7. ctr. Nah. 1. 15.
t ver. 4. ctr. Mal. 3. 17.
u Is. 13. 6. Zeph. 1. 7. Mal. 4. 5. cf. 1 Thess. 5. 2, 3.
v cf. Jer. 1. 11, 12. cf. Mt. 24. 32, 33.
w cf. Ps. 59. 12. cf. Prov. 16. 18. cf. Dan. 4. 30, 31, 37.
x Jer. 6. 7. Jer. 20. 8. cf. Ps. 55. 9-11.
y cf. Is. 39. 6. Jer. 50. 26.
z cf. Jer. 16. 5, 6. ctr. Lk. 19. 41.
a cf. Jas. 5. 8. cf. 1 Cor. 7. 29-31.
c cf. Lk. 21. 21.

* Adonai.

† The word is of doubtful meaning. In Isaiah 28: 5, it is rendered "crown." The primary meaning is given as "ring." Hengstenberg renders it "lot." The text is perhaps the best rendering.

‡ More literally, "though their life were yet," etc.

The Church must be removed, and the indwelling Spirit of God that hinders the full development of things according to their nature. The restraint removed, there will be manifested, in the man of sin, the iniquity which has been working in mystery through the ages past. This has to be brought out of its concealment, and the delusion which man seeks must be permitted to him. Then, as the issue, there will be that open defiance of God in every way in which He has revealed Himself, which will necessitate the full display of long-lingering judgment. He who is to come will come, and "will smite the earth with the rod of His mouth, and with the breath of His lips destroy the wicked one" (Isa. xi. 4).

But the time of wrath upon Christendom can only come after there has been the full revelation of God, and time given for the effect of it to be fully manifest. Almost 2,000 years have passed since the revelation has been completed, and now he that will may see that the end is at hand.

The judgment upon Israel here is only a partial anticipation of the wrath in that day. Nevertheless, the rooting of Israel out of their land, and the desolation of the house which God had among men, marked a distinct crisis, the day of which had come. The turn of the wheel, as Ezekiel repeats, had come to them. The rod for the punishment of their iniquity was blossoming, even as the pride which provoked the judgment was indeed full blown. Violence among them had thus risen up into a rod to smite them: in itself a rod of wickedness, no doubt; for not vision is touching the whole multitude thereof; it shall not be revoked; and none* shall through his [d]iniquity assure his life. They have blown the [e]trumpet and made all ready, but none goeth to the battle; for my [f]wrath is upon all the multitude thereof. The [g]sword is without, and the pestilence and the famine [h]within: he that is in the field shall [i]die by the sword; and he that is in the city, famine and pestilence shall devour him. And they that [j]escape of them shall escape, and shall be on the mountains like doves of the valleys, all of them [k]mourning, every one for his iniquity. All [l]hands shall be feeble,† and all knees shall dissolve‡ into water. And they shall gird on [m]sackcloth, and [n]horror‖ shall cover them; and shame shall be upon all faces, and [o]baldness upon all their heads. They shall cast their [p]silver in the streets, and their gold shall be as an unclean thing; their silver and their gold shall [q]not be able to deliver them in the day of Jehovah's wrath; they shall not [r]satisfy their souls, nor fill their belly: for it hath been the [s]stumbling-block of their iniquity.

* Literally, "A man shall not," etc.
† Or, "hang down." ‡ Literally, "go." ‖ Or, "trembling."
4; Zeph. 1. 18; cf. Ps. 115. 4-8. r cf. Is. 9. 20; ctr. Ps. 103. 5. s cf. ch. 14. 3, 4;

d cf. Jer. 17 11.
cf. Ps. 55, 2
cf. Prov. 1 2 with Prov. 11. 4
e cf. 2 Ki. 9. 13.
cf. 1 Ki. 1. 41-49.
f ver. 8.
g Deut. 32. 2 Lam. 1. 20
h cf. 2 Ki. 7. 4.
Lam. 1. 20
i cf. 1 Ki. 21 24.
j ch. 6. 8.
cf. Ps 11.
k Is. 59. 11. Lam. 3. 10
l cf. Heb. 1 12.
ch. 21. 7.
Is. 13. 7.
m cf. 2 Ki. 1 1.
Is. 22. 12.
Joel 1. 13.
n cf. Is. 51. 1
cf. Jer. 3, 2 25.
o Is. 3. 24.
Amos 8. 1
p cf. Is. 2. 2 21.
q cf. Prov. 1
cf. Rev. 2. 1

on account of righteousness in the enemy did God permit their triumph over His people; yet comparatively even these were clean. They had not trampled God's gifts under their feet as Israel had done. And thus they had themselves invited the scourge which was now to sweep through the land, leaving nothing remaining, neither of their multitude, nor of their wealth, nor even any to wail for the absence of these. The time was already come, the day was at hand; the buyer need no more rejoice in that which he had acquired, nor the seller either mourn for that which he had lost: for the wrath upon all was without distinction. No day of jubilee would return with its gracious provision to him who had had to give up his patrimony through poverty; and if even his life were yet permitted to him there would be no land for him to return to. "The vision," says the Lord, "is touching the whole multitude thereof. It shall not be revoked, and none shall through his iniquity assure his life." Strange indeed that man under the very judgment of God could think to secure himself by means of the very iniquity which was bringing down the judgment; yet man is capable of just such thoughts.

The prophet sees only utter desolation. Were the trumpet blown, there was none to go to battle. Sword, pestilence and famine had already done their work, and if there were but a few that escaped, they would be like scared and scattered doves of the valleys driven to the mountains—all of them with their mournful plaint, and every one for his own iniquity. Horror would cover them, shame be upon their faces, and baldness upon their heads. The very silver and gold, so precious to man, would be cast away in bitterness as worthless, utterly unable to accomplish anything for them; neither to satisfy their souls, nor fill their belly; for indeed it was the very stumbling-block of their iniquity. God had enriched them with that which was much more than the

And he set in majesty his beautiful ᵗornament,* but they made therein the ᵘimages of their abominations and of their detestable things: therefore have I made it unto them an ᵛunclean thing. And I will ʷgive it into the hands of ˣstrangers for a prey, and to the wicked of the earth for a spoil; and they shall profane it. And I will ʸturn my face from them, and they shall ᶻprofane my secret [place];† even the violent shall enter into it and profane it.

Make the chain; for the land is full of ᵃbloody crimes, and the city is full of violence. Therefore‡ I will bring the worst of the nations, and they shall possess their houses; and I will make the ᵇpride of the strong to cease; and their sanctuaries shall be profaned.§ Destruction cometh: and they shall ᶜseek peace, but there shall be none. ᵈMischief‖ shall come upon mischief, and rumor¶ shall come upon rumor; and they shall ᵉseek a vision from the prophet; but the law shall ᶠperish from the priest, and counsel from the elders. The ᵍking shall mourn, and the prince shall put on blank amazement, and the ʰhands of the people of the land shall tremble: I will do unto them ⁱaccording to their way, and according to their deserts will I judge them; and they shall ᵏknow that I am Jehovah.

t cf. Jer. 4. 30. cf. ch. 16. 17.
u cf. Judg. 8. 24-27.
v cf. ch. 36. 17.
w Is. 1. 7.
x cf. Jer. 18. 17. cf. Ps. 34. 16. ctr. Ps. 80. 3, 7, 19.
y Ps. 79. 1.
z cf. Is. 1. 15. cf. Num. 35. 33.
a cf. Is. 23. 9. cf. Is. 40. 6-8 with 1 Pet. 1. 24, 25.
b cf. Prov. 1. 28. cf. Zech. 7. 13. ctr. 2 Cor. 6. 2 c cf. Job 1. 14-19. Jer. 4. 20. ctr. Jno. 1. 16
d cf. Amos 8. 11. Lam. 2. 9 cf. ch. 20. 3.
e ctr. Jer. 18. 18.
f cf. 2 Ki. 6. 30.
g ver. 17.
h Gal. 6. 7. Hos. 12. 2.
i ver. 4, etc.

* Hengstenberg renders this, "And his glorious ornament he has set for pride." † Or, "treasure." ‡ "And."
§ More literally, as Hengstenberg, "They who consecrate them shall be defiled." ‖ Or, "injury." ¶ Or, "message."

riches so much valued by man: He had set the beautiful ornament of His own house in their midst, and they had put therein the images of their abominations; so that God had Himself to treat His holy house as an unclean thing, and give it up to the hands of strangers to be a spoil for the wicked of the earth.

Thus the prophet is bidden now to "make the chain" which indeed they had forged for themselves, as the crimes that filled their land attested. No sanctuary could be maintained in the midst of a people such as they were, and the glory of God required the removal of that which now only dishonored Him by its existence. Thus all, in fact, was gone. The prophet who was alone their hope, in days when every other link was broken, would have a vision from God no more, as the law would perish from the priest, and counsel from the elders. From prince to people they would alike now receive their judgment; and thus they would know (how terrible to know it thus, and how constant the repetition of this!) that their God was Jehovah.

Subdivision 2.

There yet remains to be given proof of the general charge which has been made as to the condition of the people, and this in view of all the privileges, all the mercies shown, and all the warnings given. Here it is Jerusalem, and those connected with it, that are especially before us, as those most conspicuous

1 (viii. 1): The just cause of judgment.

SUBDIVISION 2 (Chap. viii.–xix.).

Conviction of the sin for which the glory leaves the city.

SECTION 1 (Chaps. viii.-xi.).

The shepherd's rod becomes a rod of iron.

1 (1-6): The first cause, the image of jealousy. Rebellion against God as the one living and almighty Maker.

1. [1] AND it came to pass in the [j]sixth year, in the sixth [month], on the fifth of the month, that I sat in my house, and the [k]elders of Judah sat before me, [and] the [l]hand of the Lord* Jehovah fell there upon me.

j cf. ch. 1. 2. cf. ch. 20. 1 k ch. 14. 1, ch. 20. 1, ch. 33. 31. cf. Lk. 5. 17
l ch. 1. 3, ch. 3. 22.

* Adonai.

for the pride of heart which hardened itself against all warning. Proportionately to the mercy that had so far spared, so must their punishment be.

Sec. 1.

Jehovah had been their Shepherd, as witnessed by the pillar of cloud and glory, of which Ezekiel speaks so much, which had guided and protected them. But it is this that has now become their adversary. Their Shepherd's rod becomes thus to themselves—not to their enemies merely—a rod of iron; and God calls in the witness of man himself to the necessity of this. God calls to witness earth as well as heaven, in the judgment of His people; after which the glory finally leaves the city.

1. There are four examples given, all witnesses to their complete adoption of the idolatry around them. Question has been raised as to how far that which Ezekiel sees in vision answered to the facts. For instance, as to the actual defilement of the temple in the way that Ezekiel sees it, it being supposed by some that it is God Himself who connects their abominations with that holy house of His, which stamped its character upon the land. Yet, while it is true that all here is expressly stated to be in vision, it is clear that there must be in it, none the less, a true picture of the people's state. It is the evidence upon which they are convicted; it must not be merely ideal, therefore, but the positive facts of the case—facts that could be appealed to as without possibility of question.

[1] The new division is marked, as we might expect, by a new date, although reckoned from the same significant period as before—that of Jehoiachin's captivity. We have come now to the sixth year of this; and the sixth month of the sixth year emphasizes the thought of evil come to its head, but at the same time with God's hand over it; while the fifth day, the day of the vision, links responsibility with judgment. On this day the prophet is in his own house, the place of family relationships, which could not be exempt from the invasion of that which, as judgment, brooded over the whole people; the shadow falling even where grace had wrought exemption from the actual judgment.

The presence of the elders of Judah prevents that which follows from being simply a private, personal communication. Nothing is said of the purpose for which they were there; it is therefore a matter of entire indifference. We need no speculations to explain what is manifestly unexplained. The elders are rulers of Judah, as is manifest—those who should have maintained judgment according to God, but who now were made the witness of judgment which was coming from God in place of that which they had failed to exercise. In

Then I beheld and, lo, a [m]likeness as the appearance of fire, from the appearance of his [n]loins and downward, [o]fire; and from his loins and upward, as the appearance of [p]brightness, as the look of [q]gold- [and] brass. And he put forth the [r]form of a hand, and took me by a [s]lock of my head; and the [t]Spirit lifted me up between the earth and the heavens, and brought me in the [u]visions of God to Jerusalem, to the entrance

[m] ch. 1. 26.
[n] ch. 1. 27. cf. Heb. 12. 29.
[o] cf. Lk. 9. 29.
[q] ch. 1. 4. cf. Rev. 1. 15.
[r] cf. Dan. 5. 5.
[s] cf. 2 Cor. 12. 2.
[t] ch. 3. 12, 14.
[u] ch. 11. 1, 24. ch. 40. 2. cf. Rev. 20. 10.

their presence, then, the hand of the Lord Jehovah fell once more upon the prophet.

He beholds, and, first of all, there appears to him, as he has seen before, the likeness of a Man upon the throne of God. Again there is seen, "as the appearance of fire"—the holiness of God, which against unrepentant wickedness is wrath, and which takes this character especially "from the loins and downward:" that is, in that which speaks of the activities of the person seen, rather than of the personality itself. "From the loins upward" there is the appearance of brightness, as the look of gold and brass. Thus we are ever reminded that, whatever the work may be, the character of Him who is engaged in it cannot fail to be displayed; and there is for us the joy of this, the appearance of a brightness, which is in fact that of the divine glory itself, the glory of One who is in His own nature immutable, of which the brass speaks.

There is at first no vision of anything beside, not even of the throne upon which He sits, no living creatures, no wheels. We shall come to these directly, but we have to notice that here, first of all, we have the Lord Himself. It is He who puts forth the form of a hand, and taking the prophet by a lock of his head, the Spirit lifts him up between earth and heaven, and brings him in the visions of God to Jerusalem. Thus it is plain that all that follows here is a vision simply. It is a vision according to the truth, necessarily, because it is a vision of God; nevertheless, we have to remember that God looks forward as well as back, and that the judgments which are seen now to take place may be, in fact, as in the slaughter of those in the temple courts and in the city, that which takes place afterwards, and not necessarily at the moment in which they are seen.

In Jerusalem, as the prophet is carried there, nothing is seen but its great dominant feature, the house of God which is in it. Here is the heart of the whole subject before us—the heart of God Himself; of Him who assumes for the prophet the "form of a Man," and of whom it could be said from of old that His "delights were with the sons of men." The temple is the symbol of this, for which David's heart longed after as the abode of God among men; of which He, of whom David was but the mere shadow, "sware unto Jehovah and vowed unto the mighty One of Jacob, Surely I will not come into the tabernacle of my house, nor go up to my bed; I will not give sleep to mine eyes, or slumber to mine eyelids, until I find out a place for Jehovah, a tabernacle for the Mighty One of Jacob" (Ps. 132: 2–5). And where did David himself find this? "Lo," he says, "we heard of it in Ephratah; we found it in the fields of the wood." Thus had man treated in those days the token of the Lord's presence with them; what had characterized the preceding time was that the ark "had not been inquired of in the days of Saul" (1 Chr. xiii. 3).

of the [t]inner gate that looketh toward the [u]north, where was the seat of the [x]image of jealousy, which [y]provoketh to jealousy. And, behold, the [z]glory of the God of Israel was there, [a]according to the appearance that I saw in the plain. And he said unto me, Son of man, [b]lift up now thine eyes the way towards the north. And I lifted up mine eyes the way toward the north and, behold, northward of the gate of the altar this image of jealousy in the entry. And he said

v cf. ver. 14; cf. Neh. 12. 5.
w cfr. Ps. 48. 2.
x Jer. 7. 30; cf. Ex. 20. 4; cfr. Col. 3. 5 with Mt. 3. 17.
y Deut. 32. 16-21.
z cf. Ex. 33. 18; cf. Jno. 1. 14.
a ch. 1. 28; ch. 3. 23. b vers. 6, 13, 15.

Thus has man met again and again the wondrous grace that would draw man to God Himself; and here now, the place of such a testimony, is the very place of fullest abomination! Brought to the entrance of the inner gate that looked toward the north, there the prophet is confronted at the outset with the proof of this. It is the seat of the image of jealousy, "which provoketh to jealousy." And now, in full view of this, the glory of the God of Israel appears according to the appearance that the prophet had seen in the valley: "And he said unto me, Son of man, lift up now thine eyes towards the north." From the north, the place of darkness, from where the sun is absent, comes ever the opposition to God: "And I lifted up mine eyes toward the north, and behold, northward of the gate of the altar, this image of jealousy in the entry."

The image of jealousy presents, first, the general thought which underlies all that follows here. God will not give His glory to another. Hence any self-devised image of Him, which must of necessity be man's imagination, must be a challenge of the One only to be known by revelation, otherwise unsearchable. It is impossible indeed for man's thoughts to get beyond himself. Thus the image of God which he devises must be only in some way a reflection of himself; but this is the debasement of God to man's own likeness. The question is asked in Job as an unanswerable one: "Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty to perfection?" Whatever the witness of creation therefore (true witness as it is), God never really left man to that. He declared Himself, as Scripture assures us, at the beginning; and it was man who voluntarily got away from this, banished himself into the darkness and distortion of his own thoughts.

And still this image of jealousy is that which threatens us all. It stands, as it were, at the very entrance when we would approach God Himself. And it need not be a visible or open image to do this. What admonition there is for us in this endeavor, as it really is, to have a god after our own thoughts, which is always in opposition to the true God? Thus "covetousness," the apostle tells us, "is idolatry;" and this, as we know, may be amongst those who are in all other respects most orthodox. But the heart after its own object, seeking that which gratifies itself (although it never satisfies), will have a god according to its own thought; while in name He may abide just what He was, and all the points of orthodoxy be preserved.

Here, in Israel, their hearts had got away so manifestly from God that the image of jealousy stood in open sight at the very gate by which men approached God; appealing thus to all, and blocking the way of sacrifice (the way of the altar) which, while it is God's only way, is just on that account what man's heart naturally would put aside. The image was in the outer court, presenting itself thus to the multitude. It was indeed the common sin and snare.

unto me, Son of man, seest thou what they do, even the great [c]abominations that the house of Israel commit here to [d]cause me to go far off from my sanctuary? But thou shalt see [e]yet other great abominations

2 (7–12): The second cause: The chambers of imagery, and the degradation of beast-worship.

7 And he brought me to the entrance of the [f]court; and I looked, and behold, a [g]hole in the wall. Then said he unto me, Son of man, [h]dig now in the wall: and when I had digged in the wall, behold, a [i]door. And he said unto me, Go in and see the wicked [j]abominations that they do here. And I went in and looked, and, behold, every form of [k]creeping thing and abominable beast, even all the [l]idols of the house of Israel, [m]portrayed * upon the wall round about. And there

* Or, "engraved."

[c] cf. Deut. 7. 25, 26. [d] cf. 1 Sam. 1. 21, 22. [e] vers. 13, 15. [f] cf. vers. 3, 14, 16. [g] cfr. Ps. 83 5. [h] cf. Ps. 139. 12. [i] cf. Heb. 4. 13. [j] cf. Prov. 15 3. [k] cf. Deut. 13. 14. [l] cf. 1 Cor. 1 11. [m] cf. 2 Cor. 13. 1. [n] ch. 7. 3, etc. [o] cf. Deut. 4. 16–18. [p] cfr. Ps. 29. 9.

And we need not speculate, as has been done, as to the form of the image, what false deity was represented by it. The less we define in this respect, if we could define, as we really cannot, the more significant will be what is before us. Any special false god the multitude might disclaim; for man's thoughts are various, and their gods therefore multitudinous as their thoughts; but the trouble is with the thinking at all. God has revealed Himself. Blessed to know we have only to receive His revelation.

How careful we should be, therefore, that we add nothing to it, that there be no mere speculation even within the limits, as we may say, of revelation itself. God's own Word is best; is all-sufficient. If we add to its perfection, we in reality subtract from it. We are right in inquiring into it, in seeking to know the depths that are there; and if we do so we shall find that indeed God has spoken to us in it, "not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth" even, "but which the Holy Ghost teacheth." Were we to say that the image here was the image of Baal or the image of Ashtaroth or any other specific form, the meaning for us at least would have largely died out of it. We would refer it to the past, to Israel, the rebellious nation, and we should escape entirely the warning which speaks to us to-day, as much as ever, of an image that provoketh to jealousy—the imagination of man, whatever form it may assume. But how blessed to know that we have indeed "the image of the invisible God," One in whom God has spoken to us, and met all true cravings of the heart after Him, the One in whom we find "the Word made flesh, the Only-begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, and who hath declared Him."

2 What follows, therefore, is but a further development of this fundamental thought; it shows whither it would carry those who commit themselves to it. The second proof of Israel's condition is their open adoption, if we may call it open—for after all, the secrecy and darkness accompanying it betray the consciousness of the moral deformity attaching to it—their open adoption of beast-worship.

We shall find much suggestiveness here in the symbolism of the numerals. We are at the second step downwards, and the number indicates descent; but in its ideal form it is for service, as with the Lord Jesus. It is His number, as we have abundantly seen. But the heathen gods themselves came down to men. They had an interest in reference to the things of earth, but how essentially different! The descent of the heathen gods was almost always their real stood before them seventy men of the [n]elders of the house of Israel, and in the midst of them stood [o]Jaazaniah the son of Shaphan, with every man his [p]censer in his hand; and the prayer of the cloud of incense went up. And he said unto me, Hast thou seen, son of man, what the elders of the house of Israel do in the [q]dark, every one in his [r]chambers of imagery? * For they say, Jehovah [s]seeth us not, Jehovah hath [t]forsaken the land.

* Or, "imagination."

n ch. 14. 1. etc. Tit. 2. 2.
o cf. ch. 11. 1. cf. 2 Ki. 25. 23.
p cf. Lev. 10. 1. cf. Num. 16. 17, 35.
q cf. Eph. 5. 11, 13.
r cf. Jer. 35. 2-4. cf. chap. 14. 3.
s ch. 9. 9. etc. Gen. 16. 13.
t cf. 2 Ki. 5. 26. t etc. Is. 54. 5-8

degradation, in which even bestial forms were assumed by them for base and lustful ends. There is no need to enter into this for those who have the slightest knowledge of the ancient idolatry which the Egyptian animal-worship made permanent, the worship of the animal forms themselves, which (whatever may be pleaded for its esoteric meaning) would necessarily be accompanied with the most debasing results, such as the epistle to the Romans witnesses. For a beast, no immorality is possible, and therefore where beasts are gods it may well drop out of common speech. Apart from the spirit which God has given him (which often, alas, is almost as if it were not) man is, in fact, but a beast; and thus he can find in the beast that which reflects and appeals to his lower nature; but become a beast, he cannot He must carry with him into these bestial instincts the evidence of a higher nature, which in subjection to the lower must of necessity degrade itself. But let us not relegate what is here merely to the past, as something of old time which has been civilized out of existence, and which we may well forget, therefore, except as the evidence of the progress we have made since times like these. For Scripture at least the "natural" man is still the "psychical" man, the soul-led man; and his wisdom, which cometh not from above, is "earthly, sensual" (psychical, that is). And more, it is "devilish;" for, through all human departures, easily traceable is the subtlety and power of one who, with no beast nature in himself, yet has led man in this departure.

These things then characterized Israel in the awful days that we are contemplating. The people who had in their hands God's revelation, the people separated from the nations around by multiplied interventions on God's part and wondrous works of power by which He made Himself known, are a people now so completely gone from Him that it is precisely in this worship of the beast, in secrecy and darkness, that we find the seventy elders, and Jaazaniah, a son of Shaphan, in their midst. What was the condition of the nation whose elders were the leaders and instigators in such things as these! And the names here mark the rapid and complete departure that had been going on. Jaazaniah means "Jehovah hears," and this name came to him from a father whose own name signifies "one who is hidden"—the name of the hyrax or coney of our common version. The book of Proverbs speaks of it as one of the things "little upon the earth, but exceeding wise" "They are a feeble folk," says the wise man, "yet make they their houses in the rocks" (Prov. xxx. 26). This is their wisdom: they know their weakness and hide themselves in their stronghold. And the record that we have of Shaphan in the history (2 Kings xxii. 8-10) answers at least to this, connecting him as it does with the publication

[3] (13, 14): The third cause: Tammuz: resurrection without sanctification.

[3] And he said unto me, Thou shalt again see yet [u]other great abominations which they do. And he brought me to the entry of the [v]gate of Jehovah's house which was toward the north; and, behold, there sat [w]women weeping for Tammuz.

[u] ver. 15. cf. Amos 2. 4.
[v] ver. 5. [w] cf. Is. 3. 16, 26. cf. Jer. 44. 15, 19.

etr. Ex. 38. 8; etr. Lk. 8. 2, 3.

of the newly discovered book of the law which Hilkiah, the priest, gives first to Shaphan. How rapid then had been the movement towards apostasy! The father in the light, cleaving to God and His Word; the son in the midnight darkness, degrading himself into a worshiper of the beasts that perish! Such then was the condition of things in Israel.

[3] But we have still further proofs. The next account involves another class from that of the elders, and shows how all parts of the nation were infected now: "He brought me to the entry of the gate of Jehovah's house toward the north, and behold, there sat women weeping for Tammuz." Tammuz* is a word of difficult derivation, but the history of which is in measure plain. We have to identify him, no doubt, with one better known to us and to history in general as Adonis, who according to the legend, which is told in different ways, was beloved of Venus for his beauty. Slain in hunting by a boar, says the legend, he was, at her solicitation, permitted to return six months in the year from the under-world to her companionship. We need not go into it, as the general lesson is all that interests us. It is a nature picture in some way, no doubt; and faithfully represents the brief and lawless joys of earth under a heaven pictured as no less lawless, joys which soon end in lamentation; along with this long ng for their recovery, which in one way or another makes men prophesy this for themselves, but with little comfort even in that which they prophesy: as to which there need be no wonder, no knowledge of sin being in it, and no repentance.

We find God setting before us here the one side only, the sorrow and not the joy; the weak and passionate wail over the shadow departing, which identifies itself, as the details of this Tammuz-worship show, with only the increase of the power of evil in the despair of good. Thus this weeping of the women was accompanied with utter self-abandonment to the grossest wickedness. It was the practical fulfilment of the motto of despair: "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." Yet after all this is not absolute. Man will cling to the poorest and vainest hopes; and in the case before us here we have the distorted, faint image of what is indeed God's remedy for the sorrow of earth—not escape from death, but resurrection out of it. But this is indeed out of the power of man to accomplish; and has come to us—alone could come to us—in Him who has put His seal upon man's sentence, Himself bearing it.

Thus the evil which has wrecked the world is judged, and we reach God's side of it; finding not the mere restoration of the life wrecked, but, thank God, a new life in sanctification, and indeed with higher hopes than ever before.

* The derivation of "Tammuz" which is most accepted would make it a corruption of tammezuz, "melting away," and which they refer to the discoloration of the streams of Lebanon, among which is the river Adonis, by the mountain floods. This they connect with Adonis' legendary death by the boar, but it seems nevertheless hardly possibly to justify the derivation. On the other hand, may it not be derived more simply as tam'uz from tamam, "to complete" (and thus "finish," "end"), and uz, "strength," thus giving the meaning of the exhaustion of strength? This seems, more directly than the other, to apply itself to the story of Adonis.

§ (15-18): The sun-worship. Priestly apostasy.

[4] And he said unto me, Seest thou, son of man? Thou shalt see yet again [x]greater abominations than these. And he brought me into the [y]inner court of Jehovah's house, and, behold, at the entry of the temple of Jehovah, between the porch and the altar, were about five and twenty men with their [z]backs toward the temple of Jehovah, and their faces toward the east; and they worshiped the [a]sun toward the east. And he said unto me, Seest thou, son of man? Is it a light

x ver. 13. cf. ch. 16. 5
y cfr. Joel 17.
z Jer. 2. 27. Jer. 32. 33 cfr. Jer. 5[illegible] 4, 5.
a cf. Deut. 19. etc. cf. Job 31. 26, 28. cf. Ps. 48. cf. Isa. 40 26.

God is the God of resurrection, and this we have seen to be stamped upon the whole physical frame of things here, and to be especially that which is before Ezekiel, the revolution of the wheel: which indeed is so high as to be dreadful, out of man's merely natural ken, yet which, as revealed, becomes with all its blessedness a possession of faith, open to all who will accept the lesson of abasement. This is the only hope, the acknowledgment of a ruin which is at once the condemnation of evil and the glorification of God. The numerical symbolism here sheds full light upon what is before us, the divine substitute for the poor hopes to which man vainly clings, and which are pictured in this Tammuz worship among God's people of old.

[4] The last picture here is that of priestly apostasy; in this way it is the natural conclusion of the whole. Approach to God is what His house speaks of. The apostasy of the priesthood leaves this approach no longer possible; and this is complete in what is before us. "And he said unto me, Seest thou, son of man? Thou shalt see yet again greater abominations than these. And he brought me into the inner court of Jehovah's house, and behold, at the entry of the temple of Jehovah, between the porch and the altar, were about five and twenty men with their backs toward the temple of Jehovah, and their faces toward the east; and they worshiped the sun towards the east."

These twenty-five men are necessarily a priestly company. They are representatives of the twenty-four courses into which we know the priesthood were divided, with the high-priest at the head of them. They are not indeed spoken of as priests, and at this we need not at all wonder, for the plain reason that they are apostate; but their position is between the porch and the altar, therefore in the priestly court, where no others were allowed. "And He said unto me, Seest thou, son of man? Is it a light thing to the house of Judah to commit the abominations which they commit here, that they yet fill the land with violence, and keep again provoking Me to anger; and behold, they put the vine-branch to their nose. Therefore will I also deal in wrath. Mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity; and though they cry in mine ears with a loud voice, yet I will not hear them." Thus the very ones, chosen out of the chosen nation itself, to draw near to God, are seen with their backs turned upon His house, and worshiping the sun, the foremost feature in those heavens which "declare God's glory and show His handiwork," as the Psalmist reminds us (Ps. xix).

The sun, with all his brilliancy and blessing for us, is manifestly but the servant of a power beyond his own, and indeed, as Moses declares in his appeal against this very worship, servant to the peoples to whom God has assigned the ordinance of heaven (Deut. iv. 19). Thus in the very constancy with which it observes its appointed seasons, its character is seen as abiding under physical law, that of a servant simply. It is part of the great wheel of nature which thing to the house of Judah to commit the abominations which they commit here, that they yet fill the land with [b]violence, and keep again [c]provoking me to anger? And, behold, they put the [d]branch to their nose. Therefore will I also deal in wrath: mine eye shall not [e]spare, neither will I have pity; and though they cry in mine ears with a loud voice, yet I will [f]not hear them.

9 (ix): The judgment a discriminative one.

2. And he cried in mine ears with a loud voice, saying, [g]Draw near, ye that have charge over the city,* and every man with his destroying [h]weapon in his hand.

* Lit., "Governments of the city."

[b] ch. 9. 9. cf. Gen. 6. 11.
[c] cf. Deut. 31. 20.
[d] cf. ch. 15. 2. cf. Rom. 1. 25.
[e] ch. 5. 11. ch. 7. 4, 9. ch. 9. 5, 10.
[f] cf. Prov. 1. 28. cf. Is. 1. 15. cf. Zech. 7. 13. cf. Lk. 13. 24, 27.
[g] cf. Rev. 6. 1.
[h] cf. Ex. 32. 27.

Ezekiel has shown us, whose revolutions, indeed, its own revolution marks. But law is the rule of the governed, and not of the Governor. We must penetrate to the Heart that is beyond all this, to One who is not limited by the laws which He has appointed, to get above the necessary perplexity of those who see only, as the preacher saw, what is "under the sun." Law is indeed most necessary to produce a stable world. Where would we be if we could not trust the stability of the things amongst which we move? But those who worship it, as alas so many seem inclined to do now, instead of worshiping are merely putting the vine-branch to their nose. There is a sweetness in nature, apart from that which sin has brought into it, which we cannot and need not deny; and for one whose heart enshrines the true Beloved, "the vines with their tender grapes give a good smell" still (Song ii. 13). But if we rise no higher, this sweetness of nature only hinders the sweet savor of sacrifice—of that which is true worship and of Him who has offered it, the basis upon which everything rests now for faith. The fall being ignored, no sacrifice is needed, as is plain. Nature itself bears witness of this, though it needs interpretation. But without God, what is nature, with all the steadfastness of the laws which govern it, but a poor, weak thing fittingly imaged by this vine in which God pictures it—the very image of dependence, as it surely is, with ourselves, who are part of it, upon the One "in whom we live and move and have our being." Those who are but mere Danites of Ir-shemesh (Jo-h. xix. 41) find, spite of their joy in nature, nothing finally but perplexity, as the Preacher did (Eccl. viii. 17). The Comtist, with his worship of humanity, may illustrate in a very forcible way man's need and the vanity of all attempts to meet it. He is most surely one who is putting the vine-branch to his nose, and imagining himself the worshiper that he is not; for who, after all, can worship himself, much as he may desire it?

But here, then, is the end of that which we saw in the beginning, in the image of jealousy. This is what all men's imaginations come to. They cannot get beyond the nature of which they are part, and they cannot get beyond the perplexity that is in nature, the vanity written upon all that is merely "under the sun." Yet thank God, there is a better Sun soon to appear as Sun of righteousness upon the world, and with healing in His wings. Then shall men find how the types of nature are prophecies of what is in God's thoughts for us; and then shall the vines with their tender grapes give a good smell; not alienating the heart from God, but drawing it to Him.

Here, then, the evidences of Israel's condition are complete. Surely, noth-

And, behold, six men came from the way of the upper gate, which is turned toward the north, and every man with his destroying weapon* in his hand; and in the midst of them one man clothed in [f]linen, with a writer's inkhorn by his side. And they went in, and stood beside the [g]brazen altar. And the glory of the God of Israel went up from off the cherubim, whereupon it was, to the threshold of the house. And he called to the man clothed in linen who had the writer's inkhorn by his side; and Jehovah said unto him, Go through the midst of the city, through the midst of Jerusalem, and set a [k]mark upon the foreheads of the men that [l]sigh and that cry for all the abominations that are done in the midst thereof. Unto the others

[f] cf. ch. 44 17, 18.
[g] cf. Rev. 15. 6.
[h] cf. Rev. 1. 13
[i] cf. Rev. 8. 3
[k] cf. Rev. 7. 3.
[l] cf. Rev. 9. 4
[m] cf. Rev. 13 17.
[n] cf. Eph. 1. 13.
[o] Jer 13. 17
[p] cf. 1 Cor. 5. 2.

* Or, "battle axe," as in Jer. 51 : 20. Not the same word as in ver 1.

ing more is needed. Sentence is passed, therefore, and we have but to see the execution of it in what follows.

2. "And he cried in mine ears with a loud voice saying, Draw near, ye that have charge over the city, and every man with his destroying weapon in his hand." As already said, we are not to look at this as a judgment actually taking place at the time of the prophet's vision. It is no doubt that which is really executed by the Chaldeans afterwards. For the purpose of the vision there is no need to distinguish in this way, or rather, the thought that is impressed upon us is precisely that which the bringing in of Nebuchadnezzar's host might conceal for many. The judgment is as direct from God as if the Chaldeans were not at all in question.

The six men that answer to this summons come from the north; and this was, as we know, the route of invasion by the Chaldean hosts. The number six speaks, as always, of divine sovereignty over evil.* This, alas, is now to be shown in judgment. Yet on this very account the judgment must be discriminative also, as the man in linen tells us: "In the midst of them one man clothed in linen with a writer's inkhorn by his side." Here, plainly, is that which speaks of peace in the midst of all that is adverse. "And they went in and stood beside the brazen altar." The altar had in a special way been outraged by the abominations practised, and the vengeance upon this is now to be executed. When men refuse the only way of propitiation, there can be none, of course; and as the fitting corollary to this, "the glory of the God of Israel," distinctly emphasized as that, "went up from off the cherub whereupon it was, to the threshold of the house"—a significant action indeed, for we have nothing as yet here of the living creatures, which Ezekiel soon afterwards identifies with the cherubim of the mercy-seat. But as yet they are not identified; and we are to think of the abode of the glory as realized of old, which made "the Lord God that dwelleth between the cherubim" a familiar thought. He is seen for a moment there again, but only now to show distinctly the terrible change which is taking place. There is to be no more for Israel the truth

* It is also the number of man, the utmost limit of his power, and thus of evil in its assault upon what is of God. It enters into Goliath's stature (1 Sam. 17: 4), the dimensions of Nebuchadnezzar's image (Dan. 3: 1), and the number of the Beast (Rev. 13: 18), where, thrice repeated, it would assail the people of God. It is thus fittingly associated with this preliminary assault of the Chaldeans.—S. R.

he said in my hearing, Go through the city after him and [m]smite: let not your eye spare, neither have pity. Slay [n]utterly the old man, the young man, and the maiden, and little children, and women; but [o]come not near any one upon whom is the mark; and [p]begin at my sanctuary. And they began at the [q]old men who were before the house. And he said unto them, [r]Defile the house, and fill the courts with the slain; go forth. And they went forth and smote in the city.

And it came to pass, while they were smiting, and I was left, that I [s]fell upon my face, and cried, and said, Ah, Lord Jehovah! wilt thou destroy all the remnant of Israel in thy pouring out of thy wrath upon Jerusalem? Then said he unto me, The iniquity of the house of Israel and Judah is exceeding great, and the land is full of blood, and the city full of perverseness; for they say, Jehovah hath [t]forsaken the land, and Jehovah seeth not. And as for me also, mine eye shall [u]not spare, neither will I have pity: I will recompense their [v]way upon their head. And, behold, the man clothed in linen who had the inkhorn by his side [w]reported the matter, saying, I have done as thou hast commanded me.

m cf. 1 Chron. 21. 16.
cf. Jer. 48. 10.
n 2 Chron. 36. 17.
o cf. Zech. 2. 8.
p 1 Pet. 4. 17.
cf. Jer. 25. 29.
q cf. ch. 8. 11.
r cf. Ps. 79. 1, 2.
s cf. Num. 14. 5.
cf. Josh. 7. 6.
t cf. 2 Ki. 21. 14.
u ch. 8. 12.
v ch. 5. 11, etc.
w ch. 11. 21.
cf. Gal. 6. 7.
x cf. 2 Sam. 24. 13.

of a mercy-seat over which the cherubim bend down to see the blood of propitiation placed there. If the altar be rejected, there is no blood to be sprinkled upon it any more. But then He who dwells between the cherubim must go forth.

This, then, is what we have here; the full significance of it will be developed for us in what is soon to follow. But, first of all, He calls to the man clothed in linen who had the writer's inkhorn by his side, and bids him go through the midst of the city to "set a mark upon the foreheads of the men that sigh and that cry for all the abominations that are done in the midst" of it. The word for "mark" here is that which designates the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet, the tav, which in the manner of writing of that time was a cross. Who can forbear, in connection with all that we have here, to realize the meaning of this? The judgment is judgment in behalf of the altar; or, to put it in another way, it is that which necessarily comes because the propitiation of the altar is no more. How significant, then, that those whom the judgment spares are just those marked for mercy by the altar itself, that is, by the sign of the cross, as the Christian heart at once interprets it. As far back as the days of Tertullian it has been interpreted in this way, and all the circumstances here confirm the interpretation. Here, then, is the sinner's shield at all times, the only hope of escape where all are sinners.

"Unto the others He said in my hearing Go through the city after him, and smite . . . and begin at my sanctuary." Judgment must begin at the house of God. It always begins there. In proportion to the privilege is the responsibility; and the outward nearness to God, with the heart away, only the more invites judgment. The house is completely gone as that. The blood defiles it; and in the midst of the awful judgment which is then poured out, the prophet

3 (x): The ban from the glory.

3. And I looked, and behold, in the expanse* that was over the head of the cherubim, there appeared above them as it were a [y]sapphire stone, as the appearance of the likeness of a [z]throne. And he spake unto the man clothed in linen, and said, Go in between the revolving [wheels], even under the cherub, and fill thy hands with [a]coals of fire from between the cherubim, and scatter them over the city. And he went in in my sight. And the cherubim stood on the right side of the house when the man went in; and the [b]cloud filled the inner court. And the glory of Jehovah had risen from off the cherub, over the threshold of the house; and the house was filled with the cloud, and the court was full of the brightness of Jehovah's glory.

y ch. 1. 22. cf. Ex. 24. 10.
z cf. Rev. 4. 2.
a ch. 1. 13. cf. Ps. 18. 12, 13.
b cf. Ex. 40. 34, 35. cf. Is. 6. 1–4.

* The same as "firmament" in Gen. 1: 6.

pleads against the complete removal of Israel from before God's sight. But this has been already anticipated and answered. The only reply now is the urging of Israel's iniquity, which is now complete, and God can no longer spare.

3. Even yet the tale of judgment is not ended. What is of the utmost importance is now seen: the appearance of the heavenly throne, as the prophet had already seen it in the vision at Chebar, is to replace the earthly one which God can no more take. The removing is to be complete. He who was once, when the ark of old passed through Jordan, spoken of as "the God of all the earth," is now to be known simply as "the God of heaven." The earth is, as we see in Daniel, to be committed in fact to the Gentiles. Outwardly and visibly God's throne is no longer on earth. The throne of Gentile empire is, alas, how different! And yet it is the representative, responsibly, of the throne above. Though we cannot hope that this responsibility will now be discharged in a way more according to God than hitherto, yet, even so, God will rather have the Gentile with all his manifest alienation from God, than the Jew with his false profession and worse dishonor of Him by them who professed to draw nigh.

The judgment still proceeds; and it is the man clothed in linen, who has been hitherto the messenger of God's mercy, who is told to go in between the revolving wheels and fill his hand with coals of fire from between the cherubim and scatter them over the city. Here, of course, we have the pregnant figure of divine wrath; and it is at least an approach to that which we find afterwards, when the yet future day of wrath shall have arrived, and when this will be distinctively "the wrath of the Lamb." How terrible and how hopeless when it is His wrath! And yet how blessed to see and know that it is He who is eternal Love itself who will execute the judgment, and that, therefore, the one cannot be in contradiction to the other.

And now we are called to see more fully all the significance of that which is taking place. The cloud as yet fills the house; the glory of Jehovah, as we are reminded here, having risen up from off the cherub over the threshold of the house. The brightness of the glory is rather in the court itself now than in the house which it is leaving. The wings of the cherubim too are in motion, heard as the speech of the Almighty God Himself; and the cherubim are of course no longer those of the golden mercy-seat, which, as the memorials of a mere dead worship, are now left behind. The wheels of the former vision are

And the [c]sound of the wings of the cherubim was heard even to the outer court, as the voice of the Almighty God* when he speaketh. And it came to pass, when he had commanded the man clothed in linen, saying, Take fire from between the revolving [wheels], from between the cherubim, that he went in and stood beside the wheel. And the [d]cherub stretched forth his hand from between the cherubim unto the fire that was between the cherubim, and took up [thereof], and gave it into the hands of him [that was] clothed in linen; and he took it and went out.

And there appeared in the cherubim the form of a [e]man's hand under their wings. And I saw, and behold, four [f]wheels beside the cherubim, one wheel beside one cherub, and another wheel beside another cherub; and the appearance of the wheels was as the look of a [g]topaz stone. And as for their appearance, they four had one likeness, as if a [h]wheel were within a wheel. When they went, they went upon their four sides; they turned not as they went; but to the place whither the head looked they followed it: they [i]turned not as they went. And their whole body, and their

c ch. 1. 24. ch. 43. 2.

d cf. Heb. 1. 7.

e ver. 21. ch. 1. 8. cf. Gen. 18. 2

f ch. 1. 15, etc.

g cf. ch. 28. 13.

h cf. ver. 11.

i cf. Jas. 1. 17.

* "El-shaddai."

here also, and ready for revolution; stayed for the moment, as the linen-clothed man goes in to take of the fire (which we have already seen at Chebar as going up and down between the cherubim), and which they now put into his hands. We are reminded here of what has been seen before, that there was the form of a man's hand under the wings of the cherubim. Human hands, we need not doubt, are to execute that judgment which, nevertheless, is itself the wrath of God.

Attention is once more called particularly to the wheels. We have them just as they appeared at Chebar, one wheel beside each cherub, with the look of the topaz in them, the display still of divine characteristics, though in human history, and the likeness as of a wheel within a wheel. There is added here that the whole body, and backs, and hands, and wings, and wheels, are full of eyes round about, the tokens of a knowledge which is indeed omniscient, although there is of course no omniscience in the creature: but they move by a wisdom higher than their own. They are, in fact, beginning as it were afresh their revolution in obedience to the call of the Voice to them, at the bidding of which they revolve This is no doubt the real meaning of the 13th verse. The pause of contemplation is over. The trial is over. The wheels that have halted as it were in suspense for the moment, are to revolve again: and we are bidden to take notice once more of the faces of the cherubim as we have seen them, only that now the cherub itself is identified with the face of the ox; which is foremost, therefore: for through all this, while judgment is before us, God has nevertheless His harvest-field in view.

But now the cherubim mount up, and at last we have the full identification of the living creature with the figures upon the mercy-seat. "The cherubim mounted up . . . this was the living creature that I saw by the river Chebar."

backs, and their hands, and their wings, and the wheels, were full of [j]eyes round about; and they four had their wheels. As for the wheels, it was called to them in mine ears, Revolve.* And every one had four [k]faces: the first face was the face of a [l]cherub, and the second face the face of a man, and the third the face of a lion, and the fourth the face of an eagle. And the cherubim mounted up. This was the [m]living creature that I saw by the river Chebar. And when the cherubim went, the wheels went beside them: and when the cherubim lifted up their wings to mount up from the earth, the wheels also turned not from beside them. When they stood, these stood; and when they mounted up, these mounted up with them: for the [n]spirit of the living creature was in them.

And the glory of Jehovah [o]departed from over the threshold of the house, and stood over the cherubim.

[j] ch. 1. 18, etc.
[k] ch. 1. 6, 10, etc.
[l] cf. Ps. 18. 10.
[m] ch. 1. 5, etc.
[n] cf. Ps. 139. 7.
[o] ver. 4. cf. Hos. 9. 12 with Mt. 23. 38, 39.

* Lit., "revolution," or, "turning."

"I knew," says the prophet just after this, "I knew that they were cherubim." There is the complete identification. It is, as it were, those figures upon the mercy-seat that are now manifesting life and activity.

It is very striking as to this word "cherub" that only two derivations seem to be at all satisfactory for it. The one is from the word charab, "to engrave," of which "cherub" would be but the past participle; thus, "the forms engraved." This suits (but alone suits) the cherubim of the mercy-seat. On the other hand, Hengstenberg contends for another derivation, which certainly exactly suits the meaning of the living creatures, according to which it is a compound word, che-rav, "as it were a multitude."* But here, not the mercy-seat is before us, but the Chebar vision. Significant it surely is that the one meaning now goes over as it were to the other. The one is, no doubt, the interpretation of the other. But, more than this, the reality is now taking the place of the mere symbol. The cherubim are indeed the living ones, in every way full of life, and standing for that multitudinous host of God which in all His creation ever obey His will.

But, alas, for Israel, the mercy-seat is left, and the cherubim now go forth from it. "And the cherubim lifted up their wings, and mounted up from the earth in my sight when they went forth, and the wheels beside them. And they stood at the entrance of the east gate of Jehovah's house;" and now also "the glory of the God of Israel is over them above." It is God who is leaving His earthly abode; and yet even as He leaves, everything assumes a greater clearness and a fuller glory. Notice once more, as we are called to it, the close dependence of the wheels upon the living creatures. As the cherubim mount up, the wheels mount up with them: they leave the earth. Thus as far as Israel is concerned, whatever suspension of the sentence there may be (and which we read in this lingering yet a while over the east gate), it is signified to us that they are soon, as it were, to revolve no more.

* Another derivation has been given—che-reb "As if pleading." These assessors to the throne are pleading for righteous judgment upon an apostate nation. At other times their pleading has been for mercy on the basis of the blood upon the mercy-seat. But that having been rejected by the people, nothing but judgment is left.—S. R.

And the cherubim lifted up their wings, and mounted up from the earth in my sight, when they went forth, and the wheels beside them: and they stood at the [p]entrance of the east gate of Jehovah's house; and the [q]glory of the God of Israel was over them above. This is the living creature that I saw under the God of Israel by the river Chebar; and I [r]knew that they were cherubim. [s]Each one had four faces, and each four wings; and the likeness of a [t]man's hands was under their wings. And as for the likeness of their faces they were the faces which I had [u]seen by the river Chebar—their appearance and themselves: they went each in the [v]direction of his face.

p ch. 11. 22, 23 with ch. 43. 2.
q ver. 18.
r cf. Is. 6. 2. cf. Gen. 3. 24.
s ch. 1. 6, etc.
t cf. ver. 7. cf. 1 Ki. 18. 44.
u ch. 1. 1.
v ch. 1. 12. cf. Dan. 9. 21.

As far as prophetic history is concerned, we see the truth of this fully at the present time. Prophecy as to them has ceased. We are in a gap of time which has for them, as it were, no more significance! And yet in this very way how sad a significance! In truth there was a longer suspense than this lingering over the east gate might seem to signify. God's mercy lingered, as we know, over the returned remnant until, in fulfilment of what the countless voices of the prophets had declared, He who was to come did come, and Messiah, Himself the King of glory, stood in their midst. But it was only to find rejection proportionately decisive and complete. The wings that would have sheltered Jerusalem had to be withdrawn. She had once more to be given up to enemies that would lay her in the dust and her children with her. The glorious vision in the midst is gone, but it has gone in fact to heaven, a heaven which is opened for us that we may see it there. The living creatures are connected with this throne above, which has just been intimated to us in Ezekiel. Israel abides outside of the glory without a mercy-seat and without a priest to represent them before it; but for us there is only a nearer, sweeter vision, a fuller reality, a gospel of the glory which is indeed no longer in the face of Moses but in the face of Him who, Man as He is, is "the image of the invisible God," the effulgence of it.*

4. We have what is now in some sense an appendix to what has gone before. The judgment having been definitely pronounced, the glory, as we have seen, yet lingers, and the mercy which is in God's heart expresses itself more freely, as one may say, because of the judgment pronounced. God's character being

* There seems to be a striking correspondence between this vision of the removal of the throne of God from the temple to the chariot of the cherubim, from earth to heaven, and the removal of God's testimony from the Jews and Jerusalem to the Church, as recorded in the book of Acts. During His life our Lord had declared to the Jews, "Behold your house is left unto you desolate" (Matt. 23: 38, 39), and the removal or transfer of the glory is seen taking place at Pentecost. The Jewish "house" being left desolate, the shekinah glory descends upon believers, instead of filling the temple of Jehovah (2 Chron. 13: 11). The persecution of the saints develops until in the stoning of Stephen the glory is seen in heaven rather than upon earth. Gradually the blessing extends from Jerusalem to Samaria, Cæsarea and Antioch—a Gentile city. The meeting at Jerusalem to consider the relation of the Gentiles to the law (Acts 15) may be considered as the final lingering upon the threshhold of the temple: but the widening circle of blessing reaching to Ephesus, Philippi and Corinth shows how a great change was impending. Paul's last visit to Jerusalem is, we may say, the final appeal of lingering love, and his closing words to the Jews at Rome (Acts 28: 28) indicate the complete removal of the shekinah from Judaism: "The salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and they will hear it."—S. R.

4 (xi.): Scattering among the nations, but with mercy.

4. And the Spirit [w]lifted me up and brought me to the [x]east gate of Jehovah's house, which looketh eastward; and behold, at the entrance of the gate five and twenty men; and I saw in the midst of them [y]Jaazaniah the son of Azzur, and Pelatiah the son of Benaiah, [z]princes of the people. And he said unto me, Son of man, these are the men that [a]devise iniquity, and give wicked counsel in this city: who say, It is not the [b]time to build houses: this is the [c]caldron, and we are the flesh. Therefore [d]prophesy against them, prophesy, son of man. And the Spirit of Jehovah fell upon me, and said unto me, Speak, Thus saith Jehovah: Thus have ye said, O house of Israel; even the things that come into your mind, I know them. Ye have [e]multiplied your slain in this city, and ye have filled the streets* thereof with the slain. Therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Your slain whom ye have laid in the midst of it, they are the flesh, and it is the [f]caldron; but you shall one bring forth out of the midst of it. Ye have [g]feared the sword; and I will bring the sword upon you, saith the Lord Jehovah. And I will w ch. 3. 12, 14. ch. 8. 3. cf. Acts 8. 39.

x ch. 10. 19.
y cf. ch. 8. 11.
z cf. Num. 14. cf. Num. 13. 3, etc. cf. 18. 1. 23.
a cf. ch. 14. 3.
b cf. ch. 12. 22.
c cf. Lk. 12. 19.
d ch. 13. 2, etc.
e ch. 7. 23. cf. 2 Ki. 21. 16.
f cf. ch. 24. 3–5.
g cf. Job 3. 25. cf. Prov. 1. 26, 27.

* Or, "courts."

cleared by this, He is free to show what is in His heart. At the same time, that there may be no false hope, the judgment is re affirmed.

We are introduced once more to the leaders of the people who have, as we see, the people behind them. They are twenty-five men (the number of the priests as given before), but these are not the priests, though they represent, as one may say, all represented by the priesthood—that is, the people at large, and therefore are the same in number. Among them, two prominent men recall in their very names the false hopes which are misleading the people: Jaazaniah, "the Lord heareth," who is the son of Azzur, "the helper," with Pelatiah, "Jehovah delivers," the son of Benaiah, "Jehovah builds up." Their words correspond to their names. These are the men, as it is declared to Ezekiel, who supplant Jeremiah's exhortation to the captives to build houses in the place of their captivity, which was to be long (Jer. xxix. 5), by building in Jerusalem. Judgment is not near, they say. They infer, the time to act after this manner never will be. If Jerusalem, in the midst of all its enemies, may seem indeed to be but a caldron, and "we are the flesh in it," be it so, say they, we can accept that place with all that we find in it. The words, vague though they may seem, can scarcely be anything but mockery. They base themselves upon such prophecies as both Ezekiel and his contemporary Jeremiah were uttering against the place, which nevertheless still stood, defying its adversaries; so they argue that it will stand. These prophecies are idle talk, say they, suited enough for exiles whom the land has already cast out, and who have forfeited the privileges of the chosen people. For us, they say, we need not fear them.

Swiftly as the destruction was coming, God yet meets this with another prophetic warning. He who was acquainted with all their thoughts, would give them presently their full answer. Already the prophet sees the slain in bring you forth out of the midst of it, and deliver you into the [h] hands of strangers, and will execute judgments among you. Ye shall [i] fall by the sword; I will judge you in the [j] border of Israel; and ye shall [k] know that I am Jehovah. This shall not be your [l] caldron, neither shall ye be the flesh in the midst of it: I will judge you in the border of Israel; and ye shall [m] know that I am Jehovah, in whose [n] statutes ye have not walked, neither have practised my ordinances, but have done [o] after the ordinances of the nations that are round about you.

And it came to pass, when I prophesied, that Pelatiah the son of Benaiah [p] died. And I [q] fell down on my face, and cried with a loud voice, and said, Ah, Lord Jehovah! wilt thou make a [r] full end of the remnant of Israel?

[h] cf. Is. 1, 7. cf. Hos. 7, 9. cf. Hos. 8, 7.
[i] cf. Jer. 39, 6.
[j] vers. 7, 9.
[k] Ps. 9, 16. ch. 6, 7, 14.
[l] cf. ver. 3.
[m] ver. 10, etc.
[n] cf. Ps. 19, 8. ch. 20, 16.
[o] cf. Lev. 18, 3. cf. Deut. 12, 30, 31.
[p] cf. Nu. 16, 29. cf. Acts 5, 5.
[q] cf. Josh. 7, 6. chap. 9, 8.
[r] cf. Ex. 32, 10, 11. cf. Jer. 30, 11.

the city, slain at the hands of those who have misled them. These would fulfil the figure, and be, manifestly enough, the flesh in the caldron; but for themselves, the deceivers of the people, there waited still a severer judgment. God would not suffer the city to be even the tomb of such. The sword which they defied, even while they trembled at it, Jehovah would bring upon them, taking them out of the midst of the city which they had profaned, to fall by the sword in the border of Israel; they would witness before their death the calamities which they had brought upon the people. Cast out of the city, they would be judged in the border of Israel, and should learn there, to their utter confusion, that it was Jehovah who had been speaking to them—Jehovah, whose ordinances they had transgressed, while they claimed the privileges which belonged to His elect, and had gone after the ordinances of the nations around them *

While Ezekiel thus prophesies, one of these leaders, the man whose name falsely spoke of deliverance and building up, Pelatiah, died. Vision it is still; yet one would naturally argue that this was, in fact, an actual occurrence at the time. Such a proof has constantly accompanied true prophecy, that God was speaking in it. There was to be no deliverance nor building up in the way that they imagined to themselves; but, as before, the heart of the prophet, standing truly before God for the people, trembles at the judgment manifested, and again there is a question in his heart, as has been uttered before, whether any can survive it. "Ah, Lord Jehovah," he cries "wilt Thou make a full end of the remnant of Israel?" But this had been already answered again and again.

It is but a moment of dismay; a confusion which the Lord answers in grace, explaining to him that these people, the objects of His divine judgment, are not such a remnant. His brethren, such as the prophet could truly own as kindred, those who truly represent the house of Israel, are not such men as these, but have characteristically their position among those very exiles to whom the then inhabitants of Jerusalem were saying, "Get you far from Jehovah," as having no claim upon Him. In their own possession the land still was, and

* For an Israelite especially it was a great dishonor not to be buried, or not in his own sepulchre. There seems to have been, in the care taken of the body and its burial, a hint of the resurrection to blessing. So Abraham purchased the cave of Machpelah (Gen. 23). To have no burial, as in the case of Jehoiakim (Jer. 22: 19) was like "the burial of an ass"—S. R.

And the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, thy [s]brethren, even thy brethren, are the men of thy kindred* and all the house of Israel, the whole of it, unto whom the inhabitants of Jerusalem say, 'Get you far from Jehovah: unto [t]us is this land given for a possession. Therefore say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Though I have [u]removed them far off among the nations, and though I have [v]scattered them among the countries, yet I will be to them for a little [x]sanctuary† in the countries whither they have come. Therefore say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: I will even [y]gather you from the peoples, and assemble you out of the countries where ye are scattered, and I will [z]give you the land of Israel. And they

[s] cf. Mt. 23. 13.
[t] cf. Deut. 13. 7.
[u] cf. ver. 3.
[v] cf. Lev. 26. 39 42. cf. Deut. 32. 26. cf. Jer 31 10.
[x] cf. Is. 8. 14. etc. Ps. 43. 3.
[y] cf. Jer. 24. 6. ch. 28. 25. ch. 36. 24.
[z] cf. ch 47. 13, etc. ch. 39. 25, 26.

* Or, "redemption." † Or, "a sanctuary for a little while."

so, they argued, it would continue. Was not the condition of those in exile a plain proof of the displeasure of God against them? Nay, says the Lord: it is amongst these that I am, and though it is true that in this national breach of the covenant they are removed far off among the nations and scattered among the countries, and though they have lost the recognized sanctuary in Jerusalem, yet I Myself will be to them for a little sanctuary in the countries whither they come. It was not indeed all that they were looking for, and might look for yet, it was an unseen Presence that was with them. The glory was unseen, save by such opened eyes as were those of Ezekiel. Nevertheless, in the "remnant according to the election of grace," as the apostle speaks afterwards, there was the assurance of what grace would be in its fulness when the time should come for the completion of those promises which God had unconditionally made, and which, therefore, He would fulfil. The sap of life was in the tree, although it was a tree cut down; and it would in due time manifest itself in the renewal of all they had departed from, and much more: "Thus saith the Lord Jehovah"—it is the exiles plainly to whom He is turning, He has no promise for the doomed inhabitants of the city itself—"I will even gather you from the peoples, and assemble you out of the countries where ye are scattered, and I will give you the land of Israel." But along with this there must be and would be, therefore, the return of heart to God which would alone be the fulfilment of such promises. The terms of the new covenant must be fulfilled, and they would contemplate not the mere setting up again of the glory that had departed, but much more, the inward renewal, in which alone they would be manifested as the true seed of Abraham and the heirs of all that God had promised to him

Here, it is plain, we go far beyond the mere return of a remnant out of Babylon, such as took place under the Persian kings. This was, according to the Lord's figure, but a fig-tree planted in the vineyard, under conditions of fruit-bearing, which were not fulfilled; and when He who was to come, and did come, seeking fruit upon the fig-tree and finding none, according to His word it withered away. But this could not be the end of the promise—the free and unchangeable promise of God, which never can be taken away from the people to whom He made it. And the words of Jehovah here look on to an end not come even yet, but which through all the length of time elapsed He shall come thither, and they shall [a]take away from thence all its detestable things and all its abominations. And I will give them [b]one heart, and I will put a [c]new spirit within you; and I will [d]take away the stony heart out of their flesh, and will give them a [e]heart of flesh; that they may may [f]walk in my statutes, and keep mine ordinances, and do them; and they shall be [g]my people, and I will be their God. But as for them whose [h]heart walketh heartily after their detestable things and their abominations, I will [i]recompense their way upon their heads, saith the Lord Jehovah.

And the cherubim [j]lifted up their wings, and the wheels were beside them; and the glory of the God of Israel was over them above. And the glory of Jehovah [k]went up from the midst of the city, and stood upon the [l]mountain which is on the east side of the city. And the Spirit [m]lifted me up, and brought me in the vision by the Spirit of God into [n]Chaldea, to them of the captivity; and the vision that I had seen went up from me. And I [o]spake unto them of the captivity all the things that Jehovah had shown me.

[a] ch. 37. 23. [b] cf. Ps. 86. 11. Jer. 32. 39. cf. Zeph. 3. 9. [c] ch. 36. 26, 27. cf. Jer. 31. 33. cf. Jno. 3. 3. [d] cf. Zech. 7. 12 with Eph. 4. 22. [e] cf. 2 Ki. 5. 14 with Mt. 18. 3. [f] cf. Deut. 4. 40. cf. Ps. 105. 45. [g] Jer. 24. 7. ch. 37. 27. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 10. [h] cf. Acts 7. 51. [i] ch. 9. 10. ch. 22. 31. [j] ch. 10. 19. [k] ch. 9. 3. cf. Lk. 13. 34, 35. [l] cf. Lk. 24. 50. cf. Zech. 14. 4. [m] cf. ch. 8. 3. [n] ch. 1. 1-3. [o] cf. ch. 3. 4.

has never forgotten: "They shall come thither," says the Lord; "and they shall take away from thence all its detestable things, and all its abominations; and I will give them one heart, and I will put a new spirit within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of their flesh and will give them a heart of flesh that they may walk in my statutes, and keep my ordinances, and do them; and they shall be my people and I will be their God." This, then, is afresh certified with all the assurance of God's word, and in plain view of all that has just before been denounced in the way of judgment. Nay, it is repeated here: "But as for them whose heart walketh heartily after their detestable things and their abominations, I will recompense their way upon their heads, saith the Lord Jehovah."

And now the breach between the city and the Lord is consummated: "And the glory of Jehovah went up from the midst of the city, and stood upon the mountain which is on the east side of the city"—the Mount of Olives. How it reminds us of how the Lord Himself took leave of the same city from the same place! Refused by the world, and risen from the dead, He went up finally to heaven in the eyes of His disciples from the Mount of Olives once more. The angels prophesy His return, as Zechariah had prophesied it long before. For us, the Mount of Olives with its Bethany home, is the witness of what is ours in the meantime. Olivet is the memorial of the spiritual unction which has been poured out upon us, anointed with which we wait for His return. Meanwhile, in widowed loneliness, God's earthly city waits also; but in how different a manner! Her captivity has been unbroken ever since, and it is to the men of the captivity that the prophet now returns. "The Spirit lifted me up and brought me in the vision by the Spirit of God unto Chaldea to them of the captivity, and the vision that I had seen went up from me." In principle, the story is told out, although there may be many and important details that are to follow. What a word for the elders who had been waiting all this time the SECTION 2 (Chaps. xii.—xv).

The judgments in detail.

1 (xii.): The king in exile, and the land desolate.

1. And the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, thou [p]dwellest in the midst of a rebellious house, which have [q]eyes to see, and see not; which have ears to hear, and hear not; for they are a rebellious house. Therefore, thou son of man, prepare thee the baggage of an [r]exile, and remove by day in their sight; and thou shalt [s]remove from thy place to another place before their eyes; perhaps they will see, though they are a rebellious house. And bring forth thy baggage by day in their sight as an exile's baggage, and thou thyself go forth at even in their sight, as they that go forth into exile. [t]Dig thou through the wall in their sight, and carry out thereby. In their sight shalt thou bear upon thy shoulder, and [u]carry it forth in the dark; thou shalt [v]cover thy face that thou see not the ground: * for I have set thee for a [w]sign unto the house of Israel. And I did so as I

[p] ch. 2. 3, 6-8. cf. Rom. 10. 21.
[q] Is. 6. 9. Jer. 5. 21. Mt. 13.13,14.
[r] cf. 2 Chr.36. 17-21.
[s] cf. Jer.15 4. cf. Jer. 24.9.
[t] cf. Jer. 52. 7. cf. 1 Sam.19. 12.
[u] cf. Jer. 15. 9.
[v] cf. Jer. 52. 11.
[w] Is. 8. 18. ch. 4. 3. ch. 24 24. cf. Is. 20. 3.

* Or, "land."

result of this prophetic rapture: "I spake unto them of the captivity all the things that Jehovah had shown me."

Sec. 2.

The story having been told, we have in what follows the detail of exactly measured judgment in relation to the various classes.

1. First of all, therefore, we begin with the king, of so great significance in Judah as the one who "sat upon the throne of the Lord" in Jerusalem (1 Chr. xxix. 23). The removal of the king means, therefore, that the representative throne exists no more. Yet how many hopes had been centred in it! Throughout the history of the Judges we find that the great necessity was that a king should come. Even if men did that which was right, it was "that which was right in their own eyes;" that only made the need more apparent. There was no king yet in Israel. When he came, he was ushered in by the prophet, as we know, so in Ezekiel the prophet announces his removal; for the prophet remains through all this time the witness for God and of His ideal in government; but from the very first, we see how the ideal of the people diverged from God's thought. Saul, who was really the man of the people, as such had to be removed; and David, though the man after God's heart, fails in his turn, and is himself the witness that, although in his house the promise of sovereignty remains, yet it must be fulfilled in some higher way than man can accomplish it—the true King must come. Whatever faint shadows of Him there might be, as shadows they could not be permanent, and as they more and more departed from their character as witnesses to Him that was to come, always the more clear it becomes that they must pass. The meaningless king must be removed; he cannot be left for a reproach as God's king—an imbecile, and worse. Ezekiel is now summoned, therefore, to announce his definite removal from the land, no more to return there. During the time in which the desolate land keeps its sabbaths, which it keeps yet, it cannot prosper in their hands; thus we have here the connection of the two parts of the prophecy.

was commanded: I brought forth my baggage by day as an exile's baggage, and in the evening I digged through the wall with my hand; I brought it forth in the dark, and bare it upon my shoulder in their sight.

And in the morning the word of Jehovah came unto me saying, Son of man, hath not the house of Israel, the rebellious house, said unto thee, [x] What doest thou? Say unto them, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, This [y]burden [concerneth] the prince in Jerusalem, and all the house of Israel that are among them. Say, [z]I am your sign: as I have done, so shall it be done unto them: they shall go into exile, into captivity. And the [a]prince that is among them shall bear upon his shoulder in the dark, and shall go forth; they shall dig through the wall to carry out thereby; he shall cover his face that he may [b]not see the ground with his eyes. My net also will I spread upon him, and he shall be taken in my snare; and I will bring him to [c]Babylon, to the land of the Chaldeans; yet shall he not see it, though he shall [d]die there.* And I will [e]scatter toward every wind all that are about him to help him, and all his hosts; and I will draw out the [f]sword after them. And they shall know that I am Jehovah, when I shall scatter them among the nations, and disperse them through the countries. But I will leave a [g]few men of them from the sword, from the famine, and from the pestilence; that they may [h]declare all their abominations among the nations whither they shall go; and they shall [i]know that I am Jehovah.

[x] ch. 17. 12, ch. 24. 19, ch. 37. 18.
[y] cf. 18. 22. 1, cf. Mal. 1. 1.
[z] ver. 6, cf. Is. 8. 18, cf. 1 Ki. 22. 11.
[a] cf. Jer. 39. 4.
[b] cf. Jer. 39. 7.
[c] cf. Jer. 32. 4, 5.
[d] cf. ch. 17. 16.
[e] cf. Deut. 4. 27, cf. Deut. 28. 64, ch. 5. 2, 12.
[f] cf. Deut. 28. 65, 66.
[g] ch. 6. 8–10, cf. Jer. 42. 2.
[h] cf. Lev. 26. 39–42.
[i] vers. 15, 20, etc.

* Or, "and there shall he die."

All is simplicity itself with regard to the prophecy, however little they, who were a rebellious house, as Ezekiel was told from the beginning, might see what was meant. Eyes they had to see, and saw not; ears they had to hear, and heard not; yet God acts for Himself, and unhindered by this incapacity on their part. Ezekiel is instructed to prepare the baggage of an exile and to remove by day in their sight. "Perhaps they will see," says Jehovah; for we know there were still those who were capable of doing so; and, as for the rest, God would still make things so plain that on His part there should be no possible misunderstanding—nothing wanting to complete conviction.

He is to gather together his baggage by day, but himself was to go forth at evening, under the cover of darkness, digging through the wall to carry off just what he can bear upon his shoulder, and no more; covering his face also, so as not to see the ground—a pregnant sign to the house of Israel of what was to take place. All this, of course, was not in vision, but in reality; expressly intended to awaken question by those who saw these enigmatical doings, and would naturally inquire into what they meant. He is to tell them that the burden concerns the prince still in Jerusalem, with all the signs of his royalty about him, but who is to go forth into exile, into captivity, with no sign of his forfeited rank, but as a mere ordinary fugitive; and even so, not to be allowed

And the [j]word of Jehovah came unto me saying, Son of man, eat thy bread with [k]quaking, and drink thy water with trembling and with care;* and say unto the people of the land, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah concerning the inhabitants of Jerusalem, concerning the land of Israel: [l]They shall eat their bread with anxiety, and drink their water with astonishment, because her [m]land shall be left desolate of all that is in it for the [n]violence of all them that dwell therein; and the cities that are inhabited shall be laid [o]waste, and the land shall be a desolation; and ye shall [p]know that I am Jehovah.

And the [q]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, what is that proverb that ye have in the land of Israel, saying, The days are [r]prolonged, and every vision faileth? Tell them, therefore, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: I will make this proverb to [s]cease, and they shall no more use it as a proverb in Israel; but say unto them, The days are at [t]hand, and the matter* of every vision. For there shall be no more

* Or, "anxiety." † Lit., "word."

j vers. 21, 26; ch. 13. 1, etc.
k cf. ch. 4. 9-17.
l cf. Deut. 28. 38-40, 49-51.
m cf. Lev. 26. 33. cf. Jer. 4. 27.
n cf. Ps. 107. 34. cf. Is. 59. 6.
o cf. Lev. 26. 31, 33. cf. Neh. 2. 17. cf. Jer. 4. 7.
p ver. 16, etc.
q ver. 17, etc.
r ver. 27. cf. ch. 11. 3. cf. Mt. 24. 48.
s cf. ch. 18. 2, 3.
t cf. Joel 2. 1. cf. Zeph. 1. 14. cf. Rev. 1. 3.

to go safely away, but to be taken in the net by Him whose hand was acting through the Chaldeans. And yet the very land to which he would be removed he should not see, although he should die there. His eyes, in fact, were put out, according to a common custom of the Babylonians in such cases. His following would be all dispersed, the mass of them slain by the sword, by famine and by pestilence, and the few left would be but as witnesses of the state of things amongst them which had provoked Jehovah's wrath; for in all this, as it is repeated again and again, they were to know that He was Jehovah.

To this burden concerning the king, there is appended, as naturally connected with it, the burden of the land left waste and desolate; for as long as the king continued, even though he might be but the shadow of royalty at the last, this was a testimony that the covenant between God and Israel was yet not wholly gone. The land itself also, as Jehovah's land, which they enjoyed as sojourners with Him, as His guests, was another sign of this: it could not pass wholly into other hands; and in this way even still remains, until the people of God are brought back to enjoy it. Thus, in one way or another, the curse of barrenness must be upon it. The hands that should have wrought in its harvests are scattered far away, and the few that remain, remain but to eat their bread with anxiety and drink their water with astonishment, while their cities should be laid waste and the land a desolation—and this, though Jehovah were His covenant name, that all might know Him to be the Unchangeable, as His name implied.

To this is appended another solemn testimony against the vain hopes of those who, expecting the message of peace which the false prophets had given them, and grounding it upon all the promises to their fathers, were already realizing the failure of their vision, which was no true vision. How often people imagine a failure of God's word, when the failure is only that of hopes falsely built upon His word! But the true word was not of smooth things, but of any vain vision nor [u]flattering divination within the house of Israel. For I am Jehovah; I will speak, and the [v]word that I shall speak shall be performed; it shall be no more deferred; for in [w]your days, O rebellious house, will I speak the word and will perform it, saith the Lord Jehovah.

And the [x]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, behold, they of the house of Israel say, The vision that he seeth is for many days, and he prophesieth of times that are [y]far off. Therefore say unto them, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: There shall none of my words be [z]deferred any more, but the word which I speak shall be performed, saith the Lord Jehovah.

2 (xiii.): A prophecy against false prophets.

1 (1–16): The prophets.

2. [1] And the [a]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, prophesy [b]against the prophets of Israel that prophesy, and say unto them that prophesy out of their [c]own heart, Hear ye the word of Jehovah:

[u] ch. 13. 23 cf. Is. 30. 10.
[v] ver. 28. Is. 55. 11.
[w] cf. Dan. 5. 30.
[x] ch. 13. 1, etc.
[y] ver. 22. cf. 2 Pet. 3. 4. cf. Lk. 17. 26, 27.
[z] cf. Hab. 2. 3. cf. Rev. 10. 6, 7. cf. Is. 55. 10, 11.
[a] ch. 12. 1, etc.
[b] ver. 17. cf. Mt. 7. 15. cf. 1 Jno 4. 1.
[c] Jer. 14. 14. Jer. 23. 16. Jer. 27. 10.

judgment, which would not linger now. It was at hand. In the very days of those that spoke, the Lord Jehovah would fulfil at once that which He was declaring He would bring upon them. Again the word comes re-affirming this: "Son of man, behold they of the house of Israel say, The vision that he seeth is for many days, and he prophesieth of times that are afar off. Therefore say unto them, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: There shall none of my words be deferred any more, but the word which I speak shall be performed, saith the Lord Jehovah."

2. [1] When the priesthood (the first link between God and Israel) failed, the prophet was raised up extraordinarily of God, in sovereign goodness, to stand between the people and Himself. When the kings failed afterwards, the prophet again came forward, the sign, on the one hand, of the broken condition of things, and yet on the other, of God's patience, waiting for possible recovery. Priest and king belonged to the established order of things, and therefore their office passed in the ordinary way from father to son. With the prophet it was otherwise. There was no provision for the continuance of the prophet. He was specially raised up by the goodness of God, as His messenger, to bring His word to the people in such a condition of things as was, or should have been, exceptional altogether. Alas, the adversary of God and man might find his opportunity in this very way to imitate that which is of God, bringing forth prophets of his own invention to speak falsehood as from God, so as to lead more entirely astray their followers.

Naturally, therefore, Ezekiel now turns to these, to prophesy to and against these prophets—prophesying out of their own hearts and seeing nothing. The word which the prophet spoke was not simply something evolved out of a man's "inner consciousness," as men represent it to-day, a divination as it were of a spiritual mind prognosticating the future from what he saw before him. On the contrary, it was no human judgment that they professed to bring, but the judgment of God Himself. Thus it was not their own saying, but Jehovah's saying. And so thoroughly was this known in Israel, that the false prophets themselves had to go as far as this in their pretension. If they saw nothing, they must

Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Woe unto the foolish prophets that follow their own spirit, and have [d]seen nothing! O Israel, thy prophets have been like [e]jackals in waste places. Ye have not gone up into the breaches, nor made up a [f]wall around the house of Israel, to stand in the battle in the day of Jehovah. They have seen vanity and [g]lying divination that say, Jehovah saith! and Jehovah hath [h]not sent them; and they make [men] [i]hope that the word will be fulfilled. Have ye not seen a vain vision and spoken a lying divination when ye say, Jehovah saith—and I have not spoken? Therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Because ye speak vanity, and have seen a lie, therefore, behold, I am [j]against you, saith the Lord Jehovah. And my hand shall be against the prophets that see vanity, and that divine a lie: they shall [k]not be in the council of my people, neither shall they be [l]written in the registry of the house of Israel, and they shall not [m]enter into the land of Israel; and ye shall [n]know that I am the Lord Jehovah. Because, even because they d cf. Zech. 1 2.

e cf. Ps. 59. 14.
f cf. ch 22 3
cf. ch 14 with Ps. 10 23, 30
g cf. Jer. 1 14.
ch 22. 28.
h Jer. 23. 2 32.
cf. Jer. 27. 14, 15.
cf. 2 Pet. 2.
i cf. ver. 22
cf. Jer 23 1
etc. Hag. 1.
j Jer. 23. 31
cf. Zeph 2.
etc. Rom. 31.
k cf. Ps. 1.
cf. Mt. 7. 2 23.
l cf. Ezra 2. 59, 62.
cf. Neh. 7.
cf. Ps. 69. 2
etc. Lk. 10 20.
etc. Mal. 3

16, 17. m ch. 20. 13. n ch. 11. 10, et feign that they saw. But the true heart of the prophet was not seen in them, nor, therefore, the true voice of Jehovah heard. The priest's breastplate was typical of what made the priest the true expression of the Lord's mind towards His people. It contained the Urim and Thummim, by which the priest gave answer from God; the precious jewels which shone in it representing the various attributes of the Unchangeable. They were "the lights and perfections" of Him who is the true and perfect Light, abiding unalterably in Him as the lustre in the gem. But upon these jewels also the names of the people of God were indelibly engraved. Thus the priest bore upon his heart before God the interests of God's people, and God's interests, therefore, in His people. If the priest had now passed, and the king also, any one raised up of God as His prophet must be marked by these very characteristics. Thus, in Ezekiel's day, the prophets should have been men "gone up into the breaches," not ignoring them nor what had been the occasion of them, but proclaiming the faithful word of Jehovah, while at the same time seeking, if it might be, to build up the wall which had been broken down, that it might stand in the battle, even in the day of Jehovah.

But these false prophets had failed in all this. Great as was their pretension, it was as far as possible from the reality. "O Israel, thy prophets have been like jackals in waste places"—a significant figure indeed of those who preyed upon the corruption around, hiding from the light in the barren wilderness which could only furnish them the covert that they sought. In pretension they were angels of light indeed—as Satan's emissaries among God's people constantly are—but the evil which prospered around them bore them true witness. They had seen but vanity, says the Lord, and divined lies. They should not, therefore, be in the counsel of His people, nor written in the register of the house of Israel, nor possess themselves of that land which could be held only according to the tenure of the covenant. Thus they too must know that He was the Lord Jehovah. Yet these were the men that swarmed around in proportion have seduced my people, saying, °Peace; and there is no peace; and one ᵖbuildeth up a wall, and lo, they daub it with ᵍuntempered [mortar]: say unto them that daub it with untempered [mortar], that it shall ʳfall: there shall be an ˢoverflowing rain, and ye, O great ᵗhailstones, shall fall, and a ᵘstormy wind shall rend it. And lo, when the wall is fallen, shall it not be said to you, ᵛWhere is the daubing wherewith ye have daubed it? Therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah: I will even rend it with a stormy wind in my wrath; and there shall be an overflowing shower in mine anger, and great hailstones in wrath to consume it. So will I ʷbreak down the wall that ye have daubed with untempered [mortar], and bring it down to the ground, so that the foundation thereof shall be discovered; and it shall fall, and ye shall be ˣdestroyed in the midst thereof; and ye shall ʸknow that I am Jehovah. Thus will I ᶻaccomplish my wrath upon the wall, and upon ᵃthem that daub it with untempered [mortar], and will say unto you, The wall is not, nor they that daubed it—the ᵇprophets of Israel who prophesy concerning Jerusalem and who see a vision of peace for her, and there is no peace, saith the Lord Jehovah.

2 (17-23): The prophetesses.

2 And thou, son of man, set thy face against the ᶜdaughters of thy people who prophesy out of their ᵈown heart, and prophesy thou against them, and say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Woe to the women that o Jer. 6. 14. Jer. 8. 11. cf. Mic. 2. 11. cf. Is. 57. 21. ctr. Col. 1. 20 with Rom. 5. 1.

p cf. Gen. 11. 4. cf. Gal. 2. 18.
q ch. 22. 28. cf. Gal. 1. 8-10.
r cf. Ps. 62. 3. cf. 1 Cor. 3. 17.
s ch. 38. 22. cf. Is. 28. 14-18. cf. Mt. 7. 24-27.
t cf. Job 38. 22, 23. cf. Is. 28. 2.
u cf. Dan. 7. 2. cf. Ps. 18. 42. cf. Ps. 103. 16.
v cf. Is. 33. 18. cf. Deut. 28. 52.
w cf. Rev. 11. 13.
x cf. Num. 31. 8.
y ver. 9, etc.
z cf. Jer. 51. 25. cf. Jer. 42. 18.
a ctr. 1 Cor. 3. 15.
b cf. 1 Ki. 22. 24, 25.
c cf. Is. 3. 16; cf. Rev. 2. 20. d ver. 2; cf. Lk. 18. 11.

as the true prophet of the Lord was scarce, banding together, confirming one another's words, one building up a wall and another daubing it with untempered mortar, which could never stand the storm that was at hand. God would bring it down completely to the dust, so that the foundation upon which it was built would be discovered—a lie, all through, which could work but the destruction of those who trusted in it. For their prophesying of peace could but provoke war, and the pretension of security provoke God to sweep away the refuge of lies; for, however men misrepresent Him, Jehovah must still and evermore be the Lord; and as against the men who misrepresent Him the Lord will be found Jehovah—the unchanging One. This is the constant reiteration all the way through. Jehovah is arising in His own behalf when there remains as it were no longer any witness for Him.

2 But there were not only prophets, but prophetesses. Beautiful it is to see that, when it is God's grace that is raising up help, the expression of it will be found in those who in their very weakness will thus be most competent witnesses. There were no priestesses in Israel; nor, saving usurpation, any queens that reigned in their own right, but there were prophetesses. The grace of God did not in the same way regard distinctions such as these. Nay, if the men of Israel failed, the rise of a prophetess might be a more signal rebuke to them—thus Deborah, in the days of the Judges, and others at other times. And if after all there were but few women of this class, we know how slow God's people are to accept the grace which thus visits them in its fulness of blessing.

sew [e]cushions upon all armholes,* and that make [f]veils for the head of [persons of] every stature, to [g]catch souls. Will ye catch the souls of my people, and will ye [h]save your own souls alive? Will ye even [i]profane me among my people for handfuls of barley and for morsels of bread, to slay souls that [j]should not die and to save souls alive that should not live, by your [k]lying to my people that listen to lies? Wherefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold I am [l]against your cushions wherewith ye hunt souls, that they may fly away,* I will even [m]tear them from your arms, and I will let the souls go, the souls that ye catch, that they may fly away.† And I will [n]tear your veils, and [o]deliver my people out of your hand, and they shall be no more in your hand to be hunted; and ye shall know that I am Jehovah. Because with lies‡

[1] Literally, "upon all my wrists." † Or, "as birds." ‡ Or, "falsely."

e cf. Mic.3.5.
cf. Rev 18 7.
f cf. Is. 30. 10.
cf. Mt. 23. 16, etc.
cf. Mt 15.14.
cfr. Is 25. 7.
g cf. 2 Pet. 2. 14.
cf. 2 Tim. 3. 6.
cf. Hab. 1. 14, 15.
h cf. ch. 34. 16.
cf. Jude 11.
i cf. Prov. 28. 21.
cf. Mic.3.11; 7. 3
cf. Tit. 1. 11.
j ver. 22.
k cf. Jer. 14. 14.
l ver. 8.
cf. Is. 2. 12–17.
m cf. 2 Ki.18. 4.
n cf. Mt. 21. 12, etc.
o cf. Ps. 124. 7.

And God's delight is shown in various instances, as in the case of the daughters of Zelophehad, who claimed their portion in Jehovah's land when a weaker faith might have thought it humility to make no claim. The heart that counts upon God's grace, how much may it enjoy of the grace it counts upon! Grace is the same grace towards all, and God answers faith. Alas, we ourselves put limit where God puts none. If we make our portion in the land the whole question, we may hesitate to ask for the needed springs—which Achsah did—to make the very land that is our own, fruitful! Beautiful is the recognition, which even a false propheey is forced to make, as to the sovereign grace of God in the instruments that it employs. But, alas, even such precious grace as this could find those who would pervert it, and Ezekiel has now to utter Jehovah's voice against the daughters of his people, who prophesied out of their own heart merely.*

The words that describe the conduct of these have been differently interpreted. What was this sewing of cushions upon all arm-holes, and making veils for the head of every stature to catch souls? Many have interpreted these things literally, as magic fillets worn by these women after the manner of sorceresses, to impose upon their dupes, and which perhaps imposed upon themselves also. But this seems nothing but conjecture; there is no proof, if it be not in the words before us; and while it is easy to recognize the feminine character of these doings, it is surely not necessary to make them seamstresses for such occasions, nor would it mark them out with any plausibility as prophetesses of Jehovah. On the other hand, we may easily read Ezekiel's language here as

* It has been suggested, by Hengstenberg, that these may not have been literal women, but effeminate men, whom in derision the prophet calls prophetesses, and who address themselves to the love of luxury and pleasure which appeals to effeminate natures. "She that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth" (1 Tim. 5: 6). It is very significant that it was "that woman Jezebel who calleth herself a prophetess" (Rev. 2: 20) who is the type of the luxurious seductions of the "great harlot" described in Rev. 17, 18. These seductions were for ease and a smooth path by which the people were ensnared, and these snares might well be spread by men who had lost all true manliness of spirit. "As for My people, children are their oppressors, and women rule over them."—S. R.

ye have *grieved the heart of the righteous [man] whom I have not made sad, and *strengthened the hands of the wicked [man] that he should not return from his wicked way, to save his life; therefore ye shall no more see vanity nor divine divinations. I will even *deliver my people out of your hand; and ye shall know that I am Jehovah.

3(xiv. 1-11): Against the seekers of oracles.

3. And there came certain of the *elders of Israel unto me, and sat before me. And the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, these men have set up their idols in their *heart, and put the stumblingblock of their iniquity before their face: should I be *inquired of at all by them? Therefore speak to them and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Every man of the house of Israel that setteth up his idols in his heart, and putteth the stumblingblock of iniquity before his face, and cometh to the prophet, I, Jehovah, will answer him *according to this—according to the multitude of his idols: that I may *take the house of Israel in their own heart, because they are all *estranged from me through their idols. Therefore say p cf. Mt. 23 4. cf. 1 Sam. 1. 13-16.

q cf. Jer. 23. 14.
r cf. Is. 46. 4.
s ch. 8. 1. ch. 20. 1. ch. 33. 31.
t cf. Eph. 5. 5.
u cf. 2 Ki. 3. 13. cf. Mk. 8. 12.
v cf. ver. 9 with 1 Ki. 22. 15-23.
w cf. Is. 8. 14, 15. cf. Is. 28. 13
x cf. Is. 2. 6. cf. Ps. 58. 3.

figurative. They did in fact, by their prophecies of soft and pleasant things, sew cushions upon the arm-holes, upon which those who listened to them might repose themselves and be at rest; while the veils for the head might, on the one hand, suit what was a mere false humility, and be, on the other, a blinding of the eyes, so as not to see things as they were. These prophetesses sold cheap their sophistries, as Jehovah says, working destruction by them, perverting judgment, so as "to slay souls that should not die, and to save souls alive that should not live." Here again Jehovah must come in to manifest Himself and tear from them the cushions which were upon their own arms also for repose—their false confidence, which infected others. As the constant repetition shows, Jehovah must be and must prove Himself, Jehovah. No lie can avail before Him who is the living Truth, and before whose presence every delusion must at last be broken and pass away; and then what would be the condition of those who had prophesied deceits? Would they catch souls of His people and yet save their own souls alive?

3. The idolatry in the heart of those who professed to be inquiring of the Lord is now exposed in the very elders of Israel who should have led the people in Jehovah's ways, and from whom the revival of the nation should have been looked for. Certain of them come and sit before the prophet, and before they speak God anticipates their inquiry. Only the fact that they are elders is given, those who should have the wisdom of age, therefore, and from whom came the judges of the people. Moreover, they had before their eyes the judgment of God already taking effect upon the nation; a judgment of which they themselves, in their scattered and captive condition, were witnesses. Yet, among those who thus have a decorous outside of orthodoxy, the heart is found, for the most part at least, gone after the common idolatry. It was in this way that false prophets rose up among the true, finding their inspiration, as we presently see, from the desire of the people who, under whatever name, really coveted gods of their own—manageable gods, as the idols certainly were, although the unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: [y] Return ye, and turn yourselves from your idols, and [z] turn away your faces from all your abominations. For every one of the house of Israel, or of the [a] strangers that sojourn in Israel, that [b] separateth himself from me, and setteth up his idols in his heart, and putteth the stumblingblock of his iniquity before his face, and cometh to the prophet to inquire of me by him, I Jehovah will answer him by myself; and I will [c] set my face against that man and will make him an astonishment, for a sign and [d] proverbs, and I will [e] cut him off from the midst of my people; and ye shall [f] know that I am Jehovah. And if the prophet be enticed,* and shall speak a word, I Jehovah have [g] enticed that prophet; and I will stretch out my hand against him, and will [h] destroy him from the midst of my people Israel. And they shall [i] bear their iniquity: the iniquity of the [j] prophet shall be even as the iniquity of the enquirer; that the house of Israel may go [k] no more astray from me, nor defile themselves any more with all their transgressions, but that they may be [l] my people, and I may be their God, saith the Lord Jehovah.

y ch. 33 11
z cf. 1 Thess. 1. 9.
a cf. Nu. 11. 4.
b cf. Lk. 15. 13.
c Lev. 20. 3, 5, 6. Jer. 21. 10. Jer. 44. 11. Amos 9 4. 1 Pet. 3. 12.
d cf. Nu. 26. 10. cf. 1 Cor. 10. 6. cf. 2 Pet. 2. 6.
e Ps. 34. 16, etc.
f ch. 13. 23, etc.
g cf. 1 Ki. 22. 23 cf. Jer. 4 10 cf. Mt. 24. 11 with 2 Thess. 2. 11.
h cf. Jer. 28 17. cf. ch. 11. 13
i cf. Jer. 31. 30.
j Jer. 14. 15, 16. cf. 2 Pet. 2 15.
k cf. ch. 34 29; cf. ch. 16. 63; cf. Deut. 13. 11. l ch. 36. 28; cf. Zech. 13. 9.

* Or, "deceived."

power of Satan was not deficient in them. They were now treating Ezekiel as a false prophet himself, and thus putting Jehovah also among the false gods, as one who could be flattered, wheedled and bribed into conformity with their own desires. How strange is the mystery of the human heart that must, after all, have a god, and yet will not bow to him! — must have a god, yet in reality be its own god; "serving," but even with professing Christians, "serving their own belly," as Scripture says! What a strange and terrible conflict this between their interests and their convictions; and what folly it writes upon this creature of God, intended for communion with Himself, but who has made itself so incapable of it! Their false gods are but the expression of how their hearts and their convictions are opposed to one another.

God therefore meets them, as we see, first of all with the assurance of how truly He discerns the thoughts and intents of the heart, arresting the very inquiry which is upon their lips by giving them the answer which indeed they do not seek, but with all the evidence that it is God who gives them answer. It was but their doom, however; it could be nothing else, as they were but too truly representatives of the house of Israel as a whole, and are addressed therefore as such. They are to learn that the prophet, who truly represents Jehovah, is no advocate to make terms between the people and their offended God. Thus God declares that if they approach Him through one upon whom they can work more easily than upon Himself, in hope that such an one can draw God to be of their mind, they shall find that He will answer for Himself, to manifest the more His own unchangeable nature. He therefore declares the doom of those who set up their idols in their hearts, yet came to the prophet with an

4 (12 23): The failure of mercy.

4. And the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, when the [m]land sinneth against me by working unfaithfulness, and I stretch out my hand upon it and break the [n]staff of the bread thereof and send famine upon it, and cut off man and beast from it, though these three men, [o]Noah, Daniel, and Job, should be in it, they should deliver but their [p]own souls by their righteousness, saith the Lord Jehovah. If I cause evil [q]beasts to pass through the land, and they bereave it, and it becometh a desolation, so that no one [r]passeth through because of the beasts, though these three men should be in it, [as] I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, they should deliver [s]neither sons nor daughters; they only should be delivered, and the land should be a desolation. Or if I bring the [t]sword

m cf. Is. 24. 20. cf. Lam. 1. 8. n Lev. 26. 26. Is. 3. 1. o ch. 5. 16, 17. p vers. 16, 18, 20 cf. Jer. 15. 1. cf. Gen. 6. 8, 9. cf. Dan. 9. 21. cf. ch. 28. 3. cf. Job 1. 5. q ctr. Gen. 18. 23 33 with Jer. 5. 1. q Lev. 26. 22. cf. 1 Ki. 20. 36. cf. 2 Ki. 17. 25. cf. Jer. 15. 3. r cf. Jer. 9. 12. cf. Is. 34. 10. s ctr. Gen. 7. 13. t Lev. 26. 25; cf. ch. 32. 11, 12.

outward semblance of obedience to inquire from Jehovah. He would answer for Himself—not merely by the prophet—setting His face against such, making them a sign and a proverb by His dealing with them. Moreover, if they could entice, as, alas, they did entice prophets professedly of God, to utter a word such as they coveted to hear, Jehovah might permit them to have the message which they craved from such a prophet, but they would both alike find the penalty of their iniquity, and be destroyed from among the people whom God would have in result as His people, and to whom He would be God, according to the name by which He was in covenant with them, the unchangeable Jehovah.

4. A solemn appendix to this follows. These elders would fain have had an answer of peace without righteous foundation to it, and would have made the prophet the mediator of such a peace. God answers them now, although not with a direct message to them, but as it were with His face turned away; addressing the prophet merely, He announces the principles of His own holy government under which they and all must come. Thus "the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, when a land sinneth against Me by working unfaithfulness, and I stretch out my hand upon it and break the staff of bread thereof, and send famine upon it, and cut off man and beast from it: though these three men, Noah, Daniel and Job, should be in it, they should deliver but their own souls by their righteousness, saith the Lord Jehovah."

Thus, in the condition of which the Lord speaks, and in which the people of Israel were at this time, no human mediation could be at all available, even of the righteous. Of these, God chooses three who might of all men be most suited as intercessors; if even they were before Him at the present time, their pleading would alter nothing in such a case. Noah had stood at the wreck of one world, and alone was spared with his house to begin another; when the after-world was once again departing far from Him, Job was declared by God Himself to have no equal upon the earth. Noah and Job had long since passed away. It is remarkable to find Daniel associated with such men as these—a young man as Daniel surely was at this time, and in the court of the king of Babylon; but this has no doubt to do with his fitness to represent hopes that might be very much centered in him; his great place with Nebuchadnezzar being gained in so remarkable a way, and so conspicuous. It had been, too, by upon that land, and say, Sword, go through the land; so that I cut off man and beast from it, and these three men should be in it, [as] I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, they should deliver neither sons nor daughters, but they only themselves should be delivered. Or if I send a [u]pestilence into that land and pour out my wrath upon it in blood, to cut off from it man and beast, and Noah, Daniel, and Job should be in it, [as] I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, they should deliver neither son nor daughter, they should but deliver their own souls by their righteousness. For thus saith the Lord Jehovah: How much [w]more when I send my four sore judgments upon Jerusalem, the sword, and the famine, and the evil beast, and the pestilence, to cut off from it man and beast. But behold, there shall be left in it those that [x]escape, who shall be brought out of it, sons and daughters. Behold, they shall come forth unto you, and ye shall see their way and their doings; and ye shall be [z]comforted concerning the evil that I have brought upon Jerusalem, as to all that I have brought upon it. And they shall comfort you, when ye see their way and their doings; and ye shall know that I have [y]not done without cause all that I have done in it, saith the Lord Jehovah.

u ch. 38. 22. cf. 2 Sam. 24. 15. cfr. 1 Ki. 8. 37-39.

v ch. 5. 17. cf. Amos 4. 6-12.

w cf. ch. 6. 8-10. cf. Is. 6. 13. cf. Is. 17. 4-6.

x cf. Rom. 2. 24. cf. 2 Sam. 12. 14.

z cf. Is. 52. 5. cf. ch. 36. 20, 23. cf. ch. 20. 43. cf. Lev. 26. 39. cf. Hos 5. 15.

y cf. Jer. 22. 8, 9. cf. Deut. 29. 24, 25. cf. 1 Ki. 9. 8, 9.

actual prevailing with God in prayer—prayer which had availed for others as much as for himself, a sample of the "effectual, fervent prayer of the righteous," of which James speaks. It was as one of these practically righteous ones his prayer had prevailed with the Lord. It was not the favor of man that had raised up Daniel, but the favor of God. How much might be hoped for from such a conspicuous representative of God in a day like that! Yet, while recognizing Daniel's eminent place, and associating him with the prominently righteous of by-gone generations, all human hopes that might be based upon this are refused. Not Noah, Daniel and Job together could avert a judgment which was already in fact begun!* Indeed, if only one of God's four sore plagues had been in question, they could not have turned it away; but these four plagues were all of them together now upon the land.

The sentence had been pronounced; judgment was already begun; how vain to think of altering the word which had thus gone forth from God! All that remained was to acquiesce in it; and in a strange and terrible way would God work, as He assures Ezekiel, to produce this acquiescence. There should

*There seems a contrast here too with the Lord's mercy when there is the least indication of a possibility of any returning to Him. "Run ye to and fro through the streets of Jerusalem, and see now . . . if ye can find a man, if there be any that executeth judgment . . . and I will pardon it" (Jer. 5: 1). So in Abraham's intercession for Sodom, God declared He would spare the city if but ten righteous were found there. It is to be noted that Abraham ceased asking for any further lowering of the number; as long as he asked, God granted his request. "Ye are the salt of the earth;" but the time comes, as in the days of Noah, when the salt was taken away and the corrupt earth left to its doom. So will it be at the coming of the Lord for His church. A similar moral state is here described by Ezekiel. The testimony of the few faithful ones, like Jeremiah, was helpless in the face of universal apostasy. Therefore nothing but judgment was left.—S. R.

5 (xv.): Israel a fruitless vine. Their responsibility and judgment.

5. And the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, what is the wood of the [z] vine more than any wood—the vine-branch, which is among the trees of the forest? Shall [a] wood be taken thereof to do any work? or will [men] take a pin of it to hang any vessel thereon? Behold, it is given to the [b] fire for fuel: its two ends that the fire consumed and the midst of it is burned; * is it fit for [any] work? Behold, when it was whole, it was used for no work; how much less when the fire has consumed it and it is burned. Shall it yet [z] cf. Ps. 80. 8-15. cf. Is. 5. 1, etc. cf. Jno. 15. 1, etc.

[a] cf. ch. 17. 6. cf. Judg. 9. 12, 13. cfr. Deut. 32. 32, 33.
[b] Jno. 15. 6. cf. Zech. 11. 2. cf. Is. 27. 11.

* Or, "dried out."

be left in Jerusalem a remnant who would escape, and be brought out of it, sons and daughters: "Behold, they shall come forth unto you, and ye shall see their way and their doings; and ye shall be comforted concerning the evil that I have brought upon Jerusalem, as to all that I have brought upon it; yea, they shall comfort you when ye see their way and their doings, and ye shall know that I have not done without cause all that I have done in it." Such language is as unmistakable as solemn. This spared remnant, alas, a remnant not of the righteous, but of the wicked, after all God's mercy to them would demonstrate by their very doings the necessity of God's judgment. God would be vindicated in such a way that every upright heart must acquiesce in it.

5. And still there is a supplement, as we may say, even to this. "And the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, what is the wood of the vine more than any wood?—the vine-branch which is among the trees of the forest? Shall wood be taken thereof to do any work? or will men take a pin of it to hang any vessel thereon?" The vine, as we know, is of use simply for one thing, for its fruit. If it bear no fruit, there is no reason for its existence. What is its wood? Compare it, says the Lord, with those trees of the forest among which it twines its branches. Has it wood like their wood? Can you manufacture anything from it? or can it serve any purpose? Only for one thing is it of the least use, it is for the fire.* And, as already shown, God was acting thus with regard to Israel. Its two ends, the kingdom of Ephraim and the kingdom of Judah alike, were manifestly being consumed in the fire which was burning the whole of it. How useless now to expect anything from what was so manifestly a mere brand for the burning! Thus it was with the inhabitants of Jerusalem; at the time the prophet spoke they were as between two fires from both sides—Egypt and Babylon—ready to lay hold of them; and to the fire they would be given up. That which they dreaded would come upon them; they should know that He was Jehovah when He set His face in unchangeable holiness against them.

One cannot but remember, in connection with what is here, the Lord's word

* Israel had been brought as a vine out of Egypt (Ps. 80: 8). Everything had been done to secure fruit. The heathen had been displaced, it had been cared for, and had flourished, but all had been in vain. With a slight change of figure, the prophet Isaiah pleads with Israel, which had been planted as a vine in a very fruitful hill, fenced, guarded and tended, but which had borne only wild grapes. "For the vineyard of the Lord of hosts is the house of Israel . . . and He looked for judgment, but behold, oppression; for righteousness, but behold, a cry" (Isa. 5: 1-7). Their vine had become as the vine of Sodom (Deut. 32: 32), although planted a noble vine (Jer. 2: 21). Israel had become an empty vine (Hos. 10: 1). Therefore, failing utterly to bear fruit, nothing but judgment was left for it.—S. R.

be used for any work? Therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah: As the wood of the vine among the trees of the forest which I have given to the fire for fuel, so will I [c]give the inhabitants of Jerusalem. And I will [d]set my face against them: from the fire they have [e]gone out, but fire shall devour them; and ye shall [f]know that I am Jehovah when I set my face against them. And I will make the land a [g]desolation because they have wrought [h]unfaithfulness, saith the Lord Jehovah.

[c] cf. Jer 52. 13 with Jer. 2. 21. cf. Mic 3.12.
[d] Lev. 17. 10. Ps 34. 16. Jer 21. 10.
[e] cf. 1 Ki. 19. 17. cf. Is. 24. 18. cf. Amos 5. 19. cf. Jer. 48. 44. cf. Amos 9. 1-4.
[f] ch. 6. 7, etc.
[g] ch. 6. 14; ch. 33. 29; Is. 24. 3-12. [h] cf. 2 Chr. 36. 14-17.

to us as Christians, in which He declares Himself the true Vine, the stock of the vine for His people, from which all the sap and nourishment must come; in whom alone, therefore, all ability for fruit is found: "I am the Vine," says the Lord to His disciples: "ye are the branches." There is nothing strange, therefore, in the choice of this image for Jerusalem. In God's people is found at all times that weakness and impotence which belong to man, apart from Him who alone can be to them the source of supply—the all-sufficient Source. It is ours to recognize this feebleness and nothingness on our part; not merely such as is necessarily in the creature, but more, in the ruined creature; as hopelessly ruined as Israel in the picture here. To be connected with Israel, now cast out of the land, could be no cause of hope, apart from the grace of God which could alone fulfil to them those promises which in grace He had given, which He would fulfil, therefore—must fulfil—for His own sake, for He can neither change nor repent. Nevertheless, no individual in Israel could claim their fulfilment. God's grace itself was manifestly out of their reach, save only as in the confession of this helplessness faith turned to Him who, because of His own nature, could not turn away from the prayer of the destitute confiding in Him. Here is where we find our place and portion still, who have indeed no part in these promises which are to be fulfilled to Israel, but who enjoy, nevertheless, the sweet new covenant assurances in their fullest reality.

How blessed to know Christ as the unfailing resource of His people; from whom they have but to draw, as the branch from the vine, for unlimited capacity for fruitfulness! We are "blessed with all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus." What we want, therefore, is but the faith which claims and looks for the fulfilment of these blessings—the actual ministry of them for actual need. And of what use are we if we do not bear fruit? "In this," says the Lord, "is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples."

Sec. 3.

We have now the long and terrible history of Jerusalem as the Lord alone could give it: a people who, in so signal and manifest a way, had been delivered by the power of God from the misery of her original condition, as born among the nations, and made to know Himself. None, surely, had been brought face to face with Him as Israel had. And Jerusalem was only Israel in fullest manifestation; and not only delivered, but they had been united to God in a way no other nation had, to have their part with Him, and know the full blessedness of that in the midst of a world gone far from Him. They were thus (wonderful to speak of it) as it were Jehovah's married wife, to whom He was

SECTION 3 (Chap. xvi.).

Jerusalem's profanation of her marriage covenant, yet final restoration.

1 (1-5): Her original condition.

1. And the [f]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, [g]cause Jerusalem to know her abominations, and say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah unto Jerusalem:

[f] ch. 15. 1, etc.
[g] ch. 20. 4. ch. 22. 2. cf. Ps. 78. 9, etc. cf. Ps. 106. 6, 7, etc.

in a relationship peculiar and exclusive amongst the nations, and enjoying all the blessings that this great and wonderful position would of necessity yield for them. Yet they were now to prove the terrible capacity on man's part of losing all that he is entrusted with, in breaking, as far as he can do it, every tie by which God would bind him to Himself.

The long story of this is given in all its loathsomeness, for it was no time to hide the reality of it all, so that it should be fully judged. For if we would judge ourselves, we should not find judgment from God; thus, for those who had hearts to realize it (and the spiritual eye is in the heart) Israel is taught here to judge herself, that grace may even now be her refuge; and, as at the beginning, so at the end, triumphant therefore all through, God's grace is manifest. If Israel has profaned her marriage covenant, yet God in the end shows Himself true to it: and from Him shall come the final restoration which shall at last openly, in the eyes of all the world, manifest His grace, so that the world itself should know it. This, then, is what we have here.

1. Israel's original condition is first reviewed. As already said, Jerusalem is only Israel in full development. The city stands for the people, as cities are everywhere the development of man, in which what he is is most fully shown and brought to maturity. The city in this way is notable from many sides. The tendency of men is plainly towards cities; they show what man is, what he can do for himself; as, on the other side, they show his feebleness, his dependence, and how little he can do. There was no city of God in the beginning. The first city that we read of was man's city, not God's. It was the offspring of man's thoughts and of his need. The city is the bringing together of men in the consciousness of their need of one another, according to the common motto that "Union is strength." Helplessness is written upon man in his very beginning. The human babe is helpless as the young of no other creature is. The child from its beginning and for long, is debtor to others if it is to exist at all; and for suitable development men must come together. God has so ordained that full independence should be impossible for us. Individuality with all of us is grounded in some way upon individual defect. We are not competent all round. We have each his special capacities and his special deficiencies; as, in the world at large also, each country has its own peculiar productions and its need of what is to be got from elsewhere. Thus the world is bound together, and it is quite superfluous to-day to dwell upon the need which we thus have of one another.

The city then is the natural product of this need; but while it is almost necessarily thus the product of man's thought, there is in it a divine meaning which eternity itself will recognize in the fullest way. Yet man anticipated God as to it, and such an anticipation is ever found to be without God, and to have, therefore, all the terrible characteristics of this. Those who would not scatter, when that was God's mind, remained but to build up Babel. Yet man finds the help he seeks. "As iron sharpeneth iron, so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend." The bringing of men together favors this; and even the more diverse such men are, the more may this help be manifested—struck out, as one may say, even from the collision of contrasted attributes. Thus in the city we find, as a rule, the ripest fruits of man's efforts, and always, perhaps, his ripest wisdom, but in evil as well as good. And, alas, with man such as he is, selfish ends dominate too largely to make the coming together wholly good. Rather is there oftentimes, as we know, the most manifest and fullest debasement in this way. What spectacles are men's cities of vice and poverty, as, on the other hand, of man's achievements! Cain builds his city; and his posterity show the aptitudes which are developed in such combinations as the city manifests. But it is plain that morally the development is but a degeneration. On the other hand, in the final future, the city will manifest God's hand in it—God's hand in our individual necessities themselves; in our various adaptation to one another; in our various ability to help one another. Love is the spirit of help, and, where true, manifests the divine nature. How blessed to know that His own ministry of love to us all is to be reflected in our ways with one another. The city of God stands over against the city of man, contrasted, yet resembling. Jerusalem here gives us, in a sense, both sides of this—city of God, as in His thought and desire; city of man, as he but too surely makes it. Jerusalem, then, is but Israel herself in full development.

She is first told of her extraction and of her birth. Heredity puts its mark upon the pages of Scripture, as it does everywhere upon nature; only, man being fallen, the mark of heredity is largely the mark of the fall. Grace makes us to rise above this, but if the power of grace declines, the natural heredity manifests itself once more. Thus Jerusalem was, as it were, again Canaanite, as it was in its origin: "Thy father," says God, "was an Amorite, and thy mother a Hittite." Notice these names here, where everything has a symbolic force, and fully significant, therefore. At the very opening of the world after the flood, as a mark of departure from God already beginning, and so soon to spread everywhere in it, we find the shameful story of Ham ("darkened by the light," as his name imports), and Canaan is his immediate descendant; it shows us man, not in mere original ignorance of God, as many now would make him, but as one who, in the presence of the light received it only as capacity for degradation. Resisted light is ten-fold darkness. From such an one Canaan is the natural fruit, Canaan "the merchantman," as the word is plainly used in Scripture. Canaan is from cana, "to bend the knee, to bow down." "Servant of servants" he was to be to his brethren; and we may be sure that he was that in spirit, if God puts him into this place. But we may serve in two ways. We may serve in love, in which there is nothing higher. But, with fallen man, this service may be but as in Canaan the spirit of the slave (the "servant of servants"), the spirit of fear and not of love. Or it may be for selfish ends; when, of necessity, subtlety and deceit will characterize it. "He is a merchant" (Canaan), says the prophet, "the balances of deceit are in his hand; he loveth to oppress" (Hos. xii 7). Thus it is plain what the spirit of his service is. The Amorite comes naturally from this.

The Amorite, as we have seen elsewhere, does not mean "the mountaineer," for which there is no proper justification. He is "the talker," the man of words; in the East, in the market-place, he is the person who perhaps most impresses you. The merchant, there, is emphatically one who "cries up" his wares; demanding a higher price than he ever expects to get, in order to Thine extraction and thy birth is of the land of the Canaanite; thy [l]father was an Amorite and thy [m]mother a Hittite. And as for thy [n]nativity, in the day that thou wast born, thy [o]navel was not cut, neither wast thou [p]washed with water for cleansing; thou wast k ch. 21. 30. cf. Neh. 9. 7. with Is. 51. 1, 2. cf. Eph. 2. 3. cf. Deut. 26. 5.

l cf. Deut. 20. 17. cf. Rom. 5.

* Or, "for looking upon;" so Gesenius.

12. m cf. Ezra 9. 1; cf. Ps. 51. 5. n cf. Ex. 1. 7, 14; cf. Ex. 2. 3, 6; cf. Acts 7. 18, 19; cf. Hos. 2. 3. o cf. 2 Cor. 6. 17, 18; cf. 2 Cor. 7. 1. p cf. 2 Pet. 1. 9; cf. Ex. 19. 10.

leave room for the inevitable coming down. He knows the uttermost value of his goods; or if he is buying, how to depreciate that which he really values. The wise man exactly describes him: "It is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer; but when he is gone his way, then he boasteth" (Prov. xx. 14). With greed against greed, the balances are sure to be deceitful ones; and for him who is possessed with a spirit of this sort, everything is valued according to its estimate in the market. Alas for "the Canaanite in the house of the Lord!" (Zech. xiv. 21). Here the Judas-spirit develops, who will sell his Master cheap enough; and we see directly the proofs of Israel's parentage in this way, how the Amorite father manifests itself in her.*

Her mother also as the Hittite is not difficult to understand. The sons of Heth are literally "the children of fear" (See Gen. xxiii. 19, Notes). Such fear necessarily develops where the heart is set upon its own things, and in a world where every one is at strife with his neighbor. In the things of God also it comes in, as we know, in such sort that men tell us to-day that all religion is bred of it. This, moreover, can alternate with utter recklessness; for such a spirit will naturally seek the antidotes for its torment, which the world and Satan will as readily supply. All this, alas, but too well depicts the history of the professing people of God, whether in Israel or in the Christendom that has succeeded it. If we would get the profit of all this, we must not lose sight of the unmistakable repetition before our eyes to-day of Israel's history. We have it all, even to the Babylonish captivity, and the broken fragments which have come out of it. Go back to the so-called "dark ages," or find the spots in in which these dark ages have survived to the present day, and see how a selfish spirit of fear is everywhere, and how it connects with the haughtiness of a spiritual profession which knows how to cry up its wares, while it will sell them cheap, too, to attract sufficiently the bidder. The Amorite and the Hittite have left unmistakably their impress upon things everywhere; and we have little cause to boast ourselves with the Philistine boast (see ver. 27) against scattered and exiled Israel. Yet we cannot but notice in Jacob, the supplanter, how these features showed themselves in the very beginning of the nation—before there was a nation at all. But this is all that heredity can do for us. For the rest, it must be the grace of God or nothing.

We come now (ver. 4) to the actual birth of the nation which, as we know, was in Egypt. The forlornness of their condition was manifest when, according to the figurative language here, their navel was not cut; that is to say, they

*The Amorites, or "Talkers," suggest that pride which is so distinctive of high profession—"speaking great swelling words;"—"Our lips are our own, who is lord over us." Pride and boasting seem thus to be connected with the thought of the Amorite, the emir (as the word is) who exalts himself, and gives his commands. The Hittite is the other extreme—cringing, fawning cowardice. They are linked together as the parentage of the natural man. "Ye shall be as God" is the Amorite pride; "they hid themselves" is the Hittite cowardice.—S. R.

not rubbed with [q]salt at all, nor [r]wrapped in swaddling bands at all. No eye had [s]pity on thee to do any of these things for thee, to have compassion upon thee; but thou wast [t]cast out in the open field, so [u]abhorred was thy person in the day that thou wast born.

2 (6-8): Her deliverence and Jehovah's love.

2. And I [v]passed by thee, and saw thee [w]weltering in thy blood, and I said unto thee in thy blood, [x]Live! Yea, I said unto thee in thy blood, Live! I caused thee to [y]multiply* as the sprout of the field; and thou didst increase and grow [z]great, and camest to [a]excellent

* Or, "made thee myriads."

cf. Lk. 10. 33; cf. Lk. 18. 37. w cf. Eph. 2. 1. x cf. Eph. 2. 5; cf. Col. 2. 13. y cf. Ex. 12. 37; cf. Gen. 22. 17. z cf. Deut. 4. 32-34; cf. Gen. 18. 18; cf. Deut. 26. 5. a cf. Ex. 3. 22; cf. Deut. 4. 8; cf. Deut. 32. 10-14; cf. Ps. 135. 4.

q cf. Lev. 2. 13.
r cf. Lk. 2. 7, 12.
s cf. Is. 49. 15. cf. Lam. 2. 11, 19. cf. Lam. 4. 3, 10.
t cf. Gen. 21. 10. cf. Jer. 9. 21, 22. cf. Deut. 32. 10.
u cf. Is. 14. 19. cf. Mic. 7. 10.
v cf. Ex. 2. 24, 25.

were not qualified, as it might seem, for independent life at all, and thus exposed to death at the very outset.* Nor were they washed with water for cleansing. How they had forgotten the very name of their God in Egypt is manifest by Moses' inquiry (Ex. iii. 13); and the golden calf is manifest proof of how the Egyptian idolatry had laid hold of them. Thus they were not rubbed with salt at all; they were strangers to divine holiness and to that power which alone can resist corruption. Nor, as yet, were there even swaddling-bands for the infant nation. The restraints suited to their condition which love itself may impose, and which they were to find afterwards, were, as yet, unfelt. Egypt had lawlessness enough for them, if it had no true freedom. And Israel was, as we know, no object of compassion even to the nation among whom they had come to be. They were but as a foundling cast out into the open field to perish; as we may see them in Moses their deliverer himself thus cast out, but with the divine hand over him, and a divine purpose in all, through which these very circumstances became the means of lifting him into his higher and God-ordained position.

2. It is evident, then, in what we find here, it is not the city Jerusalem merely or literally that we are to think of, but the nation as we find them in Egypt when under the decree of the persecutor, in their blood, as it is expressed here, and groaning in their bondage, "God looked upon the children of Israel, and God acknowledged them" (Ex. ii. 25). The first sign of their national life and of the blessing of God was even then manifesting itself with regard to them in their multiplication under the very decree of death; and when afterwards the judgments were upon Egypt, Israel, as we read, grew great and came to excellent adornment. It was indeed the voice of the Almighty that had said unto them in their blood, "Live." And, according to the figure, the breasts that were to nourish her children grew; while even then, nevertheless, they were, as far as the blessing which God designed for them, still "naked and bare." But then and thus it was that He looked upon them; and for this despised people, mere Egyptian bond-slaves as they were, there came the time of love in which, as He declares, He spread His skirt over them to cover their nakedness. We cannot but think of the covering cloud, and how, when they seemed to be exposed to the wrath of their enemies and almost in their grasp, adornment;* thy breasts were fashioned and thy hair grew: yet thou wast [b]naked and bare. And I passed by thee, and looked upon thee, and behold, thy time was the [c]time of love; and I spread my [d]skirt over thee, and covered thy nakedness; and I [e]sware unto thee, and entered into [f]covenant with thee, saith the Lord Jehovah, and thou becamest [g]mine.

* The necessary separation from defilements of birth is here suggested. "That which is born of the flesh is flesh." The link with its symbolic Hittite mother had not been cut. The picture is dreadful and solemn, but divinely applicable to Israel's infancy as a nation.—S. R.

* Lit., "Adornment of adornments."

b cf. Hos. 2. 3. c cf. Jer. 2. 2. cf. Rev. 2. 4. d cf. Ruth 3. 9.
e cf. ch. 20. 5, 6. cfr. Heb. 7. 20-22.
f cf. Ex. 19. 4-8. cfr. Ex. 24. 1-8. cfr. Hos. 2. 18-20.
g cf. Ex. 33. 16; cf. Is. 43. 1.

the sea made way for them, while the cloud covered them from above. Here, already, they were proclaimed the people of the Lord, although the covenant at Sinai had not yet taken place; and, indeed, it is important to realize that this covenant was not, after all, the foundation of blessing for the nation. God had His own purpose in it, and His purposes are always blessing.*

The law was needed as the handmaid of a grace for which the people as yet, alas, were not prepared; and when God looked upon them in Egypt, it is expressly declared that He remembered His "covenant with Abraham, with Isaac, and with Jacob," and thus "took knowledge of them." In the same way, at the bush, God declares Himself to Moses as "the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob;" and His word is: "I have surely seen the affliction of my people who are in Egypt" (Ex. iii. 7). His message to Pharaoh accordingly is: "Thus saith Jehovah, Israel is my son, my first-born; and I say unto thee, Let my son go, that he may serve Me." Thus God's recognition of His people does not wait for any legal promise on their part of what they will do: and when at Sinai the legal covenant begins, He could already say to them (Ex. xix. 4): "Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you to Myself." True, He has now to say: "If ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto Me above all people: for all the earth is mine: and ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Ex. xix. 5, 6). Thus there was a covenant which they had to keep or observe, but that which followed was not what is yet in the divine mind for them, of which the new covenant is to be the perfect expression. Nor are we to confound, as alas so many Christians even still do, the old with the new covenant. It was of their own choice and with the declaration of their own ability—the value of which had so soon to be tested, but with such terrible result—that God proclaimed in their hearing from the mount which flamed with fire and quaked under His presence there, the terms of blessing which they might find in an obedience which was rendered as easy as possible for them, but which, nevertheless, was the "ministration of death."

Hittite they are in their own character surely, as they tremble and stand afar

* This period is touchingly referred to in Jeremiah, "I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, when thou wentest after Me in the wilderness . . . Israel was holiness unto the Lord" (Jer. 2: 2, 3). The whole chapter is a solemn and tender pleading with a poor unfaithful people, like an untrue wife; and this is followed up in the next chapter: "Turn, O backsliding children, saith the Lord; for I am married unto you" (chap. 3: 14). Similarly Isaiah (chap. 50) shows that it was not the Lord, but Israel's sins which had brought about her divorce. This is the frequent imagery of Scripture in history (as Gen. 29: 18), psalm (45) and prophecy. In a higher and sweeter sense it is also the type of the union of Christ with the Church (Eph. 5: 32, etc.). The two are not however to be confounded.—S. R.

3 (9-14): Her conferred glory.

3. And I [h]washed thee with water, yea, I thoroughly washed thy blood from off thee, and I [i]anointed thee with oil. And I [j]clothed thee with broidered work, and shod thee with [k]seal-skin, and bound thee about with fine [l]linen and covered thee with [m]silk. And I

[h] Ex. 19. 10. [i] Ps. 51. 7. [j] cf. Ex. 13. 21, 22. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 21. [k] cf. Ex. 19. 4-6.

cf. Ps. 45. 13, 14. [k] cf. Ex. 25. 5; Ex. 26. 14; cf. Deut. 33. 25. [l] cf. Ex. 39. 27-29 with Ex. 19. 6; cf. Gen. 41. 42; cf. Prov. 31. 22. [m] cf. Rev. 18. 12.

off while Moses draws near to the thick darkness in which God is (Ex. xx. 18–21); and Amorite none the less for that, as we see in their ready profession. But thus it was that they had to be tested, as Moses declares: "God is come to prove you," he says. But alas for the fallen creature under the proving of God! What can it prove but a fallen condition? And Moses' song long after this (Deut. xxxii.), a song which was to be put into their mouths that it might be a witness for God against the children of Israel (Deut. xxxi. 19), declares at once the utter hopelessness of blessing under it, and the grace of God which must be their only resource at last. Nevertheless, Israel was here now by their own profession in covenant with the Lord; they had fully, of course, the responsibility of this.

3. The object here is manifestly to recite all that God did for them, and in spite of legal conditions, how God's grace as well as His holiness was made to shine out. "I washed thee with water," He says, "yea, I thoroughly washed thy blood from off thee, and I anointed thee with oil." Hengstenberg asserts here that "We are not to think of spiritual benefits;" and that "the prophet abides by what is palpable, which the ungodly even, whose consciences he wishes to touch, would necessarily recognize." How narrow is this as an idea, and how little it does justice to what God was doing for His people, in which the spiritual benefits were, as one may say, the whole thing aimed at—without which all others would be necessarily empty and vain; true also, as has just been acknowledged, that the people under the test of the law, would necessarily show themselves what man under such tests has ever shown himself to be, and that, notwithstanding the large outward show of blessing in keeping the Lord's words, which should have enticed nature itself, if possible, into obedience. They were to have all possible assistances to this, and self-interest itself was to be enlisted upon the same side. Every material good was to be with the righteous; the whole nation, under one government, committed to the same path, was to be in favor of him who kept the covenant. Nevertheless, He who knew man perfectly—who knew the needs of the true-hearted who would experience that by the law is the knowledge of sin—could not but speak all through of God's continual mercy and the ground of His showing this. The very publication of commandments in the keeping of which, if it were possible, man should live, was a light which must needs have effect upon the nation at large. Moreover, they had all the responsibility of the knowledge which God had given them of Himself in the constant interventions in their behalf, providing for them through the barren sands of the wilderness every day of their journey—a constant miracle. Thus He could say of them, in contrast with the terrible immoralities of the nations around: "I washed thee with water;" and in the provisions of His law itself, when seen in connection with their typical meaning: "I thoroughly washed thy blood from off thee, and I anointed thee with oil."

As to what these last words signify in their deepest meaning, we cannot but see ground for it in the gifts and work of the Spirit manifesting Himself among them, the responsibility of which was upon all. From those who have heart for the blessing, nothing can shut out blessing. Nothing on God's part surely would ever do it. And the oracles of God, which, as we must remember, began to take written form with Moses himself, were as the voice of the Spirit; the apostle Paul puts them as Israel's chiefest blessing: "Chiefly that unto them were committed the oracles of God." How much are we not receiving at this present time through God's word to them! Here, then, God puts before the nation, in its extreme departure from Him, all that in which He had wrought to bring them nigh.*

The clothing with "broidered work" (literally, "variegated work") naturally refers to the elaborate ceremonial of their religion; in which, although under a veil, all the grace of God was found for them, as far as it could then have expression. What an interweaving of forms and colors do we find there when we consider its typical significance—continually inviting the meditation of the thoughtful; and for those who, stricken in conscience by the law's just claim upon them, how it pointed them to God's way of forgiveness! We may see in the 32nd psalm how far this knowledge could go, while here the very failure of the law to produce perfection made it all the more a finger pointing to that which was yet to come. The inefficiency of those sacrifices, such as those of bulls and goats, would necessarily press itself upon any who realized what sin was; while faith, in connection with prophecies given from the very beginning, would find in it the foretoken of a better Sacrifice to come. On the other hand, when positive, wilful sin was in question, the ceremonies failed altogether, and one in sin like David's was left entirely to God's mercy, as he also expresses it in the 51st psalm. In all this Israel was plainly under the school-master, and the law was already the handmaid of the grace upon which everything depends for man.

The shoeing with sealskin, which is next spoken of, makes us think of Kohath's charge in the wilderness, to whom the most precious things, as the object-lessons for approach to God, were committed—all went under the protection of sealskin. Israel was thus, in a higher sense than the literal, shod for the way. She must pursue her journey in peace: and so are we, as the apostle tells us, "shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace;" shoes which, like those of Israel in the wilderness, never wear out.

The "fine linen" speaks of practical righteousness, inscribed as it was upon the tables of the covenant. The clothing of the priests, and the enclosure of the tabernacle itself, was of fine linen; to a thoughtful mind it could hardly fail to suggest something of what it typified. It comes also in its natural place in the enumeration here, after cleansing by the blood and the maintenance of approach to God had been duly cared for—things upon which all righteousness depends.

The word used here for "silk" only occurs twice in Scripture. It speaks of something drawn out (meshi, from mashah); it is an animal product, as the fine

* The anointing with oil was an official act in setting apart priests, kings, and in one case at least, the prophet to his work. As a type of the Spirit, it would suggest the empowering of the anointed one for his work. Thus Israel as a nation had that ministry of the Spirit which should have been an abundant sufficiency for all her testimony and service. That she so utterly failed was but proof of her alienation, not of any lack in God's provision. The simile of the marriage relation is still preserved here. The presentation of queen Esther to Ahasuerus will illustrate this. For the Church however the unction is of the indwelling Spirit, and therefore abides eternally.—S. R.

decked thee with [n]ornaments, and I put bracelets upon thy hands and a chain about thy neck: and I put a ring upon thy nose and earrings in thine ears, and a beautiful [o]crown upon thy head. Thus wast thou decked with gold and silver, and thy clothing was fine linen, and silk and broidered work; thou didst n cf. Gen. 24. 22, 47, 53 with Ex. 33. 4. cf. Prov. 1. 9. cf. Prov. 4. 9.

o cf. Is. 28. 5. cf. Lam. 5. 16.

linen is a vegetable one. All nature contributes to the symbolism of spiritual things, and none can question that Israel's was a symbolic system throughout. Silk is produced by the caterpillar, according to the figurative idea, through death to resurrection; left behind, as it were, by the creature for the use of man. We thus see in it the most costly ornament of God's people still—in fact, the "best robe" for the Father's house.

This introduces to what is more simply ornament, for God is not satisfied with meeting the necessities of His people, but must enrich those whom He has delivered. Hands, neck, nose, ears, head, are all covered with them. The bracelet (tsamid) speaks of what is "joined together," and tsemed means a "yoke;" thus are the hands still ornamented that are used to labor in the service of Christ. The chain for the neck (rabhid, "collar for the throat") reminds us of that through which the high praises of God should sound, as expressed in psalm 149. In both of these last things the activities of the divine life are pointed out as the true ornament of God's people. The nose-ring seems to give us the effect for the whole life here: nezem al appaim means literally "the device for the nostrils," which in Scripture are connected with the human life which is as a vapor in the poor, weak creature which man is; but by God's "device," the wonderful plan which these things bring before us, the life is redeemed from vanity. It seems that we are here reminded of all this.

Then we have the ear-rings in the ear. The word agil is in close relation with the name Eglon (see Josh. x. 3, Notes), which means not simply a "ring," but with the thought of movement also, reminding us of what Ezekiel has ever in remembrance, the whirring wheels, the wheel of life ordained at once for man's humiliation and his blessing. These two things come constantly together, and the ear is truly circumcised when it accepts the divine lesson. "The ear that heareth the reproof of life shall abide among the wise" (Prov. xv. 31). Thus the ear is indeed beautified and capable of hearing aright all other things when it has heard, first of all, the condemnation upon man himself, which, accepted, brings him ever to the never-failing blessing which God has for him.*

After all this comes the beautiful crown. A people of whom the former things were true could not lack it. Israel, when true to her God, could not but be thus a queen among the nations. If she failed, the cause of the failure is manifest. For when God was even in measure owned in the midst of Israel, she stood unconquerable by all enemies. Thus the next words picture her according to her God-given exaltation. As we see her in Solomon's time, she has indeed "come to royal estate." The Lord sums up what He has done for them: "Thus wast thou decked with gold and silver, and thy clothing was fine linen and silk and broidered work." And to this is added that by which God sustains the creature so dependent upon Him: "Thou didst eat fine flour and honey and eat fine [p]flour, and [q]honey, and [r]oil; and thou becamest [s]exceeding beautiful and didst prosper unto [t]royal estate. And thy [u]fame went forth among the nations for thy beauty; for it was perfect through [v]my comeliness which I had put upon thee, saith the Lord Jehovah.

* How beautifully all these adornments speak of the Lord our righteousness. Each detail yields a fuller richer meaning for us than even it could do for Israel, for all is real, spiritual, and therefore eternal.—S. ft.

15. t cf. Gen. 17. 6; cf. 2 Sam. 8. 15. u cf. Deut. 4. 6-8, 32-38; cf. Josh. 2. 9. cf. Song 1. 5 with Song 4. 7.

p cf. Deut. 32. 13, 14. cf. Ps. 81. 16. q cf. Ex. 3. 17. r cf. Deut. 33. 24. cf. Deut. 8. 8 s cf. Ps. 48. 2. cf. Ps. 50. 2. cf. Lam. 2. v cf. Ps. 90. 17;

oil." Even in the wilderness, the bread from heaven was given them; not only angels' food, as the common version puts it, but "the food of the mighty" (Ps. lxxviii. 25)—the food which makes mighty. How apt we are to think that if we are once Christians, the character of our food is of no vital import. How little is realized our dependence upon the word of God—that "man shall live not by bread alone," but by that which is its true antitype, "by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God!" If only we knew better our dependence upon this, if only God's word was searched into, not to obtain mere knowledge, but that which ministers to the need of the soul (and there is nothing in all God's word that does not minister to it if read aright), what mighty men would be produced! Is it not for want of this that revivals, such as are truly that, so soon decline? Through the grace of God, some ministry has laid hold upon men, some fresh truth, it may be, or some fresh power in truth known before; but then, so often comes the lack in going on acquiring and growing. God has invited, has drawn to Himself, and is ready to give in unexhausted grace what would maintain the spiritual life in blessing and power. But we are satisfied, as it were, with the first taste, and go no further. Thus, as the manna, kept and unused, quickly grew old and became corrupt, so the truth once enjoyed, even if not lost, becomes, as it were, without sap or lifeless, inadequate to produce what once it did produce. And why? It has been neglected, if not slighted. It has not led, as it should, to God Himself and to the growing acquaintance with Him for which it was intended. The glow and fervor that once was, passes away therefore; and we are brought under that law which we have seen again and again so to characterize that which is earthly—of revival and decay. The unsearched pages of God's word are witness against us of how we have really dishonored that which we have professed to believe in as, all of it, the word of God. If we are content with this, decay is assured.

Again, we read of the manna that it was like wafers made with honey (Ex. xvi. 31). Honey speaks of natural sweetness, which may refresh one for the moment, as in Jonathan's case, but which we can in no wise live upon. But the manna, the heavenly food, has in it a power which does not pall; not mere natural sweetness, but that which is abiding. In Christ, the true antitype of the manna, our true food, we find indeed all the sweetness of humanity, but raised to the divine. Such honey of spiritual sweetness awakens an appetite which should never languish.

But again, we find in the manna (Num. xi. 8) that the taste of it was like "fresh oil." So the power of the Spirit is in the word of God; it is Christ whom it ministers to us; and in this there is perpetual freshness, which will resist decay. Thus even in the wilderness we already have that which will be our food in the land itself—the meat which, as the Lord says, "endureth to everlasting life."

This is the application for ourselves, of course. The things that happened

4 (15-34) Her failure to abide.

4. But thou didst *w*trust in thy beauty, and *x*playedst the harlot because of thy renown, and pouredst out thy harlotry upon every passer-by: his it was. And thou didst take of thy [garments] and madest for thyself *y*high places, decked with divers colors, and didst play the harlot thereon: [the like] had *z*not been, and shall be no more. And thou didst take thy beautiful w cf. Deut. 32. 15. cf. Mic. 3. 11. cf. Zeph. 3. 11.

x cf. Ex. 32. 6. cf. Num. 25. 1, 2. cf. Judg. 3. 6. cf. Ps. 106. 35. cf. Is. 1. 21. cf. Is. 57. 8.

cf. Jer. 2. 20; cf. Hos. 1, 2; cf. Hos. 4. 10. y cf. 1 Ki. 3. 2; cf. 1 Ki. 22. 43, etc. z cf. 1 Ki. 21. 25, 26; cf. 2 Chr. 33. 9.

unto Israel "happened unto them for types;" yet in all this we surely can see how God was drawing His people to Himself; how He would make, and did make, day by day bear witness to His inexhaustible resources, and lead His people on from strength to strength, making their difficulties only the more to manifest the almighty power which was there to meet them. Thus Israel became "exceeding beautiful," even in the eyes of the nations around, as we see in the gifts of Tyre and Sheba in the days of Solomon—an anticipation of the time yet to come in which again, drawn by the glory of her glorious King, "the daughter of Tyre shall be there with a gift." "The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents: the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts. Yea, all kings shall fall down before Him; all nations shall serve Him" (Ps. xlv. 12; lxxii. 10, 11). But Israel forgot that it was the comeliness which Jehovah's presence imparted to them which constituted her beauty. Hence the misery which soon followed, and which not yet has passed away.

4. The story of Israel's failure is next brought out; and, alas, all her privilege, her wealth of blessing, became for her only the means of more fatal and deeper downfall. It is traced to its root here, to their self-confidence. Alas, how possible it is for those who owe all they have to grace alone, that self-confidence should yet show itself! And we may build ourselves up just as Israel did, upon privileges which only God's grace could have given to us, thus taking the glory which is His due to dress ourselves with it! And how quickly pride may thus darken the sunshine of God's grace—for God dwelleth with the humble and the contrite spirit, and the proud He beholdeth afar off: it is the necessity of His nature. Sin entered at the very outset of man's history, by departure from the God-appointed place, as it began in heaven itself. The account of this is given us later on, where we shall have to consider it: "Thy heart was lifted up because of thy beauty; thou hast corrupted thy wisdom by reason of thy brightness" (chap. xxviii. 17). So with Israel: "Thou didst trust in thy beauty," and then, alas, the Canaanite character came fully out. Israel could make merchandise of that beauty itself, and, in the strong language of Scripture (to make it offensive to us, as it was to God), she played the harlot because of her renown, prostituting herself with the nations around in utter debasement. What cause had she indeed to whom all God's wealth was being ministered, to make merchandise of it with others? Alas, where pride turns the thoughts upon oneself, God's gifts fail to satisfy. So with Israel; and so with us, wherever in any measure we repeat this history. All that we see here in Israel is in principle only too sadly possible for the Christian also. Ezekiel has thus a message for us to-day. The heart that loses its first love becomes unsatisfied with its God-given blessings; the good that is in them is not found, and a mad craving comes into the soul to seek from the world a satisfaction jewels of my gold and of my silver, which I had given thee, and madest for thee [a]images of men *and didst play the harlot with them. And thou didst take thy broidered garments, and didst cover them; and thou didst set [b]mine oil and mine incense before them. And my bread which I had given thee, fine flour, the oil and the honey with which I had fed thee, thou didst even set it before them for a sweet savor: so it was, saith the Lord Jehovah. And thou didst take a cf. Jer. 2. 27, 28. cf. Rom. 1. 23.

b cf. 1 Sam. 2. 12–17. cf. Num. 28. 2.

* Lit., "male."

which the world has not, and therefore cannot give. Thus it finds but degradation, and this is what God calls idolatry and harlotry—singularly strong words, we may think, but only because the true estimate of things is lost. "Ye adulterers and adulteresses;" says James, "know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God?" And again another apostle says, "Covetousness, which is idolatry." The Church taking up with the world has repeated, only in a more terrible way, Israel's history; and we must not forget this, so as to make the prophetic words but mere records of the past, and lose their admonition for us.

Departure from God took its outward form in Israel by making for themselves "high places." It was but a heathen habit, playing upon the imagination with a worship in which there is no heart, just as men still seek to satisfy themselves with music, architecture, drapery, and that most characteristic "dim religious light," in which to worship a God who is Light itself, and in whom no darkness is. Such things work upon nature, and produce a sentiment which is so largely taken for the reality which is wanting to it. Thus upon the mountain-tops man could imagine himself nearer to God than in the valleys, and the depths of groves and forests helped, with the beauty of nature, to make him think he was nearer to the God of nature than he really was. There is indeed a witness to God in all these things: who would wish to deny it? Nay, with joy to realize how God in all these things is seeking to draw near to man. Nevertheless, it is just here that man so often makes the fatal mistake of substituting what is merely natural for what is spiritual, and so deceives himself. In heathenism these high places and these groves turned thus, as was inevitable, to evil instead of good, and the worst abominations of heathenism attached themselves to them. What is figurative in the language used here is nevertheless drawn from the awful grossness of the heathen abominations, in which the lusts and passions of men were let loose as homage to the God of nature, with the consequent degradation following upon this. Israel soon realized all these abominations, and spent the riches which God had heaped upon her to the gratification of those various forms of lust which make the world the corrupt thing it always has been.

Under such figures as we find here, the Spirit of God in the final book, in Revelation, draws the awful picture of Babylon the Great, the corrupt Church, in her commerce with the kings of the earth. She has gone Israel's way, but further in reality than Israel could go, for holy things were committed to her such as Israel never had, and with these she has made merchandise in true Canaanite fashion. She has given that which is holy to the dogs; she has cast her pearls before swine; and she, too, out of her silver and gold, has made for herself thy [c]sons and thy daughters, whom thou hadst borne unto me, and thou didst sacrifice them unto them to be devoured. Were thy whoredoms a small matter that thou didst slay my children and give them up in passing * them over to them? And in all thine abominations and thy whoredoms thou didst not [d]remember the days of thy youth when thou wast naked and bare, when thou wast weltering † in thy blood.

And it came to pass after all thy wickedness ([e]woe, woe unto thee! saith the Lord Jehovah), that thou didst build thee an eminent place, and madest thee a high place in every street: thou didst build thy high place at [f]every head of the way and madest thy beauty to be abhorred, and didst open thy feet to every one who passed by and multipliedst thy harlotry. And thou didst commit fornication with the [g]Egyptians, thy neighbors, great of flesh: and didst multiply thy harlotry to [h]provoke me to anger. And behold, I c cf. 2 Ki. 16. 3. Ps. 106. 37, 38. cf. Is. 57. 5.

d cf. Jer. 2. 2. cf. Hos. 11. 1. cf. Gen. 35. 1. cf. Rev. 2. 4, 5.

e ch. 2. 10. Jer. 13. 27. cf. Mt. 23. 13–29.

f ver. 31. cf. Prov. 9. 14. 18. cf. Is. 57. 5, 7. ch. 23. 9, 10.

g cf. Is. 30. 2. cf. Is. 31. 3. cf. Lam. 5. 6.

h Deut. 31. 20. Jer. 11. 17.

* Or, "passing them through [the fire]." † Or, "trampled."

what is spoken of immediately here, the "image of men"—men not as they are, but as she would have them: in effect, sacramental, sham Christians, decorated with the lowest debasement of spiritual blessings. But wherever the heart departs from God, it will adorn what it seeks with imaginations of its own, and conjure up delirious visions, which only show the loss of all sobriety. The false becomes the true, and the true therefore becomes the false.

The last step here is one in which the apostate Church has still followed the ancient order. The children really born to God in the midst of Israel, the remnant owned as His, were sacrificed by a people mad upon their idols; and who knows not that, for refusing divine homage to a piece of magically transformed bread, the blood of God's saints has been poured out like water? If we had eyes to read such things on a minuter scale, how often might we find that the impulses and purposes born of the Spirit within us have been sacrificed in like manner to the self-will that even in a Christian may go thus after its idols. In all this, as with Israel, God's grace and the deliverance wrought by His grace must be practically forgotten. The way is naturally downward, and Israel leaving her true God transgressed as the heathen with their false ones would be ashamed to do. "Hath a nation changed its gods which are yet no gods?" asked the Lord by Jeremiah; "but my people have changed their glory into that which doth not profit" (Jer. ii. 11). The Philistines who at Ashdod would not tread upon the threshold of their mutilated Dagon (1 Sam. v. 5), might be ashamed of Israel's lewd way. They recognized the hand of the Lord upon them, when they sent back the ark to Israelitish territory; yet how little did Israel recognize or repent under the divine hand which was upon her! "Why," asks the Lord by Isaiah, "should ye be smitten any more? Ye will revolt more and more: the whole head is sick and the whole heart faint" (Isa. i. 5). But as in a Christian assembly, even in the apostles' days, there had been what even the Gentiles stigmatized as infamous, so Israel away from God became more heathenish than the heathen. Her high places were, as the Lord reproaches her here, at every cross-road, to allure passers-by from all stretched out my hand over thee, and I [i]diminished thine allotted portion; and I [j]gave thee over to the soul of them that hate thee, the daughters of the [k]Philistines who were ashamed of thy lewd way. And thou didst commit fornication with the [l]Assyrians because thou wast insatiable; yea, thou playedst the harlot with them and yet couldst [m]not be satisfied. And thou didst multiply thy harlotry with the land of merchants,* [n]Chaldea, and yet thou wast not satisfied therewith. How [o]weak is thy heart, saith the Lord Jehovah, seeing thou doest all these things, the work of a lewd, [p]imperious woman, in that thou buildedst thine eminent place at the head of every way, and madest thy high place in every street, and wast not like the harlot in that thou scornedst [q]reward! O [r]adulterous wife, that taketh strangers instead of her husband! They give rewards to all harlots, but [s]thou gavest thy rewards to all thy lovers, and rewardedst them that they might come unto thee on every side for thy whoredoms. And in thee is the [t]contrary from [other] women in thy whoredoms, in that none followeth thee to commit fornication, and whereas thou gavest reward, and no reward is given unto thee; so art thou contrary.

i cf. Deut. 28. 48-57.
cf. Is. 3. 1.
cf. Jer. 37. 21.
j cf. Ps. 106. 41.
cf. Jer. 34. 21.
k ver. 57.
cf. 2 Chr. 28. 18, 19.
cf. Is. 9. 12.
l ch. 23. 5-9.
cf. 2 Chr. 28. 20-23.
cf. Jer. 2. 18, 36.
m cf. Amos 4. 8 with Eph. 4. 19.
cf. Prov. 30. 15.
n ch. 23. 14-17.
cf. 2 Ki. 21. 9.
o cf. Prov. 9. 13.
cf. 1 Sam. 2. 5.
cf. Hos. 6. 4.
p cf. Prov. 7. 11-13, etc.
cf. Judg. 16. 15, 16.
cf. Lam. 4. 1.
q vers. 33, 34.
cf. Is. 52. 3.
r cf. Jer. 2. 25-28.
ch. 23. 27.
s cf. Is. 30. 3, 6, 7.
cf. Is. 57. 9; cf. Jno. 6. 68.

* Or, "Canaan."

cf. Hos. 8. 9, 10. t cf. Jer. 2. 11 with Mic. 4. 5;

quarters. As Rome in her days of degeneracy, so had Israel her Pantheon of all the gods there were round about her—of Egypt, with the fleshly grossness indicated in the worship of bestial gods; of Assyria, of Babylon, etc., all sought after, with continually increasing loss of prestige and power. The infatuated harlot squandered in vain all that divine goodness had bestowed upon her, hiring lovers for reward, getting herself none, and her portion from her true Husband necessarily finding no replenishment. If godliness hath profit of this life also, as well as that which is to come, how sure and utter is the loss that is entailed by the will that wanders from the Source of every good!

The record of Israel here is what we find in the history of Christendom as well, as already said, which has repeated the sins of her ancestry, even though there may be with this the disguise of a new dialect which puts no restraint upon the things thus covered up by it, the darkness only favoring the deeds that suit it.*

* It may be well to remember that this apostasy may have had, ostensibly, its origin in a political effort to court the friendship of the nations by whom Israel was surrounded. Isolated from all other peoples, Israel's only safety lay in abiding obedience to Jehovah. Lapsing from that she turned for help to one and another of the nations. Only faith would keep them true to God; this is abundantly seen in the book of Deuteronomy. Therefore when that faith failed, the people soon courted the favor of the world, and this of course led them into the idolatry described with such unsparing faithfulness in this portion.

So in the history of the Church, when first love failed—as in Ephesus—in the very effort to escape persecution—of Smyrna—the world was courted, and the illicit union of Pergamos and Thyatira was the inevitable result. Of course true faith resisted all this: but, alas, all men have not faith, and so the mass turn to the world for its help.

Similarly in the soul's individual history, faith alone fights the good fight; where faith

5 (35 52): The recompense of God.

5. Therefore, O [a] harlot, hear the word of Jehovah, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Because thy money hath been poured out, and thy nakedness discovered through thy fornications with thy lovers, and with all the idols of thine abominations, and because of the blood of thy children which thou didst give unto them, therefore, behold, I will [u] gather all thy lovers with whom thou hast taken pleasure, and all that thou hast loved, with all that thou hast hated—I will even gather them round about against thee, and will discover thy nakedness unto them, that they may see all thy nakedness. And I will [w] judge thee with the judgments of women that commit adultery and shed blood; and I will give thee up to the blood of [x] wrath and jealousy. I will also give thee into their hand, and they shall [y] throw down thine eminent place, and break down thy high places; and they shall strip thee of thy garments, and take thy fair jewels, and [z] leave thee naked and bare. They shall also bring up an assemblage against thee, and shall [a] stone thee with stones, and thrust thee through with their swords. And they shall [b] burn thy houses with fire and execute judgments upon thee in the sight of many women; and I will cause thee to [c] cease from being a harlot, and thou shalt also give no more any reward. And I will [d] appease my wrath against thee, and my jealousy shall [e] depart from thee; and I will be quiet, and will be no more angry. Because thou hast not [f] remembered the days of thy youth, but hast raged against me in all these things, therefore, behold, I also will [g] bring thy way upon thy head, saith the Lord Jehovah, and thou shalt not commit this lewdness besides all thine abominations.

Behold, every one that useth proverbs shall use this proverb against thee, saying, As is the [h] mother, so is her daughter! Thou art the daughter of thy mother that loathed her husband and her children; and thou art the sister of thy sisters who loathed their husbands and their children. Your mother was a Hittite, and your father an [i] Amorite. And thine elder sister is [j] Samaria that dwelleth at thy left hand, she and her daughters; and thy younger sister that dwelleth at thy right hand is [k] Sodom and her daughters. And

[a] cf. Is. 1. 21. cf. Jer. 3. 1.
[u] cf. Jer. 13. 22, 26. ch. 23. 9, 10, 22. 30. cf. Nah. 3. 5, 6. cf. Rev. 2. 22.
[w] cf. Lev. 20. 10. ch. 23. 45. cf. Jno. 8. 3-11.
[x] cf. Ps. 79. 3, 5. cf. Jer. 18. 21. cf. Zeph. 1. 17.
[y] vers. 24, 31. ch. 7. 23-24. Is. 27. 9.
[z] cf. 1 Ki. 13. 2.
[a] ch. 23. 26, 29. cf. Is. 3. 16-24.
[b] cf. Jno. 8. 5, 7. cf. Hab. 1. 6-10. ch. 23. 10, 47.
[c] Deut. 13. 16. 2 Ki. 25. 9. Jer. 39. 8. Mic. 3. 12
[d] ch. 23. 27. cf. ch. 37. 23. cf. Zech. 13. 2.
[e] ch. 5. 13. cf. Is. 1. 24.
[f] cf. Is. 40. 1, 2. cf. Is. 54. 9, 10.
[g] ver. 22. Is. 106. 13.
[h] ch. 7. 3, 4, 8, 9. ch. 22. 31.
[i] vers. 3, 45. cf. ch. 18. 2.
[j] cf. 1 Ki. 21. 26.
[k] ver. 51. ch. 23. 4.
[k] vers. 48, etc. cf. Is. 1. 9, 10. cf. Jer. 23. 14.

5. Israel's guilt is now summed up and her punishment announced. Her sins are made the means of her recompense, and those to whom she has turned, while turning away from God, become the instruments of His judgments. Stripped of the riches she had received from God, but had lavished upon her weakens, the power of spiritual enemies increases, and in very timidity the soul turns to the world and its principles for the strength which comes from God alone. Compromises, worldly ways and entanglements, and shameful dishonor to the Lord are the result.

But it cannot be too constantly repeated, that the beginning of all declension is a loss of heart for the things of Christ, and of faith which counts upon Him alone.—S. R.

thou hast not walked in their ways, nor done after their abominations, but, as though that were a very [t]little, thou wast [m]more corrupt than they in all thy ways. [As] I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, Sodom thy sister hath not done, she nor her daughters, as thou hast done, thou and thy daughters! Behold, this was the iniquity of thy sister Sodom: [n]pride, [o]fulness of bread, and [p]careless ease was in her and in her daughters; neither did she [q]strengthen the hand of the poor and needy. And they were haughty, and committed abomination before me. Therefore I [r]took them away when I saw [it]. And [s]Samaria hath not sinned according to the half of thy sins; but thou hast multiplied thine abominations more than they, and hast [t]justified thy sisters with all thine abominations which thou hast done. Thou also, take upon thee thy shame, thou who hast [u]judged thy sisters; because of thy sins in which thou hast acted more abominably than they: they are [v]more righteous than thou. So be thou [w]ashamed, and bear thy confusion, because thou hast justified thy sisters.

6 (53–63): The victory of grace at last.

6. And I will [x]turn again their captivity, the captivity of [y]Sodom and her daughters, and the captivity of t ch. 8. 17. cf. 1 Ki. 16. 31.

m cf. 2 Ki. 21. 9, 16. cf. 1 Cor. 5. 1. cf. Mt. 10. 15. cf. Mt. 11. 24. cf. Acts 7. 52.
n cf. ch. 28. 2, 9, 17. cf. Ps. 138. 6. cf. Prov. 16. 5, 18.
o cf. Gen. 13. 10. cf. Deut. 32. 15. cf. Is. 22. 13, 14. cf. Lk. 12. 16–20.
p cf. Ps. 123. 4. cf. Is. 32. 9. cf. Amos 6. 1.
q ch. 18. 12. cf. Prov. 21. 13. cf. Is. 3. 15. cf. Jas. 5. 1–6.
r Gen. 19. 24. Deut. 29. 23.
s cf. Lk. 12. 47, 48.
t cf. Is. 10. 11. cf. Jer. 3. 11.
cf. ch. 23. 11. u cf. Mt. 7. 1-5; cf. Rom. 2. 1, 19, 20, 27; cf. Lk. 18. 11. v cf. 1 Sa. 24. 17.
w ch. 36. 31, 32. x cf. Ps. 126. 1. y cf. Jer. 20. 16.

lusts, she should no more be able to gratify herself in this way. She had fully proved, as she is again reminded, her Canaanite descent, which was now apparent: "Behold, every one that useth proverbs shall use this proverb against thee, saying, As is the mother, so is her daughter. Your mother was a Hittite, and your father an Amorite." There remained for her but the judgment long since pronounced upon Canaan for their sins; and Judah was but the sister of already judged Samaria—and more, of judged Sodom too. She had exceeded in her enormities even these, and, as the Lord declares, had even justified them, comparatively—she had exceeded them in iniquity. She who had judged her sisters must now take her place along with them and bear her shame. Jerusalem that had looked on in pride of heart while Samaria had gone into captivity, and had ceased to think of Sodom, a mere vacant spot as it were upon the earth which had cast it out, was now to exhibit her guilt in her condemnation as fully as they did.

6. And is this then the end? It might seem indeed to be so. What could be done more than God had done, but in vain? If the story were merely a human one, a dealing of man with man, there would surely be no help, no remedy; and God Himself numbering Judah now with Sodom and with Samaria might seem to argue that He had fully and finally given her up. Indeed, interpreters not a few have argued from such premises in this very way. If Sodom could return and find blessing, then there might be hope for Jerusalem; but was it not already wiped out from the earth? Yet God takes up this argument to answer it in a way of His own: meeting the challenge from His own words, to say, Well, I will do this thing which is impossible: "Thy sister Sodom and her daughters shall return to their first estate, and Samaria and her daughters

[z] Samaria and her daughters, and the captivity of thy captives in the midst of them, that thou mayest bear thy confusion and mayest be confounded for all that thou hast done in that thou comfortedst them. And thy sister [a] Sodom and her daughters shall return to their former estate, and [b] Samaria and her daughters shall return to their former estate; thou also and [c] thy daughters shall return to your former estate. For

[z] cf. Jer. 31. 23.
[a] cf. ch. 29. 14. cf. ch. 47. 8.
[b] ver. 53. cf. Jer. 31. 5.
[c] cf. Amos 9. 14. cf. ch. 36. 11. cf. Mal. 3. 4.

shall return to their first estate. Thou also and thy daughters shall return to your first estate."

What is intended here seems a difficulty, for it is certain that Sodom has gone out of knowledge. If we look for her upon the earth, we shall not find her; yet it is just of this earthly restitution that Ezekiel, as has often been said already, everywhere speaks. The judgment that he pronounces is not the judgment of eternity, the judgment following after death, but the historical earth-judgment. Thus we are not permitted here to do as some do, and look beyond the grave to find the remedy. The fact that we have just now had before us, that the judgment of Israel was to be at the hands of those with whom she had sinned, shows that it is in the record of the world's history that we are to look for its accomplishment. It is not a question therefore of the standing of souls before God, nor of individuals, whatever inference we may make, as we have to make in many cases, but what is before us here is Sodom as a whole, Samaria as a whole, and so again Jerusalem as a whole. God is acting things out before the eyes of men, in order to give the broad, general lesson so much needed. We do right to carry it further than the mere details of history. If sin is the destruction of any people, it is because it is the destruction of individual souls; and if it is their destruction in this world, assuredly, except God's grace in some way come in, it must be their destruction in the eternity that follows time. But this is not Ezekiel's theme. It is the broad lesson of history to which he would call our attention, and we may be sure that these lessons are of immense importance to us. It was for this that the trial of man, through the forty centuries before Christ, went on. And we know how God in the New Testament takes up the result of this trial. It was "when the world by wisdom knew not God," that "it pleased God by the foolishness of the preaching to save them that believe;" and it was "when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly." Thus we may not think lightly of the lessons of history, while there is that, truly, which no earthly history can reveal, of which indeed we must think, and for which all else works.*

If we take what is here clearly revealed, then, Sodom is to reappear in a future generation, with her burden of sin and shame removed, and owned as sister to the tribes of Israel; as in their punishment, so in the grace they can say at last, they have received double for all their sins (Isa. xl. 2). We need not at all be at the trouble to search for her at the present time. God will know how to bring her out of her obscurity in His own due time; but it is certain

* Our Lord had declared it would be more tolerable for Sodom than for the city which rejected Him; and in Revelation (ch. 11: 8) Jerusalem is spiritually called Sodom. The Phariseeism which made self its object, resulted in spiritual abominations and corruptions which can only be characterized in this awful way.—S. R.

Sodom thy sister was not [d] mentioned by thy mouth in the day of thy pride, before thy wickedness was discovered, as at the time of the reproach of the daughters of Syria and of all that are round about her, the daughters of the Philistines who despised thee on every side. Thy lewdness and thine abominations, thou barest them, saith Jehovah. For thus saith the Lord Jehovah, I will even [e] deal with thee as thou hast done who hast despised the oath and broken the covenant.

[d] cf. Is. 65. 5, cf. Zeph. 3. 11.

[e] ch. 14. 4, etc.

that for other perished nations besides Sodom, the future, according to the word of God, has a resurrection-time at hand. Nor can we fail to see, if we have eyes for it, some anticipations of such things furnished by present history. Thus has Italy been finding her lost national unity again; and Greece is upon the way to realize this also.* In some cases it seems indeed as if there were to be, not a resurrection of life, but rather a resurrection of judgment. Into all this it is not the place to inquire here; but, for various purposes of righteousness or of grace, God will certainly show, as the Preacher assures us, that He "requireth that which is past" (Eccl. iii. 15). This, once more, is only part of that implied in the revolution of the wheel which again and again Ezekiel brings before us, in which we may see the lesson it surely has for us. The divine Word thus positively assures us that "Sodom and her daughters shall return to their first estate;" "Samaria and her daughters shall return" also—guaranteed by Scripture again and again, though disputed still (perhaps less and less however). The verity of the judgment which has come is only the seal upon the verity of the restoration that shall come. The wheel is, in fact, revolving; and that which brings down will bring up again.†

So the double assurance is given here: "Thy lewdness and thine abominations, thou barest them, saith Jehovah; for thus saith the Lord Jehovah, I will even deal with thee as thou hast done, who hast despised the oath and broken the covenant. Nevertheless, I will remember my covenant with thee in the days of thy youth, and establish to thee an everlasting covenant. And thou shalt remember thy ways and be confounded, when thou receivest thy sisters, thine elder and thy younger one; for I will give them unto thee for daughters, but not because of thy covenant; and I will establish my covenant with thee, and thou shalt know that I am Jehovah." Thus, if on man's side the covenant with God has been broken, from God's side, breach there really can never be.‡

* Since the 10 years when this was written, Greece has taken further strides, and even now seems on the verge of assuming the national prominence foretold in Scripture.—S. R.

† Sodom, we must remember, was a typical Canaanite city. If the "mother" was overthrown, the "daughters" were spared, and in Zoar (the "little one" spared for Lot's sake) we see the perpetuation of the Canaanite, which in the latter day will blossom out in what will answer to a literal restoration of Sodom.—S. R.

‡ It is instructive to note the causes which developed such abominable iniquity in Sodom—"Pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness." Pride, the exaltation of self, comes first. It is the sin of Satan, as it is declared in chap. 28. Pride's self-sufficiency has no need of mercy nor of grace; it says to God, "Depart from us, for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways." Next comes "fulness of bread"—no need which would force a cry to God. It is notorious in the world's history that wealth and luxury are the cause of moral and manly decay.

"Abundance of idleness" leaves the soul open for the lusts of the flesh to assert themselves. Vices flourish in luxuries, until unspeakable corruption brings God's judgment

Nevertheless, I will [f]remember my covenant with thee in the days of thy youth, and establish to thee an [g]everlasting covenant. And thou shalt [h]remember thy ways, and be confounded, when thou receivest thy [i]sisters, thine elder and thy younger ones: for I will give them unto thee for [j]daughters, but [k]not because of thy covenant. And I will [l]establish my covenant with thee, and thou shalt know that I am Jehovah; that thou mayest remember, and be ashamed, and [m]no more open thy mouth because of thy confusion, when I am [n]propitiated as to thee for all that thou hast done, saith the Lord Jehovah.

[f] Lev. 26. 42, 45. Ps. 105. 8. Jer. 2. 2. Jer. 33. 20-26. Hos. 2. 15. cf. Lk. 1. 72.
[g] Jer. 32. 40. ch. 37. 26, 27. Is. 55. 3. cf. Heb. 8. 10.
[h] ver. 63. cf. 20. 43.
[i] cf. Is. 2. 2-5. cf. Is. 60. 8-10.
[j] cf. Is. 54. 1. cf. Is. 49. 18-23. [k] cf. Jer. 31. 31-34 with Heb. 8. 8-13. [l] cf. Gen. 9. 9; cf. Ps. 89. 3; cf. Is. 55. 3; cf. Heb. 13. 20. [m] cf. Ps. 85. 1, 2; cf. Rom. 3. 27; cf. 1 Cor. 15. 9. [n] cf. Is. 40. 1, 2.

This covenant in the days of Israel's youth we must not confound, as has been already said, with the mere legal covenant which Israel so readily entered into, but which has had such bitter fruit. The covenant which God remembered when He took up Israel at the first was, as we have seen, His covenant with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob; and those three names give what is to be His memorial to all generations (Ex. iii. 15). So also the everlasting covenant which He will establish with them is expressly said to be a new covenant (Jer. xxxi. 31-34): "Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt, which my covenant they brake, though I was a husband to them, saith the Lord." To confound these contrasted covenants would seem to be impossible for us; yet it has been done, and is being done continually. The covenant with their fathers they could not break; it had no conditions which might entail the loss of its blessings. The Sinaitic covenant is distinctly marked out in the very passage before us as not that covenant: "I will give them unto thee for daughters," says the Lord here, "but not because of thy covenant." "Thy covenant" He calls it, because man with his legal heart necessitated, as it continually does in individual experience, the allowing of a law which could yet perfect nothing, and with which God thus finds fault—not indeed for lack of holiness in it or anything unsuited in that way to His requirements, but just because it is that requirement which, to those who are under it, yields nothing but the knowledge of sin and self-hopelessness. Indeed that is its true and worthy fruit. But then, as the apostle says, if God speaks of a new covenant, He has made the first old; and it is according to the new covenant that He says here: "I will establish my covenant with thee, and thou shalt know that I am Jehovah; that thou mayest remember and be ashamed, and no more open thy mouth because of thy confusion, when I am propitiated as to thee for all that thou hast done, saith the Lord Jehovah." Here the fruit of upon the putrid mass. When, in the language of the Roman satirist, "the Orontes flowed into the Tiber"—oriental luxury and vice displaced the manly energy of former days—the great empire tottered to its fall. Nations can no more afford to be idle than individuals. Peoples of a rough northern climate or bleak mountain lands, often put to shame those under a balmy sky where sloth flourishes.

So in spiritual things, the saint must meet the foe, must toil and wrestle with an apparently barren condition, if he is to avoid succumbing to the deceits of this world. There is special warning in this for the young believer. "It is good that a man bear the yoke in his youth"—learn to endure hardness, and thus become a good soldier of Jesus Christ.—S. R.

SECTION 4 (Chap. xvii.).

The mercy to an abased kingdom; yet its failure.

1 (1-10): The parable

1. And the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, put forth a [o]riddle, and speak a parable unto the house of Israel, and say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: A great [p]eagle with great wings, long pinioned, full of feathers which had [q]divers colors, came unto [r]Lebanon and took the topmost [s]branch of the cedar. He cropped off the topmost of the young shoots thereof.

o cf. Judg. 9. 8-15, etc. cf. Judg. 14. 12-19. cf. 2 Sa. 12. 1-4.
p vers. 7, 12. cf. Jer. 4. 13. cf. Ex. 19. 4 with Deut. 32. 11 and Is. 63. 9.
q cf. Dan. 2. 37, 38. cf. Dan. 3. 29.
r cf. Deut. 3. 25; cf. 2 Ki. 14. 9; cf. Song 4. 8. s 2 Ki. 24. 17, 18.

Christ's work is, as we see, recognized. The glory, over which the law necessitated a veil, is now in open sight.

Sec. 4.

Having thus seen Israel in her relation to God, and in what comes from this on her side, and on God's side—the judgment, and the grace which follows the judgment—we return now to what is more simply history, but which has of necessity, as ever, its spiritual lesson, as all history will have if it be read aright. We have, here, the mercy which had been shown to the abased kingdom, in the long days of its latter declension, when God yet waited upon it in patient long-suffering. But this mercy failed to effect recovery, as we see here; and it must be reserved to a future day, in which it will manifest itself at last in triumph. This brings in, of course, a prophecy of Messiah, the future King; for in all this part, in which judgment is assured and imminent, the promise of future dawn is held out for faith, to deliver from a hopelessness which is not of Him who is "the God of all encouragement."

1. We have first a parable put forth, of which the interpretation is given afterwards. It is significant, as to the use of a parable, that it should be given with its interpretation alongside of it; which one might think to be the whole matter. It is evident that in pictures such as these we have what strikes the mind and fastens upon the imagination in a peculiar way; and God does not disdain to use these helps for men's attention. Certainly everything is full of parables, if we had only skill to read them; parables which are not mere chance applications, but everywhere rooted in the very nature of things. God's wisdom is everywhere seen in that with which He has surrounded man in all his history. It needed no apology therefore that Ezekiel should be, what they in fact accused him of being, "a speaker of parables." It showed that he was in the line of that universal teaching which divine wisdom has appointed for us, which connects itself with what is before our eyes, that we might never lose sight of it. How good it would be if our minds were spiritually trained in the interpretation of parables! When the Lord asked His disciples the question: "How then will ye know all parables?" did it not imply that He intended them to know what was thus set before them for their exercise? Yet we are not ashamed to own our want of skill in such things, and so far despise what Scripture calls "the deep things of God."

The parable here, as all true parables are, is from God Himself: "Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: A great eagle with great wings, long-pinioned, full of feathers, which had divers colors, came unto Lebanon, and took the topmost branch of the cedar. He cropped off the topmost of the young shoots thereof, and carried and [t]carried it into a land of merchants; in a [u]city of traders he set it. And he took of the seed of the land and planted it in a [v]fruitful soil; he placed it beside many waters, he set it as a willow, and it sprouted and became a spreading [w]vine of low stature, so that its branches might turn towards [x]him, and its roots might be under him; and it became a vine, and [y]produced branches and shot forth sprigs. There was [t] cf. Jer. 51. 13 with Is. 47. 15.

[u] cf. Rev. 18. 3.
[v] cf. Nah. 3. 4 with Zech. 14. 21.
[w] cf. Deut. 8. 7–9.
[x] 2 Ki. 24. 17.
[y] ver. 14.
[z] 2 Ki. 24. 17–20.
[y] Jer. 37. 1, 2; 2 Chr. 36. 11–13.

it into a land of merchants. In a city of traders he set it. And he took of the seed of the land and planted it in a fruitful soil. He placed it beside many waters; he set it as a willow, and it sprouted, and became a spreading vine of low stature; so that its branches might turn towards him and its roots might be under him. And it became a vine, and produced branches and shot forth sprigs." Here is plainly a story of humiliation, and yet of mercy mingling with the humiliation. He had once reminded them of a deliverance from Egyptian bondage, and how He had borne them on eagles' wings and brought them to Himself (Ex. 19: 4). This, however, is not what we have here. It is not in Egypt or the wilderness that the scene is laid; nor is it the beginning of a nation that is spoken of; but of the Cedar of Lebanon, which in fact Israel was, with the sign of its former glory. The interpretation leaves no doubt of this: "Behold, the king of Babylon came to Jerusalem and took its king and its princes, and brought them to him to Babylon; and he took one of the seed royal and made a covenant with him, and brought him under an oath. He took away the mighty of the land, that the kingdom might be abased, that it might not lift itself up, that it might keep his covenant in order to stand." It is, plainly, the history of Zedekiah that is thus before us. Jehoiachin had been plucked off and carried away in the captivity from which, as we have seen, Ezekiel dates his own prophecies. Jehoiachin never returned, and the captivity of Judah was already begun. Daniel himself belonged to the beginning of this transportation to Babylon.

Thus the great eagle is Nebuchadnezzar, a royal bird, his royalty being derived from God Himself; yet a bird of prey, whose great wings show the extent of his dominion, as well, perhaps, as the rapidity with which he acquired power. The feathers of divers colors are the heterogeneous multitudes which followed him; yet he is plainly under divine control, and his acts towards Israel are at first gentleness itself, as far as a king of Babylon could show this. If he crops off the topmost shoots of the cedar, it is to carry them to a land of merchants, a city of traders. We see in Daniel himself an illustration of this conduct; in the captives of Tel-abib we see how they could find their hope in it. But Israel as a whole was not yet rooted out of the land. He took of the seed of it and planted it in a fruitful soil. Nebuchadnezzar placed it beside many waters, set it as a willow that its branches might turn towards himself. This was everywhere, and necessarily, the policy of the empire, whose interest was to encourage in a subjective way the growth of various powers under it, independent of one another while dependent upon himself. Thus one might be used against another, and the empire sustained by these divided interests. Here we find the beginning of Zedekiah's history. His significant name, "Jehovah's righteousness," was soon to be the illustration of it against himself. The kingdom, under Nebuchadnezzar's policy, was reviving hopefully. It was also [z]another great eagle with great wings and many feathers; and, behold, this vine did bend its roots [a]toward him, and shot forth its branches toward him, that he might [b]water it from the beds of its plantation. In a [c]good field, by many waters, it had been planted to produce leaves and to bear fruit, that it might be a [d]noble vine. Say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, [e]Shall it prosper? Shall he not [f]pull up its roots and cut off its fruit that it may wither? All its fresh sprouting leaves shall wither, and [g]not by a great army or many people, to pluck it up by its roots. And, behold, when it is planted, shall it thrive? Shall it not utterly wither when the east wind toucheth it? It shall [h]wither in the beds where it grew.

2 (11-21): The interpretation.

2. And the [i]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Say now to the [j]rebellious house, Know ye not what these things are? Say, Behold, the [k]king of Babylon came to Jerusalem, and took its king and its princes and brought them to him to Babylon. And he took one of the [l]seed royal and made a covenant with him, and brought him under an oath. He took away the z Jer. 37. 5–7.

a cf. Is. 30. 2.
b cf. Jer. 2. 18.
c ver. 5. cf. Ps. 80. 8–11.
d cf. Jer. 2. 21.
e cf. Num. 14. 41. ctr. 2 Chr. 20. 20.
f cf. 2 Ki. 25. 1–7.
g cf. ver. 17. cf. Lev. 26. 36.
h cf. Hos. 13. 15. cf. Mt. 21. 19.
i ver. 1. ch. 18. 1, etc.
j ch. 2. 5, 8, etc.
k ver. 3, etc. Jer. 22. 24–28.
l Jer. 37. 1. 2 Ki. 24. 17. 2 Chr. 36. 13.

indeed but as a vine of low stature; it could be nothing else, but it produced branches and shot forth sprigs. But soon the spirit of independence arose which was to work the total downfall of the nation.

Another great eagle is seen with great wings and many feathers; it is the king of Egypt, but in no wise with the power of the king of Babylon; yet for this very reason more capable of being made use of, while having sufficient power, as they hoped, to enable them to stand by his help against Babylon's rising power, which was much more to be feared. Thus did this vine bend its roots towards him, and shot forth its branches toward him, that he might water it from the beds of its plantation. There was nothing to be pleaded for this on the ground of any oppression by Nebuchadnezzar. On the contrary, Israel might still have prospered in bowing to Jehovah's will. It was still, according to the language of the prophet, in a good field, by many waters, and had been planted to be a noble vine. God had declared His purpose as to Babylon, so that rebellion against it was rebellion against Him. It was resistance to the chastening which the Lord had appointed for blessing, if they had received it as such.* But all was forfeited by this resistance. The question then is capable of but one answer: "Shall it prosper? Shall he not pull up its roots and cut off its fruit, that it may wither?" This, surely, would be the result, if God's word and His power counted for anything. What was the power of Egypt that it should be opposed to Him? "Shall it not utterly wither," the Lord asks, "when the east wind toucheth it?"—but "toucheth" it! and of course it did.

2. The people are not left to interpret this parable for themselves. That they may be without excuse, God Himself will give them the interpretation. They are to be plainly told the issue of this breach of a covenant which had

* This is clearly seen in the closing part of Jeremiah, where the whole situation is the same, both in the exhortations of the prophet, and the disastrous consequences of their going down into Egypt (chaps. 34–52).—S. R.

[m] mighty of the land that the kingdom might be abased,* that it might not lift itself up, that it might [n] keep his covenant, in order to stand. But he [o] rebelled against him in sending his ambassadors to [p] Egypt, that they might give him horses and much people. Shall he prosper? shall he escape that doeth such things? Shall he break the covenant, and yet escape? [As] I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, verily, in the place of the king that made him king, whose oath he despised and whose covenant he broke, even with him in the [q] midst of Babylon shall he die. Neither shall Pharaoh with a great army and a large assembly do [r] anything for him in the war when they cast up mounds and build forts to cut off many persons. He hath [s] despised the oath and broken the covenant; yea, behold, he had given his hand, yet hath he done all these things; he shall not escape. Therefore, thus saith the Lord Jehovah: [As] I live, verily, mine oath which he hath despised and my covenant which he hath broken, even this will I [t] recompense upon his head. And I will spread my [u] net over him and he shall be taken in my snare, and I will bring him to [v] Babylon, and will enter into judgment with him there for his unfaithfulness in which he hath been unfaithful against me. And all his fugitives with all his bands shall [w] fall by the sword, and they that remain shall be scattered towards every wind, and ye shall [x] know that I Jehovah have spoken.

3 (22-24): The revival of David's house in Messiah.

3. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: I also will take of the topmost [y] branch of the high cedar, and will set it: I

* Lit., "it might be a base kingdom."

[m] Dan. 1.1,2. cf. Jer. 24.1 with Jer. 52. 16.
[n] Jer. 27. 12-17. Jer. 38. 17.
[o] cf. Is. 30.1-4.
[p] cf. Is. 36. 6-9.
[q] cf. Deut. 17. 16.
[q] Jer. 32. 4, 5. Jer. 39. 5-7.
[r] cf. Lam. 4. 17 with Is. 31. 1.
[s] cf. ch. 16. 59. cf. Josh. 9. 20. cf. Lam. 5. 6.
[t] ch. 21. 23-26. cf. Gal. 6. 7.
[u] ch. 12. 13. ch. 32. 3.
[v] cf. 2 Chr. 33. 11. ver. 16.
[w] ch. 12. 13, 14. Jer. 52. 8.
[x] ch. 6. 7, 10, etc.
[y] cf. ch. 34. 29. cf. Is. 11. 1. cf. Ps. 80. 15. cf. Jer. 23. 5-8. cf. Jer. 33. 15, 16. cf. Zech. 3. 8. cf. Zech. 4. 12-14. cf. Zech. 6. 12, 13.

solemnly been made in the name of the Lord with Nebuchadnezzar; the breach of which could only make heavier the chastisement which had already come, and thoroughly arm God as well as man against them. Thus the royal power in Israel, which was to have been for the deliverance of the people, was now to involve them completely in its doom: "As I live," says the Lord, of Zedekiah, "Verily in the place of the king that made him king, whose oath he despised and whose covenant he brake, even with him in the midst of Babylon shall he die. I will spread my net over him, and he shall be taken in my snare; and I will bring him to Babylon, and will enter into judgment with him there for his unfaithfulness in which he hath been unfaithful to Me." Plainly, the whole character of Israel as the people of the Lord was gone, and nothing remained for them but complete scattering, which would assure them at last what their unbelief had refused to own, that Jehovah had spoken!

3. Such then, for many centuries, was the end of the throne of David; yet God had guaranteed that throne with a promise which no failure of man could possibly set aside. Nay, in giving it, God had contemplated the failure, and declared what He would do: "I will establish his seed forever, and his throne as the days of heaven. If his children forsake my law, and walk not in mine will crop off from the top of its young shoots a [z] tender one and will plant it upon a mountain, high and exalted. Upon the [a] mountain height of Israel will I plant it; and it shall [b] bring forth branches, and bear fruit, and become a [c] noble cedar; and under it shall [d] dwell all birds of every wing; in the shadow of its branches shall they dwell. And [e] all the trees of the field shall z cf. Is. 53. 2 with Lk. 4 22, etc.

a Is. 52. 13. Ps. 72. 11.
b cf. Ps. 92. 12, 13.
cf. Jno. 15. 1, 2, etc.
cf. Ps. 72. 16.
c cf. Acts 5. 30, 31.

d cf. ch. 31. 6 with Dan. 4. 12; cf. Gen. 49. 10, 22, etc; cf. Ps. 22. 27-30; cf. Is. 49. 18-23. e cf. Is. 55. 12, 13; cf. Is. 60. 3; cf. Ps. 2. 10-12.

ordinances; if they profane my statutes and keep not my commandments, then will I visit their transgression with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes. Nevertheless, my lovingkindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail. My covenant will I not break, nor alter that which has gone out of my lips. Once have I sworn by my holiness, I will not lie unto David. His seed shall endure forever, and his throne shall be as the sun before Me" (Ps. lxxxix. 29–36).

Therefore, while avenging their breaking of the covenant, God will surely not forget His own; and while the rod is upon David's house for its unfaithfulness, the assurance is at once given that God is not as man to repent, and that He will be to Israel at last, what the Babylonian eagle could only be by contrast, representing as it did, God's tender hand in their present discipline: "Thus, saith the Lord Jehovah, I will also take of the topmost branch of the high cedar, and will set it. I will crop off from the top of its young shoots a tender one, and will plant it upon a mountain high and exalted."

For God, the cedar remains therefore, though He seem now to be calling that which is not as though it were. But this cedar of David's house rises up only to fuller stature, as it were, out of its degradation, when Christ of whom the Spirit speaks here becomes the Head of it; humbled, and accepting the deepest possible humiliation, when every promise of blessing to the people who refused Him will seem to have come to an end forever. What blessing can there be, we might ask, for those who have refused the Deliverer when He came and, in a way beyond all that Zedekiah could possibly do, hurled defiance against Him who sent His Son for man's salvation? Yet, in the resurrection of Him who went down thus to death for man, is the assurance of the fulfilment of every promise: "Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: I also will take of the highest branch of the lofty cedar, and will set it; I will crop off from the top of its young shoots a tender one, and I will plant it upon a mountain high and exalted. Upon the mountain height of Israel will I plant it." There is here no question of legal conditions at all, nor breach of covenant, which we see all through Israel's history, to affect Jehovah's promise in grace when He takes up her cause. It is a new beginning, as we see. It is the branch cropped off by Jehovah which now becomes a noble cedar, and all birds of every wing shall dwell in the shadow of its branches. Here comes at last the universal refuge from the oppressor, the beneficent power in which the weakest shall rejoice. All the music of heaven shall be heard amid its branches. Here at last is One in whom God shall fully display Himself, and in whom will be revealed the secret of all God's former dealings with the nation, and with men at large. Man's pride is brought down that thus abased he may be rightly exalted. The tree, once so green to man's eye, is dried up that it may flourish again after God's mind. Ezekiel's wheel, and the Preacher's, has made now its final revolution! Thank know that I Jehovah have f brought down the high tree, have g exalted the low tree, have h dried up the green tree, and made the i dry tree flourish: I Jehovah have j spoken and will do it.

f 1 Sa. 2. 7, 8. cf. Is. 2. 13–17.
g cf. Is. 9. 6, 7. cf. Is. 53. 11, 12.
h Ps. 75. 6, 7. Lk. 23. 31. cf. Mt. 2. 19, 20.
i cf. Num. 17. 5, 10.
j ch. 12. 25, et al.

SECTION 5 (Chap. xviii.).

The righteous ways of God.

1 (1-9): With the righteous man.

1. And the k word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, What mean ye, that ye use this l proverb in the land of Israel, saying, The m fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge? [As] I live, k ch. 17. 1, etc.

l cf. ch. 12. 22.
m Jer. 31. 29, 30. cf. Lam. 5. 7.

God, it will need to revolve no more; for here is One come who, having been abased, is now exalted, and shall never again be abased. By His abasement all has been secured. It was "overturn, overturn, overturn," till He should come whose right it was, and now it is given Him. God has put His seal upon this: "I, Jehovah, have spoken, and will do it." *

Sec. 5.

We have now another chapter after the manner of, and according to the line of things committed to Ezekiel—the affirmation of God's righteous ways in government. These governmental ways form the matter of his whole prophecy hitherto. And they are ways that need to be affirmed; for in God's government of the world, clouds and darkness are round about Him, and we have here that in which the whole law given to Israel finds its explanation. Even now, with His face fully seen, as Moses yet could not see it, we are in some sense upon the mount with Moses still hearing Him say: "Thou canst not see my face." And though we may be consciously hidden and safe under His hand while His glory passes by, yet still what we see is just the glory of the back parts—glory after it is passed. The apostle says of the chastening Hand (which so often is like a cloud encompassing the throne), "Afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness to them that are exercised thereby." Faith, therefore, is the requisite all through; but it is faith, now, in One who has fully manifested Himself in Christ, so that as to what He Himself is there should be henceforth no rightful question. But His ways may still perplex us; and the exercise which we have under them is intended as part of the wholesome discipline under which we are.

* Let it be borne in mind that the prophet refers, not to the first coming of our Lord, but to His final revelation as the King of His people, which introduces the millennial reign. He is seen indeed at His first coming as "a root out of a dry ground"—ready to be the Deliverer. But "His own received Him not:" Messiah was cut off and had nothing. The true Vine was refused, save by the remnant of His people, who became the nucleus of a new order, the Church. "We have no king but Cæsar," shows how the people still leaned upon the arm of flesh, and their house remained desolate. It will be so until (after the close of the present day of grace) the remnant will turn in faith to the One whom they have previously disregarded. "Return, we beseech Thee, O God of hosts; look down from heaven, and behold, and visit this vine; and the vineyard which Thy right hand hath planted, and the BRANCH that Thou madest strong for Thyself . . . Let Thy hand be upon the Man of Thy right hand, upon the Son of Man whom Thou madest strong for Thyself" (Ps. 80: 14-17). Then will this tender Shoot spread abroad its branches, and redeemed Israel will dwell under the shadow of the Vine of the Lord. "Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the earth with fruit" (Is. 27: 6). But it will be through Him whose voice they shall at last hear saying—"From ME is thy fruit found." "His branches shall spread, and His beauty shall be as the olive tree, and His smell as Lebanon. They that dwell under His shadow shall return: they shall revive as the corn, and grow as the vine" (Hos. 14: 6-8).—S. R.

saith the Lord Jehovah, ye shall not have any more to use this proverb in Israel. Behold, [a]all souls are mine; as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine: the soul that [c]sinneth, it shall die.

[a] Num. 16. 22. cf. Zech. 12. 1.
[c] cf. G. n. 2. 17. cf. Rom. 6. 23. cf. Rom. 5. 12.

With Israel under the law, the glory was under a covering; and here we have to look at things necessarily from the standpoint of men in those days. The chapter before us deals with the unbelief which prevailed so much in Israel, which argued from what was but the consequence of their own sin, against the righteousness, as well as the goodness, of God's chastening hand.

1. The statement of the chapter is very full, and we see easily God's earnestness about it. It is not of little account to Him what man, the creature He has made, may make of Him. He is saying here, as in the opening words of another prophet: "Come, let us reason together;" although upon His side there is here little of what we might call reasoning. He reasons in fact upon that in man which should be obvious upon the mere statement of it, which if denied would mean there was no God at all, none worthy to be called that. On the other hand, man's arguments are but those of unbelief, of self-ignorance; for he who knows not God, we may be sure, knows not himself to begin with. We must come to ourselves in order to come to Him. As surely as we have taken our true place before Him, so surely will His glory shine upon us.

"And the word of Jehovah came unto me saying, What mean ye that ye use this proverb in the land of Israel, saying, The fathers have eaten sour grapes and the children's teeth are set on edge?" It is to be noted that it was in the land of Israel that this proverb was being used; the land of God's gift to them, the land that was emphatically "a good land," a land into which God had brought them by the display of most wonderful miracles, beating down the haughtiest power on earth existing then, to give them deliverance, and executing judgment upon Egypt's false gods in a way which rang in the ears of the nations around for long. It was in this good land they could speak of "sour grapes" which their fathers had eaten, and their children's teeth were set on edge through no failure of their own! How little need of argument, one would say, against a proverb of this sort in the land and among the people of Israel! All the more, and because these people are the objects of His love, for whom He has shown Himself mighty, must He silence this talk forever: "As I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, ye shall not have any more to use this proverb in Israel." In fact, throughout all the judgments which the prophet had had to announce, we have heard echoing again and again the assurance that He is Jehovah, the One who took them up under this Name. How plainly His heart is in the answer: "Behold, all souls are mine. As the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine." Will they take from Him the souls of those He has created? Will they doubt His care and goodness toward those whom He had created? Will they think, in the face of the goodness which He has lavished upon them, that those for whom He has thus provided are of no concern to Him? And as the apostle asks long after, "Is God the God of the Jews only? Is He not also of the Gentiles?" As surely as man is man, wherever he is, so surely must God be God to them all. Clouds and darkness may be round about Him, but is the sun less bright because it is hidden? And are the clouds that encompass it of heaven or of earth?

We must remember that Israel was brought into special relationship with God as Creator. As such the very opening of their inspired oracles declare Him; and if Israel had special nearness to Him, yet, even where this is declared, there is careful remembrance of His relation to all others on the same ground. Thus, if God says to Pharaoh: "Israel is my son, even my first-born," the first-born son implies there are other sons. And if there be a special promise to Abraham and to his seed, that promise (indirectly, but as truly) takes in others: "In thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Thus the relationship of the Creator to His creatures is especially insisted on in the Old Testament. So the Psalmist (Ps. cxxxix. 13–16), if troubled at the omniscient eye of God ever upon him, has but to go back and consider how that same eye watched over him before ever he was born, while gradually that delicately interwoven body of his was forming. How could he do other than welcome the eye of such an One to search him through and through? So, pitiful even in His anger, God says in Isa. lvii. 16: "For I will not contend forever, neither will I be always wroth: for the spirit should fail before Me, and the souls that I have made."

True, death has come into the old creation, and God does not forget it here. It is His own penalty, and He cannot overlook it. It is meant to have meaning for man. The very law is the ministration of it; and if all souls are His, the soul of the son as of the father is an object of emphatic interest to Him: none the less is it true that "the soul that sinneth, it shall die." It is solemnly affirmed that it is for his own sins that man dies—not for the sins of another.

We must pause a moment here to consider (what has been considered elsewhere and in various places) what the "soul" is that is intended here, and what death. The "soul that sinneth" is so constantly assumed to be the immortal part of man, and therefore the death, with which it is connected, an immortal death, as it were, that we must stop to consider the Old Testament's constant speech as to this, and the law which is in a special way the spirit of the Old Testament. It has often been said that if it is the judgment of eternity that is affirmed in the law, and its death-judgment eternal death, then God has pledged Himself that every sinner shall receive eternal condemnation. But we know this is contrary to every principle that Scripture declares. God has not thus bound Himself as to be unable to show grace; nor could He play fast and loose with what He has declared. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die" is the patent fact before all men, and pressed upon them by what is itself the ministration of death. It is the undeniable reality of this fact, that all men are under the sentence of death, which makes the law a true and full test of man's condition—shows his inability to stand before God in judgment. It says, "The man that doeth these things shall live in them." Is it not plain that the man who really doeth these things, in a way absolutely according to God, could not be under the sentence of death at all? How could God put such a sentence upon one who is altogether according to His mind? Ah, but that is the contention. Does God really mean that all must be according to His mind? Does He not know, do we not all know and confess, that men are sinners? And if we be so, why any test of man in this way at all?

The answer is, that man will ever mix up God's mercy and man's righteousness, so as to get credit for himself for whatever partial righteousness he thinks he can furnish; and God did, in fact, in the second giving of the law, contemplate this very thought which was in man's heart. With the first giving of the law no promise of forgiveness was attached; the trial was soon over, as we

> But if a man be [p]righteous and do judgment and justice: he hath not [q]eaten upon the mountains, nor lifted up his [r]eyes to the idols of the house of Israel, nor hath [s]defiled his neighbor's wife, nor come [t]near to a woman in her separation, nor hath [u]wronged any;

p Ps. 15. 2. 5. Rom. 2. 7. 10. Rom. 10. 5.
q Ch. 20. 28.
r ch. 33. 25.
s ch. 33. 26.
t Lev. 18. 19.
u Ex. 22. 21. cf. Mk. 10. 19.

know. The golden calf was the end of that; and the tables of the covenant as first made were simply broken under the mount, and never reached the people. In the second giving of the law God declares that He is not only righteous but "merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth . . . forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin." Here, then, is a provision made for those who are allowed—what, in fact, the first trial proved them so clearly to be—sinners. God was ready to forgive sins—though the ground of it is not yet stated—with regard to every one who truly turns to Him. Yet, according to this, man is under a legal system still; and it is of the essence of a legal system that God should say that He can "by no means clear the guilty." How reconcile this with the forgiveness which He has just declared? Where shall the line be drawn? How much sin will God forgive? And where will He put the limit? Here man would interpret in the easiest way according to the measure of his own light thoughts, making God such an one as himself. It is of all importance, therefore, to show precisely what God means, and to declare also from His side what must be the issue of such a trial. And this is not held back at all. The ten commandments are the measure of the righteousness God requires. But who can yield to Him this requirement? And if that be the measure (however often God may come in to cancel the past, and bid him begin again) will man, in result, be anything else but guilty, at any time God comes in? and then how can God clear him? Thus, clearly, it is of this second giving of the law that the apostle asserts it is "the ministration of death and condemnation." No need to say so as to the first. It was of the time when God had declared His mercy, and thus His glory, which made the face of Moses to shine, that the apostle is speaking; and how important it is to realize that God here actually cuts off all hope as to the issue. No man can stand before Me and live, He says. How far does that go? Moses himself, the mediator of this covenant, can in no wise behold His face, as He declares. After He has gone by, God will take away His hand and let him see His back parts; but this is God turned—His back, not the face. And this is the constant tenor of the law. Man misreads it because he is anxious to maintain his own righteousness in whatever fragment of it he thinks himself able.

But grace was always in God's heart; and grace is the only possible hope for any. "But if it be of grace," says the apostle, "it is no more of works, otherwise grace is no more grace." You cannot mix these principles at all. The legal system could not but be a ministration of death to man. And this yet has its use, as is also plain. The law becomes in this very way the handmaid of the gospel, cutting off all hope derived from human effort, and thus making us debtors to God's grace alone. How suited to this character of it, then, that the law should affirm, not the penalty of eternity (unseen as yet), but the penalty which man can plainly see exacted from man day by day, the penalty which in its universality is designed to cut off hope absolutely from all on that ground. Thus the death must be the present death; and God can maintain the penalty he hath [w]restored to the debtor his pledge, hath spoiled none by [w]robbery, hath given his [x]bread to the hungry, and covered the naked with a garment: he hath not given forth upon [y]usury, nor taken increase: he hath [z]withdrawn his hand from unrighteousness, hath executed true [a]judgment between man and man, hath [b]walked in my statutes, and kept mine ordinances to deal faithfully: he is righteous; he shall surely [c]live, saith the Lord Jehovah.

[w] Deut 24.12, 13
[x] Is. 58. 6, 7. Job 31. 16, 20.
[y] Neh. 5. 7. Is. 58. 7.
[z] Is. 33. 15.
[a] Lev. 19. 15, 35.
[b] Ps. 19. 7-11.
[c] ch. 20. 11. cf. Rom. 3. 20 with Gal. 3. 21.

here and now, while holding to His own grace as to the eternity that follows. All is absolutely clear and perfectly consistent.

The death here in Ezekiel, then, is not what we think of as the death of the soul. It is "the soul that sinneth" that dies, true; but what is the soul in this Old Testament language? Just the person himself, the man who was made "a living soul." The soul of the father and the soul of the son is just the person of the father and of the son, and this use is retained in our common language.* And it is well to see how perfectly all this unites with the whole character of Ezekiel's prophecy, which contemplates the world and God's judgment of the nations as nations, of Israel as a nation, judgment executed by special instruments, as here by Nebuchadnezzar. Eternal judgment is entirely out of the question. It is not Nebuchadnezzar who inflicts eternal penalty.

Another difficulty must also be considered here. It will be said, and rightly, that the penalty of death, of which God speaks by Ezekiel in, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die" can scarcely be a penalty resting upon all, when God Himself positively exempts the righteous from it. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die" is but in contrast with the righteous man who shall not die, but live; and that God is not speaking of absolute righteousness, but of those who in heart are His own, who are constantly spoken of, in the Old Testament especially, as "the righteous." Nor that it means the righteous by faith, as it was not the principle yet clearly announced.

We acknowledge this to be true. It is the man righteous in character of whom God is speaking, distinguished in this way from the wicked, even while he "the righteous" lays no claim to any absolute righteousness. Yet he escapes death as it is spoken of here. We can easily see how some at once would say: Here, at least, it must be eternal death that is intended. But, whatever the implication, that is not what is meant. It is death, no question, but as a special judgment of God—not as what comes upon man so universally that he thinks of it as the law of nature with him; but it is a cutting off before the time, in such a way as declares God's wrath upon the person so cut off.

It is the same here as ever in the Old Testament therefore; just what we call natural death, but as a special infliction. For instance, we have no difficulty in understanding what the apostle means when he says to the Corinthians (because of their profanation of the Lord's supper). "For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep." And he adds as to it: "For if we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged," while at the same time carefully preserving the grace in which the Christian stands by the declaration, "But

* It is interesting to find in the Syriac New Testament the word nephesh, "soul," constantly used for "self."—S. R.

2 (10 20): With the son of the righteous or wicked according as he is himself righteous or wicked.

2. Now if he have begotten a [d]son that is violent, a shedder of blood, and doeth to his brother any of those things; and that doeth not any of those [duties], but hath even eaten upon the mountains, and defiled his neighbor's wife, hath oppressed the poor and needy, hath spoiled by robbery, hath not restored the pledge and hath lifted up his eyes to the idols, hath committed abomination, hath given forth upon usury and taken increase; shall he then live? He shall not live: he hath done all these abominations; he shall surely die; his [e]blood shall be upon him.

[d] cf. 1 Sa. 2. 12, etc.

[e] Lev. 20. 9 11. 13, etc.

when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world." Thus there is a death in judgment here which is, nevertheless, not eternal judgment, but which is God's open manifestation of what departure from Him naturally leads to. So the apostle John speaks again: "If any one see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life, for them that sin not unto death. There is a sin unto death: I do not say that he shall pray for it." This is perhaps more than what is necessary to be said upon the matter, but Christians and commentators have so largely gone astray with regard to just such things.

As already said, Ezekiel keeps constantly in view what the law has in view, the tribunal of God in His providential dealings with men upon earth. He is, through all this, contemplating the issue and the end of this very legal covenant; and thus the penalty which He announces is the penalty in human history.

In the first place, then, the Lord speaks of His way with a righteous man—not absolutely such, as already said, but distinctively so: "If a man be righteous, and do judgment and justice, he hath not eaten upon the mountains, nor lifted up his eyes to the idols of the house of Israel, . . . he hath walked in my statutes and kept mine ordinances to deal faithfully; he is righteous; he shall surely live, saith the Lord Jehovah." This was entirely subversive, therefore, of the proverb which Israel was using. There is no question about their ancestry; each one was responsible for himself; and this is the basic principle of all that follows.

2. In the second place we have the son of the righteous, or the son of the wicked, as he is himself righteous or wicked. First, as to the son of the righteous: If this righteous man "have begotten a son that is violent, a shedder of blood . . . shall he live because of his father's righteousness?" This was an important question for the Jew, and especially for the Jew of the captivity, who with the nation under God's dealings, cut off from their land and temple, more and more learned to fall back upon the merits of Abraham, which Rabbis pressed to the extent of involving in some sense the acceptance of all his natural seed. The question is turned back upon them. Here was a father who had not eaten sour grapes; did it prevent his children having their teeth on edge? God was dealing with them for their own sins; and all the privileges they had through Abraham were necessarily forfeited, if in their own character they were not the true seed of Abraham.*

* This is dwelt upon by our Lord in John 8, where it is well to note the distinction He makes between Abraham's seed—according to the flesh—and Abraham's children according to faith and new birth. See John 8: 37, 39.—S. R.

Now, lo, if f he have begotten a son that g seeth all his father's sins which he hath done, and considereth, and doeth h not such like: he hath not eaten upon the mountains, nor lifted up his eyes to the idols of the house of Israel, hath not defiled his neighbor's wife, and hath not oppressed any, nor withholden the pledge, nor spoiled by robbery; hath given his bread to the hungry, and covered the naked with a garment; hath withdrawn his hand from the poor; hath not received usury nor increase; he hath executed my judgments, hath walked in my statutes; he shall not die i for the iniquity of his father, he shall surely live.

f cf. 2 Ki. 16. 19, 20.
g cf. 2 Chr. 29. 6, 11.
h ch. 20. 18.
i vers. 19, 20; cf. Jer. 16. 11-13.

Next comes the question of the son of the wicked man, who "sees all his father's sins which he hath done, and considereth, and doeth not such like." This should ever be the result with one who has had such an object lesson before him. If he read it aright, so as to turn from his father's iniquity and to walk in the divine statutes, should he die for the iniquity of his father? Nay, he should surely live. Father and son are thus judged according to their own personal character.

But they raise the objection: "Why? Doth not the son bear the iniquity of his father?" Spite of many commentators, the second commandment of the law is evidently in question here. It was that which gave a seeming excuse for the proverb itself. For God had declared that He was "a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate Me, and showing mercy unto thousands of them that love Me and keep my commandments." It seems evident that the resentful thought that is in the mind of those overtaken by the present calamities of the nation, is that the third and fourth generations were suffering for faults that were in no wise their own. Allowing the wickedness of former generations—which is not so hard to confess as one's own—they admit that their fathers indeed ate the sour grapes, but not themselves. But the commandment speaks quite otherwise than this; for those who love God and keep His commandments have in it the definite assurance of mercy to be shown them, and could not come, therefore, under the contradictory law of inheriting their father's sins.

This is quite plain as to the law. But it may be argued, Is there not a testimony of fact, however, which we cannot help taking as an interpretation of the commandment? Is there not a law of heredity entailing the most serious consequences? What do we all inherit from Adam? There is but one answer to this. We certainly inherit both a sinful nature and its consequences; but the nature is not in question here. It is the penalty, of which the popular proverb here is speaking. A fallen nature we all have, truly—though we must remember that man is not as a beast to be bound by his nature, nor to be excused by it. Let a man argue as he will about what he has inherited from Adam, he knows in his own soul, as to every sin that he has committed, that he is responsible, and why he is responsible for it. He cannot put his sins to Adam's account. They are his own. Theology may complicate matters for him, indeed, but we are not concerned with that now—it is looked at elsewhere. (See Rom. v. 12–21, Notes.)

As for his [j]father, because he practised oppression, spoiled his brother by robbery, and [k]did that which is not good among his people, behold, he shall die in his iniquity.

Yet ye say, [l]Why doth not the son bear the iniquity of the father? When the son hath done judgment and justice, hath kept all my statutes, and hath done them, he shall surely live. The soul that [m]sinneth, it shall die; the [n]son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son;

j ver. 4, etc.
k cfr. Prov. 14. 22.
l cf. Ex 20.5. cf. 2 Ki. 23. 26.
m ver. 4. cf. Rom. 2. 6, 11.
n Deut 24.16. cf. 2 Ki. 14. 6.

As to penalty, the apostle plainly declares that "by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men" (not, for that Adam sinned, but) "for that all have sinned." Any one who can say he has not sinned, may justly argue that he should be free from a penalty which comes to him simply from his fathers. But let us look at this in the light of some examples that may help us. The Christian at least is free from wrath. He is accepted in Christ before God in all the fulness of Christ's own acceptance. With regard to him the Lord distinctly states: "Verily, verily, I say unto you. He that heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent Me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into judgment (as the word is), but is passed from death unto life" (Jno. v. 24). In this thought of judgment (not as the holy discipline of God with His people, as in 1 Cor. xi. 30-32, but) as true penalty, the Christian is wholly free; yet he dies as others do (unless the Lord comes before), for death came into the world through Adam. Plainly, we must carefully distinguish here. Death for the Christian has changed its character. The Lord has pronounced with regard to this that he who believeth on Him, though he were dead, yet shall live, and whosoever liveth and believeth in Him shall never die (Jno. xi. 25, 26). Yet we must admit a death which is the result of chastisement. Discipline, so far from being penalty merely, is that which secures our being partakers of God's holiness (Heb. xii. 10). It is a proof thus of sonship, as the apostle says.

An Old Testament example is of great value to us here. The book of Job gives an account of the trial of a man who had not his like upon the earth; a man that feared God and eschewed evil. Yet Job is permitted to be in Satan's hands in such a way that his suffering through it is proverbial. His friends argue, as men so commonly do, that this must be the visitation of God for sins in his life, thus detected and exposed, in spite of all his righteous seeming. Of the suffering there was no doubt. Of its being distinctly from God there can be no proper doubt either. Yet Job could proclaim his blameless conduct without possibility of any one controverting it. But there was another cause, which the speech of Elihu (who alone has God's mind with regard to it) brings into open view. There is often an inner condition of heart which has to be reached, and which Job's very claim of righteousness, truthful as in a sense it was, clearly manifests. He has to come where, instead of any such claim to righteousness, he can only say: "I have heard of Thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth Thee; wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes" (Job xlii. 5, 6).

By such examples as these we can see clearly how the fruits and consequences of sin—which is indeed penalty for the unrepentant sinner—may be found in the °righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him, and the ᵖwickedness of the wicked shall be upon him. 3. But if the wicked ᵍturn from all his sins that he hath committed, and ʳkeep all my statutes, and do judgment and justice, he shall surely live, he shall ˢnot die. None of his transgressions which he hath committed shall be ᵗremembered against him; in his ᵘrighteousness that he hath done, he shall live. Have I any ᵛpleasure at all in the death of the wicked? saith the Lord Jehovah; and not rather in his ʷreturning from his way that he may live? But when the ˣrighteous turneth from his righteousness and committeth iniquity, and doeth according to all the abominations that the wicked doeth, shall he live? ʸNone of his righteous deeds that he hath done shall be remembered: in his unfaithfulness which he hath wrought, and in his sin which he hath sinned, in them shall he ᶻdie. And ye ᵃsay, The way of the Lord is not equal!

3 (21-32): With the wicked returning to righteousness, or the righteous to iniquity.

o 1 Ki. 8. 32; cf. Is. 3. 10, 11.
p Rom. 2. 9 with Rev. 20. 12, 13.
q ver. 27, etc. ch. 33. 11, 16; cf. Is. 1. 16-20.
r cf. Is. 55. 7.
s ver. 9.
t cf. Jas. 2. 10.
u vers. 17, 28; cf. Rom. 8. 2.
v ch. 33. 16; cf. Ps. 25. 7; cf. Heb. 8. 12.
w 2 Chr. 6. 23.
x ver. 32; ch. 33. 11; cf. 2 Pet. 3. 9.
y cf. Ps. 147. 11; cf. Hos. 6. 1, 3; cf. Lk. 15.

4, etc. x ch. 3. 20, etc.; cfr. 1 Jno. 2. 1, 2. y cfr. Jno. 10. 28-30; cf. Rom. 8. 31-35. z cfr. Col 3. 3, 4. a ver. 29; ch. 33. 17, 20.

the case of the righteous. If a man like Job needed the discipline through which he passed to open his eyes to his condition—to sin in his very nature—it is plain that no one could think of being exempt from these ways of a holy and merciful God with regard to him. And proportionately as we have little knowledge of ourselves, these ways may be mysterious to us. They were surely that to Job until they found their interpretation; and it is plain that the great point through it all is, as Elihu says, to turn man from his purpose, from all his own ends and ways, and to hide pride from man. Pride is that which, above all, obscures the ways of God with us, while it necessitates a severity of trial which, arguing from the mere outward conduct, when there is even a general desire to be right with God, is hard to penetrate. Thus we can see why, in a world like this, the righteous and the wicked seem often to fare so similarly; indeed, as the psalmist thought, the wicked may get on best. He found that he must be in the sanctuary to understand this.

3. We have now another case considered; which closes the account. It is that of the sinner turning to righteousness; or, on the other hand, the turning of the righteous outwardly to sin. In either case, the judgment must be according to the end of the trial. Former sin, or former righteousness, cannot be remembered; that is, the sin of the past will not make the present righteousness to which one has turned, unavailing; nor, on the other hand, the past righteousness make the present sin to be cancelled by it. We must remember in all this that it is not the final account in eternity that is spoken of, but the present entering into the favor or under the judgment of God in government. Nor have we the grace of God's mercy, as the gospel has shown it to us, spoken of at all. It is God's ways in government that are before us, which is the constant theme of the prophet. We must remember also how, in the case of sin like David's, there might have to be, as far as outward experiences go, the remembrance of the sin, even when it had been forgiven and the soul was once more in the unclouded favor of God. The need in David's case is explicitly given to us. Because he had made the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, God

Hear, then, O house of Israel: Is not [b]my way equal? are not [c]your ways unequal? When the [d]righteous man turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, and dieth therein, in his iniquity that he hath done he shall die. And when the [e]wicked turneth from his wickedness which he hath committed, and doeth judgment and justice, he shall keep his soul alive. Because he [f]considereth and turneth away from all his transgressions which he hath committed, he shall certainly live, he shall not die. Yet the house of Israel say, The way of the Lord is not equal. O house of Israel, are not my ways equal? Are not your ways unequal? Therefore I will judge you, O house of Israel, every one [g]according to his ways, saith the Lord Jehovah. [h]Return ye, and turn from all your transgressions; and iniquity shall not be your stumbling-block. [i]Cast away from you all your transgressions wherewith ye have transgressed, and [j]make you a new heart and a new spirit: for [k]why will ye die, O house of Israel? For I have [l]no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord Jehovah. Therefore [m]turn ye and live.

[b] Gen. 18. 25. Deut. 32. 4. Zeph. 3. 5.
[c] Ps. 50. 21. cf. Jer. 2. 19.
[d] ver. 24. cf. Rom. 2. 7.
[e] ver. 21.
[f] ver. 14. Deut. 32. 29.
[g] ch. 7. 3. ch. 33. 20. Eccl. 12. 14.
[h] Mal. 3. 18. Is. 31. 6, 7. etc. Heb. 9. 26.
[i] etc. ch. 36. 25, 26 etc. Jer. 32. 39.
[k] ch. 33. 11. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 20.
[l] cf. Lk. 19. 41.
[m] cf. Mt. 11. 28.

must glorify Himself as to the sin, not merely on account of any disciplinary need on David's part, but because God cares for His glory among men in general. He must maintain His character, and show that He cannot pass over evil in the lives of His own people because they are that. Thus the sword was never to depart from David's house, and the sin that he had committed sprang up again and again in his own family history. How great the need that there should be no right question with regard to the holiness of Him who yet delights in mercy, abundant in goodness and in truth at the same time! But with Him, "mercy rejoiceth against judgment," and He emphatically declares, therefore, that He can have no pleasure in the death of the sinner. In fact, the nation of Israel as a whole were in such a state as necessitated judgment. The darkness over the ways of God was with them the fruit of that darkened understanding which a heart turned away from Him will surely produce; and he closes here with an earnest appeal to their conscience and heart together. Their ways, not His, were unequal; of necessity therefore, judgment was at hand; but still He would have them turn from all their transgressions, that they might not be to their destruction. "Cast away from you all your transgressions wherewith ye have transgressed, and make you a new heart and a new spirit: for why will ye die, O house of Israel?" How fully is man's responsibility for his whole condition recognized in this appeal! It is not, of course, what the Lord urged upon Nicodemus, when the new light was dawning upon him, that man must be born again; but it is responsibility pressed to the full, and man is fully recognized as one who ought to be master of himself, capable of such appeal as is made to him here: "For why will ye die, O house of Israel? For I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord Jehovah; therefore, turn ye and live."

Sec. 6.

In this chapter we return to the lessons furnished by the history of the peo-

SECTION 6 (Chap. xix.).

The victories of the Gentiles over the line of David, so that under them Israel never obtains her hope.

AND thou, take thou up a [n]lamentation for the princes of Israel, and say, What was thy [o]mother? A lioness: she lay down among [p]lions, she nourished her whelps in the midst of the young lions. And she brought up [q]one of her whelps; it became a young lion, and he learned to catch the prey; he devoured men. And the [r]nations heard of him; he was taken in their pit, and they brought him with hooks into the land of [s]Egypt. And when she saw that she had waited and her hope was lost, she took [t]another of her whelps, and made him a young lion. And he went up and down among the lions, he became a young lion, and learned to catch the prey; he devoured men. And he n ch. 26. 17; ch. 27. 2.

o cf. ch. 16. 3; cfr. Gal. 4. 26, 31.
p cf. Nah. 2. 11, 12. cf. Gen. 49. 9, 10.
q cf. 2 Ki. 23. 31, 32. cf. 2 Chr. 36. 1, 2.
r cf. 2 Ki. 23. 33, 34.
s cf. Jer. 22. 11, 12, 18.
t cf. 2 Ki. 23. 34–37.

ple. The prevailing of Gentile power over the line of David, spite of the promises of God given to it, is here pointed out. The hope which these promises awakened, Israel seemed not to obtain. We have not this fact merely, however, but the plain reason for it, which its very brevity makes all the more vivid. Two pictures of Israel are set side by side before us, Jerusalem and her king being the representatives of Israel; and these pictures are intended to cast light upon one another. There is a certain incongruity between them which at first sight makes the connection difficult, but which is the very point intended to be pressed. Jerusalem as the lioness among lions is the very secret of Jerusalem's present broken-down condition as God's vine.

The lamentation is over the princes of Israel; it is the kingdom that is before us, and the question is asked, "What was thy mother?" The answer is, "A lioness; she lay down among lions; she nourished her whelps in the midst of the young lions." She is a kingdom among the kingdoms of the earth, in a relation to them which makes her offspring as their offspring, and reproduces in them the Gentile characters. There is, truly, a Lion of the tribe of Judah; it is a title of Christ Himself, and He will arise in this character to put down all enemies at last by one decisive stroke. The book of Revelation shows us Christ after this manner, as the Lion of the tribe of Judah. When the seer looks to see this Lion, however, he sees the Lamb. These things are not incongruous or contradictory in Him. The Lamb is His true and inner character; and all the way through it is the Lamb that is upon the throne, and it is the Lamb whose wrath is dreaded. The rod of iron, to use another figure, is in His hand; but it is the Shepherd's rod none the less. Judgment is not only in behalf of righteousness, but it is the fruit of love itself. He must manifest Himself against the enemies of His people; He must destroy those that destroy the earth.

But the lion which is spoken of here is a very different one. Indeed, Israel was nothing now but a Gentile power, with the lawlessness and selfish spirit that belongs to man in nature. Her offspring manifest this: "She brought up one of her whelps. It became a young lion, and he learned to catch prey; he devoured men." The statement is as decisive as it is short. This is not God's picture of the "Ruler amongst men," surely. It is not knew their palaces, and laid [u]waste their cities; and the land was desolate and its fulness because of the noise of his roaring. Then the [v]nations set against him on every side from the provinces, and spread their net over him; he was taken in their pit and they put him in a cage with hooks, and brought him to the king of [w]Babylon; they brought him into strongholds, that his voice should [x]no more be heard upon the mountains of Israel.

[u] vch. 22. 25. cf. 18. 1. 21. 23.
[v] cf. 2 Ki. 24. 1-6. Jer. 22. 13-19.
[w] 2 Chr. 36. 6. cf. Hab. 1. 6.
[x] ch. 6. 2, 3.

David's picture in his final song; and we see how truly he realized it when he owned that his house was "not so with God." Indeed, it was not, as the disorders already manifested plainly showed; but this being so, the rule of the line of David could not justify its existence; for even God's promise would not do this apart from its possessing the characters of true rule, which it had not. Thus it directly follows that when "the nations heard of him, he was taken in their pit, and they brought him with hooks into the land of Egypt." It is the fate of Jehoahaz that is referred to; it is his history generalized for our consideration. What would people do with a man-eating lion? The pit and the hooks were the only right treatment for such.

But Jehoahaz is only one example out of many: "And when she saw that she had waited and her hope was lost, she took another of her whelps and made him a young lion; and he went up and down among the lions; he became a young lion, and learned to catch prey: he devoured men." We scarcely know whether it is Jehoachin who is spoken of here, or Zedekiah who replaced him. It is really of no consequence. In any case, it is but another lion's whelp, like the former; and as the character is like, so also must be the result.

There is some further description to bring out fully the moral of the whole. The first expression is difficult, and there is some question with regard to the text. "He knew their palaces:" more strictly perhaps, "He knew their widows;" but it may mean, rather, their solitary or widowed places or palaces. Some would read it: "He broke down their palaces," which would seem to connect better with what follows. But we have to be careful in Scripture how we take what seems simplest to be the best. The general thought, however, is plain: "He laid waste their cities, and the land was desolate and its fulness" (i. e., all that was in it), "because of the noise of his roaring." His voice was evidently more pretentious than his power, but his power was enough, such as it was, to make a desolation, whereas there should have been prosperity. This repeats, therefore, only more emphatically, what was the character of these lion whelps. The consequence is that the same destruction comes upon him, only now from another side. "Then the nations set themselves against him on every side from the provinces, and spread their net over him. He was taken in their pit, and they put him into a cage with hooks, and brought him" (this time) "to the king of Babylon. They brought him into strongholds, that his voice should no more be heard upon the mountains of Israel." This would make it look more like Zedekiah, the last king; but in any case it is the justification of the Gentile overthrow of David's house, and it is a complete one. It may be said, of course, that these Gentiles were none of them any better. The answer is plain, that Israel, with all her privileges and her knowledge of God, should have been better; and that the profession of this knowledge could Thy mother [g]like thee is as a vine planted by the waters: it was fruitful and full of branches by [z]reason of many waters. And it had strong [a]rods for sceptres of them that bare rule, and its stature was [b]exalted among the thick boughs; and it was conspicuous by its height with the multitude of its branches. But it was [c]plucked up in fury, it was cast down to the ground, and the east wind [d]dried up its fruit; its strong rods were broken and withered; the fire consumed them. And now it is planted in the wilderness, in a [e]dry and thirsty land: and the [f]fire is gone out of a rod of its branches, it hath devoured its fruit; so that there is in it no strong rod to be a sceptre for ruling. This is a [g]lamentation, and shall be for a lamentation.

g ch. 17. 6, etc. Is. 5. 1-4. cf. Mt. 21. 33-41.
z Deut. 8. 7-9. Ps. 80. 8-11. a cf. ch. 21. 10, 13. cf. Ezra 4. 20.
b cf. ch. 31. 3.
c cf. Ps. 80. 12, 13, 16. cf. Jer. 31. 28.
d cf. Jer. 4. 11, 12. cf. Hos. 13. 15.
e cf. Ps. 63. 1. cf. Hos. 2. 3.
f cf. Judg. 9. 15. cf. Jer. 52. 3.
g ver. 1; cf. Lam. 4. 20.

not possibly be permitted to dishonor God, accompanied, as it was, with the full heathen character.

This ends the first picture. Now, in opposition to this, we have what Israel should have been, what it was in the mind of God according to the place in which He had set it for Himself upon the earth. Here the address is, one would say, to Zedekiah: "Thy mother like thee is as a vine planted by the waters." That seems the most probable rendering of another difficult expression. Naturally, the mother was like her offspring in character; but that is not the point here: it is place, not character; and the place of the king in Israel was to exhibit rightly the character corresponding to the place which God had given to the nation, the mass of which had departed from Him. Ezekiel, as Isaiah also, had already used the same figure, reminding us of fruitfulness as the only purpose of a vine, of its weakness and dependence. It was in this weakness that Israel would find her strength; it was in drawing from the one Source of all blessing that all her fruitfulness was to be found; and God had in Israel's case done all that could be done in this respect. For a short time, intermittently, it was fruitful; but, by reason of many waters with which God had encompassed it, it grew strong rods for sceptres of them that bare rule, and its stature was exalted among the thick boughs, and it became conspicuous by its height with the multitude of its branches. That is all that is said as to its condition; but we have had abundance heretofore to show that, whilst in weakness she was to find strength, she turned her very blessings, alas, into instruments for her weakness.

These strong rods for sceptres were indeed conspicuous in such times as those of David and Solomon, when the kingdom stretched from the Edomite Gulf to the Euphrates; but it was at this very time that the seed was being sown of the disasters which were soon to follow. The idolatry under Solomon blasted it at once; and though God indeed bore with them in long patience, so that the history of the divided kingdom was prolonged for centuries, yet it forebode the end as a sure thing, and it came at last: "It was plucked up in fury, it was cast down to the ground, and the east wind dried up its fruit; its strong rods were broken and withered; the fire consumed them." So much wood, useful for nothing else when the fruit was gone, as already shown—was proper fuel for the fire. Israel still remained, but in how different a condition! "And now it is planted in the wilderness in a dry and thirsty land, and the fire is SUBDIVISION 3 (Chaps. xx.–xxiv.).

The full exposure of the people's sin, the heart laid bare.

SECTION 1 (Chap. xx. 1-44).

Rebellion from the beginning hitherto, though still God's purpose as to them abides.

1 (1-9): In Egypt, their birth land.

1. And it came to pass in the [h]seventh year, in the fifth [month], the tenth of the month, that certain of the [i]elders of Israel came to inquire of Jehovah, and they sat before me. And the [j]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, speak unto the elders of Israel and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Is it to inquire of me that ye are come? [As] I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, I will [k]not be inquired of by you. Wilt thou judge them, son of man, wilt thou

[h] cf. ch. 1. 2. ch. 8. 1, etc.
[i] ch. 14. 1. ch. 33. 30. 33.
[j] ch. 18. 1, etc.
[k] ch. 14. 3. cf. 2 Ki. 3. 13. ver. 31.

gone out of a rod of its branches" (Zedekiah seems clearly intimated here), "it hath devoured its fruit, so that there is in it no strong rod to be a sceptre for ruling." The kingdom had passed—passed with every hope that could be grounded upon man as man. It had passed in the righteous judgment of God upon it; and yet who can forbear to mourn for the blighting? "This is a lamentation, and shall be for a lamentation."

We have thus reached already the close of this sad history. The last section here, extended beyond what is usual, gives us the summary of it all before the final judgment, which we reach in the last chapter of this division, where the siege of the city by Nebuchadnezzar is announced as having begun, and closes therefore the first division of the prophecy.

SUBDIVISION 3.

Sec. 1.

We have now, therefore, their history given from the beginning. We have had it already in various aspects, but here it is shown how consistent, alas, had been the conduct of the people from their very birth as a nation in Egypt to the present time. Constant grace had been shown them; on their part constantly resisted, and thus made ineffectual. Still the purpose of that grace abides, as we see in the end here. God would not leave His gracious purpose to end in failure, whatever may be man's sin against it. Once more, therefore, we are reminded that the promise abides, and that God will perform it in His own wonderful way.

1. We have a new date now, which is significant. "It came to pass in the seventh year, in the fifth month, the tenth of the month, that certain of the elders of Israel came to inquire of Jehovah, and they sat before me." This seventh year with the numbers of responsibility attaching to the month and day, with which we are already familiar, naturally connects itself with the subject before us. We have once more a deputation of elders to inquire of Jehovah, and once again their inquiry is unanswered—it is not even uttered, one would say. They represent, as we see by their inquiry, the professed orthodoxy of the people of whom they are the leaders. But God has nothing to say to them; that is, He has nothing that will answer to their expectations.

judge them? Cause them to know the [l]abominations of their fathers and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: In the day [m]when I chose Israel, and lifted up my hand unto the seed of the house of Jacob, and made myself known unto them in the [n]land of Egypt, when I lifted up my hand unto them, saying, I am Jehovah your God, in that day I lifted up my hand unto them to bring them out of the land of Egypt into a land that I had [o]espied for them, flowing with [p]milk and honey, which is the [q]glory of all lands; and I said unto them, [r]Cast ye away every man the abominations of his eyes, and defile not yourselves with the idols of Egypt: I am Jehovah your God. But they [s]rebelled against me, and would not hearken unto me: none of them cast away the abominations of his eyes, nor did they forsake the idols of Egypt. Then I said, l Ch. 16. 2. cf. Mt. 12. 38, 39.

m Ex. 6. 7. Ex. 19. 4-6. Deut. 4. 37. Is. 41. 8, 9.
n Ex. 4. 31. Ex. 20. 2, 3. Deut. 4. 34.
o Deut. 8. 7-9. Deut. 11. 11, 12. p Ex. 13. 5, etc.
q Ps. 48. 2. Dan. 8. 9.
r cf. Ex. 13. 5-7. cf. Josh. 24. 23. ch. 18. 31.
s cf. Deut. 9. 7. cf. Neh. 9. 16-18.

They are looking for good, and there is nothing but evil that can be announced to them. They fully represent those fathers who, according to the current proverb, had set their teeth on edge; and the prophet is commissioned only to set before them the way in which they were repeating their fathers' abominations. We cannot but remember how in the Lord's time, the scribes and Pharisees were pleading, in the same way as was done here, their right of exemption from the judgment coming for their fathers' deeds, and how the Lord meets them at that time: "Ye are witnesses," He says, "that ye are the children of them who killed the prophets. Fill ye up, then, the measure of your fathers" (Matt. 23: 31, 32).

What is most manifest here is the moral unity of the generations which succeeded one another. There is a perfect monotony of evil all the way through, from the nation's birth in Egypt to Ezekiel's time, and nothing else can be expected until God acts in the sovereignty of His own grace, at last to fulfil His promises in spite of this continuous rebellion.

The elders here are not spoken of as the same company that had previously come to inquire of the prophet, but they are met in the same way, for there is no moral difference. God will not suffer any more inquiry from them. What right have they to inquire, when the terms upon which He alone can be with them have been fully before them, so continually pressed upon them also by the voices of the prophets whom God raised up, and violated all the time? Their own consciences would witness that their hearts were untrue in the inquiry itself. There was no need, therefore, but to remind them of their fathers' abominations: they would find in them a mirror of their own. For this cause the long history is brought before them, beginning from the time God had chosen them, making Himself known in the land of Egypt, to bring them out of it into the land He had selected for them, a land flowing with milk and honey, the glory of all lands. But they were all defiled with the abominations of Egypt, and God had warned them from the outset that these must be put away. Yet with His judgments upon the gods of Egypt before their very eyes, they had not put them away; so that in Egypt itself He had threatened to pour out His wrath upon them. What an inside picture of the condition of things already in the people whom His grace was taking up! Yet He had taken them up, and for His name's sake still wrought, that it should not be

I will [t]pour out my wrath so as to accomplish mine anger against them in the midst of the land of Egypt. But I wrought for my [u]name's sake that it should not be profaned in the [v]sight of the nations among whom they were, in whose sight I had made myself known unto them in bringing them forth out of the land of Egypt.

2 (10-27): On the way.

2. So I caused them to go [w]forth out of the land of Egypt and brought them into the wilderness. And I gave them my [x]statutes, and made known unto them my judgments, which if a man do, he shall [y]live by them. And I also gave them my [z]sabbaths, to be a sign between me and them, that they might know that I am Jehovah who sanctify them. But the house of Israel [a]rebelled against me in the wilderness: they walked not in my statutes, and they rejected my judgments, which if a man do, he shall live by them; and my sabbaths they greatly profaned: then I said, I will pour out my wrath upon them in the [b]wilderness to consume them. But I wrought for my [c]name's sake, that it should not be profaned in the sight of the nations in whose sight I had brought them out. Moreover also t vers. 13, 21.

u vers 14,22.
cf. Ex.32.12.
cf. Num. 14. 13-16.
cf. Josh.7.9.
v cf. Josh. 2. 10.
cf. Josh.9.9, 10.
w Ex. 15. 17, 18.

x Ex. 20. 1, etc.
cf. Deut.4.8.
y Lev. 18. 5.
cf. Lk.10.28.
cf. Gal. 3.12, 21.
z cf. Gen.2.3.
cf. Ex.16.29.
Ex. 20. 8-11, etc.
a cf. Ex. 16. 28.
cf. Deut. 9. 12-24.
b cf. Ex. 32. 10.
cf. Num. 16. 20, 21
c vers. 9, 22.

profaned in the sight of the nations among whom they were, with whom God was dealing through them, and with purposes of mercy towards those also who might listen to His powerful voice. Israel was thus a witness of the living God, proclaiming Himself in the sight of all in bringing them out of the land of Egypt.*

2. The wilderness begins another portion of their history; yet how thoroughly it resembled that which had come to an end! What deliverances God had wrought for them; how thoroughly He had declared Himself to them. Question there could not be, one would say, as to the power or grace of One who was among them, making Himself known in constant miracles. Yet it is not of these that He speaks here, but rather of the statutes and judgments which He had given them, which pointed to the way of life. His sabbaths were the seal upon all these, a sign between God and them of the rest which He designed for them. Not a hard taskmaster was He, but their gracious Deliverer: He ever would point them to the rest, for themselves and the very cattle with them, the memorial of that creation-rest when, satisfied with the perfect goodness of all that He had created, Himself rested. But man's sin had soon broken in upon it, and they continually repeated this: "They walked not in my statutes, and they rejected my judgments, which if a man do, he shall live by them; and my sabbaths they greatly profaned." Thus again, as in His words to Moses, He had to threaten them with the wrath which could so easily

* It is to be remembered that in all this historical review of Israel's sin, God's controversy with them is not primarily for their sinful acts, but for that which lay at the root of all those acts—their apostasy from Him, and their idolatry. All else is the fruit of this. So it ever is: sin, in principle, is departure from God, a departure which produces actual transgressions. So God wrought for the glory of His name, and will eventually magnify that name, in the recovery of the apostate, but finally penitent people. The chapter is strikingly correspondent to chapter 16.—S. R.

I lifted up my hand unto them in the wilderness, that I would [d]not bring them into the land that I had given [them], flowing with milk and honey, which is the glory of all lands; because they [e]rejected my judgments and walked not in my statutes and profaned my sabbaths: for their heart went after their idols. Nevertheless mine eye [f]spared them so as not to destroy them, neither did I make a full end of them in the wilderness. And I said unto their [g]children in the wilderness, Walk not in the statutes of your fathers, neither observe their judgments, nor defile yourselves with their idols. I am Jehovah your God: walk in my statutes, and keep my judgments, and do them and sanctify my sabbaths; and they shall be a sign between me and you, that ye may know that I am Jehovah your God. But the [h]children rebelled against me: they walked not in my statutes, neither kept my judgments to do them, which if a man do, he shall live by them;
they profaned my sabbaths: and I said I would pour out my [i]wrath upon them to accomplish mine anger against them in the wilderness. Nevertheless I withdrew my hand, and wrought for my [j]name's sake, that it should not be profaned in the sight of the nations in whose sight I had brought them forth. I lifted up my d Num. 14. 23-30. Num. 26. 64, 65. Ps. 95. 11. cf. Heb. 3. 11, 18.

e cf. Ex. 32. 1-8. cf. Num. 15. 39. cf. Acts 7. 39 43.
f Ps. 78. 37, 38. cf. Neh. 9. 19.
g Num. 32. 13-15. Deut. 4. 3-6. Ps. 78. 6 8.
h Num. 21.5. Deut. 9. 23, 24. Ps. 106. 29-33, etc.
i vers. 8, 13. cf. 2 Chr. 34. 21, 25.
j vers. 9, 14. cf. Ps. 25. 11.

have consumed them; but still His mercy held back the merited reward of their sins, and again it was for His name's sake that He wrought, that it should not be profaned in the sight of the nations before whose eyes He had brought them out. How much depended upon the preservation of the witness of what He was amid the idols with which everywhere men had surrounded themselves!

But God could not bring, as He had been ready to bring, that generation into the land which He had promised them; for their hearts yet were after the idols they had seen smitten by Him blow after blow. How useless that man's mind should be convinced when his heart is deliberately astray! God's eye had spared them so as not to destroy them, not to make a full end of them in the wilderness; and once again He took their children by the hand, saying: "Walk not in the statutes of your fathers, neither observe their judgments, nor defile yourselves with their idols: I am Jehovah your God;" but was answered after their former manner. They again refused the statutes which commended themselves to their consciences. They profaned the sabbaths, the sign of the rest which He desired for them; and even before the land was reached, He had again to threaten them with the wrath which love and pity held back from a people who were to be the bearers of His name before the nations; for how could He destroy that which alone remained as a witness at all? Yet, through all that time, as the prophet Amos bears distinct witness, they deserted Him for the false gods around them. His own words by the prophet appeal to them: "Have ye offered unto Me sacrifices and offerings in the wilderness forty years, O house of Israel? Nay, ye have borne the tabernacle of your Moloch and Chiun your images, the star of your god which ye made to yourselves. Therefore will I cause you to go into captivity beyond Damascus, saith the Lord, whose name is the God of hosts" (Amos v. 25–27).

hand also unto them in the wilderness, that I would [k]scatter them among the nations, and disperse them through the countries; because they had not executed my judgments, but had rejected my statutes, and profaned my sabbaths, and their eyes were after their fathers' idols. And I also gave them [l]statutes that were not good, and judgments whereby they should not live; and I polluted them with their own gifts, in that they caused to [m]pass through [the fire] all that opened the womb, that I might make them desolate, to the end they might know that I am Jehovah. Therefore, son of man, speak unto the house of Israel, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, in this moreover have your fathers blasphemed me, in that they have wrought [n]unfaithfully against me.

3 (28, 29): In the land.

3. When I had [o]brought them into the land which I had lifted up my hand to give them, then they saw every high hill and all the thick trees, and they offered there their sacrifices, and there they presented the [p]provocation of their offering: there also they presented their sweet savor* and they poured out there their drink offerings. And I said unto them, What is the [q]high place whither ye go? And the name thereof is called Bamah† unto this day.

k Lev. 26. 33. Deut. 28. 64-68. Ps. 106. 27. Jer. 15. 4.

l cf. ver. 39. cf. Deut. 4. 27, 28 cf. Deut. 28. 36. cf. Ps 81.12. cf. Is. 66. 4. cf. Rom. 1. 21, etc.

m cf. 2 Ki.17. 17, etc. cf. ch. 16. 20, 21.

n cf. Jer. 32. 35 with Ex. 32. 7, 8. cf. Ps 78. 57.

o cf. Josh. 23. 3, 4, 14. cf. Neh. 9. 22 26. cf. Ps. 78. 55 58.

p cf. ch. 8. 3.

q cf. ch. 16. 24, 25, 31.

* Lit., "savor of rest," as in Gen. 8 : 21.
† Lit., "high place," as in the previous clause.

Thus the wilderness had decided as to the issue which only now in Ezekiel's time was becoming history; and since they had rejected His statutes, and their eyes were after their fathers' idols, He had to "give them," as in strong language He puts it here—give them over to "statutes that were not good, and judgments whereby they should not live:" that is, give them over to statutes of the heathen around them, as we see immediately when He adds: "And I polluted them with their own gifts in that they caused to pass through the fire all that opened the womb" (every first-born whom the Lord had sanctified to Himself), "that I might make them desolate, to the end that they might know that I am Jehovah." People ask still for evidences of Christianity, as if God had not been heaping evidence upon evidence; and here was a people before whose eyes were constant miracles, which forbade men to doubt the reality and power of their Deliverer, yet the answer given to Him was only in unfaithfulness and blasphemy.

3. There is but a glance at their history in the land. What would come upon them, as we have seen, was already pronounced; and this in itself declared what would be their conduct, which God foresaw. Fresh privileges would be only fresh opportunity for evil; and the high hills of the land to which they were now brought, and the trees which showed its fertility, became for them the places of idolatrous resort where they lifted up, professedly to Him, offerings that provoked Him, or would fain have hid amongst the trees the sin from which they could not be divorced. Their sweet savor was for others than Himself. Their drink-offerings of joy became but drunken revels in honor of their multitudinous deities. This worship in the high places had left its marks

4 (30-38): The wilderness of the peoples.

4. Therefore say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah; Do ye pollute yourselves after the [r]manner of your fathers, and do ye [s]commit fornication after their abominations? And when ye offer your gifts, when ye make your sons to [t]pass through the fire, do ye pollute yourselves with all your idols, even unto this day, and [u]shall I be inquired of by you, O house of Israel? [As] I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, I will [v]not be inquired of by you. And that which r Judg. 2. 19. Jer. 7. 26.

s cf. Rev. 2. 14. cf. ch. 16. 15.
t cf. Deut. 18. 10. 12. Jer. 19. 5.
u ver. 3. ch. 14. 3. 4. cf. 2 Ki. 3. 13, 14. cf. Mt. 12. 38, 39.
v cf. Zech. 7. 13; cf. Is. 1. 15.

upon the land in the very names by which they were known. Thus everywhere, upon the face of the country and the city alike, they had written out their sentence.

4. As to all their history, therefore, there was nothing more to say. Reformations attempted here and there by some of their kings, and all that was accomplished by the prophets whom God had raised up amongst them, altered in no wise the character of things below the surface. What a witness against man it is! And the history of the Church on earth has still been a viler history, when we think of the higher privileges perverted, and the sweeter communications of God's grace—a grace now fully declared. We are to-day, as a mass, just where Ezekiel was in his day, although we may hide it from ourselves, as they would fain have hidden it also. A spiritual captivity may be more easily denied, of course, than their external one; but "as in water face answereth face, so the heart of man to man." We may worship silver and gold still, while we do not make it into the hideous shapes which once were made. We may civilize and refine, while altering nothing as to the terrible reality of hearts that are away from God; and we are surely now, at the very end, face to face with an impending judgment to which Scripture bears fullest witness. An outbreak of evil is at hand which will fill the world once more with a darkness of which the prophets of Israel bore witness: "Darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the peoples"—and this at the time when it is said as to Israel, "The Lord shall arise upon thee, and His glory shall be seen upon thee" (Isa. lx. 2).

We have cause, therefore, to enter into the feelings of the prophet as God's voice denounces those who, with the light that He had given them, deliberately preferred darkness, who said: "We will be as the nations, as the families of the countries in serving wood and stone." They had plenty of evidence of this before their eyes; but whatever presents itself as a hiding from God has always been, alas, acceptable to those whose hearts wander from Him. If He reigns at all, it must be in power, therefore: "As I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, surely with a mighty hand, and with an outstretched arm, and with wrath poured out will I reign over you. And I will bring you out from the peoples, and will gather you out from the countries wherein ye are scattered, with a mighty hand and with an out-stretched arm, and with wrath poured out. And I will bring you into the wilderness, and there will I enter into judgment with you face to face." Here we are plainly carried on to what is still future. They are now indeed scattered in the countries and among many peoples, yet they are with reviving hope turning once more to the land which God is indeed keeping vacant for them, expecting to find quiet possession, to obtain it as a mere matter of merchandise and by successful politics. But that is not what cometh into your mind shall not be at all, that ye say, We will be [w]as the nations, as the families of the countries, in serving wood and stone. [As] I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, surely with a [x]mighty hand and with an outstretched arm, and with wrath poured out, will I reign over you. And I will [y]bring you out from the peoples, and will [z]gather you out of the countries wherein ye are scattered, with a mighty hand and with an outstretched arm, and with wrath poured out; and I will [a]bring you into the wilderness of the peoples, and there will I enter into judgment with you face to face. Like as I entered into judgment with your fathers in the [b]wilderness of the land of Egypt, so will I enter into judgment with you, saith the Lord Jehovah. And I will cause you to [c]pass under the rod, and I will bring you into the bond of the [d]covenant. And I will [w] cf. 1 Sam. 8. 5.

cf. Deut. 7. 3-5.
[x] ch. 8. 18.
cf. Jer. 21. 5.
[y] ch. 34. 13.
cf. Is 27. 13
[z] cf. Lev. 26. 45.
cf. Jer 32. 37.
cf. Jer. 31. 10.
[a] cf. ch. 38. 8.
cf. Hos 2. 14.
cf. Jer. 2. 9, 35.
[b] cf. Ex. 32. 30, etc.
cf. Num. 11. 1, etc.
[c] Lev. 27. 32.
cf. Jer. 33. 13.
cf. Matt. 25. 32, 33.

[d] cf. ch. 16. 59, 60; cf. Ps. 89. 31-34; cf. Jer. 31. 31-34.

God has in mind for them; for the record of their history has yet to be faced, and that record, unrepented of, can only be faced in judgment.

Thus, God will gather out, but only into a condition of things such as when He brought Jacob their father out of Padan-aram to meet the consequences of the sin which had driven him there, and for which, if God is to interfere for him, He must wrestle with him Himself. Thus Peniel must be known by the nation also before they can know Bethel. And "like as I entered into judgment with your fathers in the wilderness of the land of Egypt, so will I enter into judgment with you, saith the Lord Jehovah; and I will cause you to pass under the rod, and I will bring you into the bond of the covenant"

It is for mercy, and yet through judgment; for mercy will once more rejoice against judgment. But the judgment must itself do a necessary work: "I will purge out from among you the rebels, and them that transgress against Me, and I will bring them forth out of the land where they sojourn, but they shall not enter into the land of Israel; and ye shall know that I am Jehovah." This is not, of course, the whole history of the people in that day soon to come. There will be those who doubtless will return to their land and get a certain possession of it for a while, but only to end in a worse condition than ever, as they yield themselves to an idolatry more terrible than all that has been seen among them yet. People may scout even the possibility of this, while false christs and false prophets are everywhere rising up, leading men captives with unblushing delusions.

We do not enter into the details here, which the book of Daniel is to bring fully before us; but the issue is given by the prophet Isaiah in words that cannot be mistaken, except wilfully. Thus he speaks: "In that day shall the Branch of the Lord be beautiful and glorious, and the fruit of the earth shall be excellent and comely for them that are escaped of Israel. And it shall come to pass that he that is left in Zion and he that remaineth in Jerusalem shall be called holy, even every one that is written among the living in Jerusalem, when the Lord shall have washed away the filth of the daughters of Zion, and shall have purged the blood of Jerusalem from the midst thereof, by the spirit of judgment and by the spirit of burning." There is no room to say that this has been fulfilled in any time of their previous history, for the prophet

[c] purge out from among you the rebels, and them that transgress against me; I will bring them forth out of the land where they sojourn, but they shall [f] not enter into the land of Israel: and ye shall [g] know that I am Jehovah.

5 (39-44): The end in the strong hand of Jehovah.

5. As for you, O house of Israel, thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Go ye, [h] serve every one his idols henceforth also, for* none of you will hearken unto me; but profane my [i] holy name no more with your gifts and your idols. For in my holy [j] mountain, in the mountain of the height of Israel, saith the Lord Jehovah, there shall [k] all the house of Israel serve me, the whole of it in the land; there will I [l] accept them, and there will I require your heave offerings and the first fruits of your offerings, with all your holy things. As a [m] sweet savor will I accept you when I bring you out from the peoples, and [n] gather you out of the countries wherein ye have been scattered; and I will be [o] sanctified in you in the sight of the nations. And ye shall [p] know that I am Je-

* Or, "if."

c cf. ch. 34. 17, 20. cf. Amos 9. 9, 10. cf. Zech. 13. 8, 9. cf. Mal. 4. 1-3.
f cf. Num. 14. 28-30. cf. Ps. 95. 11. cf. Jer. 44. 14. cf. Is. 65. 12-15.
g ch. 6. 7, etc.
h cf. Jer. 10. 11. cf. Ps. 81. 12. cf. Hos. 4. 17. cf. 2 Thess. 2. 11.
i cf. Is. 1. 13. cf. Jer. 7. 9-11. cf. Zeph. 1. 4-6. cf. Hos. 2. 16, 17.
j cf. Ps. 2. 6. cf. Is. 2. 2, 3. cf. Jer. 31. 12. cf. Joel 3. 17, 18.
k cf. ch. 37. 22-28; cf. Is. 11. 13; cf. Jer. 3. 18; cf. Rom. 11. 26.
l cf. Is. 56. 7; cf. Is. 60. 7; cf. Mal. 3. 3, 4. m cf. Lev. 1. 9, 13, 17; cfr. ch. 6. 13; cfr. ch. 16. 19; cfr. ver. 28.
n ch. 11. 17; ch. 34. 13; ch. 36. 24; Is. 27. 12, 13.
o ch. 28. 22, 25; cf. Is. 5. 16; cf. Lev. 10. 3.
p vers. 38, 44, etc.

goes immediately on to what is certainly still future: "And the Lord will create upon every dwelling place of Mount Zion and upon her assemblies a cloud and smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night; for upon all the glory shall be a defence. And there shall be a tabernacle for a shadow in the daytime from the heat, and for a place of refuge, and for a covert from storm and from rain" (Isa. iv. 2-6). To the time pictured here, Ezekiel will bring us before his prophecy is run out. Here what we have is the intervening judgment, the judgment which has scattered and will scatter, the judgment which has overturned and will overturn, "until He come whose right it is," and the kingdom shall be His to whose hands it belongs.

5. Even here a brief glance is permitted forward at the blessing that shall be. Israel is dismissed, as it were, for the time present, to go and serve every one his idols as he lists. Only, let them do it openly, and not with the profanation of His holy name as attached to it. For once again God will, and finally, sanctify His name, and that in the grace which is His, and which we cannot wonder at when we know how it has dealt with ourselves: "For in my holy mountain, in the mountain of the height of Israel" (that is, when the mountain of the house shall finally be lifted up, and exalted above the top of the mountains, as God has declared, Isa. ii. 2), "there shall all the house of Israel serve Me—the whole of it, in the land. There will I accept them, and there will I require your heave offerings and the firstfruits of your offerings, with all your holy things. As a sweet savor will I accept you, when I bring you out from the peoples and gather you out of the countries wherein ye have been scattered, and am sanctified in you in the sight of the nations." Yes, if He is sanctified in judgment first, as He must be, yet will He only be sanctified fully in blessing, as becomes Him. What a time when the people who hovah, when I shall bring you into the land of Israel, into the country which I [q]lifted up my hand to give your fathers. And there ye shall [r]remember your ways, and all your doings, wherein ye have polluted yourselves; and ye shall [s]loathe yourselves in your own sight for all your evils which ye have committed. And ye shall [t]know that I am Jehovah, when I have wrought with you for my [u]name's sake, [v]not according to your evil ways, nor according to your corrupt doings, O house of Israel, saith the Lord Jehovah.

[q] ver. 5, etc.
[r] ch. 16. 61. ch. 36. 31. cf. Ps. 126.
[s] cf. Jer. 31. 18. cf. 2 Cor. 7. 11.
[t] ver. 38, etc.
[u] Ps. 79. 9. cf. Ps. 115. 1, 2.
[v] Ps. 103. 10. Ezra 9. 13. cf. Deut. 7. 7, 8.

SECTION 2 (Chaps. xx. 45-xxi. 32).

The sword upon the righteous and the wicked.

1 (45-49). Against those who have had the light.

1. And the [w]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, [x]set thy face toward the south,* and drop [thy word] toward the south,† and prophesy against the forest of the south‡ field; and say to the forest of the south, [y]Hear the word of Jehovah: Thus saith the

[w] ch. 21. 1, etc.
[x] ch. 4. 3, 7. ch. 25. 2. Jer. 26. 11, 12. Amos 2. 4, 6.
[y] Amos 7. 16. ch. 36. 1.

* Lit., "right." † Lit., "bright." ‡ Lit., "dry." These are three different words—all meaning "south."

have been His witnesses in spite of themselves, in all the scattering by which they have fulfilled the words of their ancient prophets, and still by their preservation in which is contemplated the mercy that awaits them! "And ye shall know that I am Jehovah, when I shall bring you into the land of Israel, into the country which I lifted up my hand to give to your fathers; and there ye shall remember your ways and all your doings wherein ye have polluted yourselves, and ye shall loathe yourselves in your own sight for all your evils which ye have committed. And ye shall know that I am Jehovah when I have wrought with you for my name's sake, not according to your evil ways, nor according to your corrupt doings, O house of Israel, saith the Lord Jehovah."

This, then, is how the story ends. There is no triumph of man in it, but there is the triumph of God's own sovereign grace. The view of their history given here is morally complete. We have not details, but for its purpose what is more suited, the character of that history as a whole. Whatever the individual exceptions, and the superficial and momentary revivals which we know have been, God has not yet interpreted by the event what He means by working for His name's sake. Then His name, so long profaned, shall be indeed honored, according to the psalmist's words of praise, anticipating those of the nation: "Then shall the earth yield her increase; and God, even our own God, shall bless us. God shall bless us, and all the ends of the earth shall fear Him" Ps. lxvii. 6, 7).

Sec. 2.

We are nearing the end of all this part of Ezekiel—the first Division. There is little more now than the reiterated announcement of judgment, which in the last chapter, the 24th, we see begun. Nebuchadnezzar has there begun the siege of the city, which we see him here contemplating. And with this commencement of what the prophet has announced, the word for the present ceases. There is no need and no use in any further announcement. The chapter before

Lord Jehovah: Behold, I will kindle the [a]fire in thee, and it shall devour every green tree in thee, and every dry tree: the flaming flame shall not be [b]quenched, and all faces from the south to the north shall be burned thereby. And all [c]flesh shall see that I Jehovah have kindled it: it shall not be quenched. Then said I, Ah, Lord Jehovah, they say of me, Is he not a speaker of [d]parables?

[a] ch. 15. 6, 7. ch. 19. 14. Jer. 21. 14.
[b] cf. Is. 66. 24. cf. Mk. 9. 43–49.
[c] Deut. 29. 24–28. cf. Is. 26. 11. cf. Jer. 40. 2, 3.
[d] cf. ch. 33. 32. cf. Mt. 13. 13, 14; cf. Ps. 78. 2, 3.

us shows the sword in Nebuchadnezzar's hand as God's judgment upon the land, a judgment so complete that it sweeps away the righteous and the wicked together; that is, the whole land was desolate. It is not meant that there is no discrimination between the righteous and the wicked, for this would contradict what we have had explicitly in a previous chapter as to the seal put upon those who sighed and cried before God for the abominations of the people, and who are, therefore, by this seal itself, put explicitly under the care of God whom they have honored. Nevertheless, the land is swept bare; the righteous and wicked suffer together in this respect. The sword is upon both; only, as we have already seen, and as is simple enough, that which is pure judgment for the one class is only a refining fire for the other, and God is in it carefully superintending the process which is to bring forth a perfect vessel for Himself.

1. First of all, it is insisted that one common doom is to envelop the whole of the land. God will be true to His own, but they cannot save from destruction that which is already devoted to it. God's wrath is as a devouring fire, which lays hold of all that is before it, and that is the first point. "The word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, set thy face towards the south" in which Judah and Jerusalem were), "and drop thy word towards the south, and prophesy against the forest of the south field." According to the idea here given, the cultivated "field" has, as it were, grown wild, grown into a forest, as we know was the case with Judah. (For a similar thought, the meaning of Kirjath-Jearim, "the city of the woods," may be compared in Josh. xv: 9. See Notes.) In such a case, the very fertility of the ground, and the care that may once have been bestowed upon it, only helps the luxuriance of the wild growth. It is the common story of perverted privileges and blessing of every kind. Thus the prophet is to address himself to "the forest of the south." God is bringing a fire upon it, which is of course the symbol of His wrath, although the wrath must in a sense be discriminative, which the fire is not. This is not a contradiction, however. The external calamity reaches all alike, and the green tree suffers with the dry, but God knows how to turn the suffering itself into blessing for His people, which eternity shall reveal: and in spite of all, as He has Himself said, the man that doeth righteousness shall live thereby.

But a flame is devouring the land from south to north. Why the direction here, when the inroad of the enemy was from north to south? It would seem that what is intimated is, what was according to the fact, that the destruction of Jerusalem would scatter the people mainly northward, as it did, and would follow them there.* It was to be the unmistakable evidence of God's own

* The south was the place of light—under the sun—of privilege, and if the privileges of the light were not used, they became means of dryness. So the various words for "south" indicate the failure to enjoy privilege, and thus "I will curse your blessings" is fulfilled.

2 (xxi. 1-7). Against Jerusalem and the Lord's house.

2. And the [d]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, set thy [e]face toward Jerusalem, and drop [thy word] toward the [f]sanctuaries, and prophesy against the land of Israel; and say to the land of Israel, Thus saith Jehovah: Behold, I am [g]against thee, and will draw forth my [h]sword out of its sheath, and will cut off from thee the righteous and the wicked. Seeing that I will cut off from thee the righteous and the wicked, therefore shall my sword go forth out of its sheath against [i]all flesh from the south to the north; and all flesh shall know that I Jehovah have drawn forth my sword out of its sheath: it shall not return any more. [j]Sigh then, thou son of man, with breaking of the loins and with bitterness, sigh before their eyes. And it shall be, when they say unto thee, [k]Wherefore dost thou sigh? that thou shalt say, Because of the tidings, for it cometh; and every heart shall melt, and all [l]hands shall be feeble, and every spirit shall faint, and all knees shall dissolve into water: behold, it [m]cometh; it is even here, saith the Lord Jehovah.

[d] ver. 8, etc.
[e] ch. 20. 46.
[f] cf. ch. 9. 6. cf. Mt. 23. 38.
[g] cf. ch. 6. 11-14. cf. ch. 26. 3. ctr. Rom. 8. 31.
[h] ch. 5. 2, 12. Is. 34. 5, 6. cf. Rev. 1. 16.
[i] ch. 20. 47.
[j] ver. 12. Is. 22. 4. Jer. 9. 1, 17-21. cf. Lk. 19. 41.
[k] ch. 12. 9-11.
[l] ctr. Is. 35. 3. cf. Jer. 50. 43.
[m] ch. 7. 2, 3, etc.

judgment. God was to be glorified in it when His people were not glorifying, but dishonoring Him. The speech of the prophet, however, is as the people urge, in parables. God was dealing with them after their own fashion, for His plainest warnings had been but words to them; and, shut up in their own unbelief, there seemed no use in speaking more plainly. The ear that was opened would hear; and if it were realized that Jehovah was speaking, the very language of parable would only invite the more to search into the meaning of it.

2. Nevertheless, the word of Jehovah answers the voice of the people, and Ezekiel is instructed to speak plainly, to set his face towards Jerusalem, and drop his word toward the holy places, which, of course, were that no more, but only the witness against those who had destroyed them by their desecration. The prophecy is now to the whole land, and God says plainly that the sword, which they might then see drawn out of its sheath, was the sword of no mortal enemy merely, but His own; and as the fire devoured the green wood and the dry, so He would cut off out of the land the righteous and the wicked. The judgment was, as already declared, to be plainly His judgment. And if we follow Daniel to the court of the king of Babylon, we shall see how God took care to make known, in such a way that the heathen himself had to acknowledge it, His power and majesty, whose sanctuaries Nebuchadnezzar might seem to have overthrown. The king of Babylon was, as the chapter itself declares plainly, but an instrument in the hands of the Almighty who wielded all the power which Nebuchadnezzar would naturally ascribe to himself. In fact it was this which brought judgment upon him—a judgment which humbled his heart and brought him fully to own the Most High God, while the hearts of His own people remained intractable and rebellious. But it is not without sorrow,

---

The fire begins in the south, the place of privilege. "Begin at my house," and it reaches northward, to the mass of the people until all are consumed.—S. R.

3 (8 17). Wrath fully displayed.

3. And the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, prophesy and say, Thus saith the Lord: Say, A sword, a *sword is sharpened, and also furbished: it is *sharpened for sore slaughter; it is furbished that it may glitter. Shall we then make *mirth, [saying], The sceptre of my son *despiseth all wood? And he hath given it to be furbished that it may be *taken into the hand: the sword—it is sharpened, yea, it is furbished to give it into the hand of the *slayer. *Cry and wail, son of man: for it shall be against *my people, it is against all the *princes of Israel: they are given up to the sword along with my people; *smite, therefore, upon the thigh. For the trial [is made]; and what if even the *sceptre that despiseth shall be no more? saith the Lord Jehovah. And thou, son of t cf. ver. 19; cf. Ps. 17. 13, 14. u ver. 6, etc. v cf. ch. 9. 6; cf. Amos 3. 2. w cf. vers. 25–27. x Jer. 31. 19. y cf. Gen. 49. 10 with ver. 27.

* "Adonai."

n vers. 1, etc.
o vers. 3, 15, 28. Deut. 32. 41, 42. cf. Is. 66. 16. p cf. Ps. 7. 11–13. cf. Is. 27. 1. cf. Is. 34. 5, 6.
q cf. Is. 5. 12–14. cf. Is. 22. 12–14. cf. Amos 6. 3–7. cf. Lk. 21. 34, 35.
r cf. vers. 25–27. cf. Rev. 18. 7. cf. Is. 47. 8. cf. Zeph. 2. 15.
s cf. Deut. 32. 41. cf. Is. 10. 5.

such as He never hesitates to attribute to Himself, that God inflicts this inevitable chastisement; and the sighing of the prophet, even with breaking of the loins and bitterness, is but the echo of what is in the heart of Him who bids him give vent thus to his human sorrow. As of old it was said, "In all their affliction He was afflicted," so it ever is, even when He whose delights are with the sons of men has to manifest Himself against them. The tears of the Lord over Jerusalem, when He took leave of it, witness with the anguish of the prophet. Yet He who wept could not spare; and that which threatened now would melt the heart and enfeeble the hands and make every spirit faint; and it was already upon them: "It cometh, it is even here, saith the Lord Jehovah."

3. Still, we have to be reminded once more of what is involved in this. It is not simply the judgment of a people, but of a people with whom were the promises of God; and it is this which for the time sets aside those promises, that they cannot be fulfilled. The sons of David, however much in rebellion against God, had nevertheless built themselves up in pride upon these very promises; and the heart of the righteous might plead with Him: Was He going to permit that the sweet assurances He had given be made void? Might they make mirth and say, as if from God's side of things, "The sceptre of my Son despiseth every tree?"* Could it not make light of all human power, however firmly rooted, which would set itself in opposition against it? "The sceptre of my Son" shows the thought implied. Was it not, according to the second psalm, the One who could declare the decree that Jehovah had said to Him, "Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten Thee," who was appointed to rule upon God's holy hill of Zion, and the very ends of the earth were to be given into His hands? And had it not been said in older prophecy, that the sceptre man, prophesy and smite thy hands together; and let the sword be [a]doubled the third time: it is the sword of the slain [ones], the sword of the [a]great one slain, which penetrateth to them. That their [b]heart may melt, and their stumbling be multiplied, [c]I have set the threatening sword against all their gates. Ah! it is made to glitter, whetted for slaughter! Gather together, [d]go to the right, turn thee, go to the left, whithersoever thy face is turned; and I will smite my hands together, and I will cause my [e]wrath to rest: I Jehovah have [f]spoken.

* "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh"; God's sceptre, held by His Son, would lay low every thing that exalted itself against Him, would bring down the high tree and dry up the green tree. Hengstenberg makes this rod, despising every tree, to be the affliction which is now about to fall upon the people—so great that it eclipses ("despises") all former rods of affliction. But the explanation in the text is so lucid, appropriate and complete, that there can be little room for questioning it.—S. R.

[a] cf. Gen. 41. 32.
cf. Lev. 26. 21.
[a] Is. 3. 14, 25.
[b] ver. 7.
ch. 22. 14.
[c] cf. ver. 9 with Lev. 26. 16, etc.
ch. 14. 17.
[d] cf. Ps. 139. 7.
cf. Amos 9. 2.
[e] ch. 5. 13.
cf. Deut. 28. 63.
cf. Is. 1. 24.
[f] vers. 1, 8, etc.

should not depart from Judah and a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh came? (Gen. xlix.) How simple, it seemed, to put such things together, and think of it as faith itself, to resist the conviction of coming judgment. Yet, in spite of this, the prophet affirms that it is coming. The sword of the Lord, He has made it ready, furbished and sharpened it, that it should be as fully as possible effective, and this sword was to be against this people of Jehovah, and against all the princes of Israel; princes and people alike were to be given up to the sword. Yea, the test (in the event) was even now being made; and what if this sceptre that despiseth were actually to be no more? asks the Lord Jehovah.

How readily may His people misinterpret His plain words! How ready are we to-day to misinterpret them! How often do we hear that "the knowledge of the glory of the Lord is to cover the earth as the waters cover the sea" interpreted as being of course through the spread of Christianity—and this after nearly 2,000 years, which have manifested its incapacity to do this; and not merely this, but exhibited everywhere, as is so plain to-day, its capacity for decay—yet how many still look for this! And the very word which announces what is plainly opposite to such thoughts is made to confirm them: "Israel shall bud and blossom, and fill the face of the earth with fruit"—and are not we Christians the true Israel?

Thus we see the heart searched out in Ezekiel's day; and here we have a glimpse, as it would seem, that we have not elsewhere, as to the perplexity which must have been in the hearts of many of such a day, faced with all those promises of triumph and blessing of which Scripture is full for them; and then, on the other hand, faced by the prophet now with this assurance of the coming desolation. But God's word abides, and time will reconcile all these things. What concerned them now was to realize the Lord's judgment upon His people, and its sure and swift coming. "Son of man, prophesy and smite thy hands together, and let the sword be doubled the third time:" the strokes of it growing only the more terrible to the end—perhaps, if we are to read the number symbolically, until the time of full manifestation. This is the sword which is soon to be busy in its dreadful work, and among the slain, the "great one," the sword which has penetrated to the king himself who is the "deadly wounded." Not that Zedekiah was himself slain in the siege or after it: we know he was not. His sons were slain before his eyes, and then those eyes that had been witness of the awful sorrow were put out, that they might see the light no more. As king, he lived no more; and his life after that, was it life? And still the sword swept on, melting every heart and multiplying the 4 (18-23): The divination true and false.

4. And the [g] word of Jehovah came unto me, saying: And thou, son of man, set thee [h] two ways for the coming of the sword of the king of Babylon. Out of one [i] land shall they both come; and make* thee a [j] finger-post, make it at the head of the way to the city. Thou shalt set a way for the coming of the sword to [k] Rabbah of the children of Ammon, and to [l] Judah in Jerusalem the fortified. For the king of Babylon standeth at the [m] parting† of the way, at the head of the two ways, to use divination: he [n] shaketh his arrows, he inquireth of the [o] teraphim, he looketh in the [p] liver. In his right hand is the divination for [q] Jerusalem to set battering rams, to open the mouth for slaughter, to lift up the voice with shouting, to set battering rams against the gates, to cast up mounds, to build forts. And this shall be a [r] false divination in their sight for them that have sworn oaths; but he bringeth the iniquity to [s] remembrance that they may be taken.

5 (24-27): Divine government waiting for Immanuel.

5. Therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah; Because ye have made your iniquity to be remembered, in that your [t] transgressions are uncovered so that in all your doings your [u] sins appear; because that ye are come to remembrance ye shall be taken with the hand. And

* Lit., "create." † Lit., "mother."

[g] ch. 20. 45, etc.
[h] cf. Jer. 1. 10, ver. 20.
[i] cf. Jer. 25. 9.
[j] ctr. Jer. 31. 21.
[k] ch. 25. 5. Jer. 49. 2. Amos 1. 14
[l] cf. 2 Chr. 26. 9. ctr. Ps. 48. 12, 13.
[m] ctr. Josh. 24. 15.
[n] ctr. 1 Sam. 20. 35, 39. ctr. 2 Ki. 13. 17.
[o] cf. Gen. 31. 19, 34. cf. Judg. 17. 5 with Judg. 18. 5, 6. cf. Hos. 4. 12.
[p] cf. Is. 47. 13.
[q] cf. ch. 4. 2. ctr. Is. 54. 17.
[r] cf. Is. 28. 14, 15. cf. ch. 17. 13, 15, etc.
[s] cf. Nu. 5. 15. ch. 29. 16.
[t] cf. Is. 3. 9. cf. Jer. 2. 34.
[u] cf. Jer. 5. 27, 28. cf. Hos. 4. 2. cf. Rom. 3. 10-18.

carcases so that men stumbled over them. And there was no escape from it: the threatening sword was against all their gates. Its very glitter was meant by God as prophesying the sure quenching in blood which was to follow. Jehovah turns to it and bids it do its work: gather up its strength, go to the right, turn to the left, finding its work unfailingly wherever it turned, for it could not miss worthy objects. And thus was Jehovah's wrath: "I will smite my hands together, and I will cause my wrath to rest. I Jehovah have spoken."

4. The next word of Jehovah contemplates more the human instrument which is implied in all this. The sword is the sword of the king of Babylon, which, even if blindly, is none the less the instrument of the Hand which is over him continually. The prophet marks his course, the path that he is to pursue. He sees him pause, and hesitate, where the one road out of his land separates into two. The one road leads to Rabbah of the Ammonite; the other to Jerusalem, strong in its fortifications. There he stands at the parting of the way, practising his vain divination, shaking his arrows, inquiring of the teraphim, looking into the liver. In his right hand is the divination for Jerusalem, to lay siege to it. A poor thing in itself, against which men might build themselves up, as mere false divination of the heathen—they who had in Jehovah's name sworn faithfulness to the king of Babylon and broken their oath! All right to scorn the heathen divination, but what about Jehovah who has been scorned and defied? "He bringeth the iniquity to remembrance that they may be taken." And thus the divination does not fail.

5. Divine government has not loosed its hand upon men in all this. Nay, it is the very thing that is coming out in its full reality. The "iniquity of the thou, the pierced-through wicked one, the [v]prince of Israel, whose day is come at the time of the iniquity of the end, thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Remove the mitre, and take [w]off the crown: what is, shall be no [more]. [x]Exalt that which is low, and abase that which is high. I will [y]overturn, overturn, overturn it! This also shall be no [more] until he come whose [z]right it is; and I will give it [him].

6 (28 32): The sword upon Ammon.

6. And thou, son of man, prophesy and say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah concerning the [a]children of Ammon and concerning their reproach: and thou shalt say, A [b]sword, a sword is drawn; for the slaughter it is furbished that it may consume,* that it may glitter: whilst they see vanity for thee, whilst they [c]divine a lie unto thee, to lay thee upon the necks of the wicked that are pierced through, whose [d]day is come at the time of the iniquity of the end. Let it [e]return to its

* Or, "Sufficiently furbished that it may glitter."

v 2 Chr. 36. 11-13. eh. 17. 19, 20.
w ch. 12. 12, 13.
cf. Jer. 13. 18.
x ch. 17. 24. Ps. 75. 7.
y cf. Hag. 2. 21, 22. cf. Heb. 12. 26, 27.
z cf. 1 Ps 2. 6-8. cf. Heb 1. 2. cf. ch. 37. 24, 25. cf. Is 9. 6, 7. cf. Jer. 33. 15, 16. cf. Dan 9. 25. cf. Mi. 5. 2. cf. Zech. 9. 9. a Jer. 49. 1-5. Amos 1. 13-15. Zeph. 2. 8-10.
b vers. 9, 10.
c ch. 12. 24. ch. 22. 28. cf. Is 44. 25.
d ver. 25.
e cf. Jer. 47. 6, 7; etr. 1 Chron 21. 27.

Ps. 37. 13; cf. Rev. 6. 17.

end" (which is bringing about the end) has taken place. The crown is gone from the head of the king of Israel, and the mitre of the high priest, which was supported by the crown, has to go also. That which still existed was to be no more. The wheel was going round! That which is low is to be exalted; that which is high is to be abased. "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it," says Jehovah; "and it shall be no more until He come whose right it is, and I will give it Him." Thus there is even here a gleam through the thunder-clouds. All other hands are proved incompetent to wield this sceptre which God is taking for the time being from the line of David. There is One, however, who has right, and who will put forth His claim to it, and Judah's rod of magistracy would not cease until Shiloh comes. How sweet such a promise to a sorely-stricken heart! How sweet for us in our own day, revealing, as it does, the mystery of the breakdown of all things upon which we rest our human hopes, "until He comes whose right it is!" How we forget this, that the overturning is not something against His right, but contemplates it. Just as Israel's desolate land with all its desolation speaks of a people for whom it is waiting, in God's design, so the broken sceptre and the empty throne are only waiting for the One to come who surely will fulfil every promise, and outdo all that the heart can imagine or crave, in the blessing that He brings.

6. There is yet one final word: Ammon had escaped; the enemy of God's people had gone scot-free. The king of Babylon had turned off to Jerusalem; and the enemy now can insult them as they will. Ammon, as we know, was an ancient enemy of Israel; and, as a type, shows still more the opposition of the heart to that which is of God. We may remind ourselves how in the days of Jephthah, and afterwards in the days of Saul, Ammon stood forth under its king Nahash, "the serpent," as bent upon taking from Israel the land that was their own. (Judges xi. and 1 Sam. xi., Notes.) This is ever the work of the enemy of our souls—not merely to gain a victory over the people of God, but to take from them the very portion which God has given them. Israel's sins, now sheath. In the place where thou wast created I will [f] judge thee, in the land of thy birth. And I will pour out mine [g] indignation upon thee, I will [h] blow upon thee with the fire of my wrath, and deliver thee into the hand of [i] brutish men, skilful to destroy. Thou shalt be for [j] fuel to the fire; thy blood shall be in the midst of the land; thou shalt [k] not be remembered: for I Jehovah have spoken.

[f] cf. Gen. 15. 14. cf. ch. 16. 38. cf. Mt. 25. 31, etc.
[g] ch. 7. 8. ch. 22. 22. cf. Nah. 1. 6.
[h] ch. 22. 20, 21. Is. 18. 15. cf. Is. 30. 33.
[i] cf. ver. 19 with Is. 14. 4-6. cf. Jer. 4. 7. cf. Jer. 6. 22, 23.
[j] ch. 20. 47, 48. cf. Mal. 4. 1.
[k] ch. 25. 10. Zeph. 2. 9.

SECTION 3 (Chap. xxii.).

The corruption in Jerusalem manifest.

1 (1-16): The causes of the judgment.

1. Moreover, the [l] word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, And thou, son of man, wilt thou judge, wilt thou judge the [m] bloody city? Yea, cause her to [n] know all her abominations, and say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: a city that [o] sheddeth blood in her midst, that her time may come, and that maketh [p] idols against herself to defile her. Thou art become [q] guilty in thy blood which thou hast shed, and hast defiled thyself with thine [r] idols which thou hast made; and thou hast caused thy [s] days to draw near and art come unto thy years: therefore have I made thee a [t] reproach unto the nations and a mocking unto all countries. Those that are [u] near, and those that are far from thee, shall mock thee, thou infamous* one, full of tumult. Behold, the [l] ch. 1. 3. ch. 3. 16. ch. 6. 1, etc.

[m] ch. 24. 6. 2 Ki. 21. 16. Jer. 2. 34. cf. Nah. 3. 1.
[n] ch. 8. 6, etc. ch. 16. 2, etc. ch. 23.
[o] ver. 27. ch. 24. 6, 9. Zeph. 3. 3.
[p] cf. 2 Ki. 21. 2, 9. cf. Hos. 8. 5, 11.
[q] cf. Is. 1. 21-24. cf. Jer. 22. 17.
[r] cf. Ps. 106, 36-39. cf. Jer. 3. 9.
[s] cf. Joel 2. 1.
[t] cf. Lam. 1. 12 with Obad. 10-14; cf. Deut. 29. 22.

* LIT., "unclean of name."

cf. Ps. 85. 9. [l] ch. 16. 57; Deut. 28. 37; cf. 2 Chr. 7. 20; Ps. 44. 13, 14; Ps. 79. 4. [u] cf. Lam. 1. 12 with Obad. 10-14; cf. Deut. 29. 22.

at their height, bringing judgment upon them, the desolate land lay open to the attacks of the enemy. But God's eye is upon it, and Ammon is not to escape. The sword is to prove itself as Jehovah's sword in this way also. Misjudging altogether the work of God, as the enemy continually misjudges it, Ammon brings upon himself the wrath in which, as against others, he is rejoicing. "And I will blow upon thee," says the Lord, "with the fire of my wrath, and deliver thee into the hand of brutish men, skilful to destroy. Thou shalt be for fuel to the fire; thy blood shall be in the midst of the land; thou shalt not be remembered. For I Jehovah have spoken." Thus, where all seems wreck, and what God has done for His glory seems to have fully shared in this, yet Jehovah's word stands forth unchanged in its utterance!

Sec. 3.

We return now to see once more in Jerusalem the manifest corruption which is bringing in the judgment. As has been said elsewhere, God does not judge until the corruption is fully manifest. Evil is allowed to come to its head before God smites upon it, for He will be justified in its judgment, and be clear when He is judged. What we have here, therefore, is no more history: it is not the sins of the fathers, even, as showing themselves in the children. It is the present condition of things—the causes which necessitated that which was at hand.

1. We need not spend many words upon interpretation of what is manifest.

[t]princes of Israel have been in thee to shed blood, each according to his power.* In thee have they set light by [u]father and mother; in the midst of thee have they dealt by [v]oppression with the stranger; in thee have they wronged the [w]fatherless and the widow. Thou hast despised my [x]holy things, and hast profaned my [y]sabbaths. In thee have been [z]slanderous men to shed blood, and in thee have they [a]eaten upon the mountains; in the midst of thee they have committed [b]lewdness. In thee have they discovered their [c]father's nakedness; in thee have they humbled her that was [d]unclean in her separation. And one hath committed abomination with his [e]neighbor's wife; and another hath lewdly defiled his [f]daughter-in-law; and another in thee hath humbled his [g]sister, his father's daughter. In thee have they taken [h]bribes to shed blood; thou hast taken [i]usury and increase, and thou hast [j]overreached thy neighbors by oppression, and hast [k]forgotten me, saith the Lord Jehovah. And behold, I have [l]smitten my hand at thine overreaching which thou hast done, and at thy bloodshed which hath been in the midst of thee. Shall thy heart [m]endure, shall thy hands be strong in the days that I shall [n]deal with thee? I Jehovah have [o]spoken, and will do it. And I will [p]scatter thee among the nations, and disperse thee through the countries, and will [q]consume thy filthiness out of thee. And thou shalt be [r]polluted through thee in the sight of the nations; and thou shalt [s]know that I am Jehovah.

2 (17–22): Jerusalem the furnace of wrath.

2. And the [t]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, the house of Israel is become [u]dross to me: they are all [v]copper, and tin, and iron, and lead, in the midst of the furnace: they are become the dross of silver. Therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Bet Prov. 1. 19; Is. 56. 11; cf. Lk. 18. 11. u Deut. 32. 18; Jer. 2. 32. v ch. 21. 14, 17. w ch. 21. 7; ch. 16. 30; cf. Job 40. 9. x Jer. 13. 21; cf. Jer. 12. 5. y ch. 17. 24. z ch. 5. 12; Deut. 28. 25, 64; Zech. 7. 14. a cf. vers. 18 22; Zech. 13. 9; cf. Mt. 3. 12. b cf. Is. 43. 28; cf. Is. 47. 6. c ch. 6. 7, etc. d ver. 1, etc. e Is. 1. 22; Ps. 119. 119. f Jer. 6. 28-30; cf. Lam. 4. 1; cf. Is. 1. 25; cf. Prov. 17. 3.

* Lit., "arm."

g cf. Mic. 3. 1-3. cf. Neh. 9. 34. h Ex. 21. 17. Deut. 27. 16. Prov. 20. 20. cf. Mt. 15. 4-6. i cf. Mal. 3. 5. cf. Ex. 22. 21. cf. Ps. 72. 4. j Ex. 22. 22. Prov. 22. 22, 23. k Lev. 19. 30. cf. 1 Sam. 2. 17. l cf. Amos 8. 4-6. ch. 20. 20. cf. Jer. 17. 21-23. m Ex. 20. 16. cf. 1 Ki. 21. 10-13. cf. Prov. 18. 8. n ch. 18. 6, 11, 15. cf. Ps. 106. 28. o ch. 16. 15, 45. ch. 24. 13. p cf. Gen. 35. 22. cf. 1 Cor 5 1. q cf. Lev. 20. 18. r Lev. 18. 20. cf. 2 Sam. 11. 2, 3. cf. Jer. 9. 2. s Lev. 20. 12. cf. Gen. 38. 26. t Deut 27. 22. cf. 2 Sam. 13. 1, etc. u Deut. 27. 25. Mic. 7. 2, 3. cf. Mt. 26. 14-16. v Lev. 25. 35, 36. cf. Ps. 15. 5. cf. Neh. 5. 1, 7.

The evil speaks for itself, and what we have is an enumeration of crimes in high and in low; crimes of which the apostle says, with reference to them, that the name of God was blasphemed among the Gentiles through them. We need not wonder at this. It is according to the constant rule of perverted privileges, and that which is done in the darkness elsewhere, is now done in the full light. Along with this, and instead of the anticipation of a sure judgment coming, that there was hardening of the heart against it is in entire harmony with all the rest. Nothing but the actual infliction of wrath would now avail. Words merely were useless. They must be replaced by deeds.

2. Accordingly, Jerusalem has become a furnace which melts down the various things exposed to it into one mass of manifest dross. God surely has cause ye are all become dross, therefore, behold, I will gather you into the [g]midst of Jerusalem. As they gather silver, and copper, and iron, and lead, and tin, into the midst of the furnace, to blow the fire upon it, to melt it; so will I gather you in mine anger and in my wrath, and I will lay you there and [z]melt you. Yea, I will gather you, and blow upon you with the fire of my wrath, and ye shall be melted in the midst thereof. As silver is melted in the midst of the furnace, so shall ye be melted in the midst thereof; and ye shall [a]know that I Jehovah have poured out my wrath upon you.

3 (23 31): Corruption through and through, with none to stand in the gap.

3. And the [b]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, say unto her: Thou art a land that is [c]not cleansed, nor rained upon in the day of indignation. There is a conspiracy of her [d]prophets in the midst of her like a roaring lion ravening the prey; they devour [e]souls; they take [f]treasure and precious things; they have increased her [g]widows in the midst of her; her [h]priests do violence to my law, and profane my holy things: they put [i]no difference between the holy and the profane, neither do they make known [the difference] between the unclean and the clean, and they hide their eyes from my [j]sabbaths, and I am profaned among them. Her [k]princes in the midst of her are like wolves ravening the prey, to shed blood, to destroy souls, that they may get dishonest [l]gain. And g cf. ch. 11. 2, 7. cf. ch. 24. 3-6. cf. ch. 21. 31, 32.

z cf. Is. 48. 10. cf. Mal. 3. 2, 3. cf. Mal. 4. 1.
a vers. 16, 31.
b vers. 1, 17, etc.
c cf. 2 Chr. 36. 14-16. Is. 1. 5. Jer. 2. 30. Zeph. 3. 2. d ch. 13. 10-16. cf. 1 Ki. 22. 11-13. cf. Jer. 5. 30, 31.
e cf. Jer. 2. 34. cf. Rev. 17. 6. etc. Rev. 18. 13.
f cf. Mt. 23. 14. etc. 2 Ki. 5. 26. cf. Tit. 1. 11.
g etc. Is. 1. 17. cf. Job 22. 9. cf. Is. 10. 1, 2. cf. Lam. 5. 3.
h cf. 1 Sam. 2. 12-17, 22. Mic. 3. 11, 12. Mal. 1. 6-8.
i cf. Lev. 10. 1-3, 10. etc. Jer. 15. 19. cf. Hag. 2. 11-13.
j ch. 20. 12, 13.

k ver. 6; Is. 1. 23; cf. Mic. 3. 1-3, 9-11. l ver. 13; cf. Mt. 21. 13.

purification in mind, but what is here is the wrath itself—a wrath by which what cannot be changed may yet be limited and kept under. And such will be the fire of hell; corruption, at last, will be permitted no longer; none of the rioting will be there which has been in men's shameful imaginations of what is to come; Satan, then, is the arch-tormentor no more, but himself the most tormented. Suited and necessitated penalty, carefully discriminated, will be God's decisive repression of that which can be no more permitted to break out at all. Man's ways come to an end then, and God comes to His own finally and fully.

3. The final word returns once again to the corruption itself. It is complete, among all classes, and especially are the prophets and priests brought into the dark catalogue here; for in their corruption hope is gone entirely. Among all these not a man was left ("and I sought for such," says the Lord), that can make up a fence to keep out the incoming desolation, or stand in the breach before Him, that He might not destroy the land. Thus, then, the indignation, so long warned of, is at last to be poured out: "I will consume them in the fire of my wrath. Their own way will I recompense upon their head, saith the Lord Jehovah."

See. 4.

We have now once more one of those apparent repetitions which, as such, emphasize the importance of what they speak. Yet there is perhaps no mere her [m]prophets have daubed for them with untempered [mortar], seeing vanity and divining [n]lies for them, saying, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah! and Jehovah hath [o]not spoken. The [p]people of the land use oppression and practise robbery; yea, they have vexed the [q]poor and needy, and oppressed the stranger wrongfully. And I [r]sought for a man among them that should make up the fence, and stand in the breach before me for the land, that I should not destroy it; but I found none. Therefore have I [s]poured out mine indignation upon them; I will consume them in the fire of my wrath: their [t]own way will I recompense upon their head, saith the Lord Jehovah.

SECTION 4 (Chap. xxiii.).

Yielding themselves to the world.

1 (1–4): One mother and one course.

1. And the [u]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying: Son of man, there were [v]two women, daughters of one mother. And they committed whoredom in [w]Egypt;

m ver. 25. ch. 13. 10–16. cf. 1 Cor. 3. 11–15.
n ch. 13. 22, 23. Jer. 23. 25–32. cf. Zeph. 3. 4.
o Jer. 23. 21. cf. Jer. 28. 2, 16, 17. p cf. vers. 25, 26, 27. cf. Is. 10. 2. cf. Jer. 5. 26–31.
q Job 24. 4, 14. Ps. 12. 5. Ps. 109. 16. r Is. 41. 28. Is. 59. 16. Is. 63. 5. Jer. 5. 1.
s vers. 21, 22.
t ch. 7. 3, 8, 9. ch. 9. 10. cf. Gal. 6. 7.
u ch. 22. 1 etc.
v cf. ch. 16. 44, 46.

etc. Song 8. 8; cf. Jer. 3. 7–10. w ch. 20. 8; Lev. 17. 7. cf. Deut. 29. 16, 17 with Josh. 24. 14.

repetition in all Scripture, and it is important for us to realize what constitutes the difference between things which at first sight seem absolutely similar. The present chapter gives us, as is evident, substantially the theme of the 16th; Israel's departure from God being symbolized by the sin of adultery; Jehovah's exclusive relationship to Israel among all the nations of the earth being compared in this way to marriage. God has taken up the most intimate relations of human life to show us the fulness of His love towards men, and the nearness in which His heart delights to bring us to Himself. All the greater therefore is the sin which breaks through a love so manifested, and we cannot wonder if the foulest of human sins becomes a shadow of that which is symbolized by it here. We shrink from these descriptions. How thoroughly God would teach us by it to loathe that which in His sight is so much worse: the human symbol is but a shadow of the greater sin!

It has been truly said that the present chapter, as compared with the former one, speaks of political, rather than of spiritual, departure from God; yet this only shows the more how intimately the two are related to one another. Religion is necessarily the most powerful bond that unites men together, and thus it is no wonder that when men no longer recognized the one true God, supreme over all, each nation came naturally to have its own gods whose glory or decay became identified with that of the nation to which they belonged. We see in Nebuchadnezzar's policy, in the setting up of his golden image in the plain of Dura, the recognition of the power of such a motive. The different gods of the subjected nations were acknowledged in what was owned as supreme over them still. As Nebuchadnezzar was a king of kings, so naturally in his thought was his god a god of gods. Such then being the condition of things, and idolatry set up everywhere among the nations dispersed at Babel, God had necessarily to separate to Himself politically a people who were to be in true spiritual relationship to Himself. Where the nations ruled, their gods must rule; and thus to lose national independence threatened the loss of all else. This could not have they committed whoredom in their [x]youth: there were their breasts pressed, and there were handled the teats of their [w]virginity. And their names were Oholah, the elder, and Oholibah her sister; and they were mine, x vers. 8, 19, 21. ch. 16. 22. w Hos. 2. 15. cf. Jer. 2. 2, 3. y cf. Jer. 18. 13.

been as to Israel, had they not been untrue to themselves as the people of Jehovah. The captives in Babylon show what the change meant for the true-hearted under its imperial power.

Christianity, indeed, openly disclaimed any separate political existence for its converts; this was necessary; for, in the first place, it was a gospel for the world, going out freely to men apart from all question of nationality. Judaism had not such a gospel; and as long as Judaism lasted, the time for it had not come. The people whom God took up to reveal Himself to them showed this by their ready acceptance of the legal system after their own demonstrated inability, and on this account it was necessary that they should have it, that they should be allowed to prove in the fullest way that inability. The "due season" for the gospel did not come until man was shown not only to be "ungodly," but "without strength." Then and thus it was Christ died for us. But if God would prove in the completest way what man was, He must give them, and did give them, all the assistance in His power to walk aright according to a law. Thus they were fenced off from the intrusion of the nations, and assured of God's protection in preserving the fence. Among themselves they were bound together by family relationships, by the promises to their forefathers, which embraced them all, by the earthly blessings attached to obedience, by a central worship which drew them together from all parts of the land, while through all their tribes the cities of the priests and Levites were, as it were, a garrison to keep them for God—men separate from all other interests and devoted to God alone.

This all broke down, as we know; the hands of the people themselves broke it down. Christianity fully accepts the fact of this, being itself a complete salvation for men who can no longer trust in themselves at all; and it accepts the fact of a hostile world through which, kept by the power of God alone, His people have to make their way, finding in Christ at once their Leader and the Captain of their salvation. To the Jewish policy we cannot go back; and while on the one hand it is no wonder that men should have sought the advantage of this, it should be just as plain that for Christians themselves it is absolutely impossible. We stand by faith, and faith is not helped by circumstances, or by any natural conditions, but rather by the very difficulties which exercise and develop it. A higher blessing is thus secured for us as we have higher privileges and a perfect Example. We are strangers and pilgrims, and not citizens of earth at all. Yet there will be a time when God's present purpose completed, and His heavenly people taken to Himself, the world will be delivered from the power of evil which now rules it; and what we find in Israel of old will be reproduced again, with all the imperfection of it removed, in restored Israel, no longer in the midst of hostile nations, but under the dominion of Him who will be owned over all the earth, one Lord, and His name one.

1. In what is before us, the kingdoms of Judah and Israel are seen as distinct, but in closest relation to one another; alas, clearly related also in the common course that they pursue. "And the word of Jehovah came unto me saying, Son of man, there were two women, daughters of one mother." There and they bore sons and daughters. And as for their names, [z]Samaria is Oholah, and [a]Jerusalem Oholibah.

2 (5-10): Oholah, the separate tent.
2. And Oholah played the [b]harlot when she was mine; and she doted upon her lovers, upon the [c]Assyrians

z cf. 1 Ki. 12. 20.
a cf. 1 Ki. 8. 29. cf. Ps. 76. 1, 2. b cf. 1 Ki. 14. 8. 16.
cf. 1 Ki. 15. 26, 30. c cf. 2 Ki. 15. 19.

is no need to question as to that mother now, nor to speak of Amorite or Hittite. The heredity which they exemplify goes further back, and lust, in whatever way displayed, is the beggar's badge which marks out everywhere fallen man. As the apostle has shown us, the full condition of man is reached and judged in that one commandment: "Thou shalt not lust." Of these lusts, the idols of the nations are the exhibition, and meant for their gratification. They represent an imaginary freedom of souls who have got away from God, seeking to satisfy themselves, apart from His way and will, with things incompetent to do so.

Such as these women here, all the children of Adam are in all their generations. And if we ask, as we look at their history, How could God take up such as these? the answer is found in another question: Where could He find any better? As we see their common origin, so we are taken back to Egypt to see them from the very beginning of their course nationally. And this licentious free-will marks them from the start. God had appointed them in Egypt a school which should have been profitable for them. No land could more fairly and fully exhibit the folly and degradation of heathen idolatry, while God made them also to realize the rod of the school-master in what they suffered at their hands. There was as plainly, on one side, God's meaning in all this, as on the other was exhibited the natural perverseness of the human heart. Little cause had Israel to take up with Egypt, themselves having the revelation of the true God and such promises of blessing as might well have won their hearts to obedience. Yet, it is plain, they accepted Egypt as their school in another way entirely from that in which God meant it. Egypt was the land of independence, the type of the world in that way, nurtured by the constant overflow of its river, with no need of the rain of heaven, which was, however, the source of the abundance that was round about them. But these sources were afar off, unnoticed and unknown, and if they were not content to make the river itself their god, as we know they did, there was another course, yet more satisfactory to human pride: "My river is mine, and I have made it"—the complete folly of which was no hindrance to its adoption. Manifestly, Oholah ("her own tent") made this the text upon which her conduct was the comment. Oholah is Ephraim, characterized by her chief city, Samaria, a name which speaks of the desire to preserve that which they stood for. Samaria (Shomeron) means "keeper" or "guard." It was Omri's city, set up against Jerusalem, and as Micah says (chap. vi. 16), "the statutes of Omri were kept" but too faithfully in it. But before this, at the very commencement of their independence as a kingdom, the calves which Jeroboam set up remind us of Egyptian worship. In fact, he had been in Egypt and manifestly brought them from thence.* Jerusalem, on the other hand, the capital city and representative of Judah, characterized by its glorious temple, was Oholibah ("my tent is in her") in contrast with Oholah, "her own tent." How far this affected her after-course we have already had intimated.

* Israel worshiped the golden calf at Sinai. Thus the Egyptian idolatry was manifest both in the earlier and the later apostasy.—S. R.

[her] neighbors, clothed in blue, governors and rulers, all of them desirable young men, horsemen riding upon horses. And she bestowed her whoredoms upon them, all of them the choice of the sons of Asshur; and on whomsoever she doted, with all their idols she [d]defiled herself. Neither did she [e]leave her whoredoms [brought] from Egypt: for in her youth they had lain with her, and handled the breasts of her virginity, and d ch. 22. 3, 4. Ps. 106. 39.

e Ex. 32. 4. cf. Hos. 2. 5 cf. Jer. 3. 1.

2. We have first the history of Oholah; and, under the strong figure of adultery, we find how the world outside at once attracted her. Assyria was her main attraction: "She doted upon her lovers, upon the Assyrians her neighbors, clothed in blue, governors and rulers, all of them desirable young men, horsemen riding upon horses." In a worldly course, the world in fact surpasses the people of God, whose own things, the moment they seek the world, fail with them at the start. In the outside world there is full room for all the energy, ambition, luxury, self-enjoyment, which the terms speak of here: youth, vigor, the keen pursuit of that which man counts to be riches, and which makes him all that he can hope to be, these things attract, alas, how much, the people of God themselves!

And what does Asshur stand for? If we go back to the neglected book of national genealogy, the 10th chap. of Genesis, we find that Asshur has his place as the second son of Shem. He is, therefore, in the line of revelation, of which Shem speaks. Shem means "name;" the name of God revealed in connection with him, which makes him all that he is; and, as is well known, revelation as a whole has come to us through the line of Shem; and as has been said elsewhere (see Judges, chap. iii., Notes) the genealogy of Shem, as God has given it to us, shows in its necessary order the unfolding of this revelation.

We begin with Elam, which is only, in another form, Olam, "eternity;" and the first necessary revelation of God is that He is the Eternal. His name, therefore, which stands for what He is, must be eternal as Himself. Nevertheless, there is a gradual unfolding of this, of which Asshur in the next place speaks. Asshur means "step," and the steps of God, His activities, are also His manifestation. In every act of God, He more or less reveals Himself; and there has been, as we surely know, an adaptation of this revelation to the conditions and needs of men which has made it a revelation, gradual indeed, far more so than we should have thought could be; but our thoughts are not as God's thoughts. It has been shown, in what has just been referred to, that the names following show the continued development of the revelation.

Arphaxad, in the third place, brings us to what God's manifestation for the need of man is, the mystery in which He is truly manifest, the mystery of the cross being spoken of in it; while the next name, in the fourth place, Lud, "born," shows that He has revealed God in manhood; this humiliation of His being followed by what the last name speaks of, Aram, "exalted." The depths and the heights that we find in Christ are surely before us here. "Beautiful, however, as are these names thus joined together, we easily understand how in a world like this, and as connected with the human generations for which they stand, they soon scatter and fall away from one another, and thus lose their meaning and their beauty as united. The sentences become but broken words, capable of very different, even of opposite suggestion. The Shem families, as poured their whoredoms on her. Therefore I [e]gave her into the hand of her lovers, into the hand of the sons of Asshur, upon whom she doted. These [g]uncovered her nakedness: they [h]took her sons and daughters, and [i]slew her with the sword: and she became a [j]name among women; and they executed [k]judgment upon her.

3 (11-35): Oholibah, "My tent in her."

3. And her [l]sister Oholibah saw [this], yet was she [m]more corrupt in her doting than she, and in her whoredoms more than the whoredoms of her sister. She doted upon the sons of [n]Asshur, her neighbors, governors and rulers, clothed to perfection, horsemen riding upon horses, all of them desirable young men.

e cf. 2 Ki. 15. 19. 2 Ki. 17. 3-6, 36. 2 Ki. 18. 9-12. cf. Hos. 11. 5.
g ver. 29. ch. 16. 37, 41. Hos. 2. 3, 10. cf. Rev. 2. 22.
h cf. ver. 47. cf. Dan. 1. 3.
i cf. Rev. 17. 16.
j cf. Jer. 22. 8, 9. Deut. 28. 37. Ps. 44. 14.
k cf. 1s. 10. 5, 6. ver. 24.

l Jer. 3. 7, 8. m cf. Jer. 3. 10, 11; cf. Mt. 11. 20-24; cf. ch. 16. 48. n ch. 16. 28; cf. 2 Chr. 28. 16-23.

they scattered and multiplied into nations, lost almost entirely the promise of their origin. Their primitive worship became corrupted into a dark and debasing idolatry" in which, however, we find still as we look into them, the fragments of primitive revelation. Still, as a whole, the meaning is lost. Cut off from the Name of which they speak, there is no purpose of God really left. What should have been God's "steps" become in fact but a reflection of man himself and of his lusts. Strikingly in this way does Asshur's god speak for what he is. Asshur's god was Asshur. Man serves but himself—himself, alas, the miserable object of his worship! Even as the apostle puts it, with regard to some professing Christians, "whose god is their belly, whose glory is in their shame" (Phil. iii. 19). Yet he is successful, as men say; his energies are spent undividedly upon that which is within his reach, and "the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light." He is successful; and what is his success like? Look at the 73rd psalm for the answer, and see how perplexed even the godly can be at what he finds it. Only in the sanctuary can you learn the truth about it—the end of it.

After Asshur, therefore, Oholah goes with her whole heart. She still carries her Egyptian idolatries with her, for evil, as we know, is tolerant of evil, while the good is not. Yet at last, as we find in her history here, out of men's vices are hatched the hordes that prey on them, and out of this has arisen the fable that Satan is the torturer of men in God's final place of judgment; but this is only the reflection of present things. He is indeed here the torturer, not there; and God would wake man up by this constant connection of sin with its judgment. Man's pleasant vices are the whips that scourge him.

The history here in the case of Ephraim is plainly read: "I gave her into the hand of her lovers, into the hand of the sons of Asshur upon whom she doted. These uncovered her nakedness, they took her sons and daughters, and slew her with the sword, and she became a name among women, and they executed judgment upon her."

3. Oholibah's history now follows. In it we see once more the power of example, as we see also how one evil develops out of another, and the consequent progress made in a downward path. Once more Oholibah chooses the human school instead of the school of God, and learns nothing by His rod upon her sister. She too goes after the attractive Assyrians, but she adds to these the Chaldeans, the images of whom promptly carried her off. And these Chal-

And I saw that she was defiled: they both took [o]one way. And she [p]increased her whoredoms: for she saw men [q]portrayed upon the wall, the images of the [r]Chaldeans portrayed with vermilion, girded with girdles upon their loins, with flowing turbans upon their heads, all of them leaders* in appearance, after the likeness of the sons of Babylon, of Chaldea, the land of their birth. And as soon as she [s]saw them she doted on them, and sent messengers to them into Chaldea. And the sons of Babylon came unto her in the bed of love, and [t]defiled her with their fornication; she too defiled herself with them, and her soul was [u]estranged from them. So she uncovered her whoredoms, and uncovered her nakedness: and my soul was [v]estranged from her, like as my soul was estranged from her sister. Yet she multiplied her whoredoms, [w]calling to mind the days of her youth, wherein she played the harlot in the land of Egypt. And she doted upon their paramours, [x]whose flesh is as the flesh of asses, and whose issue as the issue of horses. Thus thou calledst to mind the lewdness of thy [y]youth, in the handling of thy teats by the Egyptians, for the breasts of thy youth.

o cf. 2 Ki 17. 18, 19 cf. Hos. 12. 1, 2. cf. Rom. 3. 22, 23 p cf. ch. 8. 6, etc.
q ch. 8. 10.
r Is. 47. 1. Jer. 50. 2. cf. Is 39.3-7. s ch. 16. 29. cf. Job 31. 1 with Mt. 5. 28. cf. 1 Sam. 6. 6, 8
t ch. 20. 43. ver. 13. cf. Hos. 5. 3.
u cf. 2 Sam. 13. 15. vers. 22, 28. cf. 2 Ki. 24. 20.
v cf. Jer. 6. 8. cf. Lev. 26. 30. cf. ch. 16. 18.
w vers. 3, 8, 21. cf. ch. 20. 7. cf. Acts 7.39.
x ch. 16. 26. cf. Jude 7.
y ver. 8.

* Lit., "Third men," i. e., "leader of three."

deans, as we learn by more than the derivation of their name, which seems to be "demon-like," bring with them a power of evil more intense, less human, more supernatural. As James teaches us, it is how the wisdom that cometh not from above develops; it is "earthly, sensual, devilish." These Chaldeans had their own tongue and learning, practised occult arts, "wore a peculiar dress like that seen upon the gods, and deified men in Assyrian sculptures." Added to this, they were not Shemites, but Cushites, and belonged fully to the darkness of this their origin. Yet Oholibah, as we see, is immediately attracted; their mere images attract her: "As soon as she saw them, she doted on them and sent messengers to them, unto Chaldea." This passion, as we know by their history, did not last long, except in its consequences. It was, as is so often the case, as short-lived as it was sudden. Oholibah returned to her old passion for Egypt, and this brought on her doom.

When her day of lawless self-will is past, the day of the Lord finds all her former lovers gathered against her. The mustering is come now, the sons of Babylon heading the list with all the Chaldeans; and Asshur too, with Babylon, Assyria following under the power of Nebuchadnezzar.

Numbered among the Chaldeans, we have three names which present a special difficulty. Pekod is, in Jer. l. 21, an allegorical name for Babylon itself as the land of "visitation"—there, visited of God; here a visitation of God upon others; or it may mean her "charge," "office," for officer. Shoa means "wealth," "liberal;" Koa, probably "prince." Geographically no such names are found within the limits of Chaldea, and the words remain a problem yet unsolved, while from the connection they might seem to form part of the enumeration of all that was brilliant and attractive in the land, now gathered

Therefore, Oholibah, thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I will [a]raise up thy lovers against thee, from whom thy soul is estranged, and I will bring them against thee on [d]every side: the sons of Babylon, and all the Chaldeans, Pekod and Shoa and Koa, all the sons of Asshur with them; all of them desirable young men, governors and rulers, all of them leaders and men of renown, all of them riding upon horses. And they shall come against thee with [b]weapons, chariots, and wheels, and with an assemblage of peoples; with buckler and shield and helmet they shall beset thee round about: and I will [c]commit the judgment * unto them, and they shall judge thee with their judgments. And I will visit my [d]jealousy upon thee, and they shall deal with thee in fury: they shall [e]cut off thy nose and thine ears, and thy remnant shall fall by the sword: and they shall [f]take thy sons and thy daughters; and thy residue shall be [g]devoured by the fire. They shall also [h]strip thee of thy garments, and take away thy fair [i]jewels. † And I will make thy lewdness to [j]cease from thee, and thy whoredom [brought] from the land of Egypt: so that thou shalt not lift up thine eyes unto them, nor [k]remember Egypt any more.

For [l]thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I will [m]give thee over into the hand of them whom thou hatest, into the hand of them from whom thy soul is estranged; and they shall deal with thee in [n]hatred, and take away all thy labor, and [o]leave thee naked and bare; so that the nakedness of thy whoredoms shall be [p]uncovered, both thy lewdness and thy fornications. These things shall be done unto thee, because thou hast gone [q]whoring after the nations, because thou hast [r]defiled thyself with their idols. Thou hast [s]walked in thy sister's way, and I have given [t]her cup into thy hand.

a ver. 28. ch. 16. 37. cf. Is. 10. 5, 6. cf. Hab. 1. 6-10. cf. Rev. 17. 16.
d cf. Jer. 6. 22, 23. cf. Jer. 12. 9-12. ctr. Ps. 118. 10-12 b ch. 26. 10. cf. Jer. 47. 3. Nah. 2. 3, 4. c cf. ver. 45. cf. ch. 16. 38. cf. Jer. 39. 5, 6. d cf. Deut. 29. 20. Song 8. 6. Zeph. 1. 18. Ex. 20. 5
e cf. Rev. 17. 16. cf. 1 Sam. 11. 2.
f ver. 47. Hos. 2. 4, 5. cf. Dan. 1. 3.
g ch. 15. 6, 7. ch. 20. 47, 48. cf. Rev. 18. 8.
h ver. 29. Jer. 13. 22.
i 1 Is. 3. 17-24.
j ch. 16. 41. cf. Mic. 5. 10-15. cf. Zech. 13. 2. k ctr. Hos. 14. 3, 8.
l ver. 1, etc.
m ch. 16. 37. Jer. 21. 7-10. Jer. 34. 20. n ch. 16. 39. cf. Deut. 28. 47-52
o ver. 26.
p cf. Is. 3. 17.
q ch. 6. 9. cf. Ps. 106. 35-38. cf. Jer. 2. 18-20.
r vers. 7, 17. cf. Acts 15. 20.
s ver. 13; ch. 16. 47-51.
t cf. 2 Ki. 21. 13; cf. Jer. 7. 14.

* Lit., "Set judgment before them." † Lit., "adornment."

with the desirable sons of Asshur against Jerusalem. The qualities which before spoke of the energy and ability which carried away the hearts of the Israelites are now enumerated in the same terms, but realized now in an opposite interest. How men's old allurements face them in the day of visitation which comes for each one! They work their will without mercy, though the mere instruments of God's judgment, as He declares. The punishment of cutting off the nose and ears was the punishment of an adulteress; and we may remember how these, on God's part, were ornamented in a former chapter (xvi.) which gives us, as the present does not, the blessing which God had poured out upon those brought into this peculiar relationship to Himself. Now, not only the ornaments are removed, but there is no place for them any longer, mere deformity instead, and with the jewels the garments are also taken away.

Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Thou shalt [u]drink of thy sister's cup, deep and wide; thou shalt be for a [v]laughing-stock and derision: for it containeth much. Thou shalt be filled with [w]drunkenness and sorrow, [with] the cup of [x]astonishment and desolation, with the cup of thy [y]sister Samaria: thou shalt even drink it and drain it out, and thou shalt gnaw the sherds thereof, and tear off thy breasts: for I have spoken [it], saith the Lord Jehovah. Therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Because thou hast [z]forgotten me, and cast me behind thy back, therefore bear thou also thy lewdness and thy fornications.

4 (36-49) The human appeal.

4. And [a]Jehovah said unto me, Son of man, wilt thou judge Oholah and Oholibah? Yea, [b]declare unto them their abominations. For they have [c]committed adultery, and [d]blood is in their hands; and with their idols have they committed adultery; and also their sons, whom they bare unto me, have they caused to [e]pass through [the fire] unto them to be devoured. Moreover, this have they done unto me: in the same day have they defiled my [f]sanctuary and profaned my [g]sabbaths. For when they had slain their children to their idols, they [h]came the same day into my sanctuary to profane it: and behold, this have they done in the midst of my house. And furthermore, they [i]sent to men to come* from far, to whom a messenger was sent; and behold, they came: for whom thou didst wash thyself, [j]paintedst thine eyes, and deckedst thyself with ornaments, and satest upon a stately bed, with a table prepared before it, whereupon thou hadst set [k]mine incense and mine oil. And the voice of a u cf. Is. 51. 17, cf. Jer. 25. 15-28. cf. Rev. 16. 19.

* Or, "coming."

v ch. 22. 4, 5. ch. 36. 3. cf. Deut. 28. 37. cf. Ps. 79. 4. ctr. Mic. 7. 8.
w Jer. 25. 27. Hab. 2. 16. cf. Is. 51. 21.
x cf. Is. 51. 17, 22. Ps. 60. 3.
y ver. 32.
z ch. 22. 12. Jer. 2. 32. Hos. 8. 14.
a vers. 1, 28.
b Is. 58. 1. Hos. 2. 2. Mic. 3. 8-11.
c cf. Hos. 4. 2. ver. 5.
d vers. 39, 45. ch. 16. 36, 38. Ps. 106. 37, 38. Is. 1. 15. Hos. 4. 2. cf. 2 Ki. 24. 4.
e ch. 20. 26, 31, etc. cf. Deut. 12. 31. ctr. Lev. 19. 30. cf. ch. 8. 16, etc.
f ch. 22. 8. Neh. 13. 17, 18. Jer. 17. 27.
g Is. 3. 9. Jer. 7. 8-11. Mic. 3. 11. cf. Jno. 18. 28.
h ver. 16. Is. 57. 9.
i cf. 2 Ki. 9. 30; Jer. 4. 30; ch. 16. 15-16; cf. Prov. 7. 10.
k ch. 16. 18, 19; Hos. 2. 8, 9

Yet all this severity is on God's part not mere judgment. The effect is, as He puts it here, to make the lewdness of Oholibah cease from her, and the objects formerly attractive to be turned from with loathing. One must come to one's self in order to come to God, and this is the process through which God was now bringing Israel. What a terrible thing to face, when one is left naked and destitute, all that gone which, while it was being squandered, made one for a time feel and look rich to others! But the cup now must be drained to its bitter dregs, wrung out in desperation by the soul that has lost its all, but cannot yet fully awake to it; the very sherds of the broken cup, as represented here, gnawed in madness to obtain that which is impossible, while the tearing off of the breasts is but the self-despair under which, if anywhere, the true blessing lies. But this is not gone on to in the chapter before us, which ends with judgment: "Because thou hast forgotten Me and cast Me behind thy back, therefore bear also thy lewdness and thy fornications."

4. God now appeals to man himself in the person of the prophet against both these debauched and uncensured women: "And Jehovah said unto me, Son of man, wilt thou judge Oholah and Oholibah? Yea, declare unto them their

[l] loose crowd* was in her: and with people of the common sort were brought Sabeans† of the wilderness: and they put bracelets upon their hands, and a beautiful crown upon their heads. And I said of her who was old in adulteries, Will she now, even she, commit her fornications? And [m] they went in unto her as they go in unto a harlot: so went they in unto Oholah and unto Oholibah, the lewd women. And righteous men, they shall judge them with the [n] judgment of adulteresses, and with the judgment of women that shed blood: for adulteresses they are, and blood is in their hands.

For thus saith the Lord Jehovah: [o] I will bring up an assemblage against them, and will give them to be driven hither and thither, and spoiled. And the assemblage shall [p] stone them with stones and shall despatch them with their swords; they shall kill their sons and their daughters, and their houses they shall [q] burn with fire. And I will cause lewdness to [r] cease out of the land: and all women shall be [s] warned, and shall not do after your lewdness. And they shall [t] recompense your lewdness upon you, and ye shall bear the sins of your idols; and ye shall [u] know that I am the Lord Jehovah.

*"Or, a multitude living at ease." †Or, "drunkards."

[l] cf. Ex. 32. 6, 18, 19. cf. Hos. 13. 6. Amos 6. 1–6.

[m] cf. Ezra 9. 7. vers. 3, 9–13.

[n] ver. 24. ch. 16. 38, etc.

[o] ch. 16. 40. Jer. 25. 9. cf. Lk. 19. 43.

[p] ch. 16. 40. ch. 9. 6. Jer. 33. 4, 5. cf. Josh. 7. 25, etc. cf. Jno. 8. 5.

[q] Deut. 13. 16. Jer. 39. 8.

[r] ver. 27. ch. 22. 15. cf. ch. 36. 25. Mic. 5. 11–14.

[s] Deut. 13. 11. cf. Esth. 1. 20.

[t] ch. 7. 4, 9, etc.

[u] ch. 24. 24, 27, etc.

abominations." And the story is repeated briefly with all the circumstances of its aggravation and the persistency of wickedness, which seems as if it would go on to the end—the scum of a pot, as in the next chapter, which will never be cleansed. Adultery and blood are both in the count against them here. Their idolatries contained both features: unfaithfulness to God, and causing their sons to pass through the fire to their idols to be devoured; and all the while shamelessly entering Jehovah's sanctuary, which could but be defiled by their presence; and His sabbaths, the sign of His covenant with them, profaned by all their actions. They had not been the victims of others, simply; they had not merely been solicited by others; they themselves had been the solicitresses, laboring to bring from afar those who could only pollute them with their abominations; they had decked themselves with the ornaments that God had given, for the reception of their corrupters!

The picture is painted for us in a few brief touches: the insensate profligate sitting upon a stately bed, with a table prepared before it whereon were placed the incense and the oil that belonged to her forsaken God. Around her the voices of a loose crowd in utter abandonment, even the Sabeans of the wilderness, the men who lived by pillage, as their name here may indicate, brought in to join with them, and all this when plainly old age was come upon her, hastened by her excesses.* The two sisters, every way such, are joined together in this count, and men of mere human righteousness are called to pronounce

* There is a resemblance to Jezebel, the apostate queen of Israel, 2 Kings 9: 30, who in her old age "painted her face and tired her head." She is also the symbolic adulteress in the professed church, the Thyatira of Rev. 2, whose adulteries bring down the Lord's judgments.—S. R.

SECTION 5 (Chap. xxiv).

The judgment reached.

1 (1-14): The stroke falls on the rebellious city.

1. And in the [v]ninth year, in the tenth month, on the tenth of the month, the [w]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, [x]write thee the name of the day, of this selfsame day: the king of Babylon has [y]drawn near to Jerusalem this selfsame day. And utter a [z]parable unto the [a]rebellious house, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: [b]Set on the caldron, set it on, and also pour water into it; [c]gather the pieces thereof into it, every [d]good piece, the thigh and the shoulder; fill it with choice bones. Take the choice of the flock, and [make] also a pile of the bones under it;* make it [e]boil well, yea, let the bones thereof be boiled in the midst of it.

*Or, "A pile [of wood] for the bones under [it]."

v cf. ch. 1. 2, etc. cf. 2 Ki. 25. 1. cf. Jer. 52. 4. cf. Jer. 39. 1. cf. Zech. 8. 19.
w ch. 13. 1, etc.
x cf. Is. 30. 8, 9. cf. Hab. 2. 2, 3. cf. Jno 4. 52.
y 2 Ki. 25. 1. Jer. 39. 1. Jer. 52. 4.
z ch. 17. 2 ch. 19. 2, etc. cf. ch. 20. 49.
a ch. 2. 3, 6, etc. cf. Is. 1. 2. cf. Is. 30. 1, 9. cf. Acts 7. 51.
b cf. ver. 6 with ch. 11. 3.
c cf. ch. 22. 18, 22; cf. Mic. 3. 2, 3. d cf. ch. 20. 47; cf. ch. 34. 16, 20; cf. Lk. 1. 52; cf. Jer. 39. 6.
e cf. Is. 30. 33; cf. Mt. 3. 12.

the judgment upon them which they so well deserve. Thus a divine judgment is executed, but with the approbation of the human conscience everywhere. God and man are united together against them, but with the end in God's thoughts still of getting rid, by whatever severe measures, of the wickedness which else would never end, but which shall at last make them recognize their covenant-God in the holiness which compels Him thus to afflict them. The end for Israel and for the nations alike is ever that they shall know that He is the Lord Jehovah.

See. 5.

In the last chapter of this series, which comes evidently as an appendix to what has gone before, we find the judgment now reached. The king of Babylon has drawn near to Jerusalem, and with this, when fully ascertained, prophetic communications cease for the present. The events speak for themselves, and to God's voice in them they have now to listen.

There are two parts in the chapter. The first announces, before the people could have any message of it to reach them, that the siege has begun; while the second shows us what is implied in this—the divine sundering of the tie between Jehovah and the people, as figured in the death of the prophet's wife. These two parts are in a certain sense, and in a most touching manner, in contrast with one another, as we shall see when we examine them.

1. We are now in the second year from the last communication, and in the ninth year of Jehoiachin's captivity. The number speaks of divine manifestation, God manifesting Himself now, alas, in the very cloud which hides Him from the people; but the cloud is that which their sins have raised, and God is manifest in necessary judgment. Thus also the tenth month the tenth day of the month, speaks. The word of Jehovah comes to Ezekiel on that day, bidding him to write down the name of the day, with the assurance that the king of Babylon has drawn near to Jerusalem on that self-same day.

And now the taunt about the caldron is to be answered in the event. Jerusalem is indeed to be their caldron in which they are to be subjected to the

Therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Woe to the f bloody city, to the g caldron whose rust* is s therein, and whose rust is not gone out of it. Bring it out piece by piece; no lot has fallen upon it. For her blood is in the h midst of her; she set it upon the bare rock; she i poured it not upon the ground to cover it with dust. That it might cause j wrath to come up to take vengeance, I have k set her blood upon the bare rock that it should not be covered. Therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah: l Woe to the bloody city! I m will also make the pile great. n Heap on the wood, kindle the fire, boil well the flesh, and make o thick the broth,† and let the bones be burned. Then p set it empty upon the coals thereof, that it may be hot, and the brass thereof may burn, and that the q filthiness thereof may be molten in it, and that its rust may cease. She has r exhausted labor, yet her great rust t goeth not forth out of her: let her rust be in the t fire. In thy filthiness is u lewdness, for I have cleansed thee, and thou wast v not cleansed. Thou shalt w no more be cleansed from thy filthiness till I have caused my x wrath upon thee to rest. I Jehovah have y spoken it: it shall come to pass, and I will do it; I will not go back, neither will I z spare, neither will I a repent. b According to thy ways, and according to thy doings, shall they judge thee, saith the Lord Jehovah.

* Or, "filth." † Or, "Spice it well."

f cf. 2 Ki. 21. 16. Mic. 7. 2. cf. Nah. 3. 1.
g vers. 11-13. cf. Jer. 6. 29, 30.
h cf. Jer. 2. 34. cf. Jer. 6. 15.
i cf. 2 Cor. 12. 20, 21.
j Lev. 17. 13. Deut. 12. 16, 24. Job 16. 18. Is. 26. 21. cf. Gen. 4. 10. k Deut. 32. 21, 22. cf. 2 Ki. 22. 17, etc.
l ch. 16. 37, 38. cf. Jer. 22. 8, 9.
m ver. 6. cf. Lk. 13. 34, 35.
n cf. Is. 31. 9. cf. Deut. 32. 22.
o ver. 5.
p cf. Jer. 20. 5. cf. Mk. 9. 49.
q cf. Jer. 32. 29. cf. Jer. 38. 18. cf. Jer. 52. 13.
r ch. 20. 38. ch. 23. 26, 27. cf. Is. 1. 25. cf. Mic. 5. 11-14.
s cf. Is. 47. 13. cf. Is. 57. 9, 10. cf. Hos. 12. 1.
t cf. Jer. 5. 13. u cf. ch. 23. 44, etc. v ch. 22. 24; cf. Is. 5. 7; cf. Jer. 25. 3-7. w cf. Hos. 7. 1, 9, 16; cf. Mt. 23. 34-39. x ch. 5. 13; cf. ch. 16. 42; ctr. Zeph. 3. 17; ctr. Is. 40. 1. y cf. Is. 55. 10, 11; cf. Num. 23. 19; cf. 2 Cor. 1. 20. z ch. 7. 4, 9, etc.; ctr. Mal. 3. 17. a cf. Jer. 23. 20; ctr. Rom. 11. 29. b ch. 16. 43, etc.; Gal. 6. 7.

fire of divine wrath: "Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Set on the caldron, set it on, and also pour water into it. Gather the pieces thereof into it, every good piece, the thigh and the shoulder; fill it with the choice bones. Take the choice of the flock, and make also a pile of bones underneath it. Make it boil well; yea, let the bones thereof be boiled in the midst of it." This then was to be the issue of every controversy with God, of which there was ample necessity. The city itself was a caldron whose rust was in it, and could not be scoured out. The whole, therefore, is visited. No lot has fallen upon it for the sparing of any. She had taken life—that life which God had ordained to be sacred, even where rightly taken, when the blood was to be poured out to Him. It had not been poured out; it remained to defile her; nay, she had set it upon the bare rock in open view: "She poured it not upon the ground to cover it with dust." Thus it cried openly for vengeance, and God had set her blood upon the bare rock, in His turn, that it should not be covered. The very city emptied of its inhabitants must go down in the fire of His anger: "Set it empty upon the coals thereof, that it may be hot, and the brass thereof may burn, that the filthiness thereof may be molten in it and its rust may cease. It has exhausted labor, yet its great rust goeth not forth out of it. Let its rust be in the fire." Thus after all possible pains taken with her, such pains as God Himself might take, she was not cleansed. Here then was the only possible end; inexorable, unsparing

2 Sam. 15. 30. Mourning forbidden.

15 Also the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
16 Son of man, behold, I take away from thee the [a]desire of thine eyes with a stroke: yet neither shalt thou mourn nor weep, neither shall thy tears run down.
17 [b]Forbear to cry, make no mourning for the dead, bind the tire of thine head upon thee, and put on thy shoes upon thy feet, and cover not thy lips, and eat not the bread of men.
18 So I spake unto the people in the morning: and at even my wife died; and I did in the morning as I was commanded.
19 And the people said unto me, Wilt thou not tell us what these things are to us, that thou doest?
20 Then I said unto them, The word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
21 Speak unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Behold, I will [c]profane judgment was alone sufficient for such a case: "According to thy ways and according to thy doings shall they judge thee, saith the Lord Jehovah."

[a] ver. 1, etc. [b] Lev. 10. 6. [c] Ps. 74. 7.

2. We have now a parable of another nature, which seems to bear a double significance; one open, and one hidden. Jerusalem is gone in judgment. The city is gone, and the sanctuary with it—the sanctuary so necessary for the nation as a whole, where alone the blood of sacrifice could be offered to God. Thus the destruction of the sanctuary was the end of all relationship. What could remain between a holy God and a people for whose sins no atonement could be made? This is the overwhelming calamity which, as to the people, might well make every other of comparatively small account. The voice of lamentation itself was hushed in this silence of despair. "And the word of Jehovah came unto me saying, Son of man, behold, I take away from thee the desire of thine eyes with a stroke, yet thou shalt not mourn nor weep, neither shall thy tears run down." It is not that grief is forbidden, but the expression of it. He is to be in this expressionless grief a sign to the people: "Sigh in silence, make no mourning for the dead, bind thy turban upon thee, and put thy sandals upon thy feet, and cover not the beard, and eat not the bread of men. And I spake unto the people in the morning, and in the evening my wife died; and I did in the morning as I was commanded."

In contrast with the loud lamentation customary in such cases, for which they even hired mourners, this conduct calls for explanation: "The people said unto me, Wilt thou not tell us what these things are to us which thou doest? Then I said unto them, The word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Say unto the house of Israel: Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Behold, I profane my sanctuary, the pride of your power, the desire of your eyes and the pity of your soul, and your sons and your daughters whom ye have left behind shall fall by the sword." It is the mourning for these last that is to cease in view of the mourning which can have no sufficient expression.

Yet, after all, it is not they who can feel these things according to the divine account of them. They might be overwhelmed by the calamity, but were to pine away in iniquities yet unrepented of. This is why, as it seems, the full meaning as to what Ezekiel is called to do does not come out. The loss of their sons and daughters, with all its severity, cannot answer to this breaking of a marriage-tie under which Ezekiel suffers. For that, we have to think of the my sanctuary, the [n]pride of your power, the [o]desire of your eyes, and the pity of your soul; and your sons and your daughters whom ye have left behind shall [p]fall by the sword. And ye shall do as I have done: ye shall [q]not cover the beard, nor eat the bread of men; and your turbans shall be upon your heads, and your sandals upon your feet: ye shall not mourn nor weep; but ye shall [r]pine away in your iniquities, and moan one toward another. Thus Ezekiel shall be unto you a [s]sign; according to all that he hath done shall ye do: when it cometh, then ye shall [t]know that I am the Lord Jehovah.

n cf. Mt. 24. 1. cf. Jno. 19. 20.
o cf. Ps. 27. 4. cf. 1 Ts. 84. 1. cf. Is. 64. 11.
p ch. 23. 25, 47. Jer. 6. 11.
q vers. 16, 17. cf. Ps. 78. 64. cf. Jer. 16. 4-7.
r ch. 4. 17. ch. 33. 10. Lev. 26. 39.
s ch. 4. 3. Is. 8. 18. Hos. 1. 2.
t ch. 7. 9, 27, etc.

sanctuary itself gone, which was the pledge and seal of the tie, which spoke of the Lord's presence with them, and gave the people access to Himself; that tie being broken, it might well swallow up all others.

But this does not put the prophet's parabolic action in its full meaning before us. Ezekiel himself is plainly here, as elsewhere, the representative of God to the people, as the prophet in fact always was. It is to be noted that the stroke falls not upon the people, but upon the prophet himself. Nor is it inflicted as a judgment, as far as he is concerned. With the prophet there is no divorce from God by it; on the contrary, just at this time he stands before the people fully as the representative of God Himself, speaking and acting in His name. We have to take the prophet here as really representing the One for whom he stands. Thus it is not obscurely intimated that the prophet's sorrow is the sorrow of God Himself. The affliction is on His part, not on man's side. Yet it is an affliction which can find no expression in the midst of a people obdurate as these are. It is their sin which has wrought their calamity. It is their sin in which they still pine away; feeling, no doubt, certain effects of it, but not the iniquity itself. He who has inflicted it is He who feels what He has inflicted. It is the sundering of His own relationship with a people whom He had taken up to manifest His love to them and to bring them near to Himself in such a way as all their history indicates. Yet He has been compelled to give them up. The tie, in fact, is broken, for we are not thinking here of purposes to be fulfilled in the end, but of present relationship, and these ended for the nation as such. Yet He who in all their affliction has ever been afflicted, can give no expression to it. It is the shadow of judgment which is necessarily over them all and which hinders this expression.

Yet how wonderful in its pathos is this unexpressed, inexpressible sorrow with which all this part of the prophecy closes! God will not, as it were, permit it all to end in judgment merely, without bringing us to His side in this matter, if we have heart for it, and showing us how truly His heart remains unchanged, and how thoroughly the divorce which He has given, as He says in Hosea, is not on His side but on theirs. Nothing can divorce His heart from the objects of His love, and if He has to act in a way apparently most contradictory to this, faith may yet penetrate the disguise and realize the love unchangeable throughout it all. This is what seems to be the meaning here—the meaning upon His side; the worthy end to which we have been looking.

The prophetic communication to the people closes here for the time. The last act of the judgment which is now about to take place is to be waited for until the message shall come which speaks of its full accomplishment. For

And thou, son of man, shall it not be in the day when I take from them their strength, the joy of their glory, the desire of their eyes, and the burden* of their souls, their sons and their daughters, that in that day he that [u] escapeth shall come unto thee to cause thine ears to hear it? In that day shall thy [v] mouth be opened to him that is escaped, and thou shalt speak, and be no more dumb. So shalt thou be a sign unto them; and they shall know that I am Jehovah.

[u] cf. 1 Sam. 4. 12–18. cf. Job 1. 15–19.
[v] ch. 3. 26, 27. ch. 29. 21. ch. 33. 22. cf. Lk. 1. 20, 64.

* Or, "choice."

nearly a year and a half the siege lasted, and then came the message that the city was taken. In that day, when at last all was over, and no false hope could any longer be maintained, the prophet's mouth would be opened. He would speak, and no more be dumb. This we shall find accordingly in the third division of these prophecies. When judgment has had its way, and God's holiness is fully vindicated, the prophet's mouth is to be opened, not in judgment once more, but in the announcement of blessing to come; of blessing which, in God's unrepenting goodness, is still reserved for them, however much their persistent iniquity has delayed the fulfilment of it.

DIVISION 2 (Chaps. 25–32.)

Judgment is now executed upon Israel, God's special people, who owed their prominence to the privileges granted to them, as the apostle reminds us —"chiefly that unto them were committed the oracles of God." But this of necessity includes others also, in so far as these oracles have reached to others besides Israel. In God's mind His house was to be a house of prayer for all nations; and Israel, with her miraculous history, whose land was on the highway of national intercourse, was to be wisdom's voice heard in the crossways in which God had appointed her stand. Could the nations around be guiltless, then? They were not in the simple ignorance which God could overlook, as the apostle states in his address to the Athenians (Acts xvii. 30). In fact, as we shall see, the message had in measure told upon them, but only to arouse, as to the mass of them, the natural enmity of the human heart to God. Accordingly, if Israel be judged, the nations around her must also be dealt with, and dealt with by the instrument which God uses in the judgment of Israel herself. Thus it is the nations in various degrees of relation to Israel that we find now summoned before the judgment-seat.

Seven of the nations around are thus made special representatives of such responsibility, and their attitude towards the chosen people of God stands at the forefront of the account. In principle we have here what will be repeated in the last days, in the judgment before the Son of Man (Matt. xxv. 31–46, see Notes). Ammon we find to be against the sanctuary and the land. Moab, in pride of heart, will see nothing in Israel but a nation like all the rest. Edom and Philistia have nursed a spirit of vengeance against her. Tyre finds her own gain in Israel's fall. Sidon has been a sting and a thorn to her; and Egypt, always a staff of reed. Whatever difference there may be one from another, it is plain that God's word in Israel, which is necessarily for all His creatures, has been disregarded or refused. It may be said, and truly so, that there was not a missionary spirit in Israel, and that as yet there was no proper gospel to

DIVISION 2. (Chaps. xxv.–xxxii.)

The judgment upon the Gentile enemies.

SECTION 1 (Chap. xxv. 1-11).

Ammon-Moab, one in descent, in sin, and retribution. Their land given to the sons of the East.

1 (1-7). Rabbah made a solitude for their joy at the desolation of the temple and the land.

1. AND the [w]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, set thy face toward the children of [x]Ammon, and prophesy against them; and say unto the children of Ammon, Hear the word of the Lord Jehovah: Thus saith the Lord Jehovah; Because go out to others. Nevertheless, for the heart that seeks Him, there will be the consciousness that wherever He is to be found, He is the rewarder of those that seek Him out. His gifts, wherever appreciable to the carnal mind, will be easily recognized and sought after. At the time of Israel's deliverance, when judgment passed upon Egypt and upon all her gods, there was such a testimony as could not be mistaken, but it only brought out more fully the fact that there was no heart to respond to it—that their ignorance of God was a willing ignorance. Thus the opposition of surrounding nations to Israel in her after-course was, manifestly, largely due to a claim which these things pressed upon them, and to which they did not yield.

[w] ch. 24. 1, etc.
[x] ch. 21. 28-32. Jer. 9. 25, 26. Jer. 25. 21. Jer. 49. 1-6. Amos 1. 13-15. Zeph. 2. 8-11. cf. Judg. 11. 4, etc. cf. 1 Sam. 11. 1, etc. cf. 2 Sam. 10. 1, etc.

It has been remarked by some that the number of these nations—seven in all—is meant to be significant. Together they present an epitome of the world as a whole, in the different forms which this resistance takes. This surely should cause us to inquire into the particular significance of each of these, and what we are to learn by it; but it has been little inquired into. If we examine it, however, we shall find that what is given us here is not simply the world in Israel's time, but the world in our time also. It is essentially the same—one in spirit all through; and the lessons therefore abide for us to-day; typically they are for spiritual lessons to us, having at the same time a prophetic meaning, manifesting itself everywhere to those who care to see. Let us take them up therefore in this manner, remembering the importance to apprehend God's mind in everything that He may communicate to us, and that true blessing to ourselves is not merely found in what is distinctly addressed to ourselves, but in the apprehension of what God would give us in the consideration of all His ways either in judgment or in grace. His steps everywhere, as we have said before, are always steps of revelation. His acts are of significance, as His words are; and here, as elsewhere, all these things happened and were recorded for our admonition upon whom the ends of the ages have come.

Sec. 1.

First of all, the kindred peoples of Ammon and Moab are set before us: one in their origin, according to their well-known shameful history, and one in their sin, as we shall see directly; one also, therefore, in the retribution which comes upon their sin. Yet there is a difference between them, a difference fully recognized in what we find here.

1. Ammon faces us first. In him is marked opposition to the sanctuary and to the land of Israel. But the sanctuary is God's dwelling among men, the expression thus of grace—a grace which has been only more fully made thou saidst, Aha, [y]against my sanctuary, when it was profaned; and against the [z]land of Israel, when it was made desolate; and against the [a]house of Judah, when they went into captivity: therefore, behold, I will give thee to the [b]children of the East for a possession, and they shall set their [c]encampments in thee, and make their dwellings in thee; they shall [d]eat thy fruits, and they shall drink thy milk. And I will make [e]Rabbah a habitation for camels, and the children of Ammon a couching place for flocks: and ye shall [f]know that I am Jehovah. For thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Because thou hast clapped thy hands, and y vers. 6, 8. ch. 24. 2, etc. cf. Prov. 17. 5. cf. Lam. 4. 21. cf. Ps. 137. 7. cf. Obad. 10–14.

z cf. ch. 21. 3. cf. ch. 6. 2, 3.
a cf. ch. 20. 45, 46. cf. Dan. 1. 2, etc.
b cf. Judg. 6. 3. cf. Num. 23. 7. cf. Is. 41. 2. c cf. Lk. 19. 43. d cf. Lev. 26. 16; cf. Deut. 28. 33, 50, 51; cf. Is. 1. 7. e ch. 21. 20; cf. 2 Sam. 12. 26; cf. Is. 17. 2; cf. Zeph. 2. 14, 15. f ch. 25. 17, etc.

known in after-times. In Christ we have had the fullest expression of it, dwelling amongst men in such a way as told out His delight in them; and this is a step which He will never take back. In Him, God and man are indissolubly joined, and with Him there is no repentance. The land of Israel is the portion which God in grace has given them, and in which He would make manifest the blessedness of those who draw near to Him. These are lessons which at all times are meant to speak to all; but as Israel on the one hand could take such privileges to glorify themselves with them, and despise others, so on the other hand, men could take them as the mere exhibition of a narrow partiality on God's part, and make Him but as one of the gods of the nations round about.

If in this way we look back at the history of Ammon it will have continual significance for us. Their first father's name, Ben-ammi, "son of my people," is significant, if we think of it as in opposition to the people of God. The land also, as we find in the history of the Judges, he covets for himself, though he can take possession really of nothing, being only the nomad ravager which everything shows him to be. Thus, as others have remarked, we have no cities of the land of Ammon; nothing that indicates the proper occupation of the soil or the care of the agriculturist. Rabbah is his one city, "numerous," as we may read the word, the hold of a motley host, as it were, but the stronghold of a Bedouin race; and the judgment which falls upon it is completely in character with this. In the congruous ways of God, the land of Ammon is given up to similar raiders, "the sons of the East;" the word for east signifying what is opposite to you, but which may easily acquire the character of what we find in the east wind—what is in opposition, or adverse. "The sons of the East," such as the Ishmaelites, were men whose hand was against every one, and every one's hand against them. Rabbah, under them, becomes itself broken up, and is but a habitation for camels, "the burden bearers" of the desert.

If we look further at Ammon, and in the light of his previous history, which has been elsewhere considered, we need have little difficulty in discerning the foe who makes his attack upon the things of primary importance for us; above all, upon the grace of God and the portion which grace has for His people. It is characteristic of the errorist of all time, in whom the power of Satan specially is at work, one who is ever against Christ, and necessarily, therefore, against His people. Nahash, "the serpent," the king of Ammon, is thus the figure of the great adversary of God and man. His attack upon the people in Saul's stamped with the feet, and [g]rejoiced with all the spite of thy soul against the land of Israel; therefore, behold, I will stretch out my hand upon thee, and will give thee for a [h]spoil* to the nations; and I will [i]cut thee off from the peoples, and I will cause thee to [j]perish out of the countries: I will destroy thee, and thou shalt know that I am Jehovah.

2(8-11): Moab associated with Seir and Ammon; judged according to their associations.

2. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Because that [k]Moab and Seir say, Behold, the house of Judah is [l]like unto all the nations, therefore, behold, I will [m]open the side

* Or, "for food," as good authority gives it.

g ver. 3, etc. ver. 15. h Amos 1. 13-15. i Jer. 49. 2. j cf. Num. 24. 18-20. k cf. Num. 22. 2-6, etc. Num. 24. 17, 18. cf. Ps. 83. 4-8. l Is chs 15,16. Jer. 48. Amos 2. 1-3. Zeph. 2. 8-11. cf. ch. 35. m cf. Is. 45. 1; cf. Jer. 50. 26; cf. Zech. 11. 1, 2.

time has been already considered in its place. Heresy, as we know, takes away the portion of God's people, but it is able to do nothing with it. It cannot make the land fruitful in which it is simply a raider, and indeed cannot retain that upon which it may lay hold, as we see in Ammon's previous possession of the land of Sihon which they had lost to the Amorite.

All this is in the deepest way instructive for those who have learned in Scripture history to find not merely that, but prophecy also, bringing out, as prophecy ever does, the mind of God, His judgment of all the things that come into man's mind. It is not the place to dwell upon it here at length, but the history will be found in this way significant throughout, and not merely in a few points which a lively imagination may read things into. The history as such, with all its admonition, is the more confirmed, of course, as we realize it to be an inspired history; with the breath of the Spirit of God in them, the prophets wrote much better than they knew.

2. From Ammon now we turn to Moab, who is associated in the closest way with Ammon, and with Seir also, in whom one of the great lessons that we read is the gravity of the association. In all that is here Moab is scarcely seen alone. Moab is the company-lover, and not careful as to the company he keeps; he is the true child of Lot, as we see at once, if we remember him as with Abraham on the one hand, and on the other off into Sodom, drawn there by what gain he can find in it. Moab is thus the very type of the comfortable worldling who will keep company with the people of God until he can almost persuade himself, as he would others, that he is one with them, while on the other hand he can consort with what is in deadliest opposition to the people of God; he is not able to discern for himself what constitutes the difference.

Thus, "Moab and Seir say, Behold the house of Judah is like unto all the nations." Moab's character is thus as plainly marked as that of Ammon. In contrast with Ammon, he can win his land and have his cities, which are the glory of it. As mentioned specially here, he has a Beth-jeshimoth ("a house of the wastes") to redeem the wastes. He has a Baal-meon, or more fully, Beth-baal-meon ("the house of the possessor of a dwelling"), and he appreciates it, of course. Then he has a Kiriathaim, "a walled double city," in which security and the association which he loves, so favorable for polish and practical activities, are combined. These things stand for principles which men still glory in; and they come so near to what is true and right, that we find them taken up and adopted by Reuben, the typical child of God, as there is, no doubt, such of Moab from the cities, from his cities which are on his frontiers, the glory of the country, Beth-jeshimoth, Baal-meon, and Kirjathaim, unto the [n]children of the East, with the sons of Ammon; and I will give it them for a [o]possession, that the children of Ammon may not be remembered among the nations: and I will execute judgments upon Moab; and they shall [p]know that I am Jehovah.

SECTION 2 (Chap. xxv. 12–14).

Edom the unbrotherly enemy; the Lord's vengeance for his vengeance.

Thus saith the Lord Jehovah; Because that [q]Edom hath dealt against the house of Judah by taking [r]vengeance, and hath made himself very guilty, and re-

[n] ver. 4.
[o] ctr. Ps. 83. 3-6. cf. Is. 23. 15, 16.
[p] ver. 5, etc.
[q] vers. 3, 8, etc. 2 Chr. 28. 17. Ps. 137. 7. Jer. 49. 7, etc.
[r] Amos 1. 11, 12. Obad. 10-16. cf. Gen. 27. 41, 42. ctr. Rom. 12. 19-21.

transformation in them as that into which faith introduces him (Josh. xiii. 17–20. Compare Numbers xxxii. 38, Notes).

In all this, Moab exemplifies typically the professor of religion, but always tending to go easily with the heretic; he makes Christianity itself, as Moab made Judaism, but one of the forms which illustrate the religious element in man. Every one knows what a favorite idea this is coming to be in these last days. Thus Moab, in full company with Ammon in his later history and in his spirit, becomes partaker of his doom. In other places of Scripture they are treated as if one. The company he keeps testifies of the man he is; this is a lesson as to association which is continually needful.*

Sec. 2.

The judgment passes on to Edom, the typical enemy of Israel, who, according to what we have seen of it elsewhere, presents to us the world of the old man, as we may say—the natural fallen man—the most real enemy we have as Christians; none the less so for being akin to us all naturally, even as Edom was the unbrotherly brother of Israel. His enmity is characterized here as revenge. He had, as we know, a quarrel from the beginning—the primal loss of his birthright-blessing, his sale of which, for a mess of pottage, has passed out of his memory. Nothing is stated here as to the cause of his enmity, which is indeed inherent in his nature. The old man has had a quarrel with God from the beginning; having turned his back upon Him, and so lost paradise, he counts against God the evils of the place in which he finds himself now, which is indeed very much a wilderness, a "rugged" place, such as Seir was for Edom, according to its name. Yet he has acquired wisdom in it, the wisdom gathered from experience: "Necessity is the mother of invention," as the proverb says; and fallen man has sought out many inventions.

Teman, spoken of here, was noted for the wisdom of its inhabitants. It means "the right hand," which, according to Scripture usage, was the south, and as

* Moab and Ammon, the children of Lot, as pointed out in the text, are by their close relationship to Israel types of profession. From the history in the book of Judges, we would gather that Moab represents profession closely coupled with the lusts of the flesh; Ammon with the lusts of the mind. The one brought God's people into slavery through their appetite; the other through the darkening of their minds. See Judges 3: 12-30; 11: 4-28. We see the bondage of Moab in the worldliness, love of ease and pleasure of the day; of Ammon in the infidelity, higher criticism and general unbelief so common.—S. R.

venged himself upon them, therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah; I will also [s]stretch out my hand upon Edom; and will [t]cut off from it man and beast; I will even make it [u]desolate from Teman, even unto Dedan shall they fall by the sword. And I will execute [v]my vengeance upon Edom by the [w]hand of my people Israel; and they shall do in Edom according to mine anger and according to my wrath; and they shall [x]know my vengeance, saith the Lord Jehovah.

[s] vers. 7, 16. Is. 34. 6. Is. 63. 1-6. Lam. 4. 21, 22.
[t] cf. Is. 34. 11-15.
[u] cf. Jer. 7. 20.
[v] cf. Is. 34. 9, 10. Obad. 8, 9.
[w] Jer. 49. 8-13. cf. Heb. 10. 30, 31.
[x] cf. Gen. 27. 29.

cf. Ps. 83. 9, etc; cf. Is. 11. 14; cf. Ps. 149. 6-9. x cf. Deut. 32. 35, 36. cf. Ps. 9. 16.

this, has many significant implications. The right hand is the place of dependence, yet of honor: it was the place of Reuben in the wilderness, and we may remember that he also was a first-born who had lost his birthright place, and yet found blessing in the loss itself. Typically he is the man of faith, essentially dependent, yet finding abundant resources in God who is for him—the refuge always of the destitute. This Reuben thus learns a wisdom of his own, the wisdom of faith; and in this way, as the book of Numbers shows us, falls heir to Sihon, the king of Heshbon, which he possesses and builds up afresh. The story has been told elsewhere. (See Notes, Numbers xxxii.) Heshbon means "device," and it is faith that restores the reason in man to its natural, dependent place, to find how much blessing in it! Teman's wisdom is dependent also, necessarily; it is Edomite, not Israelite—a fleshly dependence, therefore. He has no faith in God to keep him steady, to give him fixed points to reason from; he is born into a world where he must receive largely from others, inheriting the thoughts of men, fallible, in fact, often deceived, sinful, and capable of deception. Yet men pride themselves upon this godless wisdom, which so often assumes the name of science, though in its wilful ignorance of God it is necessarily ignorant of the sources and origin of all things.

And here we find another name in the prophecy which seems to have a relation and adds significance to all this. Dedan is given as meaning "progress"—the watchword of the day, we might say; but which, after all, has doubt thrown upon it, in its derivation from a word which means not exactly to go forward, but rather to go softly or slowly. Slow enough indeed has been man's progress through all these centuries of his possession of the earth, although the pace may be quicker now through the multiplication of experiences and experiments which he has been able to make. He has been variously assisted along the road, and by nothing so much as by the divine revelation which has lighted up every place in which it has shone, which he, nevertheless, is seeking to discredit as "unscientific." Discarding this, however, his science must necessarily lose knowledge of the beginning, and is unable to look onward to the end. Put human wisdom right, let it not be esteemed as opposed to faith, let faith not be thought unreasonable, but rather the highest character of reason, and then indeed we might see splendid work, with nature yielding its resources—spite of the fall yielding true blessings, in the bounty of God, which still it witnesses.

Stranger than this unbrotherly strife between Edom and Israel is that which is seen between the men of nature and the men of God. Yet it will continue, if we read Scripture aright, and Ezekiel's prophecy should throw light upon it and make us aware of what is coming. For power will assuredly put down

SECTION 3 (Chap. xxv. 15–17).

The Philistines under ban.

Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Because the [y]Philistines have dealt by [z]revenge, and have taken vengeance in spite* of soul, to [a]destroy with perpetual enmity; therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I will [b]stretch out my hands upon the Philistines, and I will [c]cut off the Cherethites,† and [d]destroy the remnant of the sea-coast. And I will [e]execute great vengeance upon them with wrathful rebukes; and they shall [f]know that I am Jehovah when I shall lay my vengeance upon them.

y vers. 6, 12. cf. 18. 14. 29. 32. cf. Jer. ch 47. cf. Amos 1. 6–8.
z ver. 12.
a cf. Judg. 13 1, etc. cf. 1 Sam. 4. 1, etc.
b vers. 7, 13.
c 1 Sam. 30. 14. cf. Zeph. 2. 4, 5.
d Jer. 47. 4.
e ver. 11. cf. ch. 5. 15.
f vers. 5, 11, etc.

* Or, "contempt." † Lit., "those cut off;" the same root as "I will cut off." They thus answer to their name.

those whom grace has not subdued; and if neither the witness of Scripture nor of nature have a right effect upon this pride of human wisdom, God Himself must interfere. There is nothing left but for Him to come in in necessary judgment. In the case of Edom, as given here, Israel will be God's instrument in this; for we know by the voice of prophecy everywhere that to Israel is given the inheritance of the earth, and through the seed of Abraham alone shall all the families of the earth be blessed. The gospel will not effect what men are looking for from it—though it does take out from the earth a people for heaven; but He to whom will be given the heathen for His inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for His possession, will surely rule over the nations with a rod of iron, and as the vessels of a potter shatter them to pieces. This, and Israel's part in it, we find abundantly in the prophets elsewhere, but it is not the place here to take it up. (See Jer. li. 20, 23; Isa. xi. 14, etc.)

Sec. 3.

The Philistines next come before us, as partakers of this inherent and perpetual enmity of Edom. They were intruders into a land promised to Israel, though with a conviction of their own prior right. They have given their name to the whole land (Palestine, from Philistia), which they claim, though they have never been able to take possession of more than its mere lowest border. We have seen them abundantly elsewhere, as typically natural men intruding into spiritual things. As Philistines they are "immigrants," but never Hebrews—that is, "passengers" or "pilgrims." They figure largely in the earlier historical books as far as Samuel, and must have a corresponding importance in their signification for us. As Christians, we should know these Philistines very well. They are seen to-day in what claims to be the Catholic, the Universal Church, but which spiritual judgment recognizes as but Judaism with a thin veil of Christianity drawn over its face, and with the full inheritance of Jewish enmity to the children of the free woman apparent through it. Into this also we cannot enter now, and need not, as any that will can find it fully where the interpretation naturally belongs. (See Notes on Gen. xx.; xxvi. 12; Josh. xiii. 2, 3; 1 Sam. xvii., etc.)

We have but one class of these Philistines specially noticed here, the Cherethites, the "cutters off," which have been also elsewhere considered. (See Acts xxvii., Notes.) "Cutting off" naturally characterizes asceticism in its

SECTION 4 (Chaps. xxvi.-xxviii).

Tyre and Sidon, the world of mammon under the abasing hand of God.

1 (xxvi.): Tyre to be bare rock.
1 (1-6): The occasion of her fall.

1. [1]And it came to pass in the [g]eleventh year, on the first of the month, that the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, because [h]Tyre hath said [i]against Jerusalem, Aha, she is broken, the gate of the peoples! She is turned unto me: I shall be [j]replenished now that she is laid waste. Therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I am [k]against thee, O Tyre, g ch. 1. 2. ch. 8. 1. ch. 20. 1.

h cf. Ps. 83. 7. Is. 23. Jer. 25. 22. Joel 3. 4. Amos 1. 9, 10. Zech. 9. 2-4.
i ch. 25. 3, etc.
j cf. ch 35. 10.
k cf. ch. 28. 22.

every shape, a remnant merely of the old heathenism, whatever its Christian dress. Externalism is manifest here, even in the most zealous forms of devotion. The Cherethites are taken by many, in certain passages at least, to mean "executioners," and in this form of cutting off, Philistinism has ever distinguished itself; and, doubtless, many who sacrificed in this way the deepest feelings of their nature have thought they were doing God service. But all through, the enmity against Israel (the literal as well as the typical enmity) is apparent in what is here, and God threatens the Cherethites in a special manner: "Behold, I will stretch out my hands upon the Philistines, and I will cut off the Cherethites, and destroy the remnant of the seacoast." Thus Philistia will perish in the day of God, and all that are with God will only rejoice over the judgment.

Sec. 4.

We come now to Tyre, though in Tyre we find no direct enmity to Israel. Tyre, as we know, was in the days of David and Solomon ministering in friendly fashion to the Israelites; and in the day of their prominent blessing, under Christ their King, the daughter of Tyre will be there again with a gift. Tyre thus stands apart from Edom and Philistia. She is a Canaanite, however —of no good significance in this respect. The Canaanite was ever under the doom of being a servant of servants to his brethren, and in his proudest day he is still this. Tyre is essentially the merchantman; his professed object even is to serve. No doubt his aim is first of all to serve himself. He has not the true spirit of service for God, but finds in the necessity of man the opportunity for his own gain, and this is what we find as to the cause of his judgment here. Jerusalem has been judged—Jerusalem, in many ways a centre of attraction for the people around, "the gate of the peoples," as Tyre calls her. The rejoicing at her fall is Canaanite enough. She says against Jerusalem: "Aha, she is broken, the gate of the peoples; she is turned unto me. I shall be replenished now that she is laid waste." How naturally we understand it, alas! How natural it is! How common is such rejoicing on the part of merchantmen at all times! The habitual acquirement of riches from the need of others hardens the heart, there is little need to say; and thus with Tyre here: and for this she is judged. As we plainly see, Tyre is the world of mammon, and we need not wonder at the large place it has in Ezekiel's prophecy.

1. Tyre means "a rock." This island city was built upon a rock, and what it needed for its peculiar purposes was not productive power in the place it occupied, but a suitable gathering point where the products of other parts might come and be exchanged. In the immensity of its resources, Tyre might indeed look upon itself as a rock that could not be shaken. The greater the necessities of others, the more the streams of supplies from all quarters ministered to it.

and will cause [i] many nations to come up against thee, as the [m] sea causeth its waves to come up. And they shall [n] destroy the walls of Tyre, and break down her towers; I will also scrape her dust from her, and make her a [o] bare rock. She shall be a place for the [p] spreading of nets in the midst of the sea; for I have spoken it, saith the Lord Jehovah; and she shall become a [q] spoil for the nations. And her [r] daughters that are in the field shall be slain by the sword; and they shall [s] know that I am Jehovah.

i cf. Mic. 4. 11. cf. Zech. 14. 2.
m cf. Jer. 6. 23. cf. Rev. 13. 1 with Rev. 17. 15.
n ver. 9. Is. 23. 11.
o cf. ch. 24. 7, 8. cf. Lk. 19. 44.
p ver. 14.
q ch. 25. 7.
cf. ch. 29. 18, 19. r ver. 8; cf. Jer. 49. 2. s ch. 25. 17, etc.

But God takes up its character in result, and pronounces that it shall be a rock—a rock and nothing more—"a bare rock," or "cliff," as the word which He uses means. The word for "bare," means rather, "dry," dried by the sun, in fact; barren enough, surely, in the idea of it, for few things can dry as the sun.

The point for us is that which we find in the first ancestor of all these Canaanites, who were Hamites; and Ham is "the sun-dried one." He is what man fallen from God and in conflict with Him necessarily is, darkened by the light itself. And this is the nature of all heathenism; not, as people imagine, a condition in which men are groping after God, but on the contrary, one in which they are doing their best to forget God, and turn away from Him. God did not leave man His creature without the primitive knowledge of Himself; and there is in him still a witness to God, however perverted. But if he turns from the true God, he must have a God of his own—make it out of a beast, or fashion it out of stone with a chisel, or hew down a tree, and fashion into some grotesque shape what he reserved from the fire. As the sun can darken, so it can dry. God's blessings, which all surrounding nature furnishes to man, are the very things which he takes to dry himself up into a being divested of every human sympathy. Not only Godward, but manward also, he thus becomes parched and barren. This was the process that was going on in Tyre: the process that makes men misers or usurers, and sometimes prodigals also for the luxury of prodigality—drawing remorselessly from others the means which they scatter again with lavish hands. This is what characterized Tyre, which God decrees shall in the end be just what it has made itself, a sun-dry cliff; or, as He puts it otherwise, a mere place of the spreading of nets; the device of poverty to lay hold upon the living being of which it makes merchandise.

[1] The date of the prophecy is in the eleventh year of Jehoiachin's captivity, on the first of the month; the month itself, if we have the true text here, not being given. What can we make of this eleventh year? Is it characterized by not being yet the full twelve, which speaks of the manifest government of God that shall be? In fact, all this judgment of which Ezekiel speaks, falls short of the full end which prophecy for the most part contemplates, though here assuredly there is the shadow of this. The blow has fallen upon Jerusalem, and Tyre is quite ready to take advantage of it. Proud of her position and counting upon her many sources of strength, she can sit apart, hoping to profit by that which she does not dread. But, as God declares to her, it is but a vain dream. The many nations whom she has seen constantly coming to replenish her, are now come up against her with the resistless force of the waves of the sea, to overtop her defences, destroy her walls, and break down her towers. She that hath so often profited by the spoil of the nations, shall be in turn a spoil for the

[2] (7 14): The instrument of destruction.

[2] For thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I will [f]bring from the north, against Tyre, Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, the king of kings, with horses, and with chariots, and with horsemen, and an assemblage and much people. He shall [u]slay with the sword thy daughters in the field; and he shall make [v]forts against thee, and cast up a mound against thee, and raise up the buckler against thee; and he shall set his [w]battering engines against thy walls, and with his weapons shall he break down thy towers. By reason of the [x]abundance of his horses their dust shall cover thee; thy walls shall [y]shake at the noise of the horsemen, and of the wheels and of the chariots, when he shall enter through thy gates as one entereth into a city wherein a breach is made. With the [z]hoofs of his horses shall he tread down all thy streets; he shall [a]slay thy people with the sword, and the [b]pillars of thy strength shall go down to the ground. And they shall make a [c]spoil of thy riches, and make a prey of thy wares; and they shall break down thy walls, and destroy thy [d]pleasant houses; and they shall [e]lay thy stones and thy timber and thy dust in the midst of the waters. And I will f ch. 28. 7. ch. 29. 18. 20. cf. ch. 30. 10, 11. cf. ch. 32. 11, 12. cf. Jer. 27. 6–8.

u ver. 6.
v cf. ch. 21. 22.
w cf. Jer. 32. 24.
x cf. Jer. 47. 3.
y cf. ver. 15. cf. Nah. 2. 3.
z Is. 5. 28. cf. Hab. 1. 8.
a ver. 6.
b cf. Is. 26. 5.
c ver. 5. ch. 27. 3, etc.
d cf. Is. 32. 13, etc. cf. Amos 5. 11.
e cf. Is. 13. 11. cf. Is. 23. 12.

nations; and the judgment of God, carrying further the judgment of man, as her history has fully shown, declares itself in that which has been fully accomplished: "I will scrape her dust from her, and make her a bare rock. She shall be a place for the spreading of nets in the midst of the sea; for I have spoken it, saith the Lord Jehovah." And her doom is to be the declaration of Jehovah's name—the Name which she has despised.

[2] In the first place the instrument of Tyre's destruction is declared to be Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon; but we must not confound with this the full end which Jehovah Himself makes of her, as in the 14th verse. The siege by Nebuchadrezzar was the beginning of the end. There was a revival after this, however, and another siege by the Grecian king Alexander. This brought down her strength effectually, although the remnant of a city remained for a long time, more and more wasting and drying up until the end was reached, when, as we see to-day, nothing but a bare rock was left, used for the spreading of nets only. Nebuchadrezzar is here, however, as all through this part of Ezekiel, the special instrument of the divine judgment.

The name is striking enough in connection with his own history, meaning "the god Nebo's prince;" Nebo being worshiped in Babylon as the interpreter of the gods—answering to the Greek Mercury. The word Nebo is but a form of the Hebrew nabi, "the prophet," and this strikingly connects with the heathen wise men's utter failure to interpret to Nebuchadrezzar the divinely-sent dream which Daniel alone was able to make known. Thus the discredit of Nebo was complete, and this witness of God to Nebuchadrezzar was natural and necessary for one whom God was taking up, in His dealings with the nations around, to make him himself the interpreter of the divine mind as to them; thus out of the dark north was the light to break out, but only as the flash from the storm-cloud. The proper meaning of divine revelation could not be given through him, as is plain; it belonged rather to those who were now under the rod for cause the [e]noise of thy songs to cease; and the sound of thy harps shall be no more heard. And I will make thee a [g]bare rock; thou shalt be a place for the spreading of nets; thou shalt be [h]built no more: for I Jehovah have spoken it, saith the Lord Jehovah.

3 (15, 21): Realizations at the fall of Tyre.

[3] Thus saith the Lord Jehovah to Tyre: Shall not the isles [i]shake at the sound of thy fall when the wounded groan, when the slaughter is made in the midst of thee? And all the [j]princes of the sea shall come down from their thrones, and lay aside their robes, and put off their broidered garments: they shall [k]clothe themselves with trembling, they shall sit upon the ground, and shall tremble [every] moment, and be astonished at thee. And they shall take up a [l]lamentation for thee, and say to thee, How art thou destroyed that wast [m]inhabited from the seas, the [n]renowned city, which wast strong in the sea, she and her inhabitants, who caused their [o]terror to be on all that haunt it! Now shall the isles tremble in the day of thy fall; yea, the isles that are in the sea shall be troubled at thy departure. For thus saith the Lord Jehovah: When I shall make thee a [p]desolate city like the cities that are not inhabited; when I shall bring up the deep upon thee, and the great [q]waters shall cover thee, then will I bring thee down with them that go down to the [r]pit, to the people of old time, and will make thee to dwell in the lower parts of the earth, in places desolate of old,* with them that go down to the pit, that thou be not inhabited; and I will set [s]glory in the land of the living. And I will make thee a terror, and thou

* Or, "like places long desolate."

e cf. Is.14.11. cf. Jer 7.34. cf. Jer.16.9 cf. Hos 2.11.
g ver. 4. cf. Mt. 11. 20-23.
h cf. Mal.1.4.
i ver. 18. ch 27.28,35. ch. 31. 16. ch. 32. 10.
j ch.27.29-36 Is. 14. 9, etc.
k cf. Ps. 132. 18. cf. Ex. 15. 14 16.
l cf. Rev. 18. 11, 19.
m cf. Rev.18. 19. ch. 27. 25. etc. Is. 60. 5.
n ch. 27. 3. cf. Is. 23. 4, 5, 8.
o cf. ch.32.27.
p ver. 12, etc. etc. Is. 62. 11, 12.
q ver. 3.
r ch.32.18-32. cf. Lk.10.15. s cf. ch. 28. 25, 26 with Is. 4. 5. cf. ch. 39. 25-29.

their sins, yet the recipients of promises which should be, and shall be, fulfilled when Babylon and all that has succeeded it should have passed away.

In the meantime no effectual resistance was possible; it only rendered the destruction of those that opposed themselves more complete. As the prophet speaks here, the breach in Tyre had already been made for him by their sins. Her stones, her timber and her dust were now to be laid in the midst of the waters; the noise of her songs was to cease, and all her pomp and glory were to perish together. As already said, however, the complete end would wait for many generations.

[3] The lessons of such a fall need hardly be dwelt upon. They are felt instinctively by all that are in the presence of them, while, as unwelcome, they are dismissed as quickly as possible. The lessons of God's school are too humiliating to man to be welcomed by him. He may perforce accept the sentence of condemnation upon himself, and the passing away of all the false glory which he would fain make true, but cannot. The sentence of God is upon it; but, as He says here, that He may set true glory in the land of the living. The earth is at present little like this; it is rather the sepulchre of the dead; what man conceives as glory is largely that of those who have been in an eminent way the

2 (xxvii.): Its means of revenue and dissolution.
1 (1–11): Its sources of greatness.

shalt be no more; and thou shalt be [t]sought for, and shalt never be found again forever, saith the Lord Jehovah.

2. [1]And the [u]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying: And thou, son of man, take up a [v]lamentation for Tyre, and say unto Tyre: O thou that dwellest at destroyers of mankind. Blessed be God, all this has indeed to pass away; that which can be shaken is to be removed, in order that that which cannot be shaken may remain, and our kingdom is in that which cannot be shaken.

[t] ch. 27. 36. ch. 28. 19.
[u] ch. 26. 1, etc.
[v] ver. 32. ch. 26. 17. cf. Amos 5. 1.

2. We have now an analysis of all the sources of greatness such as we see in Tyre, together with the announcement of its bereavement and desolation; in fact, its own rowers bringing it into the deep waters in which it is to find shipwreck. It is a picture which God has put before us in much detail, and had we eyes to see more into it, we should assuredly realize its meaning for ourselves; for while Tyre itself has passed away, no one can doubt that it has had many successors in the generations following, and that to-day the world is largely characterized by what we find in it. There are certain characteristics about it also which naturally enlist men's sympathies. Tyre was not a great conqueror as Assyria or Babylon. It does not express to us the despotic tyranny of man over man which we see so much of in the history of the world. The activities that we find in it have very much the character of ministry to the need of others; they are employed in making the best of all man's resources and spreading abroad everywhere the products of his hands and of his intellect. The merchants are in our day more and more realized as the princes of the earth, and the rule of commerce is looked at very much as meaning the rule of civilization and the elevation of the nations generally to more equality, causing the brotherhood of man to be more realized in that which gives each his place in service to the common good. It does not take deep looking into it to realize that it is self-interest which stirs everywhere in it, a motive which is at once intensely powerful and readily communicating itself also to others. Persuade a man that it is his own interest that you are seeking—how readily in general will he be accessible to such a motive! And in this sense only it is a civilizer as prompting men to follow that which is to be personal gain, and thus spreading abroad a civilization which, however, has been reached in another way. And the gain must be of a sort which the lowest can realize. However man may value intellect, with the mass, appeals to the intellect in any other way than personal gain have very little power. They are comparatively few who are much moved by intellectual appeals, save as it can be shown that it may be made to minister to the gratification of the lower senses. Religion again is that which it is evident should be most powerful in its appeal to man; and it is true that almost everywhere man's conscience responds to it. You do not find in the masses the casting off of God, but, on the other hand, you do not find in the masses anything like a spirit of real obedience to Him. He will make his bow, and go his own way; or he will give his money, and pay a good price to be allowed to do so; but a real religious nation has yet to be found.

Yet, after all, in the revelation of God to man's conscience is found the true springs of power for the proper development of man as man, such as is alone worth speaking of as civilization. Here, mind and heart go together, and under its influence is developed a man, not a monster. Here the mind of man fully wakes up, as we may see if we will, in the track of light which the Bible leaves behind it wherever it has been. What would not we attain were we only true with the truth and to Him who gave it to us! But we are not, alas! The children of light are everywhere but a small minority; and more than this, alas, as we have divine authority for saying, "The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light." These can concentrate themselves without distraction upon objects which appeal to them in the deepest way, and the power of worldly interests over the people of God themselves may well assure us, if we need any assurance, of what they must be to those with whom they are their all. The light once introduced will be true to its own nature; and as all the fruits of the earth develop only under the light of heaven, so the mind of man awakened by the truth manifests its God-given power in a way which wakes up others, who nevertheless are not themselves truly under its influence. These can discern just so much as serves their worldly interests, and even pursue further in this direction what those truly wiser let slip in mere carelessness out of their hands. And thus it is that unbelief can assert to-day that natural science belongs to it, while it gives at the same time that peculiar twist which turns it into the enemy of the truth itself.

So Christianity has manifested itself in such a way that to-day the great powers of the earth have become "Christian nations." Yet this must be read in another way that it may be seen in its rightful aspect. Alas, we must say, that the "Christian" powers have become powers of the earth. Everywhere, what we see is, that instead of the grace which is really the Christian spirit—the grace which grace has taught and which makes gracious, the spirit of self-sacrifice for others, such as the cross is the great example of—there is in fact in every kingdom of the earth to-day the spirit of gain, the opposite of self-sacrifice, everywhere dominant. Men may talk of altruism in the same way as heathen philosophers themselves could read excellent moral lessons to their pupils, but if you expect the practice you must be sanguine indeed. We must expect nothing of this sort in the mass until Christ comes, or that any other principle will rule the world save the Canaanitish principle which is exemplified here in Tyre—of selfish gain. No doubt, with it all, a certain progress results; certain fruits even of Christianity itself, though plucked half-ripened from that which they grew upon, are made available to a continually increasing number, while the fruits of intellect merely are still more made to serve, as they are amply able to serve, the lust of acquirement. The way in which the Spirit of God in Ezekiel dwells upon all this in the prophecy before us, may assure us of what interest it should have for us in following it out; yet how little has been the interest! Commentators are mostly content to point out what has been plain enough upon the surface, how all the treasures of the earth are heaped up in Tyre, and how all the nations around are made to minister to her; little more indeed do they give us except scraps of geography and history, which may be good enough for the historian, but which for the prophet, we may be sure, could have little that was attractive. What we do find here is certainly a moral and spiritual analysis of what so much constitutes the world of to-day, the world of mammon; and if we profit rightly by it, we must look into our own hearts and search out what is there, for the lusts of the flesh are native to us, alas, and "all that is in the world," as the apostle tells us, is "the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life; "fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind."

the [w]entry of the sea, trafficker with the peoples in [x]many isles, thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Thou hast said, O Tyre, I am [y]perfect in beauty. Thy borders are in the [z]heart of the seas, thy builders have perfected thy beauty. Of cypresses* of [a]Senir they have made all thy planks; [b]cedars from Lebanon have they taken to make masts for thee. Of the w ch. 26. 17. Is. 23. 2.

* The ordinary word for firs, but which would include the cypress; for which Senir was noted (Sirach 24:13).

x vers. 12, etc. Is. 23. 8, 11. cf. Rev. 18. 3, etc.
y vers. 4, 10, 11. cf. ch. 28. 12. ctr. Ps. 50. 2. cf. Is. 23. 9.
z ch. 26. 5.
a cf. Deut. 3. 9.
b cf. 1 Ki. 5. 1, 6; cf. Ps. 104. 16.

[1] The ship is used allegorically here as picturing Tyre for us, a most natural figure, which we use still when we speak of the "ship of state," thinking in this of the needed power and skill that must be put forth in human effort to make it prosper, to catch favoring winds and avoid shoals and rocks. We should surely expect to find this vividly pictured here, and the moral character of things brought out; this state in Tyre, being a commercial one, having its true image, therefore, in every vessel sailing from its port. We may say that man has been working at this ship ever since, doing his best to perfect its beauty; and how attractive it may be we realize in the exhibitions which it is continually affording us of all the productions of nature and of man which it brings together, and, as it were, embodies in itself the restless, ever-craving spirit of man, the untiring energy which works in him.

We have the materials of the vessel first, from which we go on to see the character of the crew that mans it; then its merchandise, the prizes which it holds up to others and for which it works itself.

We have first the material of the vessel's frame-work: "Of cypresses of Senir they have made all thy planks. Cedars from Lebanon have they taken to make masts for thee." The word for "cypresses" is not confined to what we now call cypress; it would apply to the whole fir tribe to which the cypresses belong, but Senir or Hermon was in fact renowned for these (Sirach xxiv. 13), and their wood was of the best for the kind of work contemplated here. Hermon designated here by its Amorite name, means, as we have seen elsewhere, "the ban," the exterminating curse upon evil. It was the mountain which, with its white dome, dominated the land of Israel, and from which, in most expressive connection, the river Jordan, the river of death, ran down to the sea of judgment, the salt sea. It was that which marked out the tenure upon which Israel held the land, as seen in the extermination of the Canaanite out of it, which was the preservation of that awful purity of which its dome, rising like a great white throne above all else, naturally spoke. Notable it seems that Senir, the Amorite name, should be used here instead of Hermon. Senir is said to mean "cuirass," "coat of mail," from senar, "to clang, clatter," a notable comment, as it seems, of the Amorite talker upon that Israelitish ban. Senir, then, furnishes the funereal cypress as material for the ship of Tyre. No wonder if the issue is a funeral!

Lebanon, which means "white," is the range of which Hermon is the southern point; the same image would suggest the same solemn thought. This furnishes the cedar-masts upon which is hoisted the sail to carry the ship of commerce forward in its career. From Bashan come the oars, as the propelling force which alone could be duly trusted in those days: a strength not derived from God, but from native energy—"well fed," as was proverbial of that which came

[c] oaks of Bashan have they made thine oars; they made thy rudder of [d] ivory inlaid in pine* from the isles of Chittim. Of fine linen with broidered work from [e] Egypt was thy sail†, to serve thee for an [f] ensign;

* A peculiar and difficult sentence: hatches, deck, benches, have all been suggested instead of rudder; and cedar or boxwood instead of pine. † Or, "was spread forth."

[c] cf. Is. 2. 13. cf. Zech. 11. 2.
[d] cf. Gen. 10. 4. cf. 1 Ki. 10. 18. ver. 15.
[e] 1 Ki. 10. 28. cf. Is. 19. 9.
[f] cf. Ps 74. 4. etc. Is 59.19.

from Bashan. We need not wonder to find human energy emphasized in this way, almost at the outset.

After the oars comes the rudder, as the word probably means, though there is a doubt about it; but we would not expect it to be left out, as otherwise must be the case. The steering of a vessel is surely of the first importance; it must have lessons for us if lessons there be everywhere here. The word used, however, is keresh, "planking." A specific word for "rudder" there does not seem to be in the Hebrew. It is taken here collectively by most, perhaps, either for the benches for the rowers, or for the deck; but, in connection with what has immediately preceded it, this view would have little apparent significance. The suggestion that it is the thick plankwork which forms the scaffold of the mast, argues no better for our purpose. Meyer suggests "table-work, wainscoting for the laying out of the ship." It is Rashi who suggests "the helm," which, says Schroeder, "recommends itself more than the others, on account of its importance for the vessel and its suitableness in respect to the adorning that follows." There is some difficulty also in connection with this, but it is generally taken as meaning that it was of ivory inlaid in pine, box-wood, or cedar. That some kind of wood is intended, is obvious, and the word for it seems to intimate what is straight, as pine or cedar would be. It being from the isles of Chittim also, that is, from Cyprus, reminds us that the Cyprian pines were especially noted as ship-building material.

All this is serviceable for us, mainly in ascertaining, if we may, the spiritual significance; and if Chittim be Cyprus, as is generally allowed, then it stands for all that is fair and lovely in nature, the sweet influences which are apt to rule the heart, rigorously enough it may be, and be to it what Chittim means, "the breakers down," destroying the true response of the heart to Him from whom all natural blessings come. But how such influences do guide, in one way or another, the course of the ship of commerce, while there are master-needs indeed which must be met, and which must in a certain sense control. Yet how much there is of ministry to pleasure merely, and to luxury! How much of all the material of trade goes to this end! And the guidance of the ship must be accordingly.*

Next, we have either the sail or ensign, or most probably the sail which is at the same time the ensign; and this gives the fullest moral significance. Egypt provides for this the fine linen, which everywhere speaks of practical righteousness—necessarily here as the world recognizes it; while it is ostentatiously put forth as "embroidered," to attract the eye. Your personal interests, it would say, are to be cared for with all uprightness, and here is something quite need-

* This influence of the pleasant, gentle and soft as a guide, is seen in the loosing of the ship in which Paul was carried as a prisoner to Rome, from Fair Havens, when "the south wind blew softly" (Acts 27: 8, etc.). Such a "rudder" or guide resulted in the disastrous voyage and shipwreck of the ecclesiastical vessel of which the ship was a type.—S. R.

blue and purple from the isles of [g]Elishah was thine awning. The inhabitants of [h]Zidon and [i]Arvad were thy rowers; thy [j]wise men, O Tyre, were in thee, they were thy pilots. The elders of [k]Gebal and the wise men thereof were repairing thy leaks; all the [l]ships of the sea with their mariners were in thee to barter with thee. [m]Persia and Lud and Phut were in thine

g cf. 1 Chr. 1. 7.
h cf. Gen. 10. 15. cf. ch. 28 21.
i cf. Gen. 10. 18. ver. 11.
j cf. 1 Ki 5. 6. cf. 1 Ki 9. 27.
k Ps. 83. 7.
l cf. Rev. 18. 19. m ch. 38. 5; ch. 30. 5; cf. Gen. 10. 6; cf. Is. 66. 19.

ful to enable the vessel at the same time to catch the wind and minister to its own. Is it not, in fact, for its own interests to serve yourself? How can you sever these? Thus you have the best possible security that your interests will be served. This interweaving of argument is often very elaborate, as we know.

Last of all here the good ship needs a covering, and the idea is, to protect it from the sun. The isles of Elishah furnish this in the purple colors, which speak of earthly dominion, whether this may refer to the powers of the world, whose protection she may fairly claim as servant to all their interests, or whether it refer to the claim of dominion on her own part, her power rooting itself so firmly as it does in the interests of the many. In the language of the day, she is abundantly insured in this way; but, whether it be the men or the measures by which she insures herself, how much its motto finds adoption in the principle held secretly, if not openly, that "God has forgotten." This seems to be the meaning of Elishah here; and is not this the secret of the abundant care which everywhere the world must take of itself?—that which the serpent taught man in Eden; and the question as to God once raised, man's hand is immediately lifted to pluck for himself the fruit, though forbidden. That "God helps those who help themselves" means, in the ear of faith, that God can be trusted no more.

Next comes the manning of the vessel, in which, significantly, Zidon, "the taker of prey," and Arvad, "the runner loose," are the rowers. She will often have to trust this human energy and skill when the winds of heaven will do nothing for her. The motives and the character indicated do not commend themselves to heaven; so we need not wonder. The master-mind, the controlling power is that of Tyre herself. We have the repairers next; very necessary indeed when human machinery is so constantly wearing out. These are the elders of Gebal, from a word which means "to plait," "combine," "twist together." Plenty of this work has to be done for the stopping of leaks and much else in this way. Finally, we see in this ship of trade how common interests, as it is boasted, bring the world together. "All the ships of the sea" are in her, as if all were one vessel to serve her purposes and to carry on the civilization of the world upon the ground of the common brotherhood of man and the conservation of the universal good.

Yet the vessel of commerce must be prepared for the conflict also, and it has many a battle to fight. And we see her armament for this: First of all, Pharas (Persia), "division," reminding us of the old motto, "Divide and conquer"—a very reliable one, surely. Next we have Lud (not the Shemite of Gen. x. 22, but the Mizraimite or Egyptian of Gen. x. 13), which may mean, as it is taken to mean, "strife." Thus if Pharas speaks of manœuvering and diplomacy, Lud speaks of preparation for more open war; while Put (or Phut) is given either as "trampling down," or else "despising," or "rejection." One may be tempted to think here of the crowding out of all separate interests of those who army, thy men of war: they [n]hanged the shield and helmet in thee; they gave thee splendor. The children of [o]Arvad with thine army were upon thy walls round about, and the Gammadim were on thy towers: they hanged their shields upon thy walls round about, they perfected thy beauty.

n ver. 11. cf. 1 Ki. 10. 16, 17. cf. 2 Chron. 12. 9-11.
o ver. 8.

do not belong to the combination which trade favors and which favors trade, a thing for which, in its extreme form, "boycotting" is the name to-day. Then the sons of Arvad are seen upon the walls round about, a careless and unscrupulous crowd, while the Gammadim, who are in her towers, may be "guards," as the Septuagint calls them, and thus speak of the constant spirit of watchfulness which in all this and at all times has to be maintained. This would give a consistent sense, but there are other conjectures which seem only that.

[2] Now, as to the merchandise. What can be said of it for edification, which all Scripture is to serve? Is it a mere catalogue, an inventory of where, as a matter of history, she found the goods with which she traded, and of the goods themselves? Little else seems ever to have been made of it, but are we not warranted to seek for something more? Certainly the difficulties are greater here than elsewhere, and any interpretation that may be proffered will doubtless be stamped as visionary by the many who shrink from allegory with the aversion that Israel themselves had to Ezekiel's parables. Yet if the choice is to be between an absolute giving up of such scriptures as these, or seeking in them what we are positively assured all Scripture has (2 Tim. iii. 16, 17), what is the position for faith to take? Plenty of difficulties there are, of course. What we have here is, upon the surface, just a catalogue of lands or peoples with their produce with which they traded, and there seems no moral element in them, nor in the fact of the trading either. We are indeed to buy the truth and not to sell it; but this is not in question here. The wares embraced otherwise all kinds of material; for what is there a man will not sell who will sell his soul to satisfy the craving of a moment? To how much of all this should we be able to assign a spiritual meaning that shall stand the test of sober, judicial reflection? And if mistakes are too many or too serious, will it not cast doubt upon the whole inquiry? Yet, with all this, it would seem to some less serious than to own that in the word of God there are large portions here and there to which no spiritual meaning can be assigned—portions which might vanish entirely from the pages they occupy, and Scripture be rather bettered for their absence. If they are not "for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness," then why should they be found in the word of God at all?—which is not a mere history, but God's word, to which we must neither add, nor diminish from it.

Coming now to consider the commerce of Tyre and what it represents for us, we find Tarshish coming first and last in the list, apparently giving character to the whole. It is important therefore to know just what Tarshish means. The derivation is mostly understood to be from rashash, "to break down," or if in the hiphil, "to cause to break down;" but the word is usually taken as a noun, and as meaning "fortress," which involves another and apparently altogether conjectural meaning of rashash. The "breaker down" seems also to give nothing that plainly connects with what we have here. On the other hand, Tarshish may be a compound word, the first syllable from the verb tur, "to go

2 (12-25): Its commercial activity.

2 [p] Tarshish traded with thee by reason of the abundance of all kinds of riches: with [q] silver, iron, tin, and lead, they traded for thy wares. [r] Javan, [s] Tubal and p ch. 38. 13. cf. 1 Ki. 10. 22, etc.

q cf. Is. 60. 9. cf. Jer 10. 9.
r Gen. 10. 2, 4; cf. Dan. 8. 21. s cf. ch. 32. 26; cf. ch. 38. 2, 3.

about," and thus "to explore," "search out," or even sometimes "to traffic." The second syllable may then be shesh, which means "white marble" or "white linen," the common element of which plainly is "white," or as it is suggested, "shining;" and here we find what at first sight seems singularly in keeping with all that is before us.

Tarshish was the second son of Javan, as Javan was the fourth son of Japheth, the typical Gentile by whose seed the isles of the Gentiles were divided. Javan is thus in character the wanderer from God, as the Gentile plainly was. There is not in him the positive opposition that we find in the sons of Ham, and in Noah's prophecy the two are widely distinguished in God's ways of dealing with them. "God will make room for Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem"—a partaker of the revelation of which Shem is the depositary. But in the meanwhile he is away from God, busy and making room for himself. He spreads abroad unfettered; but Javan, whose name in its root-meaning gives the thought of "boiling," "bubbling," or "fermentation," seems akin to yayin, "wine." Greece,* which Javan confessedly represents, was the land of wine, given over to the worship of Bacchus; and in its light-heartedness, its poetry, and even its philosophy, bears witness of a kind of intoxication of spirit which would answer to the name.

Javan's first-born is Elishah, "God has forgotten," which is always the thought in a soul which has forgotten Him. His second son is Tarshish; and, according to what has been already said as to the derivation, naturally speaks of one who goes out from the presence of God, a seeker on his own account, attracted by everything that is shining or conspicuous. He is seeking to satisfy himself with that which never satisfied any; but thus we can understand the energy that he puts into it, so that he is the ideal explorer, and the riches of the earth become his own. He has, as we see here, silver, the current money of the merchant; iron, the great material for manufacturing implements, and we have had enough talk about "the iron age," to recognize what it stands for. Then he has tin, which is literally "alloy," and which, however serviceable for men's ends, is in Scripture described as impurity, as much that seems very serviceable surely is. Lastly we have lead, which in Scripture scarcely stands for anything but dross or weight. There is no gold in this catalogue; but, on the other hand, while not noticed in this connection, there is in Tarshish a precious stone which we have had before us as the topaz, and which gives a similitude for the wheels of the cherubic vision. That it should not be noticed in this connection seems striking here. It is not part of his merchandise. Is it not rather a witness from God to himself? For with all his eager hunt after something that will satisfy, the stamp of vanity is upon it all, as the topaz wheel bears witness. How plain indeed the moral, and how significant, even, that it should be omitted here! Just the one thing, one might say, omitted from the inventory of the wealth of Tarshish. But Tarshish is the foremost contributor to Tyre's commerce, and gives, as what is introductory mostly does in Scripture, the character of all that follows. Here is the restless spirit of one

* Literally, "Ionia."—S. R.

Meshech, they were thy traffickers: they bartered with thee the [f]persons of men* and vessels of bronze. They of the house of [u]Togarmah traded for thy wares with [v]horses and steeds† and mules. The sons of [w]Dedan were thy traffickers: many [x]isles were the mart of thy hand: they brought thee in exchange‡ horns of [y]ivory and ebony. [z]Syria was thy merchant for the multitude of thy handiworks:§ they traded for thy wares with [a]carbuncles, purple, and broidered work, and fine linen, and coral,‖ and rubies. [b]Judah

* Lit., "Soul of man." † Or, "riders." ‡ Or, "As a present."
§ Lit., "works." ‖ Lit., "Precious things."

f cf. Rev. 18. 13. cf. Joel 3. 3. u Gen. 10. 3. ch. 38. 6.
v cf. Is. 31. 1, etc.
w ver. 20. Gen. 10. 7. Gen. 25. 3. Jer. 49. 8.
x cf. Is. 60. 9.
y 1 Ki. 10. 22. cf. Rev. 18. 12.
z Gen. 10. 22. cf. Gen. 28. 5.
a cf. ch. 28. 13.
b cf. Acts 12. 20.

adrift from God—a prodigal. How often are "the substantial gains of commerce," as they are called, but prodigal wasting of the Father's goods!

We have Javan next, with Tubal and Meshech, who belong to the same order, and are indeed brethren. Tubal means "issue." Tubal-Cain is but another Cain, a continuation of the one who first sought to take possession of the earth and build his city there. We may remember Tubal-Cain as the instructor of every artificer in brass and iron, who thus contributes to the civilization of the city which Cain has built. A similar thought we have in Ahab, whose name means "brother of his father," again one in whom heredity clearly holds its place and shows its full value. Thus Tubal here. Meshech, elsewhere associated with him in Scripture, means "a drawing out," as of seed from the basket of the sower; hence, "a sowing." In connection, the two together look backward and forward; they tell—how surely!—as the beginning so shall be the end. Not that there is not progress; there truly is; but progress in this way, and in fallen man, is scarcely to be boasted in. So we find these three sellers here with their vessels of brass and human chattels also. We shall see how prominent these are in the great confederacy against Jehovah and Israel of which Ezekiel speaks later.

We have next Togarmah, which no doubt is Armenia, the third son of Gomer, Ashkenaz and Riphath being the other two. None of the three is known as to its derivation, and only Togarmah as the people for whom it stands. This vagueness makes all else about it doubtful for our purpose.

Next we have the sons of Dedan, which, if it has the meaning we have before ascribed to it, is of that "progress," such as it is, which the world can show. It is remarkable that what they trade in is in general what is used for purposes of veneer—an outside which does not truly indicate what is beneath. How much of what is called education goes for this, and how much of what is counted civilization consists in it!

Next we have Aram, child of Shem though he is, but fallen from the blessedness of this, and who, instead of speaking of Him whom God constantly exalts, and finding his own exaltation in Him, has learned the fatal habit of self-exaltation (see Judges iii. 8, Notes); and who, enriched with many a precious thing from the divine goodness, would fain exchange them for Tyre's manufactured articles. Nophek, here, from a word which means "to blow up a fire," is thought to mean a precious stone of a glowing, ruddy hue, probably a carbuncle; thus it may speak of what One who suffered in the fire has produced in glory to God.

and the land of Israel, they were thy traffickers: they bartered with thee [c]wheat of Minnith, and sweet cakes, and [d]honey, and oil, and balm. [e]Damascus dealt with thee because of the multitude of thy handiworks,* by reason of the abundance of all kinds of riches, with [f]wine of Helbon, and white wool. Vedan and Javan of Uzal traded for thy wares with wrought iron; [g]cassia and calamus were among thy merchandise. Dedan was thy trafficker in [h]coverings spread

c cf. Deut. 8. 8.
d cf. Ex. 3. 8.
e Gen. 15. 2, etc.
f cf. Hos. 14. 7.
g cf. Ex. 30. 23, 24.
h cf. Lev. 15. 9.

* Or, "works."

Purple speaks of the royal crown which followed the cross. Then the broidered work, which may well image the Spirit's embroidery of the new creature, far surpassing that of which the psalmist speaks (Ps. cxxxix. 15) when he applies the same word to the work of the old creation. Next we have the fine linen, which is ever in Scripture practical righteousness, or what stands for this. Then what is considered to be coral, literally, "heights" (surely not from the great price paid for it, as some suppose, but rather from its manner of growth), and which, as found in the sea, gives us heights out of the depths, as we may say; and how much more than can be expressed is implied here! Finally, we have kadkod, "the sparkler," another gem. Whatever it was, whether jasper, garnet, ruby, or agate, the Lord's promise to His people of making their windows "agates," shows that it was to some good extent transparent, and naturally suggests, as typical of a future blessing, the visions of glory that shall surely come. All this may be significant enough as the portion of a fallen Shemite, which, alas, he is ready to barter—for what? It is not said; and silence is surely more significant than speech—goods of Tyre's own manufacture, that is enough to say.

But Judah too is here in line with the rest; Judah too will barter her wheat of Minnith (her own "portion") and her dainties of honey and oil and balm. There needs little skill to interpret this; we need not emphasize the sorrowful way in which the people of God will barter away what is their own portion—and again, for what?

Damascus follows, as Aram preceded. It is but another form of Aram (see 2 Sam. viii. 6, Notes), and speaks of elevation by activity, being itself a noted place of traffic. Its contributions are the wine of Helbon, "fatness"—the stimulus of successful self-enrichment, and the whiteness of its wool which has been shorn from the sheep.

The next sentence is again more or less doubtful. The merchandise, however, speaks strongly for Arabia, and Vedan may be Aden, which, although there is no full certainty about it, has come generally to be accepted: and Aden was celebrated as a commercial emporium from very ancient times. The wrought iron may remind us, as one has suggested, of the sword-blades of Yemen, as Uzal was the ancient name of Sanaa, its capital. Cassia and calamus are also Arabian products. If Javan and Uzal both speak in different ways of man's departure from God, it may remind us of what in Scripture is devoted to Him now turned aside to self-indulgence, while the wrought iron may speak of the many inventions which man attributes to necessity as their mother, but which God attributes to his departure from original uprightness, by which he has got into necessity (Eccl. vii. 29).

out for riding. [i]Arabia and all the princes of Kedar were the merchants of thy hand: in [j]lambs, and rams, and goats, in these did they trade with thee. The merchants of [k]Sheba and Raamah were thy traffickers: they traded for thy wares with all the choice [l]spices, and with all precious stones and gold. [m]Haran, and [i] 1 Ki. 10. 15; Jer. 25. 24.

[j] Is. 60. 7.
[k] cf. 1 Ki. 10. 1-13.
[l] Is. 60. 6, etc.
[m] Gen. 10. 10; Gen. 11. 31, 32.

Now comes again Dedan, though probably another, the Edomite, not the Arabian; as some have thought there may be also a connection between them. That the men of what is counted "progress" should furnish riding-cloths for others than themselves is not to be wondered at, and even as Edomites they may serve Israelites in this way. God is above all the world's ways to serve their own ends, and makes them serve Himself, and thus serve His people in some ways, after all.

Arabia and Kedar, "darkness," in their meaning are connected by ereb, "evening," the time of darkness, and thus of mixture when the forms of darkness are abroad. Naturally enough the two peoples sell sheep and lambs, though they may often quite rightly sell goats also.

Sheba and Raamah then come together. They are remarkable as being the first Cushite or indeed Hamitic people named, with the exception probably of one of the Dedans, in whom the opposition to God and to the light may be expected fully to show itself. Accordingly we find, first, Sheba, "captor," in whom we may read the great enemy of God and man. It would be strange if he who leads men captive made no more contribution than we have seen to Tyre's merchandise. Here he makes notable contribution by his merchandise, and with him is associated Raamah, "rumbling," "trembling," "agitation," "thunder," and Raamah is the father of Sheba, while named second here. In these two names together there is as much truth as one can find in what is often said, that fear is the parent of all religion. It will be readily allowed, of course, that there is a fear of God which is the beginning of wisdom, and that reverential fear is a very different thing from what these names would speak. In all heathenism and superstition fear is that which has complete control, and how much of the sway that Satan has over a soul is found in this! "We have not received the spirit of bondage unto fear," says the apostle to his fellow-Christians, but Satan, as the dread power which works by death, makes men "all their lifetime subject to bondage." Thus we can understand that Raamah is the father of Sheba here; the spirit of fear gives his place to him who holds man captive. God known, as He is in the gospel, and the soul brought into full liberty as in relationship to Him, how thoroughly and forever is the rule of Satan broken, and every form of superstition brought to an end!

It may seem strange to find here what Sheba can make merchandise of. The chief of spicery and all precious stones and gold are in the catalogue. But if this surprises us, we may look on to the book of Revelation and notice Babylon's array: "In purple and scarlet color, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand," and yet "full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication." But in truth, Satan is known by his selling these. He does not buy them, nor has he acquired them aright, nor will he enrich any with them. All through, he is the captor merely, and in his method, the deceiver. God does not sell; He gives. Or if He invites to buy, that is, to come to His terms about that which is to be your own, He is careful to assure us that it is "without money and without price."

Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of [n]Sheba, 'Asshur and Chilmad were thy traffickers. These traded with thee in choice wares, in wrappings of [o]blue and broidered work, and in chests of rich apparel, bound with cords and made of cedar, among thy merchandise.* The [p]ships of Tarshish were thy caravans† for thy merchandise; and thou wast replenished, and made very [q]glorious in the heart of the seas.

3 (26-36): The transformation of its glory.

[3] Thy [r]rowers have brought thee into great waters: the [s]east wind hath broken thee in the heart of the seas. Thy 'substance and thy wares, thy merchandise, thy mariners and thy pilots, they that repair thy leaks, and they that barter with thee, and all thy men of war that are in thee, with all thine assemblage which is in the midst of thee, shall fall into the heart of the seas in the day of thy [u]ruin. At the sound of the cry of thy [v]pilots the open places shall shake. And all that handle the oar, the mariners, all the pilots of the sea, shall come down from their ships; they shall stand upon the land, and shall cause their voice to be heard over thee, and shall [w]cry bitterly; and they shall cast up dust upon their heads; they shall wallow themselves in ashes. And they shall make themselves bald for thee, and gird themselves with sackcloth; and they n cf. Ps. 72. 10, 15.

o cf. ch. 23. 6.
p cf. Ps. 48. 7. cf. Is. 2. 16.
q cf. Is. 23. 1-11.
r cf. Is. 33. 23. cf. Acts 27. 11, 12.
s cf. Jer. 18. 17.
t ch. 26. 12.
u ch. 26. 14, 21. cf. Is. 23. 9. cf. Jer. 47. 4. cf. Amos 1. 9, 10. cf. Zech. 9. 3, 4.
v ch. 26. 16, 15. cf. Ex. 14. 23-25.
w cf. Rev. 18. 17, etc. ch. 26. 16.

* This might be rendered, "Treasures of costly raiment, bound with cords and packed, among thy merchandise."

† Or, "visited thee."

Next and really last in this catalogue, we have Haran, "the parched," "the dry," but he is associated with Kanneh, "the firm," "the upright," and also with Eden, the place of "delight" lost from earth; for, alas, these are still but the merchants of Sheba, doing his work with Asshur, the Shemite, who has lost his place in connection with the revelation of God, and is wandering among the perverted traditions of men, and with Chilmad who, as the word seems to mean, points out the "quasi learner." Their traffic is in rich apparel, by which the nakedness of the fall is done away, nay, covered over with adornment, and of which, as we see by the carefully packed bales that are noticed here, they evidently made much.

The analysis ends here, save only that we find how that the ships of Tarshish are the one great means to unite all these together. It is all indeed the fruit of a spirit away from God, which therefore explores the earth for whatever it can make gain of, but which, nevertheless, can yield no satisfaction. All is thus united together like their bales of merchandise, by which Tyre is made for the present very glorious, but in the midst of what is the very image of instability, "in the heart of the seas."

3 Now comes the end of all this glory. The very hands by whose power the good ship has been carried on, bring her into great waters, and there the east wind of adversity breaks her helplessly "in the heart of the seas." No skilful management avails any more; no stoppage of leaks can be attempted any more. Useless are the men of war, and all that assemblage which has been gathered in and about her falls into the heart of the seas in the day of her ruin. The shall weep for thee in bitterness of soul with bitter mourning. And in their wailing they shall take up a [z] lamentation for thee, and lament over thee [saying], Who is like Tyre, like her that is brought to [y] silence in the midst of the sea? When thy wares went forth over the seas, thou filledst many peoples; thou didst [z] enrich the kings of the earth with the abundance of thy riches and of thy merchandise. In the time that thou art [a] broken by the seas in the depths of the waters, thy merchandise and all thine assemblage in the midst of thee have fallen. All the [b] inhabitants of the isles are astonished at thee, and their kings are horribly afraid; their countenance is troubled. The merchants among the peoples [c] hiss at thee; thou art become a [d] terror, and thou shalt never be any more.

3 (xxviii. 1-10) The prince who glorifies himself as God.

3. And the [e] word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, say unto the [f] prince of Tyre, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Because thy heart is [g] lifted up, and thou hast said, I am a [h] god, I sit in the seat of God, in the heart of the seas—and thou art a [i] man, and not God—and thou settest thy heart as the heart of God: behold, thou art [j] wiser than Daniel; nothing secret z ch. 26. 17. ch. 32. 16. cf. Rev. 18. 9, etc.

y cf. Is. 16. 9. cf. Lam. 1. 12. cf. Lam. 2. 13.
z ch. 26. 4, 5. cf. Jer. 16. 9 cf. Is. 15. 1.
a cf. Rev. 18. 3, etc.
b ver. 26. ch 26.19-21.
c Is. 23. 5, 6. cf. Jer. 18. 16. cf. Zeph. 2. 15.
d ch. 26. 21.
e ch.27.1,etc.
f cf. ver. 12. cf. Jno. 14. 30.
g vers. 5, 17. ch. 31. 10. Deut. 8. 14. cf. Dan. 4. 30, 37.
h cf. Gen.3.5. cf. Acts 12. 22, 23. cf. 2 Thess. 2. 3, 4.
i cf. Ps. 9. 20; cf. Is. 31. 3; cf. Is. 40. 18-23.
j Dan. 1. 20; Dan. 2. 22, 23; Dan. 5. 11, 12.

cry of the pilots is only one of despair; the open places of the land that might give her refuge, are themselves shaking, and shut out hope, and those who stand afar off in fear for her judgment only recall the glory of the past as those who fain would be incredulous that it is past. So full of help to many, so abundant in the riches continually being distributed, all the inhabitants of the isles are astonished and their kings are horribly afraid, their countenance is troubled. Where shall any find a security that Tyre has not found? All this lamentation is sealed by one single and emphatic word from God: "Thou art become a terror, and thou shalt never be any more."

3. We have now an address to the prince of Tyre, in which we see the effect upon him of the abundance of wealth gathered together and the power implied by this, exalting his heart to a place more than human. "Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Because thy heart is lifted up, and thou hast said, I am a god, I sit in the seat of God, in the heart of the seas; and thou art a man and not God, and thou settest thy heart as the heart of God." Monstrous as all this may be, it is yet, after all, the natural development of what took place in the Garden of Eden itself, when the temptation presented by the evil one was distinctly, "Ye shall be as God." No doubt this was to be a moral likeness—"knowing good and evil;" nevertheless, it was a place usurped, not given by God, and naturally leading to still more open and extreme usurpation. We see in it apparently also reminiscences of the dealings which we know Tyre had had with Israel in Solomon's time, when she had been permitted to contribute to the temple of God in Jerusalem. Solomon sat, as the inspired Word says, "on the throne of Jehovah in Israel" (1 Chron. xxix. 23), His representative in that place. This representative place was given him from God Himself. The prince of Tyre takes it in a carnal fashion, and in independence. With him it is no mere representative authority which might, in the fear of God, be realized by have they hidden from thee; by thy wisdom and by thine understanding thou hast gotten thee *riches, and hast gotten gold and silver into thy treasures; for thy great wisdom thou hast by thy traffic increased thy riches, and thy heart is lifted up because of thy riches. Therefore, thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Because thou hast set thy heart as the heart of God, therefore, behold, I will bring strangers upon thee, the terrible ones of the nations: and they shall draw their swords against the beauty of thy wisdom, and they shall "tarnish thy brightness. They shall bring thee "down to the pit, and thou shalt die the death of those that are slain in the heart of the seas. Wilt thou °yet say before him that slayeth thee, I am God? But thou art man, and not God, in the hand of him that pierceth thee. Thou shalt die the death of the uncircumcised by the hands of strangers: for I have spoken it, saith the Lord Jehovah.

k cf. Hab. 1. 15, 16. cf. Zech. 9. 2-4.

l ch. 26. 7-14. cf. Is 23.8,9. cf. ch.30.11.

m cf. vers. 15-17. cf. Is. 2. 11, 12. cf. Is 23. 9.

n cf. ch. 32. 18-30. cf. Is.38.17.

o ver. 2. cf. Dan. 4. 31, 32.

* Or, "defileth."

any of those "powers that be," of whom the apostle speaks as "ordained of God," so that obedience to the power becomes for the believer obedience to God Himself. In Tyre there was no such sense of responsibility, but the language is according to what we find concerning one who in the last days shall himself sit in the temple of God, "showing himself that he is God." It is the language of Antichrist, of whom the prince of Tyre here is, no doubt, to some extent, a shadow. But what is Antichrist himself except the full manifestation of fallen manhood, with the restraint upon it which God is exercising now, removed, so that the depths of the heart come out? Who that lifts himself up against God but becomes God to himself, in fact, robbing God of the glory which He will not give to another? Incredible it might indeed seem that any could go to the full length of what is here, when manifestly, as he is reminded, he is but a man—and what a nothing is man before God, even the wisest! As to his wisdom amongst men, no doubt he might claim much as searcher out of the secrets of all the earth, and knowing how to use for his purposes all that he acquired. He was "wiser than Daniel," as the prophet says to him; and, as we see, the wisdom of Daniel had reached far already in those days. Daniel had shown himself wise as to the secrets of a monarch's chamber, and could interpret to him the thoughts of his heart, nevertheless it left Daniel in the place of entire subordination to the king to whom he ministered. Here was one who had learned to use his wisdom in his own behalf, to give himself a place amongst men, a greatness which was merely acquired, however, neither innate nor moral, and therefore no real greatness in the sight of God. He had gathered riches into his treasury and continually was increasing them, but to debase himself morally in a way that he was not competent even to estimate. He is incapable of receiving God's judgment of things as they really are, and thus God would have to teach him by men like himself, with a lesson of the sword, marring all his beauty and bringing his brightness to an end. God needed to put forth no manifest divine power against him, the power of men was enough. Would he maintain an argument for his own divinity in the face of the weapons of those who would put him to death? Uncircumcised as he was, having never 4 (11-19): The apostate king.

4. And the [p]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, take up a lamentation over the [q]king of Tyre, and say unto him, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Thou who sealest up the [r]sum, full of wisdom and perfect in beauty, thou wast in [s]Eden, the garden of God; every [t]precious stone was thy covering: the sardius, the topaz and the diamond, the chrysolite, the onyx and the jasper, the sapphire, the carbuncle, and the emerald and gold. The workmanship of thy

[p] ver. 1, etc.
[q] cf. ver. 2, etc.
[r] ch. 27. 3.
cf. Is. 10. 13.
cf. Jer. 9. 23.
[s] cf. Gen. 3. 1, etc.
cf. ch. 31 8, 9.
[t] cf. ch. 27. 16, etc.
ctr. Ex. 28. 17-20.
ctr. Rev. 21. 19, 20.
cf. Lk. 4. 5, 6.

learned the lesson of self-judgment, he would die the death of the uncircumcised by the hand of strangers, and the Lord seals this as the doom which He has pronounced upon him.

4. Nevertheless, for such an one there is a lamentation. If God must execute judgment, He does not smite without recognizing the sorrow of this, which is always His "strange," if necessary, "work." Here was the man enriched with everything that his hand could acquire, nay, with all that God had filled the earth with in the way of beauty: and beauty there is in it, how much beyond any that we apprehend! Who could expect to come after the king in this way? He had "sealed up the sum" of perfection which it seemed impossible for mere man to transcend; full of wisdom he had shown himself; perfect in beauty he had come to be. True, it was for his own interests, and the beauty which he had acquired was but artificial, the result of all that he had heaped together of the world's goods. He had been, as it were, in another Eden, a garden like that of old, stored with everything pleasant to the eye. Nature had for him opened its resources to enrich him with its innermost secrets; nay, it had revealed beauties which are indeed the manifold reflections of perfect light, the source of which is in God Himself. Thus every precious stone was his covering—the exquisite beauty with which God has strewed the earth, and which the fall itself has not removed, although it has dimmed the lustre in which it was meant to shine—this covered him. You could not, as it were, think of the man himself for all the glory that was spread out over him. Moreover, in man himself what beauty is there, and what a capacity for awakening out of the things around him, over which he is sovereign, the hidden capacities everywhere existent, and which he alone has power to evoke to his Creator's praise! Thus the workmanship of his tabrets and of his pipes was in him. In the day that God had created him they were prepared. He was himself the chief of creation, more glorious in himself than all this glory; all the more humbly should he have learned it, as what was from God and therefore for God.

Thus he was "the anointed," that is, as it seems, the "king cherub." Ezekiel has already taught us how to understand this, for the cherubic forms of his vision are predominantly human; and these cherubim show us the working of all this living ministry ordained of God to work out His will and to fulfil His purposes upon the earth. The cherubim upon the mercy-seat, which we have seen interpreted for us by these living creatures, cover the throne of God, and this language is again and again used with regard to them. They emphasized the judgment and the justice which were the habitation of His throne; and, as transformed into the living creatures, the fire of God ran up and down amongst them. From this, in the tenth chapter, the linen-clothed tabrets and of thy pipes was in thee; in the day that thou wast [u]created they were prepared. Thou wast the anointed covering [v]cherub, and I had set thee [so]: thou wast upon the holy mountain of God; thou didst walk up and down in the [w]midst of the stones of fire. Thou wast [x]perfect in thy ways from the day that thou wast created, till [y]unrighteousness was found in thee. By the abundance of thy traffic they filled the midst of thee with violence, and thou hast sinned; therefore have I [z]cast thee as profane out of the mountain of God, and have destroyed thee, O covering cherub, from the midst of the stones of fire. Thy heart u ver. 15. cf. Col. 1. 16. cf. Phil. 2. 10, 11.

v cf. Ex. 25. 17–20. cf. Gen. 3. 24.
w cf. Ex. 19. 18. cf. Ps. 18. 7–10. cf. Is. 6. 1–4.
x vers. 3–5, 12. cf. ch. 27. 3.
y cf. Jude 6, 9. cf. 2 Pet. 2. 4. cf. 1 Tim. 3. 6.
z cf. Is. 14. 12–15. cf. Lk. 10. 18 with Rev. 12. 8, 9; cf. Heb. 2. 14.

man took the coals of fire to scatter over the city in judgment for the desecration of the sanctuary. Thus the stones that covered the cherub himself were, in fact, "stones of fire." In them, as we have many times seen, were the reflections of the divine attributes, which must be revealed in wrath therefore against all profanation of them. So had this king of Tyre been walking as "amidst the stones of fire." However ignorant and however careless, nevertheless his was the responsibility of such a position. His would be the judgment if he abused such a position. It should be plain that much more than the temporary ministry to the temple in Solomon's time is here intended. No doubt the connection of Tyre with the temple in this case was the connection with that revelation of God of which Israel was the depositary; it should have enlightened him fully as to the One with whom he had to do, and brought him consciously into that light in which henceforth he would have seen light.

But it is not merely knowledge that makes us responsible, but the lack of knowledge when we should have had it; how much more, therefore, the lack of availing one's self of the opportunity for knowledge which God is everywhere giving, is in fact pressing upon men! All the beauty of creation was in the temple upon the mountain of God, dedicated to the God of creation, seen in its proper place, and thus with all the beauty which such a place would give it; for the jewel is seen in the light, and God's jewels in the light of God. Yet in these relationships of Tyre with Israel, we have the anticipation of a time to come, when, under a greater than Solomon, "the daughter of Tyre shall be there with a gift." And as we think of Hiram, the Tyrian, the fashioner of things in the temple (the very name of the king of Tyre of that time being his own), how suggestive it is of privileges conferred, and at the same time of responsibilities incurred!

The Lord owns also the blamelessness of her ways in this respect, which in some sense, at least, might well be taken for the time of her creation, putting her as a nation in the place in which she might have availed herself of blessed opportunities, and united herself to the people of God in a way that certainly He on His part would have owned and perpetuated. But the attraction of the world was too great, and the history of man from the beginning repeated itself here. Deceit and violence quickly followed. How we misconceive often as uprightness in man that which is only lack of opportunity; or, let us say, lack of trial sufficient to reveal a man even to himself, and certainly to others! How men can be taken thus with their own beauty, when it is but factitious, a glory with which circumstances only have surrounded one, like the halo of a was lifted up [a]because of thy beauty; thou hast [b]corrupted thy wisdom by reason of thy brightness: I have cast thee to the ground, I have laid thee before kings, that they may behold thee. By the multitude of thine iniquities, by the unrighteousness of thy [c]traffic, thou hast profaned thy sanctuaries: and I have brought forth a fire out of the midst of thee, it hath devoured thee; and I have turned thee to ashes upon the earth in the [d]sight of all them that behold thee. All they that know thee among the peoples shall be astonished at thee: thou art become a terror, and thou shalt [e]never be any more.

a cf. ch. 16. 14, 15.
cf. ch. 31. 10.
cf. Prov. 16. 18.
cf. Rom. 1. 21–23.
b cf. Jer. 8. 9.
c ch. 27. 33.
d cf. Rev. 18. 9.
cf. ch. 26. 17, 18.
e ch. 26. 21.
cf. ch. 27. 35, 36.
cf. Rev. 18. 21.

traditional saint; and the God of truth cannot spare it, while the heart lifted up because of this external beauty is corrupted by it. All the sanctuaries of the soul, or what should be such, become profaned. It is the image of man that appears in them instead of God. Covetousness shows itself as idolatry and thus out of it comes forth the fire which shall surely and finally sweep it all away.

Many have seen in all this account a greater prince depicted than the king of Tyre, and we cannot refuse such application of prophecies which have their most obvious fulfilment near at hand; but this is only the pledge and anticipation of that final one which is always the great thing with God, while man is prone to lose sight of it in what is nearer and therefore larger to his eyes. In all this part of Ezekiel, the judgment at hand by Nebuchadnezzar has indeed a special place; but there are, nevertheless, many intimations in various places, both of final judgment and of final blessing. Here, where the glory of the world has been spread out so before our eyes, it seems fully in place that there should be seen a real prince of it, and in this way some of the things here speak with more fulness than in their first application: thus the fall, by self-occupation and the pride begotten by it—for it was in this way that he who was created an upright and glorious being became an apostate and a devil. The cherub character given him would be more difficult, spite of the common thoughts about angelic cherubs, if we were to take Ezekiel alone. But Daniel reveals the principalities of the earth as angelic, and as having a place in this way from which even their fall has not yet removed them. Thus it is, as the apostle tells us, "with spiritual wickedness in heavenly places" that we are in conflict still, and the book of Revelation shows this just at the time when Satan is cast down from heaven (Rev. xii.). In Job also we are made to realize the cherub place he has. In his accusation of Job, which is all upon the ground of righteousness, as detecting what is false and unreal, he is, as it were, professedly covering the throne of God. And while in Ezekiel the human and other forms of the cherub seem to leave no place for the angelic, yet they in no wise conflict with this, the thought itself of the cherub requiring naturally, as one would say, the angel also as the highest natural creature of God to supplement it. Thus also we may realize the application of what is said of Eden here, though it be gone from the earth, and the stones of fire. What to an angel must be the riches of the earth, which man, prodigal as he is, so little cares to estimate, while he is so busy squandering them! After all, we may well conceive here the great king of Tyre, whose judgment abides a future time, when he too shall be cast out of the mount of God and come to that end which, in the patience of God, so long has tarried.

5 (20-26): Sidon: retributive judgment which acts to deliver Israel from her enemies.

5. And the [f]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, set thy face towards [g]Sidon, and prophesy against it and say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I am [h]against thee, O Sidon, and I will be [i]glorified in the midst of thee; and they shall [j]know that I am Jehovah when I shall have executed judgments in her, and shall be sanctified in her. And I will send pestilence into her, and blood in her streets; and the wounded shall fall in the midst of her by the [k]sword upon her on every side; and they shall know that I am Jehovah. And there shall be no more a pricking [l]brier to the house of Israel, nor a grieving thorn of any that are round about them, that despised them: and they shall know that I am the Lord Jehovah.

Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, When I shall have [m]gathered the house of Israel from the peoples among whom they are scattered, and shall be sanctified in them in the sight of the nations, then shall they [n]dwell in their own land which I gave to my servant Jacob. They shall dwell in it in safety, and shall build houses and plant vineyards; yea, they shall dwell in safety when I have executed [o]judgments upon all those that despised them round about them; and they shall [p]know that I am Jehovah their God.

f ver. 1, etc.
g ch. 32. 30. cf. Is 23.2 4.
h ch. 5.8, etc.
i cf. ch 39.13.
j ver.26,etc.
k cf. ch. 25. 7, 11, 17.
l cf. ch. 26 6. cf. Num.33. 55. cf. Josh. 23. 13. cf. Judg 2.3. cf. Is 35. 9 with Is. 55. 13.
m cf. Is 11.12. cf. Lev. 26. 44, 45. cf. Deut. 30. 3, 4. cf. Ps. 106. 47. cf. Jer 30.18. cf. Hos.1.11. cf. Joel 3. 7.
n ch. 36. 28. cf. Jer.23.8. cf. Lev. 25. 18, 19. cf. Deut. 12. 10. cf. Is. 65. 21, 22. cf. Amos 9. 13, 14.
o cf. Ps. 9. 16.
p ch. 34. 30; cf. Ex. 29. 46.

5. We have now the judgment upon Sidon, as supplementary to the judgment upon kindred Tyre. It is of the briefest, but as the first-born of Canaan, he cannot be overlooked here. Sidon means not distinctively "the fisher," as some say, for which there is no word, but "the taker of prey." Sidon was a great mercantile power before Tyre was known, and thus Homer speaks exclusively of her. In general, Tyre represents the Canaanite character, and therefore Sidon requires briefer notice. But she has been a pricking brier and a grievous thorn in Israel's side; not very formidable, perhaps, through lack of power, but that was not her fault. It is the enmity that God judges here, as elsewhere. Israel has sinned and given occasion to what the malice of others might do and justify themselves in doing. Nevertheless, it was malice, and that against God in His people. Hence, Jehovah should be known by them in judgment simply. In Israel, spite of her terrible failure and sin, He will be known in final grace; it must be in grace, for she can claim nothing, as we know. Can any of us claim anything from God on any other ground? But this only makes it sure that God will cleave to this in which all the interests of man and His own glory are alike concerned. In us He is going to show "the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us through Christ Jesus." Who shall forbid Him this? And how suited that this unrepenting grace should take up Israel also according to the angel's words to Zechariah (Zech. iii.), in which her sin and just condemnation are alike owned: "Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?" True, it is this; but Satan is ever and only the adversary against God as he is against man. But if it is God's will to pluck a brand out of the fire, who shall say Him nay?

Sec. 5.

We have seen, then, the judgment of the world, as represented in Tyre, the merchantman, rich with all that man's energy can pillage from the earth and use with the lavishness of a prodigal who knows not its value—use it also as the prodigal away from his Father's house, and with no reference any more to that Father whom he has forgotten. We come now finally to look at the world in another way, in which however it closely connects with what we have had before. It is a fallen world in the one case and in the other, and the marks of the fall upon it are essentially similar. The soul away from God, having lost faith in Him, must needs have faith in itself, or there would be despair at once. Thus man's competency comes in to meet the defect of God's incompetency, and while taking freely what God has graciously bestowed upon him, he uses it to build himself up in pride and self-sufficiency. We see this unmistakably in Egypt, the lesson of which is as clear as it is fundamental.

Egypt is, as we have seen long since, the land of Mizraim—the double strip: that is, the strip on each side of the river, the overflow of which has formed and enriches it. Wherever we look at it, it is essentially the land of independence, as far as heaven is concerned. The rain seldom falls there; it is not expected. The sources of the river are necessarily in the heavens themselves, but so far off that they are no more thought of, or if speculated about, the speculations themselves are of no great consequence. The practical thing is that the river is there, always there, overflowing at a certain regular time most convenient for man's purposes, giving him little to think about, only how best to guide hither and thither the supply which is thus made his own. Indeed he values himself upon this, that he can direct this abundant water with great wisdom so as to meet with it his own needs. Thus Pharaoh can say, as we see him here doing: "My river is mine, and I have made it." Practically it is the reverse of this, it is the river that has made him. Even the name of the first father of the Egyptians, Mizraim, is given to him, as one would say, by the land to which he owes his all: which is after all but the narrow strip through a desert in constant conflict with it, blowing its sand upon it in such a way as would soon annihilate the whole strip if it were not for the constant overflow of the river. Life is thus in perpetual conflict with death, and the Egyptians, one would say, were in a position to value life and enjoy it. No doubt in a way they did—yet from the earliest times Egypt was, what the earth at large very much is, a place of death rather than of life. Egypt is emphatically the land of tombs. Its literary memorial is a book of the dead. Their great men built their sepulchres with more extravagance than their palaces, for they realized that they were to use them longer; and, almost as if in mockery of themselves, they had their bodies embalmed that they might enjoy their sepulchres!

Thus if death is the stamp upon man's fallen condition, it was not only over all the land of Egypt—it is everywhere—but was emphasized there in a most remarkable way. The very lesson that God would impress upon man, and would have him take to heart, he has taken to show how little his heart is impressed by it, for he remains the same vain, self-confident creature that he ever was. This, alas, is the fundamental moral condition of the fall. All blessing comes from keeping the creature-place, but there is this constant tendency to depart from it, God's mercy being abused to that very end, as we have seen. Thus, in very mercy, must judgment come to abase the pride of man and give him wisdom in the only way possible. This, then, is what we find in the section before us. Egypt is everywhere in Scripture the type of that fallen condition out of which we have been redeemed; in this condition, he who has been

SECTION 5 (Chaps. xxix.-xxxii).

Egypt: the abasement of creature-pride for ever before God.

1 (xxix. 1-16): Causes of the judgment.
1 (1-5): Pride and self-sufficiency.

1. [1] In the [q]tenth year, in the tenth [month], on the twelfth of the month, the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, set thy face against Pharaoh, king of [r]Egypt, and prophesy against him and against all Egypt; speak and say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I am [s]against thee, Pharaoh, king of Egypt, the great monster that lieth in the midst of his rivers,* q ch. 1 2, etc.

r cf. Is. 19. 1. cf. Jer. 25. 19. cf. Jer. 46. 2. 25. cf. chs. 30-32. cf. Joel 3. 19 cf. Zech. 14 18, 19.
s ver. 10, etc cf.r. Rom. 8. 31.

* A word said to be of Egyptian origin, and used almost exclusively of the river Nile.

awakened by the life-giving Spirit of God finds himself in captivity, and out of it he must be redeemed as Israel was redeemed out of Egypt.*

1. We have, first, the causes of the judgment; they are, mainly, two: First, that pride and self-sufficiency itself, of which we have already spoken. Second, that Egypt has been a breaking staff to Israel; a staff of reed, which offered much, but never fulfilled its promises, bringing only ruin to all that trusted it. The going down to Egypt for help was the constant snare of the people of God, though they had been delivered from that land, and seen God's judgment upon it in their own deliverance. Yet they could again and again turn back to it. Alas, it is an inconsistency which not one of us who knows himself can be a stranger to! Happy for those who are taught by any means at last to say, as the apostle says for Christians as such: "We are the circumcision who worship God in the Spirit, and glory in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh." What blessing is implied in such a condition, but how slow we are in reaching it! God must, therefore, for Israel, Himself break this staff that they leaned upon; and although He show mercy in the end, and Egypt is not finally left to judgment, as with Edom or Babylon, yet it must be henceforth a "base," that is, a low kingdom, something that will invite no more the confidence which it has hitherto invited, and be trusted no more by those about it. The lesson is as plain as it is fundamental. It is the lesson, "Cease ye from man whose breath is in his nostrils, for wherein is he to be accounted of?"

[1] The date of the prophecy is the tenth year, and the tenth month, the number of responsibility and of judgment being thus emphasized for us. It is given on the twelfth day of the month, the number which speaks of the manifestation of divine government, as it is manifested here. On this day, says the prophet, "The word of Jehovah came unto me saying, Son of man, set thy face against Pharaoh king of Egypt, and prophesy against him and against all Egypt. Speak and say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Behold, I am against thee, Pharaoh, king of Egypt, the great monster that lieth in the midst of his rivers, who hath said, My river is mine own, and I have made it for myself." Pharaoh is likened here to the crocodile of his rivers, the "long stretched," as the word "monster" here literally means; a creature whom one might think took shape by his river, as the king of Egypt does—an unclean creature at the best; an ungainly one, however huge he may be, and however much the scales which shut him in may give him defence against all that may be adverse. He lies there, in no really who hath said, My [t]river is mine own, and I have made it for myself. And I will put [u]hooks in thy jaws, and I will cause the fish of thy rivers to stick unto thy scales, and I will bring thee up out of the midst of thy rivers, and all the fish of thy rivers shall stick unto thy scales; and I will [v]cast thee forth into the wilderness, thee and all the fish of thy rivers: thou shalt fall upon the open field; thou shalt not be brought together nor gathered: I will give thee for [w]food to the beasts of the earth and to the fowls of the heavens.

* Tyre seems to represent the world in its intercourse and traffic; Egypt in its isolation and authority.—S. R.

2 (6-12): A breaking staff to Israel.

[2] And all the inhabitants of Egypt shall know that I am Jehovah, because they have been a [x]staff of reed to the house of Israel. When they took hold of thee t cf. ch. 28. 2. cf. Is. 10. 13, 14. cf. Deut. 8. 17.

u cf. Is. 37. 29. cf. ch. 38. 4. cf. Job 41. 1, 2. cf. Amos 4. 2.
v ch. 32. 4, 6. cf. Jer. 8. 2.
w cf. ch. 39. 4, 6, 17, 20. cf. Ps. 74. 14. cf. Rev. 19. 17, 18.
x cf. 2 Ki. 18. 21. cf. Is. 20. 5, 6. cf. Is. 30. 2, 7. cf. Is. 31. 1–3.

exalted position, as is plain, and with little ability to survey things beyond the banks which on either side enclose him. Yet he can derive matter of boasting out of all this: "My river is mine own," he says, "and I have made it for myself." The ditches, the canals, the embankments and sluices are of his own manufacture truly, and this he calls making the river; just as we think so much of the little we do, and so little of all that God has done for us. What a sight for the angels that excel in strength, to see a creature pinned to the earth that bears him, as the crocodile to his river-bank, and yet boasting himself to be in the place of God, and be his own god! And it was not Pharaoh's boast alone, as we have sufficiently seen. A god to himself, he was a god also to his people, as is well known, whose fate is represented as identified with that of their king as the fish of the rivers sticking to his scales; for all that he is to be brought out of his river, and in a way that will abase him utterly: "I will put hooks in thy jaws, and I will bring thee up out of the midst of thy rivers, and all the fish of thy rivers shall stick unto thy scales; and I will cast thee forth into the wilderness, thee and all the fish of thy rivers; thou shalt fall upon the open field; thou shalt not be brought together nor gathered. I will give thee for food to the beasts of the earth and to the fowls of the heavens." No overthrow can be more complete. Thus, in another sense than that of Samson's riddle, "Out of the eater comes forth meat;" he becomes the prey of those upon whom hitherto he had preyed.

[2] We come now to the second cause of the judgment, and we see how God takes up the cause of His people, foolish and perverse as they may have been. Had they not been sufficiently warned that they must not trust in Egypt? Were they not fully accountable in doing this after all the care that God had taken to deliver them from it? This Pharaoh, then, who has invited their confidence in himself which he cannot justify, who, as thus leaned upon by Israel, has given way under them and rent all their shoulder and lamed all their loins, he must be put into the place where he belongs, and God Himself must break the staff that has broken to His people's hurt. The fertility of Egypt, proverbial as it was, must therefore be turned into deserts and desolation from one end of it to the other. Migdol was on the east border of lower Egypt, as Syene was on the border of upper Egypt, on the boundary between it and Cush, or Ethiopia. Not only would the desolation for a time be extreme, but the people would be scattered from the land, and the cities laid waste forty years.

by thy hand, thou didst give way and did rend all their shoulder; and when they leaned upon thee, thou didst break, and didst make all their loins to tremble. Therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I will bring a [y]sword upon thee, and cut off from thee man and beast. And the land of Egypt shall be a [z]desolation and a waste, and they shall [a]know that I am Jehovah: because he saith, The [b]river is mine, and I have made it. Therefore, behold, I am [c]against thee and against thy rivers, and I will make the land of Egypt deserts of waste and desolation, [d]from Migdol to Syene, even to the border of Ethiopia. Foot of man shall not pass through it, nor shall foot of beast pass through it, nor shall it be inhabited [e]forty years. And I will make the land of Egypt a desolation in the midst of the countries that are desolate, and her cities among the cities that are laid waste shall be a desolation forty years; and I will [f]scatter the Egyptians among the nations, and will disperse them through the countries.

y cf. ch. 21. 3, 4, etc.
z ch. 30. 7, etc.
a vers. 16, etc.
b ver. 3.
c ch. 28. 22, etc.
d ch. 30. 6.
e cf. Num. 14. 33.
cf. Jer. 46. 19.
cf. Is. 23. 15, 17.
cf. 2 Chron. 36. 21.
f ch. 30. 23.

The judgment here has raised an historical question of which the critics have naturally not been slow to avail themselves. We must remember, in thinking of it, that the reckoning of Scripture is not that in respect to time with which we are familiar. That the words here do not necessitate that the desolation must be complete, after the manner spoken here, for the whole forty years, is easily to be proved by what is undeniable elsewhere. In Genesis xv. 13, God speaks to Abraham of his seed being strangers in a land that is not theirs, serving them, and to be afflicted by them 400 years. And again we have in Exodus xii. 40, 41, the time more precisely stated: "Now the sojourning of the children of Israel who dwelt in Egypt was 430 years; and it came to pass at the end of the 430 years, even the self-same day it came to pass, that all the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt." Thus complete accuracy is asserted. Yet, when we turn to the epistle to the Galatians, we find from the pen of one who certainly could not be ignorant or mistaken in what he asserted, that the law came just 430 years after the promise which God had given (Gal. iii. 17).

It is plain, therefore, that the 430 years are to be taken as from the promise, and that they define the time to which the captivity in Egypt lasted. Thus in the 15th of Genesis we must read this as meaning that the people should be captives to the Egyptians until 400 years from that time; the captivity is defined as to the end of it, instead of as we at first would naturally think, as to both ends. The forty years from the time of the prophecy here would reach to about the time of the overthrow of the Babylonian empire, the power of Nebuchadnezzar and his successors, until the Persian overthrew his city and his dynasty. That it is Nebuchadnezzar's hand which God uses to inflict this upon Egypt is plain from what follows almost immediately; and while the critics have doubted whether Nebuchadnezzar himself ever was in Egypt, we have now the proof from Egyptian and from Babylonian records together, that he was there twice; and it is even stated that the land was scourged by him as far as to Syene. It was completely in his hand.

3 (13-16): Yet restoration.

3 Yet thus saith the Lord Jehovah: At the [g]end of forty years will I gather the Egyptians from the peoples whither they were scattered; and I will bring again the captivity of Egypt, and will cause them to return to the land of Pathros, unto the land of their birth; and they shall be there a [h]base kingdom. It shall be the basest of kingdoms; neither shall it [i]lift itself up any more above the nations; and I will diminish them, so that they shall no more rule over the nations. And it shall be no more the [j]confidence of the house of Israel, bringing iniquity to remembrance when they turn after them: and they shall [k]know that I am the Lord Jehovah.

2 (17-21): Nebuchadrezzar's wages for service elsewhere.

2. And it came to pass in the [l]seven and twentieth year, in the first [month], on the first of the month, the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, caused his army to do hard service against [m]Tyre; every head was made bald and every shoulder was peeled: yet had he no [n]wages from Tyre, nor his army, for the service he had served against it. Therefore, thus saith the Lord Jehovah:

[g] cf. Is. 19. 22-25. cf. Jer. 46. 26.
[h] cf. ch. 17. 6, 14. ch. 30. 13. cf. Zech. 10. 11.
[i] cf. Dan. 4. 37. cf. Dan. 11. 42, 43. cf. Nah. 3. 8-10.
[j] vers. 6, 7. Is. 30. 2, 3. Is. 36. 4, 6. cf. Jer. 2. 18, 19.
[k] ver. 21, etc. [l] cf. ch. 30. 20, etc.
[m] ch. 26. 7-12. cf. Jer. 27. 6. cf. Is. 7. 20.
[n] cf. Is. 43. 3.

3 At the end of the forty years, God announces a certain measure of restoration: "At the end of forty years will I gather the Egyptians from the place whither they were scattered; and I will bring again the captivity of Egypt, and will cause them to return to the land of Pathros, unto the land of their birth, and they shall be there a base kingdom. It shall be the basest of kingdoms, neither shall it lift itself up any more above the nations; and I will diminish them so that they shall no more rule over the nations, and shall be no more the confidence of the house of Israel." This has been, as is well known, Egypt's condition since. Under the Ptolemies, whether there might seem to be something more than this, it was the foreigner who had possession of the country, and Egypt has ever since been in the hand of foreigners; the more the power that reigned over them lifted itself up, the more was the burden upon the subject people.

2. We have now Nebuchadnezzar distinctly named as the instrument of this judgment, and this at a notable time. The prophecy, unlike the other prophecies with which this is connected, is stated to have been given in the twenty-seventh year, in the first month, the first day of the month. At that time, after thirteen years' siege at the hands of Nebuchadnezzar, Tyre had just fallen; and the prophecy with regard to it which Ezekiel had thus made long before, was fully proved; God was manifested as He whose judgment it was, and in whose hand, therefore, the conqueror himself was. The "twenty-seventh year" may as a number refer to this. It is the number of divine manifestation cubed. The reality of God's government was made fully plain, and here we have one of the various ways in which God would speak to Nebuchadnezzar himself, as is so manifest in the book of Daniel. As the head of the new Gentile power that God had raised up, Nebuchadnezzar as king of kings owed all to the Hand that raised him, and God would have him learn the lesson of this.

Thus, with the seal upon God's word in what he had already accomplished,

Behold, I will [o]give the land of Egypt unto Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon; and he shall carry away her multitude, and take her spoil, and take her prey; and it shall be the wages for his army. I have given him the land of Egypt for his labor wherewith he served against it, because they wrought [p]for me, saith the Lord Jehovah. In that day will I cause the horn of the house of Israel to [q]bud forth, and I will give thee the [r]opening of the mouth in the midst of them; and they shall [s]know that I am Jehovah.

3 (xxx. 1-19): The full judgment upon the land.

3. And the [t]word of Jehovah came unto me saying, Son of man, prophesy and say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Howl ye, alas for the day! For the day is at hand, yea, the [u]day of Jehovah is at hand, a day of clouds; it shall be the time of the nations. And the [v]sword shall come upon Egypt, and there shall be anguish in [o] ch. 30. 10-12. cf. Jer. 43. 10-13.

[p] cf. Is. 10. 6, 7. cf. Is. 45. 1-3. cf. Jer. 25. 9. cf. 2 Ki. 10. 30.
[q] ch. 28. 25, 26. cf. Ps. 132. 17. cf. Is. 27. 6.
[r] ch. 3. 26. ch. 24. 27.
[s] vers. 6, 9, 16.
[t] ch. 29. 1, etc.
[u] Joel 2. 1, 2, etc. Zeph. 1. 7, 14.
[v] ch. 29. 8.

Nebuchadnezzar was to carry with him into Egypt an assurance which every step towards his full exaltation would thus confirm. Egypt was to be the spoil given him for his lack of wages in his service against Tyre. It was God's work that he had been doing, whether he regarded it as such or no, and yet in the thirteen years of the siege in which "every head was made bald, and every shoulder peeled," he found in the end, very naturally indeed, nothing but a ruin left. Thus the land of Egypt would be given him as his recompense: "He shall carry away her multitude, and take her spoil and take her prey, and it shall be wages for his army."

The prophecy ends here, as far as Nebuchadnezzar is concerned, and the voice to him in it is unmistakable. In that day God would cause the horn of the house of Israel to bud forth, and He would give Ezekiel the opening of his mouth in the midst of them. The budding of the horn speaks but of partial and more or less slow revival for the people of God, which shows itself, in its beginning, in what the end of the book of Kings supplies as to the altered treatment of Jehoiachin, from whose captivity, let us remember, these prophecies are all dated, and who was brought out of his prison by Nebuchadnezzar's successor and given a place above all the subject kings that surrounded him. Later, we have also Daniel's exaltation, after a period seemingly of forgetfulness under Belshazzar and Darius, which was soon followed by the return of the people to the land under Cyrus. Thus the horn of Israel was indeed budding. In the prophets of that period, as Haggai and Zechariah, we have intimations of a further and more wondrous budding of the horn in the announcement of Messiah's coming. Israel's sins still hindered, as we know, and Messiah Himself came only to be rejected; but that belongs not to God's side, if we may so speak, but to the people's. The final visions of Ezekiel (chs. 40-48) had been uttered just before the prophecy which we are now looking at, the fulfilment of which, however, would now cause them to speak in such a way as to be heard, though, as we know, only by a remnant.

3. We have now still another prophecy, which is, however, but the detailed announcement of that judgment upon the land already declared. The day of Jehovah is at hand, a day of sorrow and distress: "A day of clouds shall it be, the time of the nations;" that is, the full time is at hand in which the judg-

Ethiopia when the slain shall fall in Egypt, and they shall take away her multitude, and her foundations shall be overthrown. [w] Ethiopia and Phut and Lud and all the mingled people, and Chub and the children of the land that is in league shall fall with them by the sword. Thus saith Jehovah, They also that [x] uphold Egypt shall fall, and the pride of her strength shall come down: from Migdol to Syene shall they fall in it by the sword, saith the Lord Jehovah. And they shall be desolate in the midst of the countries that are desolated, and her cities shall be in the midst of the cities that are wasted. And they shall [y] know that I am Jehovah, when I have set a fire in Egypt, and all her helpers shall be broken. In that day shall [z] messengers go forth from me in ships to make careless Ethiopia afraid; and there shall be anguish upon them, as in the day of Egypt: for, lo, it cometh!

Thus saith the Lord Jehovah; I will also make the multitude of Egypt to cease by the [a] hand of Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon. He and his people with him, the terrible of the nations, shall be brought to destroy the land; and they shall draw their swords against Egypt, and fill the land with the slain. And I will [b] make the rivers dry, and will sell the land into the hand of the wicked; and I will make the land desolate and all that is therein, by the hand of strangers: I, Jehovah, have spoken it.

Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: I will also [c] destroy the idols, and I will cause the images to cease out of Noph. There shall be no more a prince out of the land of Egypt; and I will put fear in the land of Egypt. And I will [d] make Pathros desolate, and will set a fire in Zoan, and will execute judgment upon No. And I will pour my [e] wrath upon Sin, the stronghold of Egypt; and I will cut off the multitude of No. And I will set a [f] fire in Egypt: Sin shall be in great anguish, and No [w] Is. 20. 4. Jer. 46. 9. Nah. 3. 9. cf. ch. 27. 10.

[x] cf. Is. 20. 3-6. cf. Is. 31. 3.
[y] ch. 30. 26, etc.
[z] cf. Is. 18. 1, 2. cf. Zeph. 2. 12. cf. ch. 39. 6.
[a] cf. ch. 29. 18, etc.
[b] cf. Is. 19. 5-10. cf. Jer. 50. 38. cf. Nah. 1. 4.
[c] cf. Ex. 12. 12. cf. Is. 2. 18. cf. Zech. 13. 2.
[d] cf. ch. 29. 14. cf. Ps. 78. 12, 43. cf. Is. 19. 11.
[e] cf. Ps. 11. 6. cf. Nah. 1. 6.
[f] cf. ch. 28. 18.

ment will be accomplished by Nebuchadnezzar's hand which, as we have already seen, prepares the way for the full establishment of the universal Gentile empire. Egypt seems to have been the last of these nations to experience this; but with and in Egypt it comes upon Ethiopia, Phut and Lud, and all the mingled people, "the children of the land of the covenant"—apparently those Israelitish colonists of whom Jeremiah speaks, and whose judgment he also emphatically announces. Thus Egypt is desolate in the midst of the countries that have been made desolate, and her cities in the midst of the cities that have been wasted. Egypt's end is the full tale told, and Nebuchadnezzar is again clearly announced as the one by whose hand it is to be executed. The points that are marked out here are naturally those which either set before us the idolatry, in Egypt so monstrous, and which God could never forget, or on the other hand, the symbols of her power and might, and her capitals upper and lower (No or Thebes, and Noph or Memphis); Zoan also, which God had shall be rent asunder, and Noph [shall have] enemies daily. The [g]young men of Aven and of Pi-beseth shall fall by the sword; and these shall go into captivity. And at [h]Tehaphnehes the day shall be darkened, when I shall break there the yokes of Egypt, and the [i]pride of her power shall cease in her. As for her, a cloud shall cover her, and her daughters shall go into [j]captivity. Thus will I execute judgments in Egypt, and they shall [k]know that I am Jehovah.

4 (xxx. 20–26): Breach and scattering.

4. And it came to pass in the [l]eleventh year, in the first [month], on the seventh of the month, the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, I have [m]broken the arm of Pharaoh, king of Egypt; and behold, it shall not be [n]bound up to apply remedies, to put a bandage to bind it, to make it strong to hold the sword. Therefore, thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I am [o]against Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and will break his arms, the strong one and that which was broken; and I will cause the sword to fall out of his hand. And I will [p]scatter the Egyptians among the nations, and will disperse them through the countries. And I will strengthen the arms of the king of Babylon, and will put my sword in his hand; and I will break the arms of Pharaoh, so that he shall groan before him with the groaning of a deadly wounded man. And I will [q]strengthen the arms of the king of Babylon, and the arms of Pharaoh shall fall down; and they shall know that I am Jehovah, when I have put [r]my sword into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall have stretched it out upon the land of Egypt. And I will scatter the Egyptians among the nations, and disperse them through the countries: and they shall [s]know that I am Jehovah.

g cf. Is.40.30.
h Jer. 2. 16.
i Dan. 4. 37.
j ver. 17, ch. 29. 12.
k vers. 25,26.
l ch. 29. 17, ch. 32. 1,etc.
m ver. 24, cf. Ps.10 15, cf.Jer 48.25.
n cf. Jer. 30 13, cf. Ps.51.8.
o ch.29.3,etc.
p ver. 26 ch 29.12,13, cf. Ps.68.30.
q cf.Is 45 1,5, cf. Jer. 27. 6 8, cf. Is.10.5,6, 15, cf. Deut. 32. 41, 42.
r cf. Is. 10. 5 cf.Jer.51.20.
s ver. 8, etc.

plagued of old in Moses' time, having its place among these: the strongholds are gone and the land is open to all assailants. The picture speaks for itself, hardly needing a word of explanation. The purpose is here, as everywhere—whether men will listen or whether they will forbear—that they may know that He is Jehovah.

4. We have now another distinct, short prophecy, with regard to the incurableness of the breach which God has already made upon Egypt, evidently when they were defeated at the battle of Carchemish—a blow from which they never recovered. The prophecy is to forbid all revival of hope on account of the activity and energy which Egypt for the time was again showing. The effort to relieve the siege of Jerusalem is of course specially in view, and God announces that no bandage should be applied to bind up the arm that has been broken, so that it should be able to hold the sword again. On the contrary, He would break that and the other arm also, and cause the sword to fall out of Pharaoh's hand. The Egyptians should be scattered among the nations and dispersed through the countries; the king of Babylon is once more named as the instrument of this. It is striking how these prophecies follow one another,

5 (XXXI.): The divine ways with the Assyrian a lesson for Egypt. 1 (1. 9): His might.

5. [1]And it came to pass in the [t]eleventh year, in the third [month], on the first of the month, that the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, say unto Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and to his multitude: Whom art thou [u]like in thy greatness? Behold, [v]Assyria was a cedar in Lebanon, with fair branches and with a shadowing thicket and of a high stature; and his top was amid the thick boughs. The [w]waters made him great, the deep exalted him; its streams ran round about his plantation, and it sent out its rivulets to [x]all the trees of the field. Therefore his stature was [y]exalted above all the trees of the field, and his boughs were multiplied, and his branches became long, because of many waters when he sent them forth. All the [z]fowl of the heavens made their nests in his boughs, and under his branches did all the beasts of the field bring forth their young, and under his shadow dwelt all the great nations. Thus was he fair in his greatness, in the length of his branches; for his root was by many waters. The [a]cedars in the garden of God could not hide him;

t ch. 30. 20, etc. ch. 32. 1, 17.
u ver. 18. Is. 14. 13, 14.
v cf. Is. 10. 33, 34. cf. Nah. 3. 8-10. cf. Zeph. 2. 13-15.
w cf. ch. 17. 5, 8. cf. Jer. 51. 36. cf. Prov. 14. 28.
x cf. Dan. 4. 12. cf. ch. 17. 24.
y Is. 10. 8-14. Is. 36. 18, 19.
z ch. 17. 23. cf. Mt. 13. 32. etc. Is. 60. 8, 9.
a ch. 28. 13. cf. Ps. 80. 10. cf. Gen. 3. 8.

which shows the urgency, on God's part, that His people should encourage themselves in no false hope. We can see how every blow upon such hopes was intended to fasten their hope upon God Himself; but how little will man listen to anything short of experience itself, hard teacher though it is owned to be! How we have again and again to hear the word "Cease ye from man," affirmed and emphasized by the event itself. How slow are we to come to that to which we must come finally, and which will have such abundant recompense for us!

5. We have now God's governmental ways with the Assyrian as another lesson for Egypt. There was a strong link of connection between the lands themselves. Assyria, like Egypt, was as an oasis in the desert track which stretches across nearly the whole breadth of Africa and Asia, from the Atlantic to the China Sea; an oasis which for Assyria was made by its two rivers, to which it owed its all, as Egypt did to the Nile. Thus essentially dependent, as it might be seen to be, yet it was self-exaltation and not the sense of dependence that grew out of it. Thus in the end abasement had to follow, for God's law is: He that exalteth himself shall be abased.

[1] The prophecy in this case is in the eleventh year, as was the last, and scarcely two months after it. On the first day of the third month, the word of Jehovah comes to Ezekiel, saying, "Son of man, say unto Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and to his multitude: Whom art thou like in thy greatness?" How gladly would we make ourselves the one exception, so that that which applies to others should not apply to us! God therefore points them to Assyria, a power as strong as Egypt itself. The rivers that had made him great were the rivers of that old Eden which had passed away, but which might seem to have revived again in him and such as he—though just such as he among the neighboring powers there was not. In Tyre, one might have seen again, as it were, the precious stones of Eden. In Assyria and the neighboring powers, the trees of the Garden of God might seem to have reproduced themselves in another manner, but all alike dwelt under the shadow of the one preeminent the cypresses were not like his boughs, and the plane-trees were not as his branches; no tree in the garden of God was like him in his beauty. I had made him fair by the multitude of his branches; so that all the trees of Eden, that were in the garden of God, [b]envied him.

2 (10-18): His humiliation.

2 Therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah: [c]Because thou hast lifted thyself up in stature . . . He hath even set his top amid the thick boughs, and his heart is lifted up in his height. I have [d]given him into the hand of the mighty one of the nations; he shall surely deal with him; I have driven him out for his [e]wickedness. And [f]strangers, the terrible of the nations, have cut him off, and have left him: upon the mountains and in all the valleys his branches are fallen, and his boughs are broken in all the water-courses of the land; and all the peoples of the earth are gone down from his shadow, and have [g]left him. On his [h]ruins all the fowl of heaven dwell, and all the beasts of the field are upon his branches: to the end that [i]none of all the trees by the waters exalt themselves in their stature, neither set their top among the thick boughs, and that none of them that drink water stand up in his height by himself: for they are all delivered unto death in the lower parts of the earth, in the midst of the children of men, with them that go [j]down to the pit.

Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: In the day when he went down to Sheol I caused a [k]mourning; I covered the deep for him, and I restrained the floods thereof, and the great waters were stayed; and I caused Lebanon to be black for him, and all the trees of the field fainted for him. I made the nations to [l]shake at the sound of his fall, when I cast him down to Sheol with b cf. Judg. 9. 8-20. cf. Zech. 11. 2. c cf. Gen. 26. 14. cf. Mt. 23. 12. cf. ch. 28. 6, 7. cf. Dan. 5. 20. cf. 2 Chron. 34. 27.

d cf. ch. 31. 9. cf. Judg. 13. 1.
e cf. Nah. 3. 15-19. cf. Deut. 18. 12.
f ch. 30. 11. cf. Hab. 1. 5-11. ch. 32. 4, 5.
g cf. Dan. 4. 13, 14. cf. Rev. 17. 16.
h ch. 29. 5. Jer. 7. 33. Is. 18. 6. cf. Rev. 19. 17, 18.
i cf. Deut. 13. 11. cf. Dan. 4. 32, 37. cf. Ps. 83. 17, 18.
j ch. 32. 18-32. Ps. 63. 9, 10. k cf. Nah. 2. 10. cf. Rev. 18. 9-11, 18, 19. cf. ch. 27. 29-32.
l cf. ch. 26. 15. cf. Is. 14. 8.

power which was the envy of them all. Like a cedar in Lebanon was he, with fair branches and a shadowing thicket, and of high stature. All the fowls of the heavens made their nests in his boughs, and under his branches all the beasts of the field brought forth their young; so under his shadow dwelt all the great nations. No tree in this Garden of God was like him in his beauty. But, thus made great by the fostering care of God, it was only to repeat the old story; for what gift of God is there that man will not abuse? And what hope is there, one would say, for the being with whom God's mercies are turned to evil instead of good? It is a terrible lesson, but so constantly to be learned, that the wonder of it is sadly lessened by familiarity.

2 The contrast of his humiliation was now correspondingly great. He too had been given into the hand of Babylon, one who would make thorough work with him; for when God has work to be done, He will see that it is done. As a consequence, instead of seeking his protection, the birds and the beasts would dwell among his ruins. All the peoples of the earth had gone down from his shadow and had left him; and this was no inexplicable calamity, but a warning which the sure government of God preaches everywhere against pride, and which, them that go down into the pit; and all the trees of Eden, the choice and best of Lebanon, all that drink water, were comforted in the lower parts of the earth. They also went down unto Sheol with him unto them that are slain by the sword; yea, they that were his [m]arm, that dwelt under his shadow in the midst of the nations. To whom art thou thus [n]like in glory and in greatness among the trees of Eden? Yet shalt thou be brought down with the trees of Eden into the lower parts of the earth; thou shalt lie in the midst of the uncircumcised, with them that are slain by the sword. This is [o]Pharaoh and all his multitude, saith the Lord Jehovah.

[m] ch. 32. 20-30. ch. 30. 6, 8. cf. Lam. 4. 20. cf. Dan. 4. 11, 12.
[n] ver. 2. ch. 32. 19. cf. Mt. 11. 20-24.
[o] cf. Ps. 52. 7.

6 (xxxii. 1-16): God's victory over the victor.

6. And it came to pass in the [p]twelfth year, in the twelfth month, on the first of the month, that the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, take up a [q]lamentation for Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and say unto him, Thou wast like a young [r]lion of the nations, and thou wast as a monster in the seas; and thou brakest forth in thy rivers, and [s]troubledst the waters with thy feet, and fouledst their streams.

[p] ch. 31. 1, etc. ver. 17.
[q] vers. 16, 18. ch. 27. 2, etc.
[r] cf. ch. 19. 2-6. cf. ch. 38. 13.
[s] cf. ch. 34. 18.

Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: I will also spread my [t]net over thee with an assemblage of many peoples; and they shall bring thee up in my net. And I will if it were but for the moment, was felt by all around. In fact, were they not all following in the same path which could only emphasize the claim of Sheol upon them?—the claim of the unseen world which gathers men on every side. For the wheel surely turns, as Ezekiel has over and over again assured us, and he that is lifted up is exalted but for the moment, then must come down to the lower parts of the earth. True it is that, if we follow this out, we shall find that in God's thought there is a resurrection also, and that whatever is permanent in blessing lies in this for us. But man's view in general does not reach thus far, and where the lesson is not accepted, the blessing itself is not reached. God therefore challenges Pharaoh here. Sheol had its rights over him also, rights which in God's judgment were already conceded, but he must "lie in the midst of the uncircumcised with those slain by the sword. This is Pharaoh and all his multitude, saith the Lord Jehovah."

[t] ch. 12. 13. ch. 17. 20. cf. Hos. 7. 12.

6. We now come to the twelfth year and the twelfth month, a period which speaks of the full manifestation of God's governmental ways. But with this, in which there should be only blessing, there comes instead a voice of lamentation, a reminder for us of those tears actually wept on earth by One who was the manifestation of God Himself in flesh, over those that had despised His gracious invitations, and would not be gathered under the wings that would so safely have covered them. The creatures that God has made must ever be objects of interest to Him—such interest as we little realize who confound so much the clouds and darkness that are about Him with the One who is distinct from the cloud and from the darkness, in whom is no darkness at all, and who has now made Himself known to us for that which indeed He ever was. Nevertheless, man may make void all this as far as he is concerned, and with his leave thee upon the land, I will cast thee forth upon the open field, and will cause all the [u]fowl of the heavens to settle upon thee, and I will fill the beasts of the whole earth with thee. And I will lay thy flesh upon the mountains, and fill the valleys with thy height. And I will water with thy [v]blood the land wherein thou swimmest, even to the mountains; and the watercourses* shall be full of thee. And when I shall extinguish thee, I will cover the [w]heavens, and make the stars thereof black; I will cover the sun with a cloud, and the moon shall not give her light. All the bright lights of the heavens will I make black over thee, and set darkness upon thy [x]land, saith the Lord Jehovah. And I will vex the heart of [y]many peoples when I shall bring [the news of] thy destruction among the nations, to the countries that thou hast not known. And I will make many peoples amazed at thee, and their [z]kings shall be horribly afraid at thee, when I brandish my sword before them; and they shall [a]tremble at every moment, each one for his own life in the day of thy fall.

For thus saith the Lord Jehovah: The sword of the [b]king of Babylon shall come upon thee. By the swords of the mighty will I cause thy multitude to fall: the terrible of the nations are they all; and they shall spoil the [c]pride of Egypt, and all the multitude thereof shall be destroyed. I will destroy also all the [d]beasts thereof from beside many waters; and the foot of man shall trouble them no more, nor shall the hoofs of beasts trouble them. Then will I make their waters to settle, and cause their [e]rivers to run like oil, saith the Lord Jehovah. When I shall make the land of Egypt a desolation, and the country shall be left destitute of all its fulness, when I have smitten all them that dwell therein, then shall they [f]know that I am Jehovah. This is u ch. 31. 13. 18. 18. 6. Jer. 25. 33. Joel 3. 19.

v Is. 34. 3, 7. cf. Rev. 16. 6.

w cf. Is. 13. 10. cf. Jer. 13. 16. cf. Amos 8. 9.

x cf. Ex. 10. 21-23. cf. Is. 50. 3. cf. Rev. 6. 12.

y ver. 16, etc. cf. Rev. 11. 18. cf. Jer. 25. 15-25.

z ch. 27. 35. cf. Deut. 29. 24. cf. 1 Ki. 9. 8.

a ch. 30. 9. cf. Ex. 15. 14-16. cf. Zech. 11. 2.

b ch. 26. 7. ch. 30. 4, 22-25. Jer. 46. 13, 24-26.

c Is. 25. 2, 3. ch. 29. 19. cf. Is. 16. 6.

d ch. 30. 12. cf. 1 Sam. 15. 3.

e cf. Is. 8. 7, 8.

f cf. Ex. 7. 5. ch. 6. 7, etc.

*Or, "Plains."

back upon God he sees Him but as reflected in the depths of his own heart, in imaginations darkened by a guilty conscience.

Pharaoh is seen in this prophecy in a double character. He is not simply now the crocodile lying in the waters; he has broken forth as a young lion of the nations, as for some time past Egypt had been showing unwonted activity in this way, and Pharaoh sought to imitate the action of his predecessors of old, and to make himself an imperial power after the fashion of Assyria, and now of Babylon. But in this, as we know, he was doomed not to succeed. Like the restless monster which represents him, he could only trouble his own waters with his feet, and foul his streams. God, in fact, was spreading His net over him, and the human instruments were but means in His hands by which He would bring him up out of his streams and cast him upon the open field, and fill the birds of heaven and the beasts of the earth with his great bulk; his flesh would lay upon the mountains and fill the valleys; his blood would water the land, and his dead bodies would fill the rivers wherein he had been swimming.

the lamentation wherewith they shall lament: the [g]daughters of the nations shall lament therewith; for Egypt and for all her multitudes shall they lament therewith, saith the Lord Jehovah.

7 (xxxii. 17-32): At rest in the grave with all the uncircumcised.

7. And it came to pass in the [h]twelfth year, on the fifteenth of the month, the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, [i]wail for the multitude of Egypt, and cast them down, even her and the daughters of the famous nations, into the lower parts of the earth, with them that go down into the [j]pit. Whom dost thou surpass in [k]beauty? Go down, and be thou laid with the uncircumcised. They shall fall in the [l]midst of them that are slain by the sword. The sword hath been given: Draw her away, and all her multitudes. The [m]strong among the mighty shall speak to him out of the midst of Sheol with them that help him: they are gone down, they lie still, the uncircumcised slain by the sword.

There is [n]Asshur and all his assemblage, his graves round about him: all of them slain, fallen by the sword; whose graves are set in the sides of the pit, and his assemblage is round about his grave: all of them slain, fallen by the sword, who caused [o]terror in the land of the living.

There is [p]Elam and all her multitude round about her grave, all of them slain, fallen by the sword, that are gone down uncircumcised into the lower parts of the earth, who caused their terror in the land of the living; yet have they borne their [q]shame with them that go down to the pit. They have set her a bed in the midst of the slain with all her multitude; her g ver. 2. cf. 2 Chron. 35. 25.

h ver. 1, etc.

i cf. ch. 21. 6, 7. cf. Is. 16. 7, 8, 9. cf. Mic. 1. 8.

j ver. 30, etc.

k cf. ch 27. 3, 4. cf. ch. 28. 12-17.

l vers. 22-26. cf. 2 Sam. 1. 17-27.

m ver. 27. cf. Is. 1. 31. cf. Is. 14. 9, 10.

n vers. 24, 26, 29, 30. cf. Is. 30. 33. cf. Is. 37. 36-38.

o ch 26. 20, 21. cf. Is 14. 15, 16.

p Gen. 10. 22. 1 Chron. 1. 17. Jer. 25. 25. Jer. 49. 34-39.

q cf. ch. 16. 52, 54. cf. Jer. 3. 24, 25. cf. Dan. 12. 2.

All the bright lights of heaven would be made black over him, and darkness be upon the land through the darkening of sun and moon. This is the constant figure for the destruction of the powers which God has ordained for the preservation of order upon the earth. The darkness in which one could hardly find one's way was the fitting representation of ensuing anarchy, and consternation would come upon all beholders; his fall would make all the nations around to tremble for their own lives.

Again it is announced that the sword of the king of Babylon is to do this, by reason of which the land of Egypt should be but a desolation, stripped of its plenteous fulness, its inhabitants smitten that they might know—if even yet they would know—that it was Jehovah's hand. The prophecy closes as it began, with a lamentation.

7. One final prophecy now, a dirge over Egypt as gone down to the pit. We have still the twelfth year; and, as we may suppose, the twelfth month, and the fifteenth of the month, numbers in which the full government of God is seen displayed in judgment, for, alas, there is a monotony of judgment here. Nothing else can there be, for man's wickedness permits nothing else! Sheol and the grave are now seen as receiving their claim, and the nations that have already passed into the shadow are those with whom Pharaoh and Egypt are graves are round about her, all of them uncircumcised, slain with the sword; though terror was caused by them in the land of the living, and they have borne their shame with them that go down to the pit: he is put in the midst of them that are slain.

There is [r] Meshech, Tubal and all her multitude; her graves are round about her: all of them uncircumcised, slain by the sword, though they caused terror by them in the land of the living. And they lie* not with the mighty that are fallen of the uncircumcised, who are gone down to Sheol with their weapons of war, and whose swords are laid under their heads, and their iniquities are upon their bones, though they were the terror of the mighty in the land of the living. Thou also shalt be broken in the midst of the [s] uncircumcised, and shalt lie with them that are slain with the sword.

There is [t] Edom, her kings, and all her princes, who in their might are laid with them that are slain with the sword: they lie with the uncircumcised and with them that go down to the pit.

There are the princes of the [u] north, all of them, and all the [v] Sidonians, that are gone down with the slain; they are put to shame in the terror which they caused by their might; and they lie uncircumcised with them that are slain by the sword, and bear their shame with them that go down to the pit.

[r] ch. 27. 13. ch. 38. 2, 3. ch. 39. 1. Gen. 10. 2.

[s] cf. 1 Sam. 31. 4.

[t] ch. 25. 12. Amos 1. 11, 12. Obad. 1, 2. cf. Is. 63. 1–6.

[u] cf. ch. 38. 6, 15. cf. Jer. 1. 14. cf. Jer. 4. 6. cf. Ps. 48. 2, 4.

[v] ch. 28. 21–23. Jer. 25. 22. cf. Mt. 11. 21.

* Or, "Should they not lie?"

now to be joined. Among these nations Tyre is not seen as yet; but Assyria, Elam, Meshech and Tubal, Edom, the Sidonians, are all seen as involved in one hopeless ruin. It is a judgment, as we see, not of individuals, but of nations—the judgment of the whole world, so far as it had yet come, as we may say, into the light of revelation—the circumcised with the uncircumcised; for Egypt was externally a circumcised people, but for whom it meant nothing; and now all together made equal in that which merges all distinctions, the common nervelessness and shadow of death. This monotonous dirge, the same for all of them, is part of the lesson meant by it—meant to impress us with the common blank and desolation in which so many energies, so many varieties of human character and activity, all come into one undistinguishable ruin. This is the lesson of death from which none is exempt, which God pressed upon man in that law which was the ministration of it, the common death and condemnation which man must accept in order to find blessing. It is therefore the natural end of all this part of the prophecy.

Thank God, we are going to emerge now into brighter things! But God's lessons must be learned, and in their own order. There is no escape from this, and we have to have the sentence of death in ourselves, that we may not trust in ourselves but in Him who raiseth the dead. Resurrection is all of God. Here it is plain that man has no ability whatever; he is out of account, and thus God has freedom to manifest Himself as He desires to do; then the grave itself is no hindrance to Him, but rather the means of brighter display of His divine glory. Thus among the names here, Egypt herself is to have her resur-

"Pharaoh shall see them, and shall be comforted over all his multitude, Pharaoh and all his army slain by the sword, saith the Lord Jehovah. For I have caused his terror in the land of the living; and he shall be laid in the midst of the uncircumcised, with them that are slain by the sword, Pharaoh and all his multitude, saith the Lord Jehovah.

w ch. 31. 16
cf. ch. 14. 22.

rection and blessing in the coming day, and Assyria also, as Isaiah witnesses (chap. xix. 23–25): "In that day shall there be a highway out of Egypt to Assyria; and the Assyrian shall come into Egypt, and the Egyptian into Assyria; and the Egyptians shall serve with the Assyrians. In that day shall Israel be the third with Egypt and with Assyria, even a blessing in the midst of the land, whom the Lord of Hosts shall bless, saying, Blessed be Egypt my people, and Assyria the work of my hands, and Israel mine inheritance."

DIVISION 3 (chaps. 33–48).

There is a question made of where the division of the chapters actually comes here. The references to chapters iii. and xviii. in the 33rd are manifest, and this is urged to show that it is a close and not a beginning, that it connects with what is past rather than with what is yet to come. Again, the whole chapter still speaks of judgment, as the former ones have done, not of deliverance. On the other hand, the significance of the re-opening of the prophet's mouth is in this way lost, for in the 34th the judgment is but an introduction to the grace. It could not be rightly thought that this re-opening of the mouth was only more emphatically to repeat what had been already uttered, and that then again there was to be a close. Besides which, righteousness being the eternal character of God's throne must be maintained in grace as in judgment, as we all know it has been; and this must be first made clear, that grace may have free way.

Thus it is the announcement of the fall of the city, of the full execution of judgment foretold, that opens the mouth to predict the blessing. In the next chapter the false shepherds are removed that the true Shepherd may take their place, and it is Jehovah Himself who is manifested as this, the representative of whom is found in the true David raised up unto them. This is, of course, in Messiah, the Successor to David's throne, and of whom David was but the type. The Shepherd being found, and the flock in His hand, the enemy is then answered; then the land is comforted by the rooting out of those who would possess themselves of it, and the restoration of a people reunited in heart to God; after which in the 37th chapter the nation as such is brought up from the dead, and Ephraim and Judah, long parted and at strife with one another, are made one in the land. There is yet one last enemy to be destroyed (chaps. xxxviii., xxxix.), and then the land is finally cleansed and the full blessing comes in the restoration of the dwelling-place of God among them. This is set before us in full detail, and the city is then and henceforward known by the blessed reality as His abode with them. It is Jehovah Shammah, "The Lord is there."

SUBDIVISION 1

The previous chapters have shown us, then, that as far as man is concerned, all is gone. There is no hope for man that can come from himself. God must act if there is to be blessing, sovereignly and alone, and this is what the terms

DIVISION 3. (Chaps. xxxiii.-xlviii.)

Resurrection and Restoration.

SUBDIVISION 1 (Chaps. xxxiii.-xxxvii.)

Jehovah acting from and for Himself.

SECTION 1 (Chaps. xxxiii., xxxiv.)

The opening of the prophet's mouth.

1 (xxxviii.): The basis of righteousness.
1 (1-20): The way of Jehovah equal.

1. [1] AND the [z] word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, speak to the children of [y] thy people, and say unto them, When I [z] bring the sword upon a land, and the people of the land take one man from among them, and set him for their [a] watchman: if he [b] see the sword coming upon the land, and blow the [c] trumpet, and warn the people; then whosoever [d] heareth the sound of the trumpet, and [e] taketh not warning, if the sword come and take him away, his [f] blood shall be upon his own head. He heard the sound of the trumpet, and took not warning; his blood shall be upon him; whereas, if he had [g] taken warning, he would have delivered his soul. But if the watchman see the sword coming, and blow [h] not the trumpet, and the people be not warned, if the sword come and take any person from among them, he is [i] taken away in his iniquity; but his blood will I [j] require of the watchman's hand.

r ch 30.1,etc. y ch. 3. 5, 11, 27. cf. Mt 10.5,6. z cf. ch 6 3. cf. ch. 11. 8. cf. Lev. 26 25. cf. Jer.12.12. a ver. 7. cf. 2 Sam. 18. 24 27. cf. Is.21.6-9. cf. Is 56.9,10. cf. Jer 51.12. cf. Hos.9.8. cf. Heb. 13. 17. b cf. Acts 20. 29, 30 cf. Lk 19.41-44 cf. Mic.1.9, etc. c cf. vers.8,9 cf. Neh. 4 18, 20 cf. Is. 58. 1. cf. Jer. 4 5. cf. Jer. 6. 1. cf. Hos 8.1. cf. Amos 3. 6, 7. d cf. Mt.13.14. cf. ch. 12. 2. e cf. 2 Chron. 25. 16. cf. Prov. 29. 1. cf. Zech 1 4. f ch. 18. 13. Lev. 20.9,1. cf. Acts 18 6. cf. Mt 27 25. g cf. Ps.95 7 1

cf. Ex. 9. 19-21; cf. 2 Ki. 6; 10. cf. Acts 2. 37-41; cf. Heb.11.7. h cf. Is. 56. 10, 11; cf. 1 Cor.14 8; cf. Acts 20. 27. i cf. ch. 18. 20, 24; cf. Jno. 8. 24; ch. 3. 18-20. j ch. 34. 10; cf. Heb. 13. 17; cf. Gen. 9. 5; cf. Gen. 42. 22; cf. 2 Sam. 4. 11.

of the new covenant show. There is no further expectation from man, and no condition made with him. The restoration of the people must be a resurrection from the dead; for this, God alone is competent. But all His glory thus shines out, and there is fulness of blessing found—the dirge passes into a song.

Sec. 1.

The prophet's mouth then is re-opened, because there is grace to be announced. Yet the affirmation of God's righteous ways unchanged is the fitting introduction to this. The fall of the city shows the people now fully under judgment. Their false confidences are exposed. The law has spoken, and the people, by its verdict are Lo-ammi, without the blood of atonement for their sins, without the place in which alone it could be sprinkled before God, God Himself entirely withdrawn. Moreover, there are no true shepherds among the people only such as are not only inadequate, but false. God must raise up the only Shepherd who can truly represent Him in His care for the feeble and scattered remnant who shall still remain an election, wholly of grace, and who are cast entirely upon Him—themselves also undone, apart from absolute grace. The true Shepherd is found in David ("the beloved"), the real fulfiller of that name and of the unrepenting promises of God to which "the sure mercies of David" are attached.

1. [1] The prophecy here does not begin with the date, as we might expect,

So [k]thou, son of man, I have set thee a watchman unto the house of Israel; and thou shalt [l]hear the word from my mouth, and warn them from me. When I say unto the wicked, O [m]wicked man, thou shalt surely die, and thou dost not speak to warn the wicked from his way, that wicked man shall die in his iniquity, but his [n]blood will I require of thy hand. But if thou [o]warn the wicked of his way to turn from it, and he turn not from his way, he shall [p]die in his iniquity; but thou hast [q]delivered thy soul.

And thou, son of man, say unto the house of Israel, Thus ye speak, saying, [r]Our transgressions and our sins are upon us, and we waste away in them, [s]how then should we live? Say unto them, [t]As I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, I have [u]no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live: [v]turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways; for why will ye die, O house of Israel? And thou, son of man, say unto the children of thy people, The [w]righteousness of the righteous shall not deliver him in the day of his transgression; and as for the [x]wickedness of the wicked, he shall not fall thereby in the day that he turneth from his wickedness; neither shall he that is righteous be able to live thereby in the day that he sinneth. When I say to the [y]righteous that he shall surely live, if he [z]trust to his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, none of his righteous deeds shall be remembered; but in his iniquity that he hath committed, therein shall he die.

cf. Mic. 7. 18. p ch. 14. 6; ch. 18. 30; Is. 55. 7; Jer. 3. 22; Hos. 14. 1. q ch. 3. 20, 21; ch. 18. 24-26; cf. Jas. 2. 10. r ch. 18. 21, 27, 32; cf. Is. 1. 18. y cf. Lk. 10. 28; cf. Deut. 8. 1, etc. z ch. 3. 20; cf. Phil. 3. 4-7; cf. Lk. 18. 9; cf. ch. 16. 15.

k ch. 3. 17. Is. 62. 6. cf. Hab. 2. 1. l ch. 2. 7, 8. cf. Phil. 3. 18. m ver. 14. ch. 18. 4, 10-13, 18, 20. cf. Gen. 2. 17. 18. 3. 13. n cf. Acts 20. 26. cf. Mt. 27. 24, 25. cf. 1 Cor. 9. 16. o ch. 3. 19, 21. cf. Acts 13. 40, 41. cf. Acts 18. 5, 6. cf. Acts 28. 23-28. p Prov. 15. 10. Jno. 8. 24. Acts 13. 41. q cf. 1 Thess. 2. 3-6. cf. 2 Cor. 1. 12. cf. 2 Cor. 2. 15-17. cf. Acts 7. 54-60. r ch. 24. 23. cf. Ps. 44. 22, 25. Lev. 26. 39. s cf. ch. 37. 11. cf. Jno. 11. 39, 40. t cf. ch. 5. 11. cf. Num. 14. 21, 28, etc. cf. Is. 49. 18. u ch. 18. 23, 32. Lam. 3. 33. cf. Lk. 15. 7, 10, 23, etc.

that being found, however, in verse 17. God first prepares the message which the re-opened lips of the prophet are to utter. The message given is a repetition almost wholly of chaps. iii. and xiii., a repetition which, for the purpose, is more effective than a wholly new statement. It is emphasized, however, in the first place that while men might naturally, and ordinarily would appoint themselves a watchman, the prophet is not appointed of the people, but of God in their behalf. Were there no word from Him, the accountability of the people would still remain, but God had provided a watchman for those too heedless and indifferent to care for their own interests, even the most weighty. How this, nevertheless, would increase the culpability of those who still refused the Voice that spoke to them! How often had He spoken of the sword which He was bringing upon the land! Yet they had taken no heed. Instead of looking for every sign of approaching judgment, they hardened their hearts against all that was given them in this way—nay, pressed upon them by one event after another, and by one messenger after another. What then could there be at last but that which had now come?—the awful signs no more to be refused by their desolate city, and the triumph of the heathen enemy over those who, as the people of God, would have been sheltered from every possibility of successful assault.

And when I say unto the [a]wicked, Thou shalt surely die, if he turn from his sin, and do judgment and justice; if the wicked [b]restore the pledge, give again that which he had taken by robbery, walk in the statutes of life, committing no iniquity; he shall surely [c]live, he shall not die. None of his [d]sins that he hath committed shall be remembered against him: he hath done judgment and justice; he shall surely live. Yet the children of thy people [e]say, The way of the Lord is not equal: but as for them, [f]their way is not equal.

[g]When the righteous turneth from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, he shall die therein. And [h]when the wicked turneth from his wickedness, and doeth judgment and justice, he shall live thereby. Yet ye say, The way of the Lord is not equal. O house of Israel, I will judge you every one [i]after his ways.

2 (21-33): Confirmation of the judgment foretold.

[2]And it came to pass in the [j]twelfth year of our captivity, in the tenth [month], on the fifth of the month, that one who had [k]escaped out of Jerusalem came unto me, saying, The city is smitten! Now the [l]hand of Jehovah had been upon me in the evening, [m]before he that had escaped came, and he had opened my mouth before he came to me in the morning; and my [n]mouth was opened, and I was no more dumb.

a ver. 8. ch. 3. 18, 19. cf. Jonah 3. 4, 5.
b Is. 55. 7. Mic. 6. 8. Hos. 14. 1. cf. 2 Chr. 33. 12, 13. Deut. 24. 6, 10-13, 17.
c cf. Lk. 19. 8.
d ch. 18. 27, 28.
e Is. 40. 27. cf. Mic. 7. 18.
f ver. 20. ch. 18. 25, 29. cf. Rom. 7. 12.
g cf. Rom. 3. 21, 31.
h cf. Lk. 19. 21, 22. cf. Rom. 3. 4, 19.
i vers. 12, 13, etc.
j ch. 32. 17, etc.
k ch. 24. 26, 27.
l ch. 1. 3. ch. 3. 22.
m cf. 2 Ki. 5. 25, 26; cf. 2 Ki. 6. 32.
n ch. 24. 27; ch. 3. 26, 27; cf. Lk. 1. 64.

ch. 37. 1; ch. 40. 1.

The second part of the address here begins at the 10th verse, in which the lesson of the 18th chapter is once more enforced. They would now be ready to plead, and indeed were pleading, that before the unbending righteousness of God it was impossible that men should live. But the Lord replies as He had declared abundantly already, that He has no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that they turn from their wickedness and live. For one who truly turned to Him, none of his past wickedness should be remembered against him. Could God go on with them in evil ways? Surely it would be impossible even for themselves to think so. There was then but one alternative, and God still pleaded as He had been pleading, that they turn from their evil ways that they might live. Why would they die? Their death was of their own will and not His. If, then, even one who had been righteous, trusting in this past righteousness of his, gave himself up to wickedness, none of his righteous deeds could be remembered: in his iniquity that he had committed, he would surely die. But what is rather emphasized is the mercy that awaits even the worst and vilest who should turn to God. Yet the people would rest the blame of all upon the Lord's ways as if they were not equal, whereas it was their own ways that are unequal, as their conscience must surely witness against them. Much as men may seek to stifle the voice that speaks for God within them, yet it will one day have full utterance when they will be compelled to hear it.

[2] We have now the confirmation of the judgment foretold in the destruction of the city: "And it came to pass in the twelfth year of our captivity, in the tenth month, on the fifth of the month, that one who had escaped out of Jerusalem came unto me, saying, The city is smitten. Now the hand of the

And the [o]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, they that inhabit those [p]waste places in the land of Israel speak, saying, [q]Abraham was one, and he inherited the land: but we are [r]many; the land is given us for a possession. Therefore, say unto them, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Ye [s]eat with the blood, and lift up your eyes unto your [t]idols, and [u]shed blood: and shall [v]ye possess the land? Ye stand upon your sword, ye work abomination, and ye [w]defile every one his neighbor's wife: and shall ye possess the land? Say thou thus unto them, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: As I live, surely they that are in the waste places shall [x]fall by the sword, and him that is in the open field will I give to the [y]beasts to be devoured, and they that are in the strongholds and in the caves shall die of the [z]pestilence. And I will make the land a [a]desolation and an astonishment, and the [b]pride of her strength shall cease; and the mountains of Israel shall be desolate that none shall pass through. And they shall [c]know that I am Jehovah, when I have made the land a desolation and an astonishment, because of all their abominations which they have committed.

o ch. 26. 1, etc.
p cf. Jer. 52. 16.
cf. ch. 5. 3, 4.
q Is. 51. 2. Acts 7. 5.
r cf. Mic 3.11. cf. Jno.8.33, 34.
s Lev. 3. 17. Deut. 12. 16.
t ch. 18 6,etc. Deut. 4. 19. cf. Jer. 44. 15-19.
u ch. 9. 9. ch. 22. 6, 9, 27.
v cf. Jer. 7. 9, 10.
w ch. 18. 6, 11, 15. ch. 22 9-11. Jer 5. 8, 9. cf. 1 Cor.5 1.
x ch. 5 12 17. ch. 6. 11, 12.
y Jer.15 2,3. cf. Rev. 19. 17, 18. z Lev. 26. 25. Num 14.12. Deut.28 21. Jer. 24. 10.
a ch. 6. 14.

Is. 6. 11; Mic. 7. 13. b ch. 7. 24, etc. c ch. 6. 7, etc.

Lord had been upon me in the evening before he that escaped came, and He had opened my mouth before he came to me in the morning, and my mouth was opened, and I was no more dumb." The date here is a significant one, "the twelfth year of our captivity" is, according to the numerical stamp upon it, the time of complete manifestation of the government of God with which the tenth month and the fifth day of the month combine to speak of the responsibility of man before God, of man who can never escape from the presence of Him whose eye is in every place, beholding the evil and the good. It is strange, however, to realize that the date here of the arrival of the man escaped from the city is more than sixteen months after it was taken. It has been naturally thought, therefore, that there must be a mistake in the text which, in common manuscripts of the Septuagint, seems to have been altered to suit. The well-known Alexandrian manuscript, however, agrees with the Hebrew which, as has been already seen, has its own internal evidence of being the correct one. No doubt the report of the capture had long preceded the actual coming of the refugee, delayed as he doubtless was by the conditions through which he had to make his way, and which there is no need to suppose to have been a direct one. It was probably after much wandering that the refugee had found a place at last where he could rest in safety. Until this time, then, the message waited: God dealing with the people in a way suited to the persistency with which they clung to their false hopes, and hardened themselves in obstinate pride of heart that would not listen to the plainest announcements. Now, with the living witness in their midst, they could at least doubt no more that the blow had actually fallen.

The first utterance of the prophet after this, which is addressed to those yet remaining in the desolate land, shows how readily still these hopes would rally: "Son of man," says the Lord to him, "they that inhabit those waste places in

And as for thee, son of man, the children of thy people [d]talk of thee by the walls and in the borders* of the houses, and speak one to another, everyone to his brother, saying, Come, I pray you, and hear what is the word that cometh forth from Jehovah. And they [e]come unto thee as the people cometh, and they sit before thee as my people, and they hear thy words, but they [f]do them not: for with their [g]mouth they show much love, but their heart goeth after their plunder.† And behold, thou art unto them as a lovely [h]song, a pleasant voice, and one that playeth well upon an instrument; and they hear thy words, but they do them not. And when this cometh to pass (behold, it cometh), then shall they [i]know that a prophet hath been among them.

*Or, "doors." †Or, "coveteousness."

[d] Jer. 11. 19. Jer. 18. 18. cf. Jno. 7. 32.
[e] cf. Is 29. 13. Jer. 23. 35. cf. Jer. 42. 1. 6. 20. cf. Mt. 22. 16, 17.
[f] cf. Jer. 43. 1. 7. cf. Mt. 7. 24–27. cf. Jas. 1. 22–24.
[g] cf. Deut. 5. 28, 29. cf. Ps. 78. 36, 37. cf. Is 29. 13. cf. 1 Jno. 3. 18.
[h] cf. Mk. 6. 20. cf. Jno. 5. 35.
[i] cf. Jer. 28. 9. ch. 2. 5. 2 Ki. 5. 8.

the land of Israel speak, saying, Abraham was one, and he inherited the land, and we are many; the land is given us for a possession." Had this been the boldness of faith, it might indeed still have been admirable; for the inheritance, as we know, however much the people might even for long years lose possession of it, could never be finally alienated from the children of him to whom God had promised it. But this was another thing, as the character of those who made these utterances showed, mere desperadoes as they were, whose works declared them to be anything but Abraham's children. Their very conduct is held up before them, therefore. It was not for such to possess the land, surely, and they are warned by the Voice that speaks to them through the prophet: "Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: As I live, surely they that are in the waste places shall fall by the sword, and him that is in the open field will I give to the beasts to be devoured, and they that are in the strongholds and in the caves shall die of the pestilence; and I will make the land a desolation and an astonishment, and the pride of her strength shall cease. And the mountains of Israel shall be desolate that none shall pass through them. And they shall know that I am Jehovah (how differently should they have learned this!) when I have made the land a desolation and an astonishment because of all their abominations which they have committed."

Among the exiles, however, a transient effect might seem to have been produced by the fulfilment of the prophet's words. They were now coming to hear the message that he had for them, sitting before God as if His people, and hearing words which, however, they never followed. "Behold," says the Lord to him, "thou art unto them as a lovely song, a pleasant voice, and one that playeth well upon an instrument; and they hear thy words, but they do them not"—there was no true faith with them. They would know that the prophet had spoken to them only by the voice of the judgment which would overtake them, as it had in fact already overtaken them. They would believe when it was too late, when the prediction was fulfilled, but that would be only to make it vain as to the whole meaning of it. It was no true faith that did not anticipate the fulfilment. Thus everywhere, as one sees, the ruin of man is complete. There could be no proper hope, no expectation any longer, and here the first utterance closes.

2 (xxxiv 1): The shepherds and the Shepherd.
1 (1 6); The shepherds that feed but themselves.

2. [1] And the [j] word of Jehovah came unto me, saying,
Son of man, prophesy against the [k] shepherds of Israel, prophesy; and say unto them, even unto the shepherds, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: [l] Woe to the shepherds of Israel that [m] feed themselves! Should not the shepherds feed the [n] flock? Ye [o] eat the fat, and ye clothe you with the wool; ye kill those that are fattened, but ye feed not the sheep. The [p] weak have ye not strengthened, nor have ye healed the [q] sick, nor have ye [r] bound up that which was broken, nor have ye [s] brought again that which was driven away, nor have ye [t] sought for that which was lost; but with [u] force and rigor ye have ruled over them. And they were [v] scattered because there was no shepherd; and they became food to all the [w] beasts of the field, and were scattered. My sheep [x] wandered through all the mountains, and upon every high hill: yea, my sheep have been scattered upon all the face of the earth, and there was [y] none that searched, or sought after them.

j ch. 33.1, etc.
k cf. Jer.2.8. cf. Jno.10.12. cf. 1 Pet. 5. 1-4 l cf. Jer.23.1. cf. Zech. 11. 17. cf. Mt.23.13, 14, etc.
m cf. Mic. 3. 1-3, 11, 12. cf. Zeph. 3. 3, 4. cf. Is. 56.11, 12. cf. 1 Sam. 8. 11-18. n cf. Jno. 21. 15-17. cf. Acts 20. 28, 29.
o cf. Zech.11. 5, 16. cf. ch.22.25-27. cf. Jas. 5. 5. Ps. 53. 4. p cf. 1 Thess. 5. 14.
q cf. Heb. 12. 13.

etr. Lk. 4. 18. r etr. Lk. 10. 34. s etr. Mt. 9. 36 with Lk. 15. 3-7. t etr. Lk. 19. 10. u cf. Ex. 1. 13, 14; cf. Mt. 24. 49. v Jer. 23. 2; cf. 1 Ki. 22. 17; cf. ch. 5. 10. w Is. 56. 9; cf. Jno. 10. 12. x cf. Jer. 13. 16; cf. Ps. 107. 4. y cf. Ps. 142. 4; etr. Mk. 6. 34.

2. [1] In the chapter following, we have again no date given as to the time of the message, nor is there another until we come to the closing vision of the temple in the restored land, which is the only other in the book. That which follows here seems now to pour forth without any pause; and while we have once more judgment, in the opening, it is now manifestly connected with blessing, as the way to it. If the people are to be according to God, it must be as Isaiah has said (chap. iv. 4), "By the spirit of judgment and by the spirit of burning," or as Ezekiel himself has said elsewhere (chap. xx. 38) by purging out from them the rebels and those that transgress against God.

Thus we find that the judgment now before us is upon the false shepherds, those who only feed themselves, and make a prey of the sheep. "And the word of Jehovah came unto me saying, Son of man, prophesy against the shepherds of Israel; prophesy and say unto them, even unto the shepherds, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Woe to the shepherds of Israel that feed themselves! Should not the shepherds feed the flock? Ye eat the fat, and ye clothe you with the wool, ye kill those that are fattened; but ye feed not the sheep. The weak have ye not strengthened, nor have ye healed the sick, nor have ye bound up that which was broken, nor have ye brought again that which was driven away, nor have ye sought that which was lost; but with oppression and rigor ye have ruled over them." How thoroughly this gives the character of those whom the Lord charged in His day with similar conduct. The rule of the rabbins was an oppressive one, and while they assumed to stand for God and for His word, self-seeking characterized them throughout, and thus of necessity the sheep were scattered: "They were scattered because there was no shepherd: and they became food to all the beasts of the field and were scattered. My sheep wandered through all the mountains and upon every high hill; yea, my sheep have been scattered upon all the face of the earth, and there was none that searched or sought after them." Nothing stirs the heart of 2 (7-10): The judgment of the shepherds and the deliverance of the flock.

2 Therefore, ye shepherds, hear the word of Jehovah: As I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, surely [z]because my sheep have been a prey, and my sheep have been food to all the beasts of the field, because there was no shepherd, and my shepherds searched not for my sheep, but the shepherds fed themselves and fed not my sheep: therefore, ye shepherds, hear the word of Jehovah. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I am [a]against the shepherds; and I will [b]require my sheep at their hand, and cause them to [c]cease from feeding the sheep; neither shall the shepherds feed themselves any more; and I will [d]deliver my sheep from their mouth, that they may not be food for them.

3 (11-16): The flock regathered with their portion from Jehovah.

3 For thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold I, even I, will [e]search for my sheep, and examine* [as to] them. As a [f]shepherd examineth his flock in the day that he is among his scattered flock, so will I examine* [as to] my flock, and deliver them out of all the [g]places whither they were scattered in the [h]cloudy and dark day. And z cf. Lk.16.2. cf. Mt.21.43. cf. 1 Sam.13. 14.

*Or, "seek out."

a ch.5 8,etc. b ch. 33. 6-8. cf. Jer.13.20. cf. Heb.13. 17.

c cf. 1 Sam.2. 27-33. cf. 1 Ki. 13. 34.

d ver. 22. cf. 1 Sam.17. 34, 35.

e cf. Ps. 80. 1. cf. Ps. 119. 176.

f cf. Lk. 15. 4-6. cf. Is. 40. 10, 11.

g cf. Lev. 26. 40, 41.

h cf. ch.30 3. cf. Jer. 13. 16, 17.

the true shepherd like the wanton abuse or neglect of the sheep, and here is One whose heart never needed to be stirred, but abides continually with His people, however long He may have patience, and however much circumstances may seem to argue that He has forgotten them. Therefore, as we shall see, it is Jehovah Himself who is manifested as the Shepherd of Israel, and that in the One raised up to them in tender grace; One who is Himself Man, and a stranger to nothing in man, except man's inherent evil.

2 The doom of the shepherds is therefore now announced. It is the judgment of love which smites for deliverance. There must be an end of this false assumption of the shepherd's place without the shepherd's heart—an assumption so peculiarly offensive to Him whose heart is with the sheep, who is afflicted in all the afflictions of His people, and who, when He arises for their help, will make a thorough work of it.

3 Thus the Lord declares that He will come in and search for His sheep and examine their condition. The language is human language, and we see here, according to what Ezekiel has shown us elsewhere, the likeness of a Man upon the throne. God speaks as if He were ignorant; therefore to examine into everything were a first necessity; and in truth there is what answers to this. God is careful to expose fully the evil with which He is dealing, that in His government He may be justified by all His creatures. This is the meaning of all those solemn assurances of a day of judgment to come, when the books are opened, and all the history of those brought before the judgment-seat is thoroughly entered into. There are crises of judgment which anticipate this, in which God allows the character of things fully to come out, allowing to come to a head the evil upon which He is going to smite, and bringing out the secret thoughts of men's hearts into open day. Thus as to His flock, Jehovah will examine their whole condition and all that has led to it. Their scatterings shall cease when the Voice is heard which His people know—which does not scatter, but brings together; and this, therefore, by removing every cause of

I will [i]bring them out from the peoples, and [j]gather them from the countries, and will bring them to their [k]own land; and I will [l]feed them upon the mountains of Israel by the water-courses, and in all the [m]habitable places of the country. I will feed them in a [n]good pasture, and upon the high [o]mountains of Israel shall their fold be: there shall they [p]lie down in a good fold, and in fat pasture shall they feed upon the mountains of Israel. I myself will feed my sheep, and I will [q]cause them to lie down, saith the Lord Jehovah. I will [r]seek that which was lost, and will bring again that which was driven away, and will [s]bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick; but the [t]fat and the strong I will destroy: I will feed them with [u]judgment.

[i] cf. Jer. 31. 8, 9, ch. 11. 17, etc.
[j] Jer. 32. 37, etc.
[k] Amos 9. 14, 15, etc.
[l] cf. Mic. 7. 14, 15, ch. 36. 28, 29.
cf. Is 25. 6.
[m] Jer. 23. 3, 4, 8.
cf. Mic. 4. 3, 4.
cf. Zech. 3. 10.
[n] Ps. 23. 2.
cf. Ps. 65. 11, 12.
cf. Jer. 31. 12–14.
[o] Is. 25. 6, Is. 65. 25.
[p] Jer. 33. 12, 13.
[q] cf. Song 1. 7, 8.
cf. Is 11. 6, 7.
cf. Hos 2. 18

4 (17-22): The sifting in mercy.

[4] And as for you, my flock, thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I judge [v]between sheep and sheep, between the rams and the he-goats. Seemeth it a small scattering. Yet scattering may be at times the very thing that is of God, which He permits to avoid worse evil: nevertheless it is only permission for a brief time. What is in His heart is gathering, not scattering. And so He declares that He will deliver His flock out of all the places whither they were scattered in the cloudy and dark day. He has realized the darkness of it, and He will bring them out from the peoples, and gather them from the countries, and bring them into their own land. It has been their own land in His mind all the way through; and if for a time it has refused to own them as its inhabitants, there is no setting aside of the purposes which, with God, can never be repented of. The mountains of Israel shall welcome them again, and all the springs shall be set running for their benefit, and all the habitable places of the country shall be filled with them. The mountains, which so peculiarly characterize the land of Israel, shall provide good pasture for them, lifted up and kissed as it were by the light of heaven. That is where God would ever have His people feed, and there are the fat pastures to be provided now. He will feed them and make them to lie down. How thoroughly these things go together in His mind—provision and rest, in which all the evils that have afflicted them in the long past shall be put away, the lost restored, the wounded bound up, the weak strengthened; but, on the other hand, the fat and the strong destroyed! We know what this means: God is thinking of those who have been feeding themselves at the cost of the sheep, and have become fat through the spoiling of others. They of necessity will be the objects of swift, sure judgment: "I will feed the flock with judgment," says the Lord.

[r] vers. 4, 11; cf. Is. 40. 11; cf. Mic. 4. 6, 7; cf. Mt. 9. 36–38. [s] cf. Is 61. 1–3 with Lk. 10. 33–35; cf. Lk. 15. 4–7. [t] ch. 39. 17–19; cf. Deut. 32. 15. [u] cf. Amos 4. 1–3; cf. Jer. 23. 15. [v] vers. 20–22; ch. 20. 37, 38; cf. Jas. 5. 1–8; cf. Zech. 10. 3.

[4] The searching which the Lord institutes is to go down deeper than merely with certain heads of the people: "Behold," says the Lord, "I judge between sheep and sheep," not merely between sheep and shepherds. "The rams and the he-goats" seem to speak not alike of objects of His judgment. The rams belong to the flock themselves, but the he-goats are alien to it. They are, as we know, in the Lord's own picture of judgment, representatives of those whom the Son of Man puts upon His left hand, as He puts the sheep upon His thing unto you to have eaten up the *w*good pasture, but ye must *x*tread down with your feet the residue of your pasture, and to have *y*drunk of the clear waters, but ye must *z*foul the residue with your feet? And as for my sheep, they eat that which ye have *a*trodden with your feet, and drink that which ye have fouled with your feet.

Therefore, thus saith the Lord Jehovah unto them: Behold, I, even I, will judge between the *b*fat sheep and the lean sheep. Because ye *c*thrust with side and with shoulder, and push all the weak ones with your horns, till ye have *d*scattered them abroad:—I will *e*save my flock, that they may no more be a prey; and I will judge between sheep and sheep.

5 (23-31): Immanuel.

*f*And I will set up *f*one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even my servant *g*David; he shall feed them, and he shall be their shepherd. And I Jew cf. Num. 16. 9, 13. cf. 1 Sam. 2. 12-17. ctr. Acts 20. 33-35. cf. Mic. 2. 2. x cf. Mt. 15. 6-9. cf. Mt. 23. 13. cf. Lk. 11. 52. ctr. 2 Cor. 2. 17. y cf. 2 Cor. 6. 1. ctr. Acts 4. 20. z cf. ch. 32. 2. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 2. cf. Phil. 1. 15. ctr. 1 Cor. 2. 13. a ver. 18. b vers. 10, 17. cf. Ps. 72. 2, 4. cf. Ps. 22. 24, 26, 29. cf. Gal. 6. 12, 13.

c vers. 3-5; ctr. Rom. 15. 1; ctr. 1 Thess. 2. 7, 8; cf. Gal. 5. 15; cf. Zech. 11. 5; cf. Lk. 13. 14-16. d Jer. 23. 1; Jer. 50. 17; cf. Lk. 11. 23; cf. Jno. 10. 12. e Jer. 23. 4; vers. 11-16; cf. Is. 40. 11. f cf. Mic. 5. 2-5; cf. Zech. 13. 7; cf. Jno. 10. 11 with Heb. 13. 20. g ch. 37. 24, 25; cf. Is. 11. 1; cf. Is. 55. 3, 4 with Acts 13. 34-37; Jer. 30. 9; Hos. 3. 5.

right. Among the sheep there are those who have from God a certain natural place as leaders, and when God is working among His people, as in the days to come, these must of necessity come to the front. Leaders among the people of God are always recognized. It is the character of the leading which determines as to what it is before God. The true leader is he who leads by the Word itself, and to faith in it, and not in the leader, therefore. And he who says, "Follow me as I follow Christ", puts Christ before the eyes of His people as the measure by which he himself and all his leading is to be measured. How good to have those who, if they have found a bit of good pasture, must run to tell others of it! And this is a kind of leading open to all that have hearts for it. How different the conduct of those of whom the Lord speaks here, who not only have eaten up all the good pasture for themselves, but must tread down and spoil what is left of it: not satisfied with drinking of the clear waters, they must foul the residue with their feet. How this applies to such as rose up in Israel after this, when the rule of the priest was changed for the rule of the rabbi, is obvious to all; who, as our Lord said, were "teaching for doctrine the commandments of men," and putting their own word before the word of God. They made the flock eat what they had trodden with their feet, and drink what they had fouled with them. And it is not in Israel only that these things have taken place. Alas, how Christendom has copied them in fullest detail! But God is going to judge between the fat sheep and the lean sheep. The lean sheep are His objects now—the people who have suffered from these things, and whom He sees suffering. Thus He will save His flock that they may no more be a prey, and will judge between sheep and sheep.

5 Now we come to what is God's complete thought for them. He has one true Shepherd that is to be set over them; in that sense, only one; there is not another, and "He shall feed them, even my servant David." "The introduction of David without anything further or particular," says Schroeder, "confirms what is stated by Hengstenberg, that the Messiah, the glorious offspring of David, had in the time of the prophet been for long a lesson of the catechism."

hovah will be [h]their God, and my servant David [i]prince among them: I Jehovah have spoken it. And I will make with them a [j]covenant of peace, and will cause evil [k]beasts to cease out of the land; and they shall dwell in [l]safety in the wilderness, and sleep in the woods. And I will [m]make them and the places round about my hill a blessing; and I will cause the [n]shower to come down in its season; there shall be [o]showers of blessing. And the tree of the field shall [p]yield its fruit, and the earth shall yield her increase; and they shall be in [q]safety in their land, and they shall [r]know that I am Jehovah, when I have [s]broken the bands of their yoke and have delivered them out of the [t]hand of those that serve themselves of them.

h ch. 36. 28, etc. Is. 43. 2, 3.
i cf. Josh. 5. 13-15. cf. Is. 9 6, 7. cf. Acts 5. 31.
j ch. 37. 26. cf. Jer. 31. 31-33 with Heb. 8 8-13.
k cf. Lev. 26. 6. cf. Is. 35. 9. cf. Hos. 2. 18-23.
l Jer. 23. 6, etc.
m cf. Gen. 12. 2. cf. Is. 19 24. cf. Zech. 8. 13, 23.

n cf. Is. 2 2-5. o Lev. 26. 4; Ps. 68. 9. p Deut. 28. 12; cf. Ps. 72. 6; cf. Is. 32. 15; cf. Is. 44. 3; cf. Mal. 3. 10-12. q ch. 47. 12; Ps. 67. 6; Is. 35. 1, 2. r Is. 32. 18. s ch. 33. 29, etc. t Ps. 107. 16; Jer. 2. 20; cf. Ps. 116. 16; cf. Lev. 26. 13. t cf. Is. 52. 2, 3; cf. Ps. 18. 17.

That is true, and it is sweet to think how God necessarily supposes that they will know who is spoken of here, the true David, of whom the one in history was only a type. He is to take up David's place and office in a more glorious fashion: David's Son is also David's Lord, "the Beloved," as His name means; and our hearts recognize Him in this way: "He shall feed them, and He shall be their Shepherd." And thus alone it can be that Jehovah will be their God. Thus alone will "the covenant of peace" be theirs—the peace by a covenant never to be broken, and as a consequence, all nature at peace with them, evil beasts gone: "They shall dwell in safety in the wilderness, and sleep in the woods." Eden, but a better Eden, has come for them; and from the hill of God, His dwelling-place among them, the object for every eye and every heart, blessing shall flow out to all the places round about. Heaven yields its seasonable showers: "There shall be showers of blessing." Thus the curse is removed, and the land yields its increase. The tree of the field comes to its fruit, not casts it, and in all this they shall know that it is Jehovah who has brought them into this blessing; it is Jehovah who has burst the bands of their yoke and delivered them; it is Jehovah who has come in with the deliverance which is now eternal. They shall be no more a prey, nor shall they fear it. There shall be no danger nor thought of danger. How blessed to think of such a time at hand, and for a world trodden by the feet of oppressors, as the world has been.

But the attention is turned once more to God's central figure for them: "I will raise up for them," says He, "a plant of renown." Neither shame nor hunger can be their portion when God has done this. "A plant for a name" is the literal rendering, which reminds us at once of the Name in which is all the revelation of God for man, which has been in His thought from the beginning—revelation come to its completion, and all things taking shape according to this. For this Immanuel (Jehovah, revealed in Christ) is among them; the bond of His humanity is never to be broken, and Israel as His people are compassed with those blessed arms which are yet to be seen about the whole creation of God, linking it forever with God. They need not fear, then, to recognize the weakness which as creatures necessarily belongs to them. It is the wholesome lesson which they have taken so long to learn, and which we are all so slow to learn, though a very simple one: "Ye my sheep, the sheep of my pasture, are men, and I am your God, saith the Lord Jehovah."

And they shall [a]no more be a prey to the nations, nor shall the beast of the earth devour them; but they shall dwell in safety, and none shall make them afraid. And I will [b]raise up for them a plant of renown, and they shall be no more consumed with [c]hunger in the land, nor bear the []shame of the nations any more. And they shall know that I Jehovah their God am [d]with them, and that they, the house of Israel, are [e]my people, saith the Lord Jehovah. And ye, [f]my sheep, the sheep of my pasture, are men: I am [g]your God, saith the Lord Jehovah.

*Or, "reproach."

a ch. 36. 15. Jer. 30. 10. cf. 2 Sam. 7. 10. cf. Heb. 10. 17.
b cf. Is. 4. 2. cf. Is. 11. 1. cf. Is. 61. 3. c cf. Is. 49. 9, 10.
d ch. 36. 3. 7. cf. Is. 51. 22, 23.
e Ps. 46. 7, 11. cf. Is 8. 9, 10.
2 cf. Hos 2. 23.
f ch. 36. 38. cf. Is 40. 11. Ps. 78. 52
g cf. 1 Tim. 3. 15. 11, 16, 26-30. h ver. 24: cf. 2 Cor. 6. 16-18.

What does this mean?—that we are men. The word is "adam": God "called their name Adam, in the day that He created them"—a name which comes from adamah, "the ground." Yes, just to learn that we are men! Have we learnt it? Do we act and speak as if we had truly learnt it? That they were formed out of the clay is not the whole matter, of course, and it is not what made them the offspring of God, or in His likeness, but it is the suited word to keep us humble; yet, even so, it is a word of triumph too, of God's triumph, for in them the dust of the ground is made to shine with a new glory. He has taken up this very dust, not putting it away as if the material thing were unsuited for Him, but developing all the capacities which are latent in it, which are not capacities of the spirit but for the spirit, in which matter itself becomes a fitted servant of the spirit, and God as the Creator is revealed all through in the goodness of His work. The dust of the ground is become man, and God Himself has met us in Christ, claiming man, even man's flesh as His, of which He is not, and never will be, ashamed. Is it not the display of His glory, is it not His triumph, this wonder of divine condescension, this stooping of divine love?! Yes, men are thus the sheep of His pasture, and they have no cause to forget, but ever to remember and thank and bless Him ever that they are men.

Sec. 2.

We have now a prophecy of a wholly different character; it is a natural corollary of what we have had before us. Israel are now the people of God. But "was not Esau Jacob's brother?" It is God's own challenge to Israel in Malachi: "Was not Esau Jacob's brother? saith the Lord. Yet I loved Jacob, and I hated Esau, and laid his mountains and his heritage waste for the dragons of the wilderness. Whereas Edom saith, We are impoverished, but we will return and build the desolate places; thus saith the Lord of hosts, They shall build, but I will throw down; and they shall call them, The border of wickedness, and, The people against whom the Lord hath indignation forever. And your eyes shall see, and ye shall say, The Lord will be magnified from the border of Israel" (Mal. i. 2-5). This is the question which comes up here, Esau was Jacob's brother. Were they so unlike each other after all? Was he not Jacob "the supplanter?"—the man with the hand upon the heel of his brother; the man always intent upon his own gain and little careful as to his means of acquirement; the man who believed in himself and who, if he cannot fully trust God, must act for himself? whose motto, "God helps those who help

SECTION 2 (Chap. XXXV.)

The enemy answered.

And the [c]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying. Son of man, set thy face against [d]Mount Seir, and prophesy against it, and say unto it, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I am [e]against thee, Mount Seir, and I will stretch out my hand upon thee, and I will make thee a [f]desolation and an astonishment. I will lay thy [g]cities waste, and thou shalt be a desolation: and thou shalt [h]know that I am Jehovah. Be-

[c] ch. 21. 1, etc.
[d] cf. ch. 20. 46. ch. 25. 8.
[e] ch. 5. 8. Nah. 2. 13.
[f] cf. ch. 5. 14, 15. ch. 25. 13.
[g] cf. Joel 3. 19. cf. Mal. 1. 3, 4.
[h] vers. 9, 12, etc.

themselves" has had wide circulation. It is but the picture of a fallen being, and Jacob was such, we know. Are any of us different? We may take comfort then that God can yet say: "I loved Jacob!" Nay, that He can call Himself "The God of Jacob," which is but another way of saying, The God of grace. Jacob has another name, as we know, but that is what he is by the work of God, by that only. This "worm" Jacob can only by divine fashioning become a threshing instrument which shall "thresh the mountains, and beat them small, and make the hills as chaff" (Isa. xli. 15). Upon these two names, Jacob and Israel, God dwells in contrast all through their history. It is the history essentially of every soul that has learnt what divine grace is; as Esau's, on the other hand, is the history of a soul that has never learnt grace, and whose misery is this, not only that he has never learnt it, but resists it.

This lesson, which God is holding up before us all, Esau might have learnt, but did not. God has sworn that He has no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, and Ezekiel has borne witness to this. But He has but one way of acceptance and blessing, and not another; and he that will not learn this must be without the blessing, akin as he may be naturally, as indeed he is, to his brother that has obtained it. But thus there arises the perpetual grudge and enmity that the Edomite has against the Israelite, and it is an enmity which is really to God, to God's thoughts and ways. Thus we need not wonder if it come into special consideration here, just when Israel comes into his blessing, which is also the time when Edom is finally cast out.

The prophet is instructed to set his face against Mount Seir and prophesy against it, and say: "Thus saith the Lord Jehovah. Behold, I am against thee, Mount Seir, and I will stretch out my hand upon thee, and will make thee a desolation and an astonishment." Mount Seir is Edom's possession, a "rough," or "rugged place," as the word means. Esau has chosen for himself; therefore he has not chosen well. Does ever any one choose well who chooses for himself? When Abram stood with Lot in the land which God had told him was to be his by divine gift, the man of faith could say in the liberality which comes from faith, "Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me: if thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right: or if thou depart to the left hand, then I will go to the right," but Lot was of another mind: "Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain of Jordan that it was well watered everywhere, before the Lord destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah—even as the garden of the Lord, like the land of Egypt, as thou comest unto Zoar. Then Lot chose him all the plain of Jordan; and Lot journeyed east: and they separated themselves the one from the other" (Gen. xiii. 9–11). Alas, they were separated by more than locality, and we know the cause thou hast had perpetual [i]enmity, and hast given over the children of Israel to the power of the sword in the time of their [j]calamity, in the time of the iniquity of the end; therefore, as I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, I will appoint thee to [k]blood, and blood shall pursue thee; since thou hast not hated blood, therefore blood shall pursue thee. And I will make Mount Seir a desolation and an astonishment, and [l]cut off from it him that passeth through, and him that returneth; and I will [m]fill his mountains with his slain: in thy hills, and in thy valleys, and in all thy watercourses shall they fall that are slain with the sword. I will make thee [n]perpetual desolations, and thy cities shall not be inhabited: and ye shall know that I am Jehovah.

Because thou hast said, These two nations and these two countries shall be [o]mine, and we will possess it,

[i] cf. ch.25.12. cf. Gen. 27. 41, 42. cf. Ps.137.7.
[j] cf. Jer.18.21. cf. Obad. 13.
[k] cf. Ps. 109. 16-18. cf. Is.63.1-6. cf. Rev. 16. 5-7.
[l] cf. ch.29.11. cf. 2 Chron. 15. 5, 6.
[m] ch. 31. 12, etc. cf. Amos 1. 12. cf. Is. 34. 2-6, etc.
[n] ch. 25. 13. Jer. 14. 17, 18. Zeph. 2. 9.
[o] ch. 36. 5. cf. Ps. 83. 4-12. cf. Obad. 12, 13.

after-history of Lot's fatal choice. In a sense, God was before him also. This plain of Jordan was it not like the Garden of God? All this that spoke so alluringly to his heart, was it not of God, and good? Why should he not enjoy what God had made so manifestly for enjoyment? Alas, how is it that we can forget how sin has disordered everything, even to the very eyes that look upon things now? And Lot chose, as we know, what did not become to him a Mount Seir only because God had mercy towards him—only that God forbade it to be that to him! Lot was to be driven out, as he was driven out, and that was God's mercy to him; but Edom, the profane person, had chosen in deliberate profaneness, and Mount Seir accordingly was his.

Alas, when God has to give according to one's own desire merely, and not according to what would be for His heart a gift! Mount Seir was Esau's choice; yet it could not, after all, remain his. The things that we choose naturally are things which cannot abide because we would have them do so; for there is a judgment of God which may follow, though we see it not, of which we may be warned and yet have no eyes to see. And Edom was to know that God is Jehovah, the true and unchanging God in what He threatens, as in what He promises. Yet the portion of Jacob invited Edom too. But the kind of craving he had for it only stirred in his heart as enmity against its possessor; and thus Edom is the typical enemy of Israel through all his history. That is the point here: "Because thou hast had perpetual enmity, and hast given over the children of Israel to the power of the sword in the time of their calamity, in the time of the iniquity of the end; therefore, as I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, I will appoint thee to blood, and blood shall pursue thee. Since thou hast not hated blood, therefore blood shall pursue thee." We have already had this in brief in a former prophecy, but God returns to dwell upon it for the lesson that is in it, a lesson that we may all well ponder. He that will nurse enmity in his soul shall be himself pursued by the enmity that he nurses, and when this is enmity to God and to His grace, however he may disguise it, it will necessarily be judged as such, and the end is sure. Edom is the ancient infidel as to God. He sees Israel's land, but he does not see Jehovah's presence in it. Thus he thinks to possess himself of that in which he finds Jehovah as his adversary, and the bitter fruit of his unbelief is made good whereas [p]Jehovah was there: therefore, as I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, I will do [q]according to thine anger, and according to thine envy, that which thou hast done out of thy hatred against them; and I will [r]make myself known among them when I shall judge thee. And thou shalt know that I Jehovah have [s]heard all thine insults which thou hast uttered against the mountains of Israel, saying, They are laid desolate, they are given us to devour. And ye have [t]magnified yourselves against me with your mouth, and have multiplied your words against me: I have heard it. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: When the [u]whole earth rejoiceth I will make thee a desolation. As [v]thou didst rejoice over the inheritance of the house of Israel because it was desolate, so will I do unto thee: thou shalt be a desolation, O Mount Seir, and all Edom, the whole of it: and they shall [w]know that I am Jehovah.

p cf. Ps. 48. 1-3.
cf. Is. 12. 6.
q Ps. 137. 7.
cf. Ps. 9. 16.
cf. Mt. 7. 2.
r cf. Ps. 76. 1-3.
cf. Is. 49. 26.
cf. Is. 60. 16.
s cf. Ps. 94. 9, 10.
cf. Is. 37. 4, 23.
t cf. Is. 10 13-15.
cf. Mal 3.13.
cf. 2 Pet 2.18.
u cf. Is 14.7,8.
cf. Is.65.13-15.
cf. Lk.16 25.
v ch. 36. 2-5.
cf. Prov.17.5.
cf. Lam.4.21.
cf. Obad. 12, 15.
w vers. 4, 9. ch. 39. 6, etc.

to him as what he has indeed chosen, little as he knew the character of his choice. Was there not plenty in Israel to provoke righteous wrath against them? Yes, and God had to show this as against their misdeeds.

But the enemy's wrath is not righteous; it is of another character. It is against Jehovah at bottom, as all unbelief is; and this is what comes out in result here. The question is not between Edom and Israel, but between Edom and God. If they said of the mountains of Israel that they were desolate, was it not true? But they did not discern the difference between chastening and rejection: therefore they said, "They are given us to devour." But if Israel can for the time cast themselves out of the very land that is their own, Edom can never enjoy it: "Ye have magnified yourselves against Me with your mouth, and have multiplied your words against Me. I have heard it. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah; When the whole earth rejoiceth, I will make thee a desolation. As thou didst rejoice over the inheritance of the house of Israel because it was desolate, so will I do unto thee. Thou shalt be a desolation, O Mount Seir, and all Edom, the whole of it; and they shall know"—what a wail there is once more in this, "they shall know—that I am Jehovah."

Sec. 3.

We have now the work of restoration, of re-organization, accomplished first of all in the land once more becoming Israel's. Jehovah claims it from its would-be possessors, and gives it back to Israel. But, that they may enjoy it, a deeper work must be done in the nation itself, and thus we have the Lord sprinkling clean water upon them to make them clean, and putting within them a new heart and a new spirit. In the third place we have the resurrection of the nation as such, their political resurrection, the embodiment in a fitting manner of the new life; and for this Judah and Ephraim, so long sundered, must come together. God can lose nothing of that which, through grace, is now to be owned as His. There must be no final triumph of the power of evil anywhere. The work of restoration is thus to be completed; but the seal of their new condition and the perfect blessing which is to be theirs forever—the return of the glory of God, which Ezekiel had seen depart, but which henceforth is to be in brighter display in the restored city—remains yet to be given

SECTION 3 (Chaps. xxxvi., xxxvii).

Restoration and reorganization.

1 (xxxvi. 1-15): The land claimed by Jehovah and given back to Israel.

1. And thou, son of man, prophesy unto the [x] mountains of Israel, and say, Ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of Jehovah. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Because the [y] enemy hath said against you, Aha! and the ancient high places are [z] ours in possession: therefore prophesy, and say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Because, yea, because they have [a] made you desolate, and swallowed you up on every side, that ye might be a possession unto the residue of the nations, and ye are taken up on the lips of talkers, and the [b] defamation of the people: therefore, ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Lord Jehovah. Thus saith the Lord x cf. ch. 6. 2, 3. cf. ch. 33. 28. cf. ch. 34. 14. cf. ch. 37. 22. cf. Mic. 4. 1.

y ch. 35. 15. ch. 25. 3. ch. 26. 2.
z ver. 5. cf. Deut. 32. 13. ch. 35. 10. cf. Jer. 49. 1.
a cf. Is. 10. 13–15. cf. Mic. 3. 12.
b Deut. 28. 37. 1 Ki. 9. 7, 8. Ps. 44. 13, 14. cf. Ps. 79. 10.

us. It has a place by itself, therefore, as the crown of their blessed condition when the city itself shall be known upon earth as the dwelling-place of God with man, Jehovah Shammah, "The Lord is there."

1. We have, first of all, Jehovah's word to the land itself. This is in plain connection with the claim which the Edomite enemy had made to possess it. It must be vindicated from this reproach, therefore. The land is really Jehovah's land, and He certainly has never forfeited it, and will never give it up to those who are His enemies. Israel are to possess it upon the surest ground possible—that of God's grace. They are to be sojourners with Him, to be His guests, and thus to know all the resources of His hand, as well as the full protection necessitated by this relationship.

Thus Ezekiel is instructed now to prophesy to the mountains of Israel, and say: "Ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of Jehovah: thus saith the Lord Jehovah; Because the enemy hath said against you, Aha, and the ancient high places have become ours in possession: therefore prophesy and say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Because, yea, because they have made you desolate, and have swallowed you up on every side, that ye might be a possession to the remnant of the nations, and ye are taken up on the lips of talkers, and the defamation of the people; therefore, ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Lord Jehovah." These mountains have been addressed before, in the sixth chapter, but in far other terms. They were then the seats of an idolatry which dared to lift its head in a special manner in the high places of the land. Desolation had come upon them, therefore; and the enemy had taken it up as a reproach both to them and to Jehovah Himself. But these mountains of Israel, very far from being what we have seen Mount Seir to be (the indication of the folly of Esau's choice and the barrenness of the portion which had thus become his own), were characteristically verdant and fruitful mountains, the places of pasture for the flock; they also were in testimony to the condition of a people whom Jehovah owned as His: round about whom He stood as the mountains round about Jerusalem. Their foundations must be upon the earth, but their tops were lifted high into the light and glory of heaven. How different from their condition since!—a reproach, in their present barrenness, in the sight of those that look upon them—the types, as so many suppose, of the hopeless forfeiture of all things by the people to whom they belonged! How often Jehovah de-

Jehovah to the [c]mountains and to the hills, to the water-courses and to the valleys, to the desolate wastes and to the [d]cities that are forsaken, which are become a prey and derision to the residue of the nations that are round about; therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Surely in the fire of my [e]jealousy have I spoken against the residue of the nations, and against all [f]Edom, that have appointed my land unto themselves for a possession with the joy of all their heart, with [g]spite of soul, to take possession of it for a prey. Therefore prophesy concerning the land of Israel, and say to the mountains and to the hills, to the water-courses and to the valleys, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I have spoken in my jealousy and in my wrath, because ye have borne the [h]reproach of the nations; therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah: I have [i]lifted up my hand [saying], Surely the [j]nations that are about you, they shall bear their shame. And ye, mountains of Israel, shall [k]shoot forth your branches, and yield your fruit to my people Israel; for they are at [l]hand to come. For, behold, I am [m]for you, and will [n]turn unto you, and ye shall be [o]tilled and sown. And c ver. 1. cf. Lk. 19. 41–44.

d ch. 6. 14. cf. Jer. 33. 10 13.
e Deut. 4. 24. cf. Is. 66. 15, 16.
f ch. 25 12–14.
g Amos 1. 11.
h vers. 3, 15. cf. Ps. 123. 3, 4.
i ch. 20. 5, 15. Deut. 32. 40. cf. Rev. 10. 5.
j cf. Jer. 25. 9, 15 29. cf. Amos 1. 3, 6, 9, 11, 13. cf. Amos 2. 1. cf. Zeph. 2. 4, etc.
k cf. Ps. 65. 9–13. cf. Is. 27. 6. cf. Hos. 2. 21, 23.
l cf. ch. 12. 25 cf. Jas 5. 8, 9.
m cf. Rom. 8. 31.
n cf. ch. 6, 2, 3.
o cf. Ps. 60. 1. cf. Joel 3. 18; cf. Zech. 8. 12.

clared here that He has pledged Himself by His never-to-be-broken word, to their revival!

That word therefore takes in all the land: "Thus saith the Lord Jehovah to the mountains and to the hills, to the water-courses and to the valleys, to the desolate wastes and the cities that are forsaken, which have become a prey and a derision to the remnant of the nations that are round about; therefore, thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Surely in the fire of my jealousy have I spoken against the remnant of the nations, and against the whole of Edom who have appointed my land unto themselves for a possession with the joy of all their heart, with spite of soul, to take possession of it for a prey." This is all that the enemy could do. Make it yield its fruit to him, he could not; and already we see this in the long Sabbaths in which the land has rested while Israel has been banished from it. To none of the nations would it yield its strength, and the people who are in present possession are just those who can be readily characterized as mere plunderers, and nothing else. But this suits, in the meanwhile, Jehovah's purpose. With all this, they are as it were, His watchmen against the intrusion of those who might take it up with more serious intent to make their own out of it. The hordes that sweep over it still, the government under which it remains and under which everything like prosperity is impossible, all this is but the sign that the land is still waiting for her true inhabitants.

The prophet is instructed, therefore, to speak to the mountains and to the hills, to the water-courses and to the valleys, and to declare to them that they shall yet shoot forth their branches and yield their fruit to His people Israel, as a people who are at His hand, ready to come. The people, as we know, are kept as distinct as ever they were, under the same repression meanwhile as their land has been. Jerusalem is to "be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." If we see, as surely we do see now, the

I will [p]multiply men upon you, all the house of Israel, the whole of it; and the cities shall be [q]inhabited, and the waste places shall be built. And I will multiply upon you man and beast; and they shall increase and be fruitful; and I will cause you to be inhabited as in your [r]former estate, yea, I will do [s]better [unto you] than at your beginnings: and ye shall [t]know that I am Jehovah. And I will cause men to walk upon you, even my people Israel; and they shall [u]possess thee, and thou shalt be their inheritance, and thou shalt no more henceforth [v]bereave them of children. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Because they say unto you, Thou [w]devourest men and hast bereaved thy nation, therefore thou shalt devour men [x]no more, neither [y]bereave thy nation any more, saith the Lord Jehovah; neither will I cause thee to hear any more the [z]reproach of the nations, and thou shalt no more bear the [a]scorn of the peoples, nor shalt thou cause thy nation to stumble any more, saith the Lord Jehovah.

2 (xxxvi. 16-38): A new heart and a new spirit given with increase.

2. And the [b]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, when the house of Israel dwelt in their own land they [c]defiled it by their way and by their doings: their way was before me as the [d]uncleanness of a woman in her separation. And I [e]poured out my p ver. 37. cf. Is. 60. 2.

q cf. Jer. 30. 18-21. cf. Is. 51. 3. cf. Is. 61. 4.
r Jer. 30. 18. Jer. 31. 38-40. cf. Obad. 19-21.
s cf. Is. 30. 26. cf. Joel 3. 18-21. cf. Hag. 2. 6-9. cf. Zech. 8. 11-15. cf. Heb. 8. 8-13.
t ch. 35. 9, etc.
u cf. Jer. 32. 15, 42-44.
v etc. Jer. 15. 7.
w cf. Num. 13. 32.
x cf. ch. 37. 25-28. cf. Amos 9. 14, 15. cf. Is. 60. 20-22.
y cf. Zech. 9. 8. etc. Is. 60. 21. cf. ch. 7. 19. cf. ch. 34. 29. ver. 6. Is. 54. 4. cf. Mic. 7.

8 10. a cf. Zeph. 2. 8. cf. Ps. 89. 50. b ch. 35. 1, etc. c cf. Lev. 18. 24-28; cf. Num. 35. 33, 34; cf. Ps. 106. 37, 38; cf. Jer. 2. 7, etc. d cf. Lev. 15. 19, etc. with Lk. 8. 43, etc. e ch. 21. 31, etc. cf. Ps. 74. 1.

people gathering back, and the land sought to by them for a new occupation, we have in all this the proof that God is ready to turn His face towards them and to their land alike. It would then be seen far other than as the eye of the stranger has seen and the scoff of the infidel has declared it, a land that has but devoured its inhabitants. It is to be, as the faithfulness of God is pledged to make it, a land that shall be "the glory of all lands," a land upon which His eye rests continually: "I will multiply men upon you—all the house of Israel, the whole of it; and the cities shall be inhabited, and the waste places shall be built, and I will multiply upon you man and beast; and they shall increase and be fruitful." Thus has God pledged Himself; and, as in other cases, if He restore it is not merely to the old fruitfulness, to the condition at the beginning, but to one far better than at the beginning. The reproach of the nations shall be entirely removed from it, and His glory shall be more fully seen than ever where men have assumed to see His dishonor.

2. The prophet now turns from the land to the people themselves. The condition of the land was but the reflection of their own condition. If Joshua sees the people flee before their enemies, and in astonishment and dismay falls before God to ask, "And what wilt Thou do for thy great name?" the sufficient and only answer is, "Israel hath sinned." But Israel has resisted the lesson of their scattered condition, and have turned it even into a matter of self-glorying as if it were the sins of others that they were bearing and making atonement for! Thus they have interpreted Isaiah liii. God here asserts against them that it is judgment on account of their condition. They have defiled the land with their idolatry, and He scattered them among the nations, and they wrath upon them for the [f]blood which they had shed upon the land, and because they had defiled it with their [g]idols. And I [h]scattered them among the nations, and they were dispersed through the countries: [i]according to their way and according to their doings I judged them. And when they came to the nations whither they went, they [j]profaned my holy name when it was said of them, These are the [k]people of Jehovah, and are gone forth out of his land. But I have pity for my [l]holy name which the house of Israel had profaned among the nations whither they went. Therefore, say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: I do [m]not this for your sakes, O house of Israel, but for my holy name which ye have profaned among the nations whither ye went. And I will [n]sanctify my great name which hath been profaned among the nations, which ye have profaned in the midst of them; and the [o]nations shall know that I am Jehovah, saith the Lord Jehovah, when I shall be sanctified in you before their eyes. And I will [p]take you from among the nations, and [q]gather you out of all the countries, and will [r]bring you into your own land. And I will sprinkle clean [s]water upon you, and ye shall be clean:

f cf. ch. 23 37. cf. Gen. 4. 10, 11.
g cf. Is. 66 17, 18.
h Lev. 26. 33. Amos 9. 9.
i ch. 39. 24. cf. Gal 6 7, 8.
j cf. Is. 52. 5 with Rom. 2. 24
k cf. Ex. 32. 11–13. cf. Josh. 7. 9. cf. Jer. 33. 24.
l ch. 20. 9, 14, 22. cf. Ps. 79. 9.
m cf. Deut. 7. 7, 8. cf. Dan. 9. 18. n cf. ch. 28. 22. cf. Lev. 10. 3.
o ch. 39. 27, 28. cf. Ps. 126. 2.
p ch. 34. 13. cf. Ps. 107. 2, 3.
q cf. Is. 11. 11–16. cf. Is. 43. 5, 6. cf. Jer. 30. 3.
r cf. Jer. 23. 3–8.

cf. Is. 27. 12, 13; cf. Jer. 31. 8, 9; cf. Jer. 32. 43, 44. s cf. Lev. 14. 5–7; cf. Is. 52. 15; cf. Tit. 3. 5, 6; cf. Jno. 3. 5; cf. Heb. 10. 22; cf. 1 Pet. 1. 23; Eph. 5. 26.

have been dispersed through the countries. According to their ways and according to their doings He has judged them: nor can they say that it was for their sin before they were carried captive into Babylon, but that since then they have been clear. They were, in fact, permitted to go back into their land, in order that they might, with the lesson of their past before them, receive the One who alone could atone for the iniquities they had committed. But to these sins they have added the crowning sin of rejecting Him who came to them, aforeannounced by the prophets, with the signs and wonders with which God sealed the testimony that He gave. Thus they have bought for themselves an Aceldama with the price of His betrayal. Thank God, for this also there can be and will be forgiveness; for grace shall yet manifest itself for them above all their sins! But how vain to plead that that to which the prophet looks on here, was the termination of their scattered condition—a condition which was expressly the judgment for their sins—when we go on to that which follows here! Have they ever been taken from among the nations and gathered out from all the countries and brought to their own land? Have they ever, with a new heart and a new spirit, entered upon the possession of that from which they are no more to be alienated? It is impossible honestly to read a prophecy such as we have here and not to see that the scattering which began at Babylon has never really come to its end for God; but that they are still abiding, as Hosea declared they should abide, "many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim" (Hos. iii. 4). Their idolatrous ensigns have indeed passed from them; but recover themselves from that in which their sins have involved them, they never can until, as another prophet has declared, "they shall look upon Me whom they have pierced, and shall mourn for Him as one mourneth for an only son . . . In from all your filthiness and from all your idols will I cleanse you. And I will give you a [t]new heart, and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will [u]take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you a [v]heart of flesh. And I will put my [w]Spirit within you, and cause you to [x]walk in my statutes, and keep my judgments, and do them. And ye shall dwell in the [y]land that I gave to your fathers; and ye shall be [z]my people, and I will be your God. And I will [a]save you from all your uncleannesses; and I will call for the [b]grain, and will multiply it, and lay [c]no famine upon you. And I will multiply the fruit of the trees and the [d]increase of the field, so that ye may receive no more the reproach of famine among the nations. And ye shall [e]remember your evil ways, and your doings that were not good; and ye shall [f]loathe yourselves in your own sight for your iniquities and for your abominations. [g]Not for your sake do I this, saith the Lord Jehovah, be it known unto you: be ashamed and confounded for your ways, O house of Israel.

t cf. Deut. 30. 6. cf. Ps. 51. 10. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 17.
u ch 11.19,20. cf. Zech. 7. 12. cf. Mt. 13. 5, 20, 21.
v cf. Heb. 8. 10.
w ch 37. 14. cf. Joel 2.28, 29. cf. Is. 44. 3. ctr. Eph. 1. 13.
x ch. 37. 24. cf. Ps. 15. 2. cf. Gal. 6. 15, 16.
y ch. 28. 25, 26.
z Jer. 30. 22. Hos. 1. 10. Zech. 13. 9. cf. 2 Cor. 6. 16-18. cf. Rev. 21. 3, 7.
a cf. Hos. 14. 2, 4, 8. cf. Zech. 13. 1. cf. Mt. 1.21. b vers. 8, 9; cf. Hos. 2. 21, 23; Ps. 65. 13. c ctr. Joel 2. 21-27; cf. Jer. 14. 1-6 d cf. Ps. 67. 6, 7; ctr. Deut. 29. 22. e ch. 16.61-63. cf. Dan. 9. 4-20. f cf. Job 42. 6; cf. Isa. 6. 5. g Deut. 9. 5; Ps. 115. 1; cf. Tit. 3. 3-6.

that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and for uncleanness" (Zech. xii. 10; xiii. 1). God will fulfil His word, but only in His appointed way, and the cleansing of His people can only come when He sprinkles upon them that "clean water" which, as a type of old, declared the virtue of a sacrifice before completed—not a work of atonement as then newly wrought, but the verity of that which, blessed be God, still abides for them when faith in them shall be able to claim it.

There is a remarkable connection here between the 51st psalm and the prophet's declaration. This is the answer from God to their prayer, as it is prophetically given us in the psalm referred to. The prayer is: "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean: wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow . . . Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me" (Ps. li. 7, 10). Put this in connection with the promise here: "I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean . . . and I will give you a new heart, and a new spirit will I put within you." How plainly the one corresponds to the other, while there is indeed, as one might expect, a greater fulness in the answer than in the prayer! That this 51st psalm is, in fact, the voice of the people when they shall turn to God in the latter days, has been seen by many, and the proof of it has been fully given elsewhere. (See Ps. li., Notes.) It was David's voice that utters it, no doubt, but the personal application to himself is plainly not all, and this "Purge me with hyssop" clearly refers to the language in Ezekiel—to that sprinkling which is for cleansing from defilement with the dead, and speaks of a more terrible defilement of the people, and of God's provision for it in a sacrifice whose virtue, as already said, still abides for them. It is like that other remarkable ordinance for the day of atonement, when the sins of the people are carried away by the scape-goat, which does not

Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: In the day that I cleanse you from all your iniquities, I will cause also the [h]cities to be inhabited, and the waste places shall be builded. And the land that was desolate shall be [i]tilled, whereas it was a desolation in the sight of all that passed by. And they shall say, This land that was desolate is become [j]like the garden of Eden; and the [k]waste and desolate and ruined cities are fortified and inhabited. And the [l]nations that shall be left round about you shall know that I Jehovah build the ruined places and plant that which was desolate: I Jehovah have [m]spoken it, and will do it.

h Zech 8.7,8. cf. Is. 40. 9.
i cf. Deut. 29. 24 with Jer.32.42-44. cf. Is. 35.1,2.
j Is 51. 3. etc. Joel 2.3.
k etc. Is 29. 1-6 with Ps. 48.2,12-14.
l cf ch. 17. 24. cf. ch. 34.28-30. ch. 37. 28. ch.39.23,etc.
m cf. Nu. 23. 19. cf. 2 Chr.6.4.

make atonement for them, but which is identified with an atonement already made. (See Leviticus xvi., Notes.) The priest has carried in the blood of the offering for them—the blood of the first goat; but no answer as to it comes forth for them while the priest is himself hidden in the sanctuary into which he is entered. When he comes out again, the scapegoat (identified with the first goat in the work which has been accomplished before, and which is not repeated) carries away the iniquities of the nation to a land cut off. Thus, in fact, Israel will be met by the power and virtue of an atonement made before our Great High Priest passed into heaven. There He remains, and so long as He remains there hidden from them, Israel have practically no atonement for them nationally. Their sins are not put away.

How perfectly this is in keeping with the sprinkling of water in which are the ashes of a sacrifice before offered—the memorial of a before-accomplished work. It is then only that this word is carried out: "From all your filthiness and from all your idols will I cleanse you." They abide as yet under the condemnation of their sins, as it is plain that nationally a new heart and a new spirit, which are the accompaniment of this, have never yet become theirs. Had it been so, that which follows immediately here would have taken place, and a fulness of blessing would be theirs, in which their whole condition would bear witness to the reality of what God is yet to do for them. It is not mere reformation; it is no work such as man can perform. If David witnesses that God must create in him a clean heart, so the promise here declares: "I will give you a new heart." It is the new heart that He will give which can alone alter their condition, a new heart which is itself the effect of a new spirit put within them.

The words at once remind us of the Lord's declaration to Nicodemus, that the Israelite also needed to be born again in order to inherit the kingdom of God. Water and Spirit the Lord puts together in these words: "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God;" "born of the Spirit" implies, therefore, a new spirit in the person so born—a new and divine nature from the Almighty Worker of every true work that has ever been done in man. (See John iii., Notes.)

For this, the heart of stone must be taken out of the flesh, that a heart of flesh—a true feeling and tender heart—may be theirs. To this is added the blessed assurance: "I will put my Spirit within you," and thus, as the glory rests upon Jerusalem itself in the days that we are so shortly to contemplate, there is to be for all His saved among the people a personal assurance of this glorious reality. "I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and keep my judgments and do them." Then follows that for which only now they are fit, and are seenre in it: "Ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers, and ye shall be my people, and I will be your God."

Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: I will yet for this be [n]inquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them; I will [o]increase them with men like a flock. As the [p]holy flock, as the flock of Jerusalem at her appointed [q]feasts, so shall the waste cities be filled with flocks of men: and they shall [r]know that I am Jehovah.

n cf. Jer. 29. 11-14. cf. Jer. 50. 4, 5. cf. Zech. 13 9. o ver. 10, etc. p ch. 34. 11, etc. q cf. Deut 16. 16, etc.; cf. Ps. 80. 1 with Is. 40. 11. r ch. 37. 28, etc.

The increase of the land follows as a necessary consequence. Israel's portion is in the earth, and therefore nature itself is a witness to the relation in which they stand to God. It has been largely a witness against them, as we know. It is yet to bear testimony of another kind. Christians are taken out of the world, and are strangers and pilgrims in it: their portion is elsewhere. But, alas, with Christians also there can be a reproach of famine, which is the index of how they stand with God. How many have gone down to Egypt, as Abraham did of old, because of a famine in their own things! Our land is indeed "the glory of all lands;" but it is, above all things, a dependent land, and if we are not in communion with God we have less than any others; for the world is a wilderness for us, however much we may dream of plenty in it, while our own portion, though not denied us, surely, can yet be found only by those who dwell in it. The word is still for us, "Dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed." It is not so much the knowledge of the evil we have brought upon ourselves that brings repentance, but, in its full character, it is the wonder of the Lord's grace that does so; as the apostle says, "The goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance," so it will be when Israel shall have been brought back into their land by the mercy of God, and find His abundant welcome in the light of His glorious presence. They shall indeed remember their evil ways and their doings that were not good, and loathe themselves for their iniquities and abominations.

Meanwhile God is acting for Himself, as He declares here. He is in a measure doing in Israel what we shall know in a still brighter scene and in all its fulness, when God shall show "the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness toward us in Christ Jesus." It is not only for their sakes or for our sakes that God takes up any, but He delights to make Himself known in all that He is —the depths of the riches of His wisdom as well as of His love. Thus He has a sure ground upon which to act, and we have an unchallengeable blessing, which never can be forfeited. If God is going to show "the exceeding riches of His grace," where can we limit that? What wondrous revelations are implied here! It is good, while we are thinking of all the prophet here sets before us, to realize that they are but the figures of the things which belong to us—not indeed in the sense in which so many would make them figures, as depriving Israel of their just title to them, for the apostle of the Gentiles has assured us that these Old Testament promises belong to his "kinsmen according to the flesh:" it seems idle, therefore, to discuss whether these promises do belong to Israel. The earth at that time will be, as it were, a reflection of the heavens that are opened over it. But we shall have to trace this more fully in our prophet when we reach the final chapters. There is no confusion between the earthly and the heavenly spheres of blessing, and there is no excuse for any making confusion. Correspondence there is indeed, and we shall find many a lesson in seeking to trace this.

God has not forgotten man and the earth, and He is not going to drop it out of sight and have done with it. It is the scene of His own Son's sufferings, and the earth itself has been purchased by Him. It shall therefore be redeemed, not done away. The millennial blessing itself is but a step to the full glory of it. It is its regeneration time, according to the Word elsewhere (Matt. xix. 28), the time when evil shall be put down and righteousness shall rule, but not yet

3 (xxxvii): The resurrection of the body.
1 (1-14): Life in the Spirit.

3. [1] The [x]hand of Jehovah was upon me, and Jehovah [t]carried me out in the Spirit, and set me down in the midst of a [u]valley; and it was full of [v]bones. And he caused me to [w]pass by them round about; and, behold, there were many in the open valley; and, behold, they were very [z]dry. And he said unto me, Son of man, [y]can these bones live? And I answered, O Lord Jehovah, [z]thou knowest. And he said unto me, [a]Prophesy over these bones, and say unto them, Ye [b]dry bones, [c]hear the word of Jehovah. Thus saith the Lord unto these bones: Behold, I will cause [d]breath to enter into you, and ye shall live. And I will put [e]sinews upon you, and will bring up flesh upon you, and cover you with skin, and put breath in you, and ye shall live; and ye shall [f]know that I am Jehovah.

x ch. 1. 3, etc
t ch. 8. 3. ch. 11. 24. cf. 2 Cor. 12. 1-4.
cf. Rev. 1. 10, etc.
u ctr. ch. 17. 22-24
cf. Zech. 12. 11.
cf. Zech. 14. 4, 5.
v cf. Ps 141.7 Ver. 11
w cf. Neh. 2. 12-16.
cf. Lk. 19.41 etc.
ctr. Ps. 48. 12-14. z cf. Ps. 32. 4
cf. Eph. 2. 1
y cf. Rom. 11. 15; cf. Jer. 30. 10-17. z cf. Jer. 32. 17, 27; cf. Rom. 4. 17. a ctr. 1 Ki. 13. 2; cf. 1 Ki. 17. 20-22 cf. Lk. 3. 2, etc. b cf. Acts 17. 30. c cf. Is. 26. 19; cf. Is. 42. 18; cf. Jno. 5. 25. d cf. Gen. 2. 7 cf. 1 Pet. 1. 23; cf. Jno. 1. 3-8. e vers. 8-10; cf. 2 Ki. 5. 14; cf. Jer. 30. 17. f ch. 36. 38, etc.

the time when it will be utterly banished. That there comes between this and the time of full blessing, the passing away of the heavens and earth to be replaced by new heavens and a new earth, has been misapprehended so as to make a great mistake in the way. The earth passes—is to be changed—just as the body passes from the corruptible to the incorruptible, from the state of dishonor which sin has caused, to the state of glory; but the identification of the risen man with the man who toiled and suffered and sinned upon earth is no less complete on this account. We speak of a "new man" when we do not mean another man in the strict sense of the word; so we speak of "a new earth" which will indeed be that, as every one shall realize, yet not another earth, but the earth made new—a realized fulfilment of God's thoughts with regard to the earth when He created it. We do not go on to that here. Save in a single expression, Old Testament prophecy is limited to the millennium as its outlook, and then that kingdom shall have begun in which, under the rule of Him who is the perfect Revealer of the mind of God, that which is eternal will be perfected. What we have here is, on the one side, the trial of man still, but, on the other, God is finally inviting (by the display of all this beauty and the manifestation of His truth and grace) men to enjoy it. Revelation assures us that even then, as there will be hearts obdurate to it all the way through, so there will be a final outbreak even under those glorious skies. It is the necessary manifestation of what has been kept down by power throughout the millennial reign, in order that judgment may make the clean work which it must finally do that perfect blessing may come in.

And what a witness to man will be that which we find here; and they shall say: "This land that was desolate is become like the Garden of Eden, and the waste and desolate and ruined cities are fortified and inhabited!" There is no room for doubt or question any longer but that Jehovah has done this. There will be no skeptics or atheists in those days; yet, alas, the enmity of man's heart will not be removed even by that wondrous vision. "The nations that shall be left round about you shall know that I Jehovah build the ruined places, and plant that which was desolate. I Jehovah have spoken it, and will do it."

That which follows immediately is not necessarily a condition that God will "yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel to do it for them;" but, rather, the assurance that they will. It does not involve, as some seem to imagine, that the actual unbelief of the nation at the present time has set aside such promises as these which have been given them. The Lord goes on imme-

And I prophesied as I was commanded; and as I prophesied, there was a noise, and, behold, a rustling, and the bones [g]came together, bone to its bone. And I beheld, and, lo, sinews and flesh came up upon them, and [h]skin covered them above; but there was [i]no breath in them. Then said he unto me, Prophesy unto the wind, prophesy, son of man, and say to the [j]wind, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live. And I prophesied as he commanded me, and the breath [k]came into them, and they lived, and [l]stood up upon their feet, an exceeding great [m]army.

g cf. Jer 50.4 cf. Ezra 2.1
h cf. Neh. 10. 29.
i cf. Mt. 23. 13-28.
j vers. 5, 14. cf. Jno. 3. 8. cf. Acts 2. 2. k cf. Ps. 104. 30. cf. Rev. 11. 11. cf. Prov. 1. 23. l cf. Lk. 7. 14, 15. cf. Jno. 11. 43, 44. cf. Is. 51. 17. cf. Is. 52.1,2. m cf. Is. 60. 8, 9; cf. Ps. 149. 6–9.

diately with His assurances, which certainly do not rest upon any foundation less broad than that upon which He has set them. God is acting for the glory of His name, and who shall disappoint Him? "I will increase them with men," He says, "like a flock, as the holy flock; as the flock of Jerusalem at her appointed times; so shall the waste cities be filled with flocks of men, and they shall know that I am Jehovah."

3. We have still to see this restoration of Israel stamped as a resurrection; God bringing them out of a condition in which even to themselves all hope is lost. They are but as the dry bones of the slain, of which, if the question be raised, "Can these bones live?" the answer can only be in God's hands. The new life of the nation is truly a resurrection. The stamp which God is putting upon all things here is to be put distinctly upon this people yet. It will not be by their own efforts or achievements—as they are thinking and planning now—that they will become all that the prophets have declared that they shall become. Nothing but the quickening breath of God can accomplish it for them, and for this they have yet to be brought down into the dust, even after all that they have suffered for these centuries, in order that they may learn their needed lesson of abasement and may learn the grace to which, as they shall finally own, they owe everything.

[1] We have two parts in this chapter: First, new life in the Spirit is given to the nation which thus becomes miraculously reorganized; while, in the second part we have what must be in order for this, the healing of the long breach between Judah and Ephraim, so that the nation as a whole shall re-attain its unity and under the true David, from whom, alas, they have alike gone astray. "The hand of Jehovah was upon me, and Jehovah carried me out in the Spirit, and set me down in the midst of a valley, and it was full of bones; and He caused me to pass by them round about, and behold, there were very many on the face of the valley, and behold, they were very dry." There is no mingling here of the dead and the living as the prophet sees them. They are altogether those from whom not merely life is departed, but who are the mere dry and scattered relics of the dead. The prophet is challenged by the question: "Son of man, can these bones live?" To man of course this is impossible. The passage from death to life has never been achieved, save by the power of God alone; and this, spite of all their present thoughts, is the condition out of which God at last revives them. It is not the actual condition of the nation at present in which, as we know, there are yet those who live—live spiritually. "Blindness in part is happened unto Israel." It is true that these are, in the mind of God, no more part of the people according to the flesh; they have lost their Jewish hopes, to find in the loving mercy of God far better ones. When the Lord shall have removed His present people to Himself, the Church, this

And he said unto me, Son of man, these bones are the whole [n]house of Israel. Behold, they say, Our [o]bones are dried up, and our hope is lost: we are [p]cut off. Therefore prophesy and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I will open your [q]graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, O my people, and bring you into the [r]land of Israel. And ye shall know that I am Jehovah, when I have opened your graves, and caused you to come up out of your graves, O my people. And I will put my [s]Spirit in you, and ye shall live, and I will place you in your own land: and ye shall [t]know that I Jehovah have spoken it, and have done it, saith Jehovah.

n vers. 16,19
cf. Is. 11. 12, 13.
cf. 1 Ki. 18. 31, 32.
o cf. Nu. 17. 6, 12, 13.
cf. Ps. 77. 7, 9
cf. Is. 49. 14.
cf. Lam. 2. 21, 22
cf. Lam. 3. 4
p cf. Hos. 1. 6, 9.
cf. 2 Chr. 36. 14–21.
q Hos. 13. 14. Dan. 12. 2.
r ch. 25. 3.
s ch. 36. 27.
cf. ch. 11. 19. ch. 18. 31.
ch. 36. 26; ch. 39. 29. t ch. 36. 36, 38; ch. 37. 6; ch. 5. 13, 17, etc.

state of things will be ended. The nation will be then, in their rejection of Christ, utterly dead. The prophet answers: "O Lord Jehovah, Thou knowest," and then he is bidden to give Jehovah's word to the dry bones themselves. The nation is to be thus new born by the word of God, and from the dead. Every step here is a true creative work of God: "Behold, I will cause breath to enter into you, and ye shall live; and I will put sinews upon you, and will bring up flesh upon you, and cover you with skin, and put breath in you, and ye shall live." And then comes once more the refrain,—for this alone is what can make it truly life: "Ye shall know that I am Jehovah."

So the prophet prophesies and sees the miracle wrought—the wondrous miracle of resurrection. He sees the bones come together, and the flesh cover them, and the form given, while yet there is no breath from on high. But then he is told to prophesy to the winds, the type, as we know, in the Lord's words, of the Spirit; and from the four winds, the breath comes into these slain, and now they live. These that, but a moment since, were mere inanimate and scattered wrecks of departed life, are now at once an exceeding great army, the hosts of the Lord.

The prophet is not left in doubt about the vision. The bones are the whole of the house of Israel, and in a condition in which they are made to realize at last that, as to themselves, there is no hope any longer. They are not only dead, as the prophet has seen them, but in their graves, buried and gone. But this is the stamp which God puts upon everything in nature. The evening dies into the night before the morning springs out of it. The earth itself will have to find its dissolution before it comes to that new earth in which dwelleth righteousness. Ezekiel's wheel is going round; it is ordained to abase all the glory of man in order that man may come at last to true glory. In resurrection alone can everything be stable, as that which manifests the power of evil already met and conquered, and no foe to meet again. God has done it all Himself; He has taken upon Himself the whole burden of it! How strange a work He has wrought in order that He might lift creation into the glory that yet shall be, every Christian knows. And Israel shall know who it is that has done this, that He is indeed Jehovah, when He has opened their graves and caused them to come up out of their graves and put His Spirit in them that they may live. The blessing still keeps to the old sphere of promise for them; as an earthly people the earth is their destiny. "I will bless you," says the Lord, "in your own land." Then shall prophecy find its full witness and have the eternal seal upon it: "Ye shall know that I Jehovah have spoken it, and have done it, saith Jehovah."

z (15 28): The restoration of the brotherhood of Judah and Ephraim.

z And the u word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, And thou, son of man, take thee one v stick, and write upon it, For w Judah, and for the children of Israel his companions. And take another stick, and write upon it, For x Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and all the house of Israel his companions. And y join them one to another into one stick; and they shall become one in thy hand. And when the children of thy people speak unto thee, saying, Wilt thou not z declare to us what thou meanest by these? say unto them, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I will take the stick of Joseph which is in the hand of Ephraim, and the tribes of Israel his companions, and will put them with this, [even] with the stick of Judah, and make them one stick, and they shall be a one in my hand. And the sticks whereon thou writest shall be in thy hand before their eyes. And say unto them, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I will b take the children of Israel from among the nations whither they are gone, and will c gather them from every side, and bring them into u ch. 35. 1, etc.

v ch. Num. 17. 6. 13.
w 1 Chron. 5. 2. Gen 49. 8. 12 x 1 Chron. 5. 1. Gen 49. 22-26.
y vers. 22-24.
z ch. 24. 19.
a Mic. 4. 6, 7; 5. 3. Zeph. 3. 14-20.
b ch. 36. 24. ch 28. 25. Is. 11. 11, 12.
c ch. 36. 24. ch. 34. 13. ch. 20. 34.

z One thing remains which must not be omitted. The ancient and unnatural strife between Judah and Ephraim must and will surely pass away if all this is to be; and the complete assurance of it is given: "The word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, And thou, son of man, take thee one stick and write upon it: For Judah, and for the children of Israel his companions. Then take another stick, and write upon it: For Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and for all the house of Israel his companions; and join them one to another into one stick, and they shall become one in thy hand."

The people are Jews, for us now; that is, they are all of Judah; and the question has even been asked whether such coming together did not find its accomplishment long ago, when the people returned out of captivity in Babylon. Thus we are told with regard to the prophetess Anna, in our Lord's day, that she was of the tribe of Asher; and it is thought that other intimations are given that the ten tribes, so often spoken of as "the lost tribes," have become merged long since into this one Jewish race. But this will not do for the prophecy here, and assuredly it will not do for God. It is distinctly in their own land, and under the King whom God will raise up to them, when God shall be once more manifestly their God, His sanctuary set in the midst of them forever, that this prophecy shall find its accomplishment. There is a universal gathering: "Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the nations whither they are gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land; and I will make them one nation in the land, upon the mountains of Israel; and one King shall be king to them all, and they shall be no more two nations; neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all." That the time of all this is future should need no argument, nor should it need one that the promise to which God has appended no condition here (but which He affirms He will Himself fulfil) can never be set aside by any unfaithfulness of the people of whom He speaks, a people whose unfaithfulness has been all contemplated (and realized) from the beginning. Faithless as they may be, the time will come, as God has announced it, when they shall no more defile themselves with their idols nor with their detestable things, nor with any of their transgressions, but He will save them out of their dwelling places wherein they have sinned, and they shall be His people and He will be their God.

their own land; and I will make them [d]one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel, and [e]one king shall be king to them all: and they shall be [f]no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all. Neither shall they [g]defile themselves any more with their idols, nor with their detestable things, nor with any of their transgressions; but I will [h]save them out of all their dwelling places wherein they have sinned, and will cleanse them: and they shall be [i]my people, and I will be their God. And my servant [j]David shall be king over them; and they all shall have one shepherd: and they shall [k]walk in my judgments, and observe my statutes, and do them. And they shall dwell in the [l]land that I have given to [m]Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers dwelt; and they shall dwell therein, they and their children, and their children's children forever: and [n]David my servant shall be their prince forever. And I will make a [o]covenant of peace with them: it shall be an everlasting covenant with them; and I will place* them, and [p]multiply them, and will set my [q]sanctuary in the midst of them forevermore. My [r]tabernacle also shall be over them; and I will be their [s]God, and they shall be my people. And the [t]nations shall know that I am Jehovah that sanctify Israel when my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them forever.

d Jer. 3. 18; 30. 3. Isa. 11. 13. Hos. 1. 11.
e ch. 34. 23. Jer. 30. 21; 23. 1-8.
f ch. 48.
g ch. 36.26,29. ch. 39. 7. ch. 43. 7. ch. 14. 11. Hos. 14. 4-9. Jer. 3. 17.
h ch. 36. 28. ch. 28. 25. ch. 20 41. Mic.7.18-20. Jer. 50. 20.
i ch. 36. 28.
j ch. 34. 24.
k ch. 36. 27.
l ch. 36. 28. ch. 28. 25.
m ch. 28. 25. Gen. 35. 12. n cf. Amos 9. 11.
o ch. 34. 25.
p ch. 36. 10.
q ch. 43. 7. ch. 48. 8, 10, 21.
r cf. Is. 33. 20-22. Is. 4. 5, 6 s Hos. 1. 10. ch. 11. 20; ch. 14. 11.
t ch. 36. 23.

* Lit., "give."

The former shepherd-king comes again before us here, David, "the Beloved." This keeper of sheep has celebrated in his psalms, as we well know, Jehovah Himself in this character, and realized wondrous things from it: "Jehovah is my Shepherd; I shall not want." This is God's thought of rule, as Christ, the true Shepherd, fully manifests it; so that even if He take the rod of iron, as He will do in the time near to come, it will be to "tend" or shepherd the nations with it. Here is one with whom rule is ministry, and subjection to Him is subjection to eternal love itself. Thus when God at last shall be able to show all that is in His heart, in the times contemplated here, how shall it in fact be shown? When they shall dwell in the land as their unalienable inheritance, they and their children and their children's children forever; and David, "the Beloved," himself the servant of Jehovah, shall be their prince forever. The One who claims obedience shall be the One who has walked in obedience, and that at all cost to Himself, and in devotedness to all the interests of His people.

Thus the "covenant of peace" shall be made with them—"He has made peace by the blood of His cross." Thus it shall be an everlasting covenant with them: and "I will bless them," says the Lord, "and multiply them, and will set my sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore." This last remains for full expansion by the mouth of Ezekiel himself, but divine love lingers upon it: "My tabernacle also shall be over them"—those covering wings which once they refused, but of which they shall yet know the blessedness—"and I will be their God, and they shall be my people; and the nations shall know that I am Jehovah that sanctify Israel, when my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for evermore."

SUBDIVISION 2. (chaps. xxxviii., xxxix.)

Salvation fully realized through Jehovah's judgment of Israel's last enemy

Section 1. (chap. xxxviii. 1-7.)

The leaders in this final conflict.

And the [u]word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, Son of man, set thy face against [v]Gog, the land of [w]Magog, the prince of Rosh, [x]Meshech, and [y]Tubal, and prophesy against him, and say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I am against thee, O Gog, prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal. And I will turn thee back, and put [z]hooks into thy jaws, and I will bring thee forth, and all thine army, horses, and horsemen, all of them thoroughly equipped, a great assemblage with targets and shields, all of them handling u ch. 37. 15.

v Rev. 20. 8.
w Gen. 10. 2. 1 Chr. 1. 5.
x Gen. 10. 2. 1 Chron. 1. 5, 17. Ps. 120. 5. ch. 27. 13; ch. 32. 26.
y Gen. 10. 2. 1 Chr. 1. 5. Is. 66. 19. ch. 27. 13. ch. 32. 26. z cf. 2 Ki. 19. 28. cf. ch. 29. 4.

SUBDIVISION 2.

Israel is now brought finally back from her long captivity and planted in the land, no more to be removed, the face of the Lord never again to be turned from her. This being accomplished, there remains only the condition of the world outside to be dealt with, and to show the effect of these judgments in the deliverance of the earth.

There are three spheres of judgment in Ezekiel, apart altogether from the sphere of professing Christianity, which, of course, is not seen in Ezekiel.

First of all comes the judgment of the Gentiles who have been brought in contact with the light, and who are judged, therefore, with regard to their responsibility as to this. We shall constantly find that they are judged by their attitude towards Israel, and that the judgment does not go, therefore, beyond the circle of those who have been brought in contact with Israel. This we have seen already.

The judgments in Ezekiel are earthly judgments, and by the hands of the Gentiles themselves—in short, of Nebuchadnezzar, in whose hands God had put the imperial power. The Gentiles, who never had any revelation, are entrusted with this power. Therefore, they are directed at least to the true God and to His message, as we find in Daniel, God Himself dealing expressly with the man to whom He had entrusted this power. This ends speedily in the discovery that he is but like all those who have been entrusted with such responsibility, as we see in the image of gold set up in the Plain of Dura, and where those who confess the true God have to suffer for their faithfulness. What follows is the history of increasing departure; the history of Nebuchadnezzar himself and of his successors being taken as the exemplification of it. With the Lord's personal coming the story of the empires ends. But this is not the end altogether of Gentile history. Morally, man is completely judged, but the full assurance of this condition is seen in what follows—"the times of the Gentiles."

swords: [a]Persia, [b]Cush,* and [c]Phut† with them, all of them with shield and helmet; [d]Gomer,‡ and all his bands; the house of [e]Togarmah from the farthest north, and all his bands; — many peoples with thee. Be thou prepared, and prepare for thyself, thou, and all thine assemblage that are assembled unto thee, and be thou a guard§ unto them.

a ch. 27. 10. cf. Dan. 2. 32 39; 5. 28-31; 8. 20.

b cf. Gen. 2. 13; 10. 6. 8. Jer. 46. 9. Zeph. 2. 12 Dan. 11. 43 ch. 30. 4, 5, 9 c cf. Gen. 10. 6. 1 Chr. 1. 8. ch. 27. 10; 30. 5. Jer. 46. 9. Dan. 11. 43. Nah. 3. 9.

d cf. Gen. 10. 2, 3. 1 Chr. 1. 5, 6.

e cf. Gen. 10. 3 1 Chr. 1. 6. ch. 27. 14.

* Cush was the son of Ham, and the father of Nimrod. Cush, or Ethiopia, has reference in general to a powerful kingdom to the south of Egypt, while the connection with Nimrod associates the family with the first kingdom in Babylonia.—(J. B.).

† The A. V. gives Libya, the Greek name for the region along the Mediterranean, west of Egypt. The Hebrew name is Phut.—(J.B.)

‡ Gomer was the eldest son of Japheth, and father of Ashkenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah. He is the supposed progenitor of certain branches of the Celtic family. His descendants settled to the north of the Black Sea, spreading to the South and West of Europe.—(J.B.)

§ "Or, "chief," "commander."

This is what we have in the chapters now before us, in which the last manifestation of the Gentiles is given. If we look carefully at the names of the peoples here mentioned, we see at once that we are in a different sphere from that of Daniel. We return to what we find at the very beginning: Magog, Meshech, Tubal, Gomer and such like, which carries us right back to Gen. 10; it sets before us the final history of those who, we may say, had as yet no history at all. It is evident that the sons of Japheth are here before us, and that Japheth is seen as the prodigal that has wandered away from God; and having lost God, he has lost himself no less.

If we look at the genealogies in Gen. 10, we shall see how brief and fragmentary they are. As with the sons of Gomer, those of the next generations are only put before us in a broken manner, and they soon end altogether; nor have we any revival of them until we come to Ezekiel. With the exception of Persia in a partial way, we have nothing of the Gentiles numbered among the imperial powers of Daniel; for, as already said, the imperial history ignores these.

The first name here, a strange one in Scripture, we may recognize in another form. It is said that Gog means "extension;" Magog is but the same with the additional thought, perhaps, of "means," or "place of," "extension." Japheth is "enlargement." Thus Japheth and Gog give us thoughts to some extent similar.

[End of "Notes" by Mr. Grant.]

Now Ezekiel clearly shows how in the coming days of peace and prosperity, following the gracious work of restoration recorded in the preceding chapters, Jehovah will bring up against His people and their land these great and powerful nations which are situated outside the limits of the empires of which Daniel speaks. They have been already met in the full assemblage of their power at Har-Magedon (Rev. xvi. 12-16; xix. 11-21), followed by the judgment, at the Lord's appearing on Mount Olivet (Zech. xiv. 1-4), of the great host gathered

Section 2. (chap. xxxviii. 8-13.)

The evil designs of the enemy

After many days shalt thou be visited; at the end of years|| thou shalt come into the land brought back from the [f]sword, [g]gathered out of many peoples, upon the [h]mountains of Israel which

|| This expression would seem to have the same meaning as another of very distinct prophetic connection, i. e., "the last," or "latter (end of, New Trans.) days," which occurs just 14 times (Gen. 49:1; Num. 24:14; Deut. 4:30; 31:29; Isa. 2:2; Jer. 23:20; 30:24; 48:47; 49:39; Ezek 38:16; Dan. 2:28; 10:14; Hos. 3:5; Mic. 4:1), in all of which the reference is clearly to the closing scenes of Jacob's time of trouble and the establishment of the Millennial kingdom, as a study of the context of these passages will show.—(J. B.)

f cf. Is. 1. 20, Hos. 11. 6.

g ver. 12. cf. 20.34,etc. 28. 25, etc. 36. 24, etc. 37. 21. Is. 11. 12; 54. 7; 56. 8. Jer. 23. 3; 29. 14. Zeph. 3. 19, 20.

h cf. ch. 36. 1 15. ch. 37. 22.

for the capture of Jerusalem. But Gog and his hosts are brought up after these scenes of judgment, and when Israel is dwelling safely (vers. 8-11), for the purpose of manifesting before all nations the absolute supremacy of Jehovah in all the earth. The object in view is emphatically stated (xxxviii. 16, 23; xxxix. 6, 7, 21, 22, 28).

This prophecy not only warns, and so prepares, the people for this last great invasion, but it is intended to give them confidence, since it makes known that Jehovah will act on their behalf—He who has so blessedly established them in the land under the True Shepherd. Further they will not need to fight; Jehovah shall rise in His fury; He shall fight and triumph gloriously, and Gog shall find not a spoil, but a grave in Israel's fair land, which shall be a perpetual memorial, a witness to Jehovah's great power in judgment upon this insolent enemy.

After this great show of the enemy's arrogance, his destruction, and the purging of the land from the defilement of their corpses, we have in beautiful sequence the dwelling place of God with the detail of its establishment, the Sanctuary of the land and people, the divine centre of the earth, for "The Lord is there."

Thus, in the order of these events, we see the linking together of important features which often appear in the ways of God. First, the people are gathered back and established in favor; secondly, the enmity and power of the enemy is permitted under God's hand to manifest itself, resulting in God being glorified, while full deliverance becomes the portion of His people. Thenceforth "none shall make them afraid" any more, God in glory dwelling in their midst.

These things are illustrated on two other prominent occasions. In Egypt during the plagues, and at the Passover, the people are manifested as having special favor in the eyes of Jehovah; they are marked off from those under judgment, though in exile and poor slaves under Egypt's power; these conditions find a certain correspondence in the days of which Ezekiel speaks, in that a people scattered and peeled, trodden down under Gentile oppression, is delivered and brought into blessing in their God-given land. And as Pharaoh and all his hosts came against the delivered people, only to meet his utter destruction, so shall it be with Gog and his company; and as the Tabernacle, God's dwelling, was set up among the people, so here, have been a perpetual [i]waste: but it is brought forth out of the peoples, and they shall all of them be dwelling in [j]safety. And thou shalt ascend, thou shalt come like a [k]storm, thou shalt be like a [l]cloud to cover the land, thou, and all thy bands, and many peoples with thee.

i cf. ch. 5. 14. ch. 6. 14. Jer. 2. 15. cfr. Is. 60. 18; 61. 4. Amos 9. 14, 15.
j cf. ch. 28. 24-26. Jer. 32. 37. ch. 34. 27, 28. Hos. 2. 18. k cfr. Is. 4. 6; 25. 4. l cfr. Is. 4. 5; 25. 4, 5; ch. 30. 3; 31. 12; Jer. 4. 13.

as already remarked, the Sanctuary of the Millennial glory is established. The other occasion is in David's time. The nation, delivered out of the abject condition which existed in the closing period of the Judges, is established in blessing under David's rule with the subjugation of enemies, followed by the peaceful reign of Solomon and the building of the Temple.

We may translate these things into our individual experience. Redemption not only places us before God in favor, but also where we become special objects of the enemy's attack in full power (Eph. 6). For this the panoply of God is provided, invested in which, victory is assured. This leads into the possession of our spiritual blessings in heavenly places, into what spiritually answers to the sanctuary for us.

The truth in the Epistle to the Romans may be considered in a similar setting. First, our salvation out of ruin through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. Then we get the questions as to sin, the flesh, and the law, by means of which the enemy assails the saved soul, yet permitted by God for its exercise and blessing. God delivers by the Word of Truth, and this introduces to the glorious things of Romans 8—a sanctuary chapter. Other analogies of this divine order may be traced in Scripture. To thus see the ways of God is not only instructive, but comforting and assuring to the heart. How certain it is that He makes all things work together for good to His people. The enemy can do nothing but what shall abound to His praise and our blessing.

Let us now consider this important prophecy in more detail.

Sec. 1.

1. The leaders in the conflict soon to ensue are first set before us. It is the Lord Jehovah as against Gog, prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal. For faith this must at once settle the issue. "Who may stand in Thy sight when once Thou art angry?" Who?—for it is the hour when the earth must fear and be still, God having arisen in judgment "to save all the meek of the earth" (Ps. lxxvi.).

Gog is evidently a ruler of great power and influence, for he is able to gather under his leadership a complex group of nations, on behalf of whom Jehovah commands him to prepare in view of the coming conflict, and to whom he is to be a "guard" or "commander." This marks him as a military organizer and leader. Here we have simply the statement of his great assemblage. The time at which it takes place and the object, are given later in the chapter.

These nations do not fill a large place in prophecy. Persia alone has any measure of prominence. They are not immediately adjacent to the land, nor do they belong to the western confederacy. They

Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: It shall even come to pass in that day that things shall come into thy mind, and thou shalt conceive an evil purpose; and thou shalt say, I will go up to the land of unwalled villages; I will come to them that are at rest, that dwell in [m]safety, all of them dwelling without walls, and having neither bars nor gates, to seize a [n]spoil, and to take a prey; to turn thy hand against the [o]waste places that are [now]

m ver. 8.
n cfr. Is. 17. 12-14.
o ver. 8.

are the Gentile nations external to the groups mentioned in Daniel and Revelation, and largely descendants of Japheth, from whom come the inhabitants of "the isles of the sea" (Gen. x. 5). In a general way these peoples have been located near to and north of the Black Sea, Rosh pointing to Russia. It seems clear that we have in this assemblage a great northern confederacy which becomes the last instrument in Satan's hand by which he will seek the destruction of the chosen people then restored to the land under Messiah.

We must also distinguish this company and this invasion (which takes place early in the Millennium) from that which comes after the 1000 years of Messiah's reign, though Gog and Magog are again introduced (see notes on Rev. xx. 7-9).

Sec. 2.

Let us now endeavor to place this invasion in relation to the closing events of Daniel's 70th week. In this connection first note the words, "I will turn thee back" (xxxviii. 4; xxxix. 2). The force of this expression is to cause to return as to a place previously occupied. This being said of the invasion of the land at the time of which this vision treats seems to suggest that Jehovah is bringing these nations back again to a place formerly visited. In view of this the inquiry may be raised as to whether they had previously invaded Israel's land.

Bearing in mind that it is a northern confederacy of which Ezekiel speaks, certain nations of which are also associated in the assault upon the land recorded in Daniel xi., let us turn briefly to that prophecy. In vers. 36-39 we have the future Wilful King reigning in the land, with whom the Roman Prince makes a covenant for seven years (Dan. ix. 27), but which is broken in half that time; these rulers (the Beasts of Rev. 13) then manifest their full blasphemous character, setting up the abomination of desolation because of which God brings in a desolator — the overflowing scourge of Isa. xxviii. 15-19, the details of which are given in Dan. xi. 40-45. In the closing days of the seventieth week when the fearful apostasy of the Jewish nation under Antichrist supported by the Roman Prince is at its height, and the hour of judgment having drawn near, God in His providential ways acts to bring about the gathering of all the forces of the nations to meet their overthrow when the Lord appears in glory. So at this time the King of the South finds some reason to attack the Wilful King. Jealous perhaps of his great increase in power and influence as the chief associate of the Roman Prince, he determines upon an effort to lower his prestige. Seeing this the inhabited, and against a people [p]gathered out of the nations, which have gotten cattle and goods, that dwell in the middle* of the land. [q]Sheba, and [r]Dedan, and the merchants of [s]Tarshish, with all the [t]young lions thereof, shall say unto thee, Art thou come to take a spoil? hast thou gathered thine assemblage to take a prey? to carry away silver and gold, to take cattle and goods, to seize a great spoil?

* Or, "high part," lit., "navel," of the earth. The thought may be similar to that of Is. 2: 2.

[p] ver. 8.
[q] cf. ch. 27, 22, 23.
[r] ch. 25: 13, 27: 15, 20; Is. 21: 13.
[s] cf. ch. 27, 12, 25, etc. 2 Chr. 9: 21; 20: 36, 37. Ps. 72: 10. Is. 66: 19.
[t] cf. chs. 19: 2, 6; 32: 2. Nah. 2: 11-13.
cf. Mic. 5: 8. Nu. 23: 24. Is. 11: 6.

King of the North is roused to action, for he too aspires to world-supremacy, and doubtless has watched with jealous eye the ascendancy of the king in Palestine who stands as the representative of the great western confederacy; now fearing that the King of the South may gain an advantage he rushes into action with the vast forces at his command. It is his movements which Daniel details at length. It is evident that he passes through Palestine and reaches as far as Egypt, the country of the King of the South, in the course of his victorious campaign. It is stated that the Libyans, or people of Phut, and the Ethiopians, or those of Cush, are in his forces, and these are also allies of Gog. Then tidings out of the east and north trouble him. Since he would be in the vicinity of Egypt at this time, it would appear that these tidings would come from Palestine, which would be to his east and north. They stir him to furious energy in a mighty effort to destroy an enemy of whom these tidings inform him. He returns and establishes himself with his armies "between the seas, at the glorious holy mountain," that is, between the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea in the immediate vicinity of Jerusalem. Joel and Zechariah describe this gathering, adding details not given by Daniel. (Compare Joel iii. and Zech. xiv.).

This gathering of armies to besige Jerusalem cannot be those of the western or revived Roman empire to which Rev. xix refers, for that power is allied to and would support the Wilful King against whom the King of the North comes in his whirlwind campaign. The nations then of which Zechariah and Joel speak are those to the north and east of the "pleasant land." They are the enemies of the Wilful King and the Western confederacy which supports him—the false Messiah in the Land. Keeping this in mind, and remembering that God is working at this time to bring all these forces together for judgment at the Lord's appearing, a thought suggests itself as to what tidings reached the King of the North when in the vicinity of Egypt. May they not be the news of the gathering hosts of the Western powers coming into Palestine to effect the cutting off of his return to the north, thus severing his communications from the rear, purposing then to strike one final blow which will decide the question of world-supremacy once for all in favor of the Beasts of Rev. xiii. which are the instruments of Satanic power and policy? Putting together with this the prophecy of Rev. xvi. we learn that this mighty host will gather at Har-Magedon, identified as the plain of Esdraelon, which lies across the path of travel through Palestine between the

Section 3 (chap. xxxviii. 14-23.)

The revelation of Jehovah to the nations in the judgment of Gog.

Therefore, son of man, prophesy and say unto Gog, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: In [u]that day when my people Israel dwelleth in [v]safety, shalt thou not know [it]? And thou shalt come from thy place out of the farthest [w]north, thou and many peoples with thee, all of them riding upon [x]horses, a great assemblage, and a mighty army. And thou shalt come up against my people Israel as a [y]cloud to cover the land—it shall be at the [†]end u cf. Is. 10. 20, 27; 12. 1; 26. 1; 27. 1; 52. 6. Jer. 30. 7-9. Ezek. 29. 21. Ho. 2. 18, 21. Jo. 3. 18. Amos 9. 11. Mic. 4. 6. Zech. 2. 10-13; 3. 10; 9. 16; 12. 6-14; 14. 4, 6, 8, 9, 13, 20, 21.

v ver. 8.

w ver. 6, ch. 39. 2. Jer. 1. 14; 6. 22; 46. 20, 24. Is. 14. 31.

† See note, ver. 8.

x ver. 4; cfr. Hos. 1. 7; cf. Is. 31. 1, 3; Joel 1. 6; Hab. 1. 8; ch. 23. 6; 26. 7, 10. y ver. 9.

north and the south.* Tidings of such movements may well explain Dan. xi. 44, and the northern leader commences his return, likewise determined to strike the blow which will place in his hand the coveted world-supremacy.

These opposing leaders know nothing of Him whom they will suddenly meet and whose appearing will with swift blows of judgment destroy them utterly (Isa. xxx. 27-33; xxxi. 8, 9; Zech. xiv. 3-5; 2 Thess. ii. 8; Rev. xix. 11-21).

Having digressed thus far it may not be amiss to go a little farther afield and consider more fully the order and relation of these events.

There are two general lines of prophecy as regards the nations which perhaps are not always distinguished. The Old Testament Prophets, except Daniel, very largely, if not entirely, treat of the course and judgment of the "peoples," or nations, north and east of the land, and which have come into direct relation to Israel, but which are always her pronounced enemies and oppressors. It is the Assyrian, the King of the North, and his allied peoples which are brought before us. The great western coalition, or revived Roman

* At the seaward end of this notable plain is situated the Bay of Acre, the line of which stretches from Haifa to Acre, or Acco. Perhaps it is of more than passing interest to note that the American Zion Commonwealth has purchased 15,000 acres of land right along the shore and back, covering a very fertile section; and that the Commonwealth is undertaking a great development of this vast sea frontage, making a new channel to the sea for the River Kishon, and preparing to establish important industries with garden cities lying back from the sea, around what will be soon the greatest port of the Mediterranean, as a high British official has declared. The Palestinian Government is to spend millions to make a genuine harbor at Haifa. It is just such extensive developments which would be needful for the assembling of the vast forces of the Roman empire upon this great plain, for it is natural to suppose that they will be gathered from many parts of the ten-kingdom confederacy, and transported under naval convoy to the shores of Palestine. Already 500 miles of railroad connect this bay and its harbor facilities with different parts of the Land, including Jerusalem and reaching as far south as Beer-sheba. At Haifa, where at the close of the world-war there were only 3,000 inhabitants, ten years after there were 13,000. For centuries this town has been at a standstill, but now it pulsates with life, and under the urge of industrial enterprise the mountains are being cut through and the sea front developed to meet the demands of the projects in view.

of days—and I will bring thee against [z]my land, that the nations may [a]know me, when I shall be [b]hallowed in thee, O Gog, before their eyes.

Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Art thou not he of whom I have [c]spoken in old time through my servants the prophets of Israel, who prophesied in those days, for [many] years, that I would bring thee against them? And it shall come to pass in that day, when Gog shall come against the land z Deut. 32. 43. Ps. 10. 16; 85. 1. 3. Is. 14. 2, 25. Jer. 2. 7. Hos. 9. 3. Joel 1. 6. Zech. 9. 16.

a ver. 23. chs. 37. 28; 39. 6, 7. Ps 83. 12-18; 9. 16.
b ver. 23. c/. Is. 5. 16.
chs. 28. 22, 25; 36. 23; 39. 27; Deut. 32. 51 with Nu. 27. 14. c See notes for reference passages.

empire, is not directly spoken of except in Daniel who, indeed, reveals the relation of both these confederacies.

Now in the New Testament what comes into view is the western empire, and not those nations which so largely fill the Old Testament vision. The moral reason for this seems evident. In the Old Testament God's controversy is with "the heathen" or "peoples" north and east of the land, also to the south, which had come into direct touch with Israel, and from whom she had learned her evil ways, all of whom however hated her bitterly, despising Jehovah, and helping forward her affliction on every possible occasion, for they desired to crush her out of existence. It is their still future attack upon the Land, and their siege of Jerusalem, with their overwhelming judgment at the hands of the Lord when He comes, which so largely occupies the Old Testament. In the New Testament it is the western coalition which fills the prophetic vision, because it is in direct relation to the Church and Christendom (which is the subject of the New Testament as Israel and her place is of the Old Testament), which it first persecuted, then favored. Finally becoming apostate we find these western powers associated with the Antichrist or false Jewish Messiah. The King of the North and his allies are the open enemies of this Wilful King who will then exercise authority in Palestine.

Thus we see there are two great divisions of the nations, and similarly there are two great gatherings, at the time of the end. One distinctively occupies the Old Testament vision, and the other the New. The former is the gathering of the peoples under Israel's oppressor, the Assyrian of the future, or last King of the North. The latter is the gathering of the western nations under the Beast and False Prophet at Har-Magedon.

As there are two gatherings, there are two distinct geographical locations at which they take place. In considering these two gatherings we must remember one marked feature of contrast: the one under the Beast is friendly to the apostate Jews and their city Jerusalem, their apostate leader being the ally of the Beast; the other is fiercely opposed to the Jews and their false prince, against whom they direct their attack. We can hardly think of the Beast and his hosts besieging Jerusalem; they would rather be its defenders, and so cannot be included among the "peoples" which come up against Jerusalem. The locations then are these: the King of the North and his hosts are gathered in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, which is just outside of Jerusalem at the base of Mt. Olivet. This is referred to in Joel iii. and Zech. xiv., and Dan. xi. 45. The other gathering, as already mentioned, is at Har-Magedon, quite to the north of Jeru-of Israel, saith the Lord Jehovah, [that] [d]my fury shall come up in my [e]face;* for in my [f]jealousy, in the fire of my wrath have I spoken, Verily, in that day shall be a great [g]shaking in the land of Israel; so that the fish of the sea, and the fowl of the heavens, and the beasts of the field, and all creeping things which creep upon the earth, and all mankind that are upon the face of the earth shall shake at my [h]presence; and the [i]mountains shall be thrown down, and the steep places shall fall, and every wall shall fall to the ground.

* Lit., "nose." The idea seems to be that of a fiery breath from the nostrils, rather than the inflammation of the face from anger.—(J. B.).

d cf. ch. 5. 12-17; 14. 19-21. Is. 34. 1-4; 59. 17-19. 63. 1-6.
e cf. Is 10.20, 28, 33; 11. 4. 2 Thess 2. 8. Rev. 2. 16; 19. 15, 21.
f cf. Zech. 8. 2. Joel 2.18-20.
g cf. Is. 2, 19, 21; 24. 18. Hag. 2. 6, 7.
h cf. Ps. 68. 2, 8; 97. 3-5; 114. 7. Is. 2. 10-20; 64. 1-3. Jer. 4. 26.
i Is. 64. 3. Nah. 1. 5, 6. Hab.3. 6,10.

salem, and identified with the plain of Esdraelon, connected with the sea coast where it would be natural for great armies to disembark.

As we may thus discern two distinct groups of nations, two distinct gatherings at two distinctly different centres, so we may, I think, speak of two distinct, though of course closely related, manifestations of the Lord in judgment. The appearing of the Lord in glory for judgment is described in a twofold way. Daniel saw Him come like a son of man with the clouds of heaven (vii. 13); John says, "Behold, He comes with the clouds, and every eye shall see Him." And again, "I saw, and behold, a white cloud, and on the cloud one sitting like the Son of Man;" and, "I saw heaven opened, and behold, a white horse, and one sitting on it...and the armies which were in heaven followed Him." Then the Lord's own words are, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days...shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the land lament, and they shall see the Son of Man coming on the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." He will come in the glory of His Father with His angels. Paul speaks of "the revelation of the Lord Jesus from heaven, with the angels of His power," at which time He will consume the Lawless One, the Antichrist, with the breath of His mouth and shall annul him by the appearing of His coming. It is then also that the first Beast is taken, and both these monsters of iniquity are cast into the lake of fire and their armies destroyed. These details give one aspect of the Lord's appearing apparently directly connected with the judgment of the apostate western powers under the Roman Prince, the first Beast of Rev. xiii, and his ally the second Beast, or the Antichrist of the Jews, the Lawless One of 2 Thess. ii. and the Wilful King of Dan. xi. 36-39. The other aspect of the Lord's appearing is described as an actual descent to the Mount of Olives (Zech. xiv.; Acts i. 10, 11). With this we have the deliverance of besieged Jerusalem, against which the King of the North and his hosts are assembled in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, as with the other—the sign of the Son of Man in heaven, His coming in the clouds—we have the immediate judgment of the Beast and the False Prophet, or Antichrist, which stroke of judgment seems to take place first in the progress of the Lord's manifestation, after which He stands upon Olivet as Zechariah describes. It is to be noted that

And I will call for a [j]sword against him throughout all [k]my mountains, saith the Lord Jehovah: [l]every man's sword shall be against his brother. And I will enter into judgment with him with pestilence and with blood; and I will rain upon him, and upon his bands, and upon the many peoples that are with him, [m]overflowing rain and great [n]hailstones, fire and [o]brimstone. And I will magnify myself, and sanctify myself, and I will be [p]known in the eyes of many nations, and they shall know that I [am] Jehovah.

j cf. Is 66 16
k cf. Is 14. 25; 49. 11; 65. 9.
l Jud 7 22. 1 Sam. 14. 20. 2 Chron. 20. 23. Hag. 2. 22. Zech. 14. 12, 13.
m ch. 13. 11.
n ch. 13 11. 13. Is 30. 30.
o Gen. 19 24. Deu 29 23. Ps. 11. 6. Is 30. 33; 34. 9. Luke 17. 29. Rev. 19. 20. p cf. Ex. 7; 5, 17; 8. 10, 22; 9. 13-18; Rom. 9. 17, 22

the city is actually taken and plundered by the besieging armies, which naturally are not those of the Beast and his ally, the Jewish Antichrist, for they would be gathered rather for its defence, and it seems more than likely that they had been at Har-Magedon for that purpose in response to appeal from the Jewish ruler to meet and destroy their mutual enemy, the King of the North, when he returned from his drive into Egypt. It is evident that for some reason they could not reach Jerusalem in time to prevent its capture and plunder, though assembled only a few miles to the north. Why this failure and victory of the enemy? Is it to be explained by the fact that the Lord had suddenly appeared in heavenly glory and smitten them with the breath of His mouth, which is compared to a sharp two-edged sword, and so the city left to its own resources falls a prey to the superior power of the attacking forces? Is not just such a failure of the trusted power of the West foretold by Isaiah (xxviii. 14-22)? It would so appear. But is there a lapse of time allowed between this initial stroke and the actual appearing on Mount Olivet—during which opportunity is given for the King of the North to accomplish the capture of the city with its apostate mass? And may this not take up the additional thirty days of Dan. xii. 11 at the end of which the Lord appears for the deliverance of the city? In any case after this the Millennial kingdom is set up. There is still a further period of forty-five days after the close of the seventieth week mentioned in Daniel. May it not be that during this second additional period the momentous events of Ezekiel xxxviii. and xxxix. take place? I merely offer these thoughts by way of suggestion as presenting the possible order and relation of these vastly important events. As to the events themselves there need be no question. The prophetic Scriptures are clear enough.

We may conclude, then, that there was a first invasion of the land by the King of the North, and that this answers to what is foretold in such scriptures as Isa. xxviii. 14-22; Dan. ix. 27; xi. 40-45; Joel iii.; Zech. xiv. Furthermore, this leader is the personage of Dan. viii. 23-25, of whom the Little Horn of that chapter is the anticipatory fulfilment (Antiochus Epiphanes, King of Syria, the north, in contrast to Egypt, the south), showing that it is the King of the North that is in view. Now the course of this leader is carried to the point of standing up against the Prince of princes—Messiah, who must there-

Section 4. (chap. xxxix. 1-7.)

Creature impotence: the overthrow of the proud foe.

And thou, son of man, prophesy against Gog, and say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: [q]Behold, I am against thee, O Gog, prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal; and I will turn thee back, and lead† thee, and will cause thee to come up

q ch. 38. 3.

† The meaning of this word is uncertain. Perhaps the A. V. is correct in rendering, "leave but the sixth part of thee." It is at least suggestive as intimating that six, the number which speaks of the manifestation of evil, and the divine limit to its activity, is the measure of Gog's host, i.e., six parts compose it, of which God spares one in divine sovereignty.—(J.B.).

fore have been manifested for this to take place. Considering that the powers in Dan. viii. and xi. are to be identified, as well as with the Gog confederacy which comes out of the north and bears both a national and territorial identity with the former, then in the invasion of which our chapters speak we get the second invasion of the Northern confederacy. This seems like a supreme effort to overcome the third great Combatant who so suddenly appeared on the scene at the time of their first attack, smiting the assembled armies in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, and those of the West at Har-magedon. He does not know that Jehovah is turning him back to the mountains of Israel, and that in reality he is standing up against the Prince of princes, who is already present, as chap. xxxvii. shows. But as Daniel says, "He shall be broken without hand"—a terse description of what Ezekiel depicts in more detail.

One final suggestion: in Dan. viii. it is stated of this northern leader that he destroyed the mighty and the holy people, that is, the Jewish people; and that he shall stand up against Messiah. The first would certainly characterize his actions at the time of his first invasion, while the latter would be accomplished in what these chapters of Ezekiel tell us. This may have taken place very shortly after the Lord's descent to the Mount of Olives.

The time at which this invasion took place is clearly indicated (vers. 8, 11, 12). It is when the waste condition of the land is past, and the regathered people are dwelling securely in peace (Zech. xiv. 10, 11; Amos ix. 11-15; Isa. xxxv.; Jer. xxx. 3). His coming is like that of a dark thunder-cloud, spreading over the land, ascending from the north parts upon the mountains of Israel. In all this Jehovah is revealed as not only foreknowing and foretelling, but also as the Searcher of hearts. The mind of the enemy is as an open book to Him. This we learn in addition to the fact that He is putting hooks into the jaws of this mighty host, bringing them forth to meet Himself that all nations may know Him, the Holy One of Israel.

When the time of these events has come, how comforting and reassuring for the people to have this word of prophecy. On this they may rest their souls when the first signs of the gathering storm shall suddenly darken the blessed scenes of peace and plenty which will then be their portion in the land "brought back from the sword." Gog shall not be permitted to put it to the sword again. Has not from the farthest north, and will bring thee upon [r] the mountains of Israel. And I will smite thy [s] bow out of thy left hand, and will cause thine arrows to fall out of thy right hand. Thou shalt fall [t] upon the mountains of Israel, thou, and all thy bands, and the peoples that are with thee: I have given thee to be [u] food for the birds of prey of every wing, and to the beasts of the field. Thou shalt fall upon the open field; for I have spoken [it], r chs. 6. 2; 38. 8.

s cf. Ps. 11. 2; 37. 14; 46. 9; 58. 7; 76. 3. 5. Hos. 2. 18.
t cf. Ps. 9. 3. 10. Is. 14. 25-27; 34. 4.
u ch. 29. 5.

Jehovah made His everlasting covenant of peace with them? It is the day of Isa. xii. 2-6 when Israel shall prove the blessing of abiding under the shadow of the Almighty.

The enemy thinks he is carrying out the purpose of his own heart, and in boastful pride assembles his hosts to take a spoil. The secret for faith is that Jehovah both leads and commands. It is a solemn lesson. How often must the proud "I will" of man bring him under the crushing stroke of Omnipotent power called into action to shield and deliver the objects of infinite love. Haughty Pharaoh must sink down before it. Midian's hosts must fall under its sword. Boastful Rabshakeh and the armies of Assyria must melt away before its blast. How many more of earth's mighty have fallen, must yet fall, before its withering breath! So too, but with higher thoughts, the Christian heart can say in the light of the inspired record, and rejoicing in Christ now enthroned, "Who shall separate us?" even though we be but as sheep accounted for the slaughter.

Sec. 3.

The interrogation of the merchant princes represents them as expressing surprise at Gog's multitude. Can it be simply for the taking of spoil? The greatness of the attack appears out of proportion to the smallness of the object. Thus might it appear to human eyes, but the deep underlying reason is given in Jehovah's answer. He draws forth all this army, that, as He says, "The nations may know Me when I shall be hallowed in thee, O Gog, before their eyes." The magnitude of Gog's undertaking would seem to the observant eyes of all the "young lions" of Sheba, Dedan, and Tarshish without any prospect of adequate compensation, but all is clear when God's purpose is known. In this we get an example of how the wheels of divine government go round, carrying forward the throne and its glorious Occupant.

We have now a reference to former prophecies relating to these events. This at first may present a difficulty, for we do not find any previous prophetic announcement under the nation's names here given. The interrogative form rather excludes the thought of Gog being mentioned before. It is rather that the prophets for many years announced a great consummation in judgment, executed upon the nations having special relations with Israel, while also her pronounced enemies. The question is then, "Art thou he" in connection with whom this will find its full accomplishment? The answer is given affirmatively in the next verse, coupled with the declaration of Jehovah's wrath, and the terrible shaking which will be caused by His stroke of judgment.

saith the Lord Jehovah. And I will send a [t]fire on Magog, and among them that dwell at ease in the [u]isles: and they shall [v]know that I [am] Jehovah. And my [w]holy name will I make known in the midst of my people Israel; and I will not suffer my holy name to be profaned any more; and the nations [x]shall know that I [am] Jehovah, the Holy One in Israel.

t ch. 38. 19, 22.
u cf. ch. 39. 6, 16.
v ch. 28. 18. Is. 66. 14-16.
w cf. Is. 48. 9-11; 66. 9; 66. 19; 42. 4, 10 x cf. ch. 26. 15, 18.
y cf. ch. 36. 20-22; Is. 52. 6.
z ch. 38. 16, 23; Ps. 83.

It may be well to mention here several of the prophecies which point to this consummation. The name "Assyrian" is given to the last great enemy of Israel. He is associated with the north in Zeph. ii. 13; and Assyria is the land of the north from which Israel will be gathered (Isa. xxvii. 12, 13; Hosea xi. 11; Zech. x. 10; Jer. xvi. 15; xxiii. 8). Though "Assyria" and "Gog" seem names so very different, there is a similarity in their meaning which suggests moral identification, as well as that of locality, while the prophecies we shall refer to establish identity as to time, scene, and the character of judgment. Gog means either "extension" or "the topmost," both suggesting the ambition, pride and avarice which mark his conduct as given in our chapters. Assyria, from Asshur, means "a footstep," as going forward successfully, and this in boasted self-sufficiency, as Isaiah says (x. 8-11, 13, 14). In this very chapter Isaiah makes plain that the invasion and the consummation in judgment of which it speaks is not only future, but after the restoration and when Messiah is present (vers. 12, 17, 20, 21, 27). Thus he stands up against the Prince of princes as Dan. viii. states, and this is more emphatically affirmed by Micah (chap. v. 1-9). We know how direct the reference here is to Christ (vers. 1, 2), and then "He shall stand and shall feed His flock in the strength of the Lord," this being in beautiful accord with what Ezekiel has told us (xxxvi. 24-26). Following this we have the remarkable statement, "And this Man shall be the Peace when the Assyrian shall come into our land...and He shall deliver us from the Assyrian when he cometh into our land" (vers. 5, 6). And Jehovah says in reference to this time, "I will execute vengeance in anger and in fury upon the nations, such as they have not heard." This agrees with what we have considered to be the time of Gog's invasion, giving us good reason to link the prophecies regarding the Assyrian of the last days with those of Gog in Ezekiel. This we will find further strengthened by such passages as Isa. xvii. 12-14; chaps. xxv.; xxvi. 21; xxx. 18-33; Joel ii. 15-27; Nahum i.-iii., especially i. 11-15 and iii. 9; and Zech. 12. A careful consideration of these scriptures will lead us to see that, no matter what application they may have to the days which close the seventieth week of Daniel, they look on for full accomplishment in Gog's great gathering, though his name does not appear. Similarity of moral character and purpose, coincidence in time and characteristics of judgment, prevail throughout. They are in that way of the same generation as the Assyrian of Sennacherib's day, whose coming and defeat gave the text for many prophecies, while undoubtedly it was the foreshadow of the final consummation.

From these considerations we may conclude that Jehovah's words (ver. 17) indicate the wide scope to be attributed to the prophecies.

Section 5. (chap. xxxix. 8-16.)

Almighty strength: the glory brought to Israel through its exercise.

Behold, it cometh, and shall be done, saith the Lord Jehovah. This is the day whereof I have [a]spoken. And they that dwell in the cities of Israel shall go forth, and shall kindle fire, and burn weapons, and shields, and targets, bows and arrows, and hand-staves, and spears: and they shall

a ch. 38. 17.

They not only have an application to the action of Assyria at the time when that ancient empire flourished, but also to the King of the North, or Assyrian of the future, who shall be the desolator, or overflowing scourge, in the closing scenes of the seventieth week, God's battle-axe then as before upon a rebellious and idolatrous people; and finally the day when he shall come again as Gog from the north, to be utterly broken upon the mountains of Israel (Isa. x. 26, 27; xiv. 24-27 with our present chapters. Compare also Isa. x. 26; Judg. vii. 22 with ver. 11).

There follows a most graphic description of Jehovah revealed in judgment. It is a manifestation which while centering in the land of Israel reaches throughout the earth and affects all mankind. The overthrow is accomplished by internal strife, every man's sword against his brother; by pestilence and blood, that is, violent death, and by the downpour of destruction from heaven. Thus man in proud self-will and vaunted sufficiency has his own weapons turned against him, corruption and violence assail, while heaven's displeasure is revealed. Those who are against God must find that the forces of earth and heaven, combined with their own devices, carry them down to destruction. Self-will and pride must ever reap according to the sowing. It is an unvarying principle of the divine government. God has written this largely on the pages of history, but men in their folly will not learn, seemingly blinded by thinking that each successive effort will be the exception to the rule which prevails in all affairs physical, moral and spiritual.

Grace known by us in Christ does not deliver from this holy government of God. Rather, since it gives to us a higher place of favor than ever known to faith before, we have greater responsibility, and we become more directly subject to the action of such divine principles. The whole history of Israel enforces this lesson. It is the moral underlying the ministry of the prophets. It is pressed home upon the people by repeated strokes of judgment. David used the sword to accomplish his own sinful will, and the sword never departed from his house. Solomon consorted with strangers, his heart was led astray, and enemies arise in the very quarters from which he drew the means of pleasing himself (1 Kings xi.). Man's self-devised plans and wilful choice ever come back upon him with a harvest of results, which if he would only hear the Voice speaking in them, would bring him down before God in confessed impotency and sinfulness to receive the uplifting that is always given to those who humble themselves under God's mighty hand.

The divine purpose is clearly stated (vers. 16, 23). It is that Jehovah may be known, that "the earth shall be filled with the glory make fires with them seven years. And no wood shall be taken out of the field, neither cut down out of the forests; for they shall make fire with the weapons; and they shall [b]spoil those that spoiled them, and plunder those that plundered them, saith the Lord Jehovah.

[b] cf. Hab. 2. 1-8. Mic. 5. 8. Jud. 6. 1, 6 with 7. 19-25, and 18. 9, 4; 10. 21-34; 2 Chr. 14. 9-15; 2 Chr. 20.

And it shall come to pass in that day, [that] I will give unto Gog a place there for burial in of Jehovah as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. xi. 9; Habak. iii. 14). "Who shall not fear Thee, O Lord, and glorify Thy name? for Thou only art holy; for all the nations shall come and worship Thee; for Thy righteous acts have been made manifest" (Rev. xv. 4). This alone can establish things in proper order, as the lack of it, or its refusal, only produces confusion and evil. It is to this end that judgment is brought in. Indeed, since sin came in it is alone through God's strange work that men can be brought to know Him. From the very beginning this has been so. Through the woman's sorrow and subjection, and the man's toil striving against the curse and blight of sin, God becomes known in mercy, grace and deliverance. He might have been known to His creatures through the Garden of Delights, earthly abundance, and ever-extending dominion, but this avenue was closed forever as far as the old creation is concerned, because of man's sin. It will be realized by the new creation on a higher plane and in intimate heavenly associations through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. Thus does God triumph over evil, but by way of judgment, in which He is magnified, sanctified, and made known. And where more fully so than in the greatest of all judgments?—that of the Cross, at once the answer to every question raised by sin, the fullest manifestation of God in holiness, righteousness, and love, when indeed a greater than Gog is met and judged, even Satan, the prince and god of this world. In our individual experience it is still often through the Lord's judgments that we come to know Him in growing measure. Judgments which are either chastening for our waywardness, the discipline of love, or the disposing contrary to our proposing, or even allowing our will to have its demands granted that the bitter fruit of our way may be tasted, and so the sweetness of subjection to His way be realized. But ever it is the same love that gave Christ, working with and for us, love nevertheless which must prove itself holy to the objects of its richest blessing—to us. Our failure may not bring open discipline, He by the Holy Spirit may produce exercise and distress of heart which leads to self-judgment before Him, yet the salutary lesson will be kept before the soul by results reaped from our sowing which cannot be avoided. God graciously makes all contribute to a better knowledge of Himself. He is magnified and sanctified in these ways of judgment.

It is not that the believer has sin imputed to him, for to such pertains the blessedness of Romans 4, that of non-imputation, so that he does not come into judgment (John v. 24). This has to do with eternal issues, it is put in relation to our possession of eternal life, so that from this view-point we have passed out of the region of judgment. It remains true, however, that as in this blessed position we call on God "as Father, who without respect of persons judgeth

Israel, the valley of the passers-by* to the east of the sea; and it shall stop [the way] of the passers-by; and there shall they bury Gog and all the multitude; and they shall call it, The Valley of Hamon-Gog.† And seven months shall the

* This probably refers to some usual route of communication between the country east and that west of the Dead Sea. In view of the use of this same word in vers. 14, 15, it can hardly be applied to the hosts of Gog, as some suggest. The "passers-by" are evidently distinct from the "men of continual employment." May not the reference be, as Kiel suggests, to "travellers who pass through the land?" If so, and they are called upon with those men of special appointment to engage in burying the dead as they pass through the land, instead of going by the usual route of the valley, it being closed (ver. 11), we may see how in this way the knowledge of what God had done to Gog would be carried to distant peoples, for travellers thus made to serve either in burying or setting up signs would naturally inquire concerning the details of this signal event, and spread the news as they travelled. Thus would Israel's renown and Jehovah's glory be made known, as v.13 intimates.—(J.B.).

† Meaning, "multitude of Gog."

according to each man's work," and are to pass the time of our sojourn in fear, conscious of the redemption we have through the precious blood of Christ, and responsible as obedient children to be holy in all our behavior, "Because it is written, Be ye holy, for I am holy" (1 Pet. i. 14-18). Thus we are under the Father's government. Its principles find illustration all through Scripture, and that quite fully in the Old Testament, where we get the record of the various dealings of God with those who are given places of privilege and responsibility. Hence the value and importance of all Scripture, and its use for teaching, conviction, correction, and instruction (2 Tim. iii. 16, 17). Its essential unity is known by the exhibition of the same divine principles in the greatest possible variety of circumstance and instrumentality. This Word "endureth forever"—"Forever, O Lord, Thy word is settled in the heavens." It is the heavens that shall rule for blessing to all creation. This will surely be exercised according to that Word which is now to rule us as born from above, born by that Word and the Spirit. The position of this verse in the psalm (cxix. 89) offers an interesting numerical study. That psalm is an alphabetic acrostic "of the most regular and perfect kind," and this verse opens its twelfth section — Lamed being the twelfth letter of the Hebrew alphabet. It is the number of divine government, heavenly in character and manifestly exercised over all creation (3x4), as the psalm expresses. But to this we may add that the letters of the Hebrew alphabet (as also the Greek) have a definite numerical value. In this case it is thirty (3x10), divine and heavenly manifestation in that completeness of divine order, both Godward and manward, which ten suggests. All of this is found in and through the Word, and the exercise of that holy government which is according to it and revealed in it.

See. 4.

We return to the announcement with which we began, so that by reiteration emphasis is given to what Jehovah declares. His unalter-house of Israel be burying them, that they 'may [c] 'cleanse the land; and all the people of the land shall bury [them]; and it shall be to them for renown in the day that I shall be glorified, saith the Lord Jehovah. And they shall sever out men of continual employment to go through the land, who, with the passers-by, shall bury those that remain upon the face of the land, to cleanse it:

at the end of seven months shall they make a search. And the passers-by shall pass through the land, and when [any] seeth a man's bone, he shall set up a sign by it, till the buriers have buried it in the Valley of Hamon-Gog. And also the name of the city shall be Hamonah. Thus shall [d] they [d]cleanse the land.

[c] cf Num. 19. 11-16.

[d] ver. 12.

able "I will" assures complete accomplishment. Added to the repetition of Jehovah's purpose we now have location specified—"from the uttermost (or farthest) north." This helps to identify Gog with whatever power may occupy Russian territory at this time, while the similarity of detail in many prophecies leads us also to link him with the Assyrian, or King of the North.

As Jehovah has told of Gog's coming and purpose, also revealing His own relation and purpose, now He shows Gog's impotence to accomplish his plan—he is only a creature, vanity. The bow and arrows are smitten from his hands—at the very moment they are drawn ready for the attack, bow in left hand, arrows in right, the blow falls. How often the attainment of some self-cherished object or wilful plans seems within the grasp, and sudden blight comes. Instead of vanquishing, we are vanquished. The self-chosen way or plan is suddenly turned to our destruction. Why? God has been left out of the carefully devised arrangements. Sensual wisdom has ruled instead of that wisdom which is from above which is first pure; and God must sanctify Himself in relation to us by showing Himself in opposition. "With the froward, Thou wilt show Thyself froward." And here we must mark a distinction, for the Hebrew words for "froward" are different. The first means perverse, crafty, false, and "is said only of the mind falling from rectitude" (Gog's sin, xxxviii. 10); while the second speaks of the wrestling of one opposed, who strives until he overcomes. These chapters illustrate this text. But are there not chapters in our individual lives which convey the same lesson? How slow we are to learn! Yet God has given many warning lessons in His holy Word.

Gog then is permitted to reach the mountains he has lusted after, only to be given a prey to the ravenous bird and beast. "Lust when it hath conceived, bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is completed, bringeth forth death" (James i. 15). How often the grave is the answer to the heart's folly! Instead of taking a spoil, proud Gog falls a prey. "Extension" he did not find, nor "the topmost" place, for which he strove in pride and self-sufficiency; instead, he ignominiously falls without striking a blow to advance his selfish interests, and finds a grave in the valley.

Section 6. (chap. xxxix. 17-21.)
The mighty a prey

And thou, son of man, thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Speak unto the birds of every wing, and to every beast of the field, Gather yourselves and come, assemble yourselves on every side to my [c]sacrifice which I sacrifice for you, a great sacrifice upon the [f]mountains of Israel, that ye may eat flesh, and drink blood. Ye shall eat the flesh of the mighty, and drink the blood of the princes of the earth, of rams, of lambs, and of goats, [and] of bullocks, all of them fatted beasts of [g]Bashan. And ye shall eat fat till ye are full, and drink blood till ye are drunken, of my sacric ver. 4. cf. Zeph. 1. 7, 8. Is. 34. 6. Jer. 46. 9, 10. Rev. 19. 17, 18. 18. 11. 4. 2 Thess. 1. 7-9.

f vers. 2, 4.
g cf. Ps. 22. 12. Amos 4. 1. Deut. 33. 22 with Gen. 49. 16, 17.

The results of this overthrow shall be as a fire on Magog, reaching to the distant isles where they had thought to dwell securely, secure, perhaps, from the disastrous judgments that had fallen in rapid succession in the land at the time of the Lord's appearing in glory. In this Jehovah lets the nations know that His judgment can reach to the uttermost bounds, and so "they shall know that I am the Lord." Their security must be found in knowing Him, and this at once destroys every other fancied safety, opening the only true sanctuary to them.

In all this a threefold purpose finds accomplishment. Jehovah is manifest as dwelling in the midst of Israel. He is there in holy, preserving, delivering power. This will make true in the fullest way the desire expressed by Moses: "Wherein shall it be known that I have found grace in Thine eyes, I and Thy people, except in that Thou goest with us? and we shall be distinguished, I and Thy people, from all the people which are on the face of the earth." Then, "Neither will I suffer My holy name to be profaned anymore." This had taken place in the past. Though Jehovah had humbled and stricken Israel in judgment, using the nations as the rod of His anger, they whom He used had not considered; mocking and boasting, they had blasphemed Jehovah's name. Surely He was of less account than their own idol-gods. He could not defend nor save His professed people! They gloried in wasting the land and the people that bore that name. Israel had made Jehovah to serve with their sins, so that His name was dishonored among the Gentiles. The very judgments His holiness must visit upon His sinful people resulted to His dishonor in the eyes of the nations. The overwhelming judgment of Gog will cause this reproach to pass away, for it will demonstrate His power over the mightiest of earth. Furthermore, all that profaned that holy name in Israel will also have been purged out, and the nation will be holiness unto the Lord. Finally, through this consummation of judgment "the nations shall know that I am the Lord, the Holy One in Israel."

There is a voice in this for us. We, too, individually or collectively, stand identified with the holy name of Christ. Is that name sullied because of our failure? Do we commend Him before the eyes of the world? Or does our carelessness, our indifference, make fice which I sacrifice for you. And ye shall be filled at my table with horses and charioteers, with mighty men, and with all men of war, saith the Lord Jehovah. And I will set [h]my glory among the nations, and all the nations shall see [i]my judgment which I have executed, and [j]my hand which I have laid upon them.

[h] ver. 13. ch. 38. 16, 23. cf. Ex. 9. 16. Is. 37. 20. Ps. 97. Ps. 102. 15. Is. 11. 10; 60. 1-3.
[i] cf. Is. 26. 9. Mic. 5. 15. Ps. 126. ch. 28. 25, 26. Ps. 9. 16. Is. 42. 1-4.
[j] cf. Ex. 7. 4.

Him serve with our sins in the world's eyes because His name is named upon us? He is not visible; we are to be His living representatives, His ambassadors. May the impress of His image be upon us! For this we must be much in the secret place of communion, learning from Him, sitting at His blessed feet.

Sec. 5. (Chap. xxxix. 8-16.)

Judgment executed upon proud flesh always leaves its aftermath to which the torch must be applied, or for which the grave must be dug. The collapse of every self-willed fleshly plan leaves that which must be removed or buried out of sight as loathsome and corrupt. Who that has experienced deliverance out of a snare by God's blight falling upon some cherished plan conceived in the will of the flesh, has not found plenty to burn and bury? Yet it is thus we spoil the spoiler and plunder the plunderer, while the graves of our lust are a memorial, warning by the lessons they teach, but leading the exercised soul to confidence in an ever faithful God, so that after all He is glorified.

The prophet is first assured of the absolute certainty of these events. It is the day of which Jehovah has spoken (xxxviii. 18, 19), the day referred to in the many prophecies already mentioned. The arms of a stricken foe are usually gathered and preserved as trophies, or if fit for use stored in the arsenals of the victor. Not so here; they are consumed by fire. Might not Israel have future use for all this vast store? Would it not be prudence to preserve it? Why? They who dwelt in peace without walls or gates or bars had not used a weapon to strike the foe! They had not been called to fight, Jehovah had accomplished the overthrow. It was like that of the ancient Assyrian host, the foreshadow of Gog, when the angel of the Lord went forth and smote 185,000, and "behold, they were all dead corpses" (Isa. xxxvii. 36). The day for sword and spear had passed. The fires that burned for seven years would witness to this, as also to Israel's confidence being in Jehovah. For how different a purpose to that of Gog shall then the gathering of the nations to Jerusalem be (Isa. ii. 1-4).

The land is now cleansed of its defilement through death by the burial of Gog's multitude. This place of a grave will abide a memorial to posterity; they who pass by will stop there to consider Jehovah's judgment. Geographically this valley is difficult to locate, though the language suggests the vicinity of the Dead Sea, and also a route of general communication between the land and the east of the sea. That the lesson may not be forgotten the valley shall be called Hamon-Gog, "multitude of Gog," and a city shall bear a name memorializing this judgment.

Section 7. (chap. xxxix. 22-29.)
The perfect completion of God's ways with His people

And the [k]house of Israel shall know that I [am] Jehovah their God from that day and forward. And the nations shall know that the house of Israel went into [l]captivity for their iniquity, because they trespassed against me; and I [m]hid my face from them, and gave them into the hand of their enemies, so that they fell all of them by the sword. According to their uncleanness and according to their transgressions [n]I did unto them, and I hid my face from them.

k vers. 7, 28. cf. Is. 12. Ps. 46. Hos. 13. 4. Ps. 59. 13. Ps. 100. Joel 2. 27; 3. 17. ch. 34.27-31.
l cf. ch. 36. 16-23. Deut. 28. 15-68.
m Is. 54. 8; 57. 17; 59. 2. cf. Deut. 31. 17, 18; 32. 15-20. Is. 64. 6, 7. cfr. ch. 22.26. Is. 28. 15; 53. 3.
n cf. Lev. 26. 14-45; Deut. 32. 23-26; Ezra 9. 7; Ps. 78. 55-64.

This burial of the slain shall be for Israel a renown. It will give them a name of fame, of honor, before all nations. They bury the foe, instead of being buried under the weight of Gog's avalanche. This is so, because it is the day upon which Jehovah is glorified in overcoming their enemies.

Sec. 6. (Chap. xxxix. 17-21.)

The sacrifice of judgment provides a feast for bird and beast. It is spread upon the mountains of Israel which had been laid waste when the nations surfeited themselves with the spoil of Jehovah's people; but there now the rich and mighty of the nations fall to utter destruction. Where once they had spoiled, they are now taken for a spoil. Such is the sowing and the reaping.

Sec. 7. (Chap. xxxix. 22-29.)

The perfect completion of God's holy ways in government with His people, and their establishment in full blessing, is now expressed as a fitting conclusion. First, the work of judgment confirms Israel beyond all question in the knowledge of Jehovah as their God. Secondly, it answers conclusively every question raised to profane Jehovah's name because of Israel's abject condition for the centuries of her dispersion. It was not because He was weak, unable to save, though it might appear so to the mocking eyes of unbelief. It was because He was holy, and must hide His face from them because of their iniquity. So He gave them into the hands of the adversaries, otherwise they could have had no power. This history read in the light of Gog's judgment will witness to the righteousness and holiness of Jehovah to whom now all the earth must bow. It also becomes the lesson book for the restored nation (ver. 28), while none shall be left out of blessing, nor shall God's face be anymore hid from them. The Sun of Righteousness has arisen, and in its perpetual shining they shall ever rejoice. Likewise shall we, when in the glory of Christ's day we read the lesson book of life's history, which the judgment-seat of Christ will enable us to interpret according to divine righteousness and holiness. What a blessed knowledge this will give us of the Holy and the True, while being then forever like Him no cloud shall ever come between us and the glorious shining of His face!

Therefore, thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Now will I [o]bring again the captivity of Jacob, and have mercy on the whole house of Israel, and will be jealous for my holy name; and they shall bear* their confusion, and all their unfaithfulness in which they have acted unfaithfully against me, when they shall dwell [p]safely in their land, and none shall make them afraid; when I have brought them again from the peoples, and gathered them out of their enemies' lands, and am hallowed in them in the sight of many nations. And they shall know that I [am] Jehovah their God, in that I caused them to be led into captivity among the nations, and have gathered them unto their own land, and have left none of them any more there. And I will not hide my face any more from them, for I shall have poured out [q]my Spirit upon the house of Israel, saith the Lord Jehovah.

o cf. Deut. 30, 3. Ps. 14, 7. Ps. 126. Jer. 30, 3, 18; 32, 44. Joel 3, 1. Amos 9, 13-15.

p Jer. 23, 6; 32, 37, 38. chs. 28, 24-26; 38, 8, 11, 14.

q Joel 2, 28. ch. 36, 25-29; ch. 37, 14. Is. 44, 3; 59, 21; 32, 15.

* It is not bearing shame in the sense of outward disgrace, but as bearing the inward realization of unworthiness, into which they are brought by the manifestation of the goodness of Jehovah on their behalf.—(J.B.)

God is jealous of His holy name, He acts to vindicate it, and in this His people get their full blessing. How gloriously redemption accomplishes both—His glory and our blessing. And so with Israel in that day. But their dwelling securely as regathered will only give them a deeper realization of their shame and trespasses. The grace that restores and blesses writes more deeply upon the heart the failure of which we may be guilty than does the rod of judgment, which may leave of necessity a bleeding furrow. Thus shall the matchless glory of His presence, the perfect grace and kindness displayed in our being there, only make us read more deeply the awful meaning of sin, while we raise our anthem before the throne, "Unto Him that loveth us, and loosed us from our sins by His blood."

The blessing of those Millennial days will be found through the outpoured Spirit (ver. 29). Whatever may be the difference in dispensation, He has always been the active Divine Agent of blessing. From the time of His brooding upon the face of the waters, He has wrought in loving ministry for the creature. For us the blessing is the highest because of His personal indwelling of every believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, and His baptism of all such into one Body united to Christ in glory. Though this will not be true of Millennial days, and the presence and activity of the Spirit will then be after the order which the Old Testament makes known, yet it will be in greater fulness and with effects far more widespread than known in the days of old. It will be the glorious time of creation's deliverance from its groan, and its enjoyment of the liberty of the glory of the children of God (Rom. viii. 21).

SUBDIVISION 3. (chaps. 40-48).

This final vision of Ezekiel has for its background the whole of his preceding prophecies. It is in the form of a great plan with accompanying specifications, drawn with the utmost care, delineated with mathematical exactness, and intended to give expression by its sharp outlines to those principles of God's holiness and government which are set forth in the earlier messages of the book.

It is important for us to get a general view before studying any of the details.

It is not hard to see that the prophet embodies in the plan of the Sanctuary and the related subjects the great central truth of God's holiness, and the divine order which must govern for blessing to be realized. Expression to this is given symbolically in the wonderful structure presented in the vision, and upon which in its glorious Millennial execution all the nations of the world will look as they come to worship.

The truth of God's holiness has been the theme pervading all of Ezekiel's utterances, whether directed to Israel or the nations. Throughout the object in view is declared to be the knowledge of Jehovah in the holiness of His nature and government. This had been most seriously called in question by the rebellion and sin of His professed people. They had obscured His character and profaned His holiness in the eyes of the nations.

The presentation of this fundamental truth in relation to Jehovah not only leads to the fullest exposure, arraignment, and judgment of Israel in the light of the glorious manifestation of God given to the prophet (chs. i.-xxiv.), but the prophet is led on to pronounce judgment upon the surrounding nations who had shown themselves enemies of God and His people, so that complete manifestation of Jehovah may be made in all the earth (chaps. xxv.-xxxii.).

Not only is Jehovah to be manifested in withering everything contrary to Himself by the breath of His holy judgment, proceeding from that august Presence which is revealed at the beginning of the book and broods over all its action, but He also is manifested in grace in resurrection power, restoring the prodigal to Himself in the power of the Spirit and as a new creation, followed by the defeat of the last unholy assault of the enemy (chs. xxxiii.-xxxix.). Now that a people have been created suited to God and His holiness, we fittingly close with the picture of the divine order for Sanctuary, priesthood, people and land.

The book opens with visions of God which set forth His almighty majesty; His unerring, ever harmonious movement toward the predestined end; His will in holy government, to which all creation must bow, to the accomplishment of which all events must contribute. The book closes with the vision of the Sanctuary in which this glorious Presence takes up His dwelling, in the plan of which He intends all creation to learn the truth of His character and relation to creation, since it forms a visible expression of the very truth His prophet has so emphatically spoken.

We view things here according to the visions of God. We do not pass through the land to the Sanctuary, but begin with the sacred enclosure and proceed outward to the people and land. This is like the description of the tabernacle. It begins with the ark, the throne and mercy seat (Exod. xxv.). Or, again, like the sacrifices in Lev. i-vi., the burnt offering is first, that in which all went up as a sweet savor to God. Then, too, this vision commences at the East Gate, that at which a little later the glory is to enter (chap. xliii. 1-4). This is ever the foundation of all blessing. We must begin with God, we must take His view-point. From this all unfolds in divine order, and with absolute precision.

It is rather remarkable that there is only a single measurement which we can certainly define as being a measurement of height (xli. 8) in the whole of this minute specification. As to the sanctuary, it is exclusively a ground-plan which is before us. This marks utter indifference to what seems to man a very great, if not the greatest, element of architecture. Nothing is considered to affect the imagination so much as height or loftiness of space, especially in a religious sense. "The height, the span, the gloom, the glory" of a venerable Gothic cathedral do not enter into the conception before us. It is characteristic of man in his pride and rebellion to aim at building a tower which will reach to heaven. In this an important principle may find illustration. Man's blessing is not found through his efforts to reach up to God, but through God coming down to him. Many are the illustrations of this, commencing with the scene in the garden (Gen. iii.), which enforce the general truth that "A man can receive nothing, except it be given him from heaven" (John iii.). As a result of this coming down there is a great spreading out in relation to which height becomes an insignificant factor—the mountain is brought low, and the valley filled, for the revelation of Jehovah's glory (Isa. xl. 3-5).

In a general survey of the whole arrangement laid out in this vision, several general principles may be discerned as ruling this presentation of the fundamental truth of holiness. We may define them as separation, gradation, symmetry, sacrifice.

That separation is of great importance in manifesting the character and name of God comes out in chapter xliii. 7-12, where comparison is made with the first temple arrangements. Great defilement had arisen through the close proximity of the royal buildings to the Sanctuary, for the wickedness and idolatry of those who often occupied the former had been introduced into the latter. Further, the sharp distinction between the priests and Levites (chap. xliv. 5-16) emphasizes the thought of separation, the guarding against all undue familiarity with the presence of Jehovah, and the exercise of His government in holiness. It is to be noted how past disorders are brought forward both to show the need of, and to enforce, the ordinances of the new Sanctuary. The same may be observed as to the priestly garments and the people, and other related details (xlii. 14; xliv. 19). All is manifestly designed to impress the observer with the distinct sanctity of Jehovah and His dwelling-place. This is a needful lesson for all times, and in the days to which these visions of God refer it will be not only enforced by precept, but will have its continual display before the whole world in the plan and service of the Sanctuary, to which all nations shall come to worship.

A second principle of importance may be called gradation—a relative subordination or arrangement of parts so as to produce the desired effect, or express some one great truth. This is expressed in a way that could not fail to set forth the fundamental idea of holiness, and so give before the eyes of all a constant witness to this essential characteristic of Jehovah, who will then rule from Mount Zion over all the earth. First, as moving toward the divine centre, we have Israel's separation from the nations; then the oblation in the midst of the land; then the Sanctuary with its walls and courts; finally the Temple and its three graded apartments—porch, holy place, and most holy place. The whole plan is a most impressive portrayal of the Divine majesty and holiness in the power and truth of which the Millennial blessing will be maintained. It will give an ever present object lesson to the world such as it has never seen before. Note, too, that the outer court is entered by seven steps, the inner by eight, and the House by ten. It is an entrance into what is perfect as to its form and order (7); established in the blessing of the New Covenant, a new beginning for Israel (8); and all this through God manifest in holy government according to the fulness of the divine measure (10). God ever leads the creature, as to its learning and experience, by successive steps, into the secret of His presence. We may learn this as a general principle of God's ways in the tabernacle and its arrangement, in the days of creation, and in the recorded experiences of men of God. Whatever may be the absolute and perfect fulness of our standing, made ours the moment faith lays hold of God according to His Word, the apprehension or learning of it is by gradation, by successive steps. This, in one way, narrows the sphere, for constriction marks the gradation as we draw near the Divine presence, and yet in another way it is an introduction into the fulness of God. After speaking of the all-various wisdom of God, the eternal purpose in Christ, and the breadth, length, depth, and height which are connected with the riches of God's glory, the apostle brings us to the love of Christ, the heart of all, which had its positive and full manifestation at the Cross in every way. This may appear to be constriction, a narrowing down to that upon which our hearts may rest in what, as we may say, is concrete. This is needful for us, and ever will be so. But having reached the concentrated centre of all, notice there is immediate expansion, "which surpasses knowledge; that ye may be filled even to all the fulness of God" (Eph. iii.). Having found the divine centre we look out upon the vast expanse of grace and glory. Again, he speaks of "every family in the heavens and on earth," but the making known of the all-various wisdom of God is narrowed down to the assembly, though it will surely radiate to the utmost bounds. This mode of revelation is expressed in the most wonderful way of all, in a way seemingly constricted, if you please, yet ever abiding inscrutable, when we consider Christ in whom "dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." From the contemplation of the incomprehensible vastness of all things which that fulness ever pervades in a variety of constant manifestations we come to Him, and hear those marvelous words, the like of which cannot be found elsewhere, "Ye are complete in Him." It is interesting in this very connection to find that, not the holiest of all, but the great altar is the exact centre of the whole sanctuary enclosure (see plan). What a striking testimony to the truth of the Person and Work of Christ upon which is founded the glory of God and the blessing of man for time and eternity! May not the significance of this have influenced the mind of the godly remnant who later returned from Babylon? for they first set up the altar, and in it they found their protection in face of the surrounding peoples (Ezra iii. 1-3). Again, in Noah's day, the altar is prominent at the new beginning which is made after the purging judgment, typical, as we may well take this to be, of the Millennial scene after the introductory judgments of the day of the Lord. Then at the commencement of Solomon's reign—another Millennial picture—the altar is the great gathering centre, and also the place of God's revelation and blessing (2 Chron. i.).

Symmetry is another general principle illustrated in the plan and arrangements presented in this vision. Throughout there is a perfect balancing of the different parts in relative proportion and harmony. The constantly recurring square of 100 cubits, the whole sanctuary space being comprised of 25 such squares, and the preponderance of the numbers five and ten in the measurements, are suggestive in the light of what these numbers mean in Scripture. Such exactness of measurement and attention to detail as we find here must have as an underlying principle the harmonious arrangement of every part and relation as affecting both the buildings and the personnel of the Sanctuary. What do these things teach us? In the perfect balancing of every part we see how with God there is nothing of unevenness or undue proportion. Every element and feature of His character is in perfect adjustment and harmonious manifestation. It is found in its moral and spiritual display in Jesus, and it will be in constant manifestation before all created intelligences throughout eternity when God is "all in all." Further, it exhibits to us that there is perfect harmony, absolute precision, and perfect balance in His relation to the whole universe, or to the individual, in His every act, and in all His ways of wisdom, power, grace and love, in perfect holiness. The knowledge of this shall engage us for all eternity, when we shall no longer see through a glass darkly, but face to face, and known even as we are known. Then we shall say in a way impossible to us now, "O depth of riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable His judgments, and untraceable His ways! For who has known the mind of the Lord, or who has been His counsellor? Or who has first given to Him, and it shall be rendered to him? For of Him, and through Him, and for Him are all things: to Him be glory forever, Amen" (Rom. xi. 33-36).

As previously mentioned, five and ten are here the prominent basic numbers of measurement. We have become familiar with the first as signifying how the weak creature and the Almighty God are brought together, an accomplishment possible only through grace, so that it is a number we find identified with the blessing of redemption. In its common division of four and one (4+1) it suggests the thought of the world and man, in his own natural weakness, under the gracious yet absolute government of God. It leads us, therefore, to the idea of responsibility on the part of the creature in his relation to God as sovereign over all. These things in display become a wonderful testimony (2) to the Divine fulness (3) — 5 as 2+3. Such thoughts fit in admirably with the "visions of God," which close Ezekiel. For they treat of the time when the new covenant in its gracious work, founded upon redemption, shall be made good in all its blessing to Israel, and the sovereignty of God and His perfect administration of government shall be exercised over all creation, in which indeed there shall be a visible display of the Divine characters in the righteous reign of Christ—the fifth universal kingdom (Dan. ii.).

In the 25 (5x5) squares of 100 cubits which comprise the sanctuary enclosure we have these things intensified. This intimates that their concentrated expression is found in the plan and ordinances of the Sanctuary, the holy of holies of the earth. This number (25) is also prominent in other parts of the vision (chaps. xl., xlv., xlviii.).

In the 100 cubits so constantly repeated we have 5x20 (5x4, or 10x2 or 10+10). The latter number (20) appears in the holy and most holy places, also other adjacent parts, and must therefore be of some importance. The first division of this number (5x4) would suggest the truth of five intensified by universal application, four being the number of creation. This, indeed, will be the great lesson of the Millennial reign, that dispensation of the fulness of times, and the redemption of the purchased possession, accompanied as that will be with the manifestation of the sons of God. For the measuring of the other two possible divisions of the number twenty, we must first think of the meaning of ten, for it, too, appears as fundamental to the divine plan and order here revealed. In brief, it presents the perfection of divine government in the ordering of relations both Godward and manward (5+5), as, for example, we see in the ten commandments, and this as manifesting in fulness (3) the Divine perfections (7) (10=3+7), which, on the other hand, constitutes the witness (2) of the bringing together in grace of the weak creature and the Almighty God (5) in active display (10=5x2). That from this, ten should be expressive of full responsibility (as also of judgment, since it relates to the accomplishment or non-accomplishment of responsibility), is easily understood, and finds illustration in Scripture. All of these things will be given fullest manifestation in the Millennium. To this the abundant testimony of the prophets concerning its characteristics bears witness. It is not, therefore, surprising that this number should play such an important part in the plan of the Sanctuary, which is the heart of the administration and manifestation of this glorious kingdom as established on the earth. Twenty, then, as the product resulting from the use of two, may suggest to us the competent testimony which will be given at that wonderful epoch to the things of which we have just spoken. Further, 100 is a dominant factor throughout, and so stamps the essential meaning of ten upon the whole arrangement here spread out for our contemplation. Well may we say that a perfect symmetry governs everywhere.

There is minute care and great exactness shown in making this plan and in defining the relations of the several parts. This is also true as to the ordinances of service for the Prince, priests, Levites and people. All this is surely designed to press upon heart and conscience God's intense interest in the important truth presented in this great picture.

A fourth general principle, which stands out prominently, is the permanent memorial of sacrifice, maintained in the presence of the revealed glory. It is not sacrifice rendered with a view of obtaining salvation, but sacrifice in view of accomplished salvation, which has been blessedly developed for us in chaps. xxxvi.-xxxix.

Before closing this general survey, it may be well to speak of some remarkable omissions. In the order of feasts Pentecost is not mentioned. This, as we know, presents distinctively Christian truth which, being fully accomplished in the Church—no longer on the earth at the time this vision contemplates—is fittingly omitted from the feasts celebrated in the Millennium. There is no allusion to the ark. Is not this because of the more wondrous throne of glory which the prophet sees first in the visions of God which open the book, and which later he sees entering the House in the same form? This abides forever, filling the House (chap. xliii. 3-7). Every truth that the ark and mercy seat symbolize is found expressed in an intensified form in this remarkable chariot of the Divine glory, and over all is "the appearance of a Man." All mention of any High Priest is omitted. This would seem to find its explanation in that when Christ bears the glory, sitting and ruling upon His throne, He is spoken of as "a Priest upon His throne" (Zech. vi. 12, 13). From this passage we may also gather a suggestion as to why so much of seeming importance, needful for the construction of this great Sanctuary, such as measurements of height and details of style and treatment of both the exterior and interior of buildings and courts, is not given. Messiah, says Zechariah, "shall build the temple of Jehovah: even He shall build the temple of Jehovah." When He unrolls the completed design, and all that is needed is added to what was given to Ezekiel, then shall it be said, as once before when only the type of the glory was filling the eyes of the Queen of Sheba, "Behold, the half of the greatness of Thy wisdom was not told me." There is no king mentioned. Again Zechariah gives us the answer: "And Jehovah shall be king over all the earth...the nations...shall go up from year to year to worship the King, Jehovah of Hosts, and to celebrate the feast of tabernacles" (Zech. xiv. 9, 16, 17).

In contrast to these omissions, we have "the Prince," who has a unique and highly favored position. It is his privilege to occupy the eastern gate at which the glory of Jehovah entered. To him the offerings of the people are given, and by him administered in providing for the ritual of sacrifice. It does not appear that the people bring sacrifices of themselves, but that it is the Prince who gives all for the prescribed ritual, including the daily burnt offering (xlv. 17). The people are spoken of as simply worshipping at the times of offering by the Prince, but the act of offering is his, the priests and Levites acting in their respective capacities. He thus fills a representative position on behalf of the people in the matter of specific offerings, while in all of these the people may be considered as having their part, since, in the first instance, they present their offerings to the Prince (xlv.13-17), and join in worship when he offers. It would seem also that he occupies a representative position for God toward the people, since he is privileged to commune with Jehovah at the East Gate.

Finally, we may note that the omission of very much concerning the interior decoration, and the details of furniture, all so fully presented in relation to both the tabernacle and the first temple, only the more gives prominence and throws emphasis upon the great fundamental idea which it must be evident fills the whole vision. We have sought to show that this is the holiness of Jehovah. "Thou, son of man, show the house to the house of Israel, that they may be confounded at their iniquities; and let them measure the pattern." The mind and purpose of God are revealed to His people that they (and we too) may rightly judge both themselves and their history in the light of the revelation, and also acquire the needed wisdom to correct and direct all their ways. The things written aforetime were written for our learning.

It may be helpful to give in tabulated form the contents of these chapters. This will aid us in getting a comprehensive view of the whole subject.

SUBDIVISION 3. (chaps. 40-48).

The Glory dwelling in the Restored Land.

The principal subjects are:

The new Temple buildings, the entry of Jehovah into the House, the great altar, and the service of consecration (chaps. 40-43).

The ordinances regarding the personnel of the Sanctuary—priests and Levites (chap. 44).

The ordinances regarding the provision for the priests, Levites, and Prince, with his special responsibility to provide for the ritual in the Temple (chaps. 45: 1-17).

The ordinances regarding special and daily services in the Temple —the feasts, sabbaths, new moons, and offerings of the Prince (chaps. 45: 18—46: 24).

The river issuing from the Temple (chap. 47: 1-12).

The boundaries of the holy land, and the privileges granted to strangers who sojourn among the tribes (chap. 47: 13-23).

The divisions of the land (chap. 48).

SECTION 1. (chaps. 40, 41).

The Sanctuary, the holy of holies, where the glory will dwell.

1. (40: 1-4) The occasion of the vision.
   (1-3) The time, place, and communicator.
   (4) The eyes, ears, and heart to be engaged.
   The testimony to be given.
2. (40: 5-47) THE GATES AND COURTS: the precincts of the House.
   1. (5-27) The first court: the place of general assemblage.
      (5) The wall.
      (6-16) The Eastern Gate.
      (17-19) Chambers, Pavement, and measurement of Court.
      (20-23) The Northern Gate.
      (24-27) The Southern Gate.
   2. (28-46). The inner court: and its gateways: the place of separation for priestly service.
      (28-31) The Southern Gate.
      (32-34) The Eastern Gate.
      (35-37) The Northern Gate.
      (38-43) Chambers for washing the burnt-offering.
      Four tables for slaying the burnt, sin, and trespass offerings.
      Eight tables for the sacrifices.
      Four tables for the instruments.
      Double hooks for sacrificial purposes.
      (44-46) Chambers for the priests, keepers of the charge of the House, and keepers of the charge of the altar.
   3. (47) The Altar: the divine centre.
3. (40: 48—41: 4). The House itself into which the visible glory shall enter.
   1. (40: 48, 49) The porch.
   2. (41: 1, 2) The holy place.
   3. (41: 3, 4) The most holy.

4. (41: 5-11). The chambers around the House: the encompassment of divine fulness realized through accomplished creative sovereignty (3x10x3, 90 chambers in all).
   (5-7) Their construction and relation to the house.
   (8) The elevation of 6 cubits.
   (9-11) Adjacent spaces and way of entrance to chambers.
5. (41: 12-14) The separate place: God in government maintaining holiness, according to the fulness of the divine measure (10x10).
   (12) The building to the west.
   (13, 14) The two squares of 100 cubits each occupied by the two previously described buildings.
6. (41: 15-26) Interior details: symbolic of Messianic triumph.
   1. (15-21) General character: all established by measure in glory and righteousness.
   2. (22) The altar of wood: fellowship.
   3. (23-26) The doors: the manner of entrance.

SECTION 2. (chap. 42).

The arrangements provided to preserve the service of the Sanctuary in separation from defilement.

1. (1-12) The chambers before the separate place.
2. (13-14) The purposes served by these chambers.
3. (15-20) The established separation of the whole sacred enclosure.

SECTION 3. (chap. 43).

The glory of Jehovah filling the House.

1. (1-12) The place of the throne, glorious in majesty and holiness.
   1. (1-6) The glory itself.
   2. (7-11) The place of the throne—the seat of government.
   3. (12) The mount of holiness.
2. (13-17) The altar—the place of sacrifice.
3. (18-27) The offerings at the sanctification of the altar and the priests—the place of worship.

(Note, The people and their rulers are reproved and corrected, 7-11).

SECTION 4. (chap. 44).

Regulations concerning those who minister in the Sanctuary.

1. (1-3) The supremacy of Jehovah: regulations regarding the Eastern gate, and the Prince's privilege to use it.
2. (4-14) The judgment and holiness which become His House: regulations regarding service in keeping the gates, and slaying the sacrifices; those who shall not be permitted to serve, and the Levites who are to minister in these ways, with the reason for their exclusion from the priesthood.
3. (15-31) The priests: the features of their place and portion as sanctified unto Jehovah. They minister at the altar, are to be only sons of Zadok; their garments, their marriage, their service as teachers and judges, their preservation from defilement, their maintenance, are subjects of regulation.

(Note, The people, Levites and priests are reproved and corrected, 6-13).

SECTION 5 (chaps. 45, 46).

Divine government exercised in the apportionment of the land, and the establishment of ordinances for worship and service.

1. (45:1-8) The division of the land in which the Lord's claim is given first place.
   The portion for the priests...25,000x10,000
   The portion for the Levites..25,000x10,000 } 25,000x25,000.
   The portion for the City.....25,000x 5,000
   The portion for the Prince...
2. (45: 9-12) Justness in practical dealings required by Him whose ways are full of mercy and truth. Regulations as to weight, measure, and coinage.
3. (45:13—46:15). The materials for, and the order of, worship.
   1. (13-17) The gifts of the people: these are rendered to the Prince whose charge is to provide for the sacrifices.
   2. (18-25) The yearly feasts.
      (a) The offerings to cleanse and atone for the House.
      (b) The passover and feast of unleavened bread.
      (c) The feast of tabernacles.
   3. (46:1-7) The sabbaths and new moons.
   4. (8-10) The manner of entrance and exit.
   5. (11) The regulation as to the meal-offering.
   6. (12) The Prince's free-will offering.
   7. (13-15) The daily burnt-offering.
4. (46: 16-18) Warning against oppression.
5. (19-24) Guarding the holy things.

(Note, Princes are reproved and corrected, 45: 8-12 and 46: 16-18).

(Note the prominence of the Prince throughout this section).

SECTION 6. (chap. 47: 1-12).

The victory over curse.

The waters of continual refreshment and blessing flowing forth from the Temple.

SECTION 7. (chaps. 47: 13—48: 35).

The perfect land, for "the Lord is there."

1. (47: 13-21) The boundaries of the land.
2. (22, 23) Care for the stranger.
3. (48: 1-7) The tribes north of the sacred oblation.
4. (8-22) The sacred oblation: the universal centre of glory, government, and worship.
5. (23-29) The tribes south of the sacred oblation.
6. (30-35) The gates of the city.
7. (35) The name of the city.

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chaps. xl.-xlviii.)

The Glory dwelling in the Restored Land

Section 1 (Chaps. xl., xli.).

The "Sanctuary, the holy of holies,"* where the glory will dwell.

1 (xl. 1-4): The occasion of the vision.

1. In the twenty-fifth year of our captivity, in the beginning of the year, on the tenth of the month, in the fourteenth year after the city was [r]smitten, [r] Jer. 33. 21. 2 Kings 25. 4. Jer. 39. 1-7; 52. 4-11.

* Cf. chap. 45: 2-4.

Sec. 1.

Our attention is first called to the Sanctuary and its various precincts, the dwelling-place of the divine glory during the Millennial kingdom. These two chapters contain a description of the gates, courts, and buildings which make up what will be the most sacred and glorious place in all the world. From it the power and blessing of God will flow forth to the ends of the earth. Here we have, as it were, the very heart of that golden age, from which will go forth those streams of life which will remove the blight of the curse, make the desert blossom as the rose, and bear to every rank of creation the revivifying touch. A great pæan of praise will rise from the delivered creation thus brought into the liberty of the children of God, when the Firstbegotten shall have been brought again into the world, to whom universal homage shall be paid, His enemies having been made the footstool of His feet.

1. In order of time this is not the last prophecy of Ezekiel, that given in chap. xxix. 17 being two years later (see Notes, p. 176). But this great vision is the only one that could fittingly close the book. The glory revealed to the prophet at the beginning, and which he saw a little later leave the defiled temple soon to be laid in ruins, he now sees returning to that greater and more wonderful earthly dwelling-place, spread out before him so that he may describe it to the house of Israel.

In this there is a note of victory. It assures us of God's ultimate victory over evil, apart from which the glory could not return. It teaches us that there is a divine limit to the progress of evil. The tide of wickedness may rise so high as to seem to overwhelm the power of God and administer defeat to Him; but in the end, in the fulness of the time, when all has been accomplished which He had in mind, and which He indeed has been working out through all the turbulent scenes of human sin and strife, He moves to the closing act, the day breaks, the dark shadows of night flee away, and the mastery of His hand over all, even in the darkest hour of the past, is seen as in retrospect, the course of history is reviewed in the light of the glory. What a comfort for faith! How good to know the living God! He does not slumber or sleep. He abides faithful, no word of His can fail. "Have faith in God."

This vision was given, Ezekiel says, "In the twenty-fifth year of our captivity." The fact that morally and spiritually it alone fittingly closes his book, though not the last communication given to him, seems to imply that the very year itself in which this vision on that same day was the *hand of Jehovah upon me, and he brought me thither. In the ᵗvisions of God brought he me into the land of Israel, and set me upon a very ᵘhigh mountain; and upon it there

*Jer. 28. 5-17; 29. 31. u cf. ch. 20. 40-44; ch. 37. 22; Is. 2. 2, 3; Mic. 4. 1; Ps. 48. 1-3; ch. 43. 12.

s ch. 1. 3; 3. 14, 22; 8. 1; 33. 22; 37. 1.
t ch. 1. 1; 8. 3; 43. 3. 2 Chr. 26. 5. cf. ch. 13. 16, 22.

is given bears a lesson to us. Why the twenty-fifth year? Is it not because as 5x5 it suggests how fully God (1) and the creature (4) are brought together, and this in fivefold power and blessing? Thus the thought is emphasized, intensified, for us; and need we wonder at this when it is the time that the creature shall be delivered from the bond of corruption and be brought into the liberty of the glory? Then with the glory in the land there shall spread to earth's remotest bounds the blessing of Messiah's reign in righteousness, the time when the Son of Man shall sit upon His throne and administer the government which will then rest upon His shoulder.

The time is still more definitely stated as "in the beginning of the year, the tenth of the month." Considering Ezekiel's priestly place, and that the civil year, which was reckoned to begin with the first of the seventh month of the sacred year, was a late innovation among the Jews, having no relation to the divine economy with which the whole order of things here revealed has to do most intimately, it would appear certain that we are to think of that beginning of the year as referring to that spoken of in Exodus in connection with the Passover. This was the beginning of the year according to God's order, and this would be first in the heart and thought of the prophet. Is it not just the light of redemption and deliverance from bondage that we might expect to illumine our entrance upon the glorious vista of earth's golden age, of which this Sanctuary is the spiritual centre? What a word for downtrodden Israel to consider when pondering this book of their captivity prophet! All that that memorable event meant for them is to find its superlative accomplishment in the period to which this vision belongs. Then it is the tenth of the month when the lamb was taken to be kept up to the fourteenth day. This brings into view the blessed Person by whom alone all that is in prospect can be accomplished—Christ, who as a lamb without spot or blemish, has made peace by the blood of His cross; Christ who as the Lamb of God takes away the sin of the world; the Lamb who is so prominent in the book of Revelation, in which so much is given as to the circumstances and events relating to the period to which this vision shows the consummation.

Finally, we are told that this vision was given in the 14th year after the city was smitten (see Chronological Chart, Appendix), when the temple was burned, and the walls of the city broken down by order of Nebuchadnezzar, but in fulfilment of the divine decree (2 Chron. xxxvi. 11-21). Here again are we not to expect to find some note of comfort? Fourteen (7x2), testimony (2) given to the complete reversal of the ruin, and the bringing in of perfection (7), upon which the dark cloud of failure and ensuing judgment shall never fall again. Well may Haggai, as he looks beyond the insignificant temple of the restoration in his day, seeing as with the eye of God the glory of the Millennial temple, which Ezekiel describes, break out in prophetic ecstasy and say, "For thus saith Jehovah of Hosts: Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens, was as the building of a city, on the south. And he brought me thither, and behold, there was a [r]man whose appearance was like the appearance of brass, with a cord of flax in his hand, and a r cf. ch. 1. 5, 8; 10. 2; 9. 2; 10. 2. 1 Tim. 10. 5, 6. Rev. 1. 15; 2. 18.

and the earth, and the sea, and the desire of all nations shall come; and I will fill this house with glory, saith Jehovah of Hosts. The silver is Mine, and the gold is Mine, saith Jehovah of Hosts. The latter glory of this house shall be greater than the former, saith Jehovah of Hosts; and in this place will I give peace, saith Jehovah of Hosts."

Here we may digress, and think of another temple which lies in ruin, the walls of whose separation and protection have been broken down—the house of God which is the Church of the present time. As set up on the earth its history presents a sad spectacle, much of which may be found similar in character to that of Israel, for whatever is committed to the hands of men, though established in perfection at the beginning, suffers the same sorrowful blight. But, blessed be God, His Word teaches us in constantly recurring measure, by precept and example, in type and history, that the cycle must return to perfection, not so much like a circle returning to its beginning on the same level, but as lifted up on the line of perfection to a higher level than the point of beginning, revealing greater glory, from which flashes forth to the universe a knowledge of God not to be apprehended in any other way. So the latter glory of God's "spiritual house" shall be greater than the former, when the Church shall be presented faultless in the presence of God's glory, the temple of eternal praise throughout the generation of the age of ages (Eph. iii. 21). So too with creation—once there was a garden of Eden on the earth, then the earth shall be as the garden; once only one nation knew the blessing of a theocracy, then the whole world shall know it when "Jehovah shall be King over all the earth: in that day shall there be one Jehovah and His name one;" once only part of Israel knew God, then all shall know Him in themselves (Heb. viii. 11, New Trans.), for all Israel shall be saved when the Deliverer comes out of Zion. There is a glorious prospect wherever the eye of faith turns to contemplate the mystery of God's will, the consummation of which is the universal gathering into one under the hand of Christ our Saviour and Lord. In Him we have obtained an inheritance. We are His joint-heirs. Truly in the blessing of life and the glory of eternity we receive of His fulness, grace upon grace. Wonder of wonders that we should be called into the fellowship of God's Son!

The prophet was under the hand of Jehovah, and He brought him to the place of this vision. No other hand, no other guide, could bring him and open his eyes to see what are "the visions of God." It is good to have this assurance of how he is brought to see. The divine seal is thus put upon all. They are visions of God, signifying that God is the Giver. It is the genitive of origin, or efficient cause.

The location is definitely given. God brought Ezekiel into the land of Israel. These visions have to do with the whole nation, with the land when in possession of all the tribes, restored, united, blessed, all enemies smitten down, all internal conflict over. The prophet's vantage ground is a very high mountain. This can be no other than Jehovah's "holy mountain, the mountain of the height of Israel," measuring reed; and he stood in the gate. And the man said unto me, Son of man, [w]behold with thine eyes, and hear with thine [x]ears, and apply thy [y]heart to all that I show thee; for in order

[w] ch. 44. 5; etc., ch. 8. 5; etc.
[x] ch. 3. 10.
[y] or, Dan. 1. 8; 7. 28; 10. 12.
Ps. 119. 36; Prov. 4. 20-22.

where Israel shall serve Him (chap. xx. 40-44). It is that mountain of Jehovah to which all the nations shall flow (Isa. ii. 2, 3), beautiful in elevation, the joy of the whole earth, the city of the great King (Ps. xlviii. 1-3).

Question has been raised as to whether what Ezekiel sees is to be taken in a literal or ideal sense. There would be little profit in following the arguments on either side. All is expressly stated to be in vision, yet assuredly it must be a true picture, setting before us that which will be given actuality in all its parts in the time to which these visions belong. Great physical changes are intimately connected with the establishment of the Kingdom.

The prophet's approach is evidently from the north, since what he sees is on the south. It seems that he is brought by the way of the north from which came the great enemies of Israel, the way too by which they were carried into captivity. Now it is the return from all of that, with no ememy any more to swoop down from the north quarters, but judgment having brought in righteousness, a peaceable habitation is found. (Compare Isa. xliii. 6; xlix. 12; Jer. xxxvii. 1-9; xxiii. 7, 8).

Upon the high mountain Ezekiel sees what resembles the building of a city—that is the group of buildings which is described in the following chapters.

The prophet now sees a man standing in the gate, presumably the north gate of the sacred enclosure, for it would seem that he goes from this station with the prophet to the east gate (ver. 6), which is measured first. The man had the appearance of brass. It is the same metal as that used in the tabernacle and Solomon's temple, which is, more correctly, copper. It is familiar to us as the symbol of strength (1 Kings iv. 13; Job xl. 18; Judges xvi. 21), protection (1 Sam. xvii. 5,6), unyieldingness in good or evil (Jer. i: 18; xv. 20; Isa. xlviii. 4), and judgment (Lev. xxvi. 19; Deut. xxviii. 23; Micah iv. 13). As it could be highly polished and reflect images it was used for mirrors (Exod. xxxviii. 8). Such mirrors were used to make the laver of the tabernacle which held the water of cleansing for the priests. This last connection links it with the Word of God, of which the water is the well-known type. The characteristics of the copper are found in that Word which endureth forever, which is settled forever in heaven, and cannot be broken but must be all fulfilled, and makes all manifest even as the light, another figure of the Word (1 Pet. i. 25; cxix. 8, 9; John x. 35; Matt. v. 18; Heb. iv. 12, 13; Ps. cxix. 105). The character of God as a God of holy judgment, unchanging, enduring, and searching, all as revealed in His immutable Word, is the lesson of the copper. And this cannot fail to carry our thoughts to Him who is called the Word of God, who abides the same yesterday, to-day and forever, whose goings forth have been from eternity, and who is both the wisdom and power of God. With Him all the glory of God stands associated, and it is not strange then to find this metal prominent in the visions of God which open this book > that it might be shown thee art thou brought hither: declare to the house of Israel all that thou seest.

in which also the human form predominates. We find it also in the description of the glorious Person Daniel sees (chap. x. 5, 6), and John later (Rev. i. 15), both presenting the Lord Himself. Added to all this Ezekiel tells us that the glory of Jehovah which he saw returning to the new temple (chap. xliii.) had the appearance of the vision he had previously seen. Thus what the brass, or copper, symbolizes has a prominent place in the manifestation of God's glory.

The man has in his hand a cord of flax and a measuring reed. He is prepared to measure. In fact it is with this labor that he occupies the prophet as he guides him through the courts and around the buildings of the Sanctuary. This work of measurement is prophetically significant. See Zech. ii. and Rev. xi.; Hab. iii. 6. It suggests God's care and interest; every thing relating to His purposes and promises is important. Then it may well signify that God has risen up to take possession; it is the assertion of His title. Every false claim set aside, all that usurped possession removed, all shall be established according to the measure of truth and righteousness.

From ver. 5 we learn that the measuring reed in the man's hand was a reed of six cubits, each being a cubit and an handbreadth, which means, if our conclusion is correct (see Appendix), a cubit of four palms or handbreadths. We have learned that six expresses the thought of the limit imposed by God upon man. It is associated with evil, as in the case of Goliath, the Beast of Rev. xiii., and Nebuchadnezzar's idolatrous image. Yet if it is linked with evil in full manifestation, it is just in this connection we find God overcomes and makes the wrath of man to praise Him. He gains the victory. David fells Goliath, and the Son of Man coming in His glory destroys the Beasts and sets up His everlasting kingdom. On the sixth day of Gen. 1 Adam is brought in to subdue and rule over creation, suggesting thoughts of mastery and government. Just such thoughts cluster around this measuring reed of six cubits. When God asserts His title to the earth, destroying those who have destroyed it, it will be in the way this number suggests. But it is by the arm and hand of a Man that this will be accomplished, and four (the four handbreadths of the cubit here specified) is the number of man and creation, the Man Christ Jesus, the appointed Heir of all things, the One who will subjugate all things to Himself according to the purpose of God.

The man now addresses the prophet. The visions of God require the concentration of every faculty—the eyes, ears, and inner man are all to be called into exercise. The things of God claim our undivided attention. We yield ourselves imperfectly to the divine requirement, and so fail in spiritual perception and intelligence. God's hand brought His servant into the midst of these wonderful scenes that all that pertained to them might be shown to him by divine guidance, and then he was commissioned to make it known to the house of Israel. This is the way of divine grace. These visions of God have to do with the time when Israel will be brought under the new covenant which is grace, not law. But it is upon this principle that we are now blessed. Out of the land of our captivity to sin and 2 (xl. 5-47): The gates and courts: the precincts and the house.

1 (5-27): The first court: the place of general assemblage.

2. [1]And behold, a wall on the outside of the house round about, and in the man's hand a measuring reed of six cubits, of a cubit and a handbreadth each. And he measured the thickness of the building, one reed, and the height, one reed.

And he came unto the gate which looked toward the [z]east, and went up its [a]steps; and he measured the threshold of the gate, one reed broad, even one threshold, one reed broad. And each [b]lodge was one reed long, and one reed broad; and it was five cubits between the lodges; and the threshold of the gate beside the porch of the gate toward the house was one reed. [And he measured the porch of the gate toward the house, one reed.] And he measured the porch of the gate, eight cubits; and its posts, two cubits; and the porch of the gate was toward the house. And the lodges of the gate which was toward the east were three on this side and three on that side: these three were of one measure; and the posts were of one measure on this side and on that.

z ctr. ch. 8. 16; 11. 1-3. cf. ch. 10. 19; 11. 23; 43. 1-4.

a vers. 22, 26, 31, 34, 37, 49.

b vers. 10-16; 21. 29, 33, 36. cf. 1 Kings 14. 28.

Satan the hand of God brings us to the mountain-top of spiritual blessing. He has brought us there to be wholly taken up with our glorious heritage, and then to be ministers of its bounty to others. May our eyes, ears, and hearts be applied to all that the Holy Spirit, who searches the deep things of God, is ever ready to make plain to us. It is His delight to take the things of Christ and show them unto us.

2. [1] First of all the prophet beholds a wall on the outside of the house. The lesson of the measuring reed we have already suggested; it seems introduced here rather than in ver. 3 so as to link it with the fact that this encircling wall is one reed high, one reed broad—a reed of six cubits, equivalent to 7.2 feet, our measure. We see at once that this wall is not for protection against enemies, it is too low. Its significance is other than that of a bulwark to resist assault. The fundamental idea here expressed is that of separation, the wall teaches that the enclosed space is sanctified, set apart, to Jehovah, and this according to the symbolism of the number six. It preaches the exclusion of all that defiles. This wall is as broad as it is high, being in fact foursquare, for perfect equality in every direction marks the holy requirements of God as to both the separation from and judgment of evil. Seven steps lead up to the outer court level. This may suggest to us that the way of approach to these holy precincts of God's presence must be according to the perfection of Him who declares His character in this wall of separation. He must be sanctified in all those who draw near to Him.

This first court is the place of general assemblage. For worship the people must go within. The wall is too high for any outside

And he measured the breadth of the gate-entry, ten cubits; the length of the gate, thirteen cubits. And there was a border before the lodges of one cubit; and a border of one cubit on the other side; and the lodges were six cubits on this side, and six cubits on that side. And he measured the gate from the roof of the lodge to its [opposite] roof, a breadth of five and twenty cubits, entry opposite entry. And he made posts of sixty cubits; and up to the posts was the court of the gate round about. And from the front of the entrance-gate to the front of the porch of the inner gate, fifty cubits. And there were closed* windows to the lodges, and to their posts within the gate round about [them], and likewise to the wall-projections, even windows round about inwards; and on the posts [c]palm-trees.

And he brought me into the outer court, and behold, chambers, and a stone pavement made for the court round about: thirty chambers upon the pavement. And the pavement was by the side of the gates, answering to the length of the gates,

[c] 1 Kings 6. 29, 32, 35. 2 Chr. 3. 5 vers. 22, 26, 31, 34, 37. ch. 41. 18-20, 25, 26.

* Heb., closed, i.e., not opened like ordinary windows. Usually windows were openings filled with lattice-work. Might be rendered "latticed windows."—(J. B.)

to observe what is going on within, and entrance must be in the prescribed way, and as ascending the seven steps of the gate-building. Both the way of our approach to God, and the character which pertains to it, are ordered by Him and must be according to what He is in Himself. This underlies the truth of redemption and all that flows out of it. This outer court, as determined by the various measurements given later, is evidently a square of 500 cubits. In our general observations on this vision attention has been called to the very large place given to five as a factor of measurement, and its significance, with that of those numbers in which it occurs, has been considered.

We now come to the east gate, which is really a large building 25 cubits broad by 50 cubits long (i.e., 30 feet by 60 feet). It is described in detail; the other gates conform to it. This gate-building is in several respects the most important of all. It is on the axis of the temple; by it the glory of God enters (chap. xliii.); it is shut and no one permitted to enter it because "Jehovah, the God of Israel, hath entered in by it;" the Prince is privileged to eat bread in it before Jehovah, but he must enter by the porch and go out by the same way, there is no passing through it (chap. xliv. 1-3). The plan in the Appendix will help us to understand the relation of the several parts of this structure. The arrangement of these gate-buildings with their six guard-chambers appears designed to emphasize the [even] the lower pavement. And he measured the breadth from the front of the gate of the lower [pavement] to the front of the inner court without, a hundred cubits [as to] the east, and [as to] the north.

And the gate of the outer court which looked northward he measured, its length and its breadth and its lodges, three on this side and three on that, and its posts and its wall-projections; it was after the measure of the former gate: fifty cubits its length, and the breadth five and twenty cubits. And its windows, and its wall-projections, and its palm-trees, were after the measure of the gate which is toward the east; and they went up to it by seven steps, and its wall-projections were before them. And there was a gate to the inner court over against the [other] gate, as to the north [gate], even [so] to the east; and he measured from gate to gate, a hundred cubits.

And he brought me toward the south, and behold, a gate toward the south; and he measured its posts and its wall-projections according to these measures; and there were windows to it, and to its divine provision to preserve the sanctity of the house. It evidences special care to exclude all that would profane these holy precincts. The careful attention given to detail must impress upon all concerned God's care for the holiness of His dwelling-place, thus reminding the people of their own gross negligence and departure in the past, as a result of which they so wickedly defiled God's house. This is pressed upon them in the ordinances given in chap. xliv. 4-14.

If then the wall speaks of exclusion, limiting entrance to the court by the gate-buildings, they certainly instruct us as to that watchfulness ever necessary to guard against the intrusion of what would defile, or not be according to the requirements of Jehovah. All must answer to the claims of His holiness. By these structural forms He was preaching against those abuses and idolatrous evils which prince and priest had allowed to traverse the court of His house, and even be set up within its walls. It was like saying to them in a parable of stone, "Holiness becometh My house forever."

Only one feature of decoration is mentioned — the palm. It is the symbol of beauty (Song vii. 7); of righteousness, prosperity and fruitfulness (Ps. xcii. 12-14); of salvation and victory (Rev. vii. 9); of kingly glory (John xii. 13); and its extensive use in the first temple identifies it with the kingdom and glory of which Solomon's reign is typical (1 Kings vi. 29, 32, 35; vii. 36; 2 Chron. iii. 5). These are the characteristic features of the Millennial age. Then palm branches were used at the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. xxiii. 40; Neh. viii. 15)—this feast typifies the time of peace and rejoicing which wall-projections round about, like the other windows; fifty cubits was the length, and five and twenty cubits the breadth. And there were seven steps to go up to it; and its wall-projections were before them; and it had palm trees, one on this side and one on that side, upon its posts. And there was a gate to the inner court toward the south; and he measured from gate to gate toward the south, one hundred cubits.

2 (28-46); The inner Court and its Gateways; the place of separation for priestly service.

2 And he brought me into the inner court by the south gate; and he measured the south gate according to these measures: and its lodges, and its posts, and its wall-projections, according to these measures; and there were windows to it and to its wall-projections round about: the length was fifty cubits, and the breadth twenty-five cubits. And shall come when our Lord shall have established His kingdom upon earth, and Israel shall come into her possessions, and flourish amid Jehovah's blessings in the land. Its inclusion of the eighth day suggests the new beginning under grace, the day of the new covenant in which the nation will then stand and abide forever. The constant, steady growth of the palm tree through all seasons symbolizes constancy, perseverance. Certainly the palm sets forth perfectly the character of the time to which these visions belong, and most suitably adorns these buildings.

This outer court, with its east, north, and south gate-buildings, extends around the temple itself and the altar-court on three sides, and to the west there are additional buildings, with flanking chambers to north and south of the temple, and a gateless wall. In every direction the sanctity of the house is guarded, an arrangement manifestly different from that of the first temple, as Ezekiel xliii. 7, 8 clearly intimates.

Around this court, and abutting the gate-buildings, there is a pavement with chambers, which probably extended from the gate-buildings to the kitchens, or boiling places, situated in each of the corners of the court. No chambers, it would seem, are located on the west side; they are rather ranged along the court wall on the other three sides. These chambers would be for the people when feasting upon their offerings. The word here used for chambers is different from that for the guard-rooms, or lodges, in the gate-buildings. It suggests a rather spacious room. In 1 Sam. ix. 22 it is rendered parlor, a room in which thirty persons could be accommodated at a feast. It is probable that these chambers were arranged in six groups of five each.

We may be little able to interpret many of the details given as to these buildings, but it is noticeable that certain numbers stand out prominently, and these may at least suggest lessons which fit in with the time to which these visions of God unmistakably point.

2 The prophet now enters the inner court by the south gate, and is successively taken to the east and north gates. In connection with there were wall-projections round about, twenty-five cubits long, and five cubits broad. And its wall-projections were toward the outer court; and there were palm trees upon its posts: and its ascent was [by] eight steps.

And he brought me into the inner court toward the east; and he measured the gate according to these measures; and its lodges, and its posts, and its wall-projections, according to these measures; and there were windows to it and its wall-projections round about: the length was fifty cubits, and the breadth twenty-five cubits. And its wall-projections were toward the outer court; and palm trees were upon its posts, on this side and on that side, and its ascent was [by] eight steps.

And he brought me to the north gate, and he measured it according to these measures: its lodges, its posts, and its wall-projections; and there were windows to it round about: the length was fifty cubits, and the breadth twenty-five cubits. And its posts were toward the outer court; and palm trees were upon its posts, on this side and on that side: and its ascent was [by] eight steps. And there was a chamber and its entry by the posts of the gates; there they washed the burnt offering, and in the porch of the gate were two tables on this side, and two tables on that side, to slay thereon the burnt offering and the sin offering and the trespass offering. And at the side without, at the ascent to the entry of the north gate, were two tables; and on the other side, which was at the

the last there is the provision for the work of sacrifice. In addition there are two cells for those having charge of the house and the altar, situated in the court itself, one near the north gate, and one near the south gate.

The gate-buildings are not materially different from those already described. They have eight steps, one more than the others, so that the level of the inner court is the height of these eight steps above that of the outer court. This may be the reason why the pavement of the outer court is referred to as the lower (ver. 18).

Within this inner court the priests performed their service with respect to the altar and the house. The garments in which they ministered within these precincts must be laid aside before they go out to approach the things of the people (xlii. 14).

It seems significant that the work of sacrifice is connected with the northern gate. In Scripture the north is associated with judg-porch of the gate, were two tables: four tables were on this side, and four tables on that side, by the side of the gate—eight tables whereon they slew [the sacrifices] — and at the ascent four tables of hewn stone, of a cubit and a half long, and a cubit and a half broad, and one cubit high; whereon also they laid the instruments with which they slew the burnt offering and the sacrifice. And the double hooks of a hand-breadth were fastened round about within; and upon the tables [they put] the flesh of the offering.

And without the inner gate were two chambers in the inner court, one at the side of the north gate, and its front toward the south; the other was at the side of the south gate, the front toward the north. And he said unto me, This chamber whose front is toward the south is for the priests, the [d]keepers of the charge of the house. And the chamber whose front is toward the north is for the priests, the [e]keepers of the charge of the altar. These are the sons of [f]Zadok, those who from among the sons of Levi approach unto Jehovah to minister unto him.

3 (47): The altar: the divine centre.

[3]And he measured the court, one hundred cubits long, and one hundred cubits broad, foursquare; and the altar was before the house.

[d] Lev. 8. 35; Num. 3. 27–32, 38; 18. 1-15. 1 Chr. 6. 23. 2 Chr. 13. 11.
[e] ch. 44. 15, 16. Num. 18. 7.
[f] 1 Chr. 6. 8, 53; 24. 6. 2 Sam. 8. 17 2 Sam. 15. 24, 29. 1 Kings 1. 8, 26, 32, 34; 38, 39.
ch. 43. 19; 44. 15; 45. 11.

ment. From that quarter the stroke falls upon both Israel and Judah. The word itself, tsaphon, properly means "the hidden," "the dark," and is only used of the north as a quarter gloomy and unknown. The idea of darkness thus associated with it fits well with that of judgment. And in this connection we cannot fail to think of the darkness of Calvary, the outer darkness of eternal doom, and the gloomy darkness in which wicked angels are kept. Darkness, too, is the term used to describe man's state away from God, alienated by wicked works, and darkened in his understanding. Certainly in the moral and spiritual application, it is in relation to the north, speaking symbolically, that we need to learn the truth of sacrifice. Here then at the north gate of the inner court, the court of the altar, we have all provided for the accomplishment of this work, whether it be the burnt-offering, sin-offering, or trespass-offering.

[3] We come now to the altar, the actual centre of the whole sacred enclosure,* standing at the centre of the inner court which is measured 100 cubits each way. Details and dimensions of the altar are given later (xliii. 13-17). Here it is mentioned to show its relation to the whole. It is the divine centre upon which every line of approach converges, east, north, and south. It surely stands

* See Appendix.

3 (ch. xl. 48; xli. 4): The house itself into which the visible glory shall enter.

3. [1]And he brought me to the [g]porch of the house, and he measured the post of the porch, five cubits on this side, and five cubits on that side; and the breadth of the gate, three cubits on this side, and three cubits on that side. The length of the porch was twenty cubits, and the breadth eleven cubits,* even by the steps whereby they went up to it;† and there were [h]pillars by the posts, one on this side and another on that side.

[g] 1 Kings 6. 3. 2 Chr. 3. 4.

[h] 1 Kings 7. 21.

1 (xl. 48, 49): The porch.

2 (xli. 1, 2): The holy place.

[2]And he brought me to the temple; and he measured the posts, six cubits broad on the one side, and six cubits broad on the other side, the breadth of the tent. And the breadth of the entry was ten cubits, and the sides of the entry were five cubits on this side, and five cubits on that side; and he measured its length, [i]forty cubits, and the breadth twenty cubits.

[i] 1 Kings 6. 2, 17.

3 (5, 4): The most holy.

[3]And he went inwards and measured the post of the entry, two cubits; and the entry, six cubits, and the breadth of the entry, seven cubits.‡

* The LXX reads "twelve." This seems the most likely measure considering the general symmetry of number and plan, which see.—(J. B.).

† Or, according to the reading of the LXX, "by ten steps they went up to it." If this is correct, as is probably the case, then note the three sets of steps—7 to the outer court, 8 to the inner court, and 10 to the house.—(J. B.).

‡ It seems probable that the LXX is right in considering this measurement to refer to the wall on either side of the entry (see plan).—(J. B.).

as an abiding memorial of Christ and His sacrifice. This is central to all the blessing and glory in which Israel and the nations will participate, as indeed it is in regard to the whole universe (Col. i. 19, 20). It will ever remind those who throng the courts of the Lord's house of the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world. Upon the Mount of Transfiguration His death was the subject of converse. That scene set forth the glory of the kingdom of God come in power, and when it has actually come that death will not be forgotten. The peerless glory which will then invest Him will not hide the truth of that redemption by blood upon which all action in power is based.

In the next sections we have the description of the two courts, each 100 cubits square, in the first of which the house itself is located, and in the second, another building the purpose of which is not stated. Thus there is a series of three squares, each of 100 cubits, following each other toward the west, the first being the court of the altar already considered.

3. Now we are brought to consider what is called the house. This building over all is 60 cubits from north to south, and 100 cubits from east to west, with an open space of 20 cubits on three sides—north, i (ch. xli. 5-11): The chambers: the encompassment of divine fulness realized through accomplished creative sovereignty (5x10x3, 90 chambers in all).

And he measured its length, [j]twenty cubits, and the breadth twenty cubits, before the temple; and he said unto me, This is the holy of holies.

4. And he measured the wall of the house, six cubits; and the breadth of [k]the side chambers, four cubits round about the house on every side. And the side chambers were three, chamber over chamber, and thirty in order; and they entered into the wall which belonged to the house for the side chambers round about, that they might have hold; but they had not hold in the wall of the house. And as to the side chambers there was an enlarging and a [l]winding about still upward to the side chambers, for the winding about of the house went still upward round about the house; wherefore the breadth of the house was upward; and so one went up from the lower [story] to the upper, by the middle one.

j 1 Kings 6. 20. 2 Chr. 3. 8.

k 1 Kings 6. 5, 6.

l 1 Kings 6. 8.

west, and south. Successively, the porch, the holy place, and the most holy are measured. The plan shows the arrangement along with the surrounding chambers.* We may notice the terms used. The whole building is called "the house," of which the porch is the first part described. The next part is called "the temple," which is 40x20 cubits; this is the holy place. The third compartment is "the holy of holies," 20x20 cubits. Connected with this building are chambers surrounding it in three stories—30 of these to each story, 90 in all.

To the west another building is located, having walls of 5 cubits' thickness, and measuring on the outside 80x100 cubits. The principal measurements are then enumerated (vers. 12-15*a*).

(a)—The house, 100 cubits long.
(b)—The separate place (20 cubits), and the building (80 cubits), total, 100 cubits.
(c)—The breadth of the house, 60 cubits, with the separate place, 20 cubits on each side, making the total breadth at the east end of these two squares 100 cubits.

There follows (vers. 15*b*-26) an account of certain interior features and details of ornamentation.

4. In the temple of Solomon the dimensions are similar. The holy and most holy places are the same size, but the porch was 20x10 cubits, here 20x11, but the LXX gives 12. There too the height was given, but Ezekiel does not mention it. The side chambers are mentioned as five cubits, but Ezekiel specifies four. The account in 1 Kings vi. may help us to better understand the structure of the side chambers. These were in three stories also, and increased in breadth one cubit, the dimensions being 5, 6, and 7 cubits. This means that the wall of the house receded with each story, so forming a resting-

* See Appendix.

And I saw that the house had elevation round about: the foundations of the side chambers were a [m]full reed of six cubits to the junction. The thickness of the wall, which was for the side chambers without, was five cubits, as also what was left free along the building of the side chambers that belonged to the house. And between the chambers was a width of twenty cubits round about the house on every side. And the entrance of the side chambers was toward what was left free, one entrance toward the north, and another entrance toward the south; and the width of the space that was left was five cubits round about.

m ch. 40. 5.

place for the floor beams, these beams not being let into the wall but bearing upon the ledge of one cubit formed by the receding wall. It is noticeable that no wall thicknesses are given in Kings or Chronicles. On the other hand the rich embellishment of Solomon's temple is dwelt upon, its gold and precious stones; but of such details Ezekiel makes no mention, in fact the only material referred to is wood. This seems to indicate that at least one purpose is to impress upon us the massiveness and stability of these structures, rather than beauty of detail and adornment, while the arrangement of courts—increasing in height from the level beyond the outer court to the level of the house, and these courts with their gates so surrounding the Sanctuary as to guard it from all contamination with what was common, or would defile—seems designed to enforce the rebuke and admonition given in chap. xliii. 1-12.

Perhaps the dimensions themselves may yield us some helpful lesson. Five and ten appear as basic numbers in so many of the measurements, often intensified by the use of 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, that the general lesson seems to be that of divine sufficiency (1) identified for blessing with creature weakness (4), in the full accomplishment of every divine requirement (10). This will be manifest in the kingdom and glory. Practically all the digits by which all numbers are expressed are used in varying relations throughout this complex of buildings, suggesting how that day will be characterized by divine measure ruling in the most far-reaching manner. But in no instance is eleven used as a factor. Twelve appears in the measure of the altar, and is a factor in certain measures noticed a little later. Here we may find it in the breadth of the house, which is, including the free space on each side, 60 (5x12) cubits, but this may be also 6x10. All the multiples and the sums found by adding the measurement of different parts together are divisible by five or ten. There are no uneven multiples, or such as would leave a fraction when divided. All produces the sense of evenness, unity, harmony, stability, and so in the moral sense equity, righteousness, peace, sanctification, amid which the service and worship of Jehovah is carried out and the divine government exercised. As we consider these things and their spiritual import we understand why, "Many peoples shall go and say, Come, and let us go up to the mountain of Jehovah, to the house of the God of Jacob; and He will teach us of His ways,

5 [ch. xli. 12-14]: The separate place: God in government, maintaining holiness, according to the fulness of the divine measure (10x10).

5. And the [n]building that was before the [o]separate place at the end toward the west was seventy cubits broad; and the wall of the building was five cubits thick round about, and its length ninety cubits. And he measured the house, the length one hundred cubits; and the separate place, and the building, and its walls, the length one hundred cubits, and the breadth of the front of the house, and of the separate places toward the east, one hundred cubits. And he measured the length of the building before the separate place, which was at the back of it, and the galleries on the one side and on the other side, one hundred cubits.

n ver. 13.
o vers. 13, 15. ch. 42. 1, 10, 13.

and we will walk in His paths." The city of that day is, as Ezekiel shows us, a part of the great oblation, and Isaiah lx. is a wonderful description of it. The house, too, is spoken of, "I will beautify the house of My magnificence" (ver. 7).

From the level of the inner court the house with its encompassing chambers is elevated a full reed of six cubits. To reach this higher level there seems to have been 10 steps, if the reading of the LXX is accepted. Thus seven steps led up to the outer court, eight to the inner court, and ten to the house. This suggests perfection in new covenant relation according to the fulness of divine requirements—in all 25 steps (5x5) in three sets, the latter speaking of full manifestation according to the power of the Spirit and the truth of resurrection.

5. The house is surrounded on three sides—north, west, south—by what is called the separate place, a space of 20 cubits, making three sections of court each measuring 100x20, and so having an area of 2,000 square cubits, or a total of 6,000. The extreme measurement of the house is 60x100, or the same total area of 6,000. This makes a total for this part of the sacred enclosure of 12,000 square cubits, which equals 12x10x10x10. Here we observe how 12 appears as an important factor; and the frequent use of three, which enters into six and twelve, and of ten, whether in multiplication or addition, is worthy of notice. They appear in these areal measurements, in the number of chambers in the outer court (30), in those surrounding the house (30 in each of the three stories), and in the three successive squares of 100 cubits each, equalling 300x100. Then in the area of each of these we have a fourfold use of ten, the area being 10,000 square cubits or 10x10x10x10, and this repeated three times. Thus we find three multiplied by two or four, giving us six or twelve, intensified by ten used once, twice, thrice, or in fourfold power. These basic numbers in their multiplied form cannot fail to impress any one who has given a little attention to their significance in Scripture. They teach us how divine fulness in complete manifestation (3) is exercised in government (12) according to every requirement Godward and manward (10), and this in realized victory over evil (6), as a result of which the Creator and His creature are brought together under the administration of Christ into harmonious relation to the praise of His glory (5). This general lesson

6 (15-26): Interior details and ornamentation: symbolic of Messianic triumph.
1 (15-21): General character: all established by measure in glory and righteousness.

6. [1]And the inner temple and the porches of the court, [p]the thresholds, and the closed [q]windows, and the galleries round about the three of them (opposite the thresholds it was wainscoted with wood round about, and from the ground up to the windows, and the windows were covered), [and] above, over the entry, even unto the inner house, and without, by all the wall round about, within and without, [all was] by measure. And it was made with [r]cherubim and [s]palm trees; and a palm p cf. 1s. 6. 4

q ver. 25, ch. 40. 16.
r vers. 20, 2 1 Kings 6. 29, 2 Chr. 3. 7-14. cf. Ex. 25. 18-22, 1 Kings 6. 23-35, 2 Kings 19 15, Ps. 80. 1; 99. 1, Isa. 37. 16, ch. 10 Heb. 9. 5.

s cf. Lev. 23. 40; Neh. 8. 15; Ps. 92. 12; Jer. 10. 5; John 12. 13. etc. Joel 1. 1 appears stamped upon this whole arrangement. All is measured and ordered to set forth divine perfection, the basis of which is the reed of six cubits of four handbreadths each, making in all 24, or 12x2, for it will be the full testimony (2) to the perfection and order of divine government (12) set up on the earth, and this under the hand of man—the Man Christ Jesus. "All was by measure."

6. [1]As to the interior we are told of it being wainscoted with wood, ornamented with cherubim and palm trees, alternating, and each cherub having the face of a man and the face of a young lion. The significance of the palm tree we have already considered. This is now combined with the symbolism of the cherubim. Both are evenly distributed; there is perfect balance, symmetry rules throughout. From the scriptures in which the cherubim are mentioned they appear as "supports or guardians of the throne of God in His absolute righteousness and judgment," and "seem clearly to represent the divine attributes of righteousness and its execution in judgment, which is the basis of all true government, human or divine, the only guarantee of the stability of that which is beneath its sway. The throne of iniquity can have no fellowship with the God of righteous judgment (Ps. xciv. 20). Therefore God will overturn until the righteous Ruler comes who loveth righteousness and hateth iniquity (Ezek. xxi. 27; Ps. xlv. 6, 7). Such a throne can alone be 'forever and ever;' and this Ruler is the Melchizedek, 'King of righteousness and King of peace,' David's Son and yet his Lord, who sits at God's right hand till His enemies are made His footstool (Ps. cx. 1, 2). In view of such a Ruler the people may well tremble and bow in heart to Him in the day of His grace ere His judgment fall; and yet when He takes His power to reign, the earth shall rejoice and be glad. For Him His whole creation waits in hope, for then will the children of God be manifested in their liberty of glory and creation be delivered from its present bondage" (Rom. viii. 21, 22). The living creatures of the earlier vision of God's majesty and glory are called cherubim in chapter x., and there too we see them associated with the work of Judgment. But while there they have four faces, here in the sanctuary only two are mentioned, those of the ox and eagle being omitted. This emphasizes the lesson of the other two, that of the man suggesting intelligence combined with all the tender and gracious affections of human nature to which the face is the index by means of both look, word, and feature; and that of the lion denoting majesty of bearing, fearless and irresistible in authority and power. These features will characterize the government of God in tree was between cherub and cherub; and the cherub had two faces: 19 the face of a man was toward the palm tree on the one side, and the face of a young lion toward the palm tree on the other side; [so] was it made upon all the house round about. From the ground unto above the entry were cherubim and palm trees made, and [on] the wall of the temple. As for the temple, the door-posts were square; and the front of the sanctuary had the same appearance.

[t] ch. 1. 10.

[2] (22): Fellowship

20 The altar was of wood, three cubits high, and its length, two cubits; and its corners, and its length, and its walls were of wood: and he said unto me, This is the [u] table which is before Jehovah.

[u] ch. 44. 16. Mal. 1. 7, 12.

the day of the kingdom and glory, and surely they find there superlative manifestation in Him who then will rule—in Him who is both the Man Christ Jesus and the Lion of the tribe of Judah.

[2] The altar of wood, called "the table which is before Jehovah," seems from this to have been placed on the central axis of the temple, and so in line with the doors of the holy of holies, the dwelling-place of the glory soon to enter. Of this only two dimensions are given, the height three cubits, the length two cubits, although the LXX adds that it was two broad, making it foursquare. This makes it appear quite different from the table of showbread in the tabernacle. It seems to be more like the golden altar of incense, both as to its form and location, yet the difference is very evident in that wood is the only material mentioned, and it is called a table as well as an altar. Little can we say about this, except that the thoughts of worship and communion combine in this the only article of furniture mentioned. The fact that it is only wood prohibits the actual offering of sacrifice such as the burning of incense, and nothing is said of bread being placed upon it. Perhaps its dimensions may afford a lesson. By comparison it is four times the area of the altar of incense made for the tabernacle, and twice that of the table, being also twice its height; the altar was two cubits high, this altar-table is three. Three is the number of full manifestation, of the Trinity, and particularly of the Spirit, and of resurrection; two is the number of testimony and communion, in both of which what three speaks of is revealed and enjoyed. These precious thoughts are combined as it were in this altar-table, and if we are permitted to link with it the altar and table of the tabernacle, then all that it speaks of centres in the perfection and fragrance of Christ—His Person, work, and the results, as found in life, fellowship, and acceptance—all as set forth in the incense and the bread of presence; and furthermore all of this found in manifest union, only in intensified form, as the enlarged dimensions may indicate, in the day of the kingdom and glory. It will be the dispensation of the fulness of time when all shall be gathered together in one under Christ to enjoy the accomplished reconciliation of all things, even the things on earth and in heaven. They will then be reconciled in manifest glory to the fulness of the Godhead, resting as this does and ever will be seen to 3 (23-26): The manner of entrance.

[3]And the temple and the sanctuary had two [r]doors. And the doors had two leaves, two turning leaves; two for the one door, and two leaves for the other. And there were made upon them, on the doors of the temple, cherubim and palm trees, as there were made upon the walls; and r 1 Kings 6 31 35.

do, upon the work of the sacrifice whose abiding memorial will be seen in the great altar which stands at the very centre of this Millennial Sanctuary. It will be the day pictured for us in Ps. xcvi.-c., and also in the Hallelujah psalms cxlvi.—cl. Compare Isa. xxxii. 15-18; xxxiii. 5, 6, 20-22; xxxv. 1, 2; xli. 17-20; lv. 12, 13.

It is hardly possible to pass without notice that with all the detailed description of arrangement and measure here given, there is no mention made of many features prominent in the first temple and the tabernacle. At once we think of the candlestick, incense altar, veil, ark, censer, and all the many related vessels of service, with the wealth of spiritual instruction they afford. No mention is made of brazen sea nor laver, nor do we read of the lavish use of gold, as in the house built by Solomon. When we consider that Moses received the pattern of the tabernacle from God (Exod. xxv. 8, 9), and that the pattern of all the house and its furnishings David "had by the Spirit," by Jehovah's hand upon him "instructing as to all the work of the pattern" (1 Chron. xxviii., 11, 12, 19, New Trans.), the omission of so much in Ezekiel's vision cannot fail to impress us. Though we may be little able to explain it, this difference serves to bring out into greater prominence what we have considered the chief lesson of this vision, in view of Ezekiel's earlier prophecies and the several rebukes given in the final chapters.

[3] The prophet turns to look at the doors of the temple and sanctuary. The brief description is sufficient to show that they are similar to those of Solomon's temple (1 Kings vi. 31-35), but here seemingly it is not so much the doors themselves which are of importance as the relation in which we find them. The altar-table just described being on the central axis of the temple, the prophet now notices the doors of both parts of the house, in direct line with it. Across this line of approach to the presence of the Glory, soon to be seen entering the inner chamber, lies this altar-table with its combined lesson, if we have read it aright, of worship and communion. The only station for such holy service is in direct line with the opened Sanctuary. Through its unfolded doors the outshining light of the indwelling Glory would illuminate the altar-table, and shed forth its rays along the central line of its abode, passing through the doors at the porch to fall upon the great altar—"the hearth of God." As we think of what is associated with this manifestation of the Divine Presence in the kingdom and glory, how fitting to be reminded of the cherubim and palm trees, whose meaning we have already considered!

But why are there doors? May they not witness to God's absolute right to shut out from His presence, if occasion require? There are two doors to each opening, and evidently two turning, or folding, leaves to each door. Thus the numbers two and four appear, and they may speak of witness-bearing toward the creation, and such a witness as the carved cherubim and palm trees indicate. The truth there was a wooden portal in front of the porch without. And there were closed windows and palm trees on the one side, and on the other side, on the sides of the porch: thus were the side chambers of the house and the portals.

to which they witness orders, controls, as it were, the way of approach to the Divine Presence. And though the service and privilege of entering the house pertain only to the priestly family, the lessons of its parts and arrangements are not only for their instruction, but that the people themselves may know Jehovah as thus revealed (chap. xliv. 23).

But may we not also think of Christ in this connection? The figure of the door He applies to Himself, as we know. By Him there is entrance into full salvation. He, as having become Man, is the abiding witness of all that the cherubim and palm tree symbolize, and to all creation, to which He stands as Firstborn and the Image of the invisible God. Only by Him is there access to the altar-table and the indwelling Glory. He may give access, or be as a closed door shutting out forever. He may be the Saviour or the Judge, for to Him has been committed all in relation to salvation and judgment.

A brief reference to the porch calls attention to its portal (or threshold), its windows, and the decoration, which in this case, as in that of other surrounding chambers (chap. xl. 16), was simply the palm tree. The cherubim is rather associated with the house itself, and the interior in particular. There is an alternative rendering, not without good authority, for the latter part of ver. 25—"And there were wooden planks upon the front of the porch without." If this is accepted the close of ver. 26 should read, "and the planks," instead of, "and the portals." These planks would then also have palm trees carved upon them as upon the surrounding walls—work which would all be in low relief. Thus the approach to the outer doors of the house would be over these carved planks. The word here rendered "wooden planks" is the one used where death by hanging on a tree is mentioned (Gen. xl. 19; Deut. xxi. 22; Josh. x. 26; Esther ii. 23; v. 14). Moreover, it is by the tree cut down and fashioned to the proper form that this path of approach to the doors is made. Is it too much to draw from this a suggestion of the Cross? By it indeed, in any case, the way has been made, whether for us or Israel, by which access is possible. It introduces, as it were, to that path upon which falls the light from the opened Sanctuary. And where more than in the Cross is manifested the symbolic meaning of the palm tree, both to the glory of God and the blessing of the whole creation!

Before leaving this section let us revert for a moment to some of the dimensions of the house, in particular those of the three entrances which the plan shows to be as follows:

Porch entrance, ...	14 cubits	=7x2.
Temple entrance, ...	10 "	=5x2.
Entrance to the Holy of Holies,....	6 "	=3x2.

Two the number of testimony and fellowship, and distinctly of Christ Himself as the second Person of the holy Trinity, rules throughout in this threefold entrance to the place of the divine glory.

Section 2 (Chap. xlii.).

The arrangements provided to preserve the service of the Sanctuary in separation from defilement

1 (1-12): The chambers before the separate place.

1. And he brought me forth unto the [w]outer court, the way toward the north; and he brought me to the chambers that were over against the [x]separate place, and which were over against the building, toward the north, before the length of the one hundred cubits; the entry was on the north, and the breadth was fifty cubits over against the [y]twenty cubits that belonged to the inner court, and over against the [z]pavement that belonged to

[w] ch. 40. 17.
[x] vers. 10, 13; ch. 41. 12.
[y] ch. 41. 10.
[z] ch. 40. 17, 18.

As *three*fold it implies fulness, and this as found manifested in what 7, 5, and 3 teach us, and that is perfection, but this found in the grace which has effected the union of the Creator and the creature (4+1), and this in relation to the fulness of the Godhead itself (3). And let us remember that what leads up to this from the court in which the great altar of sacrifice stands is a flight of ten steps, signifying—shall we not say?—that every requirement of the divine righteousness both Godward and manward has been perfectly met, and this, as we know, in the Person and work of Him of whom that very altar perpetually speaks—CHRIST. I may remark too that if the plan of the house is examined* it will be found that the wall-posts of these entrances are in this same fundamental ratio, only in reverse order, that is 3, 5, 7. Again in the dimensions of the Porch, Holy Place, and Most Holy we see how two rules with ten as the number multiplied, as also in the open space of 20 cubits which surrounds this structure. One more feature which gives prominence to the house with its side chambers is the foundation upon which it rests, which is "a full reed of six cubits" above the level of the surrounding court including that of the altar, and projects five cubits from the outside walls of the building (see Appendix). Six, as the number which speaks of the divine limit to evil, and of mastery over it, and of the subjugation of all things to God, is the fitting measure for the foundation of His house of glory. Notice too that it says a full reed; there will be no coming short in what this measure of six cubits means. And it extends out five cubits all around the house, for all is realized in the blessedness of that grace which reigning through righteousness brings God and man together to share in and enjoy the triumph and the fruits of the old Serpent being smitten, his head crushed by the blessed and glorious Man whose heel he in malice and enmity had bruised at the Cross. How heaven and earth will sing His triumph! The redeemed creation will join as one to adore the Lamb.

Sec. 2.

1. Two cell buildings are now described. They are located on the north and south sides of the separate place, and are three stories high. Again the familiar factors, 3, 5, and 10, are prominent in the measurements.

* See Appendix.

the outer court; there was gallery against gallery in the third [story]. And before the chambers was a walk of ten cubits in breadth, and a way of one hundred cubits inward; and their entries were toward the north. And the upper chambers were shorter than the lower (for the galleries encroached upon them), and than the middlemost of the building. For they were in three [stories] and had not pillars as the pillars of the courts; therefore [the third story] was straitened more than the lowest and the middlemost from the ground. And the wall that was without, answering to the cells toward the outer court in front of the chambers, its length was fifty cubits: for the length of the chambers that were against the outer court was fifty cubits; and lo, before the [a]temple, it was one hundred cubits. And under these chambers was the entry from the east as one goeth unto them from the outer court.

[a] ch. 41. 1, etc.

In the breadth of the wall of the court toward the south, before the separate place, and before the building, were chambers; and a passage before them, like the appearance of the chambers that were toward the north, according to their length, according to their breadth, and all their goings out, and according to their fashions, and according to their doors. And according to the doors of the chambers that were toward the south there was a door at the head of the way, [even] the way directly before the wall toward the east as one entereth into them.

2 (13, 14) The purposes served by these chambers

2. And he said unto me, The north chambers and the south chambers, which are before the separate place, they are holy chambers, where the [b]priests that come near to Jehovah shall [c]eat the most holy things; there shall they lay the most holy things, and the [d]meal offering, and the [e]sin offering and the [f]trespass offering; for the place is holy. When the priests enter in, then shall they not go out from the holy place unto the outer court, but there they shall [g]lay their garments wherein they minister, for they are holy: and they shall put on other garments, and shall approach to that which is for the people.

2. The special purposes of these buildings are then stated. They are called holy; in them the priests eat the most holy things; to them is brought the priests' portion of the offerings; then after entering into the holy place the priests must only pass out by going through these buildings. In them they change their garments, laying aside the holy linen in which they minister in the inner court or the house before going into the outer court to the people (ver. 14; xliv. 17-19). This is to avoid hallowing the people with their garments. The details of the sacrifice and the ordinances as to priestly service will occupy us later. Here the point is that all must be kept in its proper separation from all contact with the common, thus insisting upon the essential holiness of all pertaining to the inner courts, temple buildings, and priestly place.

3 (15-20) The established separation of the whole sacred enclosure

3. And when he had made an end of measuring the inner house, he brought me forth by way of the gate whose front was toward the east, and measured it* round about. He measured the east side with a measuring reed, five hundred reeds with a measuring reed round about. He measured the north side, five hundred reeds with a measuring reed round about. He measured the south side, five hundred reeds with a measuring reed. He turned about to the west, and measured five hundred reeds with a measuring reed. He measured it on the four sides: it had a wall round about, five hundred long, and five hundred broad, to make a [h]separation between that which was holy and that which was common.

b ch. 40. 46.
c Lev. 6. 16, 26; 10. 13; 24. 9. ch. 44. 29. d Lev. 2. 3, 10; 6. 14-18; 7. 9; 10. 12, 13. Num. 18. 9, 10.
e Lev. 6. 17, 18. 25. 30; 7. 1, 7; 10. 17, 18.
f Lev. 6. 17, 18; 7. 1, 6.
g ch. 44. 19.

h ch. 22. 26; 44. 23; 48. 15.
i Lev. 10. 10; 20. 22-26. Ezra 9. 1-3. Ex. 33. 7-11. Num. 6. 2 Cor. 6. 14-18. 1 Cor. 3. 16, 17; 6. 19, 20.

* Not the gate itself, as the following dimensions show, but the enclosure, or with the LXX, "the plan of the house." This measurement appears to be along the wall referred to in chap. 40: 5.—(J. B.).

3. Finally, after all of the inner house has been measured, the prophet is brought out by way of the east gate and into a large space, four-square, of 500 reeds on each side, enclosed with a wall of which the dimensions are not given. This appears as the extreme outer line of separation "between that which is holy and that which was common." This would form a great square of 3,000 cubits, in the centre of which would be the Sanctuary square of 500 cubits.

This whole concept presents a rebuke to and correction of the laxity and loss of the just consciousness of the great difference between Jehovah and Israel. The prophet shows this was entirely absent from the life of the nation, so that rulers and people had violated the sanctity of the temple, even introducing idolatrous worship. They had grievously failed to maintain His holiness in separation from evil. By these courts and gates, and wide open spaces which surround them, Jehovah is signifying by concrete example the truth of His surpassing glory, absolute pre-eminence, and essential holiness.

Section 3 (Chap. xliii.).

The glory of Jehovah filling the house

1 (1-12): The place of the throne, glorious in majesty and holiness

1. [1]And he brought me to the gate, [i]the gate which looketh toward the east: and behold, the [j]glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east; and his [k]voice was like the voice of many waters; and [l]the earth was lighted with his glory. And the appearance of the vision that I saw was according to the vision that I had seen when I came [m]to destroy the city; and the visions were like the vision that I saw [n]by the river Chebar, and I fell upon my face. And the glory of Jehovah came into the house by the way of the gate whose front is toward the east. And [o]the spirit took me up, and brought me into the inner court; and behold, the glory of Jehovah [p]filled the house. And I heard one speaking unto me out of the house, and [q]a man stood by me.

1 (4-6): The glory itself

2 (7-11): The seat of government

[2]And he said unto me, Son of man, [this is] the place of my throne, and [r]the place of the

[i] ch. 10. 19; 40. 32, 44; 43. 1; 44. 1; 45. 19; 46. 1, 12.

[j] vers. 4, 5, ch. 1. 28; 3. 23; 8. 4; 9. 3; 10. 4, 18, 19; 11. 22, 23; 44. 4. Ex. 16. 7, 10; 24. 16, 17; 40. 34. Deut. 5. 24. 1 Kings 8. 11. 2 Chr. 5. 14; 7. 1-3. Ps. 138. 5. Isa. 6. 1-4. Zech. 2. 5. cf. Ps. 8. 1; 148. 13; 138. 5.

[k] Isa. 28. 5, 6; 33. 1-10; 40. 3-5, with Matt. 3. 3; 4. 1; 16. 28; 17. 8; 2 Pet. 1. 16-18. Hag. 2. 3-9. cf. 1 Sam. 4. 21. Ps. 106. 19, 20. Isa. 3. 8. Jer. 2. 11-13; 14. 20-22.

[l] ch. 1. 24; 25. 28; 10. 5; Ps. 29. 3-5, 7-11. Rev. 1 15; 10. 1-3; cf. Ex. 19. 19; Deut. 4. 12, 33, 36; 5. 22-26; Job 37. 2-5; 40. 9; Dan. 4. 31; 10. 6. [m] Rev. 18. 1; Ps. 80. 1; 72. 19; Num. 14. 21; cf. Isa. 2. 5; 60. 1, 3, 19, 20; Dan. 2, 35; Hab. 2. 14; Isa. 11. 9; Matt. 24. 27, 30 with Lk. 9 26. [n] ch. 1. 3; 3. 23; 10. 15, 20, 22. [o] ch. 3. 12, 14; 8. 3; 11. 1, 24. [p] ch. 44. 4; Ex. 40. 35; 1 Kings 8. 10, 11; Hag. 2. 6-9; Mal 3. 1-3. [q] ch. 40. 3; cf. ch. 1. 26; Dan. 7. 13; 2. 25; Gen. 18. 2, 13, 17. [r] cf. 1 Chr. 28. 2; Ps. 99. 5; 132 7; Isa. 60. 13; Lam. 2 1.

Sec. 3.

1. [1]The house and its holy precincts having been viewed in their entirety, the prophet is now called to see that which alone can give character to the whole—the entrance of the divine glory. He is brought to the east gate. In his earlier visions he had beheld the glory of God leave the defiled temple by way of the east gate, and take its stand upon the mountain which is on the east of the city—the Mount of Olives (chap. xi. 22-25). He who is the perfect and eternal embodiment of all that this vision of glory sets forth symbolically also left the house of His day desolate, and as He sat on the Mount of Olives, looking over the rejected city, He unfolded the course of future events until the day when He shall stand upon that same mount on the east, bringing the glorious dawn of that day which shall be ever bright with the light and healing of the Sun of Righteousness (Matt. xxiv.; Zech. xiv.).

Along the path of exit the glory now returns to fill the house. It is "the glory of the God of Israel...and the glory of Jehovah." Then all that those Names mean shall be found fully accomplished—Israel one nation, new born in fellowship with the Eternal, according to the new covenant, and in the power and blessing of the outpoured Spirit.

[2] Of old the cherubim were set and the flame of the flashing sword, east of Eden, to guard the way of the tree of life. Curse had come, soles of my feet, [z]where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel forever; and the house of Israel shall [a]no more defile my holy name, they, nor their kings, with their fornication, and with the carcases of their kings in their high places, in their setting their threshold by my threshold, and their post by my post, and there was [but] the wall between me and them; and they [b]defiled my holy name with their abominations which they committed; and I consumed them in mine anger. Now let them put away their fornication, and the carcases of their kings, far from me, and I will dwell in the midst [z] ver. 9. ch. 37. 26-28; cf. Ex. 15. 17. 1-8; 25. 8. 29. 45, 46; Lev 26.3-12 Deut. 12. 10, 11; 33. 12, 28, 29. 1 Kings 6. 13; 8. 12, 13, 27. Ps. 68. 16; 85. 9; 132. 13-18. Isa. 57. 15. Joel 3. 17. Zech. 2. 10, 11; 8. 3-8. cf. Ps. 90. 1. 1 Kings 8. 30, 39, 43, 49. 2 Chr. 6. 30. Ps. 113. 5.

[a] ch. 20. 39-44.

ch. 39. 7. [b] ch. 5. 11; 8. 3, 16; 23. 37-39; 44. 6-8; 2 Kings 23. 4-14; cf. Lev. 26. 30; 2 Kings 16. 10-18; 21. 3-7; Jer. 16. 18; 2 Chr. 36. 14.

none could claim right to life; from God alone could it come. Only in the place of His presence could it be found, but inexorable righteousness, inflexible holiness, and incontrovertible judgment stood guard. He who is "the Way, the Truth, and the Life"—the Tree of Life—bowed His blessed head to bear all and answer to all required by the divine glory, that the way might be opened to the poor sinner who draws near in the value of His precious blood. Now in the glory supported by the cherubim our attention is called to the figure of a Man. There indeed He ever was as foreknown before all ages, and so He is seen in the visions of God before the time of manifestation had come. This is one of the many foreshadows of the Incarnation, but now we know that He has actually appeared. Henceforth He, not apart from, but as identified with, all that the cherubim symbolize, stands at the very entrance of life, and He is ever found all along the way as He is its glorious and eternal end—"Christ our life."

Of old the cherubim stood at the closed Garden of delight, and looked out on a cursed earth and a fallen race, but in the day of Ezekiel's vision they shall bear the divine glory into its earthly resting-place (ver. 7), to look out upon an earth from every part of which the joyful song of deliverance shall be rising, every note blending and uniting in one universal Hallelujah.

No wonder the light of Jehovah's glory shone forth to announce the birth at Bethlehem, and that out of the midst of its brightness the angelic choir chanted its anthem of glory and pleasure over the Child born and the Son given upon whose shoulder the government shall be, and whose name is called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, Father of Eternity, Prince of Peace, the increase of whose government and peace shall never end, upholding all with judgment and with righteousness from henceforth even forever. Again that glory invests Him on the holy mount; as a cloud it receives Him ascending from Olivet; in it He shall come with all the holy angels to take His kingdom; and of the heavenly city, enlightened with the glory of God, He, the Lamb, is the Lamp.

God comes in this glory, with majesty and awe-inspiring utterance, and with light reaching to earth's remotest bounds. The prophet of them forever. Thou, son of man, show the house to the house of Israel, that they may be confounded at their iniquities; and let them measure the pattern. And if they be confounded at all that they have done, make known to them the form of the house, and its fashion, and its goings out, and its comings in, and all its forms, and all its statutes, yea, all the forms thereof, and all the laws thereof; and write it in their sight, that they may keep the whole form thereof, and all the statutes thereof, and do them.

assures us that he is seeing again the vision which appeared by the river Chebar (chap. 1; see notes), in the presence of which then and now he falls prostrate. Brought into the inner court, he sees that the Glory fills the house. Then he is personally addressed by some one speaking before the house, and he finds a man standing beside him. The Glory, majestic in appearance, mighty in speech, far reaching in its effect, has been seen to enter the Sanctuary, and now in the familiar accents of human speech Jehovah communicates His word. He speaks first of rest, and that forever in the midst of His redeemed earthly people. What He had said to Solomon after the dedication of the first house had been fulfilled in Israel's long history of shameful departure, scattering, and judgment, yet it was also true as then declared that His eyes and heart were perpetually upon that house, the place of the soles of His feet, and the returning Glory proves that He abides faithful.

Rest can only be realized where He sets up His throne. The curse comes to Satan, to angel, to man by defiance of its holy claim, by resisting the righteous rule of an ever-loving, wise, holy and glorious Creator. The blessing of every creature is found only in submission, and if this is not accomplished through grace it must be through power, the Shepherd's rod must become the rod of iron.

If the throne suggests the divine government as connected with the indwelling glory, the expression, "the place of the soles of My feet," introduces the thought of worship (Ps. xcix. 5; cxxxii. 7). In that day there will be no other throne-house in Israel. The Prince of whom we read later evidently does not occupy the same position as former kings. They had assumed absolute right to the throne, and had acted in shameful disregard of Jehovah's revealed will. Instead of acting as Jehovah's vicegerents, they had practically ignored His supremacy, neglected or rejected His Word, and made their own will paramount. In this evil course they were followed by the people and the priesthood. Idolatry came to prevail throughout the land, and even invaded the temple precincts, defiling the house itself. When the time of Ezekiel's vision has come, all such conditions will have passed forever. This change is declared to the prophet. Neither the people nor their kings will defile Jehovah's holy name any more. Because of their abominations (compare 2 Kings xvi. 14, 15; xxi. 4-7; xxiii. 11, 12; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 4-7) His anger had consumed them; but then Israel's time of suffering will be accomplished, her iniquity will be pardoned, having received double for all her sins (Isa. xl. 1, 2).

8 (12) The mount of holiness

2 (13-17) The place of sacrifice

[3] This is the law of the house: upon the top of the mountain, all its border round about is most holy. Behold, this is the law of the house.

2. And these are the measures of the altar in cubits: the cubit is a cubit and a handbreadth. The bottom was a cubit, and the breadth a cubit, and its border on the edge thereof round about, one span: and this was the base of the altar. And from the bottom upon the ground to the lower ledge was two cubits, and the breadth one cubit; and from the small ledge to the great ledge, four cubits, and the breadth one cubit. And the upper altar was four cubits; and from the hearth of God and upward were four horns, and the hearth of God was twelve [cubits] long, by twelve broad, square in the four sides thereof. And the ledge was fourteen [cubits] long by fourteen broad in the four sides thereof, and the border about it half a cubit; and the bottom thereof a cubit round about: and its steps looked toward the east.

Israel as a nation new born, upon whom the Spirit has been poured out, will dwell safely under the shadow of the Almighty. With the majesty of the glory will be the beauty of holiness. So the purgation of ver. 9 is essential to Jehovah's dwelling in the midst of them.

[3] This lesson may be learned from the vision of the house (vers. 10, 11). It is sealed by the law of the house which decrees the whole limit of the top of the mountain to be most holy (ver. 12).

2. We pass from the vision of the entering glory of Jehovah to consider the detailed measure of the altar, which stood at the centre of the whole enclosure, and directly before the house. God looks out, as it were, from the place of His rest upon that which presents the basis of all blessing and glory—the place of sacrifice. It stands as a memorial bearing witness to Christ. He is the true Burnt Offering, whose sacrifice of perpetual efficacy is being recalled by every offering presented upon this altar.

Not all is perfectly clear as to its construction. It appears to be two cubits higher than that of the first temple, and eight cubits less in length and breadth. Ezekiel's altar is 12x12 cubits.* Its principal dimensions are 18, 16, 14, and 12 cubits. The one common divisor of these numbers is two, which, as often remarked, speaks of competent witness, fellowship, and particularly of Christ. Dividing the measurements we obtain the numbers 9, 8, 7, and 6. Thus we have the complex idea of fullest manifestation (9=3x3) in the power of the Spirit and the glory of resurrection (3); and this in new covenant, new creation relations (8) into which all creation (4) will then be brought, according to perfection and rest (7), crowned of necessity with mastery over evil (6). This last is the

* See Outline Elevation of Altar. Appendix.

3 (18-27) The place of worship

3. And he said unto me, Son of man, thus saith the Lord Jehovah: These are the ordinances of the altar in the day when they shall make it, to offer burnt offerings thereon, and to [r]sprinkle blood thereon. Thou shalt give to the priests, the Levites, that are of the seed of Zadok, who come near unto me, to minister unto me, saith the Lord Jehovah, a [s]young bullock for a sin offering. And thou shalt take of its blood, and put upon the four horns thereof, and on the four corners of the ledge, and upon the border round about: so shalt thou cleanse it and make atonement for it. And topmost part of the structure, and it is foursquare, 12 cubits each side (4x3)—the number of divine government exercised throughout creation according to the fulness of the Godhead dwelling in Christ, to which fulness all things in heaven and on earth are reconciled in the power of the blood of the cross by which peace has been made. Such seems to be the lesson of the altar, if we are permitted to interpret it in the number-symbolism of Scripture.

[r] Lev. 1. 5.

[s] Ex. 29. 10, 14. Lev. 8. 14, 15. ch. 45. 18-20.

Since God has abounded toward us in all wisdom and intelligence, having made known to us the mystery of His will, we may now rejoice in the knowledge of these precious and holy themes. They give comfort and confidence as we pass on in touch with a groaning creation which we know will be brought into the reality and blessing of Christ's glory. God has given to us knowledge of His counsel, so that while it is still night for the world we may walk in the light of day. This is to have its practical effect upon us, for we are not of the night but of the day. It should lead us to walk through the world as not of it, not influenced by the spirit of this age, but as sober and watchful, wearing the breastplate of faith and love, and for an helmet the hope of salvation—that salvation for which we wait and which will be realized at the coming of the Lord. Not only so, but when the redeemed creation will be enjoying the accomplishment of all that we now know to be God's purpose and which gives cause for present rejoicing in the Lord, we shall be with Him, sharing as the Body with the Head in all the various features of that glorious kingdom, not in an earthly but heavenly relation. And though we shall then be in the glory and around the throne forever, we will never fail to look at and consider the place of sacrifice, viewing it then from the inner Sanctuary. The Lamb shall be seen in the midst of the throne.

3. The ordinances of the altar are now given. They relate to its establishment as a place of worship where the priests shall offer the burnt-offerings and peace-offerings of the people. In this there is an abiding witness to their acceptance by Jehovah (ver. 27).

As already pointed out, this altar stands at the very centre of the sacred enclosure. The worshippers in the outer court, and "the Prince" who came in among them or sat in the east gate, would have attention and interest focused upon this great altar, and, as we may say, the glory of God in the house would look toward it. It would ever stand before the eyes of all as of fundamental importance thou shalt take the bullock of the sin offering, and it shall be burnt in the appointed place of the house, [x]outside the sanctuary. And on the second day thou shalt offer a he-goat without blemish for a sin offering; and thou shalt cleanse the altar, as they cleansed it with the bullock. When thou hast made an end of cleansing it, thou shalt offer a young bullock without blemish, and a ram out of the flock without blemish; and thou shalt bring them near before Jehovah; and the priests shall cast [y]salt upon them, and they shall offer them up for a burnt offering unto Jehovah.

x Ex. 29. 14. Lev. 4. 11, 12, 21; 9. 11; 16. 27. Heb. 13. 11, 12.

y Lev. 2. 13. cf. Nu. 18. 19. Mark 9. 49, 50.

to the blessing and welfare of the people, affording visible expression of their acceptance and the ground upon which the glory could abide among them.

These ordinances are given in view of the day when they shall make the altar, a word of comfort and assurance to the remnant in the land of their captivity that the time would come when the nation would again be restored and the divine centre for worship be set up. With this prophecy before them it is not surprising to see that those who return from Babylon to the land of their fathers first built the altar.

The altar has a twofold purpose — to offer burnt-offering and sprinkle blood. The burnt-offering signifies full acceptance, the sprinkled blood, accomplished expiation. That offering all goes up to God as an odor of sweet smell, and the shed blood tells of judgment borne, vindicating the righteousness of God and answering to the holiness of His nature. The perfect service and obedience symbolized in the offering satisfies His heart, and the blood suffices to meet all the requirements of His throne. The altar too sanctifies the gift, and thus all combines to set before us the preciousness and perfection of the Person and work of Christ.

Then the priests of Zadok's seed are to minister at the altar. Zadok fills a prominent place in the history of Israel, being high priest in David's and Solomon's reigns. He remained faithful to David during Absalom's rebellion, and with Nathan the prophet espoused the cause of Solomon when Adonijah sought to secure the throne. David being of one mind with them instructed Zadok to anoint Bathsheba's son (1 Kings i. 8, 26, 32-45). Zadok thus stands as representative of the priesthood in association with the king of God's choice, and with the kingdom as established by Him in David's seed—type of Christ. Zadok descended from Eleazar (1 Chron. vi. 50-53), Aaron's third son, who succeeded to the high priesthood upon his father's death. We have already seen that this is a lesson of resurrection (see notes, Num. xxi.). Eleazar being a type of the resurrection priesthood of Christ, his association was with the new generation who were to enter the land, suggesting Israel as new born, to whom under new covenant relation will be given possession of the land and the fulfilment of the promise. Fittingly, then, the seed of Zadok fill the priestly place in the glorious Millennial day.

[z] Seven days shalt thou offer daily a goat for a sin offering; they shall also offer a young bullock, and a ram out of the flock, without blemish. Seven days shall they make atonement for the altar and purify it, and consecrate it. And when these days are ended, it shall be that upon the [a] eighth day and onwards, the priests shall make your burnt offerings upon the altar and your peace offerings; and I will accept you, saith the Lord Jehovah.

[z] Ex. 29. 35-37.

[a] Lev. 9. 1.

There are seven days of consecration, on the eighth and thereafter the regular services may be performed. In the seven we have the perfect basis laid for abiding worship which is of new creation character and in the grace of the new covenant.

If the divine glory has found its resting-place in this shrine of holiness, the plan and order of which is expressive of the divine character, then for the people to be able to draw near in their place and enjoy the blessings of acceptance and fellowship with that glory, the altar and its service are essential. Only on the ground of sacrifice which presents the truth of atonement and purification can man make his approach to the dwelling-place of God. Thus the altar stands related to the people themselves and their place with God. It stands as identified with what they are, and they being sinful, makes atonement for it necessary to purify and consecrate it. In what is accomplished for it, the people see, as in an object lesson, what is accomplished for them.

It is not hard to see in this a picture of precious truth regarding Christ and His people. He in His grace identified Himself with them, and so what they were in themselves made it necessary for Him to be the sacrifice, bearing as in their place the very judgment they deserved. Thus He accomplished atonement that they might know identification with Him in the acceptance of the sacrifice He made. Of that one offering by which all who are sanctified are perfected—we now, Israel in the future, and all who believe—these sacrifices are the significant type, as in the future day they will be an ever-witnessing memorial. If our blessed Lord took our sins upon Himself, He also endured the smiting by which atonement was made, so that coming from under the curse which He took for our sakes He can stand before God's glory, and appear in His presence on our behalf, even—may we say?—as the great altar stands before the house in which the glory dwells. Now in the place He fills we read our own acceptance and privilege in fellowship with the glory itself, together with the glory of redemption and the blessing of salvation.

Sin and burnt offerings are made for seven days. These present two aspects of atonement by which reconciliation is effectual and access procured. Sin is fully dealt with in judgment, and that as carried out in the burning in the outside place—the place where Jesus suffered that He might sanctify the people with His own blood. This was accomplished according to the will of God to which He rendered perfect obedience, offering Himself without spot in the power of the eternal Spirit. So we find what is toward man in his dire need as a sinner, but for the eternal satisfaction of God in respect to all that he deserved as being such a creature; and then

Section 4 (Chap. xliv.).

Regulations concerning those who minister in the Sanctuary

1 (1-3) The supremacy of Jehovah

1. And he brought me back toward the [b]outer gate of the sanctuary which looketh toward the east; and it was shut. And Jehovah said unto me, This gate shall be shut; it shall not be opened, and none shall enter in by it: for Jehovah, the

[b] ch. 43. 1.

what is toward God to His eternal glory, the one accomplished righteousness of the Man Christ Jesus, obedient even unto death, but for our eternal blessing as accepted in the abiding perfection of such fragrance as God alone can fully appreciate. Thus are we redeemed from destruction and crowned with loving-kindness.

There is the young bullock in all the energy and power of fresh, new life, neither aged nor blemished—type of the Perfect Servant who came only to do God's will. The he-goat speaks of the sinner's Substitute; the ram is the symbol of devotedness even unto death. The salt, the preservative power of holiness and the sign of the covenant, is that which secures beyond possibility of failure. And then the sprinkled blood of the salted sacrifice, the precious blood, effects expiation and the forgiveness of sins according to the holiness of God and the perfection of the offering.

Let us not leave this section without linking its three parts together—the glory, the sacrifice, and the worship of the redeemed people. As being a third section it suggests manifestation, the fulness revealed, and that is given in a threefold way, as just remarked. Is not the order here that which characterizes Christian blessing also? First, Christ in whom the glory all centres, in whom the fulness dwells, must be in His rightful place, that of being at the right hand of the Majesty on high in the heavenly Sanctuary, the true holy of holies. There He entered, saluted of God as priest forever after the order of Melchisedec. Then the measure of the altar could be given, the truth of the wonderful work in all its varied parts be told out, be given manifestation in the testimony rendered in its due time. This brings out the meaning of the new place, its worship, the acceptance known and enjoyed in the light of the fulness now revealed. The place of Christ in glory, the testimony to His blessed Person and work in redemption, and the place of His people as identified with Him, constitute the threefold cord of revealed truth which none can break.

Sec. 4.

1. Now that all as to the Sanctuary and altar has been set in order we are given the regulations concerning the ministers of the Sanctuary. It is not surprising that in this connection we are again reminded of the divine glory, and also to find that there is an abiding witness to its entrance into the House and to the essential pre-eminence of Jehovah, in that none, not even the Prince, is to enter by the east gate through which Ezekiel saw the Glory enter.

In the past kings, priests, and people had fallen into the evil of treating Jehovah as though He was altogether like one of them-

God of Israel, [c]hath entered in by it, therefore it shall be shut. As for the prince, he shall sit therein as prince to eat bread before Jehovah; [d]he shall enter by the way of the porch of the gate, and shall go out by the way of the same.

[c] ch. 43. 4.

[d] ch. 46. 2, 8.

selves. In their rebellion and idolatry He had become but one God among many, even though they might give Him first place in their Pantheon. In the theocracy of the future there shall be one Jehovah and His name one. His absolute supremacy will be acknowledged by all, and the evil of idolatry will be banished from the earth. So the majesty and distinctive glory of Jehovah is emphasized by the shutting of the East Gate by which He entered His House; no one may enter or go out by that gate.

Here a dignitary is introduced who has not been mentioned before —the Prince. He is privileged, as no other person, to occupy the porch of the east gate, sitting there to eat bread before Jehovah. But he does not pass through the gate, he enters by the porch and goes out by the same way. Thus the special sanctity of this gate would be impressed upon all, and particularly upon the Prince himself, reminding him of his subordinate place; the closed gate and the limited privilege of this person who appears to be the highest secular dignitary in the nation, teaching all of the supreme place of Jehovah. We may notice that the porch is at the end of the gate-building toward the west, facing the altar and the House.

This important personage, the Prince, is apparently one of the nation, not Christ Himself: his sons are spoken of (xlvi.16) and he offers a sin-offering for himself (xlv. 22). It seems clear that he occupies a representative position, yet neither the same as that of the high priest, of whom Ezekiel does not speak, nor that of the king as formerly known in Israel. He is not accorded the privileges nor the power of either. He seems to occupy an intermediary place between the people and the priesthood, since he is found among the former in their seasons of worship (xlvi. 10), not among the priests, nor privileged to enter the inner court, yet drawing nearer than the people themselves, since he may worship in the inner east gate which opens upon the inner court, while the people worship in the outer court as gathered at the door of this gate (xlvi. 2). But he is responsible to supply the various offerings at the feasts, the new moons, the sabbaths, in all the solemnities of the house of Israel, and he is therefore the recipient and holder of what the people offer for these occasions; and thus too the priesthood would look to him for the provision needed to carry on the national worship (xlv. 13-22). Then he is given his own special portion in the land, and he is enjoined not to take any of the people's inheritance (xlv. 7, 8; xlvi. 18; xlviii. 21, 22). The Oblation and the Sanctuary are spoken of as in the midst of the Prince's portion.

These considerations show that the Prince occupies quite a unique place in the history of Israel. It serves to emphasize the absolute character of the theocracy as to both kingly and high priestly rule. They are vested in the Messiah Himself, not in any mere man. Priests and kings of the past may have been types, but now the Antitype has come—the substance has replaced the shadow. This

2 (44) The judgment and holiness which become His house.

2. And he brought me the way of the north gate before the house, and I beheld, and lo, the glory of Jehovah filled the house of Jehovah; and I fell upon my face. And Jehovah said unto me, world to come of which this vision treats will not be in subjection to angels, but to Him to whom all things have been made subject according to God's purpose, even Jesus (Heb. ii. 5-10). Angelic hosts will then attend the Son of Man (Matt. xiii. 41; xxiv. 31; xxv. 31; John i. 51; 2 Thess. i. 7).

Returning to our chapter, we see then in the closure of the east gate a standing object-lesson teaching the sanctity and preeminence of Jehovah, showing that none, not even Prince or priests, are to be thought of as approaching in any measure an equality with God such as free access at the same gate might be construed to imply. Still in the privilege of the Prince to partake of a sacrificial feast in the porch of this gate we get an intimation of the connection of the saved nation and the glory of God which has hallowed this gate in a special manner, for in his place he is doubtless representative of the nation. His communion, and so that of the nation as seen in him, is with God whose glory entered by that gate and now dwells in His House in their midst—a holy, happy, salutary lesson.

We see too that all the worship would be conducted with faces westward. This furnishes an instructive contrast to what the prophet had seen in the entry of the temple as recorded in chapter viii.—twenty-five men with their backs to the temple and their faces toward the east, worshipping the sun. In their evil course they had reversed God's order. In how many things it is found that man's thought is the very opposite of God's, the sad consequence of departure and alienation through sin. How evident it is also that Satan's constant aim is to induce the creature to turn its back upon God and have an idol of his own which is always another creature, for fallen man will have his god to be like himself, and groping in the moral darkness into which he has fallen he deifies his own lusts and passions and makes their gratification the chief feature of his worship. Every step of God's advancing revelation through the ages has been to undo this lie which has wrapped itself around the heart and mind of man, blinding him to the light which he learns to hate because his deeds are evil, while for the same reason he loves the darkness. That revelation reached its meridian splendor in the coming of the Son, and now it is known beyond all possible question that in God is no darkness at all, that indeed He is light and love, not darkness and hate. He is One whose thoughts are as high above man's as the heavens are above the earth. This lesson to learn which brings the creature into its right place and therefore its real blessing, seems clearly suggested to us in what Ezekiel sets forth.

2. The prophet is now brought before the House by way of the north gate. This was the gate of sacrifice, as we have seen. Is not this significant? For only by the way of sacrifice can we be brought before the glory of God. This he beholds filling the House, and bows low in worship. Then Jehovah reveals to him the ordinances which follow, after which he is taken to view other parts of the Son of man, set thy heart [to this], and behold with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears, all that I say unto thee, concerning all the statutes of the house of Jehovah, and all the laws thereof; and mark well the entering in of the house with every going forth of the sanctuary. And thou shalt say to the rebellious, even to the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: let it suffice you of all your abominations, O house of Israel, in that ye sacred enclosure. How suggestive the order — sacrifice, worship, revelation.

[a] Ch. 2. 5; 12. 2; Deut. 31. 27; Isa. 30. 1, 9.

It is instructive to note that the communication of these ordinances of service and worship, including the allotment of the heave-offering, the feasts and special solemnities, with instruction as to the ways of righteousness which become those who draw near to God, should be given in the light of the glory and in close relation to where the work of sacrifice is performed. Three important truths are thus brought together—the glory of God who is the Holy One, the work of redemption as set forth in the sacrifices, and the holy ways which are to characterize God's people. Peter, setting before us God's holy character and government, enjoins us to walk in holiness and fear, forasmuch as we are redeemed by the precious blood of Christ (1 Pet. i. 14-19). Redeeming love in Christ has given perfect answer to the light which God is, in which all that we are and have done is searched out and manifested, and which according to holiness God must judge. Thus we who believe are made fit for the portion of the saints in light, and as thus accepted by God we are privileged to enter the holiest of all by the blood of Jesus. This being so, we are under the responsibility to behave ourselves according to the holy requirement of God our Father. Here His government over us comes in, and only the more so since He has abounded toward us in such riches of grace.

God claims the attention of the whole man (ver. 5)—heart, eyes, ears; and note, it is the inner man first. The heart stands for the inner springs of man's being and life. As from this organ of our physical frame the blood goes forth to energize the whole of the body's wonderful structure, returning to it to be again prepared for continued work in the circulatory system, so in the spiritual realm we have, as we may say, man's spirit and soul, the seat of his intellectual and emotional faculties which are manifested in his course of life. These are claimed by God, and as being under His control (other control can only result in spiritual death) there goes forth into the spiritual sphere, into all its paths of movement, of circulation, of feeling and emotion, that vital energy which makes us fit vessels for divine service. Then our vision (the eyes) will be full of that light which shines from the innermost Sanctuary enlightening the inner man; and one Voice will be heard, whose accents falling upon the multitudinous strings of our spiritual ears, send those vibrations of divine speech and harmony through our being which bring the desired response to the Master.

have brought in [f]aliens, uncircumcised in heart and uncircumcised in flesh, to be in my sanctuary, to profane it, even my house, when ye offered [g]my bread, [h]the fat and the blood; and they have broken my covenant, besides all your abominations. And ye have not kept the charge of my holy things, but have set keepers at my charge in my sanctuary for yourselves.

f Num. 3. 38; 18. 4, 7 cf. Num. 40.
2 Chr. 26. Lev. 10. 1- Eph. 5. 18 with Phil. 3. 3.
g Lev. 21. 17, 21; 22. 3. 11, 16.
h Lev. 7. 27; 3. 16,

The prophet is told to mark well, literally, "set thine heart to," what Jehovah is making known. This is called for in view of the service he is to perform, that of communicating God's mind to the people. It is well for us to remember that such occupation with what God may give is ever essential for the carrying out of any commission He may call upon us to fulfil. Purpose of heart is the necessary qualification for any servant of the Lord. One may possess much learning and great natural ability, be attractive in person and eloquent in speech, and yet useless, because the heart is not right, its purpose not formed in the secret place with God. If the inner man is under the power of divine things it is certain that the members of the outward man will be yielded in happy service to the holy and perfect will of God. God looks upon the heart, not upon the outward appearance, which may easily deceive.

The prophet is called to give whole-hearted attention to Jehovah's Word. Apart from this he could not rightly perform his mission. Nor can we know how to rightly number our days and apply our hearts to wisdom apart from such attention to the Word of God. It alone provides a thorough furnishing of the man of God for every good work. Let us feed upon it, walk by it, preach it, serving others out of its treasuries, into which we daily enter with believing and worshiping hearts. Our hearts should stand in awe of that Word, while having joy in it as those who find great spoil (Ps. cxix. 161, 162).

Jehovah first reproves the house of Israel for their evil ways. They had forgotten His holy claims and defiled His house with their abominations. In view of this He established the ordinances which follow. By them they will be kept ever mindful of the past and of His own holiness, to safeguard which from all unlawful intrusion insures to them the fullest blessing and His own proper glory.

In earlier chapters of this book the prophet has told of Israel's abominations (e.g., chaps. viii., xi.), and many times have they been referred to as rebellious. Here they are so spoken of for the last time. This then is a word for the people of Ezekiel's day, for when this new temple is built they will be no longer of such a character. This shows that God intended the new order of things to be established in the future, which the prophet was making known, to have a present effect upon the ways of the people. As they learned what God purposed for the day of glory, they were to already separate themselves from past evils, which had come in through gross carelessness as to His honor and holiness. This, it may be said, is consistently God's purpose in revealing the future. Those to whom it is revealed are responsible to walk in its light. God's purpose as to

Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: No alien, uncircumcised in heart and uncircumcised in flesh, shall enter into my sanctuary, of any alien that is among the children of Israel. But the Levites who went far away from me, when Israel went astray, that 'went astray from me after their idols, they shall bear their iniquity. Yet they shall be ministers in my sanctuary, having oversight of the gates of the house, and doing service in the future judgment or glory is His call to us to conduct ourselves now in a manner accordant with the revelation granted, and so to be witness to those around us of what we know is sure to come. This is the path of faith, for faith believing God's testimony enters into fellowship with Him as to His purposes, and then judges of the present in the light of that secret which faith possesses, and which becomes its strength and comfort while waiting in the present. Thus we know that the day of the Lord is coming upon the ungodly world. It is not only a day of judgment but also the time of established righteousness and peace which Christ will bring in, and in which we shall have our part and place with Him. We are of the day, and not of this world's present night. Hence we are to walk now as those who are of the day, putting on the breastplate of faith and love, and as a helmet the hope of salvation—salvation out of the world which goes on to wrath (1 Thess. v.). Whatever God has revealed in His prophetic Word is by no means for the gratification of curious minds, but so that he who believes it may walk with God in the present. By doing this we find practical deliverance from this present evil age, not being conformed to it, but transformed by the renewing of our minds in daily fellowship with God through His word of truth. So now Jehovah makes known by Ezekiel the order of things to obtain in the new Sanctuary and its service, that the people may learn therefrom and let the past suffice to have wrought abomination and rebellion.

1 chs. 22. 26; 48. 11. 2 Kl. 23. 8,9. 2 Chron. 24. 3 ff. Jer. 2. 8, 26-28.

Although these visions belong to a time still future, we see by the ministry of reproof and correction given in this chapter and the previous one (xliii. 7-11; xliv. 6-13), relating to the people and their rulers, both civil and religious, that God always has a present object in view in the revelations He gives. He brings the past into contrast with the future, that in the present practical sanctification may be realized in ceasing to do evil and learning to do well. Isaiah first describes the glory of the Millennial state, and then admonishes the people, saying, "House of Jacob, come ye, and let us walk in the light of Jehovah" (Isa. ii. 1-5).

In the first place provision is made to guard the Sanctuary from such profanation as had entered its precincts in the time of the kingdom. The evils that Jehovah rebukes had come in through unholy alliances with idolatrous neighbors, and by having hired foreigners to keep the charge of the gates. Such a state of things was aided by the close proximity to the temple of the king's palace, so that the corruption of the royal house first seeped into the sacred enclosure of the first temple and then flooded it with wickedness, as house: they shall slay the burnt offerings and the sacrifices for the people, and they shall stand before them to minister unto them. Because they ministered unto them [j]before their idols, and were a [k]stumbling block of iniquity unto the house of Israel, therefore have I lifted up my hand against them, saith the Lord Jehovah, and they shall bear their iniquity. And they shall not come near unto me, to execute the office of priest unto me, in the days of Ahab and Manasseh. Balaam was made to give God's thought concerning His people: "Lo, it is a people that shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations;" and he it was who later did his best to accomplish their mixture with the wicked nation of Moab. He could not curse, but becoming acquainted with God's purpose, and being an enemy, he sought their overthrow by subtlety (Num. xxxi. 16). He snares them into evil associations, and God must deal in judgment. From this we learn what is meant by the doctrine of Balaam, and it shows one of the great wiles of the devil against which we must be on our guard. His constant effort is to effect mixture where God's express mind is separation and purity. The admixture of Israel with the nations in her later history wrought her ruin, and brought the judgment of the Captivities and desolation. The admixture of the world and the Church, a greater evil, has wrought a correspondingly worse ruin. Scripture has especially warned us of this evil (2 Cor. vi. 11-18), so disastrous, whether in the individual or corporate sphere.

[j] 2 Ki. 16. 10-16.
[k] ch. 14. 1-5.

In this connection we may well consider Rev. ii. 14. It is one of those many instances in Scripture in which the things written aforetime for our admonition are taken up and made of present application. The doctrine of Balaam consisted, as we have seen, in the counsel he gave, directing the women of Moab and Midian to seduce the people of Israel into association with them in their idolatrous festivities, with which there was a practice of gross moral evil. Israel was caught in the snare of those friendly advances, which had behind them the enemy's purpose to destroy the character of God's people as called to "dwell alone," in separation to God, whose holy ways and worship had been revealed to them. Doubtless, the seduction was intended to deprive Israel of her distinctive position and favor with God, which Balaam had been forced to proclaim. God's thought was that His people should be separate from all the abounding evil of the nations. Balaam's doctrine was that a mixture should be effected between them. Fleshly lusts and false religious activities were the instruments used.

This history has been repeated in the relations established between the Church and the world. In the apostolic period idolatry touched every sphere of life. As a result, the early Christians of necessity withdrew largely from all the social and festive activities in which moral evil abounded, and in which they had formerly taken part (1 Pet. iv. 1-4). This brought against them much persecution and evil-speaking. In those days, to partake of the idol sacrifices came to signify the recantation of Christianity.

nor to come near to any of my holy things, [even] to the things that are most holy; but they shall bear their shame, and their abominations which they have committed. Yet will I make them keepers of the charge of the house, for all the service thereof, and for all that shall be done therein.

3 (15-31) The priests: the features of their place and portion as sanctified unto Jehovah

3. But the priests, the Levites, the sons of Zadok, that kept the charge of my sanctuary when the children of Israel went astray from me, they shall come near to me to minister unto me, and they shall stand before me to offer unto me the fat and the blood, saith the Lord Jehovah. They

Cf. 1 Sam. 2. 35 with 2 Sam. 15. 24, and 1 Ki. 2. 27, 35.

But things changed; the world became friendly and sought association with the Church, who, like Israel, was snared into evil practices. The doctrine of mixture prevailed. This destroyed the true character and testimony of the Church in the world. Expansion by compromise with the idolatrous world became the policy of its leaders. Features and practices of heathendom were incorporated into its life, both publicly and privately. But to-day we do not think of this, because idolatry has passed away. Nevertheless it has its lesson for us. This same principle of mixture assailed the returned remnant in the days of Ezra and Nehemiah, and wrought and caused them much sorrow. It is one of our great dangers, if not the greatest. The idol-feasts, with their open immorality, are not around us to-day; but there are still idols to keep from, and fleshly lusts from which to turn away. With the light and knowledge we have, whatever displaces God, or represents Him as different from what He is known to be as revealed in Christ, or that changes His truth, cannot be followed without some form of moral failure resulting. Truth refused, perverted, or neglected, is accompanied in some degree with moral laxity and spiritual decrepitude.

3. Returning to our chapter we find that the Levites, except the family of Zadok (ver. 15), are appointed to keep guard and do the service of the house, but are excluded from the priestly office. In the government of God they are shut out from this higher place because of their previous history. They had followed the people into idolatry, and were a stumbling-block of iniquity instead of resisting the incoming evil and instructing the people in the laws of the covenant under which they stood in relation to Jehovah. God requires that which is past; and in His ways of holy government such departure from His revealed and known will must be remembered in judgment, though those subject to it are personally safe. The day of loss and reward is certain, and this God's grace does not set aside. The future will bring out results which flow from the past, for as we sow we reap. If our work is good we shall receive reward, if bad we shall suffer loss, though we ourselves are saved. This solemn lesson is seen in the case of the Levites. The past and its lessons would thus be kept before them as they fulfilled their service, and be a constant reminder to all the people of the nation's shall enter into my sanctuary, and they shall approach unto my table to minister unto me, and they shall keep my charge. And it shall be that when they enter in at the gates of the inner court, they shall be clothed with [m]linen garments; and no [n]wool shall come upon them, while they minister in the gates of the inner court, and towards the house.

m Ex. 28. 39, 40. 42. 43.
n cf. Deut. 22. 11.

past sin, in which the Levites had joined, ministering to them before their idols.

The same principle of righteous government finds illustration in the priests of Zadok's line. They had remained faithful when Israel departed from Jehovah, and now in the day of Messiah's kingdom they fill the nearest place. Past faithfulness meets its reward. Having previously spoken of Zadok's place in the nation's history, we may without further remark consider the details now given regarding the priestly office.

The difference between the Levites and the priests is that the former stand before the people and minister to them, while the priests minister to Jehovah, stand before Him, and enter the Sanctuary. The holy privilege of going into God's presence and of fellowship with Him at His table is characteristic of the priestly place.

There are twelve features in the regulations of this section, falling into four groups of three each. All have to do with the service and walk, in which there is to be a manifestation of truth and holiness in keeping with their Sanctuary privileges.

1. Regulations regarding their place and service in the Sanctuary.
   - i. Their sacred charge (ver. 15a).
   - ii. Their holy service in this charge (vers. 15b, 16).
   - iii. Their holy garments (vers. 17-19).
2. Regulations regarding their habits and relationships.
   - i. Their hair—moderation, no extremes (ver. 20).
   - ii. Their abstinence—sobriety (ver. 21).
   - iii. Their marriage—purity (ver. 22).
3. Regulations regarding their service toward the people.
   - i. Their work of teaching (ver. 23).
   - ii. Their work of judgment (ver. 24a).
   - iii. Their responsibility to observe and care for the order of divine worship (ver. 24b).
4. Regulations regarding their separation from defilement.
   - i. As to the dead (vers. 25-27).
   - ii. As to inheritance (ver. 28).
   - iii. As to their food (vers. 29-31).

The Sanctuary, then, is in their charge. This brings to them an access that others do not share, and with it a ministry peculiarly their own. The fat and the blood are specially mentioned, and then the table, for communion can only follow that of which the former elements speak.

The fat and the blood were especially reserved from all the offerings as being God's own portion. Compare Lev. vii. 22-27. The fat is spoken of as the food of the offering, and as burnt for a sweet

They shall have linen tires upon their heads, and linen breeches upon their loins; they shall not gird themselves with [anything that causeth] sweat. And when they go forth unto the outer court, even unto the outer court to the people, they shall put off their garments wherein they ministered, and lay them in the holy chambers; and they shall put on other garments, that they may [o]not sanctify the people with their garments.

[o] Ex. 29. 37; 30. 29.

savor (Lev. iii. 16). It stands for that which is entirely consecrated to God in all that pertains to both the will and the energy of life, which is all given up to Him, even as the fat is all consumed on the altar. In this connection it is of interest to note, as another has done, that the word for ashes used in reference to the sacrifices "literally means 'fat.' This has been thought to be because of the burning of the fat upon the altar, which would thus saturate the ashes. Be that as it may, the word is significant and suggestive. Ashes are the witness that the fire has done its work, the witness of an accomplished and accepted sacrifice. So we read in the margin of Ps. 20: 3, 'The Lord turn to ashes thy burnt sacrifice,' translated 'accept,' in explanation of the text. This witness of an accepted sacrifice is not a sign of sorrow, for which the word [generally translated 'ashes'] is used, [as also for] showing the emptiness and vanity of things (Esther 4: 1, 3; Job 2: 8; 42: 6; Isa. 61: 3, etc.; 44: 20). There is nothing worthless in connection with the sacrifice of our Lord Jesus Christ.

"The ashes of the sacrifice were first put on the east side of the altar, toward the sun-rising; they were then removed to a clean place outside the camp (Lev. 4:12; 6:10,11). Our blessed Lord's body, after He had yielded up His life to God on the cross, was kept absolutely inviolate. The piercing of the spear was in fulfilment of Scripture, and furnished the evidence that He had actually died. But 'a bone of Him shall not be broken' (John 19: 33-37). So that precious body ('A body hast Thou prepared Me,' Heb. 10: 5) was not suffered to be treated as that of a criminal, but was judicially handed over to those who loved Him, wrapped in fragrant and costly perfume, and laid in a new grave hewn out of the rock (John 19: 38-42; Luke 23: 52, 53). Does this not show in reality what was suggested in the 'fat ashes?'...The same unyielding judgment that had dealt with Him on the cross now demanded the fullest honor to Him, in judicial testimony to the acceptance of His sacrifice. The east side of the altar, the side of the sunrise, where the ashes were placed, is not only the witness of accepted sacrifice, but the pledge of resurrection. All this was ever before the Lord. He always linked His resurrection with His death (Matt. 16: 21). The ashes thus would speak of God's acceptance of Christ's sacrifice, giving full assurance to the believer of his acceptance."—Lectures on the Tabernacle, pp. 439-441, by S. Ridout.

This is an acceptance connected, therefore, with all the preciousness to God of which the fat speaks. So we may say the fat speaks of our blessed Lord Himself in His unreserved and perfectly acceptable devotion to God's holy will, for the accomplishment of which He

[p] Neither shall they shave their heads, nor suffer their locks to grow long; they shall duly poll their heads. [q] Neither shall any priest drink wine when they enter into the inner court. [r] Neither shall they take for their wives a widow, nor her that is put away: but they shall take maidens of the [p] Lev. 21. 5.

[q] Lev. 10. 9.
[r] Lev. 21. 7, 13, 14.

yielded up all the strength of His holy and perfect life in the work of the cross. Are not those words of Ps. xxii. significant of this? "Like water I am poured out, and My bones are all disjointed: My heart is like wax, it is melted in the midst of My bowels. My strength is dried up like a potsherd, and My tongue cleaveth to My jaws; and Thou hast laid Me in the dust of death...I may tell all My bones: they gaze, they stare upon Me."

What other language could more vividly depict the utter yielding up of all strength, of all fatness, in the work of sacrifice under the stroke of judgment? Truly this is the food of the offering, and a sweet savor to God. In it He finds His special portion and eternal delight.

Then there is the blood, it speaks of life, but laid down under judgment, given upon the altar to make atonement. No one was permitted to eat blood (Lev. iii. 17; xvii. 10-14; xix. 26). Life essentially belongs to God, man has forfeited all claim to it through sin; but in connection with the sacrifices it speaks of Christ who became a Substitute for sinful men, and that the judgment sin required has been executed upon Him. As put upon the altar it declares the truth of acceptance, and provides the basis of worship for God's people; as put upon the gate it marks the way of access into that blessing, and as put upon the House itself it shows what permits God to be with and dwell among His people, for it fully cleanses and atones in relation to all that would defile (xliii. 20; xlv. 19, 20). The precious blood of Jesus cleanses from every sin. That precious blood gives us our access, for we are made nigh by it; it gives us our acceptance, for we are taken into favor in the Beloved in whom we have redemption, even the forgiveness of offences; it enables God who is just to justify the ungodly who believe in Jesus; and in virtue of His work He will present His redeemed people faultless in the presence of God's glory so that He will be found dwelling among them for eternity.

The next regulation refers to the clothing of the priests for entrance into God's presence. They must be clothed in linen garments. No wool was permitted, nothing that would promote the exudation of nature, for this can have no place in His presence. That stands identified with man's toil as a sinner (Gen. iii. 19). Linen we are familiar with as a symbol of righteousness, and of the righteousnesses of the saints, as in Rev. xix. 8. Whether we think of it in reference to our standing before God, what we are made in Christ, or the practical life of the believer, it is that which alone suits the holy presence of God. Such in fact are the garments of praise which should ever invest us as a holy priesthood. This alone rightly manifests His character, and on our part alone marks us as truly representing Him. Righteousness is the first feature of the kingdom of God (Rom. xiv. 17). He who loves us and has washed us seed of the house of Israel, or a widow that is the widow of a priest. And they shall [s]teach my people [the difference] betwen the holy and the common, and cause them to discern between the unclean and the clean. And in a controversy they shall stand to [t]judge: they shall judge it according to my judgments: and they shall keep my laws and my statutes in all my appointed times; and they shall hallow my sabbaths. And they

[s] Lev. 10. 10, 11. ctr. ch.22.26.

[t] Deut. 17. 8-11. 2 Chr. 19.10.

from our sins in His blood, has made us a kingdom, priests to His God and Father (Rev. i. 5, 6); and hence we are to follow righteousness (2 Tim. ii. 22). We are to avoid evil, do good, seek and pursue peace, "because the eyes of the Lord are on the righteous, and His ears toward their supplications; but the face of the Lord is against them that do evil. And who shall injure you if ye have become imitators of that which is good? But if also ye should suffer for righteousness' sake, blessed are ye; but be not afraid of their fear, neither be troubled; but sanctify the Lord the Christ in your hearts" (1 Pet. iii. 11-15). The righteous Lord loveth righteousness.

In no one like to the Lord Himself was the truth of the linen fully and perfectly displayed. So He is our example that we should follow in His steps.

Righteousness, we may say, is acting according to the place in which God has set us. As His righteousness in Christ, we are to be followers of Him as dear children. Thus in these verses we have been considering, we get first the place and its privileges (15, 16), then the responsibility to be clothed as befits that place, and to guard all as sanctified to the Lord.

In the second group of regulations, three important principles appear. That as to the hair shows how moderation is to mark those who present Jehovah's offerings. They are to avoid extremes on the one side or the other. Neither undue severity nor fleshly looseness is to characterize their ways.

Hair occupies an important place in Scripture. In the case of the Nazarite it signifies lowly dependence upon God, the only proper creature-attitude, with withdrawal from the things of the flesh and its stimulus, so that action is not under such influences. In 1 Cor. xi. it is used to show the relative place of man and woman in the divine order of creation—the short hair of the man indicating his headship and responsibilty to rule, the long hair of the woman that of her place of dependence, yet helpfulness, without which the man is not complete. Thus we may see in it a sign of separation in devotedness to God, all that we are brought into subjection to His will, and so of obedience to His order for us in whatever sphere of relation we may be placed. It is evident that there may be that extreme asceticism which does dishonor to God's creature, or on the other hand the turning of the grace of God into dissoluteness. It is needless to remark that neither is of God. It is the avoidance of such extremes that seems suggested in this ordinance as to the hair. It counsels true-hearted devotion to God in accordance with the obedience His Word enjoins, so that fleshly extremes are avoided on both sides.

shall come at [u]no dead person to defile themselves, but for father, or for mother, or for son, or for daughter, for brother, or for sister that hath had no husband, they may defile themselves. And after he is [v]cleansed, they shall reckon to him seven days. And in the day that he goeth into the sanctuary, into the inner court, to minister in the sanctuary, he shall offer [w]his sin offering, saith the Lord Jehovah. And they shall have an inheritance: [x]I am their inheritance; and ye shall give them no possession in Israel; I am their pos-

[u] Lev. 21. 1-3.
[v] Num. 19. 11, etc.
[w] Lev. 4. 3.
[x] Num. 18. 20; Deut. 10. 9; 18. 1, 2; Josh. 13. 33.

Abstinence from wine in connection with their service in the inner court well accords with what we have just considered. It "plainly covers all fleshly stimulus, which prevents clear discernment of what is or is not according to the mind and nature of God. For us also who are called to walk in the light of God's presence continually, this is not a casual, but a constant rule. The impulse of nature needs the restraint of Christ's yoke; even where, as the apostle says, things are lawful to us, we must still not be brought under the power of any (1 Cor. vi.12). And how easily do they acquire power!" It means the avoidance of all worldly, carnal methods, the love of the things of the world, in all that constitutes our place in worship and service as a holy and royal priesthood called to show forth the excellencies of Him who has brought us out of darkness into His marvelous light. We are to be controlled by that sober judgment which is formed in the Sanctuary. The psalmist might envy the ease, prosperity and power of the wicked when not in the current of God's thoughts, but when he went into the Sanctuary then understood he their end (Ps. lxxiii.). It is to such sobriety that the apostle exhorts —a sobriety of a spiritually sound mind, fleshly desires and passions held in restraint, the habits of life well regulated with discretion and moderation. Compare 1 Tim. iii. 2; Tit. i. 8; ii. 4, 6, 12; Rom. xii. 3; 1 Pet. iv. 7; 2 Cor. v. 13, sober, soberly, or sober-minded; Tit. ii. 2, temperate; ver. 5, discreet.

In the ordering of the marriage relation the purpose is to preserve purity of association. It comes as an added guard against yielding to the mere dictates of passion, or to acting in a careless, loose manner in forming the most sacred and important relation of human life. Compare Lev. xxi. 7-14.

Thus in every way the habits and relationships of the priests are to constitute a good witness for God. The priest is to "show out of a good conversation his works with meekness and wisdom" (James iii. 13). "But as He who hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation" (1 Pet. i. 15). Of course, we know that "conversation" means manner of life, and not merely our speech, though that is of itself an important factor.

The third group of regulations treats of priestly service toward the people. Let us not forget this order. To rightly fill priestly responsibility, to serve others in the work of teaching and judgment, we must first regulate our individual lives in accordance with the revealed mind of God. Here, as we know, Samson broke down, and session. [y]They shall eat the meal offering and the sin offering and the trespass offering; and every devoted thing in Israel shall be theirs. And the first of all the first fruits of every kind, and every heave offering of every kind, of all your heave offerings, shall be for the priests; ye shall also give unto the priests the first of your dough, that he may cause a blessing to rest on thy house. The priests [z]shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself, or of that which is torn, whether it be fowl or beast.

y Lev. 10. 12-15; 27. 21. Num. 18. 1-32.

z Lev. 22. 8.

how many another since his day! The apostle well understood this principle, and declares, "I buffet my body, and lead it captive, lest after having preached to others I should be myself rejected." This gives us a sober guiding principle. To love this present age results in forsaking the path of true service, as Demas did (2 Tim. iv. 10); that is only a form of self-love which refuses to give place to that love which would make Christ everything and all; in other words, to henceforth live unto Him who loved us and died for us, so that the life we now live in the flesh has Him for its supreme object. Plainly to know how to discern for ourselves, and so teach others the difference between the holy and profane, the clean and unclean, we must live in the light of the Sanctuary and know how to use its balances. And again what else can fit for the judgment of that which is in controversy? Those who thus serve and would lead others to obey the divine order must themselves observe God's holy laws and statutes, thus setting the example of obedience thereto. This is their responsibility, the foundation upon which the superstructure of priestly service must be built. When this is not so we may see the consequences depicted in the case of Eli's sons (1 Sam. ii. 12-30).

In the last part of this section we return to what relates to the walk of the priests. First, as regards defilement from the dead. Compare Lev. xxi. 1-6. To be connected with it in even the permitted cases defiles, requiring proper cleansing and the presentation of a sin-offering. Thus death becomes the remedy for the defilement which death brings in as the penalty of sin. To this the cross bears witness. But it is clear that general or promiscuous defilement was to be sedulously watched against. There is defilement in death because it is the penalty of sin, and what we have here is given as an evidence of what is suited to God's presence. The priestly place is viewed in that relation. Into His presence death and its defilement cannot come. Sin is inextricably linked with it, and so even Christ is forsaken when dying under its judgment. Only His death avails to bring poor helpless man into the life beyond its touch. And He so perfectly and completely met all the issues raised by sin and death that He could sit down in the presence of God—a witness, indeed, how all is removed from before God through that one sacrifice. Upon this depends all the exercise of power to take away sin by judgment. So we may learn from this regulation that the one who enters God's presence must be free from the touch of death, from the defilement it causes. As redeemed by the precious blood of Christ

Section 5 (Chaps. xlv., xlvi.).
Divine government exercised in the apportionment of the land, and the establishment of ordinances for worship and service

1-8) The division of the land in which the Lord's claim is given first place

1. And when ye [a]shall divide by lot the land for an inheritance, ye shall offer a [b]heave offering unto Jehovah, a holy portion of the land: the

[a] ch. 47. 22.
[b] ch. 48. 8-14.

we are made free, and stand identified with the glorious resurrection-life of our Saviour and Great High Priest. Our priestly place as linked with Him is in the power of indissoluble life. The present practical effect of this is to be a godly care to avoid unnecessary contact with what death stands for—sin and its fruits; while when this comes in we must remember what becomes His presence, the cleansing which restores the disturbed communion and service. The governing principle is, "I will be sanctified in them that draw near to Me."

The subject of inheritance is next treated. "I am their inheritance ....I am their possession." The priests have no inheritance, no possession in Israel. Compare Num. xviii. 20; Deut. x. 9; xviii. 1. Is this a deprivation? Can it be that to be an heir of God, to have Him as one's inheritance and possession? Rather it expresses the highest possible place of nearness and blessing in which what God is becomes the portion of those so blessed. What more than this gives God His rightful place? The whole man is lifted up to Him in whom all his resources are found, from whom all his expectation must come. It reminds us of the Christian place—heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ, who is the appointed Heir of all things, and He in whom we have obtained an inheritance into which we are brought according to the riches of His grace and to the praise of His glory. Now we joy in God, and rejoice in hope of His glory. Our city is of His building, our kingdom is of His preparation and giving.

Finally, the food of the priests is virtually all that is offered to Jehovah by the people—His portion becomes their's.

"Because of the anointing, the most holy things were given them to eat, which was a special privilege of the priests. The same thing is true with regard to us. Whatever is precious in the offering of Christ, in every point of view—in His life and in His death; in that bread come down from heaven, contemplated in His life of devotedness and grace here below; and in His death for us—all is the food and nourishment of our souls, in that communion with God in which we ourselves are kept in our priesthood. The priests alone ate the holy things, and they ate them in a holy place. It is only in the sense of the presence of God, and under the efficacy of that oil which is not poured on flesh, that we can truly realize what is precious in the work of Christ" (Synopsis, Vol. 1, pp. 261, 262).

Sec. 5.

1. The apportionment of the land and the arrangement of the heave offering, which includes the Sanctuary, we have already considered. Little more need be added here, except to notice that it is the Lord's portion that is specially in view. The tribal portions are stated in chap. xlviii. It is given first place, and the order in which the parts of this heave offering are mentioned emphasizes the Lord's length shall be the length of five and twenty thousand, and the breadth ten thousand:* this shall be holy in all the borders thereof round about. Of this there shall be for the sanctuary five hundred by five hundred, square round about; and fifty cubits for the suburbs thereof round about. And of this measure shalt thou measure the length of five and twenty thousand, and the breadth of ten thousand; and in it shall be the sanctuary, the holy of holies.

* It may be better to read here 20,000 with the LXX. This is preferred by Keil, Davidson, and others. It seems to make ver. 3 more intelligible. "Of this measure [or, out of this measure, i.e., the 25,000x20,000]" they were to measure 25,000x10,000 for the priests, and in this the sanctuary was located. Thus the previously mentioned allotment of 500x500 plus 50 cubits all around was in this portion given to the priests. Ver. 5 tells us to whom the remainder of the 25,000x20,000 was assigned, namely, the Levites who received a portion equal in size to that of the priests. Both these portions are called holy in chap. 48: 10, 14, thus agreeing with chap. 45: 1 if read with the LXX—"This shall be holy [the 25,000x20,000] in all the borders thereof round about." The adjoining possession of the city is not called holy.—(J. B.)

preeminence. That of the priests and Levites comes first, for what has to do with the Sanctuary is of chief importance. This is the more evident since the priests' portion is first mentioned, although the central division of this offering from the land.

Ver. 8 shows how moral considerations govern throughout. The possession given to the Prince has in view the correction of past abuses when those who ruled in Israel appropriated for themselves the possession of others, as in the case of Naboth's vineyard (1 Kings xxi.). Naboth's refusal was based on the Lord's word. His mind as to the change of possession had been given in Num. xxxvi. 7-9. The inheritance was not to remove from tribe to tribe, but each one was to cleave to the inheritance of the tribe of his fathers; and provision was made to redeem any possession that had been sold because of poverty (Lev. xxv. 25-28). The book of Ruth affords us precious lessons in this connection. God's care that each of His people should have preserved to him the allotted inheritance, teaches us the unchangeable character of His giving (for all was determined by lot which He disposed), and that there is an individuality which He designs should be preserved in the inheritance. Thus the person and his portion in the land as allotted of God (Num. xxxiii. 54; Josh. xiv. 2; Num. xxxvi. 2, 3; Prov. xvi. 33) are so identified in His mind that no separation is to take place—individuality, distinctness and abiding character are involved in this. Israel lost her inheritance, and the land reverted to Him who had given it and who claims it as His. But Israel is to be brought back, and the land will be again divided by lot according to this vision of Ezekiel. Then shall its apportionment to the redeemed people abide according to the purpose of God.

Abuses such as that of Ahab's were decried by the prophets (Isa. v. 8). Micah pronounces, "Woe to them that devise iniquity, and work evil upon their beds! When the morning is light they practise it, because it is in the power of their hand. And they covet fields, and

This is a holy portion of the land; it shall be for the priests, the ministers of the sanctuary, who come near to minister to Jehovah, and it shall be a place for their houses, and a holy place for the sanctuary. And five and twenty thousand in length, and ten thousand in breadth, shall be for the Levites, the ministers of the house, for a possession for themselves, for their habitations.

And ye shall appoint [c]the possession of the city five thousand in breadth and five and twenty thousand in length side by side with the holy heave offering: it shall be for the whole house of Israel. [c] ch. 48. 15-20

And the prince shall have [d]his portion on the one side and on the other side of the holy heave offering, and of the possession of the city in front of the holy heave offering, and in front of the possession of the city, from the west side westward, and from the east side eastward; and in length answering to one of the portions from the west border unto the east border. As land it shall be his for a possession in Israel; and [d] ch. 48. 21.

take them by violence; and houses, and take them away; and they oppress a man and his house, even a man and his heritage" (chap. ii. 1, 2). Hosea says, "The princes of Judah are become like those that remove the land-mark" (chap. v. 10; see Deut. vi. 21; xix. 14). The oppression of the ruling classes had grown in evil from the days of Solomon. Ezekiel found the princes of the land "like wolves ravening the prey to shed blood, to destroy souls, to get dishonest gain" (xxii. 27). The prevalence of such oppression finds confirmation from many passages in the prophets, and these show how deep and vile was the corruption—religious, moral, and civic—which destroyed the life of both kingdoms (Israel and Judah) until there was no remedy, the unsparing stroke of judgment must fall. How good to know that the day of restoration shall not be darkened by this evil—"My princes shall no more oppress My people."

The lesson of this history is patent. With departure from God's order and the ways of truth and righteousness which His Word directs, oppression, tyranny, and violence come in as the means to establish man's unrighteousness and its evil brood. This marks the line of Cain at the very beginning, and human history bears its sad and solemn witness to the inevitable consequences of rejecting the revealed knowledge of God, whether in the individual, the family, the Church, or the nation. Under this incubus creation groans, and will continue to do so until He comes whose rod of iron shall smite, breaking in pieces the oppressor, bringing liberty to creation and freeing the nations from the shackles in which sin and Satan's power have bound them.

my princes shall no more oppress my people; but they shall give the land to the house of Israel according to their tribes.

2 (9-12) Justness in practical dealings required by Him whose ways are full of mercy and truth

2. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Let it suffice you, princes of Israel, [e]remove violence and spoil, and execute judgment and justice; take away your exactions from my people, saith the Lord Jehovah. Ye shall have just balances, and a just ephah, and a just bath. The ephah and the bath shall be of one measure, so that the bath shall contain the tenth part of an homer, and the ephah the tenth part of an homer: the measure thereof shall be according to the homer. And the shekel shall be twenty gerahs; twenty shekels, five and twenty shekels, fifteen shekels, shall be your maneh.

e ch. 22. 27. Isa. 1. 23. Jer. 21. 12. 22. 3. Mic. 3. 1-12.

2. In the light of that coming day when the last blow of the oppressor's cruel will shall have fallen, and his terror cease from the earth, the prophet calls for that response in his day which would be in accord with the evident mind of God.

The admonition of these verses reaffirms the ordinances of the Law (Lev. xix. 15, 35, 36; Deut. xxv. 13-15). In the Proverbs we are assured that a false balance, divers weights and measures, are an abomination to the Lord (xi. 1; xx. 10); and by Micah He denounces the prevailing injustice, scant measure, deceitful weights. Amos also exposes the same wickedness (viii. 4-7).

Isaiah v. 10 makes clear that both liquid and dry measure are mentioned by Ezekiel, the bath being the former and the ephah the latter. The homer is made the standard for both, a measure approximately estimated at 11 bushels, or 90 gallons.

As to weights, the shekel is to be that of the Sanctuary, twenty gerahs (Exod. xxx. 13; Lev. xxvii. 25). The latter part of this verse is difficult to understand. The maneh is usually taken to equal fifty shekels; here it seems to be sixty, that is, 20+25+15; but if this is so, the reason for giving it in three parts is not apparent. Kiel inclines to consider the text corrupt; but Hengstenberg and Hitzig suppose a maneh of threefold value, but evidence for this is lacking. If the talent is correctly estimated as 60 maneh, the statement here seems at variance with Exod. xxxviii. 25, 26, an analysis of which gives the following result: 603,550 persons gave each half a shekel. This would give 301,775 shekels, deducting the 1,775 leaves the 300,000, which would be equal to the 100 talents, these being taken as sixty manehs each, requires each maneh to equal fifty shekels (100x60x50=300,000). This is true of the later Jewish weight system. The passage remains obscure. Some critics suggest the adoption of the LXX as read in the Alex. MS., "Five (shekels) shall be five, and ten shekels ten, and fifty shekels shall be your maneh," meaning that all shall be genuine, of equal and full weight. This at least is in accord with the moral significance of the context.

This insistance upon judgment, justice, honest measure and weight, may serve to remind us of the character of the Millennial age. It is the time when righteousness shall reign and all conform to the divine standards (Ps. xlv.; Isa. xi. 1-5; xxxii. 1-5, 16-19; xxxiii. 5, 6; lx. 17, 18; lxi. 10, 11; Jer. xxxiii. 15; Dan. ix. 24).

3 (13 ch. 46: 15) The materials for, and the order of, worship.
3 (13-17) The gifts of the people

3. [1]This is the heave offering which ye shall offer: the sixth part of an ephah out of a homer of wheat, and ye shall give the sixth part of an ephah out of a homer of barley; and the set portion of oil, by the bath of oil, shall be the tenth part of the bath out of the cor, [which is] a homer of ten baths; for ten baths are an homer; and one lamb out of the flock, out of two hundred,

3. Here what relates to the worship of the people—their gifts, the feasts, and other regulations—is given in seven sub-sections. First, we considered the place of the Sanctuary (vers. 1-8); then ways of holiness and truth enjoined (vers. 9-12); and now the order of worship, the manner of approach to God. This teaches us that right ways in practical life are the garments which must first invest those who are to be worshipers. The removal of evil and the following of righteousness must characterize those who offer their gifts to God. Of this the fine white linen in which the priests are clothed for service is the symbol. Apart from the accompaniment of obedience and practical righteousness, God can take no pleasure in mere outward observances and lip worship (Isa. i. 10-17; Matt. xv. 7-9). He desires mercy and not sacrifice, the knowledge of God more than burnt-offerings (Hos. vi. 6). Obedience is better than sacrifice. God looks upon the heart, His searching eye penetrates the mask of outward appearance, and what He desires of His people is that they should do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with Him (Mic. vi. 7). This order, namely that of practical righteousness preceding activity in worship, fits well with this as a fifth section—the number that speaks of responsibility to maintain and be exercised in godliness as under the government of God with whom relationship has been established through grace. This principle holds good for us as well as Israel. This the Epistles abundantly teach. The marvelous grace which they reveal as ours only obligates us to answer the more fully to the righteous and holy requirements of Him whose love and grace we now know. The hands that are lifted up to Him are to be holy hands, the sacrifices of our lips confessing His name are to be yielded up from hearts true in their purpose for His glory, the out-breathing of lives yielded up to obedience in sincerity and truth—our bodies presented as living sacrifices.

[1] Let us now consider the various features of the order of worship. First we have the gifts of the people. These consist of wheat, barley, oil, and lambs, in the measure and proportion stated. All is given to the Prince from all the people of the land, and he is to supply the various offerings at the yearly and monthly feasts, on the sabbaths, and in all the solemnities. These gifts have their significance. As to the lamb little remark is needed, we are so familiar with it as the type of Christ, the Lamb of God. Oil is the well-known symbol of the Holy Spirit; this is associated with the oblation of an ephah presented with the various sacrifices. The cereals too we from the well watered pastures of Israel; for a meal offering and for a burnt offering and for peace offerings, to make atonement for them, saith the Lord Jehovah. All the people of the land shall be [held] to this heave offering for the prince in Israel. And it shall be the prince's part [to give] the burnt offering and the meal offering and the drink offerings, in the feasts, and on the new moons, and on the sabbaths, in all the appointed times of the house of Israel: he shall prepare the sin offering and the meal offering and the burnt offering and the peace offerings, to make atonement for the house of Israel.

think of in relation to Christ, the Bread of Life (wheat), while also the food of the poor and humble, to be which He Himself entered into humiliation (barley). Barley was, and still is, to some extent, the food of the poor (Ruth ii. 17; 2 Kings iv. 42; John vi. 9, 13). Its connection with Gideon makes it a type of those who are despised and of lowly condition. Then wheat is the figure used by the Lord in reference to His people, those really His whom He will gather into His barn. It thus becomes a symbol of what is true and genuine as the result of the divine work. Such alone are acceptable to God. On the other hand the barley may suggest the humble station of those who become God's people, and the lowly place they must take to enter into blessing with Him. To be converted man must become as a little child. It is to the babes that the Father makes His revelation of the Son. To the poor the gospel is preached, and "Blessed are the poor in spirit." Not many mighty, not many noble are called; but the despised and those of no account in the eyes of the world become God's peculiar treasure.

But aside from these suggestions, this heave-offering from all the people teaches the recognition of God's goodness and bounteous giving from the lowest to the highest, from the least to the greatest form of blessing (barley, wheat); realized in the power of the Spirit (oil), and redemption (the lamb). This should be true of all God's people, whether the form of blessing be earthly or heavenly.

Terumah, the word for heave-offering, means a sacrifice or gift offered up, that is, as raised or lifted up in presentation for acceptance, and as such devoted to Jehovah's service. In the Law the right shoulder is the usual heave-offering, the type of service, and that the most efficient, for the right shoulder is the one best able to bear the burden. It is the term applied to the gifts of Israel for the tabernacle, and in that connection we learn what God's mind is as to the inward state of those who offer: it is heart-willingness, the spirit of being wholly yielded up to God in devoted service, the inner attitude answering to the outward act as the gift is heaved or lifted up. Here in Ezekiel it is specially connected with the oblation which accompanies the sacrifices mentioned in these regulations (xlv. 24, 25; xlvi. 5, 7, 11, 14, 15); and then with two forms of offering, the burnt and peace-offerings, the latter being always mentioned in the plural, which thus emphasizes the ideas of thanksgiving and fellowship so prominent in those offerings (Lev., Notes.). Since the gift of lambs is only mentioned in the heave-offering of the people, and later in the sacrifices of the sabbaths and new moons and the daily burnt offering (xlvi. 3-5, 13-15), it would seem that the people are particularly associated with these occasions. We may conclude that the other animals of sacrifice, the bullocks, rams, and he-goats, are of the Prince's own providing, though in doing so he doubtless fills a representative place. In one case this is specifically stated (ver. 22). Yet that the people are identified with all these sacrifices may be seen in that an oblation accompanies each supplied out of the cereal-offering of all the people. The sacrifices for the purgation of the House (vers. 18-20) appear rather to be the responsibility of the priests, though the indefiniteness of the address—"Thou shalt"—may leave it open to question.

2 (18-25): The yearly feasts

2 Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: In the first [month], on the first of the month, thou shalt take a young bullock without blemish, and thou shalt cleanse the sanctuary. And the priest shall take of the blood of the sin offering, and put it upon the door-posts of the house, and upon the four corners of the ledge of the altar, and upon the posts of the gate of the inner court. So they shall do also on the seventh of the month for every one that erreth, and for the simple; and ye shall make atonement for the house.

2 Now the yearly feasts are stated; and first the offerings to cleanse and atone for the House. Two occasions are mentioned, on the first and seventh of the first month. This is a remarkable deviation from the Levitical order. The great day of atonement is not mentioned, and these two occasions in the first month seem to take its place. The bullock only is offered, whereas in Lev. 16 there are the bullock and two goats, as well as the two rams for burnt-offerings. Yet the object in view is similar, cleansing and atonement respecting the House and those who err. We hear of no ark or mercy-seat, as of old, upon which the blood is sprinkled; but the blood is put upon the posts of the House, upon the altar, and the posts of the gate of the inner court. Which gate is not specified, though most likely the north gate was meant, for here the work of preparing the sacrifices took place.

The omission of not only the day of atonement, but also the offering of firstfruits, Pentecost, and the blowing of trumpets, is significant. In fact, at the time to which the vision of Ezekiel applies, all these will have been accomplished. The resurrection of Christ, the formation of the Church, and the regathering of Israel answer to them, while all that the day of atonement typified, including its application to Israel (Lev., Notes, p. 344), will have also found its fulfilment.

Evidently these sacrifices which open the year cannot be considered in the same light as those of old. These point back to the basic work of redemption at the Cross, as those of the past pointed forward to it—those anticipated it, these memorialize it. At the same

In the first [month], and the fourteenth day of the month, ye shall have [f]the passover, a feast of seven days; unleavened bread shall be eaten. And upon that day shall the prince offer for himself, and for all the people of the land, a bullock for a sin offering. And the seven days of the feast he shall offer a burnt offering to Jehovah, seven bullocks and seven rams without blemish daily for the seven days; and a he-goat daily for a sin offering. And he shall prepare a meal offering, an ephah for a bullock, and an ephah for a ram, and a hin of oil for an ephah.

[f] Ex. 12. 14-20; Lev. 23. 5-8; Num. 28. 16, 25.

In the [g]seventh [month], on the fifteenth day of the month, at the feast, shall he do the like seven days, according to the sin offering, according to the burnt offering, and according to the meal offering, and according to the oil.

[g] Lev. 23. 34; Nu. 29. 12-40.

3 (xlvi. 1-7): The sabbaths and new moons

3 Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: The gate of the inner court that looketh toward the east shall be shut the six working days; but on the [h]sabbath time they constitute a continual reminder of God's holiness, which must take notice of the least departure.

[h] Nu. 28. 9, 10.

Next in order comes the Passover and the feast of unleavened bread. Here there are also marked differences from the Mosaic order, which required for each of the seven days two bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs, and an oblation of fine flour mingled with oil, graded for each (Num. xxviii. 19-21). Ezekiel requires seven bullocks and seven rams for each of the seven days, and no lambs. In both cases there is also the daily sin-offering of one he-goat. The oblation is one ephah for a bullock, and one for each ram, and an hin of oil for an ephah. In addition there is on the first day a bullock for a sin offering for the Prince and all the people, a feature not included in Numbers. The significance of this feast has been fully given in its place (Exodus, Notes), and in considering the offerings in Leviticus the spiritual meaning of the animals of sacrifice has been adequately stated. Here, then, let it suffice to notice that the offerings required are much richer than under the Law. This emphasizes the fulness of obedience in service (bullock) and consecration (ram). The omission of the lambs would concentrate attention upon the one lamb of this feast—the Passover lamb, and so upon Christ, the Lamb of God.

The third, and last, yearly feast is that of tabernacles. Referring again to Numbers (xxix. 12-34) we find here an entire change, and on the whole a simplified ritual, since it is to be the same as at the previous feast of unleavened bread. The eighth day appears omitted also, for its significance finds fulfilment in the establishment of the kingdom with its glorious new beginning of righteousness, peace, and rest for Israel, the nations, and creation itself.

3 The ordinances which relate to the weekly and monthly feasts—sabbaths and new moons—are now given. In connection with them day it shall be opened, and on the day of the [1]the new moon it shall be opened. And the prince shall enter by the way of the porch of the gate from without, and shall stand by the post of the gate, and the priests shall offer his burnt offering and his peace offerings, and he shall worship at the threshold of the gate; then he shall go forth: but the gate shall not be shut until the evening. And the people of the land shall worship at the door of the gate before Jehovah on the sabbaths and on the new moons. And the burnt offering that the prince shall present unto Jehovah on the sabbath day shall be six lambs without blemish, and a ram without blemish. And the meal offering shall be an ephah for the ram, and the meal offering for the lambs as he is able to give, and a hin of oil for an ephah. And on the day of the new moon, a young bullock without blemish, and six lambs and a ram: they shall be without blem-

[1] Nu. 28. 11-15.

a distinctive feature appears in regard to the east inner gate. This is closed for the six working days, but opened on the sabbath and the day of the new moon. At this open gate Prince and people worship (vers. 2, 3). The Prince is distinguished by alone having permission to enter its porch, and standing there to worship during the offering of his sacrifices. This brings these acts of worship into line with the great altar, and the entrance of the House, immediately before the indwelling glory.

Again comparing Num. xxviii. 9-15 we see there are marked differences.

NUMBERS	EZEKIEL
Sabbath: Two lambs, with their oblation of two-tenths parts of fine flour mingled with oil, and the required drink offering.	Sabbath: Six lambs, one ram, with an oblation of an ephah for the ram, and that for the lambs is left to the Prince's generosity: and oil, a hin for an ephah.
New Moon: Two bullocks, one ram, seven lambs, with their graded oblations. One goat for a sin-offering.	New Moon: One bullock, one ram, six lambs, with an oblation of an ephah for a bullock, and for the ram, and for the lambs according to the Prince's generosity: and oil, a hin for an ephah.

This new order of sacrifices gives greater prominence to the sabbath, while the greatly increased oblation in all cases may signify the increased fruitfulness and prosperity of those Millennial days; and the emphasis on the sabbath suggests that what it means for

ish. And he shall offer a meal offering, an ephah for the bullock, and an ephah for the ram, and for the lambs according to what his hand shall attain unto; and a hin of oil for an ephah.

4 (8-10): The manner of entrance and exit

[8]And when the prince cometh in, he shall come in by the way of the porch of the gate, and he shall go out by the way thereof. And when the people of the land come in before Jehovah at the appointed times, he that entereth in by the way of the north gate to worship shall go out by the way of the south gate; and he that entereth by the way of the south gate shall go out by the way of the north gate: he shall not return by the way of the gate by which he came in, but shall go out straight before him. And the prince shall come in in the midst of them, when they come in; and when they go out, they shall go out [together].

the earth and creation is then blessedly realized in the righteousness, peace, rest and abundant blessing of the kingdom. The enlarged oblations which answer to the meal-offerings of old, and are typical of Christ's Person in its human perfection, may well speak of the enhanced appreciation of Him in that day when He will no longer be One having no beauty that He should be desired. Of Him then will it be sung, "Thou art fairer far than the sons of men: grace is poured into Thy lips...Thy throne, O God, is forever and aye; the sceptre of Thy kingdom is an even sceptre." The larger proportion of the oil intimates the greater fulness of the Spirit, and so of apprehension. The offerings are increased threefold, for there is full realization through redemption of the victory of good over evil (6) in the sabbath-keeping of that coming day.

As to the differences on the feast of the new moon we can say little. The monthly return of the moon speaks of constant renewal under the good hand of God, and that of course of the creature, weak and nothing in itself, ever dependent upon the sufficiency and ministry of the Creator; like the moon, in itself nothing, and getting all its light from the great source of light and power, the sun. It has its special reference to Israel, but yields its lessons also for the Church and the individual (Numbers, Notes, p. 498). The bullock and ram must still speak of service and consecration, but in the victory of known redemption.

[8] Certain directions as to the times of public worship follow. First, the Prince cannot enter the inner court. He comes into the porch of the east gate, which is at the outer end toward the court of general assemblage, and goes out the same way. This shows that he is not privileged to pass through the gate.

The people are to enter by one gate and leave by the opposite one. Only two gates are available for them, the north and south, for the outer east gate was perpetually closed. This rule of the Sanctuary is, in effect, "Let all things be done fittingly and in order" (1 Cor. xiv. 40). We have referred to the meaning of the north when con-

5 (11): The regulations as to the meal-offering

5 And on the feast days, and at the appointed times, the meal offering shall be an ephah for a bullock, and an ephah for a ram; and for the lambs as he is able to give, and a hin of oil for an ephah.

6 (12): The Prince's free-will offering

6 And when the prince shall offer a free-will burnt offering or free-will peace offerings unto Jehovah, the gate that looketh toward the east shall be open for him, and he shall offer his burnt offering and his peace offerings as he did on the sabbath day; and he shall go out again, and the gate shall be shut after he has gone out.

sidering that gate. The south affords another lesson. To go southward is to go toward Egypt—the land of the serpent, with its lure for the flesh, and its bondage too, though with this may be found a measure of ease and pleasure which gratifies the natural man. Abram travelled there to escape the famine and the exercise of dependence upon God alone. We are kept by His power through faith, not sight, but that means a path of both exercise and discipline. Relaxing influences are found in the south; they may be pleasant for a season, but there too we experience the burning heat which parches the earth and destroys fruitfulness. "How many have found the hot breath of worldly prosperity the destruction of spiritual fruit." In the tabernacle it is suggestive to find the table of the showbread on the north side, for the truth of communion is what we need and get there, where also we learn how through sacrifice judgment is forever removed so that our darkness is turned to light. But on the south side of the tabernacle, opposite the table, the candlestick was placed, for as we walk in the light of the Spirit we do not fulfil the lusts of the flesh—the south does not attract. Instead we bear the fruit of the Spirit, of which the motif used in designing the candlestick plainly speaks. Spiritually speaking, we need to pass through both the north and the south gates, for thus the altar and the House come into view and their lessons are impressed upon us.

5 The oblation, or meal-offering, is now specially emphasized by repeating its measure in relation to the sacrifices. Typical of Christ in His perfect humanity it brings Him before us as the Son of Man, the One in whom full, perfect and holy Manhood is united with full Deity, for in Him the fulness of the Godhead dwells bodily. It is fitting that that which speaks of Him in this character should receive prominence in these visions of Ezekiel, for they refer to the time of the kingdom of the Son of Man, when He as that will take up His great power and reign, possessing Himself of the inheritance of which He is the appointed Heir.

6 This next ordinance shows the distinctive place of the Prince. The east gate is opened to him whenever he presents his freewill offering. It seems clear that he fills a representative place, and this being so may not his special privilege suggests the preeminent place of Israel as compared with other nations who come up to the mountain of Jehovah's House?

7 (13-15): The daily burnt-offering

7 And thou shalt [j]daily offer a burnt offering unto Jehovah, a yearling lamb without blemish: morning by morning shalt thou prepare it. And thou shalt prepare a meal offering with it morning by morning, a sixth part of an ephah, and a third part of a hin of oil, to moisten the fine flour: a meal offering unto Jehovah continually by a perpetual ordinance. And they shall offer the lamb, and the meal offering, and the oil, morning by morning for a continual burnt offering.

[j] Ex. 29.38. Nu. 28.3.

4 (xlvi.16-18): Warning against oppression

4. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: If the prince give a gift unto any of his sons, it shall be his inheritance, it shall belong to his sons: it shall be their possession by inheritance. But if he give a gift of his inheritance to one of his servants, it shall be his until [k]the year of liberty; then it shall return to the prince; to his sons alone shall his inheritance remain. And the prince shall not take of the people's inheritance to thrust them by oppression out of their possession: he shall give his sons an inheritance out of his own possession: that my people be not scattered every man from his possession.

[k] Lev. 25.10.

5 (xlvi.19-24): Guarding the holy things

5. Then he brought me through the passage which was at the side of the gate, into the holy chambers which were for the priests, which looked toward the north; and, behold, there was a place there at the end westward. And he said unto me, This is the place where the priests shall boil the trespass offering and the sin offering; where they shall bake the meal offering: that they bring them not forth unto the outer court to sanctify the people.

7 Finally, the daily burnt-offering is prescribed. In contrast to the Levitical order it is offered in the morning only. The oblation is increased from one-tenth to one-sixth, and the oil from one-quarter of a hin to one-third.

4. Further warning against oppression is given, and the purpose expressed that each preserve his own inheritance. This latter feature is guarded in the regulation concerning the division of the Prince's inheritance. It must remain in his family, so that a portion given to a servant reverts to him in the year of jubilee, or liberty.

5. In this concluding part we are told about the kitchens for the priests and for the people. The care to keep what is priestly from the people is meant surely to maintain a sense on both sides—with the priests and people—of the sanctity of the service of Jehovah, so guarding against all undue familiarity, as a result of which in the past so much had crept in to defile the courts of Jehovah's house.

And he brought me forth unto the outer court, and caused me to pass by the four corners of the court; and behold, in every corner of the court there was a court. In the four corners of the court there were courts enclosed, forty [cubits] long and thirty broad: these four corner courts were of one measure. And there was a range round about in them, round about those four, and it was made with boiling places under the ranges round about. And he said unto me, These are the boiling houses where the ministers of the house shall boil the sacrifice of the people.

Section 6 (Chap. xlvii. 1-12.)
The victory over curse

And he brought me back to the door of the house; and behold, [1]waters issued out from under the threshold of the house eastward: for the front of the house was eastward. And the waters came down from under, from the right side of the house, south of the altar. And he brought me out by [1] Ps 46. 4. Joel 3. 18, Zech. 14. 8. cf. Jer. 2. 13; 17. 13. Isa. 35. 6, 7; 41. 18; 43. 19; 44. 3. Rev. 22. 1.

Sec. 6.

Brought back to the door of the House the prophet sees waters issue from under its threshold. They flow from the House on the right side, that is, the south, because the prophet stands facing east, or looking toward the altar, so that the south is on his right hand. On the south of the altar he sees the stream flowing eastward. The two east gates being closed he is brought out of the north gate, and led around outside the wall of the outer court to the east gate, and there the water was flowing out on the right side.

The stream is then four times measured at successive points of 1,000 cubits, so that at 4,000 cubits the depth was too great for a man to pass through.

The prophet now traverses the banks of this river, and finds both banks clothed with a luxuriant growth of trees of fadeless leaf and never-failing fruit, supplying medicine and food.

The easterly direction is again noticed (ver. 8), and in addition Ezekiel is told that the river flows into the Dead Sea, healing its waters so that they teem with life, for "everything shall live whither the river cometh." Its waters are waters of life issuing from the Sanctuary of the living God. Only the marshes and pools are not healed; they are reserved as a means of supplying salt.

This whole picture is one that inspires the mind and heart with the bright anticipation of that blessedness of life which will characterize the Millennial earth. Then creation will bear witness to the power and glory of God in a way man has never known since the fall. But let us range a little through the fields of Scripture, for the lesson of these life-giving waters. This symbol of the river meets us at the beginning in the Garden, and we find it again in > the way of the gate northward, and led me around outside, unto the outer gate towards [the gate] that looketh eastward; and, behold, waters ran out on the right side. When the man went forth eastward, a line was in his hand; and he measured the glory-scene which closes the inspired volume. Between these far distant points the references are numerous, teaching us lessons of blessing from God and fellowship with Him.

We go to Eden. There are its four rivers. It will repay us, however, to consider a little the whole setting of the wonderful second chapter of Genesis. It furnishes us with features of the Millennial age, which, as the porch to the House, introduces the eternal state, but which being this bears the character of that to which it thus belongs. These visions of Ezekiel, if not giving us the seventh day in the dispensational order, certainly refer to the sixth, and that leads into the sabbath-keeping which remains to the people of God. In the order of creation the sixth day has witnessed the completion of God's work. Suitably it closes with the Head of all set in the place of Lordship over the new scene of blessing. In this we have a type of our blessed Lord, God's Man, to whom all has been subjected, and who will bring all into subjection to Himself. In beautiful sequence to this the seventh day comes in—the day of God's rest. The eternal rest will result from the work of subjugation accomplished by the Second Man, and so He is called "the Father of Eternity" (Isa. ix. 6, New Trans.). Of that final rest this first sabbath of the re-fashioned, re-furnished earth is a type. Notice that from this day is omitted the formula constantly repeated on the previous days, "Evening was, and morning was." Is it not as though God would have us understand that in His thought this day should have no end? Blessed be God, that final day will endure eternally. Precious, too, it is to note that on this day God is not occupied with work, or the work done, but with the day. He blesses it, and sanctifies it. Blessed intimation that the eternal day shall have the blessing of God resting upon it with no element of disturbance to intrude.

Three things are mentioned. First, God ended His work — the dawning of the seventh day brought with it the end of His labor. Second, God rested; this is what the day brought in for Him—rest. Third, God blessed and sanctified it. The blessing of the day can alone consist in the delight and satisfaction of God concerning the accomplished work which thus makes rest possible. It is sanctified, in that it is set apart to the enjoyment of this delight and satisfaction. Who shall say what the measure of these things is to be in that sabbath-keeping of God into which His people shall enter with Him?

Apart from redemption we know man could never enter into and enjoy God's rest. This finds illustration in Israel, who as the one nation brought into relation to God on the ground of redemption, is commanded to observe the seventh day—the sabbath, the observance of which is associated with the thought of redemption as typified in the sacrificial system, and by means of priesthood-relation between God and the redeemed. All this finds its fulfilment, both as to redemption and priesthood, in the Lord Jesus. Thus the true and > a thousand cubits and he caused me to pass through the waters: the waters were to the ankles. Again he measured a thousand, and caused me to pass through the waters: the waters were to the knees. And he measured a thousand and caused me to pass through: the waters were to the loins.

final rest of God, of which Israel's sabbath was a type, is now sure of fulfilment, and secured for God's redeemed people.

A new subject begins in ver. 4 of Genesis ii., that of the relationships in which the new head of creation is placed, in all of which we see him to be a figure of Christ. We see Him here as Heir of all and Ruler over all, with His consort, the Church, of whom the woman is a type; yet may we not also see here a picture of the Son of Man and His kingdom? Following what is plainly introductory, showing how God has acted in view of man, we get the account of the garden—its location and planting, then the river and its parts (of special interest to us now); and finally man's place, service and privileges in the garden. Many details might profitably engage our attention, but we must confine ourselves to noting that the garden is located "eastward in Eden." Eden means delight; and the east suggests the glory of God. Here too is "every tree pleasant to the sight and good for food"—fullest ministry to satisfy and refresh. In the midst of this the river and its four branches fill an important place. Does it not suggest the ministry of the Spirit from whom alone rivers of living water can flow, and that in a universal character, for all the creation (the four parts), such as shall mark that day to which this whole scene points, including that of Ezekiel's vision, as we have seen? Indeed, Israel can look forward to blessings of the Spirit such as never yet enjoyed. God will put His Spirit within them (Ezek. xxxvi. 27), and pour it out upon them collectively (Isa. xliv. 3), when their time of trial and desolation is over (Isa. xxxii. 15), never to return (Ezek. xxxix. 29). Nor will this blessing be confined to Israel, as Joel plainly predicts, telling us also the time when the outpouring of the Spirit will take place. It will be after God has interposed on behalf of His people, overthrowing the aggressive power of the north, and restoring its fruitfulness to the land. If Eden's rivers then speak of the Spirit and His ministry, let us see what we may learn from a study of them. Should they not teach us the character of His ministry? That we know has for its subject Christ and His things, so this is what comes before us.

Pison, "increase," is first; it compasses the land of Havilah, "anguish," or "travail," where the gold is which is good. Gold is the symbol of God's glory. Increase for eternity has been accomplished by Christ through the encompassment of the land of anguish —the birth-pains of the new creation of which He is the Beginning. There, nevertheless, has been found in all its wealth the glory of God. And if faith now can say, "And the gold of that land is good," how much more in the eternal day! It is added, "There is bdellium and the onyx-stone." The Hebrew word for bdellium means "in trouble," and that for onyx-stone, "their recompense." Here perchance we get a hint of faith's connection with the sufferings of Christ and the glories which follow. It is given to those who find their increase through the anguish of Christ, not only to believe

> And he measured a thousand: it was a river that I could not pass through; for the waters were risen, waters to swim in, a river that could not be passed through. And he said unto me, Son of man, hast thou seen [this]? And he led me and brought me back to the bank of the river. And but to suffer for Him; but to suffer leads to being glorified with Him, and so there is both the trouble and the recompense. Both of them bring us in their way into a knowledge of the glory of God.

The second Edenic river is Gihon, "the bringer-forth." It surrounds the whole land of Cush, "terror," or "black." Christ is our Deliverer from the land of our terror and blackness. God in His mercy thus brings out of darkness into marvelous light. If in the first river we read the lesson of the cross from the Godward side—God glorified in Christ—here in the second the enemy is in view. But he is a smitten enemy, all his power has been encompassed, he is annulled, captivity led captive, and now nothing can separate God's redeemed people from His love in Christ Jesus, their Bringer-forth. Thus we can speak of being delivered from the authority of darkness and translated into the kingdom of the Son of His love. To this end Christ first entered the land of terror and blackness, and came forth as the firstborn from among the dead. Those who believe share in His triumph.

Hiddekel, the third, means "thorn of God." It "goeth in front of Assyria," "a footstep," or "to go forward," and in front lies the thorn of God—the thorn is the significant sign of the curse, which God Himself must bring in because of sin. How man in his every forward move as independent of God, following the inclination of his own will, guided by his own wisdom, meets with the thorn in such a path. Blight falls in some form upon even his greatest and highest achievements, for close by the gourd under which he seeks rest and in which he greatly rejoices, there is the worm which causes it to wither. Then the sultry east wind blows, and man faints. The thorn of God is there. To this creation is subject, and groans. But, thank God, there is deliverance. There is One who has worn the crown of thorn, but who is now crowned with glory and honor. Into His hand all power and judgment has been committed. He has made peace by the blood of the cross. He will remove the blight of sin from creation, and as the Sun of Righteousness chase away all the shadows of its long night, and under His wings of healing grace and power gather all things together in one. Viewing the lesson here from another angle, we may say that because sin and man's ruin brought in the curse, it must be borne, the judgment involved be fully endured, if God's purposes are to go forward to ultimate success. Christ has accomplished the needed work and all is assured. Then it is no wonder that in the fourth place we have Euphrates, "fruitfulness." This is the grand result which shall be made good throughout the length and breadth of the universe.

Are not the features of this picture again before us in Ezekiel? From the house filled with God's glory the river flows out, past the altar of sacrifice where the work of judgment has been accomplished, down to the sea of death, removing its curse, bringing fruitfulness and life where barrenness and death had reigned, for the

when I returned, behold, on the bank of the river were very many [m]trees on the one side and on the other. And he said unto me, These waters issue forth toward the east district, and go down into the [n]Arabah, and go into the sea; when they are brought forth into the sea, the waters shall be healed. And it shall come to pass that every living thing which moveth, whithersoever the double stream shall come, shall live; and there shall m ver. 12. cf. Rev. 22. 2.

n Or, plain. cf. Deut. 3. 17; 4. 49. Josh. 3. 16.

Deliverer has come out of Zion, and creation sings its Hallelujah. At 4,000 cubits the waters are to swim in—4x10x10x10, the creature brought into the power and blessing of the full manifestation of the divine order as it relates to God and man (the threefold ten).*

These suggestions may help us to see how important a place the rivers fill in instruction as to the blessings of God. But let us go on. We read of the Israelites after the Red Sea crossing, "They came to Elim; and twelve springs of water were there, and seventy palm trees; and they encamped there by the waters." By the way we must pass the bitter waters of Marah—sorrow and trial which the cut down tree cast in makes sweet, but rest is found at Elim where the waters flow, bringing forth abundant fruit and shade realized under the government of God (12=4x3), fully manifest in creative goodness meeting creature weakness, which as realized and bringing us into dependence upon God assures the creature's fullest blessing. Again in this we have the testimony (2) given to God's mastery over evil, the victory of good (6), through His manifest power to bless (12=6x2). Such waters are sweet and unfailing in the joy and provision they supply.

Twice the waters flow from the smitten rock, bringing life and refreshment to Israel's host. On the first occasion the lesson is plainly that of the Cross, by which alone all spiritual blessing is realized. The second time when Moses was told to take the rod of Aaron that budded and speak to the rock, we get a beautiful type of the resources of Christ in resurrection priesthood, through the exercise of which the living waters flow—flow, as we may say, from the throne upon which He sits. No second smiting was needed. In this Moses erred. The one Sacrifice suffices, and in the power of its abiding efficacy, and of life out of death, the waters now flow down from the Sanctuary where He is enthroned. These are still waters beside which He leads, and where the green pastures of blessed ministry and fellowship are found for those who know the Lord to be a very great multitude of fish; for these waters shall come thither, and the [waters of the sea] shall be healed; and everything shall live whithersoever the river cometh. And it shall come to pass that fishers shall stand upon it; from En-gedi even unto En-eglaim shall be a place for the spreading of nets; their fish shall be according to their kinds, as the fish of °the great sea, exceeding many. But its marshes and its pools shall not be healed: they shall be given up to salt.

* In the concluding section of Genesis 2, do we not get a type of all the redeemed creation ranged under the headship of Christ? First we have the counsel of God (ver. 18), then all the animal creation is brought to Adam and he gives them their names. All creation comes into relation to its head, Adam, the figure of Him who was to come, God's Man, the appointed Heir of all things, and the One who as Last Adam is set far above all principality and power and every name named. Notice there are three families mentioned: the cattle, the fowl of the heaven, and the beast of the field. May not this speak to us first of Israel, of whom in the prophets, the domesticated animal is the type; then of heavenly powers; and finally the Gentile nations, of whom the beasts of the field are used in a typical way in Scripture. Lastly we have the man's special helpmeet, suggesting the Church, the Bride of Christ.

° ch. 48. 28. Num. 34. 6. Josh. 23. 4.

be their Shepherd. He will be so known to Israel, and among the nations in that day to which Ezekiel refers.

Then as the Shepherd of Israel He will feed His flock (Isa. xl. 11: Ezek. xxxvii. 24), for they will no longer refuse "the waters of Shiloah which flow softly" (Isa. viii. 6). Of that day no more beautiful description than that of Isa. xxxv. could be given. "The wilderness and the dry land shall be gladdened; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose...for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and torrents in the desert" ("plain," or Arabah, the same word as in Ezek. xlvii. 8). It is then that "judgment shall roll down as waters, and righteousness as an overflowing stream" (Amos v. 24). Jerusalem shall be a quiet habitation, for there "the mighty Jehovah will be for us a place of rivers" (Isa. xxxiii. 21, New Trans.).

These and other passages in the prophets show how the symbol of water is used to express the fulness of blessing and fellowship with God. It is also used of God Himself. Jehovah charges His people with having forsaken Him, "the fountain of living waters" (Jer. ii. 13; xvii. 13). And the figure in this connection finds beautiful application in the words of the prophet, "Blessed is the man that confideth in Jehovah, and whose confidence Jehovah is. For he shall be like a tree planted by the waters, and that spreadeth out its roots by the stream, and he shall not see when heat cometh, but his leaf shall be green; and in the year of drought he shall not be careful, neither shall he cease to yield fruit" (Jer. xvii. 7, 8).

In relation to the blessing and glory of the days toward which Ezekiel looks we read, "The Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall shepherd them, and shall lead them to fountains of waters of life, and God shall wipe away every tear from their eyes" (Rev. vii. 17; xxi. 6; see Notes). Indeed the last passage mentioned gives almost the last gospel invitation in the Book of God, and this may well remind us of how this figure of living water is used to express the precious fulness and permanence of God's grace in His Son (John iv.), while he who receives from His hand this gift of God becomes a vessel from which shall flow "rivers of living water." "This He said concerning the Spirit, which they that believe on Him were about to receive" (John vii. 37-39). Thus we have life from God in the blessed fulness of His grace and in the power of the Holy Spirit presented to us under this figure of water. Truly, it issues out of the Sanctuary, yea, it is the outflow of God, of Christ, of the Spirit. These divine Persons are the Fountains from whence such waters flow, and of whose very being they partake, bringing the recipient into the fulness of God. However true it is that only the blessing and glory of Christianity, and so of what is heavenly, fully express the preciousness of this figure, it is also true that the coming age of earth's jubilee will enjoy, in the divinely granted measure, like blessing and fellowship in the power of the Spirit and His ministry as then poured out (Joel ii. 28, 29; Isa. xliv. 3; Ezek. xviii. 31; xxxvii. 1, 14; xxxix. 29).

> By the river, upon its bank, on the one side and on the other, shall grow all trees for food, whose leaf shall not wither nor their fruit fail: it shall bring forth new fruit every month, for its waters issue out of the sanctuary: and the fruit thereof shall be for food, and the leaf thereof for medicine.

We must not forget that water is also a figure of the Word of God. So the Lord uses it in John iii. (see Notes, pp. 492-494), in John xiii., where it is indispensable for communion. In the laver of the Tabernacle we read the lesson of its important relation to all priestly activity (Exodus, Notes, p. 240).

This general testimony of Scripture helps us to see the significance and importance of the river which flows from the Sanctuary in Ezekiel's vision. These thoughts find confirmation as we consider the results of it reaching the Dead Sea—figure as that is of utter barrenness, death, and judgment. The inflow of these living waters so changes all, that life and fruitfulness fill the place of curse and death. Only the stream flowing out from the glory of God, by way of the altar of sacrifice, can transform the wilderness into a garden, overcoming the havoc wrought by sin. Within the limits of the purpose of God "there is nothing—nothing too sunken, too useless, too doomed—but by the grace of God it may be redeemed, lifted and made rich with life." The chief of sinners has been saved, and he is now in glory. Certainly Israel, new-born and blessed with the outflowing stream of life in the Spirit's power, will be as different in her moral and spiritual condition from that of her past history as will be the future physical change of the Dead Sea and its surroundings compared with that of its present existing state.*

Yet the past must be remembered, the work of judgment must not be forgotten: and this will serve its own purpose. "But its marshes and its pools shall not be healed; they shall be given up to salt"—the witness of the inflexible righteousness and changeless holiness of the divine nature, acting in both preservative and sanctifying power. Doubtless from this source of supply will come, as of old, the salt used in the temple service.† God's grace is seasoned with salt—the preservative energy of the divine will.

---

* See Appendix.

† "The salt of the Dead Sea was anciently much in request for use in the temple service. It was preferred before all other kinds for its reputed effect in hastening the combustion of the sacrifice, while it diminished the unpleasant smell of the burning flesh. Its deliquescent character (due to the chlorides of alkaline earths it contains) is also noticed in the Talmud" — (Smith's Bible Dictionary).

Section 7 (Chaps. xlvii. 13.—xlviii.).
The perfect Land, for "the Lord is there."

1(xlvii. 13-21: The boundaries of the land.

1. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: This shall be the border whereby ye shall allot the land as an inheritance according to the twelve tribes of Israel: [p]Joseph shall have two portions. And ye shall inherit it, one as well as another; [the land] concerning which I lifted up my hand [q]to give it to your fathers; and this land shall fall to you for an [r]inheritance.

And this shall be the border of the land: toward the north side, from the great sea by the way of [s]Hethlon unto the entering in of [t]Zedad; [u]Hamath, [v]Berothah, Sibraim which is between the border of Damascus and the border of Hamath; Hazar-hatticon, which is by the border of Hauran. And the border from the sea shall be [w]Hazar-enan, the border of Damascus, and the north northward to the border of Hamath: this is the north side. And on the east side between Hauran and Damascus, and Gilead and the land of Israel, the Jordan, from the border unto the east sea, shall ye measure it: this is the east side. And the south side southward, from [x]Tamar to [y]the waters of Meribah-Kadesh, by the torrent, unto the great sea: this is the south side southward. And the west side shall be the great sea from the border as far as over against the entering into Hamath: this is the west side. And ye shall divide this land unto you according to the tribes of Israel.

p ch. 48. 4, 5. cf. Gen. 49. 22-26. 1 Chron. 5. 1, 2.
q ch. 20. 5, 6, 28, 42; 36. 7. Gen. 12. 7; 13. 14, 15; 15; 18 21; 17. 8; 26. 3; 28.13; 50. 24. Ex. 3. 17. Deut. 34. 4. Acts 7. 5.
r ch. 48. 29.
s ch. 48. 1.
t Num. 34. 8
u Num. 34. 8
v 2 Sam. 8. 8.
w ch. 48. 1. Num. 34. 9.
x ch. 48. 28.
y Num. 20. 12, 13, 24. Deut. 32. 51; 33. 8. Ps. 81. 7.

Sec. 7.

1. This final section begins with giving the boundaries of the land. These are essentially the same as those given in Num. xxxiv. 1-15. There is the difference that in Numbers the southern boundary is given first, whereas here we begin with the north. In both cases the Jordan forms the eastern line, the settlement of the two and a half tribes east of the river being a departure from the original plan. This is not given any place in the final arrangement, all the tribes being given their inheritance west of the Jordan.

We may note that Joseph is given two portions—Manasseh and Ephraim. This fulfils Gen. xlviii. 5, 6; and according to 1 Chron. v. 1, the birthright forfeited by Reuben was given to the sons of Joseph. Since he has two portions the number of the tribes remains twelve, although Levi is not counted, his inheritance being part of the heave-offering.

2 (21, 23): Care for the stranger

2. And it shall come to pass that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and for *the strangers who sojourn among you, who shall beget children among you; and they shall be unto you as the home-born among the children of Israel: with you they shall draw by lot inheritance among the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass that in what tribe the stranger sojourneth, there shall ye give him his inheritance, saith the Lord Jehovah.

*cf. Ex. 22.21; 23. 9. Lev. 17. 8, 10. 13; 20. 2; 22. 18; 25. 45. Deut. 10. 18, 19; 24. 14, 17. 21. Ps. 146. 9. Isa. 14. 1; 60. 4, 5, 10. Jer. 7. 6; 22. 3. Ob. ch. 22, 7, 29.

3 (xlviii. 1-7): The tribes north of the sacred Oblation

3. And these are the names of the tribes: from the north end along the way of Hethlon as one entereth into Hamath, Hazar-enan, the border of Damascus northward unto near Hamath; and they shall have their sides east and west, Dan one [portion]. And by the border of Dan, from the east side to the west side, Asher one. And from the border of Asher, from the east side even unto the west side, Naphtali one. And by the border of Naphtali, from the east side unto the west side, Manasseh one. And from the border of Manasseh, from the east side unto the west side, Ephraim one. And by the border of Ephraim, from the east side unto the west side, Reuben one. And by the border of Reuben, from the east side unto the west side, Judah one.

4 (8-22): The sacred Oblation, the universal centre of glory, government and worship.

4. And by the border of Judah, from the east side unto the west side, shall be the heave offering that ye shall offer, five and twenty thousand in breadth, and in length as one of the portions from

2. In addition to prescribing the division of the land to the tribes, the strangers who have settled themselves among them and begotten children among them are to receive inheritance with the tribes. The word for "stranger" here is different from that used in chap. xliv. 7, where the word signifies "sons of the alien," or "foreigner," really those brought in through Israel's unholy mixture with the evil nations around. Here it is one who, though not naturally one of the tribes, has cast in his lot among them. Such are to be as the home-born, and have their inheritance by lot in the tribe in which they live.

3-5. We next have the order of the tribes, first those north of the heave-offering (1-7), then that offering itself is described (8-22), followed by the tribes to the south (23-28). It will be of interest to compare the relations of the tribes as first settled in the land, and this final disposition. Chaps. xiii.-xxi of Joshua give in detail the first allotment of the inheritance, and this has been fully considered in its place. Here it seems only needful to emphasize the relation of the tribes to one another.

the east side unto the west side: and the sanctuary shall be in the midst of it. The heave offering that ye shall offer unto Jehovah shall be five and twenty thousand in length, and ten thousand in breadth. And for these, even for the priests, shall be the holy heave offering, toward the north five and twenty thousand, and toward the west the breadth ten thousand, and toward the east, the breadth ten thousand, and toward the south, the length five and twenty thousand: and the sanctuary of Jehovah shall be in the midst of it. [It shall be] for the priests that are sanctified of the sons of Zadok, who have kept my charge; who went not astray when the children of Israel went astray as the Levites went astray. And it shall be unto them a heave offering from the heave offering of the land, a thing most holy by the border of the Levites.

First, in bringing Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh from the east side of Jordan* an element of division is removed which formerly existed in the nation, and a feature not originally a part of God's order. Thus national unity and solidarity are established—divided interests and natural barriers overcome.

Reuben formerly separated from Judah by the expanse of the Dead Sea is now situated next to him. Benjamin who stood between Judah and Ephraim is removed to the south, bounding on that side the holy heave-offering. Manasseh, once divided, is now united and placed immediately north of his brother tribe, Ephraim. Asher, Naphtali, and Dan remain in the north, but Zebulun and Issachar are located in the south, and with them, Gad, who was formerly east of the Jordan. The division of Dan disappears. Simeon remains in the south.

It is noticeable that Judah and Benjamin, the tribes that remained faithful to David's house, are honored by nearest relation to the glorious centre of the Messianic kingdom. "Them that honor Me will I honor, and they that despise Me shall be lightly esteemed."

Now let us see what spiritual instruction may be gathered from this new arrangement of the tribes. They are in two groups, one of seven and one of five. It seems evident that we must seek the lesson in this very division, and consider them in the order of a first and second to which the numbers seven and five apply respectively. Group one should yield us truth suited to that number, and also seven; group two, what suits that and five.

First, the whole number of the tribes, twelve, speaks of manifest divine government over all creation in realized mastery over evil. Since this is divided into two parts, we may think of a full witness being given to this in the perfection and completeness (7) of the position in which God sets His redeemed people—a position of right-

* Compare the map of Canaan with that of the new arrangement. See Appendix.

> And answering to the border of the priests, the Levites shall have five and twenty thousand in length, and ten thousand in breadth: the whole length shall be five and twenty thousand, and the breadth, ten thousand. And they shall not sell of it, nor exchange it, nor shall the first fruits of the land be alienated: for it is holy unto Jehovah.

eousness and blessing in harmony with the divine attributes and sovereignty (1); and then in the fellowship, service, and relationship (2) in which they are placed in happy union with God, God and His creature reconciled (5 = 4 + 1). With these general thoughts before us, let us see what lessons the first group of seven tribes may teach us. They are in order as given us from the north:

1. Dan.
2. Asher.
3. Naphtali.
4. Manasseh.
5. Ephraim.
6. Reuben.
7. Judah.

In Jacob's prophecy (Gen. xlix.) we read in connection with Dan of Satanic character, the power of evil in manifestation. This can only be met and overcome by Jehovah's salvation, and for this Jacob expresses earnest desire. But despite Dan's evil character the prophetic assurance that he shall judge his people points to restoration and the realization of self-government, as far as the nation is concerned, when the day of the lawless one, the false Messiah, is over —a personage linked with Dan it would seem from this very prophecy. So in Dan's blessing as pronounced by Moses we have suggested the power that overcomes the enemy. His name means "judge," or "judging," and he stands for the spirit of rule which must necessarily be realized through the lesson of self-rule, self-judgment, self-government, and this means the truth applied to the whole man. Little does Dan's history express this, rather is it entirely in contrast to what his character should be. It is this which makes what Jacob yearns for in speaking of him such a necessity—Jehovah's salvation. This alone can meet the condition in which man is found, unable to rule himself (or the creation over which he was set as head at the first), dominated by the evil of his own heart, carried about by every wind of Satanic influence, he shows a character and power like that of the serpent. Self-judgment, self-government alone become possible through submission to another will and power, that of God revealed in Christ. Thus man comes into his true place and dignity —the enemy overcome, mastery through grace secured, the dominion of sin broken as made free by the Son. This is the first step in the cycle of divine blessing and perfection.

It quite naturally leads to the second as expressed in Asher, "the happy," for this man becomes when once reconciled to God by the death of His Son. As thus turned from Satan unto God, he enters the kingdom of the Son of God's love. There he enjoys fellowship with Him, finding in His shadow rapture and rest, His fruit sweet to our taste and His banner over us love (Song ii. 3, 4, New Trans.). Truly of such it can be said, as of Asher, "His bread shall be fat, and he shall yield royal dainties" (Gen. xlix. 20). Jehovah's salvation brings us the bread of life, the food of the mighty. His blessing is that of living fruit, brotherly fellowship, spiritual power in walk,

> And the five thousand that are left in the breadth in front of the five and twenty thousand, shall be a common [place] for the city, for dwellings and for suburbs; and the city shall be in the midst thereof. And these shall be the measures thereof: the north side, four thousand and five hundred, and the south side, four thousand and five hundred, and the east side, four thousand and five hundred, and the west side, four thousand and five hundred. And the suburbs of the city and divine strength, as we may learn from the blessing of Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 24, 25). "It is of immense importance that the people of God should be known as a 'happy' people. If 'the joy of the Lord is your strength,' then happiness must have for the soul a large spiritual value. As a testimony to God it can be no less. One of the characteristics of the true 'circumcision,' as given by the apostle, is that they 'rejoice in Christ Jesus:' and his exhortation to the same people is, 'Rejoice in the Lord; and again, I say, Rejoice' (Phil. iii. 3; iv. 4). Such joy is one of the best signs that the knowledge of the gospel has reached the heart, and that the life will be governed by it. It is quite true that feelings may be put in a wrong place, as in the first quest of peace they are almost sure to be. There is plenty of need for insisting on the truth that we are not justified by feeling but by faith. Nay, it is certain that the reception of the gospel with immediate joy is made by the Lord Himself a sign rather of stony-ground hearing than of a fruitful reception of the Word (Matt. xiii. 20). Plowing up must be before the seed can spring up aright; repentance before God will accompany 'faith in our Lord Jesus Christ' where the latter is real and effective. This is all true; yet, on the other hand, it is no less true that the effect of the gospel—the 'glad tidings'—is to produce gladness, and that the apostle prays for believers that 'the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing' (Rom. xv. 13). The third character of the 'kingdom of God' he gives, after 'righteousness and peace,' is 'joy in the Holy Ghost' (ch. xiv. 17). 'The fruit of the Spirit is' said to be 'love, joy, peace' (Gal. v. 22). 'And not only so, but we joy in God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the reconciliation' (Rom. v. 11). These passages, of course, define the happiness which they speak of, so that it is impossible to confound it with the mere play of animal spirits, or even the happiness derivable from the hope of salvation. One might have this last, and yet in fact be unsaved. 'Joy in God through Christ' is something perfectly distinct and infinitely higher" (Joshua, Notes, pp. 145, 146). In this connection another lesson may be noticed in Asher following Dan. If Dan speaks of self-rule, self-judgment, we know this means exercise of heart and conscience, and these are essential to the maintenance of a happiness worthy of the name.

This brings us to Naphtali which means "my wrestling," not so much with the idea of this going on but as having reached a conclusion in victory, bringing freedom. It expresses the blessedness of that new place in which man finds himself, as Moses declares of Naphtali, "satisfied with favor, and full with the blessing of the

> shall be toward the north, two hundred and fifty, and toward the south, two hundred and fifty, and toward the east, two hundred and fifty, and toward the west, two hundred and fifty. And the residue in length, alongside the holy heave offering, shall be ten thousand eastward and ten thousand westward: it shall be alongside the holy Lord," so that he becomes as "a hind let loose," all fear removed, and the tongue loosed to give goodly words which are the sacrifices of the lips confessing His name (Heb. xiii. 15). Is not this the first-fruits of the Spirit, the blessing and triumph of Romans 8? This fittingly fills the third place in the cycle of perfection and completeness.

Following on we come to Manasseh, "forgetting"—not in a mere negative sense, but after the manner of the apostle who was "forgetting the things behind," as absorbed with the glory opened through faith to the vision of his mind and the affections of his heart. Thus for him the rule became, "For me to live is Christ." Naphtali leads us to Manasseh, to that soleness of object and whole-heartedness of life which finds its portion in the things above, the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. This is the manner of walk that results from being in the sanctuary where, like Naphtali, we are made "full with the blessing of the Lord."

Is it any wonder that Ephraim, "fruitfulness," comes next? It must, it ever does, in such a cycle of blessing as we are considering, and since Manasseh and Ephraim are the sons of Joseph we may turn to what is said of him to learn more fully what belongs to them (Gen. xlix. 22-26; Deut. xxxiii. 13-17). Plainly Christ is very much before us in Joseph, and what is the fruitbearing of the divine life in man but the being conformed to His image, changed from glory to glory by the power and energy of the Spirit's transforming work? The wealth of figure and expression used to tell the portion of Joseph, and so of Manasseh and Ephraim, witnesses to the greatness of the abiding power, grace, and blessing reached as we advance in the knowledge of God's thoughts concerning the perfection and completeness of His redeemed people.

Our course brings us to Reuben with whom the excellency and dignity of sonship in its virgin freshness find expression. Such was man unfallen, fresh from the hand of God; but he showed himself unstable as water; like Reuben he fell. But Moses can say, "Let Reuben live and not die, and let not his men be few." Though worthy of death, the way of life has been opened to sinful man, and now by faith in Christ Jesus he receives that sonship which is of higher order and richer blessing than the dignity lost through sin. It is "according to the good pleasure of His will, to the praise of the glory of His grace, wherein He has taken us into favor in the Beloved: in whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of offences, according to the riches of His grace." This is victory indeed, so Reuben fitly fills the sixth place.

We end with Judah, "praise." "We find the spirit of praise is that of power—necessarily, because God is exalted in it. It is what the fiftieth psalm challenges on His part from His people: 'Offer unto God thanksgiving, and pay thy vows unto the Most High....

> heave offering; and the increase thereof shall be for food for them that labor in the city. And they that labor in the city out of all the tribes of Israel shall till it. The whole heave offering shall be five and twenty thousand by five and twenty thousand; ye shall offer the holy heave offering foursquare with the possession of the city.

whoso offereth praise glorifieth Me.' It is this which marks the life that comes from God, that it turns back to God again; and the joy of the Lord is ever its principle of strength. A simple lesson, but, oh, that it were learnt! The 'wine' in the portion of Judah is the sign of a joy in which there can be no excess; and the milk may show that here there is not merely stimulus, but nourishment as well, and that in the form in which the merest babe may find it" (Genesis, Notes, p. 129). Throughout Scripture praise is presented as a marked characteristic of God's redeemed people; it brings us to the completeness of that salvation with which we began in Dan. Let us also remember that the spirit of praise is the spirit of obedience, for it is to be rendered with the understanding, with the soul, and with the whole heart in uprightness, the whole man is to be in the power of it, and this means to find God with us, for He delights to dwell amid the praises of His people. When the heart is thus fixed, and God fills it, it will be His throne; His judgments will be known and His Word kept. Then the place of our inheritance will be found in immediate connection with the Sanctuary as with Judah here, his border joins that of the holy heave-offering where the throne-house of Jehovah stands.

In this cycle of blessing we have traced precious truths of God's great love and grace which apply to all who are His redeemed, to all to whom the new covenant is made good, as it is to us now and will be to Israel in that coming day to which Ezekiel's vision refers.

But we must now see what instruction we may gather from the second and southerly group of tribes. There the order is:

1. Benjamin. 2. Simeon. 3. Issachar.
4. Zebulun. 5. Gad.

In the first group of seven we learn the glorious perfection of the position grace gives. It is God's purposes and work whereby new creation is accomplished. This is a real bringing out of darkness into His own marvelous light, and thus we reach the Sanctuary as we move onward from Judah. Passing through its holy precincts we come to this second group which, as a second, we might expect to teach us, as already remarked, lessons of relationship and fellowship regarding the divine life. Being a series of five it should show how God (1) is found with His saved creature (4) for the control of its way, the strength of its life, and the enlargement of its capacity to know Himself through the union thus established in His grace. This of necessity brings into the meaning of this number creature-responsibility and the exercise occasioned by being under the government of God. So from the precincts of the Sanctuary we enter Benjamin, "son of the right hand." This suggests the place of power and privilege in known relationship. Moses declares his blessing, "The beloved of Jehovah shall dwell in safety by Him: He shall cover him all day long, and he shall dwell between His shoulders." Here is dearness, nearness, security, the overshadowing of Almighty power, and rest as borne up on the shoulders of infinite love. True as this is in a special way of the Church, it will be Israel's special glory too in the coming age. But all of this for us is connected with the truth of Christ in us, for because we are sons God has sent forth the Spirit of His Son into our hearts, and in this is all our power on earth for the activities of the divine life in fellowship with God whom we now know as Father. It is thus we come to know Christ lives in us, and we not only glory in Him, but we accept Him for ourselves, God having accepted Him for us.

> And the rest shall be for the prince, on the one side and on the other of the holy heave offering and of the possession of the city, in front of the five and twenty thousand of the heave offering toward the east border, and westward in front of the five and twenty thousand toward the west border, answering to the portions: it shall be for the prince; and the holy heave offering and the sanctuary of the house shall be in the midst thereof. And from the possession of the Levites and from the possession of the city, being in the midst of that which shall be the prince's, between the border of Judah and the border of Benjamin, shall be for the prince.

Easily enough we pass to Simeon, "hearing." This suggests communion, Mary's place at the feet of Jesus hearing His word. "Blessed is the man that heareth Me, watching daily at My gates, waiting at the posts of My doors" (Prov. viii. 34). In this Wisdom speaks, but we know that Christ is the wisdom of God, and that He has been made wisdom unto us; and He is the Word. To thus hear is to delight ourselves in Him. It is truly the way of life, and this leads us into what is connected with Issachar.

From Jacob's prophecy we see that Issachar stands for yoke-bearing, though evidently in a slavery that speaks of fleshly indulgence and the vain reward of sin's pleasure for a season. Here, however, we are rather to think of deliverance through grace from such servitude, as coming to the One whose loving voice calls us to hear and find the true rest. Thus coming under His yoke and learning from Him (Matt. xi. 29, New Trans.)—the meek and lowly One who stooped to bear our burden and carry our sorrows, even unto death, the death of the cross—we enter a new service, sanctified by the word of truth we have heard and received, finding in this way the true reward, for "If any man will serve Me, him will My Father honor." Isaachar means, "There is reward." Thus the blessing of Issachar is realized, for, as Moses declares, he sounds God's call to the peoples to come to "the mountain," surely the mountain of the Lord's house, there to offer the sacrifices of righteousness, a service, a yoke-bearing so different from that of the past, both for Issachar and those to whom he carries the invitation. And this is ever the order according to God, that communion (Simeon) should issue in such service. The heart that is full of the Word must overflow in ministry to others, calling them to the place where the fulness of God is found. Issachar, then, in this third place may well speak of walking in the Spirit, sanctified by Him by means of the Word of truth so that we manifest in our walk His fruit. In this our true recompense, "reward," will be found both now and for eternity.

5 (23-29): The tribes south of the sacred Oblation

5. And as for the rest of the tribes: from the east side unto the west side, Benjamin one [portion]. And by the border of Benjamin from the east side unto the west side, Simeon one. And by the border of Simeon, from the east side unto the west side, Issachar one. And by the border of Issachar, from the east side unto the west side, Zebulun one. And by the border of Zebulun, from the east side unto the west side, Gad one. And by the border of Gad, at the south side southward, the border shall be from Tamar to the waters of Meribah-Kadesh, by the torrent, unto the great sea. This is the land which ye shall divide by lot unto the tribes of Israel for inheritance, and these are their portions, saith the Lord Jehovah.

The Lord assures those who take His yoke and learn from Him that they will find rest unto their souls, and so we pass into Zebulun, "dwelling with," a doing so in intimacy, as Leah's words intimate when giving this name. "For where I am there will My servant be also." Is not this John xiv.? "If any one love Me, he will keep My word (this indeed is what the communion of Simeon and the service of Issachar involve), and My Father will love him, and We will come and make our abode with him." Because the apostle so well knew this "dwelling with," he could say out of the richness of his experience, "My God shall abundantly supply all your need according to His riches in glory in Christ Jesus." What a rich gathering of precious and priceless store this means, and so we end this series with Gad, "a gatherer:" a glorious fifth in which the need of the creature is supplied out of the exhaustless treasuries of the divine glory! Alongside the ever-abiding sufficiency of God we have the two governing principles for His people by which sufficency is appropriated — dependence and obedience. "Be careful about nothing; but in everything, by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known to God; and the peace of God that surpasses every understanding, shall guard your hearts and your thoughts by Christ Jesus...What ye have both learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me, do; and the God of peace shall be with you" (Phil. iv. 6-9).

Thus we reach Gad, the place of increase, for that thought is associated with the meaning of his name. Our truest and fullest enlargement must be found in being with God, who did not spare His own Son that with Him we might receive all things. It is of His fulness that we receive, and grace upon grace.

6 (30-35) The gates of the city

6. And these are the goings out of the city. On the north side, four thousand and five hundred by measure. And the gates of the city shall be after the names of the tribes of Israel: three gates northward: the gate of Reuben, one; the gate of

6. We are now told about the gates of the city.* They are named after the twelve tribes. It is a city in which all have their part and special interest. All ancient jealousies, all strife for place, are over; unity and concord prevail with each one in his ordered place. What we have just considered will help us to the understanding of the spiritual meaning.

We may note that Manasseh and Ephraim have their gate in Joseph. This permits Levi to have a gate bearing his name. Here, too, the association of the tribal names is different from the order of succession in the land. The prominent lesson here would appear to be in connection with the side on which they occur—north, east, south, or west. In placing the names it seems clear that we are to begin at the west corner of the north side and proceed eastward, so passing around the entire city.

We have had occasion to consider the quarters of the heaven in the book of Numbers in connection with the encampment of the tribes around the Tabernacle (Vol. 1, pp. 388-393). The significance there given we may use here: "The north (tsaphon) means 'what is hidden,' and the reason why the north is called so is because to those living in the northern hemisphere the sun travels through the southern heavens, and the north side of anything is the dark side. Naturally the north itself would be contemplated as the seat of darkness, the abode of gloom and mystery....And this mystery, how it assaults us! From the north come the most frequent attacks upon the land, and from it will come the final attack (Ezek. xxxviii., xxxix.). In the sides of the north the Babylonian apostate makes his seat and utters his defiance of the Almighty (Isa. xiv.). We must not imagine this to be without significance. Nothing in Scripture is; and it is by putting things together that we perceive a meaning which taken by themselves such things might seem to lack. Certainly in the place of mystery it is that apostasy and infidelity intrench themselves most securely; while upon the forehead of Babylon the Great there is also written 'Mystery.'" Thus the north tells of mystery, the power of evil, the judgment of God, His ways in providence too, which so often awaken exercise and leave man in his wisdom utterly baffled, and, as we have also seen, it is the place of slaying the sacrifice which speaks of the cross with all its horror of great darkness, but through which after all we come into the knowledge of the wisdom and power of God, so the dark shadow is lifted from His face and there is light from Him which "removes all guilty fear and love begets." In this quarter we get Reuben, the excellency of sonship, with which there is the blessed unfolding of the purposes of God, and Judah, for all of this is to the praise of His glory, yea, the glory of His grace, making His people an ever thankful and praising people. They have a triumph-song to sing in the face of the north, for God is for us, and who can separate us from His

* See Diagram of the city gates in the Appendix.

> Judah, one; the gate of Levi, one. And at the east side, four thousand and five hundred, and three gates: even the gate of Joseph, one; the gate of Benjamin, one; the gate of Dan, one. And at the south side, four thousand and five love which is in Christ Jesus our Lord? So we now have Levi, "joined." Forevermore it is Christ and those who are His, His companions, co-heirs, ever together with Him who is the Firstborn among many brethren, the Captain of salvation with His host of sons, all things with Him. Glorious truth! How it thrills the soul and fills the lips with praise "to Him who loves us, and has washed us from our sins in His blood, and made us a kingdom, priests to His God and Father: to Him be the glory and the might to the ages of ages. Amen!"

We turn to the east, which we have already seen is connected with the glory of God. There the sun rises, and this always suggests the idea of joy and blessing with the returning day. But the word for east is qedem, "what faces," or "confronts" you, and thus, as nearly as may be, resembles our word "adversity" from the Latin, "what is toward" you, only in a hostile manner. The qadim, the "east wind," is the dry and parching wind from the desert, as the west wind is literally the sea-wind, bringing moisture and rain. These two contrary thoughts to us as Christians so suggest one another that there is no difficulty in their connection. He who faces in earnest the evil of the world will have proportionately before him that appearing of Christ which will bring its long disorder to an end forever. The night is far spent, and the day is at hand; blessed be God, we who believe in Him are children of the day; "therefore," says the apostle, "let us cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light" (Rom. xiii. 12). In this quarter we have Joseph, beautiful type of Christ in all the lowly grace of His humiliation, and then the surpassing glory of His place at the right hand of the Majesty on high—the sufferings of Him who was separated from His brethren, and the glories that followed. These two things are in their measure true of the redeemed, for they learn to suffer with Him and are glorified together, then shall they be conformed perfectly to His image: here the lessons of Manasseh and Ephraim combine, for in the light of the glory and as absorbed with it, pressing forward to it, we "forget" the adverse and evil world, with the result that the mind of Christ possesses us and we become "fruitful" in the power of the Spirit. Benjamin follows—"Christ in us the hope of glory," so there is present power to overcome: and lastly on this side, Dan who stands for the spirit of rule and judgment. Only do we form a right judgment of the world and of ourselves as we enter into what Joseph and Benjamin speak of, and so too learn how to rule, thereby gaining capacity to rule with Him in the day of glory when the Sun of Righteousness has arisen, bringing an end to all opposition. How good to be familiar with the gateways that enter eastward, as well as those of the north.

We have had occasion to speak of the south as indicative of relaxing influences, of the way of the world and the pleasures of sin by which men seek to escape from dependence upon and exercise under the hand of God. But this only brings spiritual drought, the soul is > hundred by measure and three gates: the gate of Simeon, one; the gate of Issachar, one; the gate of Zebulun, one. At the west side, four thousand and five hundred, and their three gates: the gate parched and barrenness results. In accord with this the word for south is negeb which means "to be parched," and is applied to the south because of its drought. In this connection we may well think of the discipline of God as exercised over His people, by which they come to know Him better and are made partakers of His holiness and serve Him in righteousness. The patriarchs in their wanderings southward learned these ways of God, and so do we. Here, then, we first have Simeon, "hearing," and we cannot help but think of that word, "Hear ye the rod, and who hath appointed it" (Mic. vi. 9). Submission leads into communion, of which Simeon speaks, and this to that obedient, willing service that brings reward (Issachar): then we find the green pastures and still waters whither our Shepherd leads by rod and staff where we rest with Him (Zebulun).

Turning westward we face the sea. "Westward in Hebrew means 'toward the sea.' And the sea is preeminently in Scripture, as in nature, the type of trouble and unrest, which the word itself signifies in the original. We have seen it in the six days' work the type of the evil within us, and which remains in us though regenerate, limited, however, by divine grace. It is the evil, moreover, in the negative rather than its positive aspect, and the west wind, as the sea-wind, differs from the east wind, the wind of the desert, in this way. It comes not to wither, but rather loaded with the moisture that revives and refreshes the earth. This is the answer of heaven to the appeal of man's misery, even though that misery be in a certain sense identified with his sin. As the heaven draws from the bosom of the sea itself the vapors which it pours out again upon the land, so grace is that with which God in sovereign goodness has answered our sin, and the occasion of which has been the very sin itself; for only in a world of sinners could He show grace. How full and exact are these natural types when we come to analyze them." It is just out of this that we are able to gather our increase (Gad, "a gatherer"), and find our genuine happiness (Asher, "happy"), and in our wrestling overcome, finding victory over all the subtle influences of this world's things, learn in fact not to love them, as John speaks, and that our faith is the victory that gets the victory over the world.

Perhaps we should not pass without notice the oft-repeated measurement of each side—4,500 (45 [5x9] x 10x10). Here nine appears as an important factor. As being 3x3 it signifies the full manifestation of what is divine, its complete display. It has been suggested that as the last of the digits it signifies the end or conclusion of a matter. This brings in the idea of perfection and completeness (7), to which competent testimony (2) is given in the display. This fits well with Ezekiel's vision in which we have traced the summation of God's thoughts as to man's blessing in relation with Himself. So in another way it is all that five speaks of added to the four—the number of the creature and creation. This again is intensified by five, making the forty-five, and this whole is multiplied twice by ten of Gad, one; the gate of Asher, one; the gate of Naphtali, one. It shall be eighteen thousand round about.

7 (35): The Name of the City

7. And the [a]name of the city from that day shall be, [b]Jehovah is there.

[a] cf. Jer. 23. 6; 33. 16. Isa. 78 7; 62. 2, 12 Deut. 12. 5; 16. 2, 6, 11; 26. 2.
[b] cf. Jer 3.17; ch. 37 26-28. Isa. 60. 9 11. Joel 3. 17, 21; Zech. 8. 3; Rev. 21. 3.

—a full and competent witness to the accomplishment of divine order in all relations Godward and manward. This shows us the character of the Millennial metropolis, and the government of the kingdom; this agrees with the general testimony of Scripture. The same thoughts appear in the final measurement, "It shall be 18,000 round about" (18 [9x2] x 10 x 10 x 10).

7. The name of the city — JEHOVAH SHAMMAH — Jehovah is there.

APPENDIX

THE LOCATION OF THE SANCTUARY AND THE ALLOTMENT OF THE LAND.*

The location of the Sanctuary and the arrangement of the tribes in relation to it, are given in chap. 48. We begin at the north with Dan, and six tribes follow him in succession toward the south (vers. 1-7). Then we have what is called "the heave offering." This has three main parts, and these claim special consideration since they are in immediate relation to the Sanctuary. Five tribes follow this "heave offering," thus completing the division to the southern limits of the land.

The "heave offering" is of first importance since the Sanctuary enclosure is within its bounds. It is foursquare, 25,000 by 25,000, divided into three main parts; 25,000 by 10,000 for the priests, 25,000 by 10,000 for the Levites, and 25,000 by 5,000 for the city and environs. Then the Prince's portion is mentioned as being on the east and west of this great square, reaching to the eastern and western boundaries of the land. The Sanctuary enclosure is in the priests' portion. While these numbers are given, a question at once confronts us: are they reeds or cubits? In the text of chapter 48 this is not stated. Can it be determined from other parts of the vision?

In chap. 45:1-8 we find another detailed specification of the several parts which form this heave offering, but here again the reed and the cubit are not mentioned in giving the dimensions, with one exception; 50 cubits are allowed as open space around the 500 by 500 (something) for the Sanctuary (ver. 2). That cubits are mentioned in the one item seems to imply that the measures in the other cases are of a different denomination. Turning now to chap. 42:15-20 we are told that after completing the measurement of the inner house, the prophet was brought toward the gate fronting east. Here a space with a wall was measured as being 500 by 500 reeds. This made a separation between what was holy and what was common. This appears to determine the allotted space of chap. 45:2 to be 500 reeds, surrounded by a free or open space of 50 cubits.* If this conclusion is correct then we may determine that the other measurements are to be taken as reeds. This conclusion seems the only reasonable one when we consider that 5,000 by 5,000 (something) is given for the city (48:15, 17). If these were cubits the city would be no more than about 1.136 miles square—a very insignificant place of little more than one and a quarter square miles. Taking the measurement as reeds—the reed is six cubits, 40:5; 43:13—we have a city more fitting in size to the glory of the millennial kingdom: it would be about 6.81 miles square, or cover nearly 47 square miles.†

* See Map in the following pages.

Before going further let us consider the size of the cubit used in determining these dimensions. We know the cubit was used in Babylonia and Egypt. In the latter there is evidence of its use from very early times in two forms—the common or commercial cubit of six handbreadths, and the royal one of seven handbreadths. Ezekiel specifies the cubit used in measuring the Sanctuary as a cubit and a handbreadth, which some think points to a measure similar to the Egyptian royal cubit of seven handbreadths. From the monuments and other remains a length of 17.68 inches has been fixed for the Egyptian short cubit, and 20.63 for the long. It is not possible to determine that the Hebrew cubit was identical with that of Egypt, and it does not seem probable, for if either of these cubits is used to determine the measurements of the oblation, it is not possible to place this allotment within the boundaries of the land itself as given in chap. 47.

This "holy heave offering foursquare with the possession of the city" [i.e., the 25,000 by 20,000, plus 25,000 by 5,000] (ver. 20) is bounded on the north by Judah, and on the south by Benjamin (48:8, 22, 23; see map); but from ver. 8 it would appear that this holy offering is part of another and somewhat larger offering, not specifically called holy, which while 25,000 reeds in breadth from north to south, and thus exactly the same as the holy heave offering in this direction, is "in length as one of the parts [i.e., of the tribes] from

---

* These 50 cubits that surround the Sanctuary plot would appear to be for the purpose of preventing the priests' houses being built against the enclosing wall. This impresses the lesson of the sanctity of the Sanctuary precincts, the separation from anything relatively common, a fundamental lesson of these visions.

† The fact, too, that Levi, one of the tribes, has his entire inheritance as part of the heave offering (10,000 x 25,000) argues for the reed against the cubit. Were it the latter he would not have more than 15 square miles, while all the other tribes would have from about 800 to over 1,000 square miles, as shown on the map.

the east side unto the west side." This larger offering, then, extended from the Mediterranean Sea on the west to the eastern boundary of the land, or in other words, to the Jordan and the Dead Sea; and this larger offering included the holy heave offering of 25,000 by 25,000 reeds with the Prince's portions, one on each side, extending from the line of the holy offering to the east and west borders of the land, and stretching from the border of Judah to that of Benjamin. This appears clear from vers. 20-23. In fact no other arrangement seems possible if we follow the requirements of the text. These verses also confirm another point—the location of the priests' portion. The Sanctuary, it is said, is in the midst of the offering (vers. 8, 21). From chap. 45:3, 4 we know that the Sanctuary was in the priests' portion, which was 25,000 by 10,000, and therefore this must be the central division of the holy heave offering since the Sanctuary is in the midst of the whole offering. Then on one side of this is the Levites' portion, also 25,000 by 10,000; and on the other the city and its possessions—25,000 by 5,000. As to whether the Levites were on the north side, and the city on the south, or the reverse, we will consider a little later.

Now, as already mentioned, the west side is the Great Sea, the Mediterranean (47:20); and the east side is formed by the Jordan and the East, or Dead, Sea: that is, at that part of the land where this offering would be located. This then limits the 25,000 to the territory between these established boundaries. We have taken the 25,000 to be reeds, and this would be equivalent to 150,000 cubits. If these cubits are calculated of the longer Egyptian form, the 25,000 reeds would equal slightly less than 49 miles. This would extend west to east, beyond the limits of the land by several miles. On the other hand if we limit the cubit to the common or smaller form, which is about 18 inches, the plot of 25,000 reeds would just fall within the prescribed boundaries, but leaves no land for the Prince which, as we have already determined, is on the east and west sides of the offering between the border of Judah and the border of Benjamin.

To solve this problem I have adopted the sizes of the cubit given by Dr. W. Shaw Caldecott. He has given this subject of measurement an exhaustive examination. He says,

> "It is a commonly held opinion that the cubit of the Bible is one of eighteen inches in length. This is based on the fact of its being the common denominator of all the spaces in the best known of Babylonian ruins . . . In the absence of later and fuller light upon the matter, it has, therefore, been understood that the cubit of the Bible was half a yard in length. But further light is derivable from the other three columns of the Senkereh Tablet.* This does not contradict, but confirms the evidence already before us, and adds to it the additional information that an 18-inch cubit was not the only one used; but that there were two others of lesser length, all three of which were commensurate with one another.

"The second column of the tablet (the first having been devoted to the palm†) is limited to the various extensions of the palm into an ell, or cubit, of three palms. This is that which is represented on the statue of Gudea,‡ the cardinal fact in relation to these two antiques being, that the fractions, formed by the cuts in the stone, are those which are represented by the figures and hieroglyphs of the clay tablet. This coincidence—often repeated—is the proof that both these spoils of the pick-axe and the spade belong to one system of measures, and that they are complementary to one another. By their collation and agreement, it has been established, nemine contradicente, that in Babylonia there were three ells [or, cubits], respectively of 3, 4 and 5 palms' length; the evidence on this behalf being completed by the fact that the third column of the tablet is one of 4 palms', and the fourth column one of 5 palms'.

"We thus obtain, from a fundamental palm-breadth of 3.6 inches, the three measures of 10.8, 14.4 and 18 inches."

Dr. Caldecott is of the opinion that these measures were those of Palestine, and that they were used in the construction of the Tabernacle and Solomon's Temple.

"Care, however, must be taken to observe the rule that each of the three cubits is confined to its own department—the larger to land spaces, the middle to buildings, and the smallest to gold work."

These considerations show that we have three cubits of which the shortest one, that of three handbreadths, or palms, equalling 10.8 inches, is the fundamental or basic measure. With this system of measures Ezekiel would doubtless be quite familiar either from the knowledge of its use in Palestine, or acquaintance with it through

---

* This tablet is a small square of unbaked clay, 7½ inches by 5¾ inches in size, written on both sides of its upper and under surfaces, in closely packed rows and columns of figures. These divide themselves, on the one side, into four separate columns, each of six perpendicular rows of numerals and mathematical characters. It is in these four columns of cuneiform that we find the fuller light by which we detect three cubits of different lengths, each used in its own department of work.

† A basic measure of 3.6 inches.

‡ "In the year 1881, a French explorer in Babylonia discovered, in the courtyard of an ancient palace, a number of headless statues. These are now in the Louvre Museum. One of the sitting figures has on his knees a slab bearing the ground plan of an early royal residence, which stood on the same site as that in which it was found. On this slab, of hard diorite, is engraved a representation of the measure by which the palace was built. This measure was found, on examination, to have been ten and four-fifths English inches in length, and to have been divided into two main portions, one of which is twice the length of the other. The smaller portion is thus 3.6 inches [or, one palm], and the larger, 7.2 inches in length [or, two palms, so that this measure of three palms is equivalent to the smallest of the three ells, or cubits, found on the Senkereh mathematical tablet]."

his long residence in Babylonia. Now he is quite explicit in stating what is the unit of measurement in his visions of the Sanctuary, and in fact no other unit is given, whether it be the record of the building measurements, or those of the holy heave offering, so that we appear warranted in adopting the same basis throughout these visions of the Temple and the land. The unit he gives us is "a measuring reed of six cubits, of a cubit and a handbreadth each," and again he says, "the cubit is a cubit and a handbreadth" (40:5; 43:13). Taking the smallest cubit as the basic measure, we may conclude that Ezekiel's unit of a cubit and a handbreadth is equivalent to this smallest cubit of three palms or handbreadths plus one handbreadth, or in other words that it is the same as the middle cubit of 14.4 *inches. Let us now apply this conclusion to the measurements of the holy heave offering, and see if it enables us to solve the difficulty referred to in a previous paragraph.

Upon this basis of measurement the holy heave offering with the city portion forms a great square of 34 miles, having an area of about 1160 square miles. Within its bounds centre all the interests of the Divine worship and government as established on the earth. There the Sanctuary, the holy of holies, and the city are situated with all the attendant ministers and servants of both. Here we have the mountain of Jehovah's House to which all nations shall come (Isa. 2; Micah 4). Now by reference to the map we see at once that on this basis of measure the holy heave offering is of such a size that it falls within the prescribed boundaries of the land, and allows a suitable portion on both the east and west side for the possession of the Prince. This result, as already stated, is impossible by the use of either the royal Egyptian cubit, or the smaller and common cubit of 18 inches, for in the former case the holy heave offering extends beyond the actual limits of the land, and in the latter, though it falls just within those limits, it leaves no portion for the Prince. To adopt the middle cubit solves this difficulty, and enables us to keep within the requirements of the text.†

---

* This cubit, Dr. Caldecott has determined, is the one used for building work, and so would seem the suitable unit for the prophet to mention, while since no other is given when land measures are recorded, it seems only reasonable to use the same unit throughout. This also appears justified by the results of its application, as I go on to show.

† Another argument in favor of the middle cubit, I find in calculating the height of the steps of the House. The elevation of the house above the altar court is specified as a full reed of six cubits, and the ascent is by 10 steps (41:8 and 40:49, according to the reading of the LXX). Thus the six cubits of height were divided into 10 steps, each being therefore six-tenths (.6) of a cubit. The middle cubit equals 14.4 inches, so that each step would be 8.64 inches high. This is a reasonable height for steps of such a structure. But to use a cubit of larger standard would make them objectionably high. Even the 18 inch cubit would make each step 10.8 inches, not to mention the still larger or royal Egyptian cubit of about 21 inches.

Here a word of explanation must be given for a departure from the location of the Offering as usually given by Commentators. It has been customary to place it just north of the Dead Sea, and (because of calculating it by larger cubits) permitting it to extend across the Jordan, so going beyond the east boundary. This doubtless seemed necessary to allow for the Prince's portion on the west, but of course this placed both part of the holy offering and the Prince's portion beyond the limits of the land on the east. As already explained these difficulties are overcome by using the smaller cubit. In addition to this change the present writer also thinks it is better to place the Offering between the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea, as shown on the map. His reason for this change from the usual location is found in the prophecy of Zechariah, which states that the land is to be a great plain from Geba to Rimmon south of Jerusalem (14:10). He found that the Offering measured by the smaller cubit so closely fitted the territory between these points as almost to be exact. Geba is about six miles north of Jerusalem, and Rimmon is identified with Umm er Ramamin, about 30 miles south of Jerusalem. The map shows that the Offering as calculated on the basis of the smaller cubit may be so placed that its northern and southern boundaries touch Geba and Rimmon respectively. It may also be noted that to pass through these points the Offering must be placed at the angle shown on the map, making the northern and eastern lines of the great square run east with an inclination of 4° to the south.*

---

* In this connection it has been a matter of interest to consider the identification of Ramet-el-Khulil, a spot close to Hebron (see map), with the Ramah of Samuel's altar where Saul feasted with the prophet and was informed of his selection to be king. It is a location of sacred memories, for within an hour's walk of this Ramah is the ancient city of Kirjath-Arba, afterwards called Hebron, where three of the Patriarchs are buried.

The interest in this identification of Ramah chiefly lies in the finding at this location a large walled enclosure which evidently served as a place of sacrifice and worship. It is taken to be the high place of 1 Sam. 9:11-13, etc. Here, that is to Ramah, Samuel returned after his yearly circuit, "for there was his house, and there he judged Israel; and there he built an altar to Jehovah" (1 Sam. 7: 17).

The structure referred to has been carefully examined and measured, with the result that it is found to be an enclosed space of 100 x 145 cubits, consisting of a court 100 cubits square with the additional space of 100 x 45 cubits divided into three parts of different levels, and these give evidence of being used for the work of the sacrifices and the ablutions of the priests, a well being in one corner, while niches in the wall seem to indicate the location of stone tables for preparing the sacrifices, similar to those specified by Ezekiel in connection with the North Gate of the inner court. The entrance to this enclosure was by an eastern gateway.

Dr. Caldecott, to whom reference has been made, thoroughly investigated this site. He has presented convincing evidence for its identification with this notable centre of religion and government in Samuel's day.

I call particular attention to the fact that a survey of this walled enclosure shows that it was built with "the north and south walls running east with an inclination of 4 degrees to the south, as recorded in the third volume of the

A further indication that this is the location of the heave offering may be found in the direction of the stream which issues from the House (47:1, 2, 8). This goes out toward the east country, down into the plain or Arabah (the name of the depression of the Jordan Valley, the Dead Sea, and southward to the Gulf of Akaba: see map), and into the sea, that is, the Dead Sea. In the location usually given to the Offering this stream, flowing east, would enter the River Jordan, not the Sea; but in the location here given the requirements are all met.

Another question remains. The holy heave offering is divided into three main parts, and we have before determined that the priests' portion is the central division; on which side then, are we to place the Levitical portion and that of the city? First, we may notice that in the location I have given to the Offering, the ancient city of Jerusalem lies in its northern part; then the distance between Geba and Jerusalem is about six miles, and the 5,000 reeds allotted for the city of Ezekel's vision is equal to 6.81 miles. This along with the fact that the prophecies do not intimate any change of site for the Millennial city, but rather maintain identity all through, seem to suggest that we are to place the city and its environs on the north side of the priests' portion. If we thus locate it on the north side of this great uplifted plain, the mountain of the Lord's house, may we not think of this answering to the Psalmist's description of the city of the future: "Great is Jehovah, and greatly to be praised in the city of our God, His holy hill. Beautiful in elevation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion, on the sides of the north,

---

Survey of Western Palestine." This appears as the angle of inclination which fits the placement of the heave offering of Ezekiel between Geba and Rimmon (see map). Perhaps this has some significance, or is it mere coincidence?

It may not be amiss to quote briefly from Dr. Caldecott as to this very interesting site. He says:

"The special ruin to which I refer is a large rectangular ground-figure enclosed within monolithic stone walls, standing near to, though not visible from, the ancient highway leading from Jerusalem to Hebron. Countless travellers have looked on this mysterious handiwork of man with reverence and wonder. Each must have speculated as to who reared its massive masonry, and for what purpose. Archaeologists have agreed that we have not here the remains of a church. Nor could these low walls of solid stone have been those of any military fortification, as the work is of too refined and time-engrossing a character to have been done for purposes of war . . . the four walls which formed the enclosure [are not perfect]. That on the south side is in almost unbroken condition, many of its stones being 12 and 15 feet in length, laid without mortar, and truly squared. The west wall is in fair condition, as is a portion on the north side. The east wall has almost completely disappeared, though its line can still be traced. There is thus no difficulty in determining the size of the enclosure as originally constructed."

One surprising correspondence, I notice, between this structure and that of Ezekiel is found in the wall being 6 cubits high in both. Furthermore, Dr. Caldecott found that the cubit of 14.4 inches proved to be the common denominator of all the dimensions of original work still standing. (Quotations and references are from "The Tabernacle, its History and Structure," 2nd edition, by Dr. Caldecott.)

the city of the great King" (Ps. 48: 1, 2; Num. Bible). I have ventured to so show the city, placing the Levitical portion as the southern division of the Offering. In so placing the three parts of this Offering I am not forgetting that in the text where they are described the priests' portion is mentioned first, then the Levitical, and lastly the city, making it appear that such is the order from north to south. But as I have already pointed out, the Sanctuary is in the midst, and that being in the priests' part, necessitates making this the central division of the whole Offering. This seems to show that after specifying the whole Offering, the description follows along the line of the relative importance of the several parts, rather than giving their geographical order. From this point of view the order is quite natural, for certainly the priests' portion in which the Sanctuary is located is of first importance, while that of the Levites falls into the second place, both of these parts being considered distinctly holy; then lastly the part which is called "a common place for the city, for dwellings and for suburbs" (48:15). Thus the order of thought which governs throughout these visions governs in this also, namely, that what has to do with God, His holiness and glory, is always given first place. This is a lesson we may well take to heart, and consider our ways in its searching light, for who more than we should be ever careful to give Him His rightful place, caring for His honor, rendering happy obedience to His blessed will?

Without a doubt there are spiritual lessons to learn from the order and relation of the tribes, but these we will look at in their place.

As to the Sanctuary enclosure itself, this is shown by the outline plan. Full references to the text accompany this plan. The Gate buildings and the Temple itself are illustrated on separate plans drawn to a larger scale. Elevations of the buildings have not been attempted since measurements of height are not given. It is distinctly a plan which the prophet spreads out before us, for the only certain features of height are found in the number of steps specified for each court and the Temple square, except in the case of the altar.

SOME CONSTRUCTION DETAILS

As a help to understand the structure of the Gate-buildings, it may be useful to define some of the terms. First, the "threshold" is in Hebrew saph, a word suggesting the idea of a vestibule. "Lodge" is tah; it occurs only in Ezek. 40, 1 Kings 14: 28 and 2 Chron. 12:11, being rendered in the last two passages as "guard-chamber." The word therefore denotes a room of some kind. Tah is connected with a primitive root, meaning to mark off or out, used only in Num. 34:7, 8, for marking out the border of the land, and so we get the idea of a room that is marked out in some special way within a larger space. This suggests and appears to warrant arranging the lodges of the Gate-buildings as shown on the plan. This seems confirmed by the fact that the posts of these lodges are said to be "within the gate" (ver. 16). The word for posts is considered a little later.

A different word from tah is used for the chambers in the court, namely lishkah, which indicates a rather spacious room. Compare 1 Sam. 9:22. This word is from a root meaning to be joined, to adhere to, and so suitably describes the chambers around the court as being built in conjunction with its wall while also being connected or joined to each other in succession. The same word is used for the Chamber-buildings situated at the north and south sides of the separate place, doubtless because of similar construction and size.

Again a different word is used for the side-chambers of the House. It is tsalah, meaning a rib, literally of the body, or figuratively the sides or leaves of a double door; hence a side, and so architecturally, in the plural, ribs of a building, planks for wainscotting (1 Kings 6: 15; 7: 3): so this word fitly describes these side-chambers which like ribs or side planks go round the House.

"Porch" is ulam, from alam, which means "to tie fast," and so applies to a vestibule or porch as bound to the building.

"Post," or posts, is ayil, anything strong, and used for an oak or other strong tree, also for a ram, and architecturally a lintel as well as a post, or pilaster, as being a strong support. Thus it applies to a wall that projects forward, forming what serves as a partition or division, and also the jamb of an entry or doorway. This suggests that what is called the posts of the lodges "within the gate" are sections of wall projecting from the outer walls into the gate-building, so marking off these lodges from the surrounding space, an idea applicable to these lodges from the Hebrew word used for them, as we have seen. It is specified that these lodges and their posts had windows, and this would indicate that we are not to think of the posts as pillars or columns but sections of wall. (See plan in the following pages.)

"Border" is gebul. It is the usual word for border, that is, the boundary of any given territory. It is so used repeatedly in Ezek. 48, and elsewhere. That which is so called in the Gate-buildings is before the lodges and measured one cubit. This indicates something in the nature of a barrier, or fence, which marks off the lodges from the central corridor, so protecting them from encroachment on the part of the passing crowd. This would be necessary if, as supposed, these lodges were used by the guards or keepers of the gate. The entrances to them would seem to be in the outer walls, and so lead into the outer court. This conclusion is drawn from ver. 13 in which the total measurement across the gate is given, and the fact noted that entry is opposite entry.

Finally, we have the word rendered "projections." This is elam, and is probably from ayil for posts, a word we have already considered. In the text it occurs in the plural only, and is variously taken to mean a colonnade, or vestibules, porches, recesses. It is conceded to be a word difficult to understand and apply. From its use in this chapter (vers. 16, 21, 22, 24, 25, 26, 29, 30, 31, 33, 34, 36, uniformly rendered "projections" in the accompanying text) it is clearly distinguished from "posts." Whatever the word signifies has windows as mentioned in vers. 16, 25, 29, 33; an exception is the North inner gate, in connection with which they are not specified (ver. 36). Again, what this word signifies is said to be before the steps in the North and South gates of the outer court, but this is not said in connection with the East gate. As to the South and East gates of the inner court, what this word signifies is said to be toward the outer court; but as to the North gate no mention is made, and the text reads, "its posts toward the outer court"—the word for posts appearing instead of that rendered "projections" as in the other cases, although this word occurs in its usual connection in ver. 34 as compared with the description of the other gates. It may be further noted that in each instance there follows the mention of the steps, and this seems to bring them and whatever this word signifies into close relation. Ver. 30 gives the only dimensions of these so-called "projections." But another difficulty confronts us here. Of this verse, Davidson says, it "is wanting in the LXX and some MSS., and in others deleted. No object belonging to the gateways has hitherto been mentioned to which the measurements can apply. The verse may have arisen from an inaccurate repetition of the measurements given in the previous verse." In the text the word appears as plural, but he considers this form of doubtful authenticity, and says that there is no evidence that the word has any other sense than "porch." While to adopt this meets some of the difficulties, it does not solve all. If we take it to be singular, and to mean porch, then this determines that the porch of the inner gates is at the end toward the outer court; this apparently agrees with what is said of the porch of the North inner gate, for in vers. 38-42 the porch appears to be in close relation to the ascent or the steps of this gate; but when we come to the outer gates we find that what this word speaks of, and which Davidson considers should mean "porch," is also stated to be "before the steps," whereas the porch of these gates is specifically stated to be "toward the House" (ver. 9), which means at the inner end of the gate and not the front end where the steps are located; and further this inner location of the porch of these gates seems confirmed by what is said of the Prince who eats in it before the Lord (ch. 44: 3)—this would not be possible in the shut East gate if the porch was at the end where the steps ascend to it. In view of this, if we accept the suggestion and read "porch" for "projections," we must conclude that the outer gates had two porches, one at each end, while the inner gates had only one at the end toward the outer court. There seems nothing to warrant the former conclusion.

After all there seems no better solution than to consider the term to refer to the sections of wall which project from the posts within the gate which are between the lodges, and which therefore form the lodges and are joined by the posts (wall) which close these lodges toward the outer court, as indicated on the plan. This arrangement meets the several features already mentioned in regard to these parts, or, as we shall call them, "wall-projections." They are thus distinguished from the posts, and all have windows. They appear before the steps in the sense of facing one as the ascent is made, the steps being the full width of the gate-building. Then these wall-projections of the inner gates could be rightly specified as toward the outer court since these gates are situated wholly in that court (see outline plan). This item of information has its importance, for it establishes the location of these inner gates in reference to the courts. Apparently the one point of difference between the outer and inner gates is that in the latter the porch is situated at the outer end toward the outer court, and in the former at the inner end toward the House.

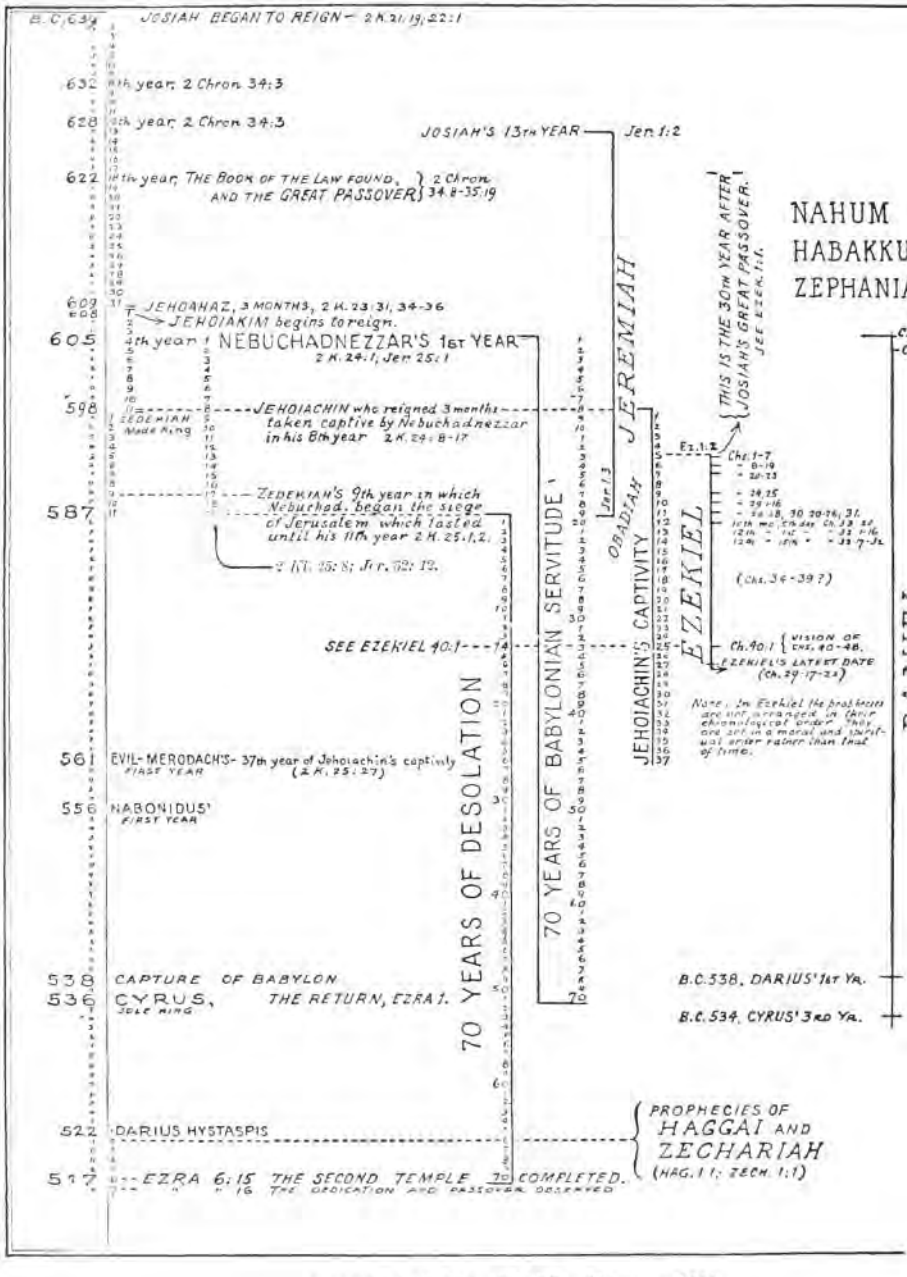
Two or three other points remain. Ver. 11 presents a difficulty. The statement, "the length of the gate 13 cubits," seems impossible to reconcile with the other measurements and preserve the 50 cubits given in ver. 15, for as a measurement of length it would naturally run from east to west. The LXX has "breadth" in place of length. A possible solution is that this dimension refers to what is primarily considered the gate, namely the gate-entry already specified as 10 cubits in breadth, plus the walls of 1½ cubits on each side, making up the 13 cubits of this verse. Thus it would be proper to speak of the breadth of the gate as being this size, and all the other parts as "wall-projections" which, as may be seen by the plan, make up the 25 cubits of breadth given in ver. 13.

Ver. 14 is obscure. "He made posts of 60 cubits, and up to the posts was the court of the gate round about." The reading of the LXX affords no real help. Some take this as applying to the posts of the porch in ver. 9, making it mean their height, comparing them to the pylons of Egyptian structures or the obelisks set up before the doors of their temples. But the posts in ver. 9 are only 2 cubits (2.88 feet), and a height of 60 cubits (72 feet) is out of all proportion and an improbable construction. An added difficulty is the word made when elsewhere in this part it is a matter of measurement. The latter part of the verse, though not easy to understand, may mean that the court surrounded the gate on all three sides, but as to the former statement a really satisfactory solution does not seem possible at present.

Considering these textual difficulties, the plan here proposed seems to give, as near as now attainable, an intelligible lay-out of these gate-buildings.

THE PRESENT CONDITION OF THE DEAD SEA

"The Dead Sea receives, beside the Jordan, four or five smaller streams, but has no relief for its waters, except through evaporation. This is raised to enormous proportions by the fervent heat which prevails in the sunken valley during the greater part of the year. The extracted moisture usually forms a haze impenetrable to the eye for more than a few miles, but sometimes vast columns of mist rear themselves from the sea, heavy clouds are formed above, and thunderstorms, the more violent for their narrow confines, rage, as the torn coasts testify, with lightning and floods of rain... While the water of the ocean contains 4 to 6 per cent of solids in solution, the Dead Sea holds from 24 to 26 per cent, or five times as much. The water is very nauseous to the taste and oily to the touch, leaving on the skin, when it dries, a thick crust of salt. But it is very brilliant, seen from far away no lake on earth looks more blue and beautiful. Swim out upon it, and at the depth of twenty feet you can count the pebbles through the transparent waters....The surface is generally smooth, the heavy water rises not easily; but when in storm it does rise, the waves are immensely powerful...like the blows of a sledge hammer. No fish can exist in the waters, nor is it proved that any low forms of life have been discovered.



"These bitter and imprisoned waters, that are yet so blue and brilliant, chafe a low beach of gravel, varied by marl or salted marsh ...but the gravel is crowned with an almost constant hedge of driftwood, every particle of which is stripped of bark and bleached, while much of it glitters with salt. You could not imagine a more proper crown for Death. With this the brilliant illusion of the Dead Sea fades, and everywhere beyond, violence and desolation reign supreme. If the coast is flat you have salt-pans or a briny swamp; if terraced there is a yellow, scurfy stretch of soil, with a few thorn bushes and succulent weeds. Ancient beaches of the sea are visible all around it, steep banks from five to fifty feet of stained and greasy marl, very friable, with heaps of rubbish at their feet, and crowned by nothing but their own bare, crumbling brows. Some hold that these gave the region its ancient name, the Vale of Siddim; and in truth it is they which chiefly haunt one's memory of the Dead Sea. Last crumbling shelves of the upper world, there are not in nature more weird symbols of forsakenness and desolation...

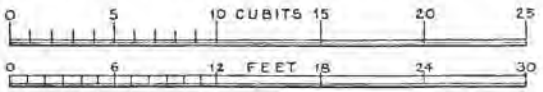
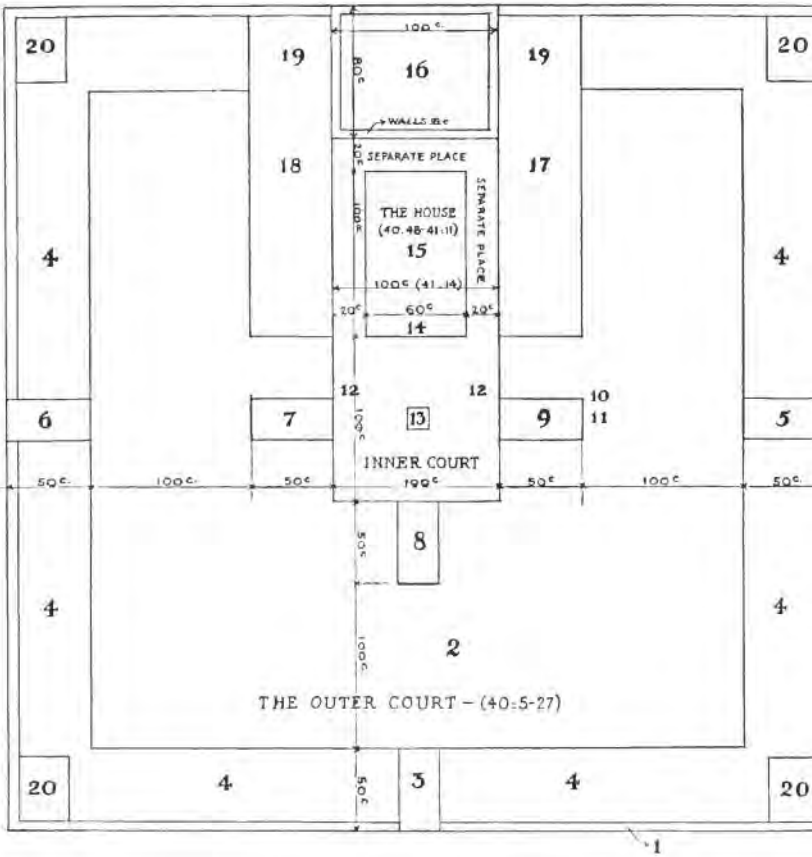
"In this awful hollow [which seems like a] bit of the infernal regions come up to the surface, this hell [as the inhabitants sometimes call it] with the sun shining into it," was the scene of one of God's most awful judgments on human sin. "The glare of Sodom and Gomorrah is flung down the whole length of Scripture history. It is the popular and standard judgment on human sin. The story is told in Genesis; it is applied in Deuteronomy, by Amos, by Isaiah, by Jeremiah, by Zephaniah, in Lamentations, and by Ezekiel. Our Lord Himself employs it more than once as the figure of the judgment. He threatens it upon cities where the Word is preached in vain, and there we feel the flame scorch our own cheeks. Paul, Peter, Jude, all make mention of it. In the Apocalypse the great city of sin is spiritually called Sodom.....

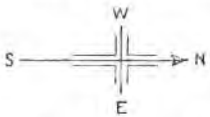
"It is in accordance with the grace of God, making that first which was last and that last which was first, that this awful vale of judgment should be the scene of one of the most lively and stupendous hopes of prophecy."



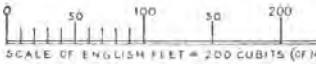
("Historical Geography of the Holy Land," Geo. Adam Smith.)



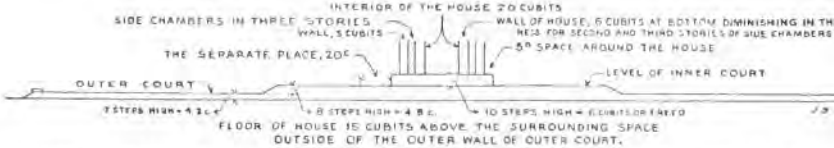
CHRONOLOGICAL CHART (Notes, p. 244)



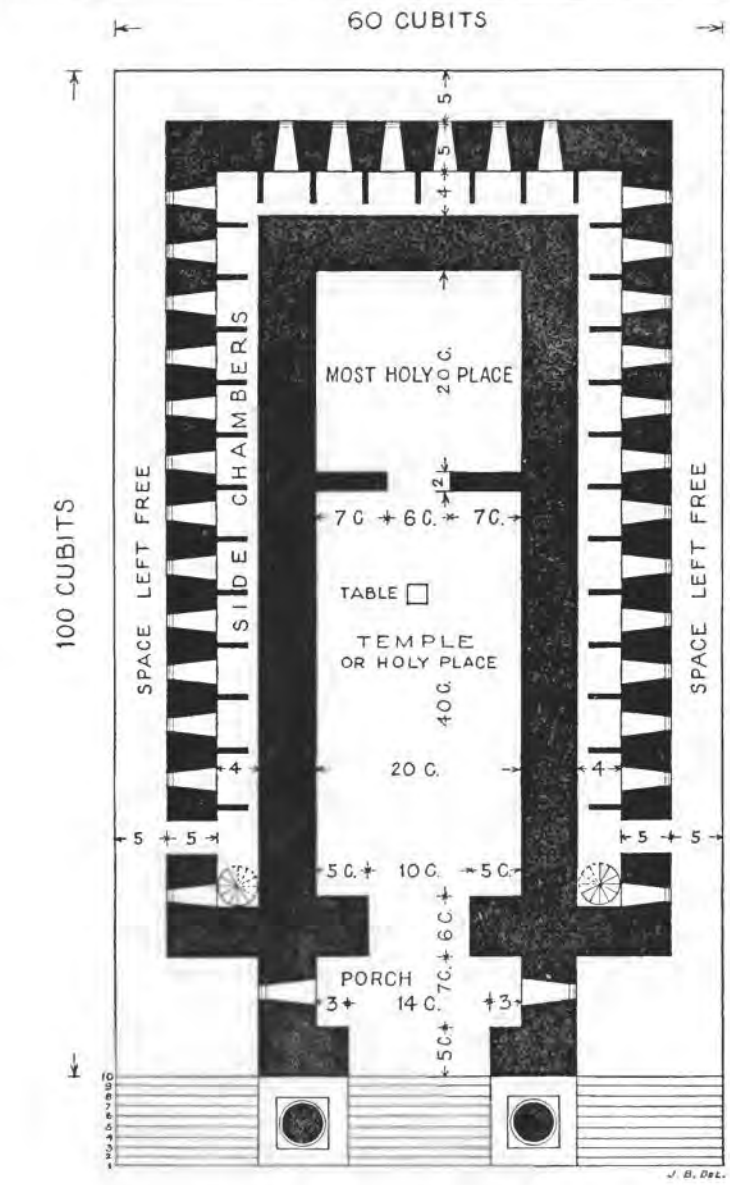
PLAN OF THE GATE BUILDINGS



OUTLINE PLAN OF THE COURTS AND TEMPLE



EACH SIDE OF SQUARE 500 CUBITS



CROSS SECTION SHOWING THE DIFFERENT LEVELS OF THE COURTS AND THE HOUS

REFERENCES TO OUTLINE PLAN

1.—Outer wall around court (ch. 40: 5).
2.—Outer court, its details (ch. 40: 6-27).
3.—East Gate of outer court (ch. 40: 6-16).
4.—Cells and pavement around the outer court, arranged on three sides in groups of five on each side of the Gate buildings (ch. 40: 17-19).
5.—North Gate of Outer court (ch. 40: 20-23).
6.—South Gate of Outer court (ch. 40: 24-27).
7.—South Gate of Inner court (ch. 40: 28-31).
8.—East Gate of Inner court (ch. 40: 32-34).
9.—North Gate of Inner court (ch. 40: 35-37).
10.—Cell for washing the Burnt offering near North Gate—text does not definitely fix the location (ch. 40: 38).
11.—Sacrificial tables connected with the North Gate. These are placed in the porch of the Gate and adjacent to its ascent (ch. 40: 39-43).
12.—Cells for the priests who are keepers of the charge of the House and the Altar—text does not definitely fix the location except that they are said to be outside the inner gate, in the inner court (ch. 40: 44-46).
13.—The Altar (ch. 40: 47). For its dimensions see ch. 43:13-17.
14.—Porch of the House (ch. 40: 48, 49).
15.—The Temple itself, holy and most holy places, the side chambers and the separate place (ch. 41: 1-11).
16.—The building to the west of the House, and a summary of the principal measurements (ch. 41: 12-15).
17.—The cell building on the north side of the separate place (ch. 42: 1-9).
18.—The cell building on the south side of the separate place* (ch. 42: 10-14).
19.—Cooking places for the priests located at the west of the cell buildings devoted to their use—see 17 and 18 (ch. 46: 19, 20).
20.—Cooking places for the sacrifices of the people (ch. 46: 21-24).

* Note. The text describing these two buildings is difficult to interpret, and in certain features obscure. The general location is clear, and this is indicated on the plan; but the actual arrangement of the several parts presents a problem to which a really satisfactory solution is hard to find.

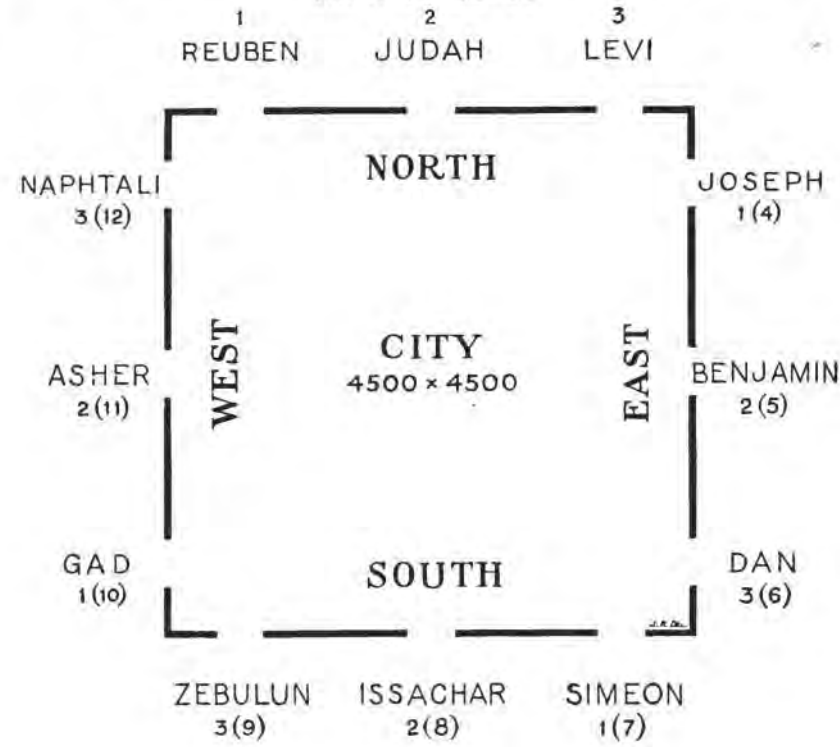
PLAN OF THE HOUSE

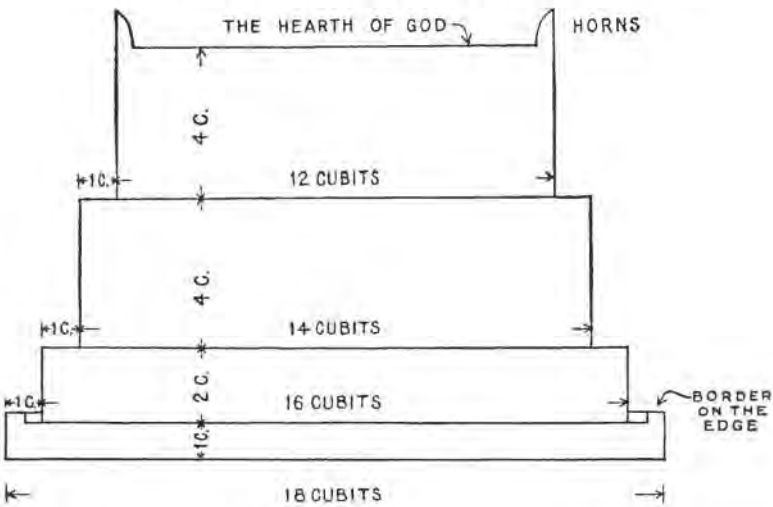
0 5 10 15 20 25 30 CUBITS

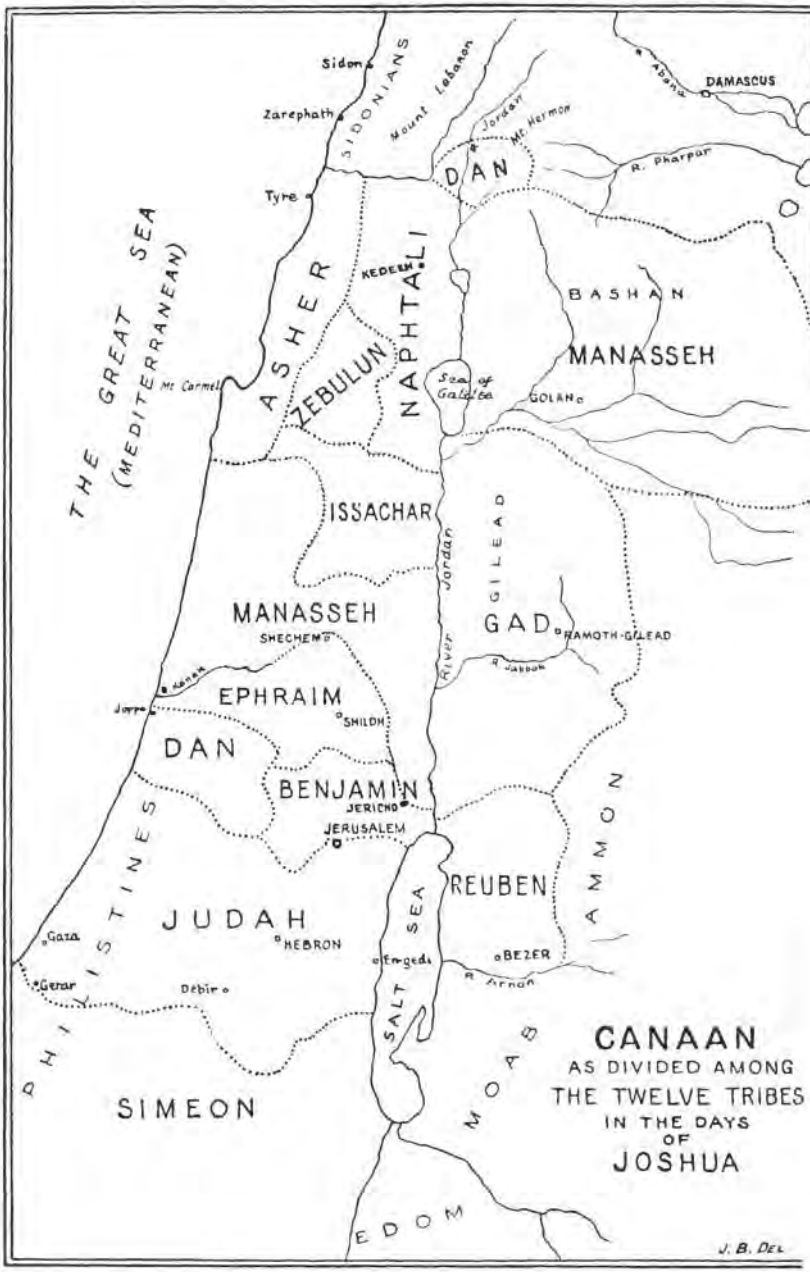
FEET 0 6 12 24

DIAGRAM OF THE CITY-GATES

CHAP. 48 : 30-35







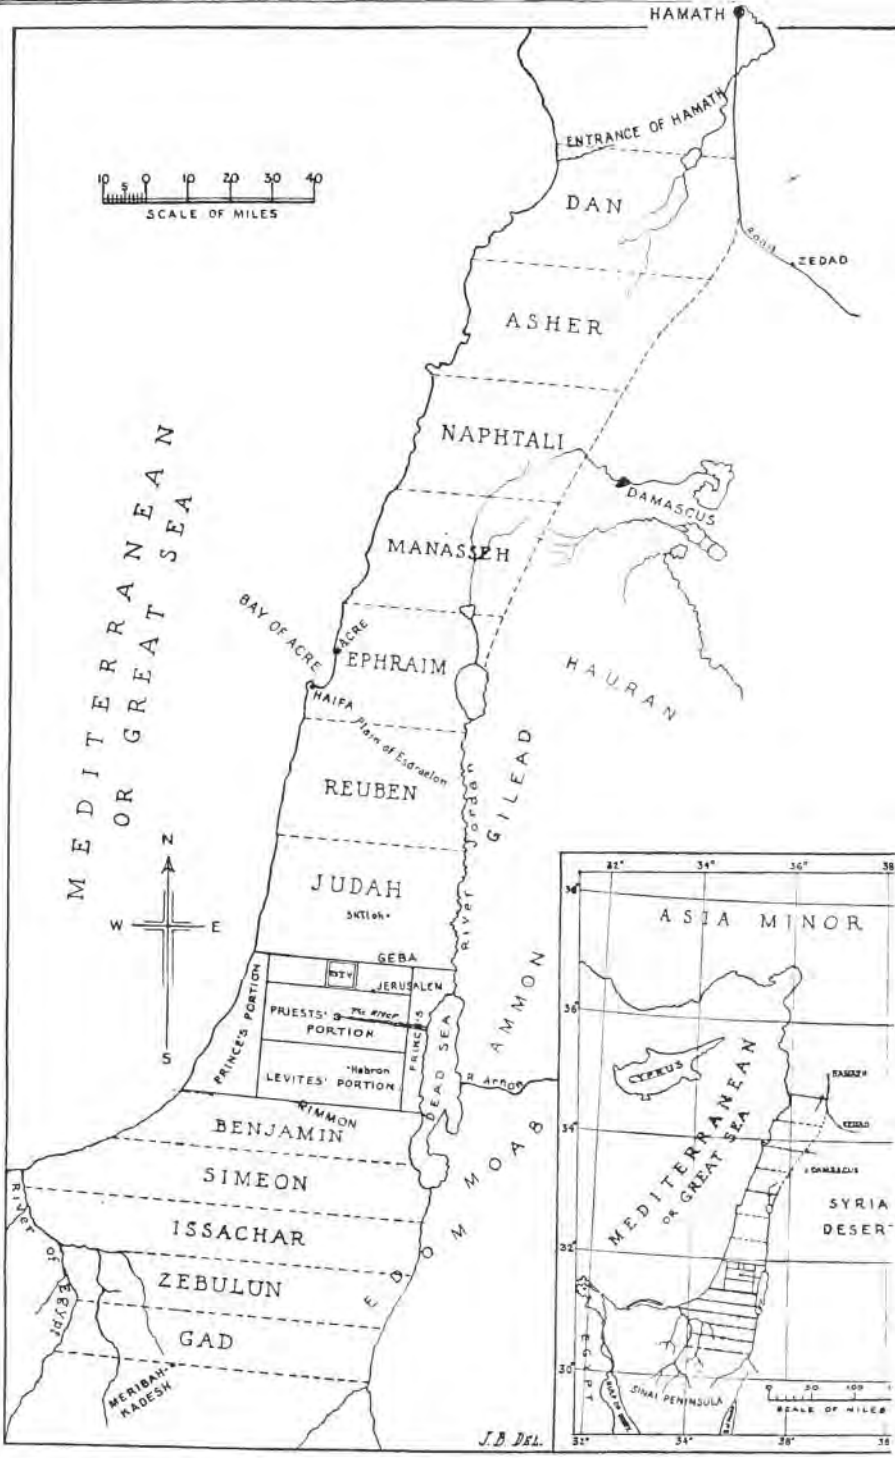


DIAGRAM OF THE ALTAR

Sidon
Zarephath
SIDONIANS
Mount Lebanon
Abana
DAMASCUS
Jordan
Mt. Hermon
DAN
R. Pharpar
Tyre
THE GREAT SEA (MEDITERRANEAN)
ASHER KEDESH NAPHTALI
BASHAN MANASSEH
Mt. Carmel
ZEBULUN
Sea of Galilee
GOLAN ISSACHAR
Jordan River
GILEAD MANASSEH
SHECHEM
GAD RAMOTH-GILEAD
R. Jabbok
Joppa
EPHRAIM SHILOH
DAN BENJAMIN JERICHO JERUSALEM
PHILISTINES
REUBEN
AMMON JUDAH Gaza
HEBRON Engedi
BEZER
R. Arnon
Gerar
Debir
SALT SEA
MOAB CANAAN AS DIVIDED AMONG THE TWELVE TRIBES
IN THE DAYS OF JOSHUA SIMEON EDOM
J. B. Del

Future Division of the Land

BS491 .G761 v.4
The numerical Bible. : being a revised
Princeton Theological Seminary-Speer Library
1 1012 00057 5680

LIBRARY OF PRINCE MAR 1 C 192
THEOLOGICAL SEMI

THE NUMERICAL BIBLE

BEING

A REVISED TRANSLATION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES

Arranged, Divided, and Briefly Characterized

ACCORDING TO THE PRINCIPLES OF THEIR

NUMERICAL STRUCTURE

THE GOSPELS

THIRD EDITION

NEW YORK
LOIZEAUX BROTHERS, BIBLE TRUTH DEPOT
1 East 13th Street

Copyright, 1904
LOIZEAUX BROTHERS.

PRINTED AT

THE BIBLE TRUTH PRESS, 183 EAST 13TH STREET,

NEW YORK

PREFACE.

IN sending out the present volume of the Numerical Bible, it is a joy to realize that it is another witness to that which in our day is assailed on every hand, the absolute perfection of the Inspired Word. This very perfection renders, indeed, every testimony of this kind so feeble in comparison that it must make every attempt to show it forth in some sense a matter of humiliation. It will ever remain its own only-competent witness; and a large part of our work has to be simply the removal of that which through the incompetence of its friends, much more than the wanton malice of its foes, has obscured for many the light which shines forth from it. Nor can one pretend that even while seeking to do this, there may not be the adding of fresh mistakes to the number of those that have gone before. One's comfort only can be that after all, it is the nature of light to shine; and that that which has this self-evidence for oneself may be trusted to manifest it also to the eyes of others. The perfection of the Word cannot of course be demonstrated by that which is confessedly itself imperfect; yet so much may be seen as to produce conviction in the soul as to what is not seen. We have the highest witness that can be, that "Scripture cannot be broken;" and it is joy to know that every attempt to show the contrary has always resulted in ampler confirmation of its truth. But there is more than this: for God has ordained that we should in the reception of even the Word of truth, be helpers to one another; and thus it is that the Spirit of God testifies to our need of one another, and to His own abiding Presence in the Church. I have for my own part sought to keep this in mind, and have not willingly neglected any available means of knowledge. My indebtedness to those who have gone before me is far too great to be even realized, much as I have desired, without despising any help, to read Scripture for myself in dependence on that "Unction from the Holy One," by which even the "babes" may be delivered from helpless dependence upon any mere human teacher. That those who take up the present volume may do it in this spirit also is my heartfelt desire.

The references are here, as in all these volumes, the work of Mr. SAMUEL RIDOUT, to whom its readers, with myself, are also indebted for many helpful suggestions as to the translation, as in other ways.

F. W. GRANT.

Plainfield, N. J.
June, 1899.

ORDER AND DIVISIONS OF THE BOOKS.

THE OLD TESTAMENT.

1. THE BOOKS OF THE LAW :—
   1. Genesis.
   2. Exodus.
   3. Leviticus.
   4. Numbers.
   5. Deuteronomy.

2. THE COVENANT-HISTORY :—
   1. Joshua.
   2. Judges.
      Ruth.
   3. Kings :—
      First Book (Samuel).
      Second Book (Kings).
   4. Captivity-Books :—
      Ezra.
      Nehemiah.
      Esther.
   5. Chronicles.

3. THE PROPHETS :—
   1. Isaiah.
   2. Jeremiah.
      Lamentations.
   3. Ezekiel.
   4. Daniel.
   5. The Book of Minor Prophets:—
      1. Hosea. Amos. Micah.
      2. Joel. Obadiah. Jonah.
      3. Nahum. Habakkuk. Zephaniah.
      4. Haggai. Zechariah. Malachi.

4. THE PSALM-BOOKS:—
   1. The Psalms.
   2. Job.
   3. Solomon's Song.
   4. Ecclesiastes.
   5. Proverbs.

THE NEW TESTAMENT.

1. THE GOSPELS :—
   1. Matthew. Mark. Luke.
   2. John.

2. THE ACTS.

3. THE PAULINE EPISTLES :—
   1. Romans. Galatians. Ephesians. Colossians. Philemon. Philippians.
   2. Thessalonians. First Epistle. Second Epistle. Corinthians. First Epistle. Second Epistle. Hebrews. Timothy. First Epistle. Second Epistle. Titus.

4. THE CATHOLIC EPISTLES :—
   1. Peter.
      First Epistle.
      Second Epistle.
   2. James.
   3. John.
      First Epistle.
      Second Epistle.
      Third Epistle.
   4. Jude.

5. REVELATION.

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE NUMERALS.

The reason for the significance must be sought in previous volumes, especially in Appendix II. to the Volume on the Psalms.

ONE.

Soleness, singularity, uniqueness; solitariness, barrenness.
Sufficiency, power, independency, pride, rebellion.
Identity, unchangeableness, consistency, perpetuity, truth, knowledge.

(UNITY.)

Unity, at-oneness, harmony, congruity, integrity, righteousness, obedience, concord, peace.

(PRIMACY.)

Supremacy, headship, rule; beginning, cause, occasion, source, foundation, ground, plea.

(COMBINATIONS OF MEANINGS.)

Life, personality, will. Choice, election. Grace.
God, Almighty, Eternal, Jehovah, Father.

TWO.

(RELATION.)

Help, support, confirmation, assurance, competent testimony.
Seconding, preservation, deliverance, salvation. Service, ministry.
Addition, increase, growth; progress, movement, activity.
Attachment, love, desire, prayer. Association, partnership, fellowship.

(SECOND.)

Dependence, faith. Inferiority, lowliness, humiliation, subjection.

(DIFFERENCE.)

Diversity, contrast; contradiction, opposition, conflict, enmity.
Double-mindedness, duplicity, deceit.

(DIVISION.)

Separation, analysis, differentiation, discernment; judgment, wisdom; sight.
Decay, death, dissolution.
Christ, Second Person, God and Man, Second Man, Word of God, Witness, Saviour, Servant, Minister. Cross. Soul. Woman.

THREE.

(THREE DIMENSIONS.)

Solidity; reality, realization, fulfilment, fulness; manifestation. Sanctuary; glory, praise. Name.

(THREE STRAIGHT LINES INCLOSE A SPACE.)

Setting apart for purpose; specialization, sanctification, holiness; transformation. Dwelling-place, possession, portion. Marriage. Ban.

(THIRD LINE OF A TRIANGLE RETURNS TO THE FIRST.)

Resurrection; return, revival, recovery; reproduction. Spirit.

FOUR.

Yieldingness, weakness; meekness, mercy. Failure, testing; experience; transitoriness, change.
Creature, earth, walk on earth, world.

FIVE.

God in government; capacity, responsibility, exercise, way and end; conditions.
Weak with the Strong; Man with God; Immanuel.

SIX.

Manifestation or fulness of evil. Work-day week; limit, discipline; mastery, overcoming.

SEVEN.

Completeness, perfection; rest.

EIGHT.

New in contrast with the Old.

TEN.

Simply a 5 by 2.

TWELVE.

The manifest rule of God.

INTRODUCTION.

THE NEW TESTAMENT.

THE meaning of the title given to the latter and distinctively Christian portion of the inspired Word is not in dispute. The Greek word (διαθηκη) means both "covenant" and "testament," and apparently in this very relation (compare Heb. ix. 15, 16); though, as in contrast with the "Old Covenant," the law, we naturally find most emphasis laid upon the former significance. "Covenant," says Fausset, "expresses its obligatory character, God having bound Himself by promise. 'Testament' expresses that, unlike other covenants, it is not a matter of bargaining, but all of God's grace, just as a testator has absolute power to do what he will with his own. Jesus' death brings the will of God in our favor into force."

Old Covenant and New Covenant are, as law and grace, completely opposed to one another. As the apostle argues, so absolutely is this true here that when the latter comes in the former must give way, to disappear before it (Heb. viii. 13); and yet they are two parts of one testimony, both necessary to the Scripture rule with regard to testimony, and answering, in their very contrast to each other to the inherent reason for its being twofold. "Who that has considered it in the least but must appreciate the power of this for conviction? For such power in twofold witness proceeds largely from the diversity of character and interest that they present. They are otherwise different,—contrasted; yet here they agree: different in such sort that you realize there is no collusion between them,—no treachery. Nothing but the necessary unity of truth could make them one. And how will this be strengthened in proportion as the contrast is manifold, and yet the unity pervasive: and this in the two Testaments is what so demonstrates them to be of God.

"The Old Testament is in Hebrew, the language of a special people, with whose history it has grown up, and to whom it addresses itself. It is the religion of a nation, one of the families of the earth, its horizon earthly, its sanctuary a worldly one, its services ritualistic, ornate, elaborate, intrusted to a special priesthood. God is here behind a veil which none can penetrate; man—all men—are shut out; none can see Him and live; for, merciful as He is, He cannot clear the guilty, and who (let him do his best) is not guilty?

"This legal, sacerdotal, exclusive system, the incarnation of conscience, but a bad conscience, in what utter contrast is it to the free, spiritual, all-embracing spirit of Christianity! 'The Lord has said that He would dwell in the thick darkness,' says Solomon on the day of the dedication of the temple. (1 Kings viii. 12.) 'We walk in the light as God is in the light,' answers the apostle. (1 Jno. i. 7.) 'Who can by no means clear the guilty,' says the Old Testament voice. (Ex. xxxiv. 7.) 'That justifieth the ungodly,' says again the New Testament. (Rom. iv. 5.) 'No man can see Me and live,' is the elder utterance. (Ex. xxxiii. 20.) 'He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father,' are His words who is Himself the spirit incarnate of the New. (Jno. xiv. 9.)

"Here are two witnesses how diverse: can it be that, after all, under these statements, so seemingly conflicting, there is yet a perfect unity? can there be a fullness of truth which embraces and harmonizes all? Yes, surely; admit what the Old Testament so abundantly confirms and illustrates, the essential opposition between law and grace, yet that the first is handmaid to the other;—then, on the basis of law, all the Old Testament utterances are but the sentence of God upon the self-righteousness of man; while the New Testament reveals the heart of God in grace, upon the basis of a righteousness, by which the law also is magnified and made honorable, and able to forego its penal claim."*

Thus this diverse testimony is all the more conclusive for being diverse. And the number two in itself speaks of diversity, as is plain. The foundation also of the new covenant or New Testament is the Cross; and the Cross receives and unites these diverse elements. It is curse and blessing,—the curse of the law taken and removed. It is humiliation and glory. It is the sin of man at its worst, and the love of God in its fullest display. The shed blood of Christ is the "blood of the new covenant," and the cup at His supper is "the new covenant (or testament) in His blood." (Matt. xxvi. 28; Lu. xxii. 20.) Thus the New Testament holds up the Cross as its emblem; and from Matthew to Revelation it is ever before us.

Clearly, the New Testament stands as a second part of the Bible, in contrast with yet confirmation and interpretation of the first. It is the substance of former shadows, but thus also in contrast with them. It is for men at large instead of a single nation; for the family of faith, who are now as such brought into a place of recognized relationship with God, and as called out of the world become a heavenly and not an earthly people.

* "Spiritual Law in the Natural World," pp. 32–34.

But it is also a fifth Pentateuch, the Old Testament being made up of four Pentateuchs, as we have elsewhere seen. Nor is this number 5 in contradiction to the other number which it bears: for every 5 is also a two: it is made up of two numbers 4+1, and these two are in perfect contrast with one another, though coming thus together. Four is the number of frailty—of the creature. One is the number of strength and of God. Five brings these together in itself, and is the number of Immanuel therefore—"God with us"* This is surely the very meaning of the new covenant: "I will be their God;" and our Immanuel, Jesus, is the personal fulfillment of it. He is the "Mediator of the new covenant," the Reconciler of God and man. Thus, as a fifth Pentateuch, the New Testament is perfectly in agreement with its character as the second part of Scripture. The numbers two and five both speak of Jesus, and as no other numbers do. It is no wonder that here they should come together. For Scripture has its own arithmetic as Nature has: and nothing that is, save man, can be ever wanting in its Maker's praise.

The Pentateuchal Structure.

Taking up the New Testament now, to look deeper into it, we find it has twenty-seven books in all, as the Old Testament has really thirty-six; the three double historical books of the latter being not originally so divided.† The one is therefore 3×12; the other is 3^3. The number of revelation (or divine manifestation), 3, enters into both; but in the Old Testament it is in connection with the number of manifest government: it is God upon the throne throughout, as "Law" means; whereas in the New Testament we have only the 3 itself, but cubed, which speaks of solidity—of contents. God is manifest all through; there are no clouds and darkness round about Him, to hide the glory of what He is: He is "Light," and He is "in the light."

Thus as the manifestation of God to man, Father, Son and Spirit are now fully revealed. Beautifully we find this first, where, at His baptism by John, Christ comes forward to take up His work among men,—the whole Godhead in wondrous fellowship in that salvation.

Answering to this also, and as the necessary response on man's part, the full sanctification of the Spirit is announced and realized. The things which Moses had to suffer for the hardness of men's hearts are now refused: "perfection" has in this sense come, that which "made nothing perfect" has (dispensationally) passed away.

Thus the numerals still bring out the character of what is here before us. But there is more than this: for these twenty-seven books fall into five divisions,—in fact a Pentateuch, of Gospels, Acts, Pauline epistles, Catholic epistles, Revelation. The divisions are not based upon their

* See the appendix for all numerical symbolism; or the former volumes.

† The division is due to the Septuagint.

form: for, in that case, the Gospels and Acts would go together as history, just as the Pauline and Catholic would all be epistles. There are epistles also in the book of Revelation. It is plain that we could not, therefore, divide them in this way; we must look more deeply into what is so presented to us, and then we shall find that they are a Pentateuch in contents as well as form, and that the structure is here as elsewhere in Scripture, throughout numerical.

1. The Gospels.

The Gospels are, in that case, of course, the Genesis. They are the new "beginning," which the apostle John in his first epistle refers to constantly as that. In Christ, "that Eternal Life which was with the Father" shines here, without fleck or stain,—"the Light of men." Head of new creation, He is the "Father of eternity"—of that which, as approved of God, abides. The Gospels are the foundation upon which the whole superstructure of Christian truth is reared, and they have always opened the canon of the New Testament. No other place would be possible to them at all.

2. The Acts.

As indisputably as the Gospels are the Genesis, the book of the Acts is the Exodus of the New Testament. It is that redemption from legal bondage of the people of God, (not now a nation but the family of faith,) of which the epistle to the Galatians speaks doctrinally. In the Acts we have the history of the deliverance, the large part of it being taken up with the labors of Paul, the instrument mainly used of God in bringing it about. Beginning with Jerusalem and its rejection of the risen and ascended Christ, it shows us thereupon the reception of the Samaritans, and then of the Gentiles in the persons of Cornelius and his household; the apostle of the circumcision being made to open the door to them. We have then the conversion of Saul, the scattering of the Jerusalem saints by persecution, the new Gentile assembly formed at Antioch, and the going forth from thence of Saul and Barnabas on their mission to the nations.

The question is then raised, Is the law to put its yoke upon these new converts? and that is decided in the negative at Jerusalem itself. The second missionary journey of the apostle follows, the Gentile work enlarging continually. But the Jewish disciples are still zealous for the law, and from the hostility of the unbelievers in Jerusalem the apostle of the Gentiles finds refuge only in a Roman prison. The last chapter narrates the final interview of the apostle with the Jews at Rome, closing with his definitive word, that "the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will hear it."

3. The Epistles of Paul.

The order of the epistles varies somewhat in different MSS.; and in the east, as it would seem, the epistles styled "catholic," because not addressed to any distinct churches or individuals, preceded those of Paul. In the west, on the other hand, the order was in this respect as found in our common Bibles.

But if the numerical (and Pentateuchal) system has any claim to be considered divine, the Pauline epistles, and not the Catholic, must stand as the third division of the New Testament books. Paul it is who by his doctrine establishes the soul before God, opening for us the heavenly sanctuary itself, to bring us in there in the Person of our Representative, the Lord Jesus Christ. He is thus, as he claims to be (Col. i. 23) in an especial sense the minister of the gospel; which answers to the place in which we have seen him in the Acts. He is in fact the first to proclaim "justification," as recorded in the Acts itself (xiii. 39), going beyond the forgiveness of sins, as preached by the other apostles; and both this and the Christian place in Christ he alone of all the Scripture writers formally declares.

As it is Leviticus that gives typically the different features of the Lord's great offering, the measure of our acceptance and sanctification to God, so it is Paul who interprets this into the plain speech of the New Testament. His epistles are evidently, then, the third division.

But he claims to be not simply "minister"* of the gospel, but of the Church also as the body of Christ (verse 25), of which again no one but himself speaks; and even its character as the house of God, indwelt of the Spirit, it is his fully to bring out: in both respects the effect of the coming of the Spirit, as found in Christianity. Every way, therefore, he fills the third place.

4. The Catholic Epistles.

On the other hand, the "catholic" or general epistles, are the work of four writers (Peter, James, John and Jude), and in this have the numerical stamp of their division. They have also all as their theme that practical path through the world which is brought out typically in the book of Numbers, and which comes under the number four. This is not hard to be realized as to them, while in many respects they are quite diverse from each other. For this reason I shall defer any further characterization of them until we may, in the goodness of God, be called to consider them in detail.

5. The Revelation.

And so we come now to Revelation, the one book of New Testament prophecy, but which goes entirely beyond the Old. In the Old Testament, however, prophecy is a third division, not a fifth,—a place which it fills here for a very beautiful and obvious reason.

In the Old Testament prophecy alone could lead the people of God

* We must not read merely "a" minister in either of the verses in question (Col. i. 23, 25); for he is speaking of the special dispensation committed to him.

into things which could not yet be proclaimed as present. Even then they could be only feebly entered into: as Isaiah says: "Eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him." But the apostle quoting this, can add for his Christian hearers: "but God hath revealed them unto us by His Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God." (1 Cor. ii. 9, 10.)

Most fittingly, therefore, do the epistles of Paul, in which the fullness of such truth is given,—truth which opens heaven itself for us, as even Old Testament prophecy could not do—take the place in the New Testament held by prophecy in the Old. But the place of Revelation itself is none the less a significant and blessed one. On the one hand, it is indeed a Deuteronomy, a magnificent summing up, solemn, yet glorious, of the divine ways with man and in view of man's ways; of the history of the Church and of the world alike; while beyond—as Israel from the plains of Moab could view their inheritance—our glorious city, the heavenly Jerusalem, is shown us. And there, and by and by upon the new earth also, "God with us," the full power of the name Immanuel, is seen in accomplished blessing. From this side also the closing book of prophecy fills completely its numerical place.

THE TIME BETWEEN THE TESTAMENTS.

The New Testament, as every one knows, was not given in quiet continuity with the Old. Inspiration had long lapsed, and after Malachi no prophet had arisen in Israel for over 400 years, when suddenly the "Messenger" before Jehovah, of whom he had spoken, broke the long silence, preaching in the wilderness of Judea. There had been much and stirring history, and Israel herself had seemed for awhile to have a resurrection in the kingdom of the Maccabees. But it had proved, as to the nation, to be but as the galvanizing of a corpse, which does not preserve it from increasing corruption. The sceptre, which from the prophetic point of view had never been a legitimate one, tumbled helplessly at last into the hands of the open usurper and Edomite, Herod; and it was in a land under his cruel sway that the true King was born.

Prophecy had already fixed the time of His coming, in the "seventy weeks" foretold to Daniel, which must be given up as a genuine prediction, if Christ were not the "Messiah the Prince," therein declared. The general expectation also fastened itself upon this or similar predictions. "That 'the testimony of Jesus was the Spirit of prophecy,'" says Geikie,* "was only the Christian utterance of a universal Jewish belief respecting the Christ. 'All the prophets,' says Rabbi Chaja, 'have prophesied only of the blessedness of the days of the Messiah.' But it was to Daniel especially, with his seeming exactness of dates, that the chief regard was paid. It was generally believed that the 'times' of that prophet pointed to the 20th year of Herod the great, and when that was past, not to mention other dates, the year 67 of our reckoning was thought the period, and then the year 135; the war which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem arising from one calculation, and the tremendous insurrection under Hadrian from the other."

* "Life and Words of Christ" (chap. vi.)

Alas, they had not known Messiah when He came; and the forfeiting in this way, for so many generations, of all their hopes, the prophet had fully declared. He would "be cut off, and have nothing" (verse 26, marg.); and the destruction of the city and the sanctuary would follow, as it did follow, as the result.

The rejection of Christ was the inevitable consequence of the self-righteousness in which the people were steeped. They had rejected the testimony of the old covenant against them, and the judgment of God because of the breach of it; on account of which they were already scattered in all lands, and in their own were under the feet of the heathen. The very temple to which they outwardly devoted themselves, and which had been rebuilt by the bloody hands of the unscrupulous tyrant Herod (contrast the prohibition of David from building it because he was a man of war) bore witness against them in its empty sanctuary. There was no ark of the covenant within the veil—no true mercy-seat, therefore, on which the blood of the covenant could be sprinkled on the day of atonement,—no "Urim and Thummim," by which the high-priest obtained answers from God—finally, no manifestation of God at all in connection with it. It was round this hollow shell that all the ritualistic system now revolved,—a type of the heartless formalism of the mass of the people.

The sentence of Lo-ammi was upon the nation (Hos. i. 9), and it was in strange but real accordance with this that never did they value themselves so highly. In the measure of one's distance from God is this self-estimation practicable, and we see by the Baptist's warning words to them how far in this way they had attained. The higher their religious claim, the more emphatically would they refuse also alike the stern preacher of repentance and the evangelist of divine grace. Thus the Pharisee could ask with assurance as to the answer, "Which of the Pharisees have believed on Him?" and with perfect conviction that that settled the matter as to the claim of Him whom they refused.

Thus to the condemnation of the broken law they added the condemnation of a rejected Gospel; to the "ungodly and without strength" which the former proved as to them, they added the last and worst count of the indictment against men, "the carnal mind is enmity against God." (Rom. v. 6; viii. 7.)

The Cross was thus in this sense the end of the trial of man, the "end of the" (probationary) "ages" (Heb. ix. 26, Gk.) but only leaving God to show Himself now, as man had done himself. The world lies indeed under its shadow; but God is in the light, and the eternal counsels—the mind and heart of God—are told out in the new revelation of Christ, His manifestation.

The Cross itself lay in this gap of time between two revelations; the new revelation waited, as far as its Scriptures were concerned, for the advent of the witnessing Spirit, the Witness of the glory of Christ in His accomplished work. His coming into the world to take the place of the absent Christ, marked at its commencement with the abundant bestowal of spiritual gifts, but perfectly distinct from this, is what characterizes for us the new epoch. And the promise of the Lord in connection with His coming, "He shall guide you into all truth," is emphasized by the apostle as in present accomplishment: "the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God." (1 Cor. ii. 10.)

This slight indication may suffice to introduce us to what we shall have almost immediately to look at more in detail under the guidance of the inspired Word. I shall not here anticipate what will be much better treated in this connection. The object we have before us is not a history, but (if I may call it so) an inductive study of the word of God. We shall, for this, commence with as few presuppositions as possible, and, even in the statement of facts, while not neglecting any sources of help that may be open to us, shall let these come into use, as Scripture itself may suggest. Wisdom is in them as well as knowledge, and we desire that it may make its impression upon us, and that all our thoughts may be absolutely moulded by it. We come now at once therefore to the study of the Gospels.

THE GOSPELS.

It is simple enough to understand why the books which give us the fourfold history of the Lord's life on earth should be called by way of eminence the "Gospels." The opening words of Mark may have given rise to it, and be its formal justification; but apart from this, all the facts which the gospel proclaims and in which it is inwrapped are here. The development and application we find afterwards rather; and yet the man who was above all intrusted with this, at the beginning of that which is the most elaborate statement of the "glad tidings" to be found in Scripture, carries us back to what is recorded in the Gospels, for that which he preached (Rom. i. 3, 4): "the gospel of God concerning His Son Jesus Christ, which was made of the seed of David according to the flesh, and declared to be the Son of God with power according to the Spirit of holiness by resurrection of the dead." These things remain ever the gospel, however great the development may be afterwards.

That there would be such development, the Lord Himself plainly assures His disciples: "I have many things to say to you, but ye cannot bear them now; howbeit, when He, the Spirit of truth, is come, He shall guide you into all truth . . He shall glorify Me: for He shall receive of Mine, and shall show it unto you" (Jno. xvi. 12–14).

We see then that it is mere unbelief of the Gospels which would make men turn from the words of the Apostles to find their all even in the words of the Lord Himself. It is the Lord who assures us that things which could not be uttered by Himself would be uttered afterwards; and that these would be still, moreover, His own things. In the Gospels we find the germinant truths and facts, which imply all else; but it would be impossible for any less qualified than the apostles to have developed them. The history of this in measure we have in the Acts: enough to show us that it did in fact take place, and that it was even a slower process than we would have imagined. As to doctrines, Paul was given to complete* the word of God" (Col. i. 25); and only in Colossians and Ephesians, from his prison at Rome, does he seem to do this.

On the one hand, if we must not expect in the Gospels the fullness of Christian doctrine, on the other we must not limit them to the expression of what is distinctively Christian. It is again Paul himself who reminds us that the gospel is about One who was "made of the seed of David according to the flesh," and that, as this implies, that He "was minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers" (Rom. xv. 8). We shall find in the Gospels, therefore, Christ in necessary relation to Israel and the fulfilment of the Old Testament predictions as to them,—predictions and promises not set aside by the unbelief of the nation when He came, however much they might be delayed by it. The true understanding of the "Sermon on the Mount" (Matt. v–vii), of the prophecy upon Olivet (Matt. xxiv, xxv), and much else, depends upon the apprehension of this.

We must rid ourselves of the short-sighted and narrow application of everything to our special interests, which has perplexed so long the interpretation of Scripture; or rather, we must lay hold believingly of the astonishing grace which has made all that concerns Christ our interest and communicates as unto "friends" the divine thoughts and counsels which have for their centre Him by whom and for whom all things were made. In this way alone can we get to the heart of revelation anywhere, and find the true Life-centre of the universe of God.

It has been little enough realized till of late, and even now is it too little discerned, that each book in Scripture has its own specific purpose,—its dominant truth or truths, therefore, which give individuality to it, and with which all other truths connect themselves. We apprehend in the works of man the specific purpose of every book and every chapter of a book which is written by him, and yet are slow to credit the Lord with equal distinctiveness of plan and method. The variety of the instruments He has been pleased to use has hidden the One author who has used them; and despite the general unity of design which runs through them, we have failed to realize the perfect way in which each fills the place appointed for him. We have scarcely even allowed to the word of God the symmetry of a woman's patchwork,—which is, in fact, the only appropriate figure for the views long current as to the four Gospels, in which each writer was supposed to be making up as best he could the deficiencies of the one preceding him, and, as this implies, with but partial success. No wonder if this suggested to the later critics to apply the patchwork theory to the composition of the individual books,—a task which has been found to be proportionally easier, according to the multiplication of the patches.

* Or "fill up," not as in the common version, "fulfil."

For the intelligent Christian, however, such theories of origin are, we may trust, passed away, and we have been returning (at least with regard to the Gospels) to what the faith of Christians anciently accepted as the truth, that each Gospel presents a distinct aspect of the Lord's person and work. It is true, that they strangely differed among themselves about these, and we may even smile at the quaintness and extravagance of some of their arguments; all the more do their conflicting voices seem to represent the uncertain transmissions of some primitive teaching which tradition had been, as usual, unable accurately to preserve. Thus Irenæus "argues that the Gospel is the pillar of the Church; the Church is spread over the whole world; the world has four quarters; therefore it is fitting there should also be four Gospels. Again, the Gospel is the divine breath, or wind of life for men; there are four chief winds: therefore four Gospels. He builds another argument on the fourfold appearance of the cherubim. The cherubim, he says, are fourfold, and their faces are images of the activity of the Son of God. The first beast was like a lion, signifying His commanding and kingly dignity; the second, like a calf, signifying His priestly office; the third like a man, denoting His incarnation; the fourth like an eagle, denoting the Holy Spirit flying over the Church. Like these are the Gospels. John, who begins with the Godhead and descent from the Father, is the lion; Luke, who begins with the priesthood and sacrifice of Zacharias is the calf; Matthew, who begins with His human genealogy is the man; Mark the eagle, who commences with the announcement of the prophetic spirit—"the beginning of the Gospel as it is written by Isaiah the prophet."

Crude enough are these applications, and not one of them really right: John is not the Gospel of the Kingship, but of incarnate Deity. The genealogy in Matthew is not to show the Lord's humanity, but His royal title; the application of the calf to Luke is trivial and wholly wrong; and that of the eagle to Mark no less so. No wonder that Dr. Salmon,* from whom I have quoted, tells us that "this is not the apportionment of the four beasts to the Gospels which ultimately prevailed in the West: John being usually represented as the eagle; Matthew as the man; Luke as the ox; and Mark as the lion."

* "Introduction to the New Testament:" p. 33.

This is better in the first case only; and Lange has amended this, though again with only partial advantage, by regarding "Matthew under the symbol of the ox and Luke under that of the man."

All this would be taken by most as instancing merely the folly of such fanciful comparisons, and Dr. Salmon seems to cite them for this purpose. Yet in fact, the application of the cherubic figures to the Gospels only fails for want of a full induction and strict rigor of argument. The truth in it is fuller than any of the ancients seem to have understood, and lies not in casual or partial resemblances, but touches the essential difference in each of the evangelic histories.

Even the number of the Gospels connects itself with the analogies first pointed out by Irenæus; though that does not guarantee the application made of them. Here we are upon the ground of the numerical structure with which we are already familiar. Four is the number of the world as the place of trial, of the four corners of the earth and the four winds of heaven; and the Lord is seen in the four Gospels in the scene of what He Himself calls His "temptation;" facing the sins and sorrows and needs of men. Himself Man, and hiding Himself from nothing human, all the perfection of His Person is thus revealed to us. He is not only heard but seen, gazed upon, and handled by the hands of men. All forms of proof that can be given are given, that they may know the meaning and certainty of the vision accorded them—of the gift of God that is put into the possession of faith in Him. This is the first necessity for us, not a system of doctrine to be learned, but a living Person to be occupied with. And for this, with scarcely a word of comment, He is made to walk and live before us in an atmosphere of crystalline purity, which never detains or diverts the sight from the one sacred Figure who is to engage our attention and lay hold upon our hearts. All other forms that pass before us are but in contrast with Himself, not excepting the disciples that follow Him, or the greatest of woman-born, who goes before Him.

The division of the four Gospels is also in accord with the scriptural manner, where all is according to God. It is not the 2+2 which is true division, and seems always suggestive of evil in some way; it is 3+1, the number of manifestation and of supreme Godhead: together, therefore, showing us Him who is "God manifest in the flesh." The first three are, as thus going together, called "synoptic" Gospels, as uniting, with all their differences, in a common view of the Lord, very different from that of John, in which all His divine glory is at last displayed. The three agree together, and contrast with John in this, that in them, as in the parable of the vineyard which they all give, Christ is seen as God's last testimony to Israel—His Son, sent after the rejection of all previous messengers, as His last resource. "Having therefore yet one Son, His well-beloved, He sent Him also last unto them, saying, they will reverence My Son." The whole character of the "synoptics" is affected by this. Testimony, as in the previous dispensations, is still going on. The demonstration of the "mind of the flesh" as "enmity against God" is not complete in them till the Cross. Israel is not yet set aside but is addressed by this last Divine Messenger, who, finding God's treasure hid in the field of the world, goes and sells all that He has to possess Himself of it. Man is not yet seen in them as "dead in sins;" and the decidedly Christian truths of new birth and eternal life are not yet brought out. With all this John's Gospel, coming after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the setting aside publicly of Judaism by the government of God, is in direct contrast. All three of the synoptic gospels, moreover emphasize the Lord's humanity; John's, as already said, most clearly and emphatically proclaims His Deity.

This distinction is at once seen in the cherubic figures of the Apocalypse before referred to, and which it will be well for us now to take up for full determination of whether and how they apply to the Gospels. That the "beasts" of the fourth chapter of Revelation—which the Revised Version more properly calls the "living creatures"—are in fact cherubic forms, no question has, I suppose, been ever raised, and could hardly be by any one who has compared them with the cherubim of Ezekiel (chap. i. 5–10). There are differences, into which it is not needful to inquire here, but the essential forms are the same. In Revelation the four forms are given in order and numbered; and the order is exactly that of the Gospels to which they respectively apply: the first like a lion; the second like a calf—or young ox;* the third with the face of a man; and the fourth, like a flying eagle.

Here at once we realize a distinction between the first three and the fourth, which is the bird of heaven: this clearly answers, as the Western interpreters saw, to the Gospel of John; as the kingly lion to Matthew; the laborer ox to Mark; and the face of a man to Luke—the gospel of the Manhood. These applications will bear the most thorough scrutiny; and the cherubim themselves will be found embroidered upon the veil of the holiest, which we have divine authority for understanding to be the "flesh" of Christ. (Heb. x. 20). We can see, therefore, that the cherubim may have this relation to the Christ of the Gospels. In fact they speak of the government of God, and are thus "in the midst of the throne and round about the throne," and in the tabernacle were out of, and of one piece with, the mercy-seat. (Exod. xxv. 19.) In their different forms they convey to us the different features of divine government, features naturally derived from Him with whom the government is found; and thus again we need not wonder in them to have Christ before us.

* Μόσχος is so applied in the Septuagint, and in fact in Heb. ix. 12, 19.

We see, then, that the ancient view is true; even while those from whom we get it did not know how true it was, and were at a loss when they came to the application of it. It thus seems as I have said, a specimen of apostolic tradition, which tradition (as so constantly) proved itself unable to keep, but which God has restored to us. Let us now look at these living creatures in the order in which Revelation presents them to us, and compare them with the Gospels in the order in which we find them in our Bibles.

1. The Lion.—There is a passage in Proverbs (xxx. 29–31) which singularly connects together four things which seem to have the closest relationship with the Gospel of Matthew: "There be three things that are good in stepping; yea, four that are good in going: a lion which is strongest among beasts, and turneth not away from any; a war-horse; or a he-goat; and a King against whom there is no rising up." I give what is only a slight correction of the common version. The first three things spoken of here are distinguished from the fourth, as so often in Scripture, and for a reason with which we are acquainted. The writer does not say "step well" of the King, nor would it be so suitable; but the more hidden meaning of the first three comes to the surface in the last—the King: and the King above all characterizes Matthew. It is as this that Christ is worshiped by the magi; and it is as this that the genealogy introduces Him. Moreover, He is in the first place Son of David,—King of Israel; and here the lion symbol comes to the front, as in the very scene in Revelation in which we find the cherubic creatures, and in which He is announced as the "Lion of the tribe of Judah"—the One now going to take up the cause of the Jew on earth.

This naturally introduces, again, the second symbol in Proverbs,—the war-horse.* When the Lamb opens the first seal of the book which He alone can open, we see a war-horse and its rider going forth; and in the closing visions of the 19th chapter He Himself is seen on the war-horse too. "In righteousness He doth judge and make war."

The third symbol in the passage in Proverbs seems in contrast, however, with these thoughts. "A he-goat" may be of stately carriage, but if that be all, the thought would be merely trivial. In fact, it is a word that is used which somewhat more approaches the previous thoughts: tayish means the "butter," or "striker;" but still there is nothing additional in this to what has gone before, and the thought is manifestly weaker than in preceding cases. What is there that can supplement it? I believe, that which the goat typically so perfectly suggests—the thought of substitutionary sacrifice. Israel must have the scape-goat in order to have her King. And the book of Psalms brings again and again (see Ps. xx., xxi., cii., etc. notes) these things together. Matthew shows us in a parable of the Kingdom, and in the history of the King, that He who finds the treasure in the field must sell all that He hath to buy the field. Thus then all four thoughts perfectly unite and fill out the picture of the first Gospel.

* In the common and revised versions, "a grey-hound;" literally, "girt in the loins," in Gesenius (Thesaur) "war-horse," girt about with trappings, as seen in the sculptures of Persepolis.

The Lion as a symbol unites but the thoughts of power and royalty, and thus emphasizes what is the chief character of the book. Christ the Son of David, the Lion of Judah,—this, though far from being all that is in the book, is its central feature.

2. How any thoughtful mind could have regarded Mark as symbolized by the lion is hard to realize; and yet this, though it was not the view of Irenæus, had the most general consent among those that followed him. But the power displayed in Mark is of another order, and the ox has strength, but which is spent in service. In this way the apostle interprets it as the type of the laborer (1 Cor. ix. 10), as it is also the fullest sacrifice known under the law. And in Mark we have this Servant character of the Lord, whether in active labor or in patient offering of Himself. Hence the introductory portions which are found in Matthew and Luke are here omitted, and we come at once to His active service. Hence too His titles are in general absent from Mark, save that He is Son of God, which makes His service so full and wonderful. This character of the Gospel is plain all through, but we are going to look at it more fully presently.

3. The "face of a man" greets us very certainly in Luke. It is emphatically the Gospel of the Manhood; and the face of a man is that unto which you look naturally to learn what he is, and what is in his heart towards you. You are never nearer to Christ than in the Gospel of Luke; and while His divine glory does not shine out as in the fourth Gospel, yet you are made assuredly to know that in Him you draw near to God. It is here that we learn of the Shepherd's quest of the lost sheep, and of the Father's reception of a returning prodigal. Our hearts will at once recall sufficiently the tenderness and intimacy which are everywhere manifest in this Gospel; while every trait of complete manhood in Him is carefully delineated for us.

4. The resemblance fails most—from the necessity of the case, probably, must fail most in the case of John: where yet the bird of heaven can hardly be mistaken in its reference to Him who speaks of Himself in it as "the Son of man who is in heaven." We should hardly have anticipated here, no doubt, of all the birds of heaven, the "flying eagle." We must notice particularly, however, that it is just "the way of the eagle in the air" of which the writer of Proverbs once more speaks, as of one of the "things too wonderful for him" (ch. xxx. 19). It is the soaring character of truth in John that is here pointed out to us: truth that penetrates to regions quite outside of human ken. It reminds us of His own words in direct reference to this, that "no man hath ascended up to heaven but He that came down from heaven," so that here we must be debtors to Himself alone, if He reveal to us that of which there can be no other witness except His.

But the "flying eagle" can yet suggest other thoughts,—thoughts not only of divine strength or of divine wisdom, but also of divine tenderness no less and ministering care. "Ye have seen," says the Lord to His people of old, "how I have borne you upon eagle's wings, and brought you to myself." (Exod. xix. 4.) And again, "As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings; so the Lord alone did lead him." (Deut. xxxii. 11, 12.) Here then under this figure we may think not merely of heights that surpass our powers, and of ways too wonderful for us, but of divine love that would enable us to soar, and support our feebleness in it with divine omnipotence. And of this character truly is the fourth Gospel.

This may serve as a first introduction to these blessed books, and assure us of the reality of the provision made for our understanding them. But this is only an encouragement to enter more deeply into the work of comparison, and realize the harmonies that are in these differences, and the fullness of blessing that the Gospels have for us in leading us into the adoring contemplation and apprehension of Christ. Let us go on then into a fuller examination of them in this relation that they have to one another and to ourselves, and may the Spirit of Christ who is with us to take of the things of Christ and show them unto us, lead, control, and enlarge every faculty, and make room for Him less unworthy of Him in our hearts.

The Gospels in Their Internal Relationship to One Another.

The Gospels then are four, not one; and there is no accident or mistake in this. There is, of course, a deep inward unity which belongs to them: because truth is one; but the apprehension of this does not depend upon our ability to put them together into one perfect narrative, nor even to expunge from them as four all appearance of contradiction to one another. The Evangelists are not to be treated as if under arraignment as false witnesses, lest we find them do as He did before a human bar—open not their mouths. They have written, without any possibility of denial of it, four books the like of which the world cannot produce beside; and they have pictured for us such a Person as has never been found but once: we must credit them, then, with knowing better than any wisdom of any age could teach them, how to do the work which they have so admirably done; and we must seek to be learners only of their method, and disciples at their feet.

There are four Gospels, then, not one; and these four are three and one. This division is surely significant, for the simple reason that it exists. In the word of God nothing exists in vain; and the more we inquire in this faith into every detail of it, apparently the most trifling, the more we shall be rewarded. We have then in these four Gospels, first, a trinity of Gospels,—a three that in some sense—some sense of value to us—are one: the Synoptics. The last Gospel stands by itself as a second division.

1. The Synoptic Gospels.

We have already glanced at the unity of the "synoptic" Gospels,—the name generally given to them since Griesbach employed it: but long before seen in some measure, though in a different way from that in which we have considered them. Ordinarily it is apprehended more as arising from there being in them essentially a common narrative, which has been sought to be accounted for, either by their all being fashioned out of some still more primitive, and perhaps unwritten Gospel, or by their growing out of one another by abridgement or addition.

Now this, to which so much importance is attached, is in fact of the very smallest importance to us. It belongs, with all these theories of the "how" of origin, to the region of speculation merely, which as such gives no firm ground to build upon; and then, if it were as certain all of it, as it is all uncertain, it would still remain that we have the three Gospels and not one, and with all needful assurance of divine intention as to their being three.

The similarity of the three Gospels is, however, not to be mistaken. They give us largely the same incidents, often in quite similar language, sometimes in the same words. With all this, characteristic differences of style are plainly to be detected, and differences otherwise, which only force themselves the more on our attention, as being divergences from what might seem a common narrative. Since God has given them to us as three, not one, it is plain that the differences are the very things which will guide us to the meaning of this; and oftentimes the worst difficulties for unbelief will be fullest of meaning to believing inquiry.

After all, this unity of the three Gospels seems to yield little or nothing as to the division of the Gospels by their subject-matter, and we shall be compelled to look elsewhere to find a meaning.

Even what has been previously said as to their common character does not characterize the presentation of the Lord Himself in them, and correspondingly seems to have nothing to say as to numerical structure. That which must characterize a division of the Gospels can only be something inherent in the life of the Lord Himself, and a broad feature of it too, and in looking for this, light will soon break in upon us.

The Gospels are essentially a glorious Life lived in the world—a "Life" which was the "Light of men." If it is John's Gospel that gives us the doctrine, the reality of it cannot be confined to this: every Gospel is a witness of it. Nor in speaking of them as a life displayed, is it meant at all to separate it in this character from that marvellous Death, which however in so many ways contrasted with this, was (in the way in which we are speaking of it now) nothing but the fruitage of that Life itself, and without which it could have profited us nothing.

But this Life—which was in character always "that Eternal Life which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us" (1 Jno. i. 2) —necessarily displayed itself in two essential characters, which together answers to the twofold revelation of God which has been given us as Light and Love. (1 Jno. i. 5; iv. 8, 16). Now Love is the full divine energy; Light is the necessary character of its display. The apostle can say as to believers (Eph. v. 8), "now are ye light in the Lord;" but he does not and could not say, "now are ye love in the Lord." "Love," therefore, finds a pre-eminent place in the Gospel of John, which is, as we know, the home of it, and thus the Gospel of the Deity of Christ.

Are then the Synoptic Gospels, which we may certainly call in this emphatic way the Gospels of His humanity, those which more occupy themselves with "light," as the complemental revelation of God? This, at first sight, seems hard to realize: for "light," too, is undoubtedly a word that is characteristic of John, and love cannot be revealed without it. "Grace and truth came by Jesus Christ;" and these are love and light in application to the need of man, and cannot be separated from one another.

Light is here also as always, the revealing power: "that which doth make manifest is light." (Eph. v. 13). But the "fruit of the light is in all goodness and righteousness and truth" (ver. 9); and the apostle, when showing how eternal life, or the divine nature, is exhibited in those that are born of God, makes its display to be in righteousness and love: "whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother" (1 Jno. iii. 10).

Righteousness, as consistency with relationship, may be even used, and is used in Scripture, in a broader sense than this: so that the "righteous" may be the full expression for the people of God; and the "righteousness of the law" cover the thought of love itself. (Rom. xiii. 8, 10). But we could not speak of God's righteousness in this way. Thus righteousness cleaves more to the human, as love to the divine order: though God who is love is righteous; and the man who is righteous loves.

Thus we can understand how the first division of the Gospels, emphasizing the humanity of the Lord Jesus, is characterized by righteousness, which as consistency with relationship finds threefold expression in the three synoptics: in Matthew in the King; in Mark the ministering Servant of man's need; in Luke, the Man, who as Priest with God opens the sanctuary for us. Here the first division finds numerical significance in Him whose righteousness was one harmonious whole, full-rounded and complete; the unique Man, Christ Jesus.

We must now look more closely at the separate Gospels.

(1) Matthew.

It was an old idea that our present Matthew was either a translation, or at least derived from a "Gospel according to the Hebrews." This is now discredited, and it would at any rate, if proved, be of no possible use to us. But it derives all the semblance of truth it ever had from the very obvious connection with the Old Testament in this first of the Gospels; which approves also its place among them as the first. Not only are the quotations from the Old Testament comparatively more numerous than in the other; but these, where made by the evangelist himself, are fresh translations from the Hebrew original, while, where in the mouths of others, they are from that ordinarily in use, the Greek Septuagint. His own style is full of Hebraisms, and he anticipates with those for whom he writes a knowledge of Jewish customs and of the law, such as only Jews might be expected to possess.

But apart from all this, his primary theme is the connection of the Lord with Israel's Messianic hopes and promises; and though on that very account he has to show also how "He came to His own and His own received Him not," and how consequently the "kingdom of heaven would be taken from them," and assume the mystery-form in which it was unknown to the prophets of Israel, yet still we are not left in uncertainty as to the final issue, when at the coming of the Son of man from heaven, the "elect" nation will be gathered from the four winds to their ancient land again. (xxiv. 30, 31.) This connection with Daniel and the prophets is indeed little more than indicated. The destruction of Jerusalem and the dispersion of her people are an immediate prospect, and with this the Gentile Christianity, for us now nearing its predicted end. Matthew is the first book of the New Testament, and the field of view widens accordingly.

Matthew is in this way the dispensational Gospel, and even the Church is contemplated in it (xvi. 18). Thus there is a new expansion of the ancient promise, and that Christ is the Seed of Abraham gains a new significance: we shall see how in the genealogy with which the book opens this is already indicated.

But King and kingdom are the governing thoughts in Matthew throughout, and the characteristic phrase, "the kingdom of heaven" is found in it two and thirty times. This is divine rule, though it may be intrusted to human hands, and is; for Christ is the King of it. In His absence as rejected by His own, and administered by men on earth, it assumes forms foreign to His mind, and must itself be purged when He comes again. This implies present discipline for His own, and final judgment for the earth; and these, which are the fruits of His own rejection, pervade the book with a certain shadow, and an unmistakable feeling of distance. There is indeed a Father in heaven, and without whom not a sparrow falls to the ground; but there is not nearness of intimacy. The work of salvation is intimated as to be accomplished, but there is not as yet the joy of it. Forgiveness of sins is found, as in the Lord's parable of the kingdom (xviii. 23–35), not absolute but conditional and revocable. Discipleship and its responsibility in walk and life are emphasized; but man's heart is not yet awakened in response to the outflow of the heart of God as yet it will be. Over all these is a certain restraint and reserve, which in the other Gospels we find more and more lifted, until we reach in John what can be called in the full sense communion with the Father and with the Son.

All this suits and illustrates a character of things which we call governmental, and which Moses on the mount at the second giving of the law very precisely pictures to us, but which may go and does go on, apart from any legal covenant whatever. When we have known God as now fully revealed in grace in the Person of His Son, and are with Him also upon that footing, that does not prevent His governmental ways being, as always, largely encompassed with the mystery that attaches itself necessarily to the throne of the Majesty on high. Providentially, as we term it, "clouds and darkness are round about Him" still; nor in His dealings with us do we meet Him face to face; but rather (safely covered with His hand as Moses was, and hid in the cleft of the Rock) we realize His glory passing by; then we look after Him and behold the glory that has passed by—as the apostle distinguishes between the present affliction, which is "not joyous but grievous," but which "afterwards yields the peaceable fruits of righteousness to those that are exercised thereby" (Heb. xii. 11). It is this exercise which the very mystery of His ways secures to us, while it draws out faith in us and reminds us of our feebleness and ignorance and of the holiness of Him with whom we have to do.

That we know Him in Christ, and know Him to be for us, is another thing, in no wise in contradiction with this, and which it is the part of faith never to account of as if it were contradiction. For us it is a Father's hand which is over us: "we call on Him as Father who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's work," (1 Pet. i. 17); so that the revelation of the Father which we find in Matthew, the necessary effect of God's speaking to us "in the Son" (Heb. i. 2), does not interfere with this, but only gives it Christian instead of legal character. The New Testament stamp is upon Matthew throughout; but we are in it only upon the threshold of the New Testament. Naturally therefore, it is just in Matthew that we find "branches that run over the wall" for Israel also, and a link maintained with the remnant of a future day, when His ancient people in the day of famine shall turn to seek their rejected Joseph, so long unknown.

We see, then, that the thought of the Kingdom and the King is the controlling one in Matthew. At first sight we may not so readily see how the truth of atonement connects itself with these. Yet the Cross in Matthew is not simply the sign of the rejection of the King, but as in the other Gospels it is distinctly atoning. The cry of desertion, "Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani," expresses this in the fullest way. This was not man's forsaking at all, nor his persecution: it was the judgment of God upon sin, and the endurance of this was that which was the very essence of atonement.

But, as I have said, we do not readily connect this with the thought of the King. Sacrifice was exclusively priestly work; and the Priest is found rather in Luke than Matthew. Yet in the Old Testament, apart from ritual law, the King is no less distinctly the Redeemer. In that verse in Proverbs which we have already seen to associate together in so striking a way the different characters of Matthew, the "goat" is the very symbol of substitutionary sacrifice. The King is the natural representative of his people: the divine King still more so: and the 20th and 102nd psalms, though with different degrees of clearness, alike connect His Kingship with His sacrificial sufferings (see notes on the Psalms). Even by the hands of His enemies, it is as the King of the Jews that the Lord is put upon the cross, and it is in parables of the kingdom which are peculiar to Matthew that, twice over, the unique figure is presented of One who to acquire the object upon which his heart is set, goes and sells all that he has, to purchase it (chap. xiii. 44–46).

The symbolism here is quite in accordance with Matthew elsewhere. In the prayer taught to the disciples, we find in Matthew "debts," where in Luke we have "sins;" and this again agrees entirely with that view of the work of sacrifice which the Cross presents in Matthew—the governmental aspect of the trespass-offering. But this we must consider with more attention.

As the Gospels give us a fourfold view of the Person of the Lord, so they do also of His sacrificial work; and this is precisely the fourfold view of the opening chapters of Leviticus. Omitting the meat (or meal-) offering, which is not sacrificial, we have there four offerings in which life is taken and the blood of atonement offered to God,—offerings which are really sacrifices—the "burnt," "peace," "sin" and "trespass-offerings."

These are divided into two classes: the burnt and peace offerings are of "sweet savor." The peace-offering speaks of peace with God accomplished and communion attained; the burnt-offering, which all goes up as sweet savor, of the perfection of the work which accomplishes this,—of obedience found in absolute devotedness to the will of God. These we shall have in Luke and John respectively; and of their application to these we shall have to speak by and by. In the two other offerings, the sin and trespass, the judgment of sin is the side dwelt upon, the necessary result of divine holiness, but which cannot be (as judgment) a sweet savor to God. Between these, again, there is this difference: that in the sin-offering sin is dealt with fully as that; in the trespass-offering, whether as regards God or man, it is treated rather as injury, the exact amount of which is estimated by the priest as having the mind of God, and made up with overpayment. In the sin-offering the thought is of expiation in the full sense; in the trespass-offering of reparation.

The Gospels of Matthew and Mark undoubtedly give the aspect of the offering which is not sweet savor. This is evident by that cry of forsaken sorrow which the Lord utters on the cross in both these Gospels, but in these only. But there is a difficulty connected with this very fact: for the sin-offering alone (as given in Leviticus) shows the full judgment of sin in that outside place in which—away from all that is owned as in relationship to God—the victim is burnt upon the ground without an altar: but both Gospels show our blessed Lord in this outside place: the cry of abandonment is in one as much as the other. What then is the difference between them? or is there in this respect a difference?

Now, in fact, in the cry itself there is a difference, and for which there must be a reason: it is "Eli" in Matthew, "Eloi" in Mark; and though both are names of God, there is a difference of meaning. "Eloi" is the ordinary expression for "my God;" while "Eli" speaks rather of power —"my Mighty One." And this last is found, just where such a difference is most intelligible, in the "lion" Gospel of Matthew, the Gospel of the Kingdom and the Throne. "Eloi," as in the Gospel of Mark, would evidently suit better the thought of the sin-offering, as what is in view of the holiness of God, or His nature. And if so, Mark will give the sin-offering aspect, and Matthew that of the trespass-offering.

But to this, which is in fact the true view, an objection may be made, which at first sight would seem a fatal one. In the 22nd psalm, from which the words are taken, and which without doubt gives the sin-offering aspect (see notes on the Psalms), "Eli" and not "Eloi" is the word we find. How then can this be the true view?

I think, nevertheless, that this is not decisive. Scripture is not written in one stereotyped language, however accurate; and in its flexibility of speech it knows how to preserve the most perfect accuracy, while gaining by it a fuller meaning than such rigidity would allow. Any one who will turn to the 22nd psalm will find that the agonizing question, "Why hast Thou forsaken Me?" is not only asked but answered there. It is because "God is holy, and dwelling amid the praises of Israel." If a holy God is to be able to dwell amid the praises of a sinful people, it can only be through such atonement as the cry expresses. Thus the question, why is the Mighty One forsaking the blessed Sufferer, is answered by the declaration of His holiness and grace. Here, plainly, "Eli," "my Mighty One," is more suited to the psalm, because the answer it is that contains the thought, which in Mark, where there is no answer, is suggested in the question itself. Thus there need be no contradiction between the language of the psalm and what has been suggested as to that of the Gospels.

That Matthew's is the trespass-offering aspect of the Cross may be seen in a still clearer way if it is considered that the trespass-offering is, as has already been said, the governmental offering. Reparation, restitution, and in legal phrase the giving damages, are plainly governmental requirements; but the sin-offering, as shown in the forsaking of God, is a question of His nature. God is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, and cannot look on sin: hence the horror of that cry from Him whose delight God ever was: though, as we have seen, the full expression of this is scarcely given in Matthew. While yet the trespass-offering can put on, as here, something of the sin-offering character, because the claim of divine government requires yet a witness to the holiness of the divine nature.

In Matthew we find also the double answer of God to the work of Christ. Having gone for us into the darkness which that which fell upon the Cross only symbolized, the darkness is for us dispelled: God dwells no more in it. The veil of the temple is rent in twain from the top to the bottom: the glory of God can shine out; the way in to God is opened for man.

But the Lord gives up His spirit also: the double portion of man is death and judgment. Judgment He takes first, and having exhausted this, dies. The answer to His death is seen in the resurrection of many of those who slept, who after His resurrection go into the holy city and appear to many. Now death is the stamp of divine government upon a fallen creature, a thing not in itself necessary, for in order to the proper judgment resurrection must come in. And while Matthew and Mark alike give the rending of the veil, Matthew alone gives the resurrection of the saints. All is perfectly—divinely fitting.

Again, in Mark there is no prophetic Aceldama, the field of blood bought for themselves by the people with the money of Christ's betrayal; the cry, "His blood be on us and our children" is omitted; there is no judgment even of the traitor. In Matthew as the governmental Gospel, these things have their right and necessary place, and their omission would be as much a defect in Matthew, as it is a perfection in Mark.

Before we close the brief review of this Gospel, let us notice that, as it begins with the genealogy which is the King's human and legal title, so it shows that He has another and higher one, inasmuch as the kingdom He rules is greater far than David's whose Son is no less his Lord. Matthew thus connects with John by the emphasis that it puts on the Divine Sonship, and on Jesus being truly Immanuel—"God with us." At the close we find accordingly all authority given to Him, in heaven as on earth. All through, the theme is one, although the "Lion of the tribe of Judah" is seen also, as in the prophet's vision, as the "Lamb slain."

(2) Mark.

We have already partly anticipated the subject of Mark's Gospel. Mark is the cherubic "ox"—the Laborer: Christ as the Servant of man's need and of the divine goodness; in this way in entire contrast with Matthew, of which in some respects it might seem, as it has been declared by some to be, an abridgment. He is at the very outset declared to be the "Son of God," but this to give blessed character to that ministry of His which it is the purpose of the writer to describe. The "kingdom of God" we have naturally often still, but no more, as in Matthew, that of "Christ" or "of the Son of man." Save as accusation on the Cross, He is never explicitly the "King of the Jews." Even when He rides into Jerusalem it is only the "kingdom of our father David" that is announced. His title of "Lord" is very seldom taken. But He is the Son of God in service, with divine power and riches in His hand, servant in love which requires nothing but power to entitle it to serve. On this account no genealogy is given or needed.

The earnestness of His service is marked by the frequency of the word "immediately" occurring in connection with it. Half of all the occurrences in the New Testament (40 out of 80) are found in Mark,* but these, of course, in various connections, the enemies of His Person and work being busy also. The singleness of His service is seen in that characteristic word of His (xiii. 32) which must be read in the light of John xv. 15, to be understood aright. Even the Son as Servant knows nothing of His Father's business, save that which is given Him to communicate. Again what tenderness is seen in all the details of His service as Mark dwells upon them: how His heart, His lips, His hands, moved sympathetically in the relief of all manner of human need. Here, too, as in Luke, the ascension is given as the fitting close to His path of humiliation, and this is marked as to the place of power, "the right hand of God": which does not change the unwearied Worker, but puts as it were afresh into His hand the power to serve: for immediately we read: "And they went forth and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following."

We need not wonder if, in connection with this we find hints of another, if not a larger audience being addressed than in Matthew's Hebraistic gospel. Mark's on the contrary, as it abounds in Latinisms, has been even affirmed (though without ground) to have been written in Latin; yet scholars pronounce it "still much more akin to the Hebraistic diction of St. Matthew than to the purer style of St. Luke." (Thomson, in Smith's Dictionary). Yet the contrast with Matthew is decided: he never himself appeals to the Old Testament; he never names the Law; he describes Jewish customs as if writing to strangers; terms that would be offensive to the Gentiles are omitted, and the grace to them more dwelt upon. Even the temple they are reminded was to be called "a house of prayer for all nations;" and in the closing commission, the disciples are bidden, "Go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature," even "the Jew first" being entirely omitted.

* In the common version variously translated as "forthwith, straightway, anon," twice "as soon as," and once "shortly."

Yet in Mark, as in Matthew, at least until the close is reached, there is not found the nearness to God which is so manifest in Luke. The Father is mentioned as such but five times, and "your Father" only in one place (xi. 25, 26). It is the servants', not the children's place that is here contemplated, even though it is recognized that the servants are yet children. Governmental responsibilities and rewards are emphasized, as in Matthew; but there as of disciples, here of laborers for the accomplishment of divine purposes, and after the pattern of Him who as "Son of man came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many."

But in this last, as has been seen also in Matthew, we find the shadow which hangs over the book. The sin-offering aspect of the Lord's work, as shown here, is only indeed brought out in the closing chapters. The substitutionary character attaches, not to His life-work but to the Cross alone. As to this we cannot be too clear. Yet the shadow hangs over the whole in this sense that until atonement has been seen as made, the fruits of it cannot be properly enjoyed. The shadow lengthens into a terrible night, which with a sudden break is scattered and the day comes; for those brought into it, never to give place again.

(3) Luke.

In Luke's picture of the Lord we have indeed "the face of a man." Luke's is the Gospel of the Manhood. Thus we have His birth as in Matthew, but with more circumstantial detail than in Matthew; and instead of the King, hailed by the worship of the magi, we have the gospel preached to the poor, and from the opened heavens by the joyful lips of angels, who proclaim God's good pleasure to be in men. The presence of Christ on earth is at once the assurance and the justification of this: and the manger at Bethlehem shows how fully He has assumed manhood in its lowliest and neediest conditions. We see Him in childhood, growing in wisdom as in stature; and after thirty years of the fulfilment of His own personal responsibility, taking at last His place of priestly service openly before God and man at His baptism by John. There the Father's voice attests His satisfaction, and the descent of the Spirit endows Him for His work.

It is here, and not at His birth as in Matthew, that His genealogy is given; but the stream as it were runs backward now. The line is traced to Adam and not merely to Abraham, and we do not need to know that as a Man He is descended from Adam. But we are reminded too that he was by creation a son of God, and now have the full significance of this made good in a Second Man who undoes the fall and brings in unimagined blessing. "The Second Man is of heaven." (1 Cor. xv. 47, R.V.)

This shows already the character of the Gospel as that in which God and man are at last at one. A new word, "salvation," is now upon men's lips and in their heart: present salvation, known and rejoiced in; peace and forgiveness fully assured. Even from the beginning of it the voice of praise breaks out; and it ends with the triumphant worship of those who have seen the risen Saviour ascend to heaven with His hands out-spread in blessing. Between these the grace of God unfolds itself without check or hindrance, in word and deed; not simply in goodness ministering to the daily needs and sorrows which appeal to all, but in awakening the consciousness of sin, in bowing the soul in repentance, in bringing to God and assuring men of welcome to Him, while the kiss, the ring, the robe, the music of the Father's house await the prodigal, and begin for him the new life which is eternal.

In all this Luke's is the peace-offering Gospel, in which the fruits of atonement are emphasized, rather than the work itself; and this, when we look at the Cross, is quite apparent. The anguish is in the garden rather than at the Cross. There, though the darkness is spoken of, the interpreting words of the Lord Jesus are not found; while twice He cries to God as Father,—in the first case, praying for His murderers. He is not Himself in the darkness, but in the light with God; and it is here we find Him giving sweetest assurance to the soul of the poor sinner by His side, and the door of paradise opened without question to a dying thief.

This is, all through, the manner of the Gospel; and it is in perfect accord with the grace of that humanity, which is here dwelt upon in all that characterizes it. He is the "brother born for adversity," "the Mediator, the Man Christ Jesus," the compassionate High Priest, who goes up to heaven with the uplifted hands. Luke therefore is the writer of the Acts also, which shows the fruit of His intercession in the place to which He is gone up. That Luke was also a Gentile (comp. Col. iv. 11, 14), the only one among the writers of the New Testament, and writes in both cases to a Gentile, is surely significant.

2. John.

We now come to the second division of the Gospels, in which, as we have seen, John stands alone. The number of the division is that which pre-eminently speaks of Christ. It suggests at once the Second Person of the Godhead, the divine Son in full reality, the Only-Begotten and not the First-born. Not less does it suggest His two natures, the Godhead and the Manhood, which John brings fully out. The activity or descent of divine love among us might well be implied under this number.

It is peculiarly also the New Testament Gospel, the grace and truth which have come by Jesus Christ being not merely exhibited as beyond law, but in contrast with it (i. 17). We are so outside Judaism, that its most familiar institutions (as the passover, ch. vi. 4) have to be explained to us; while the Hebrew names and titles (even Messias, ch. i. 41) are given only to be translated into the language of the Gentiles. This connects with its position as the final Gospel, starting morally where the others close, with the Lord's rejection by Israel (the theme of Matthew, ch. i. 11) and non-recognition by the world (10), and thus showing the necessity of divine work—of new life needed by the soul, which when received brings into the relationship of children with God and capacity to receive the divine revelation.

For there is now no veil over the face of God: man tested not only by law but in the Person of Christ in perfect lowly grace, come only to be rejected, God must now act for Himself, and in a way fully worthy of Himself. The veil therefore which law had kept over the face of God, and which in the other Gospels, even in Luke, is rent only at the Cross (Matt. xxvii. 51, Mark xv. 38, Luke xxiii. 45), is absent here all through: "We beheld His glory," says the apostle, with direct contrastive reference to the tabernacle of old,* "glory as of the Only-Begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth."

A contrast on the opposite side with the Synoptic Gospels makes this more impressive. All three give in detail—Luke in the fullest manner—the account of the transfiguration, the exceptional display of the glory of the "Son of Man, coming in His Kingdom." (Matt. xvi. 28; Mark ix. 1; Luke ix. 27: comp. 2 Pet. i. 16–18.) John omits this altogether, and necessarily, for the divine glory of Christ is ever before his eyes. This omission is similar to that of the ascension, which is indeed referred to, but in an exceptional chapter (vi. 62) in which He is seen as Son of man: "What and if ye see the Son of man ascend up where He was before?" The account of it is given in the two Gospels which speak of Him respectively as Servant and as Man; there crowning His path of humiliation with divine acknowledgment. But here it is on this account omitted. The Word has become flesh; and the blessedness of this is to remain with us, without anything to render it less near. "Grace and truth" have come to abide.

There is one special character of John's Gospel, already in part referred to, by which it is connected with the preceding ones, and which will not allow us to forget that after all it is a fourth: that is the word "world": it is the universal aspect of the grace that is come. It is that which manifests the true Light, that "it lights"—or "shines for"—"every man." When the sun rises, it makes no distinction of persons:

* "The Word became flesh, and tabernacled among us: and we beheld His glory" (ch. i. 14, Greek).

when God is revealed, we can ask with the apostle: "Is He the God of the Jews only? is He not also of the Gentiles?" (Rom. iii. 29). So we read here: "I am the Light of the world;" "God so loved the world;" "sent not His Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world might be saved;" "my flesh which I will give for the life of the world," and so on. What makes all this more marked is that, as often observed, John's Gospel is that which gives us characteristically the Lord's Jerusalem ministry, while those before it show us rather that in Galilee. But if He is here at the centre of Jewish worship and ritual, it is only to display the hollowness of it all, and Himself as the one resource and refuge of the soul. This needs no special exemplification: we shall find it all through the book.

It is that also to which the preceding Gospels have been leading on. Even in Matthew Israel is seen rejecting Him, and the Kingdom of heaven thus acquires its mystery-form. The Sower goes forth to sow His seed in the broad field of the world; but this is more anticipative of what is to be. In Mark we find what has been called the Latin Gospel and signs of a Gentile audience being contemplated. Luke is a Gentile distinctly addressing a Gentile. But in John, though salvation may come of the Jews, yet man as man, the world as the world, is fully set forth,—in its guilt and misery alike everywhere, but thus all distinctions lost in this common ruin; amid which divine grace finds everywhere its objects and ministers to the same need.

Man must be born again: this is now for the first time explicitly declared. "I give unto them eternal life": here is the grace suited. But it rises beyond the mere supply of need in bringing those that are thus "made partakers of the divine nature" into the blessed place of relationship with God as Father, in the full enjoyment of communion with the Father and the Son.

All this can now be merely indicated: it can only be developed when we come, if the Lord will, to the study of the book itself. There is, however, one character beside which has to be considered, and that is the aspect which is here presented of the Lord's sacrificial work. Even here, where least we expect to find it, His glory is shining forth. His own words about it are: "Now is the Son of man glorified, and God is glorified in Him" (chap. xiii. 31). We find at the Cross no horror of great darkness hanging about it here. There is no cry of desertion. There is no agony portrayed. If He says, "I thirst," it is not that His thirst may be met, but "that Scripture may be fulfilled." The character of the burnt-offering, which the fortieth psalm expresses, is here made manifest: "Sacrifice and offering Thou hadst no delight in: ears hast Thou digged for Me; burnt-offering and sin-offering Thou hast not demanded. Then said I, Lo, I am come: in the roll of the book it is written of ME: I delight to do Thy pleasure, my God: yea, Thy law is within my heart." (See notes on the Psalms.)

The many sacrifices of Judaism are here displaced by the one perfect Sacrifice, which in its entire devotedness to God shows the true burnt-offering character, its savor brought out by the fire of divine holiness. So in John Jesus offers Himself in the calm and perfect consciousness of acceptance: "when He had received the vinegar, He said, It is finished; and He bowed His head and rendered up His spirit."

This is the witness, not merely of the strength of our salvation, but to the perfectness of our acceptance in the Beloved. How suited also to that particular aspect of truth which we have here: viz. communion in the light with God, maintained by the preciousness of that obedience in which we are accepted. The perfection of the work which He has declared is presently borne witness to by the blood and water which follow the thrust of the soldier's spear. It is the answer of divine love to man's senseless enmity,—the divine provision for his need. The blood of atonement is here found with the cleansing water,—guilt and impurity are both met in the Cross: that which puts away sin for men before God, reconciles them also to God: "the life which I live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave Himself for me" (Gal. ii. 20).

This must suffice as to the Gospels before we take them up in detail, as now at once we shall begin to do. The orderly display of these and other features can only be seen in this way. May the Lord give us happy and fruitful meditation.

SCOPE AND DIVISIONS OF MATTHEW.

CHRIST, the King, and His Kingdom: which, offered to Israel, and rejected by them, is seen prophetically to take on its present "mystery" form, and pass over to the Gentiles. This, too, is seen in its whole course as committed to the hands of men in the absence of the King, and lapsing more and more into disorder, until His coming as the Son of man ends it in judgment. The principles characterizing it throughout are given; and the events connected with His coming again. Finally we have His life given up as the Trespass-offering, in which He sells all that He has to possess Himself, whether of the Church or Israel, and, rising from the dead, all power in heaven and in earth is given into His hand.

Matthew has seven divisions:—

1. (Chap. i., ii.) The King, as promised.
2. (Chap. iii.–vii.) The Announcement of the Kingdom and the King.
3. (Chap. viii–xii.) The manifestation of the King, which manifests also the people's heart towards Him.
4. (Chap. xiii.–xx. 28.) The Kingdom in the hands of men.
5. (Chap. xx., 29–xxiii.) The Governmental Presentation, and the End as to Israel.
6. (Chap. xxiv, xxv.) The putting down of evil at the consummation of the age.
7. (Chap. xxvi–xxviii): The completed purchase.

NOTES.

MATTHEW, the tax-gatherer of his own people under Roman despotism, is the one called of God to write the story of the true King, the "gift of Jehovah" to His people, and thus to fulfil the significance of his name. Rejecting the gift, Israel may indeed remain under the tax-gatherer for their sins, but the gift itself will not on that account lose its blessedness or be recalled by the "Eternal" from whom it comes, and with whom there is no repentance,—"no shadow of turning." The King shall yet reign in righteousness, and Israel too be His people, and Matthew himself shows us this; while in the meantime His grace shall not lack expression, nor His kingdom be taken from the earth.

The special designation of it, which is peculiar to Matthew is—or "of the heavens," as following the Hebrew, the expression always is. In this form it is founded upon the book of Daniel, and was in common use among the Jews of our Lord's day. "According to the Rabbinic views of the time," says Edersheim, "the terms 'Kingdom,' 'Kingdom of heaven,' and 'Kingdom of God' (in the Targum on Mic. iv. 7, 'Kingdom of Jehovah')were equivalent. In fact, the word 'heaven' was very often used instead of 'God,' so as to avoid unduly familiarizing the ear with the Sacred Name. This probably accounts for the exclusive use of the expression, 'Kingdom of Heaven,' in the Gospel by St. Matthew. And the term did imply a contrast to earth, as the expression 'the Kingdom of God' did to this world. The consciousness of its contrast to earth or the world was distinctly expressed in Rabbinic writings."*

"THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN"

This will hardly suffice, however, as to the Gospel of Matthew, in which the constant use of this term must be sought beyond mere Rabbinism or Jewish usage. The Old Testament furnishes us also with its roots, rather than with the exact expression; but the place in which we find them is significant from its connection with a significant period in Israel's history.

In the book of Daniel we are in the "times of the Gentiles," and his prophecies have all reference to these, which he traces to their end in the coming of the Son of man (vii. 13.) But these "times of the Gentiles" imply the subjection of Jerusalem to them,—the throne of God in Israel given up, therefore. Ezekiel has in fact already shown us this, the glory of the Lord removing from Jerusalem, as necessitated by the idolatrous abominations practised there (ch. x. 18, 19, xi. 22, 23). The destruction of the city by Nebuchadnezzar is the sequel of this, and the carrying away of the mass of the people captive to Babylon. A significant phrase comes into constant use at this time; when the ark took its place in Jordan to lead them into the land, it was said to them: "Behold, the ark of the covenant of the Lord of all the earth passeth over before you" (Josh. iii. 11); now in the books of Ezra, Nehemiah, Daniel, and the last chapter of Chronicles, God, having left the throne of His kingdom in Israel, is become in the lips of His people as afar off—"the God of heaven."

It is as this that He gives Nebuchadnezzar the throne of earth (Dan. ii. 37, 38), alas, only to find him rebellious to the Hand that has set him on it. In consequence of which we find him sentenced shortly to be driven to the beasts

* "Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah," (i. 266).

"till thou know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever He will." This is paraphrased in the next verse by an expression which seems to imply the very thing of which Matthew so often speaks:—"after that thou shalt have known that the heavens do rule" (iv. 25, 26).

That surely seems to give us the root-idea of the "Kingdom of heaven," while yet it is as plain that nearly six centuries after this, John the Baptist was only announcing in the wilderness of Judea the Kingdom to be "at hand." The "rule" spoken of to Nebuchadnezzar is only the providential one which has always existed over all the earth and through all dispensations, but without other avouchment of it upon earth than in its acts, and these often unrecognized as such by men, and indeed an enigma to men of faith; for here "clouds and darkness are round about" God still, if "justice and judgment are the habitation of His throne." In the New Testament, on the other hand, the kingdom is in the open sight of men at least, though unbelief may still mock at it and deny it. This is only the form it assumes before it is set up in power as the prophets from of old prophesied of it, though not under the name in Matthew. These two forms are distinguished in the New Testament as "the Kingdom and patience of our Lord Jesus Christ" and "the Kingdom and glory" (Rev. i. 9; 1 Thess. ii. 12). The former is the kingdom of a rejected King, as such gone in the meantime from the earth, and committing authority to men who act for Him in His absence; but this leaves room for failure to come in consequence of their unfaithfulness, and a perverted form of the kingdom itself, which is carefully forewarned of, but awaits rectification at the coming of the King (Matt. xiii.) The parables of the Kingdom are its "mysteries" (ver. 35), hidden from the prophets of old, and which now being told out make the scribe who is now instructed in the kingdom of heaven, like one who "brings out of his treasures things new as well as old" (ver. 52).

The Old Testament form is a manifest Kingdom, set up in power, in the hands of Messiah, Son of David, but Immanuel. (Isa. ix. 6; xi., xii.) Judgment introduced this kingdom, which is characterized by power exercised in righteousness and mercy. Peace prevails on earth, which shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea. Israel regathered and restored, after disciplinary judgment has done its necessary work, becomes the centre of blessing and refreshment for the earth, the glory of the Lord being once more, but beyond all past manifestation, revealed in Zion, and His throne established there. (Isa, ii. 1–4; iv. 2–6; Zech. xiv., etc.)

In both these forms it is spoken of in Matthew as the Kingdom of heaven; in the first having no display of power on earth, the sentence of Lo-ammi pronounced on Israel at the Babylonish captivity being confirmed by their rejection of Messiah when He came. Christ, gone up on high, sits upon the Father's throne instead of on His own (Rev. iii. 21). Faith in the unseen is thus the very principle of the kingdom now, as by and by everything will be manifest to sight, heaven and earth being openly united (Jno. i. 51), the heavenly city in sight (Rev. xxi. 10, 26), and the very judgment of the rebellious shown in that which is used in the New Testament to describe hell itself (comp. Isa. lxvi. 24; Mark ix. 43–48). But thus it will still be the Kingdom of heaven (Matt. viii. 11, 12),—even manifestly so.

"Heaven" is here in antithesis to earth, as in the "Kingdom of God" God is to man. There is no other difference: some of the parables of the Kingdom of heaven in Matthew being found in the other synoptic Gospels as parables of the Kingdom of God. (Comp. Matt. xiii. 1–9, with Luke viii. 5–10; Matt. xiii. 31, 32 with Mark iv. 30–32, and Luke xiii. 18, 19; Matt. xiii. 33 with Luke xiii. 20, 21.) The term in Matthew is broader and dispensationally applied, while the Kingdom of God implies more its spiritual features (Rom. xiv. 17; Matt. vi. 33). The term "Kingdom of heaven" occurs 32 times in the Gospel, the "Kingdom of God" only 5 times: the dispensational aspect of the Kingdom characterizes the book.

Division 1.

Naturally, therefore, we begin with the coming of the King Himself, carefully shown in connection with His genealogical title, and the prophecies that announced His higher glory. But these had also foretold His rejection by His people, which begins accordingly at once to be accomplished. The magi from the east bring Him the homage of the Gentiles, but only "trouble" Jerusalem with their loyalty to its King, and the new-born Christ is sought by Herod to be put to death. But this only carries Him to Egypt, where as the Representative of His people He begins anew their history under the eye of God.

He is thus called out of it by God to fulfil His predestined course as the Branch of David, netzer, the slip or scion of the fallen house, which, growing up in an obscurity which is once more the presage of rejection, finds its suited place in Netzareth (Nazareth),—small enough to be despised of men, and yet in it all the hope, not merely of David or of Israel, but of the human race. Thus on both sides had the prophets prophesied of Him.

Subd. 1.

In the first subdivision we have the King identified: in the first place by His legal descent; in the second by His supernatural birth. As the King of Israel He needed the one; as the King of the Kingdom of heaven He needed the other. But the King is also in Scripture the representative-head of his people before God, and here is One whose representation of them will be surely of divine significance: it means much for Himself—it means everything for them; thus His name is called Jesus, because He shall save His people from their sins.

Sec. 1.

The Lord is introduced in a double character,—as Son of David, and as Son of Abraham. As Son of David He is King of Israel; as Son of Abraham He is not necessarily King at all; but He has a promise of widest blessing, which is on the principle of faith to all the families of the earth. It is not hindered, therefore, by Israel's rejection of Him and the consequent delay of the Davidic Kingdom; this only affects the expression of it, not the fact; which may even find a higher expression, as it has actually found one in Christianity.

Abraham is the depositary of blessing, and therefore with Abraham the genealogy begins. Since title is conveyed by the descent, the stream runs down through the centuries. We find in Luke a very different meaning conveyed by a reverse order: the stream runs back. The style and manner of Scripture have importance as well as its statements, and we may miss the matter by not attending to the manner.

The genealogy is divided for us into three parts, which are specially emphasized as consisting of fourteen generations each. The fact that some links in the genealogic chain have to be omitted, in order that there may be just this number, still further shows that there must be importance in it. The number must be itself significant, and probably that of the parts as well as of the generations contained in each.

In fact, the first part of the genealogy embraces both the heads of promise—both Abraham and David. The second begins at once with one in whom departure from God manifested itself, one whose heart went after other gods than the One Only God, whose special favor had been shown him. After which there is a general history of decline, three descendants of the apostate murderess, Athaliah, being blotted out of the list altogether; while the Babylonish captivity, which was the giving up of the nation as the openly acknowledged people of God, ends the story in this part.

The third part has in it but one significant name, that of Zorobabel; after which the line lapses into utter obscurity. All is ruined and hopeless, save for God, till suddenly by a manifest divine intervention Jesus is born—a true resurrection, which justifies this third part as real numerical symbolism.

MATTHEW.

DIVISION 1. (Chap. i,–ii.)

The King, as promised.

SUBDIVISION 1. (Chap. i.)

Identified as such.

1 (1-17): By birth.

1 (1-6): The line beginning in grace with the heads of promise.

1.[1] THE [a]genealogy of Jesus Christ, the son of [b]David, the son of [c]Abraham.
Abraham begat [d]Isaac; and Isaac begat [e]Jacob; and Jacob begat [f]Judas and his brethren; and Judas a cf. Gen. 5. 1. cf. Lk. 3. 23-38.

b cf. 2 Sam. 7. 12-14. cf. Jer. 23. 5. Rom. 1. 3. cf. Rev. 22. 16.
c cf. Gen. 15. 4, 5. Gal. 3. 16.
d Gen. 21. 1-5.
e Gen. 25. 26.
f Gen. 29. 35. cf. Rev. 5. 5.

The genealogy shows the ruin hopeless but to God, in that Joseph, the last of the line here before Christ, is shown by it to be Jeconiah's son; and against Jeconiah prophecy had denounced (Jer. xxii. 30) that he should be (as to the throne) "childless, . . for no man of his seed should prosper, sitting upon the throne of David, and ruling any more in Judah." The consequence was pressed, as far back as Irenæus, that here the direct line of descent is smitten with a curse, while yet it was not deprived of the legal title: it could hand on to another, therefore, that which could be of no advantage to itself. The marriage of Joseph and Mary was, in the wisdom of God, the means of accomplishing this. The Lord's birth from Mary made Him the real Son of David (Luke i. 32) while the marriage of His mother made Him David's legal heir.*

The genealogy thus shows the ruin of man in the fullest way, while the grace and power of God are declared abundantly. The number 14, thus stamped upon it three times over, is certainly the number of witness (2) combined with that of completeness (7), if we interpret it by its natural factors; if on the other hand we take the dekatessares (ten-four) of the Greek, then the testing of responsible man is what is indicated; and assuredly that would be the substance of the testimony given by the genealogy all through. It is in fact the testimony of the ages up to Christ, which were the ages of human probation as characterized by that "Old Covenant," as books of which the records have come down to us. If the common chronology be admitted, its 4,000 years of human history to its centre in the birth of Jesus is only the "ten-four" in a more emphatic way ($10^3 \times 4$), while if we apply it to the birth of him of whom our Isaac was the undoubted Antitype, it is the 100 years of Abraham's age at which, after the utter failure of nature, the promised seed was born, multiplied by 40, the symbol of perfect probation. Thus by different pathways the same result is reached: God has stamped His meaning on all this too deep for erasure. Paul sums it up substantially for us in his declaration that, "when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly" (Rom. v. 6). This is the moral on man's side of preparation for Christ: we have to be brought down, not up, to receive Him; and all God's previous dealings with man enforce this conclusion.

* There are different ways of understanding this, and it is a difficulty that Zorobabel and Salathiel (or Shealtiel) appear also in Mary's genealogy in Luke, which we may indeed assume, with Lange, to be simply a coincidence of similar names, as with Jacob and Joseph in the list in Matthew, though these are of common occurrence. Zorobabel, "born in Babel," may be conjectured to have been also a name common at that period, though we have no proof of this. The names before and after have no similarity; and it is not easily seen how, if the lines come together here, they should have been separate before this meeting.

There is another difficulty in these names coming together in a line of natural descent, such as that in Luke is allowed to be, that the Zerubbabel of the returned captives was not the natural son of Shealtiel, but of Pedaiah (1 Chron. iii. 18, 19); and of Shealtiel, it is supposed, only according to the levirate law (Deut. xxv. 5, 6).

begat [g] Phares and Zara of Thamar; and Phares begat [h] Esrom; and Esrom begat [i] Aram; and Aram begat [j] Aminadab; and Aminadab begat [k] Naasson; and Naasson begat [l] Salmon; and Salmon begat [m] Booz of [n] Rahab; and Booz begat Obed of [o] Ruth; and Obed begat [p] Jesse; and Jesse begat [q] David the king.

[g] Gen. 38. 11-30. [h] Ruth 4. 18-22. [i] 1 Chr. 2. 5, 9. [j] 1 Chr. 2. 10. [k] Num. 2. 3. [l] 1 Chr. 2. 11, 12. [m] Ruth 2.

1, etc. [n] cf. Josh. 6. 17, 25 with Heb. 11. 31. [o] cf. Ruth 4. 13-17; cf. Deut. 23. 3 with Rom. 8. 3. [p] 1 Sa. 16. 1; cf. Is. 11. 1. [q] 1 Sa. 17. 12, 58.

So much then as to the Son of David; but we have still to see Him in this genealogy also as Son of Abraham—the Isaac, therefore, whose name means "laughter;" His advent "glad tidings of great joy which shall be to all people." In this way we shall find a feature of the register here appeal to us of which as yet we have taken no notice, but which would strike a Jew at once.

The presence of women's names in a genealogy was thoroughly exceptional. As links in the chain of descent they might be needed, as where there were different wives and it was needful to indicate from which of these a title was derived. Now in the first part here there are three women mentioned, of whom two at least cannot be on this account—Rahab and Ruth; which naturally would imply that in the case of the other—Tamar—this was not the reason either. In her case also the twin-birth of Zerah is referred to, as if to remind us of the history connected with her; as, again, in the case of Bathsheba afterwards, who is not called by her name, but as "her of Urias:" which flashes upon us a history worse than Tamar's, both for the actors and the relationships involved.

Indeed these names are not what we should expect in such a list—in a register of descent of the King of Israel—the great King foretold. They are all probably, three certainly, Gentiles; two are Canaanites—of a race under the curse.

Here, then, the Abrahamic blessing begins to unfold to us: just in the most indisputable part of the genealogy, where no Jew could contest their right to a place in the ancestry of his Messiah, these women's names are found. What a light they shed, with all their misery and wretchedness, upon His title as the Son of Abraham! But there is more than this: apart from their birth-heritage, three out of the four are marked out by the sins of their own lives. Tamar, the first of all, actually finds her place here through her sin—her place in connection with the Saviour of sinners! Is it not what we all do? is it not our first claim upon Him that we are sinners and He the Saviour of sinners? Thus we find our title, through His grace, in that which would otherwise drive us to despair, —in that which involves no labor on our part to reach, a title as to which it is not possible to deceive ourselves, which it cannot be presumption on our part to plead. Would we take our place even with Tamar? Then Tamar's name given here may be our encouragement — Tamar's name as one of whom He is not ashamed!

The second name is that of Rahab, drawn out of the obscurity in which in the Old Testament her later history is involved, and brought forward in strange connection with a princely family of the house of Judah. As wife of Salmon and mother of Boaz she takes her place here in the genealogy of the Lord; and we may surely say, in view of the epistle to the Hebrews, and the epistle of James, that salvation by faith is the lesson of her history. Thus we have the second great principle of the gospel proclaimed in her.

Ruth is morally a very different person from Tamar and Rahab. She is a beautiful example of faith that lives and roots itself against every wind of adversity. We know her history well, for the Spirit of God has dwelt upon it at large for our edification and encouragement: against her, whatever personally she might be, stood the sentence of the law that "an Ammonite or a Moabite shall not come into the congregation of the Lord: even to their tenth generation they shall not come into the congregation of the Lord forever" (Deut. xxiii. 3).

2 (6-11): Decay.

6 And David begat [r]Solomon of her of Urias; and Solomon begat [s]Roboam; and Roboam begat [t]Abia; and Abia begat [u]Asa; and Asa begat [v]Josaphat; and Josaphat begat [w]Joram; and Joram begat [x]Ozias; and Ozias begat [y]Joatham; and Joatham begat [z]Ahaz; and Ahaz begat [a]Ezekias; and Ezekias begat [b]Manasses; and Manasses begat [c]Amon; and Amon begat [d]Josias; and Josias begat [e]Jechonias and his brethren at the time of the [f]transportation to Babylon.

3 (12-17): Manifestation and resurrection.

12 And after the transportation to Babylon Jechonias begat [g]Salathiel; and Salathiel begat [h]Zorobabel; and Zorobabel begat Abiud; and Abiud begat Eliakim; and Eliakim begat Azor; and Azor begat Sadoc; and Sadoc begat Achim; and Achim begat Eliud; and Eliud begat Eleazar; and Eleazar begat Matthan; and Matthan begat Jacob; and Jacob begat Joseph the [i]husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ.

17 All the generations, therefore, from Abraham to David are [j]fourteen generations; and from David to the transportation to Babylon are fourteen generations; and from the transportation to Babylon unto Christ are fourteen generations.

2 (18-25): Son of God and Saviour.

18 Now the [k]birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: his mother Mary having been betrothed to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the r 2 Sa. 12. 24. cf. 2 Sa. 11. 1-27.

s 1 Chr. 3. 10, 1 Ki. 12. 1, etc. 2 Chr. chs. 10, 11, 12.
t 2 Chr. 12. 16. 2 Chr. 13. 1, etc.
u 2 Chr. 14. 1, etc.
v 2 Chr. 17. 1, etc.
w 2 Chr. 21. 1, etc.
x 2 Chr. 26. 1, etc.
y 2 Chr. 26. 23, etc.
z 2 Chr. 27. 9.
a 2 Chr. 28. 27.
b 2 Chr. 32. 33, etc.
c 2 Chr. 33. 20.
d 2 Chr. 33. 25.
e 2 Chr. 36. 1-13.
f 2 Chr. 36. 14-23.
g 1 Chr. 3. 17.
h Ezra 3. 2. Hag. 1. 1, etc.
i vers. 18-20, 24. Lk. 2. 6.
j cf. Ex. 12. 6; cf. Gal. 4. 4.
k Lk. 1. 26-38.

Thus she is legally excluded from the very people with whom her faith unites her. But grace is sovereign in her case as in every other. She and her children come into the congregation of the Lord. It is interesting to see that in the rigid observance of this law, David himself, only third in succession, would have been excluded, the reign of law would have excluded the saviour-king himself; so also would it have been as to his great Antitype.

The only woman that remains at this end of the line is not mentioned by her name but as "her of Uriah," her history being thus fully, if concisely indicated. In this case grace reigns, even with regard to a saint's transgression; and this completes the gospel as we find it in the genealogy. The salvation which it brings is for sinners, by faith, apart from law, and eternal. Thus Christ as the Seed of Abraham is fully declared.

Mary's name at the end of the genealogy has another meaning: it shows us Christ as the Seed of the Woman, out of weakness manifesting strength, out of passiveness, the energy of the Overcomer, the Conqueror who with His bruised heel stamps down the serpent.

The genealogy of Jesus Christ tells us, therefore, much of Him. It is more than possible that, had we only eyes to see it, every name in this list would prove itself significant, and have its own story to tell in connection with Him. But it is not mine to attempt this: yet of these so carefully numbered generations, I cannot believe there is one that is not worthy of being so cared for. If we had worked believingly in this direction, how would the work have been repaid!

2. But we are now to look at the Lord in another character, in which no genealogy can tell Him out. Here He is Son of God, the suited King of a Kingdom greater far than that of David, though that of David is included in it. Necessarily then the fact of His divine Sonship has a large place in Matthew, by which this Gospel connects more with John than the other Synoptic Gospels do. The [l] Holy Spirit. And Joseph her husband, being a [m] just man, and unwilling to [n] expose her, was minded to put her away privately. But while he thought on these things, behold, an [o] angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a dream, saying, Joseph, [p] son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife; for that which is begotten in her is of the Holy Spirit. And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name [q] Jesus, for he shall save his people [r] from their sins. Now all this came to pass that that might be [s] fulfilled which was spoken by the Lord through the prophet, saying: [t] Behold, the virgin shall be with child and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel, which is, being interpreted, [u] "God with us." And Joseph, being awaked from his sleep, did as the angel of the Lord had bidden him, and [v] took unto him his wife; and knew her not till she had brought forth her firstborn * son; and he called his name Jesus.

[l] Lk. 1. 35. cf. Gen. 3. 15. cf. Jno. 1. 14. cf. Heb. 10. 5.
[m] ch. 5. 32.
[n] ctr. Jno. 8. 4, 5.
[o] ch. 2. 13, 19.
[p] ver. 16. cf. ch. 22. 42.
[q] Lk. 1. 31. cf. Josh. 1. 1, 2. cf. Phil. 2. 9, 10.
[r] cf. Acts 3. 26. cf. Tit. 2. 14.
[s] cf. ch. 2. 6, 17, 18, 23.
[t] Is. 7. 14. Is. 9. 6.
[u] cf. Jno. 1. 1-3, 14. cf. Jno. 8. 58. cf. Jno. 15. 9. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 19.
[v] cf. Lk. 2. 5.

* Most editors now read "a son;" but it is doubtful.

claim of it becomes the great and critical point in His presentation to Israel, and is that which, more than anything else, brings about His rejection.

As in the case of the genealogy, however, it is still Joseph who is prominent here. We have his conflict with himself, the visit of the angel to him which dispels his doubts, his marriage and naming of the child by which he accepts it as his own. Joseph is here in all this manifestly what the genealogy makes him, the legal heir of David's line, and the representative of its hopes and responsibilities. In Luke, the Gospel of the Manhood, it is on the other hand, and as naturally, Mary who is in the fore-front, and Joseph is only outlined among the figures in the background.

Mary is seen at the beginning in question, if not under reproach. The singular honor which God's grace has conferred on her, is too great to be received unhesitatingly, even by the people of God themselves. We cannot believe for joy: the thing is too good to be true; the will to believe is not sufficient to accomplish faith. For so far is this from being credulity, that it requires all the more decisive proof, the more that for which we seek it awakens all the desire of our hearts. This is all the truth, (whatever the amount may be) contained in the strong assertion of the poet,—

> "There lives more faith in honest doubt, > Believe me, than in half the creeds:"

although the last line can scarcely express his thought accurately. Joseph here, as a righteous man, but in perplexity, thinks of a half measure: he will give her a writing of divorce without statement of the cause, and put her away. But the appearance of an angel to him in a dream resolves his doubt and changes his purpose.

It is quite in character with the distance maintained in Matthew's Gospel, that the angel appears only in a dream. It is so again with the Magi afterwards, and with Joseph himself once more, in Egypt. In Luke, on the contrary, the angel appears openly, to Zacharias as well as to Mary. The difference does not seem founded upon a personal one, as Zacharias exhibits more unbelief than Joseph. It may be connected with the failure of David's house, and especially of Jeconiah's line which Joseph represents; and the blessing comes to him in a veiled form answering to this. Mary is not and could not be of Jeconiah's line, and his connection with Jesus is only by his marriage with her. Yet grace gives him in this way a place of unspeakable blessing.

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chap. ii.)

Borne witness to and rejected: the Nazarene.

1 (1-12): God the Creator and the men of natural knowledge.

1. NOW, Jesus having been [w] born in Bethlehem of Judea in the days of Herod the king, behold, [x] magi from the east arrived at Jerusalem, saying, Where is he that [w] Lk. 2. 1-20. [x] cf. 1 Ki. 10. 1, 2. cf. Is. 60. 3.

The angel addresses him as son of David with the confirmatory announcement of the divine origin of the Child that is to be born, and whose work requires no less than a divine Person to perform. His name, Jesus, or Joshua ("Jehovah the Saviour") is declared to be no mere name, or indicative of some abstract truth, or of some principle to be developed in relation to His history. Nay, Jehovah's people are His people, and He therefore is Jehovah and Saviour. He is the full reality of His name: "He shall save His people from their sins."

Prophecy had already declared the wondrous truth as to His Person; the primal one as to the woman's Seed had been supplemented by one more distinct which plainly referred to it and filled it out. "The virgin" of Isaiah, who was to be with child, and whose Son was to be called Emmanuel, points back to and defines what had long been a hope in the hearts of men. The woman's Seed would indeed be that, without the co-partnership with man ordained by the Creator for the continuance of the race; and this by no mere miracle which would still leave the child to be a man merely, though of superhuman birth. No: his name Emmanuel would be the explanation of the unique fact; "God" would in Him be "with us;" which the angel's words declare to mean "Jehovah," come to deliver us from that which was the necessary barrier to intimacy, and in Himself to bring God and man together!

And Emmanuel is distinctly in the prophecy the King of David's line, upon whose shoulder the government should be (Isa. ix. 5, 6). We see that the prophecy belongs rather to Matthew's picture of the Lord than John's, as we might have thought it; although evidently these come near together here. As King He is at once the Representative of His people, and "Mighty God" who as "Father of eternity"* shall settle all things upon everlasting foundations —Power alone cannot accomplish this: God must become man, the King must be crowned with thorns and be the Saviour. The whole circle of truth is needed here: the Highest must become the lowest; it is His glory: only the Highest could come down so low.

Joseph, awaked out of His sleep, does as the angel of the Lord has bidden him, and takes his wife. The divine intervention does not set aside the Creator's ordinance, nor God put His seal upon human asceticism. Judaism, in fact, knew nothing of this dishonor done to the God of nature. The Child is born and named: and "David in spirit" once more calls his Son his Lord.

SUBD. 2.

So the King has come—the true King, for whom all is waiting, for whom all still waits: for He came but to be rejected, and immediately He has come, we find Him rejected, by the very people who for centuries had been taught to expect Him, and carefully prepared to receive Him. He is worshipped by those from afar; but when He comes to His own, they have no heart for Him; and this is discovered before He has even been personally before their eyes. There is but the announcement that He has come, and we see at once what afterwards they formally declare, that they have "no king but Cæsar." There is no help but to leave them, then, to Cæsar.

Gentiles indeed receive and worship Him: yes, Gentiles, but not the Gentiles. The special link between God and Israel is broken by their unbelief, and now the question is to be asked, "Is He not the God of the Gentiles also?" From

* Not, as in our common version, "Everlasting Father."

hath been born [y]King of the Jews? for we have seen his [z]star in the east and are come to [a]worship him. And when Herod the king heard it, he was [b]troubled, and all [c]Jerusalem with him; and, having gathered together [y] cf. ch. 27. 11, 29, 37, 42. [z] cf. Num. 24. 17. etc. Amos 5. 26. [a] cf. Ps. 72. 9-11. [b] cf. ch. 21. 38; cf. Jno. 1. 11. [c] cf. ch. 23. 37-39.

God's side this can only be answered as the apostle answers it (Rom. iii. 29), that He surely is. But in fact only a remnant really receive the Lord, and these are the subjects of a divine work in their souls. This, however, is John's testimony and not Matthew's; while in Matthew the worship of the magi, while Jerusalem is but "troubled" at their coming, shows the impending dispensational change.

Already the end of Judah's "sceptre"—her tribal rod of authority—as predicted by Jacob, is fairly within sight, and the Edomite Herod reigns over the land. The true King is forced out of it, but only to renew from the beginning in Egypt the history of the people in the sight of God, that He may (as He will yet) show them His grace. But this involves much more for Him through whom the blessing is to come to them, and is no release to Him from the path which ends but at Calvary. He returns, after Herod is dead, to the land of Israel, only to find Archelaus in the place and reigning in the spirit of his father Herod, and to take His own place at Nazareth as the "Branch of Jesse," returning to the lowliness out of which David sprang, but with the hopes of much more than David's house resting upon Him. But we must look at all this more in detail.

1. The King, the Lord of glory, is come into the world, and has to be announced among His own people by men from afar—by Gentiles. Yet not only had prophets from long since prophesied of Him, and the scribes could put their finger upon the place of His birth, but Daniel had predicted the exact time of His coming. Heaven had been recently giving its witness also, immediately before and at His coming. Zacharias and Elizabeth had announced in their own child His fore-runner. An angelic vision had brought the shepherds to the manger where He lay. Simeon had blessed God for His salvation seen, and with Anna had spoken of Him to many in Jerusalem itself. And yet the city is only startled for a moment from its slumber when "magi from the East" come with the inquiry, "Where is He that is born King of the Jews?" and with the declaration that a star had been seen by them as the sign of His birth,—a sign so fully believed on their part that here they were, from their own far off land, to seek and to worship Him.

The magi were the great natural observers of their day, though this connected itself largely with practices which from them have got the name of "magic." They were men of occult science, the astrologers and soothsayers, the interpreters of dreams and auguries. True knowledge in them was variously mingled with imposture and with superstition; so that they figure as variously. No doubt, we may find in those who were real among them the affecting expression of minds that, having lost hold of primitive revelation, turned to search the dim border land of the unseen, to dreams and omens, and the face of the far off heavens, to find that God who was not far off but nigh at hand; and here in these travelers we may see one supreme example of God meeting such in their own way, to lift them out of such groping into the light indeed.

They had heard of a "King of the Jews" and assuredly something more than merely that. Though He were King of the Jews, yet His coming had to do with them, awakening expectant joy and reverence in their hearts. The prophecy of Balaam is the only one of which we know, which could in their minds connect such an one with a "star;" but this, though of a Gentile and to Gentiles, if it were traditionally known to them, must have come through 1600 years of most uncertain conveyance to reach them thus. Besides the Jews scattered through the East, furnished a more direct means of knowledge. Balaam had said nothall the chief [d]priests and scribes of the people, he inquired of them where the Christ was to be born. And they said unto him, In Bethlehem of Judea; for so it is [e]written through the prophet: "And thou, Bethlehem, [in the] land of Juda, art in no wise least among the princes of Juda; for out of thee shall come forth a [f]Ruler who shall be a [g]shepherd to my people Israel."

[d] cf. Mal. 2. 7. cf. Jer. 18. 18. cf. Lk. 11. 52. [e] Mi. 5. 2. cf. Jno. 7. 42. [f] Is. 9. 6. 7. [g] cf. Zech. 13. 7. cf. Jno. 10. 11; cf. Rev. 2. 27.

ing about a star to herald the King: it was the King himself who was to be the star. Yet the prophecy was couched in terms natural to one of the magi; a class to which the seer himself seems clearly to have belonged; and the appearance of a supernatural star to men of this kind, accustomed to see portents in the heavens, might naturally connect itself with such a representation. The star was surely supernatural. No conjunction of planets, such as Kepler pointed out, could be spoken of as a star, nor have begotten so perfect a conviction in the minds of men well acquainted with the heavens. It was, in fact, a beautiful witness of the God of nature to the men of nature,—of One not under bondage to the uniformity in general so necessary to us, that we may have a stable world to reckon on. But this is only a suited back-ground on which the more plainly to display Himself as the Living and Almighty God transcending far the universe He has made, and willing in love so to display Himself.

What messengers these from among the Gentiles, to awaken, if it might be, Israel to jealousy. They come to Jerusalem, expecting, doubtless, at the capital city, to find all men ready to greet the inquirer with a gospel message. They come to find an Edomite on the throne of Israel, and with all the old Edomite hatred in his heart, craftily though he may hide it, and even gather the chief priests and elders together, to hasten them on the way. These, too, can tell all about the place of Christ's birth textually. They give a response which must have stricken the blood-stained tyrant to the heart; but of faith in God they show nothing. They answer that Christ is to be born "in Bethlehem of Judea; for so it is written by the prophet: And thou, Bethlehem, in the land of Juda, art in no wise least among the princes of Juda; for out of thee shall come a Ruler, who shall be a shepherd to my people Israel."

Such, literally, are the words they use: and one might suppose that in using them they meant to inflict a wound that Herod should not be able to impute to them, but which should come home to him as the voice of God Himself. And so it was, though the words are not found in Micah just as they quote them here. For Hebrew was not any more the language of Israel as a whole; and it was quite the custom to paraphrase, rather than quote literally a scripture appealed to. The Hebrew, besides smaller differences, does not give "shepherd" in this passage, but simply "Ruler." The Greek of the Septuagint follows the Hebrew: so that the variation is their own. And yet who can deny that the one word is God's thought as to the other? He who had sent Moses to the sheepfolds to learn how to guide His people in the wilderness—He who in the land had chosen David and "taken him from following the ewes great with young" (demanding therefore, the tenderest care) to feed and guide with no less tenderness, the flock of His pasture—He had indeed consecrated the "shepherd" as the picture of the Ruler whom He had appointed and would raise up. There is but One who has out-done this picture.

The scribes show, then, in their variation from the letter their acquaintance with the character of Messiah as prophecy reveals Him. But we hear no more of them. They cite the text for Herod; and they do it well; but they have no heart for the One they testify to. They are like sign-posts upon a road on which they do not move an inch. They pass on the word to those who value it; Herod himself also becoming the instrument in guiding worshipers to the feet of Jesus. They only, obedient to the Word, turn their faces toward Bethlehem; and as

Then Herod, having privately called the magi, inquired of them exactly the time that the star appeared; and sending them to Bethlehem he said, [h]Go and search out exactly about the young child; and when ye have found him, bring me back word, that [i]I may come and worship him also. When they had heard the king they departed; and lo, the star which they had seen in the east went before them, until it came and [j]stood over where the young child was. And when they saw the star, they [k]rejoiced with exceeding great joy. And when they had come into the house, they saw the young child with Mary his mother, and fell down and [l]worshipped him. And opening their treasures, they presented unto him [m]gifts; [n]gold, and [o]frankincense, and [p]myrrh. And, being divinely [q]instructed in a dream not to return to Herod, they withdrew into their own country by another way.

2 (13-18): Under death-sentence from man, God's Substitute for men.

2. And when they had withdrawn, behold, an [r]angel of the Lord appeareth in a dream to Joseph, saying, Arise, and take the young child and his mother, and [s]flee into Egypt, and be there until I tell thee: for Herod is h cf. Is. 2. 2, 3.

i cf. Ps. 18, 44.
j cf. Num. 9. 15–23. cf. Is. 60. 3.
k Ps. 105. 3. cf. Is. 66. 10–12.
l ver. 2. cf. Is. 49. 22, 23.
m cf. Ps. 45. 12. cf. Ps. 72. 10.
n cf. Is. 60. 6, 9. cf. Is. 61. 6. cf. Hag. 2. 7, 8.
o cf. Lev. 2. 1. cf. Song 3. 6, 7. p cf. Song 1. 13 with Jno. 19. 39, 40. cf. Gal. 6. 14.
q ver. 22, etc.
r ch. 1. 20. cf. ch. 4. 11. cf. Luke 22. 43.
s cf. ch. 4. 12. cf. ch. 10. 23, 24.

they do so, the star which they had lost by the way, appears again and goes before them, until it comes and stands over where the young child is. It does not leave them now till they are face to face with Him they seek.

Then they worship. It is but a humble house, we may be sure, and there are in it but a young mother and her babe. But they worship,—worship, not the mother but the Babe. Divinely taught, they pour out their gifts at His feet, "gold and frankincense and myrrh." The Church of old seems almost unitedly to have interpreted them as, in the gold, the recognition of His royalty; in the frankincense, the acknowledgement of His Deity; while the myrrh, used afterwards at His burial, was taken thus to be the anticipation of His death. We might be disposed, from the use of these things in Scripture, to take the gold as the recognition of His divine glory; the frankincense as the fragrance of a life lived, as none other ever was, for God. But to some of these things as we know, His disciples were long after strangers, nor could we argue that the magi knew the real significance of what they did. But the worship was real, and the great joy with which they had greeted the star on its reappearance, was we may be sure, more than justified in the result.

They are divinely instructed in a dream not to return to Herod; God again thus meeting them in their own peculiar way, and they return by another road to the place from which they came.

2. And now Joseph also is warned by an angel of the Lord of impending danger at the hands of Herod, and flees by divine direction with the young child and His mother into Egypt. There is no manifest display of power made. The angels that appeared, to announce a Saviour, do not encircle with chariots and hosts the infant King. Everything marks that He has come to take no exceptional place in this way from the common lot of men. Nay, it is a necessity of the work which He has come to do that He should stoop to this; and in subjection to these human conditions, manifest His exaltation above fallen man.

Prophecy, however, has marked out His course all through; and it is that this may be fulfilled that He goes down to Egypt. But just here we find what calls for special examination. The prophecy to be fulfilled is that of Hosea (xi. 1): "Out of Egypt have I called My Son;" but this does not, at first about to seek the young child, to [t]destroy him. And he arose and took the young child and his mother by night, and withdrew into Egypt; and he was there until the [u]death of Herod: that that might be [v]fulfilled which was spoken by the Lord through the prophet, saying: "Out of Egypt have I called my son."

[t] cf. Luke 13. 31-33. cf. Acts 4. 25-28. [u] cf. 1 Sam. 26. 10. [v] Hos. 11. 1. cf. Heb. 11. 26, 27.

sight, appear to be a prophecy at all; and certainly not a prophecy of Christ. Any one looking at it would say that it was simply a rebuke of Israel as a nation, for repaying with apostasy and Baal-worship the love which God had shown in their redemption of old. He had them taken out of the misery of their bondage, and called them to adoption as His own family among the families of the earth. "When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called My son out of Egypt." But how had they repaid it? "As they [the prophets] called them, so they went from them: they sacrificed to the Baalim, and burned incense to graven images." This, of course, could only speak of Israel as a nation.

And yet the application of the first verse to the Lord is no mere application. It is not that such a thing took place now in relation to Him who was Son of God by a fuller title, as corresponded to that which had taken place of old in regard to God's "first-born," Israel. The manner of quotation is much too precise for that: the Lord going down into Egypt definitely to fulfil what is spoken by Hosea. Evidently there is here something deeper in the way of fulfilment than we are accustomed to. It is common to say that we have here an example of typical prophecy; but we must understand what we mean, if we say this. For certainly it could only be in fragments of the national history that there could be any typical reference to the Lord; and what follows in the prophet indicates only entire and emphatic contrast, as we have seen. We must, therefore, have some guiding principle to enable us to discern, with any certainty, what is typical from what is not.

Now in Isaiah xlix. we have such a principle: for of whom is it written: "Jehovah hath called me from the womb; from the bowels of my mother hath He made mention of my name, . . . and said unto me, Thou art my servant, O Israel, in whom I will be glorified?" This, one would say, must be the nation; but immediately we hear a voice that is not the nation's: "Then I said, I have labored in vain; I have spent my strength for nought and in vain; yet surely my judgment is with Jehovah, and my work with my God."

Now notice the claim: "And now saith Jehovah, that formed ME from the womb to be His Servant, to bring Jacob again to Him: Though Israel be not gathered, yet shall I be glorious in Jehovah's eyes, and my God shall be my strength. And He said, It is a light thing that Thou shouldest be my Servant, to raise up the tribes of Jacob and to restore the preserved of Israel; I will also give Thee for a light to the Gentiles, that Thou mayest be My salvation to the ends of the earth."

Here, to a Christian, there can be no doubt of the application: it is Christ alone who fulfils this. But then He is also the true Servant, formed from the womb to be this, and the Israel in whom God will be glorified. Here Christ and Israel are both identified and distinguished at the same time. Israel, that had failed utterly,—failed even in hearing this glorious Person when He came,—Israel comes to fulfil its destiny only in and through Christ, who comes of Israel; who is (according to the prophetic language) the lowly "Shoot" from the cut down "stem of Jesse," and the "Branch" that should "grow out of his roots;" and upon whom, in full complacency and in seven-fold power, "the Spirit of Jehovah was to "rest" (Isa. xi). In Him, the "Son born" to them, Israel nationally, is yet to revive. His glory involves their blessing. He begins anew for God their history, purged of its failure and its shame; and hence comes the necessary application of such passages as that in Hosea, "Out of Egypt have I called My son."

Then Herod, when he saw that he was mocked by the magi, was exceedingly [w]enraged, and sent forth and slew all the male children that were in Bethlehem, and in all its borders, from two years old and under, according to the time that he had learned exactly of the magi. Then was fulfilled that which was spoken through [x]Jeremiah the prophet, saying, "A voice was heard in Rama, weeping and great lamentation: [y]Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they are not."

3 (19-25): The return as Sprout of Jesse (Nazarene)

3. But when Herod was dead, behold, an [z]angel of the Lord appeareth in a dream to Joseph in Egypt, saying, Arise, and take the young child and his mother, and go into the [a]land of Israel: for they are [b]dead that sought the young child's life. And he arose and took the young child and his mother, and came into the land of Israel; but having heard that Archelaus reigned over w Ps. 71. 4.

x Jer. 31. 15.
y Gen. 35. 16-20. cf. Lam. 1. 4.
z ver. 13.
a cf. Ezek. 36. 1-20.
b ver. 15.

Yet how differently is it fulfilled in these two cases! For Him there could be no captivity, no house of bondage. For them this had been the discipline needed, the "furnace," because of the dross that the Refiner must purge out. Typically, for us all, it speaks of the bondage to sin in our natural state, out of which a divine voice alone can "call" us. For Him, of all this there was nothing, and could be nothing. Egypt shelters, not ensnares, nor takes captive. He has no natural state to be delivered from. The world of nature, had He desired it, would have yielded Him all it had. The Voice that called Him out of it called Him but to the work for which He had come; and so the "favor," even "with man" was exchanged for rejection, as also for one dread hour, the "favor with God" seemed to be eclipsed in the darkness of abandonment, only to shine out, however, immediately in the glory of His resurrection and return to heaven.

All, then, should be clear as to the application of Hosea. The next quotation that we find here, which is from Jeremiah, and which speaks of Rachel weeping over her dead, is introduced after a very different manner, "then was fulfilled," not "that it might be." This is really but an application. When Bethlehem mourned her babes slaughtered by Herod, then it was as if Rachel from her grave close by were repeating her lamentation. But Rachel must be comforted here also, in a deeper way than in the prophet. He had escaped, who by and by would freely offer Himself to redeem from the power of the grave, and bring back to a better life the heirs of death.

3. But the days of the Edomite were drawing to an end; and soon the angel of the Lord appeared once more to Joseph in a dream, with words that bring back those that set the face of Moses the deliverer toward the people to whom he was commissioned: "they are dead that sought the young child's life." But only had one tyrant succeeded another, so that they do not return to Judea, where Archelaus had begun his short but cruel reign, but into Galilee, and they came and dwelt in Galilee in a city called Nazareth. In this, too, prophecy was to be fulfilled,—not a specific one, but the tenor of the prophets generally: "He shall be called a Nazarene."

Galilee means "circle" or "circuit;" and here was the place in which, though but for a short time through the unbelief that rejected Him, Israel's lost blessings were to return more gloriously. Part of Israel's inheritance as it was, it was now called, as elsewhere stated, "Galilee of the Gentiles," because so full of Gentiles. There the ruin of the people was most plainly to be seen; and thus it was the fitting place for grace to be shown; it would be grace there most manifestly. So, when the Child returns, the land is claimed, as it were, once

[c] Judea in place of Herod his father, he was afraid to go there; but having been divinely [d] instructed in a dream he withdrew into the parts of [e] Galilee. And he came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth; so that that should be [f] fulfilled which was spoken through the prophets, "He shall be called a [g] Nazarene."

c cf. Jno. 7. 1.
d ch. 1. 20.
e ch. 4. 14, 15. cf. ch. 28. 16.
f ch. 1. 22. vers. 15, 17.
g cf. John 1. 46 with Is. 53. 2, 3. cf. Jno. 15. 1 with Is. 11. 1, 10; cf. Judg. 13. 7 with Heb. 7. 26.

more: it is the only place in the New Testament where the expression is used, "the land of Israel." Such it shall be yet, when owned in the future as Emmanuel's land (Isa. viii. 8)

And this connects with what we have had before, and with that to which our attention is once again and more distinctly directed in this summing up of various prophecies. "He shall be called a Nazarene." This was, of course, a name actually given to the Lord, and generally in scorn, from the place to which in general His birth was accredited, and in which so large a proportion of His life on earth was spent. Nazareth was, it seems, nowhere in very good repute, but especially among the Pharisees and traditionalists. It had no history, no memories, was consecrated by no great names; and its own name, which seems to have been but a feminine form of netzer, a "sprout" or "shoot," may even refer to this. It was thus expressive of lowliness, if yet of life, and identical with the word in Isaiah xi. 1, where Messiah is spoken of as the "rod" or "shoot out of the stem of Jesse;" and here His greatness and His lowliness are seen together.

The stem has been cut down; it is better characterized as that of Jesse than of David, for royalty no more attaches to it: and thus the Son of David comes into no outward state or glory, but the opposite. And yet Jesse bears witness in his name also that "Jehovah exists;" and He is the God of resurrection. The Sprout, if lowly, has yet the energy of life in it. In Him the cut down tree is to revive, and to eclipse all its former glories. He is the "righteous branch" of Jeremiah (xxiii. 5, xxxiii. 15), and Zechariah's Branch, Jehovah's Servant, who is to build the temple of Jehovah, and bear the glory (vi. 12). His lowliness is but the stooping of strength in love and to service,—even to death, because His work is resurrection. How great and wonderful is this lowliness, when once we penetrate its real character! how necessary, when once we have understood the need which He came to relieve.

Here then is the key to His position; and it is manifestly the one in which we find Him throughout Matthew's Gospel. For this Branch is to reign, and be a Priest upon His throne. Not only Israel's burden is He lifting, but our own. For Israel in their long probation, in which they failed so utterly, were only the representatives of men—all men—our own: and therefore ours also is the royal Saviour. And this expression implies all this. Nazarene He may be called from opposite sides, for opposite reasons. Those who would dishonor, those who honor Him, here unite together. The Cross is a death of shame, but it is His glory. Up in the glory of heaven, amid the universal homage there, when the apostle turns to see the "Lion of the tribe of Judah," he beholds what might seem but the entire contrast to it—"a Lamb as it had been slain."

Div. 2.

The King having thus been set before us, the second division of the Gospel presents to us now the Kingdom as announced by the herald of it, and then by the King, heaven opening now more wondrously than at His birth, to proclaim Him as the object of its delight, the Son of the Father, and to anoint Him publicly as the "Christ" of God.

There are three subdivisions here: the first of which shows us the King once more identified, as now coming forward, after thirty years' interval of silence, to take up His public work, and put forth His claim to the Kingdom, already declared to be "at hand."

The second gives us the King's own testimony to the Kingdom, with the signs accompanying this—the broad seal of heaven set to that testimony in the sight of all men.

The third is the unveiling of the Kingdom in its inner spirit and holiness, as declared by the King Himself, in what is commonly known as "the Sermon on the Mount." This manifestly completes the announcement. In all this part we find distinctly the Lord as "the Minister of the circumcision for the truth of God to confirm the promises made unto the fathers" (Rom. xv. 8). The Kingdom as yet declared is in its Jewish and Old Testament form, Israel not having yet rejected Him with whom the fulfilment of all the promises is bound up. It is only after it is clearly seen that they will do this that, in the thirteenth chapter we have the parenthetic form of the Kingdom announced, in the meantime of His rejection by His people; now taking therefore its Gentile or rather its universal, New Testament form. But it must not be imagined, on this account, that our own interest in these chapters will be diminished. Not only is the whole range of Christ's interests our own as Christians, but also we shall find that there are principles all through most fully applying to us, and not infrequently that their relation to Israel really intensifies their force in relation to ourselves. But our first consideration must be what is in truth their strict meaning and application; and we need not fear that the truth when we have found it can possibly be less fruitful and profitable than what is not this. It would be disloyalty to God to believe it.

SUBD. 1.

1. At the beginning—as we are now—of the New Testament, it is natural to turn to consider the relation of the Old Testament to it; and this is pressed upon us in an especial manner by the Old Testament apparition which meets us at the threshold of the New in the person of John the Baptist. That he should go before the Lord in the spirit and power of Elias, is declared of him by his father Zacharias; and Christ Himself says of him, "If ye will receive it, this is Elias, which was for to come." It is not necessary to discuss here his exact relation to Malachi's closing prophecy. It is at least plain that he reproduced in his character and preaching the typical prophet whom even in his garb he very much resembled; and his call to repentance is only giving voice to what the law and the prophets united to proclaim.

It is divinely significant that the long interval of about four centuries should intervene between the two portions of God's inspired Word—His twofold testimony to man; and it is equally significant that the general character of the last prophecy should be that of lament over the utter failure of the people, their history closing at the same time, as if there were no use in any longer giving record of their doings. This is in fact the final account of man as man, the genealogies of Chronicles also ending, and the New Testament having only one genealogy, as it has practically only the history of One, the Second Man in contrast with the first, and (thank God) He the last Adam of a new creation.

The ages up to Christ were ages of probation, the law itself being the typical form of this, and giving character to the whole canon of the Old Testament; but even the Gentiles, left in general, as it might seem, outside of positive direct dealings of God with them, only furnish in this way more perfectly their own contribution to the history of utter ruin. And the verdict of the ages as to these both is given us in Scripture itself in such a way as yet to cover both classes of mankind with this double condemnation.

The law tested man—the Jew—as to righteousness: and the verdict of the law as to those under it is (as the apostle declares) that there is none righteous, no, not one (Rom. iii. 10, 19). But the book of Job takes up also the best man of the Gentile world, and outside of law, to make him acknowledge as to himself the self-same condition (Job xlii. 6).

Again, the Gentile was left to his own wisdom—so dearly bought—to find out

DIVISION 2. (Chap. iii–vii.)

The Announcement of the Kingdom.

SUBDIVISION 1. (Chap. iii–iv. 11.)

The King once more identified.

1 (iii. 1-6): The Fore-runner.

1. NOW in those days cometh [h] John the Baptist, preaching in the [i] wilderness of Judea, and saying, [j] Repent ye: for the [k] kingdom of heaven * is at hand. For this

* Literally, "the heavens," and so elsewhere.

[h] Luke 1. 13, 63. Luke 3. 1-3. Mk. 1. 4, etc.
[i] Mark 1. 4. Lk. 7. 24-28.
[j] ch. 4. 17. Mark 6. 12. Acts 2. 38. Acts 20. 21.
[k] cf. Dan. 2. 44. cf. Dan. 4. 17, 25, 32. ch. 5. 3, etc.

by searching as to God. But, says the apostle, "when the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of the preaching to save them that believe" (1 Cor. i. 21). And yet again, the book of Ecclesiastes shows us a Jew—the wisest man on earth—setting himself upon the same quest, to find by wisdom as to God's ways with man, only in his turn to be utterly baffled (Eccles. viii. 16, 17).

In either case, God's coming in is man's only hope; in either case, men are lost utterly: every mode of trial, every assistance that can be given them, short of a salvation all of God, only the more confirms this.

The chosen people of God are the signal example of this. After having been in their deliverance from Egypt, and in the early part of their wilderness-journey, signal examples of the grace of God, they choose a legal covenant in self-confidence to their ruin. Their after-history is only that of the successive stages of their descent into it; until in their removal to Babylon the brand of their apostasy is put upon them. And though a remnant returns at the end of the seventy years predicted, the nation is owned no more as the people of God. Our Lord's own picture of them is but that of a "fig-tree planted in the vineyard," not of the vine restored. (See Isa. v.) And to this, too, with its plentiful leaves of profession, He comes seeking the fruit which should have accompanied them, and finds none.

The causes leading to this are as patent as they are instructive. The remnant returning from the Babylonian captivity find God with them as a remnant, and as far as they have faith to count upon Him; but there is no general return of heart to God even in these, and still less in the nation at large, nor could there be hope or profit in putting them back where they had been before, to follow once more the course that had led them to ruin. No, the only hope is in that ruin itself laid to heart, that it may produce in them that distrust of self in which they shall lay hold of God and find blessing.

Accordingly as a people they are not restored. The decree of Lo-ammi is not revoked (Hos. i. 9): the covenant is not renewed. They return under Gentile dominion, to build up again their temple and city; but they cannot bring back again what they have lost—that glorious Presence with them which was the distinctive feature of their national pre-eminence. The glory of God, which Ezekiel had seen definitely leave its place among them (xi. 22, 23), never returned; there was no ark of the covenant, and as a consequence no propitiatory mercy-seat to receive on the day of atonement the peace-making blood; there was no Urim and Thummim, the habitual means of consulting with God (Ezra ii. 63). While He could speak with them by a prophet, and did, this was an exceptional thing, and itself a sign of changed relationship.

Soon even the prophet's voice closed, and closed in words of sadness and rebuke. They were left with the long story of their past against them, all their hopes now concentrated in the Christ that was to come.

The only hope that ever was! the failure of all else would work indeed for blessing, if it only shut them up to that. The law with its condemnation, the types with their spiritual enigmas inviting solution, the prophecies with their is he that was spoken of through [l]Esaias the prophet, saying, "The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord; make his paths straight." Now John himself had his [m]clothing of camels' hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins; and his [n]food was locusts and wild honey. Then [o]went out to him Jerusalem and all Judea, and all the country round about the Jordan, and were [p]baptized by him in the river Jordan, [q]confessing their sins.

[l] Is. 40. 3. Mark 1. 3. Luke 3. 4. John 1. 23.
[m] Mark 1.6. cf. 2 Ki. 1.8. cf. Zech. 13. 4.
[n] Lev. 11. 22. cf. Is. 7. 15, 16.
[o] Mark 1. 5. Luke 3. 7.
[p] Acts 18. 25. cf. Acts 19. 3-6; ctr. Acts 10. 47.
[q] Prov. 28. 13; cf. Dan. 9. 20; cf. 1 Ki. 8. 33.

clearer light, all alike pointed them forward to but One. Could they now fail to hear the Voice that spake to them? Would they not humbly, gladly accept the grace that was now held out to them?

Alas, it was in this interval that Pharisaism arose under the guise of patriotism and a zeal, all too late, for the Word which they had slighted. It took up fanatically the covenant under the condemnation of which they lay—not heeding, not accepting the condemnation. It took up the law to fence it in by fresh prohibitions from the possibility of a breach, but thus turned it into a mere and grievous yoke of ordinances, without life, which they could not deal with, and so ignored. Above all, it built them up in a self-righteousness which made them inaccessible to the grace of Christ, while ignorant and because of their ignorance of the righteousness of God which would have led them to repentance. They became thus the "ninety and nine just persons who needed no repentance," and who could therefore ask indignantly and decidedly, "Which of the Pharisees have believed on Him?"

To a nation of legalists thus it was that John the Baptist came. He came as the true voice of the law and the prophets, the spirit of the Old Testament incarnate in him. He came with the sound of his Master's feet behind him, and the announcement that at last the Kingdom of heaven was at hand. But the years that had passed had brought no recovery, and the promise had to come with a voice of warning in it. Crying in the wilderness, and not in the cities of the land,—there where Jehovah still remembered there had been shown the kindness of her youth, the love of her espousals, when Israel was holiness to the Lord, and the first-fruits of her increase (Jer. ii. 2, 3), and whither again He will have to allure her, in order that He may speak comfortably to her (Hos. ii. 14). There the cry of "Repent" was in its place.

It was the cry Isaiah had predicted, the voice of the herald before Jehovah Himself, urging them to prepare His way by taking their true place before Him, making His paths straight, as righteousness required. For he was "come in the way of righteousness," as the Lord afterwards testified of him, and could only "mourn" for a condition of things without God, and from which he must needs stand apart. Apart he is therefore, in the most uncompromising manner. While the son of a priest, he exercises no priestly functions. We never even find him at Jerusalem. His clothing even speaks of the desert, being of camel's hair, and with a leathern girdle about his loins. His food is locusts and wild honey. He acts in thorough consistency with the word to Jeremiah, "Let them return unto thee, but return not thou to them" (Jer. xv. 19).

His baptism confirms his preaching. He baptizes unto repentance, and in Jordan, the river of death: baptizes thus unto death; as it is also, according to the apostle (Rom. vi. 3, 4), with Christian baptism. But here we have to distinguish: Christian baptism is to Christ's death, for Christ has come and has died; but this is not true of John's baptism. His disciples simply take the place for themselves, "confessing their sins," of which death was the just due: as it is indeed, the stamp upon a fallen creature, as well as the penalty denounced by the law. In the history of the past, the waters of Jordan had been dried up, to give Israel entrance into the land which God had given them. Now

2 (iii. 7-12): His message of separating judgment.

2. But when he saw many of the [r]Pharisees and of the Sadducees coming to his baptism, he said unto them, O brood of [s]vipers, who hath shown you that ye should flee from the coming wrath? Bring forth, then, fruit [t]worthy of repentance: and think not to say within yourselves, We have [u]Abraham for [our] father:

r ch. 5. 20. cf. Luke 18. 10-14.
s ch. 12. 34. ch. 23. 33. Luke 3. 7-9. cf. Ps. 58. 4.
t cf. Lk 19. 8. with 2 Cor. 7. 9-11.
u cf. Is. 51. 1, 2 with Ezek. 33. 24-29; John 8. 33-44; cf. Rom. 2. 25-29 with Rom. 4. 9-12.

that history is traced back to Jordan itself, but this is dried up no longer: they do not pass through it, they are buried in it; their victory, then obtained, has after all ended in shameful defeat.

Here, then, we see the repentance that John preaches: not a vain promise of reform, not the reform itself, but what is primary and antecedent to all this, the taking true ground before God as hopeless and undone, with such a man as Job even, who, if the best man of his day, and so pronounced by God, found his place here in self-abhorrence.

Were repentance the same as reformation, or "doing better," as is more vaguely said, we might well despair, if the best man on earth had yet to repent in this sense. On the other hand, it is not hard to realize how the very perfection, comparatively, of his life and ways might hinder the apprehension of the evil in him, till he had measured himself fairly in the presence of God. This is his own account of it, as is evident. He had found in such light, deeper than his outward life, a self from which he turned in shame and loathing. Repentance was, in him, not doing in any shape, but turning from all that he had done and been, to cast himself upon mere mercy. And this mercy in God met him there and then with full deliverance and lifting up out of all his sorrows.

Thus, then, was the way of the Lord to be prepared into His Kingdom. As Isaiah states it—though the quotation is to be found in Luke, not here, the mountain was to be leveled, the valley filled, pride abased and lowliness exalted, grace in God realized as needed alike by all, sufficient for any. So would He have His way.

John preached, and his word was with power to break through the hollow crust of things and bring men to reality. This man with his strange garment and rough fare, was at all events real. Multitudes from all the country round about poured out to listen to him, and submitted to his baptism. The conditions of it were within easy reach: every convicted sinner had in this his title.

2. But we soon find the opposition of the heart to God revealing itself, even under apparent conformity to such humbling requirements, and John emphasizes therefore the division that would be made among men when the King should come. For now, among the multitude, whether merely to be in the fashion, or else moved by a power to which they would not wholly yield themselves, many Pharisees and Sadducees came to his baptism. They were the religious leaders of the people, though far enough apart from one another, types of the two directions in which men turn away from God. As the Pharisee was the legalist and formalist, so the Sadducee was the rationalist and semi-infidel of his day. Apart as they were from one another, they could yet show their essential oneness by the way in which they could combine against the followers of the Lord; and John treats them as one, essentially. "O brood of vipers," he exclaims, "who has shown you that ye should flee from the coming wrath?" He could not credit them with having felt the sting of such an incentive. They must prove, then, the reality of it—must bring forth fruit worthy of repentance. And here self-judgment would show itself first of all, in giving up the false and futile pretensions which they based upon their descent from Abraham, for all the promises to him God could fulfil to a seed raised up to him from what might be to them as it were from the very stones.

These pretensions were indeed enormous. "The common notion of the time," says Edersheim, was that "the vials of wrath were to be poured out for I say unto you that God is able of these [v]stones to raise up children unto Abraham. And already is the [w]axe directed at the root of the trees: every tree, therefore, that bringeth not forth good fruit is cut [v] cf. Is. 63. 16. cf. Gal. 3. 7-9. cf. Rom. 11. 17, 18.

[w] cf. ch. 5. 25. cf. Jas. 5. 9. cf. Lk. 19. 41-44; cf. 2 Pet. 3. 9, 10.

only on the Gentiles, while they, as Abraham's children, were sure of escape—in the words of the Talmud, that the 'night' (Isa. xxi. 12) was 'only to the nations of the world, but the morning to Israel.' For no principle was more fully established in the popular conviction, than that all Israel had part in the world to come, and this specifically because of their connection with Abraham. This appears not only from the New Testament, from Philo and Josephus, but from many Rabbinic passages. 'The merits of the fathers' is one of the commonest phrases in the mouths of the Rabbis. Abraham was represented as sitting at the gate of Gehenna, to deliver any Israelites who might have been otherwise consigned to its terrors. In fact, by their descent from Abraham, all the children of Israel were nobles, infinitely higher than any proselytes. 'What,' exclaims the Talmud, 'shall the born Israelite stand upon the earth, and the proselyte be in heaven?' In fact, the ships on the sea were preserved through the merit of Abraham; the rain descended on account of it. For his sake alone had Moses been allowed to ascend into heaven, and to receive the law; for his sake the sin of the golden calf had been forgiven; his righteousness had on many occasions been the support of Israel's cause; Daniel had been heard for the sake of Abraham; nay, his merit availed even for the wicked. In its extravagance the Midrash thus apostrophizes Abraham: 'If thy children were even (morally) dead bodies, without bloodvessels or bones, thy merits would avail for them.'"

So thoroughly had Israel missed the lesson which in Abraham himself God had kept constantly before their eyes, that he was a man justified by faith, and that the circumcision of which they boasted was, in fact but the sign of righteousness by faith (Rom. iv. 2-5, 11). Alas, natural birth, mere outward participation with the people of God, or ceremonial ingrafting among them,—it is possible for men even yet, and under a very different dispensation, to attribute to such things an extraordinary importance. For the Jew, it is plain that John's language assailed his most cherished hopes. It was possible, then, that all upon which he had built should fail him, and God could bring in, in his stead, those who had no natural claim, or birth-relationship at all! To us who enjoy, in fact, a place so given, this is simple; but for the Jew it would be an overwhelming thought. It did indeed show that the axe was being laid at the root of the trees. All depended upon the fruit that manifested the tree. If the fruit was bad, what matter though it should be of the finest stock?

The sinner, as such, wherever he was, was under the wrath of God. If once the limit of forbearance were reached, the tree cut down was destined for the fire. Very simple truth indeed; but no man loves it. Because he does not love it, he will invent every possible way of escape; or rather, hide from his own eyes that from which there is none. How terrible is the power of self-deceit in all of us; and how great need for the plainest possible speaking, where this is the case! For, thank God, there is a way of escape—not indeed from the need of repentance, but by its means. For repentance is only the backside of faith: he who turns his back on himself finds grace from the One to whom he turns,—who has thus become visible to him.

All John's aim therefore is to bring men to repentance. For this he baptizes "with water:" laying stress upon the "water," expressly to free them from the idea that there was anything in this, apart from the significance which it had as a baptism to repentance. Water is only water—can only produce a material effect, and not a spiritual. Nor does God ordain it to a magical use, perverting the nature of what He has created. On the contrary, He takes up what is in itself, and manifestly, nothing, in order that men should not lose sight down and cast into the fire. I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance; but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, [z]whose sandals I am not fit to bear: he shall baptize you with the [y]Holy Spirit and [z]fire.

[x] ver. 14. Mk. 1. 7, 8. Lk. 3. 16, 17. John 1. 15, 26, 27. John. 3. 28, 30.

[y] Acts 1. 4, 5 with Acts 2. 1-4, 16-20; cf. 1 Cor. 12. 13. [z] Mal. 4. 1; ch. 13. 8, 9; Lk. 16. 22-26.

of the spiritual meaning by what might seem to have some inherent virtues. Baptism, with John as with Paul, is simple burial of the dead, not life, not resurrection, but the contrary of this: the confession of need, of sin and death, that Another may be seen and known and trusted in.

He turns therefore now to speak of that Other and His baptism, and to put himself in the lowliest attitude at the feet of the One of whom he is but the herald, and unworthy even to bear His sandals—to perform the office of the meanest slave: a strong testimony from one to whom all the nation seemed looking at this time; but what John announces Him as to do speaks more strongly yet: for what must He be who baptizes with the Holy Spirit? No doubt, the Jews were far from having any proper intelligence with regard to the Holy Spirit; yet they knew it was a divine influence that was here spoken of. We ought to have clear knowledge; and yet of few things, perhaps, in Christianity has there been more misunderstanding than of the baptism of the Spirit. Indeed, the very thing with which John contrasts it here, the baptism of water, has been and is by many, nay, by the large number of professing Christians, confounded with it; and as a necessary consequence it has been degraded to mere unreality, subjected to man's will, made to inflate the pride of a pretentious ecclesiasticism, and to deceive the credulous victims of superstition to their ruin. While, on the other hand, many who have truer knowledge of spiritual things yet reduce the baptism of the Spirit to a temporary, oft-repeated influence, whose significance is in reverse proportion to its ready repetition.

It is evident that our Lord is but applying the words here, when He says to the disciples after His resurrection: "John truly baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Spirit not many days hence" (Acts i. 5). Here is the same contrast of water with Spirit, yet the same term, "baptism," applied to each; while the Spirit on the day of Pentecost when these words were fulfilled, did not connect itself with water, nor were those to whom they were spoken baptized with water at that time at all. It is certain, also, that these disciples were born again before Pentecost, and that this baptism, therefore, was not their new birth. Scripture, if we pay the least real heed to it, easily delivers us thus from such strange delusions.

On the other hand, clearly at Pentecost the Christian Church began, and this is the "Church which is Christ's body" (Eph. i. 22, 23); while, in exact agreement with this we are told (1 Cor. xii. 13), that "by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body." Thus the baptism of the Spirit is not that by which men are new-born, but that by which those already new-born become members of the body of Christ. It is not the beginning of the Spirit's work in souls, but a further, and yet in an important sense an initial work.

It does not follow, however, from the way in which Christianity has fulfilled this prophecy of John, that he knew anything of the Church as the body of Christ. It is certain that this was a revelation of later date, and necessarily hidden from him (Eph. iii. 3-6). It is certain, because Scripture declares it (1 Pet. i. 10-12), that prophets might be led of the Spirit to utter what was quite beyond their own intelligence. But more than this, it does not follow, because Christianity has fulfilled this in a certain way, that there may not be another fulfilment of it, Israelitish and not Christian, in those days to which the Baptist seems to point on, when Israel will be God's threshing-floor and finally purged, according to the Lord's own prophecy at an after-time. There does not seem, at least, any reason why the outpouring of the Spirit upon Israel and the nations in millennial times, of which Joel and others plainly speak, should not be called a "baptism," as initiating for them that state of bless-

3 (iii. 13-17): The King anointed, and proclaimed from heaven.

Whose [a]fan is in his hand, and he shall thoroughly purge his threshing-floor, and shall gather his wheat into the [b]garner; but the chaff he will burn up with [c]unquenchable fire.

13 Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to the Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him. But John would have hima cf. Mal. 3. 1-3. cf. chap. 25. 31-46.

b ch. 13. 29, 30, 39-43. ch. 8. 11. cf. Luke 16. 22. cf. Heb. 4. 9.
c Ps. 1. 4-6; cf. Mark 9. 43-48; cf. 2 Thess. 1. 8, 9; cf. Rev. 20. 9-15.

ing which will then be theirs. Such double accomplishments of prophecy are by no means rare.

It agrees with this thought that John puts alongside of this baptism of the Spirit the baptism of fire; which finds its explanation in what directly follows: "He shall burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire." Many would point us rather to the "cloven tongues like as of fire," on the day of Pentecost,—a thought natural enough if Christianity were the complete fulfilment of what is here, and such an idea has become fully attached to the expression, a "baptism of fire." But the tongues of fire convey a different idea—that of a word that shall act upon others, while that of baptism is of something into which the subjects of it are themselves introduced. These things may have easy connection, but they are not the same. Moreover the going forth of the gospel among men of divers tongues does not seem at all in the line of the Baptist's message here, which is an exhortation to Israel in view of the coming Kingdom and their unpreparedness for it. There would be alternate consequences, according as they repented and received, or else rejected, the coming King: they would either be separated to God by the action of the Spirit of God, or separated to judgment, if they rejected Him.

He had just been speaking of the burning of the fruitless tree; he goes on now to speak of the coming of the King under the figure of one who winnows wheat in his threshing-floor. He fans away the chaff to get the wheat, which alone he values; and this is exactly what is necessary for the blessing of Israel, who are to be blessed upon earth. For this the wicked must be severed from among the just, as we find in one of the parables of the Kingdom afterwards (xiii. 49): the earth must be freed from the destroyers of it. The saints of the present time are, on the other hand, taken to heaven; and for their blessing no such judgment of the earth is needed.

We see that the Baptist goes on to a judgment which is even yet future, and says nothing about the present delay of it in the Lord's long-suffering. This is quite in the manner of Old Testament prophecy, as in that of Isaiah which the Saviour quoted and appealed to in the synagogue at Nazareth. There He quotes "the Spirit of the Lord is upon Me," and as far as "to preach the acceptable year of the Lord." There He stops, though the sentence goes on without a break to "the day of judgment of our God" (Luke iv. 19; Isa. lxi. 1, 2); just as in John's words also, in connection with the blessing and restoration of Israel, which in Isaiah are then described in glowing terms.

We find this as a principle all the way through the Old Testament. Christianity, with all belonging to it, is a "mystery hid in God,"—abundantly spoken of in types and figures throughout, but of course needing the light of the New Testament for its discovery. Even John is not given to see behind the veil, although being brought face to face with Christ, he is "much more than a prophet" of the Old Testament.

But John is not at his highest in any of the so-called "synoptic" gospels. It is John the Evangelist who records for us his fullest utterances. In Matthew the herald of the Kingdom has nearly completed his testimony, and is about to pass away. But before doing so he is privileged to baptize the One whose coming he anticipates and welcomes with such fullness of delight; and we are now to stand with him in the presence of the KING.

3. The third section gives us now therefore, in brief but all important words, dered him, saying, I have [d]need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me? And Jesus answering said unto him, [e]Suffer it now: for so it becometh us to fulfil all the manifestation and anointing of the King, who is also, as we have seen, even in that character the Saviour. He now comes forth from His private into His public life, to take up the wondrous work for which He alone is competent. Although not historically so, yet in its significance here, the mission of the Baptist ends where Christ begins His public ministry.

[d] ver. 11. cf. ch. 11. 11. [e] cf. ch. 17. 27. cf. Lk. 12. 50 with Lk. 24. 46.

"Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him." There is definite purpose and meaning then, in this baptism; and yet, from what we have seen of its character as John proclaims it, it is the last thing that we should have imagined possible for the Lord, to be baptized of John. John himself thinks so: he is startled, even to refusing it: "but John forbad Him, saying, I have need to be baptized of Thee, and comest Thou to me?" In fact there has been the widest misunderstanding among Christians of this act ever since; and we need to look at it earnestly and reverently, in order (if it may be) to find the track where so many have gone astray. We shall not need, however, to discuss the conflicting views that have been taken. It will be more profitable to enquire directly for ourselves what Scripture may give us with regard to it. There is, it is true, no direct explanation; the Lord's words in reply to John, "Suffer it to be so now, for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness," require themselves to be set in the light of related facts, before, as it seems, we shall be able to apprehend them. Let us start with some of the plainest of these, and see what light they may throw upon the matter.

It is clear that this baptism of Christ by John lies at the entrance of His public ministry. Before this, with the exception of the notices of His birth, and the one incident of His youth which Luke recalls, the silence of the Gospels with regard to His life up to this time, when He is about thirty years of age, is absolute and profound. So strange has it seemed that this should be, that, as is well-known, the gap has been sought to be filled by apocryphal statements, in which miraculous deeds, as unlike the soberness of Scripture as possible, and as far removed from the character of the "signs" which bore testimony to His divine nature, fill the pages with transparent falsehood. They only have their use in showing us what our Gospels would have been, had they been left merely to human wisdom to provide for us. We have not really a scrap of this apocryphal work which is otherwise worth preserving. The denial of all this invention of the miraculous is found where the turning of water into wine at Cana of Galilee is stated to be the "beginning of miracles" which He did, and which showed forth His glory (Jno. ii. 11). And the silence of Scripture otherwise as to all these years of His life regarding which there were, of course, so many witnesses ready to utter all they knew, and so many eager, as we should be, to take it in—this silence can only be accounted for by a Hand controlling, and a divine design.

When He comes forth, it is to be proclaimed by John as "the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world" (Jno. i. 29); and in such a view of Him we shall find the speech of this mysterious silence. The passover lamb was to be "taken" on the tenth day of the first month, and "kept up" until the fourteenth day before being sacrificed. Yet the whole year was changed evidently in view of this, which was in fact the primal deliverance upon which the after-deliverance from Egypt was really based. Why then these unnoticed ten days?

Notice, that we are in the midst of the typical shadows of the Old Testament; and, according to the symbolic language which these types speak throughout, the number ten is the number of responsibility, as derived from those ten commandments which are its perfect measure according to the law. The lamb was, as we know, to be without blemish —and this means as to the true Lamb a spirrighteousness: then he suffered him. And Jesus, having been baptized, came up straightway out of the water; and behold, the [f]heavens were opened, and he itual state. Putting these things together, it is plain that they have connected meaning, and that the ten days of silence, yet of responsibility, answer in fact to the thirty years of silence—a three times ten—in which He was living for Himself His individual life before the eye of God, after this to come forward and be approved of Him as "without blemish and without spot." In fact, He is then so approved, the Father's voice giving testimony publicly to Him as His beloved Son, in whom He is well pleased.

[f] Mk. i. 10. Lk. 3. 21, 22. Jno. i. 32-34. cf. Acts 7. 56.

The typical "four days" of public testing—the meaning again given by the numeral—were still to come before the actual sacrifice should take place. He is immediately led up of the Spirit into the wilderness, for the express purpose of being "tempted by the devil." And His life afterwards, how different is it from that quiet life at Nazareth in which He had been so long in communion with His own thoughts and with God! This was the fulfilment of His own individual responsibility, having its divine necessity in order that He should be able to give Himself for others, yet on that very account private, and not public. Miracles, as we see at once, would have been quite out of place here. For Himself He never used them, as He had come down to the common lot of men, and was for Himself far beyond need of them. Only God could be the competent witness of such a life, and He it is who must give witness, as He does.

It is plain that if it is as the unblemished Lamb He is presenting Himself here, the Lord's baptism by John at once becomes unmistakable in its significance. In the Gospel of Mark He speaks of His baptism,* with evident reference to His sufferings (Mark x. 38). Christian baptism is also spoken of as "baptism unto death," and in it we are "baptized unto His death" (Rom. vi. 3, 4). With this John's baptism in Jordan—the river of death—is in full agreement. The words, "so it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness," receive also in this way their simplest interpretation. For those who were "confessing their sins" in such a manner, the first step in righteousness of which they were capable was to take openly their place in death, as that which was their due. This is alone the principle according to which He can unite the other recipients of John's baptism, so different as they were, with Himself: for, for Him also, who having no sins of His own, was yet there for the sins of others, the place of death which it prefigured was no less the requirement of righteousness; the blessed Substitute for sinners had of necessity to take the sinners' place.

Thus all is clear throughout, while as the King we have already seen that the Lord acts as the Representative of His people, who is to save His people from their sins. No Kingdom, such as prophecy had pointed out, apart from this. No possibility could there be of men being "His people," apart from it. Men are sinners, and a holy God cannot for a moment ignore this. When Israel came of old into relationship with Him, it could be only by the blood of the lamb: redemption could not be by power only, but (and first of all) by blood. He, therefore, who is to be King of God's Kingdom cannot without preliminary take the throne. He must suffer that He may be glorified: He must come to the throne by the way of the Cross.

And so, when the throne is taken, the effect of this and the character it manifests abide. "He shall be a priest upon his throne" (Zech. vi. 13). He still stands before God for the people over whom He reigns; and while He is the true Melchizedek, "king of righteousness," He is also the true King of Salem, "King of peace." In Him "righteousness and peace have kissed each other" (Ps. lxxxv. 10). For His throne, like the mercy-seat of old, is blood-sprinkled; saw the Spirit of God descending as a [g]dove, and coming upon him; and behold, a [h]Voice out of the heavens, saying, [i]This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

* In the common version, also in the present one (Matt. xx. 22), but all editors agree that it is an interpolation.

g cf. Gen. 8. 8-12. cf. Lev. 1. 14-17. cf. Is.38.14. *cf.*ch.10.16. cf. Song 5. 12; cf. Ps. 68. 13. h Jno. 12. 28; ctr. Ex. 19. 19; ctr. Ex. 20. 1, etc. i Mark 1. 11; Luke 9. 35; 2 Pet. 1. 17; cf. Is. 42. 1; cf. Heb. 2. 9.

and the cherubim of judgment gaze upon it from between their covering wings, and are at rest.

Here, therefore, the Lord enters not yet upon His Kingship. He is anointed, but not crowned. It is priesthood that must first act and prepare the way. Thus, rising up out of the water, the Spirit of God descends upon Him as a dove: He becomes not simply in title but in fact, the Christ, the "Anointed." As Aaron of old had by himself received the typical anointing without blood, in order to his exercising the priesthood, so is He now declared fit for and consecrated to His sacrificial work, Priest and Sacrifice as He is in one. His perfection is as needful to the one as to the other. The white linen garments of the day of atonement, and not the robes of glory and beauty, are those in which alone the sacrifice is offered that enters the sanctuary, and in which he enters it to sprinkle the blood before God. It is what He Himself was that prevailed, in the day of unequaled agony, when Aaron's Antitype offered up to God the only acceptable offering, and was accepted in that glorious "obedience unto death," by which "the many" for whom He stood "are constituted righteous" (Rom. v. 19).

What the Father's voice proclaimed the Spirit seals (Jno. vi. 27). He comes to rest where there is a heart—at last, a human heart—in perfect sympathy with His own, to give Him lodgment. Thus, appearing as a dove, He manifests exactly the character of Him upon whom He comes. The dove was one of the sacrificial birds—the symbol of Christ, therefore, in the very attitude in which we find Him here; and all is still in perfection and divine harmony. Father, Son, and Spirit are indeed for the first time openly manifested together in the work of redemption, while it is Christ, in the perfection of manhood reconstituted, and in Him brought nigh to God, to which Father and Spirit witness.

The dove, or pigeon,—and the two were almost one,—was in fact the only bird explicitly named for sacrifice. As the "bird of heaven" it has, undoubtedly, its first significance. Heaven itself provides the offering by which heaven is to be appeased and opened over man. "The Second Man is from heaven" (1 Cor. xv. 47). He who has sinned, as all mere men have, cannot by that fact provide the unblemished offering that will alone avail. It is God, therefore, who Himself provides it; and in this way manifests Himself in unspeakable goodness to win man's heart to Himself. This is the divine power of the gospel in reconciliation. He who requires has fulfilled the requirement. He who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity has yet devised the wondrous means whereby His banished should be restored to Him. Not only so, but for this restoration the bird of heaven shows us God become man—no temporary condescension, but eternal love made known for eternity, eternally to be enjoyed.

Christ is divine love come down, and the dove is the bird of love and sorrow united. The love explains the sorrow: the sorrow the depth of the love. What a world to welcome the Son of God! and what a welcome the world gave Him! "A man of sorrows and acquainted with grief! and we hid, as it were, our faces from Him: He was despised, and we esteemed Him not."

But Scripture is more definite than this as to the dove, for it points us to "its wings covered with silver, and its feathers with yellow gold." (Ps. lxviii. 13.) And here the reference will be plain to those that are acquainted with the symbolism. "Silver" gets its significance from the money of atonement, and its meaning is well illustrated in passages familiar to us. The wings are silver, for it is in redemption that the activity of divine love has been displayed; while in the feathers is the gleam of gold, the display of divine glory. This is how nature witnesses to Christ.

4 (iv. 1-11): His proving in the wilderness.

4. [j] Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness, to be [k] tempted of the devil; and when he had [j] Mk. 1. 12, etc. Lk 4.1, etc. Luke 4. 14.

cf. Acts 8. 39; cfr. Gen. 2. 8. [k] cf. Ex. 12. 3-6; cf. Heb. 2. 18; cf. Heb. 4. 15.

The Father proclaims the Son. The apostle tells us that "no man taketh this honor unto himself"—that of the high priesthood—"but He that was called of God, even as Aaron. So also Christ glorified not Himself to be made a High-priest, but He that said unto Him, "Thou art my Son" (Heb. v. 4, 5). This, then, was the Lord's induction into His office, as having the relationship which is acknowledged here. Yet it is not as the Only-begotten Son, or in His Deity that He is addressed; for, in that case, it could not be added, as in Hebrews, "to-day have I begotten Thee." Nor could His divine glory be the foundation of a priesthood which, of necessity, is human. It must be, therefore, as born into the world by the power of the Holy Ghost, as the angel says to Mary, "therefore that Holy Thing that shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God." Here he is Son of God in His human nature,—Man, but a unique Man. And the connection of this with His priesthood is not hard to trace. True Man He is, without taint of the fall—the Son of God, as coming (like Adam, but another Adam) fresh from the inspiration of God. Thus He begins another creation, though out of the ruins of the old. In this way He is the Representative Head of a new race of men, standing for them before God, with God, the true Mediator-Priest of the new humanity.

No wonder that heaven opens to own and induct into His place this glorious Person! "Therefore doth my Father love Me," He says elsewhere, "because I lay down my life that I might take it again." And here, where He is, as it were, pledging Himself to that death for men, the Father's voice breaks out in all its fullness of joy in Him: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well-pleased."

Let us notice before we pass on, how in the meat-offering view of His Person the distinction between His birth of the Spirit and His anointing is kept before us. (See notes on Lev. ii.) In the first general view of Christ as given in it, the anointing of the Spirit is what is emphasized, because it is the seal set upon Him,—the Father's approbation. In the meat-offering baken in the oven (the sufferings from the mere fact of what the world was, without open persecution) both things are represented but apart; and here the "wafers anointed with oil" show fuller, readier exposure to it after His public coming forward. In that upon the pan (the open persecution) it is the Man born and anointed that brings forth the world's enmity. His public testimony fanning the necessary opposition to Him into flame.

In the meat-offering of the priest on the day of his anointing (Lev. vi. 19-23, see notes) we have, distinctly and necessarily, what He was as presented to God at the very time to which we have reached in the Gospel. Here, therefore, it is prepared with oil, but not anointed. And it all goes up to God as a sweet savor, man having no part in it. It is Christ in the period of His life which closes with His baptism, the years lived to God in retirement, of the sweet savor of which to God He Himself gives testimony.

4. The fourth section follows the third here, as the story of the wilderness in the book of Numbers follows the priestly anointing in the book of Leviticus. The Israelites had forty years of trial in the wilderness, and all through showed how little they had learned the lessons they were placed there to learn. The Lord is there forty days, and tested to the full, approving Himself ever perfect, and beyond the need of learning,—Master and not disciple.

He has fulfilled, as we have seen, in the thirty years of His private life at Nazareth, His own responsibility as Man before God. He has now come forth from that retirement to take His public place as Mediator for others. He has been accepted as perfectly pleasing to the Father, the unblemished Lamb of sacrifice, as well as the Priest, able to offer for the sins of men. To this office He is consecrated by the descent of the Spirit upon Him, and is now fully the Christ, the Anointed, openly declared to be this.

1 (1-4): the Obedient One—God's will alone His motive,

[l] fasted forty days and forty nights, he afterward hungered. And the tempter came to him and said: [m] If [l] cf. Ex. 34. 28. cf. 1 Ki. 19. 8. [m] cf. Gen. 3. 1; cf. Ex. 17. 6; cf. ch. 26. 53, 54.

He is now to be tested as to His ability for the path upon which He has entered. The book of Job shows us Satan allowed of God for this purpose to be the sifter of God's wheat—the "accuser of the brethren." He who is to be the First-born among these pleads for Himself no exemption from this trial. He is expressly led up of the Spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil: designated thus according to the meaning of the term as "the false accuser."

But God has pronounced: is not that enough? Alas, with sin has come in distrust of God Himself: He also is upon trial; and Satan's reasoning in Job's case almost openly takes that ground. God pronounces as to Job, and he takes exception to it. "Hast Thou not made a hedge about him, and about his house?" he says; and that means to say, "This sentence is not given upon proper trial." And God in His very mercy to man, who to his undoing has accepted Satan's malignity as truth, does not retreat behind His privilege. If He is, and must be, sovereign in His doing, so that "none can stay His hand, or say unto Him, What doest Thou?" yet will He suffer question, and let all be brought into the fullest light. Job's hedge is taken away, and Satan is allowed large limits within which to deal with him,—the end being, of course, blessing to the sufferer and full vindication of God's perfect ways.

And here now is His own Beloved, and there is no remnant of a hedge about the person of the Christ of God; nor will He use the power that is in His hand against the adversary. In conflict between good and evil, power cannot decide: the good must manifest itself as that, and stand by its own virtue against all odds. The glorious Wrestler is stripped, therefore, for the wrestling. Son of God though He be, He comes into the poverty of the creature, the conditions of humanity, and these in their utmost straitness. Man in Adam in his original perfection had been tempted in a garden specially prepared and furnished for him. But one thing was denied him, and in the denial was contained a blessing, among the chief of all the blessings there. Real want there was none, and need was in such sort ministered to as to be itself, in every way, the occasion of new delight. The weakness of the creature was owned, but tenderly provided for, so as to witness to the tender arms of love that were about him: he had but to shrink into them to be in perfect safety, beyond all possible reach of harm.

But not so sheltered, not so provided for, is the new Adam, the Son of man. The garden is gone; in its stead is the wilderness; nor is there nurture for Him now from nature's barren breast. For forty days He fasts, and then with the hunger of that forty days upon Him, the tempter comes. It marks the contrast between Him and other men that, whereas a Moses or Elias fasted to meet God, He fasts to meet the devil.

There are three forms of the temptation: though, with the first broken we see that victory is gained over them all. Yet for our instruction it is that we are permitted to have all before us, that we may realise the points in which the subtlety perfected by ages of experience finds man to be above all accessible, and learn how Satan is to be resisted still. We shall do well to consider them closely, therefore, and with the closest application to ourselves. The battle-field here may seem to be a narrow one; the points of attack few; the weapons employed against the enemy a scanty armory: but here lies one of the excellences of Scripture, that its principles, while simple, have in them all the depths of divine wisdom, and far-reaching application to the most diverse needs.

1 "And when the tempter came unto Him, he said, If Thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread."

Satan would thus act upon Him by the conviction of what He was, and make Him assert Himself, in circumstances which were so unsuited to what He was. The Son of God, the Beloved of the Father, at the extreme point of starvation in a desert! But then this was surely in His own power to set right: He needed thou art the Son of God, command that these stones become bread. But he answered and said: It is [a]written not circumstances to be adjusted to Him, who was able so easily to adjust them to Himself. The power surely was His, the need real, the hunger sinless: why, then, should He not put forth His power, and make the stones of the ground minister to His necessities? So simple and plausible is the suggestion, so well it seems to recognize the truth of what He was, so natural is it with us to minister with what power we have to our own requirements, that to any of us naturally, it might seem to be no evil suggestion at all,—no temptation. But it was such; and the Lord's answer will show us, better than any reasoning of our own, why it was such.

[a] vers. 7, 10, Deut. 8. 3, ch. 6. 25-34, cf. John 4. 31-34.

It has been noticed by all,—it could hardly escape notice,—that the Lord answers ever by the word of God. This is the sword of the Spirit, the only weapon we have with which to encounter the adversary; but it is striking, and speaks powerfully to us, to find the Lord who could surely have answered from His own mind, using always, and with distinct reference to it as such, the written Word. We see that He takes absolutely the same ground as ourselves, answers as man, is subject, as we are, to the authority of God. And this the passage which He quotes fully proves,—going, indeed, beyond it: "It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God."

This is from Deuteronomy (viii. 3), the book that sums up the lessons of the wilderness, for those who had been through the wilderness. And the passage shows that the dealings of God with His people had been directly designed to teach them this: "And He humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know, that He might make thee to know that man liveth not by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live." How important,—how supremely important, therefore, is this principle!

Man lives by the word of God,—in obedience to it. The true life of man is nourished and sustained alone by this. Bread will not sustain it: the life of obedience is that which alone is life. In this way we see that though, because of inherent sin everywhere, the legal covenant had no life in it, yet there is another sense wherein "which, if a man do he shall even live in them" is to be understood. There is really a path of life, though grace alone can put us in it or maintain us there. Eternal life and disobedience are in fact opposites. The gospel does not alter this: grace fully affirms it: "Sin shall not have dominion over you, because ye are not under law, but under grace."

All this is in the passage quoted by the Lord; but in His application of it we are made to go further than naturally we should carry it. What principle of disobedience, we might ask, could be contained in the simple suggestion to use power that He really had, to minister to need that was as really His also, and in which, therefore, there could be no evil?

Notice, then, that it is as man He speaks: it is of man these things are written. Son of God He was—adoringly we own it; it is this that makes the path we are thinking of so wonderful an one; but it is not in the open glory of the Godhead that He is come to walk upon earth, but to learn obedience in humiliation,—nay, by the things that He suffers. He is come as man to work out redemption for men; and for this to learn all that is proper to man, apart from sin. Thus He cannot put forth divine power to save Himself out of this condition. What He can use freely for others, for Himself He cannot use. It is He of whom it is written in the volume of the book, "Lo, I come to do Thy will O God . . . I delight to do Thy will, O my God: yea, Thy law is within my heart." Thus He is here simply subject, and subject in satisfaction and delight, to the will of Another. He has, for His whole course on earth, no other motive. Need may press, appetite may crave: He feels this as other men; did He not feel it, the ten, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every °word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.

° Job 33. 12. Jer. 15. 16. cf. Heb. 10. 7, 8.

glory of His humiliation would be dimmed. But while He feels it, it is no motive to Him: there is but one motive—the will of God. To make Himself a motive would destroy that perfection; come to do that will, and nothing else.

This is the spirit in which He goes forth to service: the close of it on earth, closing with the deepest humiliation and dreadest shadow of all, affords so beautiful an example of this principle, (even while at first sight it might seem at conflict with it), that one cannot forbear to speak of it here. One of the physical distresses of the agony of the cross is the great thirst produced by it. Almost the last words of the Lord there had reference to this, and gave it expression. His words, "I thirst" are answered by the sponge filled with vinegar, of which He tasted: and they were such as naturally to call forth such an answer. Was this, then, really any seeking of relief in His extremity, even from the hands that had nailed Him there? No: we are carefully guarded from such a thought. There was one Scripture, we are told, that remained to be fulfilled; and of this it was, in all the agony of that hour, that He was thinking: "Jesus, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst." This leads to what had been predicted: "in my thirst they gave Me vinegar to drink." Thus the glorious obedience shines here without a cloud upon it, nay, in surpassing lustre. "Lo, I come to do Thy will" is the principle of His life.

But here we are made to realize the wondrous privilege that is ours,—the solemn responsibility that lies upon us. For we are "sanctified unto the obedience of Christ," and "He has left us an example that we should follow in His steps" (1 Pet. i. 2; ii. 21). This principle of His life must be, then, the principle of our lives. If with Him the governing motive was to do the will of God,—if He rejected every motive that could be urged from His own necessities —how simple is it that, for us also, the will of God must be our motive for action; apart from this there is no right motive possible.

What a world then, is this, in which the mass of men around us have no thought of God, no knowledge of His will, no desire to know it,—men with whom life is little else than the instinctive animal life; disturbed, more or less, by conscience, that is, by the apprehension of God! And as to Christians themselves, how easily are they persuaded, that, with certain exceptions at important crises of their lives, the simple rule of right and wrong—often determined by custom of some kind, rather than the word of God—is sufficient to indicate for them the will of God; their own wills being thus left free within a variously limited area!

The law in fact drew such a circle round man, and in mercy, as a sheepfold is the limit for the sheep. A class of actions is defined as evil, and forbidden; within these limits one may please oneself. Nor could law do other than this: for it the rigidity of a fixed code is necessary. But Christ came into the sheepfold to make His sheep hear His voice, and to lead them out: free, but where freedom would be safe as well as blessed, following the living guidance of the Shepherd Himself (John x). The rule is at the same time stricter and freer. And the reality transcends the figure, even as the Good Shepherd Himself transcends every other shepherd. To a love like His, united to a wisdom absolutely perfect, no detail of our lives can be unimportant, as (in the connection of these throughout, and of one life with another, none can be insignificant. Could it be imagined that any were so, yet which of us is competent to discern this, in any instance? "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth" is but the utterance of the common experience. Who, then, that has learned to distrust himself at all, but must welcome deliverance from such an uncertainty, and find it joy to be guided at all times by a higher wisdom?

Nothing makes this appear severe, nothing difficult, except the love of our own way, and the unbelief which, having given up confidence in God, first sent man out from the bountiful garden, to toil and strive for himself in the world

[z] (5-7): and whose faith in God's word will

[5] Then the devil taketh him into the [p] holy city, and setteth him on the pinnacle of the temple, and saith unto him: If thou art the Son of God, cast thyself outside. But the divine love which has purchased us here, and given us Bethlehem for our "house of bread," should suffice to heal that insane suspicion, and close up the fountain of self-will within us. "He who spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not, with Him also, freely gives us all things?" The path ordained for us has, no doubt, its roughness, and the cloud hangs over it; but He makes the cloud His tabernacle, and just in the very night it brightens into manifest glory. All differences are in the interests of the journey itself, as was said of Israel, that they might "go by day and by night." The record of experience adds to this the assurance, "they go from strength to strength."

[p] Is. 48. 2. cf. Is. 52. 1. cf. ch. 27. 53.

No wonder! if "by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God doth man live." What a sustenance of the true life within us to be thus, day by day, receiving the messages of His will, guided by that wondrous Voice, learning continually more the tenderness of His love for us: "He wakeneth morning by morning; He wakeneth mine ear to hear as the learner" (Isa. l. 4). This is the utterance prophetically of the Lord Himself: how blessed to be able to make it our own, and thus to have the fulfilment of those words: "I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way in which thou shalt go: I will guide thee with mine eye."

So then the first temptation is met and conquered; and with this, in fact, is conquered every after-one; for he who, walking with God, waits upon God, what shall ensnare him? what enemy shall prevail against him? It is plain that Satan has been hinting again here the lie with which of old he seduced the woman. And that, as in her case "the lust of the flesh and the lust of the eye and the pride of life" came in through the door so opened, they were now effectually shut out. Satan might repeat and vary his efforts; but to one cleaving fast to God, God will be a shield against which every shaft shall be broken to pieces. How great, then, the importance for us of such a lesson!

[z] But if we are to listen for the word of God, and our lives are to be shaped by it, we are called next to guard against the misuse of the Word itself. This is Satan's next attempt: "Then the devil taketh Him into the holy city, and setteth Him on a pinnacle of the temple, and saith unto Him, If Thou be the Son of God, cast Thyself down: for it is written, He shall give His angels charge concerning Thee; and in their hands they shall bear Thee up, lest haply Thou dash Thy foot against a stone."

How careful should we be as to quotations from Scripture! how little in fact we often are! Scripture twisted but a little awry, the authority of God is put upon a lie, and our very faith in it may betray us to the enemy.

How important, too, in this view of it, becomes the complete verbal inspiration of Scripture. If only the thought meant to be conveyed is guaranteed to us, but the wording left to the choice of imperfect wisdom, then (unless words mean nothing) we can never settle what the thought precisely is. If the words are possibly faulty, who can assure me of the exact truth hid under this faulty expression?

Satan does but leave out two or three words of the original: "to keep Thee in all Thy ways" (Ps. xci. 11, 12); but those words guard them against the abuse that he would make of them. The "ways" of Him who in the same psalm says of Jehovah, "In Him will I trust" will be God's ways, and He will wait upon God for the fulfilment of His word, and not impatiently grasp at it before the time. This is evidently Satan's effort now; and since the Lord will not move without the word of God, here is now the word to lead Him in that path of the miraculous which He has just refused. The psalm surely refers to Messiah: would it not be simply becoming confidence in God, boldly to claim and act on it?

not move out of the way of humiliation.

down: for it is [q]written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee, and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest haply thou dash thy foot against a stone. Jesus said unto him: It is written again, [r]Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.

3 (8-11): God His whole portion and praise.

[3] Again the devil taketh him unto an exceeding high mountain, and [s]showeth him all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them. And he said unto him, q Ps. 91. 11, 12. cf. 2 Cor. 11. 14. cf. 2 Cor. 2. 17. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 2.

r Deut. 6. 16. cf. 1 Sam. 4. 3-11. Ps. 95. 8-10. s cf. Lk. 4. 6. cf. ch. 12. 29. cf. Jno. 14. 30; cf. 2 Cor. 4. 4.

The place was favorable for such a venture. The miracle would be right before the eyes of the many worshipers—of a people always seeking after signs, and who, having shown themselves ready to go after impostors, would be brought now to the feet of the true Messiah. The word could not fail: was it not for Him to answer the desire of the people, stop with the right hand of power the confusion and misrule, and fulfil the glowing pictures which the prophets had drawn, and take the Kingdom already proclaimed to be at hand by one whose call of God he had Himself acknowledged?

This seems to be the line and power of the temptation here. It appeals to Jesus as the Messiah, as the former one had done to Him as Man. It takes advantage of the Lord's answer given to that, and would with devilish cunning turn that victory into a defeat. How would He refuse to take His predestined place, when the word of God itself beckoned Him into it?

But the "ways" of the blessed "Author and Finisher of faith" lie elsewhere than in this direction. Of these Satan has not dared to remind Him. He has come into the wilderness from Jordan, from the place of death, to which He had freely stooped as what "righteousness" required from the Representative of His people, and has been consecrated as the Priest to offer the needed sacrifice. Power could be found for men only in the path of humiliation, and out of this He could not raise Himself, nor put forth a hand to lay hold of that which must come to Him from God alone, vindicated and glorified. He would not be slow to put forth power, when this was accomplished, and in this alone all blessing lay. He that believed could not anticipate this: we see that it is the Lord's first answer which has essentially answered all, and which reveals the secret of victory over all temptation. He has come to do the will of God and not His own. In Him patience will have its perfect work, and thus He will be perfect and entire, living by His word, suffering only, putting forth no hand in His own behalf. Anything else would really be to "tempt God,"—to question as they questioned at Massah (Deut. vi. 16), where in their need He seemed not to come forward. They "tempted," tried Him by His providences, found Him to come short. This question still connects in this way with the first temptation; but Israel had no power in themselves to fall back upon as He had: would He use it? Nay, when God had pledged Himself to Him in His word, would He not put it to the proof, let it be seen openly that God was with Him? Nay, He will not; nor take the short road, as if God's way were too long.

This is to tempt Him then: to try Him by our thoughts,—alas, by our impatience, that cannot wait for His due time, nor take the path of humiliation He prescribes; that will in self-will reach out its hand and take, as Christ would not. He to whom all power belonged moved on as if in weakness, leaving it for God to vindicate and appear for Him, as and where and when He would.

[3] In the third temptation Satan shifts his ground completely. He is seeking the same thing of course; and shows himself more openly than he has done before; but he could not say, "If Thou be the Son of God, fall down and worship me!" He suddenly seems to realize so the truth of His humanity, that he will adventure fully upon it. If this be indeed One who is Son of man, shut off as it were from the claims and conditions of Deity;—if He has come in, in the very weakness of manhood itself to work the work committed to Him, then

All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and [t]worship me. Then saith Jesus unto him, [u]Get thee hence, Satan; for it is written, [v]Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve. Then the devil leaveth him; and behold, [w]angels came and ministered unto him.

t cf. 1 Cor. 10. 20. cf. Rev. 9. 20. cf. 1 Jno. 5. 18–20.
u cfr. Gen. 3. 6, 7. cf. Jas. 4. 7.
v Deut. 6. 13. Deut. 10. 20.
Ex. 20. 3–5; cf. Is. 44. 6–8. w Lk. 22. 43; cf. John 20. 12, 13.

he will boldly test Him as mere man. All the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them, can they have no attraction for this poor Nazarene? It is a desperate game indeed, and to us cannot but seem like the mere raving of insanity to propose to Christ to do homage to him for their possession! But, however it may seem to be no longer temptation, but a mere awful insult to the divine glory veiled in humanity before him, it does not seem to be given us as this. The Lord answers it, as He does the rest, from Scripture, though with an indignation which He has not shown before. Satan has disclosed himself, and can be called by his name and bidden to be off. Yet the whole reads as if he had as much confidence in this attack as in the other. The change of address, no longer "If Thou be the Son of God," with the boldness of his proposition, seems to say that he has now discovered and accepts the fact that his conflict is with One who, whatever He may be more than this, had indeed come to meet him as man only. And man—what had he not proved as to him? From Adam in the beauty of his Maker's handiwork, through the many generations since—he had not encountered yet a second man.

And he, the prince of this world, had he not wrested from man the sovereignty of earth, the inheritance for which God had destined him, God not interfering? might it not seem to him as if evil were stronger than good, as he realized the 4,000 years of his triumph, the generations of men that had conspired to lift him to his throne,—surely, an easy thing to do him homage!

In result, he has disclosed himself and is defeated. He has met, at last, the second Man. It is truly so: there is no display of deity, no outburst of divine judgment or of power; he is answered, still and always by the Word; its sufficiency as a divine weapon is seen all through: how great an encouragement for us in the irrepressible conflict which we all have to maintain. Through all He is the perfect example of faith, the Man Christ Jesus. We hear throughout the One who in the 16th psalm declares as the principle of His life: "the Lord is the measure of my portion and of my cup: . . . I have set the Lord always before me; because He is at my right hand I shall not be moved."

The devil leaves Him now; and angels come and minister to Him.

Subd. 2.

The manifestation of the Lord's fitness for His work is now complete. From opposite sides He is declared, what even the demons henceforth own Him to be, the Holy One of God. He can now go forth to His appointed work; and we have here a brief notice of His preaching, after the close of John's public testimony. What we have in this place is not yet any detail, but the fact of the announcement of the Kingdom by the King Himself, the place of its announcement, the association with Himself of others to carry on the work; and the signs which accompany it. Each of these things has its importance, and Matthew groups his facts for the purpose of giving a history of the testimony now given to Israel, in its fullness and sufficiency, though rejected by them, the testimony of John being already rejected when that of Christ begins.

1. We have first the place of its proclamation, Galilee being in general in this Gospel the sphere of the Lord's labors, from Capernaum as a centre, which was now indeed, according to its name, the "village of consolation," as the place of His residence and the scene of many of His mighty works. That it was chosen in divine wisdom to be this, one cannot doubt, and the prophet Isaiah had

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chap. iv. 12–25.)

The King's own Testimony.

1 (12-16): Light.

1. NOW when Jesus heard that John was [z]delivered up, he withdrew into Galilee. And leaving Nazareth he came and dwelt at [y]Capernaum which is by the sea-shore, in the borders of Zebulon and Naphtali: that it might be [z]fulfilled which was spoken through Esaias the prophet, saying: "The land of Zebulon and the land of Naphtali, the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, Galilee of the [a]nations: the people who sat in [b]darkness saw a great light, and to those who sat in the region and shadow of death, to them hath [c]light sprung up."

2 (17-22): His testimony and disciples.

2. From that time Jesus began to preach and to say, [d]Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. And walking by the sea of Galilee, he saw two [e]brethren, Simon who is called Peter, and Andrew his brother casting a net into the sea, for they were fishers. And he saith unto them, [f]Come ye after me, and I will make you fishers of men. And they immediately [g]left the nets and followed him. And going on from thence, he saw [h]other two brethren, James the [son] of Zebedee and John his brother in the boat with Zebedee their father, mending their nets; and he called them. And they immediately left the boat and their [i]father, and followed him.

[z] Mk. 1. 14. Lk. 4. 14.
[y] Mk. 1. 21. Luke 4. 31. cf. ch. 9. 1. cf. ch. 11. 20, 23.
[z] cf. ch. 1. 22, etc. Is. 9. 1, 2. Josh. 19. 32, 34.
[a] cf. John 7. 52.
[b] Is. 42. 6, 7. cf. John 1. 5.
[c] cf. Mal. 4. 2. cf. Jno. 8. 12.
[d] ch. 3. 2.
[e] Mk. 1. 16-18. cf. Lk. 5. 1-11. cf. John 1. 40-42.
[f] cf. Acts 4. 11-13 with John 14. 12.
[g] ch. 19. 27-30. cf. Lk. 9. 57-62. cf. Phil. 3. 7, 8.
[h] Mk. 1. 19, 20.
[i] cf. Lk. 18. 29, 30.

marked it out in this way long before, as Matthew reminds us. Galilee, as "the land of Zebulon and Naphtali" on the one hand, and now "Galilee of the Gentiles" on the other, spoke plainly of the ruin into which the people of God had sunk. Zebulon, the dweller in relationship, as he should have been, had long fulfilled Jacob's prophecy, and "dwelling at the haven of the sea" had become the type of Israel as a whole, giving up its "dwelling alone" to mingle in adulterous commerce with the nations. Now it was but "the way of the sea," as if swallowed up in its waters; while Naphtali, the struggler, sat, struggling no more, in darkness which was indeed the "shadow of death." But the Saviour of sinners is not hindered thus, and there in the darkness was the very place for light to spring up. And now there had come to Zebulon a Dweller, in whom God Himself could dwell with man, and to Naphtali more than a struggler, a glorious Conqueror, the woman's Seed.

Here in outcast Galilee, the light could shine more freely than in Jerusalem, with its legal pretension and its hollowness at heart. Light, its own immediate evidence for all that have eyes to see! The Personal Word, the "Brightness of the Father's glory" before men's eyes! Earth had never before a revelation such as this.

2. The Lord takes up John's word as to the coming Kingdom. The full truth, when it comes, unites in itself all preceding partial utterances. Along with this comes the call of disciples: and Peter and Andrew, James and John, answer His call to be fishers of men, with prompt obedience. It is an obvious and common remark that the Lord chooses neither men of position, wealth, or learning. The qualifications He requires are first of all spiritual, and He who sends them out means to be with them in their work. Nay, the first of all qualifications is to be dependent upon Himself. But He calls,—calls now, as ever He did; and has given over to none His claim to do this. He is Lord and Master and Guide in all His people's service.

3 (23-25): The signs accompanying.

3. And Jesus [j] went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and [k] healing all manner of disease and all manner of sickness among the people. And the [l] report of him went

[j] ch. 9. 35. Mk. 1. 39. Lk. 4.15,44.
[k] Acts 10.38.
[l] ch. 9. 31. Mk.7.36,37. Lk. 4. 37.

That His call requires prompt, unhesitating obedience, He emphasizes Himself elsewhere. How great a thing is promptness, when once we are assured of the Lord's will. There is then nothing else to be considered, while moral hesitancy may so cloud this assurance as to make obedience then impracticable. Not alone in this, with how many would the present darkness of their way be clearly intelligible, if they would face honestly their past history. And that history must, after all, be faced one day.

3. The gospel preached by our Lord had "signs" accompanying it. This is one of the common Scripture words (though not used in this place,) for what we call "miracles." Such a word is used in Scripture also, but it emphasizes the "wonder" element only, and is of infrequent occurrence in the gospels. Important was even the power to produce wonder, as a bell to gather an audience, but the words chosen rather for these divine works speak of that in them which was to make its impress on the conscience and the heart. As "signs" they evidenced themselves as "powers"—acts of power—which in their character revealed God. The Kingdom of heaven which the Old Testament prepared men to expect was, in fact, an interference of divine power on behalf of men which would free the earth from the burdens sin had imposed and the curse brought in by it. Miracles, therefore, formed an essential part in the "Kingdom and glory," and are thus called by the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews "the powers of the world to come" (vi. 5). Most suitably, therefore, did they accompany the message that the Kingdom of heaven was at hand.

Yet John, its proclaimer, had done no miracle. His simple call to repentance required none. He saw and announced the Kingdom, but was not to introduce it. He embodied the spirit and emphasized the testimony of the old dispensation, which itself pointed beyond itself for the completion which would of necessity set it aside. He was the judicial summing up of the past, but in near view of the predicted future; and men needed only to have conscience called into activity to confirm to them the truth of what he said. They needed not and were not called to have faith in John, but to judge their own condition, and thus be ready for the coming King.

But now here was the King,—the One to whom the world was to be subject, the whole realm of nature submissive to His hand. Here miracles were the natural sign, then, of His Presence; to Him what man would call supernatural was natural: not to have manifested it would have discredited His claim. True and needful testimony it was to Him, when "all manner of disease and all manner of infirmity" yielded to His power, showing Him thus to be Master of the whole condition of things into which He had come. All the consequences of sin had found their remedy: to earth the long-lost paradise might be restored. Sin itself, therefore, as presently was to be proclaimed and certified, had found in Him its conqueror also. And, not passively content with receiving all who came, this grace in Him went forth with ceaseless activity to find its objects. God's heart was pouring itself out in such a way as if to preclude all possibility of resistance. Who could refuse such ministry to need so manifest, in which man's very flesh cried out for the living God: and how could then, his heart be silent?

In fact great multitudes flocked after Him from all the country round: from Galilee itself; from Decapolis, Rome's ten colonial cities; from Jerusalem also, valuing itself for privileges which, *mis*used, were bringing ruin upon all connected with it. Could, then, these various grades of a common humanity, one in the sad inheritance of the fall, which yet had so strangely divided them, find now in one Saviour-King their restorer to one another and to out into all Syria; and they [m] brought unto him all that were sick, holden with various diseases and torments, demoniacs and lunatics and paralytics, and he healed them. And there followed him great [n] multitudes from Galilee and Decapolis and Jerusalem and Judea and [from] beyond the Jordan.

[m] Mk. 1.32. 33. Lk. 4. 40.

[n] ch. 5. 1. Mk. 3. 7, 8. ch. 8. 1, 18.

themselves? So it surely seemed as if it would be. "He made and baptized more disciples than John" was said of Him in the early days of His ministry. "The world is gone after Him," said His enemies at a later time. But history has been slow in fulfiling such a promise. Prophecy, on the other hand, has declared that so it shall be, though under different conditions from the present. And this is the one hope for the world which, in the beggary of all other hopes, shall at last find fulfilment.

SUBD. 3.

We shall be called back to these thronging multitudes again, to learn in detail their various needs and the way in which God had provided for them. But first the inspired history bids us listen to the Lord's own statement of what His Kingdom is; not in the form it should take, but in its inner spirit. The Old Testament prophets had already announced the form it would, and will yet, assume, when the "promises" still belonging to Paul's "kindred according to the flesh" (Rom. ix. 3, 4) shall be fulfilled. Introduced by a coming in glory which every eye shall see, the Kingdom of that day will be established in power that shall smite down all opposition as with a rod of iron (Ps. ii. 9). The law will then go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord once more from Jerusalem, then to be the place of His special manifestation upon the earth, men coming up from all parts of it to worship Him (Isa. ii.; Mic. iv.; Zech. xiv. 5–21).

The whole picture is, in many of its features, so unlike that into which Christianity has introduced us,—is, in fact, such apparent retrogression when seen as coming after this, that many find it impossible to understand it except as a figure; but as such no one will find it possible to understand it really. It is not Christianity certainly; it is not the heaven in which our portion is; it is a future —and still not final—state of the earth. It is a last dispensation before the eternal state begins,—a dispensation of sight, rather than of faith; and yet in many ways lower in character than that which faith now enjoys. "Blessed" in a higher sense, truly, "are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." Yet, in perfect accordance with this, the glory is then manifest and visible, as now it is not. And once more, and beyond all in the past, Jerusalem will be the candlestick for the light, where all may see it. Granting the apostle's interpretation to be the true one, and that to "Israel in the flesh" the promises belong,—and the prophets themselves unmistakably show this,—no other reading of Scripture is possible at all than the simple and literal one.

When John the Baptist proclaimed the Kingdom as at hand, he had before him no vision of Christianity, but just what the prophets of old had announced. And when the Lord takes up, with more emphasis and fuller demonstration, the Baptist's message, He is still speaking of the same thing. But Israel rejected Him through whom alone those promises could be fulfilled to them: "He came unto His own, and His own received Him not." Thus, as Daniel had predicted, "Messiah" was "cut off, and had nothing" (ix. 26, margin). As far as Israel's blessing was concerned, the fair vision vanished. The world too, and not Israel merely, understood not the day of its visitation: "He was in the world, and the world was made by Him, and the world knew Him not." Thus the predicted blessing of the earth also is delayed, and only after nineteen centuries are the streaks of dawn beginning to be seen on the horizon.

Yet the Kingdom has come: the Baptist was not mistaken; the signs given could not deceive. Yes, it has come, and more than that which it promised has been brought in for faith. Yet it has come in a different way. Grace repelled will

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chap. v.–vii.)

The Kingdom in its Inner Spirit and Holiness.

1 (v. 1-16): The principles of the kingdom as shown in those who enter it.

1. [1] AND seeing the multitudes, he [o]went up into the mountain; and when he had sat down, his disciples came unto him. And he opened his mouth and taught them, saying, still triumph over hindrances; its flood will rise but higher to overtop the barriers which would hem it in. And out of the world which has taken Satan for its prince, and rejected and crucified the Son of God, God has been all this time taking out for Himself a heavenly people—a people to share with Christ rejection upon the earth, yet to share with Him also His reign over it, and to have with Himself a place of nearer, dearer intimacy than even this might imply—"members of His body," partners soon of His throne, where He is, for eternity to be with Him.

[o] cf. ch. 17. 1. cf. ch. 8. 1.

These things we shall find the Lord beginning to unfold to His disciples, as soon as it is clearly seen that Israel will have none of Him; and here, where He speaks of "things which have been kept secret from the foundation of the world" (xiii. 35), we shall have no difficulty in finding that which is our own—a fullness of blessing that Israel's portion does indeed figure, but only figure. This—the nation's as such—is earthly: ours is heavenly. There is to be a "new earth" also "wherein dwelleth righteousness," and with which Israel's seed and name are permanently connected (Isa. lxvi. 22), as on the other hand, a "heavenly city" for God's pilgrims of to-day.

In the "sermon on the mount" we have, then, the principles of the Kingdom of heaven, with very plain reference to the millennial earth. It is the earth that the meek are to inherit, though there is a "reward in heaven" also, at which we shall have to look in its place (vers. 5, 12). The first statement is from the 37th psalm, the application of which will be perfectly evident to all who consider it. Jerusalem also is spoken of, not in its desolate, disowned condition, but as "the city of the great King" (ver. 35), and we shall see further indications of this nature, as we take up the study of what is before us here.

Yet let it not be thought that this takes from us the application to ourselves, which Christians seek in it. The fuller revelation only completes the partial one; the higher blessing but transcends the lower. Through all dispensations God is the same God; and we are "blessed with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ Jesus." Of many things we can only argue, indeed, a more perfect—or at least a fuller application to ourselves than to them. To take from Israel what is hers is only to diminish her and not enrich ourselves; nay, what has been called in this way the spiritualizing of the promises has led most surely and emphatically to the carnalizing of the Church.

1. The "sermon on the mount" is the manifestation, then, of the Kingdom in its inner spirit and holiness,—still, of course, as a Kingdom to come, and not actually come. There are seven parts (the number of perfection); and the first (vers. 1–16) fittingly consists of "beatitudes," blessings pronounced by the King Himself upon the heirs thereof: first, in view of their personal character (1–9); then as sufferers in the midst of a world hostile to them (10–12); lastly, in face of that hostility, they are set in it as ministers of a blessing to be fully realized, when the long expected Kingdom at last is come (13–16).

The old covenant also had its blessings, but which, conditioned upon legal obedience, proved only the hopelessness of blessing under it; so that the very "song" of the lawgiver is a witness against the people, and his blessing of the tribes has to look for its fulfilment in times beyond the law; in fact, in the very times of the Kingdom which the Lord here announces. How suited that the Minister of the new covenant should begin with blessing—blessing still upon obedience (for in the nature of things there can be no other) but now with a l (1-9): their righteousness.

p Blessed are the q poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

p Ps. 1. 1. Ps. 32. 1. Ps. 119. 1.

Luke 6. 20, etc. q Prov. 29. 23; Is. 57. 15; cf. ch. 15. 26-28.

positiveness and assurance which imply the grace which that covenant, with its glorious "I wills," so royally expresses. (Heb. viii. 8–12.) For those under it there is no Mount Ebal, no curse or woe at all. The sweet authority of divine love constrains and restrains together. Christ is King of a Kingdom like which there is no other, where the "ingrafted word" is law, but a "law of liberty," and every individual conscience is His throne.

[l]There are seven blessings pronounced on character, and (as in most sevens elsewhere throughout the Word) the first four are distinguished from the last three by being connected with what is more negative and external—related here to position in the world; while the last three give us more specific divine lineaments which are found in all the children of God, as partakers of the divine nature. The first four show us the heart set upon a blessing which is not yet come,—upon the Kingdom of heaven itself: governed, therefore, by the unseen, and finding itself in the midst of all that is its moral opposite in the world around. It is an empty, barren scene, and the soul is conscious of poverty and distress and moral failure only in the midst of it. The last three give us the positive energy and activity of good amid the unceasing conflict of evil with it.* But we must look at them more particularly in their order and connection with one another, all which has its importance spiritually and for us.

First, and therefore of first importance here we have "Blessed are the poor in spirit." This is in contrast with mere external poverty, and yet like it in its own sphere. When the heart is set upon things to come, present things of necessity lose proportionately their value. There is "absence of mind," as we call it,—the heart on the unseen. And this is characteristic of faith ever, which is "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things unseen." Yet this poverty of spirit is only the negative side of faith, the emptying and not the filling. Still there is power in it, as deliverance from a world in which men are walking in a vain show, and disquiet themselves in vain. The soul's bonds are cut: it can move, it can make progress. To such an one God's word becomes a necessity, as the one link with the invisible. And such a seeking has its welcome and assurance from the Lord Himself:—"theirs is the Kingdom of heaven."

How much more, not less forceful for us should this be, than for those to whom the Lord is directly speaking, or even for the people who will stand upon the threshold of the Kingdom in days soon to come. True, the earth's crisis will be upon it, and Israel's travail-time of intense anguish, out of which, as in a day, a nation will be born to God. But we have the revelation of a brighter inheritance, higher as heaven is above the earth, the meeting-place of the redeemed of the present and the past, the dwelling-place of God and the Lamb. Had we divine affections proportionate to the revelation made to us how little would mere circumstances here have power over the formation of a character like this! Granting that Satan's tactics for us have changed, and that, instead of funeral pyres for martyrs, there are now only premiums in abundance for unfaithfulness to Christ—a condition of things formed by compromise between the Church and the world,—should this have power to dim the eyes of faith?

---

*I give the meaning of these numerically here, it being difficult to do this with sufficient conciseness and intelligibility in the margin as usual.

(a) the Kingdom itself controlling, though unseen:—
  (i) the barrenness of things here:
  (ii) mourning is here love's judgment of the ruin.
  (iii) meekness, the fruit of realizing one's possessions assured by God.
  (iv) the complete failure of the world's system felt.
(b) the more positive Christ-like features:—
  (i) mercy, only righteousness with such as we are; (see notes).
  (ii) purity (separation from evil);
  (iii) peace-making,—recovering energy.

Blessed are they that [r]mourn: for they shall be comforted.

Blessed are the [s]meek: for they shall inherit the earth.*

[r] Ps. 147. 3. Lk. 4. 18. cf. Lk. 7. 37, 38, 44–47.
[s] Ps. 37. 11. cf. ch. 11. 29 with Is. 53. 7, 12.

*Or "land."

What would it be to say this, but to own it right and reasonable that Satan should gain his object?

Christ in the world at least must be poor in it. It was the place, without any question, of His poverty. If then, He be the example for us, how much does this imply? If He, too, gone out of the world, be the object for our hearts, where will our hearts be?

The second blessing is that of those who mourn; and here I do not think that it is a question of personal sin. Christ was "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief," and necessarily, as the Son of God in a world astray from Him. "For the zeal of Thy house hath eaten Me up," He says, "and the reproaches of them that reproached Thee are fallen upon Me" (Ps. lxix. 9). His tears fell over Jerusalem. The Cross He bore for men was fullest witness to the intensity of His anguish upon their account, while justifying the holiness of God in all He suffered for them. The mourning that He blesses here is, we may be sure, like His own, love's judgment of the ruin that is everywhere around: little need to dwell upon the causes for mourning in the world, such as we know it. Its open sores are revealed enough day by day, in a time when the most hidden things are revealed as a matter of course before the public gaze, as having unquestioned right to know everything. And yet, after all, the mass of evil is too great even to be so gauged and realized. What must have been the opposition of it to Him whose eye saw through it all, and whose heart had none of the callousness with which we can throw off, or the weakness which makes us faint under, so great a burden.

But "they shall be comforted." There is a rest of God to come, a rest into which we shall enter; a sabbath-rest, where rest shall not only be allowed but sanctified. How sweet the thought of a rest of God, where He shall rest—rest, as alone He can do, "in His love." And this shall be.

Approached from this direction, the next point is soon reached, the character of the meek. Amid the lusts and strife of earth, if like others you have your portion to seek, you must strive as they do. If you have nothing here to live for but God's will, you can afford to be quiet. Be sure for yourself of a Father's love and care always over you,—infinite love and wisdom concerning itself with all your path, and such realization will of necessity subdue all rashness of self-assertion, and make you careful only to give God His way, to cease from the folly of your own. Here too the Lord leads His people, "Learn of Me," He says, "for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls." There is the present blessing of it, and how great it is!—"rest to your souls:" rest from all restlessness; quiet in the knowledge that God is God; what an inestimable joy is this!

When the "meek shall inherit the earth" will be, of course, still the time of the Kingdom to which we are here continually looking forward. It will be a wonderful thing in this world, whose history has been one long strife of ambition, and whose heroes have been so often made such by the hecatombs of the slain, to have the inheritance at last belong to the meek! The promise for an earthly people as it is, we shall still enjoy it, and in a better way. "Heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ," we shall reign with Him over the earth. We have no need, therefore, to covet Israel's promises, and should not be enriched by them in the least. Here the Lord is quoting, as has been said, from the 37th psalm, and the reference is obvious. It shows of whom these blessings primarily speak; and "the gifts and calling of God are without repentance."

There is yet one special form of sorrow to be noted, and it is one that men > Blessed are they that [t]hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled.

[t] Lk. 1. 53. Is. 55. 1. cf. Lk. 15. 17, 23.

are feeling intensely to-day; not that there is more of it than in the past ages, or at least not that there is necessarily more. Rather, perhaps, because all these questions press more for solution as the day of settlement nears and the harvest of the earth approaches ripeness. "Judgment shall" yet "return to righteousness," long divorced as they have been; but it is not yet so. Still the cry because of oppression goes up into the ear of God, and He is quiet, and men think He regards not. And because they think so, they are rising up to-day to take things into their own hands, and settle them after their own fashion. Yet they can never be so settled: where are the righteous that are fit to rule? Are the few that have shown their unfitness other than fair samples of the many who have not had a chance to try? And if they could get one perfectly righteous, would they submit rejoicingly to him? What says the Cross as to that? The One they need has come and been rejected. "We have no King but Cæsar" was the cry then; and it has been answered by the long reign of Cæsar. Would they choose otherwise to-day? Cæsar may not be in the fashion: they enjoy too well the scramble for the spoils of office. Try experiments in politics they may, and dethrone Cæsar; but Christ will never get His own until God makes His enemies as a foot-stool for His feet.

But "blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness"—righteousness; not merely to get their own necks out of the collar: there is no particular moral character about that. But craving for righteousness shall at last be satisfied. The coming of the Lord alone can accomplish this. There is One who can be safely trusted—only One: He, one who had power in His hand once, on earth, and used it, but never for Himself. Personal interests He had indeed, and wrought for them—a joy on account of which He endured the cross, despising the shame: the cross, even He could not despise. He too, blessed be God, shall be satisfied: "He shall see fruit of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied." Amen.

The last three blessings upon character, to which we now come, relate to that in which the children of God manifest most distinctly their divine origin. In mercy, in purity, in peace-making, the character of God Himself is manifested as Light and Love. It is directly said of the peace-makers that they "shall be called the sons of God"—recognized in their relation to Him; and here assuredly is the great office Christ Himself assumed. In the first epistle of John, where the possession of eternal life by the possessors of Christianity is in question, similar things are given as the signs of it. There it is, indeed, that we have the statements, "God is light" and God is love:" and consequently, "he that doeth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother." The two things must be found in the same person, as in God they belong together. Love is not truly love that is not holy; holiness is not that, if separated from love.

These seven beatitudes are in like manner one sevenfold blessing. Blessing cannot dwell with cursing; nor the child of light be the child of darkness also. Such cross-checks as to reality are of the greatest possible importance for practical use. In a world of shams there is nothing but needs testing: and with the flesh still in us there is abundant room for self-deception. Saddest of all it is, that even Christians may not be unwilling to be a little blinded; with this additional necessity, of course, that they cannot dictate the limit of this: the enemy to whom they capitulate will be bound by no terms.

It will be thought strange, no doubt, to put down "mercy" under the head of "righteousness" rather than of love; yet this is what I believe its numerical place enforces. Of course, it is not to be doubted that love is shown in it; but that results from what we have just been saying, that one moral attribute, just so far as it is that, will be penetrated, as it were, by other elements. You cannot absolutely separate one part of moral character from another: each is de-

Blessed are the "merciful: for they shall receive mercy.

Blessed are the "pure in heart: for they shall see God.

u Mk. 11.25, 26. cf. ch. 18.12-35. cf. 2 Tim. 1. 16; cf. ch. 25.34-40. v cf. Jer. 17.9 with Acts 15.9; Heb. 12.14.

pendent and will not stand alone. Granting that, however, it will still be thought that mercy is more the fruit of love than of righteousness, and that it is artificial to characterize it in this way. Let us turn, then, to Scripture itself to see if it has any help for us.

Now we shall find such in this very "sermon on the mount," and only in the third section of it (ch. vi. 1, 2). In our common version you find there, "Take heed that ye do not your alms before men to be seen of them;" but the R.V. rightly substitutes there "righteousness" for alms. It will be seen when we come to speak of it, that the character formed by the realization of the presence of God is described for us in three different ways,—manward, Godward, self-ward. In each case His examples are different, possibly, from what we might have expected. Manward, He specifies "alms" as righteousness; prayer, as characteristic Godward; fasting, selfward. The truth and wisdom of this we surely cannot doubt, when we realize who is the Speaker here; but here, then, as I have claimed to be the case in the beatitudes, mercy is given as a form of righteousness: for undoubtedly alms-giving has the character of mercy.

The parable of the unmerciful servant in this same gospel will throw light upon all this (xviii. 23–34). He demands but his due from his fellow-servant, and so might not seem unrighteous; but there is more than this that must come into account. "O thou wicked servant, I forgave thee all that debt, because thou desiredst me: shouldest not thou also have had mercy on thy fellow-servant, even as I had mercy on thee?"

Mercy was with him clearly but righteousness; and so it is with us ever, being what we are, and God being to us what He ever is. Notice distinctly how this is brought out in the recompense. The mercy that the merciful shall find will be, as elsewhere with the enjoyment of these blessings, in the coming Kingdom, and we might expect perhaps something more than this; but all the reward there is mercy, and it is well and needful to be reminded of it. So the apostle, after speaking of the self-forgetting love of Onesiphorus, who had refreshed and ministered to him in his bonds at Rome, prays, "The Lord grant unto him that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day" (2 Tim. i. 18). At our best, as at our worst, it is to grace that we are debtors. Grace crowns, even as grace saves.

And now we have clearly the character of God as Light. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God," If we remember that the eyes are in the heart (Eph. i. 18, R. V.), the connection is most obvious. Indeed this must be the qualification for seeing anything that is worth seeing. When Christ, the image of God, was in the world, the world knew not its Maker. And why? Not because there was not abundant evidence. He Himself declared the reason in that pregnant question which admitted but of one answer: "How can ye believe who receive honor one of another, but seek not the honor that cometh from God only?" The reason for lack of faith is always a moral one: the pure in heart alone can see God.

The Pharisee may cleanse the outside with most religious care and see nothing,—or see indeed the very opposite of the truth; but the soul brought by its very misery to self-judgment, with its back on the world and self, shall see the glorious Vision which lies over against these, unseen by their votaries. And oh, for the bliss that lies beyond this! for the possibilities of vision beyond all that any one yet has made his own! for such is the unrealized wealth of our possession even here. To us the sanctuary is completely open; the veil is rent from top to bottom; and Christ is entered in, to give us entrance. Yet we imitate so much the unbelief of those who in days past besought God to put 2 (10-12): the world in opposition.

(a) for righteousness' sake.

Blessed are the [w] peace-makers: for they shall be called sons of God.

[2] Blessed are they that are [z] persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

w cf. Rom. 12. 19, 20. cf. Phil. 4. 2. cf. Eph. 2. 14.
x John 16. 1-3. 2 Tim. 2. 12; 2 Pet. 2. 20; 2 Pet. 3. 14-17.

distance when He was drawing nigh, and to put a creature of His, though it were a Moses, abidingly between themselves and Him.

The last beatitude, "Blessed are the peace-makers," recognizes the strife and unrest that have come in, while it shows the energy of divine grace which has come to restore and bring back out of it. As the final blessing we see in it the result of what has gone before. There is in it the consciousness of a Voice which has spoken peace with power to still the disorder and reach down to the very root of it. How wonderful to know that that which is the basis of true peace is that in which we see also evil in its worst, but overpowered, made subject, transformed into glorious good. The world's worst crime, the bitter growth of its many centuries of hostility to God, its awful act of allegiance to the prince that it had chosen, has been the Cross. But just its worst is that which, in the triumph of good over it, gives absolute peace. The worst that man could do has but disclosed the infinite good in God; nay, He has met the full power of the enemy in all the weakness of a Son of man. Goodness, with no power but what is inherent in it, has defeated evil with all its accumulated strength. "Out of the eater has come forth meat, and out of the strong, sweetness."

Henceforth, to despair of good is to despair of God. He has made peace by the blood of His cross. How blessed now are the feet of those who are but the messengers of the gospel of peace! who go forth with the trumpet of jubilee to proclaim the fruits of the day of atonement for the Israel of God! the feeblest may recount the praises of that weakness which has defeated the strong, and out of weakness brings forth strength everlasting.

Blessed, then, are the peacemakers! God is Himself that. They, then, shall be called the sons of God. Henceforth, whatever the roughness of the road, their feet are "shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace:" shoes that, like those of Israel of old, never wear out. Well may they be the publishers of this grace to others.

[2] The blessings connected with character are now followed by two which are divine encouragement to those suffering from the consequent opposition of the world. For the world is in opposition to God, as the Cross has once for all proved, and so to those who resemble Him or remind it of Him. This opposition may be indeed disguised in many ways, and so that those who exhibit it may be unconscious of what they are doing—unconscious even (such is the deceitfulness of the heart) that they are of such a spirit. For few indeed will own to themselves a condition so terrible as this. Hence have come in the false gods which have been invented to satisfy the religious principle in man, and yet allow him to follow his lusts and passions without check, or even with the approbation of a misguided conscience. And hence, even under the form of Christianity, people can picture a God after their own heart, and serve him with quite unconscious heathenism.

The persecution of which the Lord speaks here is of two kinds—for righteousness and for His sake. In the first case it is for character, but it is to be noticed that it is represented as less violent and radical than the latter is. Correspondingly, the blessing pronounced is in the latter case greater.

With righteous conduct there may not be linked the open testimony which brings out opposition; and, if it be without personal claim on the beholder, it may even be admired, or at least approved, by him. It is another thing when it does make this claim; when the honesty of a servant, for example, interferes with his employer's profit. Then he may have to suffer; and this is so common a case that it calls for little remark.

(b) for Christ's sake.

Blessed are ye, when they shall [y]revile you and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice and be exceeding glad: for great is your [z]reward in heaven; for so persecuted they the [a]prophets who were before you.

y Acts 28. 22. 1 Pet. 2. 12. 1 Pet. 4. 14.
z Rom. 8. 17, 18. 2 Tim. 2. 12. a 2 Chr. 36. 16. Acts 7. 52; ch. 23. 34-37.

When suffering is for Christ's sake, it is because suffering for Christ presses His claim upon the conscience, and it is felt, however little admitted, that one has to do with Him. As often said, a man who smiles at a Mohammedan may curse a Christian; and he who will quietly enough discuss the Koran, grows hot and angry in disputing against Scripture. Truth carries with it its own evidence sufficiently to make this difference; which is, therefore, but unwitting homage paid by those who mean nothing of this. Christ turns from the mere abstract "they" in the former case, to speak, as it were, directly into the hearts of these sufferers: "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you, falsely, for My sake." With this comes the fuller recompense: "Rejoice, and be exceeding glad, for great is your reward in heaven: for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you."

This "reward in heaven," addressed (as few realize it to have been) to Jewish saints, whose portion as such would be earthly, (and so the Lord has before applied the language of the 37th psalm,) and in immediate anticipation of the Kingdom being set up on earth,—is really stranger than it looks to those who contemplate it merely from a Christian standpoint. Our portion is rightly recognized as being in heaven, and it is so much the accustomed thing to think of all saints as dying and going there, that we have largely lost sight of the meek inheriting the earth, or else injuriously misapply it. For it is certainly not the rule with the meek now, and in seeking to make it such they would lose their character.

But the Lord, with all Israel's blessings in His hand, and offering Himself to them as Messiah to bring them in for them, naturally speaks according to the Scripture which has in view the time when He will be received and they will be blessed under Him upon earth. According to this view, it is the reward in heaven which becomes more exceptional and difficult to understand.

But these blessings—millennial as we call them—being then lost to them through unbelief, belong, in their primary sense, to the future yet;—to a remnant brought to God in a time of trial such as has never yet been known, and who will have to pass through it to enjoy their promises. Of these many will be persecuted even to death, and thus lose what we may call their proper portion. But they will thus receive, in the goodness of God, a higher blessing. Deprived of an earthly, they will enter into a heavenly inheritance, and so are seen in the book of Revelation (xx. 4–6) as a special company of martyrs, added to the saints of the first resurrection (the saints of Christian and previous times) who will be already on their thrones.

But besides this, and apart from martyrdom (of which the Lord does not here directly speak), there will be also a preserved remnant, who, passing through the trial of this time, will have a special link with heaven, such as all will not possess (Rev. xiv. 3, 4).*

For us there is, of course, no difficulty in an application, which is as true for us as if there were no others who had concern in it. The prophets, of whom our Lord speaks in this connection, dealt with men by the word of God which was given them to communicate, and themselves suffered, not merely as righteous, but as men of God. Yet as to the professing people of God even it could be said, "Which of the prophets did not your fathers persecute?"

* For this, upon which it is not the place here to dwell, I may refer to my "Revelation of Christ" pp. 159-162; 208-212.

3 (13-16): saints manifesting Him.

3 Ye are the [b]salt of the earth; but if the salt have lost its [c]savour, wherewith shall it be salted? it is thenceforth good for nothing but to be cast out and trodden under foot of men.

Ye are the [d]light of the world: a city that is set upon a hill cannot be hid. Neither do they light a b cf. Gen. 18. 23-32. cf. 2 Thess. 2. 7.

c Mk. 9. 50. Lk. 14. 34, 35. cf. 2 Tim. 3. 5. cf. Rev. 3. 15, 16.
d cf. Eph. 5. 8; cf. Rev. 1. 12, 13; cf. Jno. 5. 35.

The apostle Peter speaks similarly of these two causes of persecution (1 Pet. iii. 14; iv. 14), and with corresponding emphasis of blessing for those "reproached for the name of Christ." With him it is present, however: "the Spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you;" but who can measure what is implied in this?

3 Such treatment at the world's hand involves also in itself a place of privilege and responsibility from God, which is two-fold, answering to this two-fold rejection. First, "ye are the salt of the earth." Salt is that which resists corruption; there being in it also a special diffusibility, which makes it a suited image of active and aggressive power. Mere passivity is, in fact, inconsistent with righteousness itself; even what we call "passive resistance" is more than this. There is the government of moral principle, in obedience to which the whole man braces himself up, if but to endure. Example also becomes precept, and that of the most convincing kind: words may be merely words, and light as the breath that forms them. The willing sufferer is so truly the witness, that the old word for witness has come to belong to him. The "martyr" is preeminently the "witness."

But this leads on to the second thing, which is just a place of testimony: "Ye are the light of the world: a city which is set on a hill cannot be hid. Neither do men light a lamp and put it under the bushel, but on a stand; and it giveth light to all that are in the house. "So let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven."

From it being said, 'let men see your good works," people often imagine that these are the light itself, and thus make the two things we are considering practically one. Indeed they are made for one another: separate them, and there is at once a fatal deficiency in each. What testimony to Christ can there be, if there be not the life giving evidence? But again, what evidence in the life if the lips are silent as to Christ? Nay, this may be construed so as to make the life of no consequence:—

"For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight:
He can't be wrong, whose life is in the right."

But it is truth which sanctifies; and the life cannot be right that is not governed by it. And this is still the most serious effort of the enemy where Scripture is sought to be maintained: "For Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light," says the apostle; "therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed into the ministers of righteousness: whose end shall be according to their works" (2 Cor. xi. 14, 15). Here these ministers of righteousness press the life, to deny the truth; and as no more successful argument can be found than the evil lives of professors of it, so (next to this and in the same line with it) the good deeds of those who are without or who deny the truth, is Satan's wisest one.

Thus it needs the light to shine upon the good works, that they may be seen as such, and glorify your Father who is in heaven. Apart from this, they may glorify humanity, or glorify any lie under the sun. Christ is He with whom, in the full reality of it, "light is come into the world," and if "men love darkness rather than light," it is, as He Himself says, "because their deeds are evil" (John iii. 19). We must not be afraid to say this after Him. There are some, thank God, who are profoundly conscious that in His light alone they have seen light, and that there is no light for the world but only in Him. Thus if any are 2 (v. 17-48): The law confirmed, expanded, and supplemented. Christ's words contrasted with those of old.

1 (17-20): Its authority affirmed.

lamp and [e]put it under the bushel, but on the lampstand; and it giveth light unto all that are in the house. So let your light [f]shine before men, that they may see your good works, and [g]glorify your Father who is in heaven.

2. [1]Think not that I am come to overthrow the law or the prophets: I did not come to overthrow but to [h]complete; for verily I say unto you, Till [i]heaven and [e] Mk. 4. 21. Lk. 8. 16-18, Lk. 11. 33-36.

[f] cf. 1 Thess. 1. 8-10.
[g] cf. Phil. 2. 15, 16.
[h] cf. 2 Cor. 3. 2.
[i] 1 Pet. 2. 12.
[j] cf. 1 Cor. 14. 25.
[k] cf. Is. 42. 21.
Rom. 3. 31; cf. Gal. 5. 14. [l] Ps. 119. 89; Lk. 16. 17.

to be in any sense a light of the world, there is but one way of it—by reflecting Him. Let us remember, then, the responsibility we have, of bold confession of Him. It is not even righteous to hide from men in need what He has done for them. No: the lamp is not for the bushel,—but for the lampstand: it is not for ourselves that we are made light: the world has right to it, and can produce that right under the broad seal of Christ's commission.

One may perhaps object: "But my good works! Alas, that is just my difficulty. With all my inconsistency, I fear that it would more dishonor Christ than honor Him, for me to confess Him." One can understand such language; one can even respect the motive, and yet it involves an essential mistake. We are never called to show our good works, or even to be conscious of them. The Lord's lesson as to almsgiving perfectly illustrates the rule as to all such things, which is "let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth." He is not here, we may be sure, teaching a contradictory principle. He takes for granted that there will be good works indeed: true faith in Him will surely have its fruit; but faith is the very opposite of self-occupation, and certainly of self-satisfaction.

If it be Christ that occupies us, the apprehension of His perfection will give us true self-judgment: it will be as impossible to be careless of evil, as it will to be self-pretentious. We shall "boast in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh" (Phil. iii. 3). This will make the confession of Him both sweet and safe. We shall let our light shine before men; and, poor as we shall ever be in our own account, there will be fruit seen in us which shall glorify our Father. This joy in Christ itself will be the best evidence to commend Him to others.

2. We have now a new and very distinct section of the "sermon on the mount," in which the Lord takes the place of One greater than Moses, confirming, expounding, and bringing out the spirituality of the law, while He at the same time supplements and perfects it; not hesitating to put His own words in a place of higher authority than that of those spoken "to them of old time." For "the law made nothing perfect" (Heb. vii. 19), and what Moses had to concede on account of the hardness of their hearts (ch. xix. 8) could now, in the light which had come with Christ into the world, no longer be permitted.

There are fittingly seven subsections here, ending with the enjoining of this very perfection as required of the children of the perfect Father in heaven, who were to manifest as that their Father's character. The higher the place accorded, the higher the standard necessarily. But there are many questions which the whole subject raises, and which we must take up seriously and consider patiently in the order of their suggestion.

[1] First of all, the authority of the law is affirmed, and in the fullest way; but we have to consider in what sense it is affirmed, for it is here that many and grave mistakes are made.

"The law and the prophets" was the recognized phrase for the Old Testament as a whole, the Scriptures of a dispensation already past, but which had not passed themselves with the dispensation. Thus in the Gospel of Luke He says again (xvi. 16): "The law and the prophets were until John; since that time the Kingdom of God is preached." Thus it could be said that they were passed, earth pass away, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all come to pass. Whosoever, then, shall do away with one of these [j]least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called least and that they were not passed. They were passed as the sole and governing truth: that was now come, or at least was at hand, for which they had been preparing the way; and necessarily this must be now the higher truth, but which must by the very fact bear witness to and establish what has gone before it. No truth can pass away. The more complete that is, to which we have arrived, the more surely must it embrace and set in their place all lower and partial truths which have anticipated and led on to it.

[j] Lk. 16. 10. Jas. 2. 10, 11. cf. Gal. 3. 10.

Thus then Christ came not to destroy the law and the prophets. He came to fulfil, or rather complete,—fill them out. What would the Old Testament be without the New? Very much like a finger, pointing into vacuity!

It is plain that the Lord is not here speaking simply of the ten commandments, though these have their place, and a foremost place, in His thoughts, as is manifest by what follows. But the law, in its use in Scripture, is by no means confined to this, and the addition of the "prophets" shows that it must be taken in its widest significance.

The "fulfilment" could not be therefore simply by His obedience to the law, though He was fully obedient, but implies the bringing in something additional, as plainly even the mere fulfilment of the prophets must be by the addition of something to the prophecy.

But He goes on now to affirm with His emphatic "verily," that "not one jot or one tittle,—not the smallest letter, nor the projection of a letter*—"shall pass from the law till all come to pass." This, though translated in our own version "be fulfilled," is a different word from that just used; and such coming to pass could not refer to the keeping of commandments. The ten commandments could not be spoken of as something which had to come to pass. But this experience would naturally have to do with the law in its larger significance, which must even, one would say, include the prophets also; and thus the phrase "until heaven and earth pass" would be the real equivalent of all things being fulfilled. For beyond this the Old Testament gives us only the promise of "new heavens and a new earth," about which it says little or nothing (Isa. lxv. 17; lxvi. 22).

Every jot and tittle of the Old Testament remains then never to pass away through the ages of time. It is all confirmed as divine, and therefore stable; but which, of course, does not mean that types and shadows were not to give way to the substance when it should come, or that the "new covenant" would not replace the old: for this would be a contradiction of the Old Testament itself which affirms it. No; the law abides in all its details; and therefore in all the limits it imposes on itself, and for all the purposes for which it was given, and for no other. This is simple enough, surely, to understand; and yet it is not understood by those, for instance, who would from words like these impose the yoke of the law upon the necks of Christians. For this it is not enough to tell us that the law abides. It is none the less necessary, as the apostle says, that "a man use it lawfully." And he adds to this, in illustration, that "the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient" (1 Tim. i. 8-10).

But the Lord's next words, for many, show without any doubt the perpetual and universal obligation of the law. For here He speaks plainly about doing or not doing, teaching or not teaching, even one of the least of its commandments, and of the recompense or retribution following for this. But while this is certain, it is no less clear that it is to Jews—to men under law—that He is in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall practise and teach them, he shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. For I say unto you, that except your righteousness shall [k]excel [the righteousness] of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven.

*Which in several Hebrew letters is the only distinction between them: as between the "r" and the "d," the "h" and the "ch," etc.

[2] (21-26): the second commandment of second table: the accusation of the law.

[2]Ye have heard that it was said to them of old time, [l]Thou shalt not kill; but whosoever shall kill shall be [k] cf. Lk. 18. 11, 12. cf. Rom. 3. 20. cf. Phil. 3. 5-7.

[l] Ex. 20. 13. Deut. 5. 17. cf. Rom. 13. 9. cf. Deut. 19. 4-13.

addressing Himself. Christianity is not come, nor the Kingdom of heaven, nor is the former even announced as yet. The Lord is simply making a special application of the principle He has declared, to the case of those before Him; whether this is to be in fact wider is not to be inferred from this particular case.

When we do come to Christianity we find, especially in the epistles to the Romans and Galatians, the relation of the law to the saints of the present dispensation carefully argued out. And here two things are emphasized for us. First, that the "righteousness of the law" is "fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit" (Rom. viii. 4). There is not, there cannot be, any giving up of what is righteous—of what is according to the character of God Himself. The Christian standard cannot be lower, but is in fact higher than the legal one, in the same proportion as the Christian position is higher than the Jewish, and as the power communicated in Christianity transcends any that was known in Judaism. The Christian position is in Christ before God. The Christian standard is therefore to walk as Christ walked. The Christian power is that of the indwelling Spirit of Christ. As the greater includes the less, so the righteousness of the law is fulfilled in Christian righteousness.

But, secondly, this does not mean that we are under the law. We are dead to it, that we might be married to Christ, says the apostle, that we might bring forth fruit unto God (Rom. vii. 4). It is not that the law is dead,* but we are; and thus it is carefully guarded from the least possible conflict with what the Lord has here said.

It is not the place here to discuss this doctrine, but the simple statement of it should be enough. It is not the possible meaning of a few texts but the whole doctrine of the apostle, fully argued out, that denies that the Christian is under the law; and to say that it is merely the ceremonial part that is in question, is simply impossible for any one who will read his argument with any care. Is it the ceremonial law that says, "Thou shalt not covet" (Rom. vii. 7)? Is "the good that I would I do not" (ver. 19) ceremonial? It is impossible to say this.

The Lord, here in Matthew, is speaking to Jews, to those confessedly under the law, and in view of the coming Kingdom, which (because of their rejection of the King) has yet not come for them, and which, when it does come, will bring in a different condition of things from Christianity, as indeed the sermon on the mount itself assures us. This we shall have to look at in a little while.

[2] But now the Lord proceeds to develop the righteousness that He requires, in contrast with that of scribes and Pharisees, those zealots for the external. The second table of the law is here pressed, rather than the first: evidently because on this side man is most accessible,—his conscience is most easily roused. Men can invent all sorts of coverings to hide from themselves their state Godward; but if this be tested by their conduct toward men, made in His image, it is not so possible to conceal from oneself the truth. Corruption and violence were of old the characteristics of a world which had reached the limit of divine long-suffering (Gen. vi. 11-13). The Lord takes therefore the sixth and seventh commandments of the law—the second and third of the second table—to illustrate the righteousness which He proclaims, expanding and spiritualizing what was subject to the judgment. But I say unto you that every one that is [m]angry with his brother without a cause shall be subject to the judgment; but whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be subject to the [n]council; and whosoever shall say, Fool, shall be liable to the [o]hell of fire. If, then, thou bring thy [p]gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way: first, be reconciled to thy brother, and [m] 1 John 3. 15. 1 John 4.20. cf. Eph. 4. 26.

*See margin, and R. V.

[n] cf. 26. 59. cf. Ex. 22.28.
[o] vers. 29, 30. ch. 10. 28.
[p] cf. Lev. 1. 3, etc. cf. ch. 15.5,6. cf. Lk. 21.1-4. cf. 1 Cor. 5.8.

said to them of old time, so as to make it a new moral revelation to those that hear Him. Moses' commandments become thus, as it were, His own, who is shown as One greater than Moses,—the Prophet of the new dispensation.

The "judgment," the "council" (or Sanhedrin), and the "hell (Gehenna) of fire" are three grades of penalty, as is evident; but in the Kingdom of heaven all under one authority. "Thou shalt not kill" stood as the sixth commandment of the law. God had long before declared that "whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." The executive law in Israel could go no further than this. It could not deal with the state of the heart but with the outward act only. But the law as expressed on the tables of stone applied not merely to the outward act, and their appending in the way they did the executive to the moral law, inferred that the two were equal in what they covered; as they were not. The state of the heart was thus left out of view in the estimate of accountability toward God, and the practical bearing of the law was nullified for the many.

But now, the kingdom of heaven was drawing nigh, in which another estimate of things would be made and acted on. Anger in the heart, where causeless, and the railing charges which men so lightly bring against one another, would be all crimes against an authority which had at its command not mere physical penalties, limited by the temporal life, but the awful Gehenna of fire—hell itself. It is not meant that under this divine government no mercy would be shown: that is not the point, nor what the words express. But such things would be within the range of jurisdiction, and man would be made to realize that there is a God who judgeth the hearts, and by whom actions are weighed.

But this cuts deep: it is meant to do so, and to rouse the conscience of the hearers to the impossibility of any mere human righteousness in the presence of God. That of scribes and Pharisees would never do for Him who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, and who cannot look upon sin. Their whole method was a false one. They valued apparently God's altar, loading it, Cain-like, with gifts defiled by the hands that offered them. The Lord warns them that they must be reconciled to their justly offended brethren, before presuming to bring such offerings: and while the application here is evidently to Israel, the principle as manifestly applies to every one of us to-day. A sinner coming as such to God is not at all in question: for he can only come as what he is, and has the explicit assurance that he will be received. The Pharisees said truly of the Lord, though they meant it as a reproach, "This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them;" and the Lord answered, justifying His ways as the Physician of sin-sick souls. Abel, too, bringing his sacrifice to God, "obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying"—not of his works nor of his character, but—"of his gifts" (Heb. xi. 4). How impossible otherwise to have any assurance at all! for as to how much could we never set ourselves right with brethren! Blessed be God, it was for our sins that Jesus died; and our sins are the best of titles to a Saviour of sinners.

But while God would never turn away a sinner thus seeking Him, or delay even for a moment the reception of such an one, this is not to hinder any possible restitution to those we may have injured, but the very contrary. For now we come under the rule before us, and as saints are to lift up holy hands; but then come and offer thy gift. Make friends with thine [q]adversary quickly whilst thou art with him on the [r]way; lest the adversary deliver thee to the [s]judge, and the judge deliver thee to the [t]officer; and thou be cast into [u]prison. Verily I say unto thee, Thou shalt in no wise come out thence till thou hast [v]paid the last farthing.

[3] (27-32): the third commandment.

[3] Ye have heard that it was said, [w]Thou shalt not commit adultery; but I say unto you, that every one that [x]looketh upon a woman to lust after her, hath already committed adultery with her in his heart. But [y]if thy right eye cause thee to stumble, pluck it out and cast it from thee: for it is profitable to thee that one of thy members should perish and not thy whole body be cast into hell. And if thy right hand cause thee to stumble, cut it off and cast it from thee: for it is profitable to thee that one of thy members should perish, and not thy whole body be cast into hell.

q Lk. 12. 58, 59.
r cf. Prov. 25. 8.
cf. Lam. 3. 4, 5.
s cf. Is. 33. 6, cf. Lk. 19. 42.
t cf. Deut. 32. 36.
u cf. Is. 10. 5, 6, 15.
v cf. Is. 42. 22 with Zech. 9. 11, 12.
w cf. Is. 40. 2 with Ruth 1. 21, 22.
x Ex. 20. 14. Deut. 5. 18.
y Job. 31. 1. cf. 2 Sam. 11. 2-5 with Jas. 1. 14, 15. ch. 15. 19.
y ch. 18. 8, 9. Mk. 9. 43-47. cf. De. 13. 6. cf. Col. 3. 5.

for a saint this is absolutely necessary for communion. And how many suffer sadly in their souls because of an unjudged condition in this respect! For such the Lord's words here have the gravest importance.

Those to whom they were addressed, however, were Jews, in no wise taking the place of sinners, nor yet truly saints, but legalists: going on with the law, in which they boasted, and not realizing that Moses, in whom they trusted, was necessarily their greatest adversary (John v. 45). Judgment must be the end, if they did not in the meanwhile reconcile themselves to him by the offering of which already the law had spoken, and which the glorious speaker Himself was to provide. This He does not, however, go on to in this place. He is convicting them of a need without the consciousness of which all revelation of God's way of grace would be impossible to be understood. The judgment reached, they would in no wise come out from it until they had paid the uttermost farthing.

Hopeless then was their confidence in the law. But the Lord had not done with it for the purpose of conviction, and of clearing it from the mistakes and perversions of the scribes. He goes over, therefore, from the sixth to the seventh commandment, to show once more that out of the heart the positive transgression comes, and that what was in the heart to do was in fact done as to the guilt of it. Opportunity might be lacking, which altered nothing: the sin was in the heart.

And He urges that if the right eye or hand cause men to stumble, it were better to cut them off and go on maimed through life, than to preserve these and go with a whole body into hell. Better sacrifice what might seem most necessary than give oneself up to the sure penalty of sin. Clearly no asceticism or self mutilation is intended by such an injunction; but men excuse on the plea of necessity what they find to be a constant provocative of sin. God's law admits no pretext of the kind.

[3] In connection with this commandment, the Lord takes up also the law of marriage, to refuse the laxity which even Moses had had to bear with, and still more the license of the rabbins. Moses on account of the hardness of their hearts had only been able to modify somewhat the existing custom of divorce. The "writing" which he had "commanded" was in the interests of social order, not of license, which the prevailing school of Hillel favored in the most shameless manner. The Lord, peremptorily and on His own authority, restricts the allowance of it to that one ground which plainly destroys the very idea of marriage; and declares the putting away of one's wife for any other cause, to be

It hath been said, moreover, Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a [z]writing of divorcement. But I say unto you, that whosoever putteth away his wife, except on account of fornication, [a]maketh her to commit adultery; and whosoever marrieth her that is put away committeth adultery.

4 (33-37): warning of creature-weakness.

[4]Again ye have heard that it was said to them of old time, [b]Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths. But I say unto you, [c]Swear not at all; neither by heaven, for it is the [d]throne of God; nor by the earth, for it is the [e]footstool of his feet; nor by Jerusalem, for it is the city of the [f]great King; neither shalt thou swear by thy [g]head, for thou canst not make one hair white or black. But let your word be [h]Yea, yea; nay, nay: but what exceedeth these cometh of evil.

z Deut. 24.1. Jer. 3. 1. cf. Gen. 2. 23, 24.
a ch. 19.3–9. Mk. 10. 2–12. Lk. 16. 18. cf. 1 Cor. 7. 10, 11. cf. 1 Cor. 8. 12.
b Ex. 20. 7. Lev. 19.12. Num. 30.2. Deut.23.23. c cf. ch. 26. 63. cf. 2 Cor. 1. 17. cf. 1 Thess. 2 5.
d Is. 66. 1. ch. 23. 22.
e Acts 7. 49.
f Ps. 48. 2.

cf. ch. 4. 5. g cf. Acts 18. 18; cf. Nu.6.18. h ch. 19. 6–22; Jas. 5. 12.

making her commit adultery by another marriage. Also he who marries one so divorced is committing adultery.

The Lord's words cannot surely be less binding upon Christians of the present day; Christianity cannot be content with a lower morality than He enforces here, not as a national or ecclesiastical regulation, but just as morality. What was adultery then to Him must ever be adultery; and no human law can alter this in the slightest degree. Let the Lord's people look to it, in a day when men are doing their own wills with continually more audacity.

4 He proceeds now to another matter, in which again what was tolerated under the law is now forbidden in the new morality which He is enforcing. "Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths," plainly speaks of vowing. There had been great abuse of it, as Israel's history makes manifest: men not hesitating to vow recklessly to God at the dictate of their pride and passion and self-will, to find themselves then entangled by what seemed now their duty. Careless profanity had come in at the heels of this, and God's name been profaned by light appeals to it on every occasion, modified by conscience or the lack of it, by every kind of circumlocution and indirect expression of what they dared not openly give utterance to.

The Lord sweeps into His prohibition all these evasions of the third commandment, putting them into the same category, with that which was once permitted. Man's utter weakness, so fully and simply demonstrated by his inability even to change the color of a hair, is made (at least in part) the basis of the prohibition. God might swear, for He could accomplish, and knew, too, all the consequences of that to which He pledged Himself. Beautifully we find Him doing it when seeking to assure the soul of His creature, so ready to doubt the perfect faithfulness even of his God. "Wherefore God, willing to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of His counsel, confirmed it by an oath; that by two immutable things"—His word being really as certain as His oath, but not so to man—"wherein it was impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us" (Heb. vi. 13–18).

We then on our part should be far from what is so suited to His strength, so ill-suited to His feeble creatures. The legal covenant had, however, in its essential features the character of an oath; and the last chapter of Leviticus contemplates typically their failure under it, in contrast with the One who did not fail (see notes). The law, therefore, until man was fully proved by it, could not forbid the vow, while it is anachronism, and worse, that it should be imported into Christianity, and that we should hear of covenant-vows, the baptis-

5 (38-42): recompense as from one with God.

6 (43-45): the moral victory over evil.

38 Ye have heard that it hath been said, [i]Eye for eye, and tooth for tooth: but I say unto you, that ye [j]resist not evil; but whosoever [k]smiteth thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also, and he that would get judgment against thee, and [l]take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go one mile, go with him two. [m]Give to him that asketh of thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away.

43 Ye have heard that it hath been said, [n]Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy; but I say unto you, [o]Love your enemies, [[p]bless those that curse you, do good to those that hate you,]* and [q]pray for those that [insult you and]* persecute you; that ye

*The bracketed words are omitted by many.

cf. Ex. 23. 4, 5; Prov. 25. 21, 22; cf. Rom. 5. 8-10. p Lk. 6. 28; cf. 1 Cor. 4. 12; cf. 1 Pet. 3. 9. q cf. Lk. 23. 34; cf. Acts 7. 60.

i Ex. 21. 24. Lev. 20. 24. Deut. 19. 21.
j Prov. 20. 22. Rom. 12. 17, 19, 20.
k cf. Is. 50. 6 with ch. 26. 67. Lk. 22. 63-65.
l Lk. 6. 27-31. cf. 1 Cor. 6. 7. cf. 1 Thess. 5. 15.
m cf. Deut. 15. 7-11. Lk. 6. 30, 34. cf. 1 Tim. 6. 18. n Lev. 19. 18. cf. Deut. 23. 3-6.
o Lk. 6. 27, 35.

mal vow, etc., so contrary to the simplicity of Christ's institutions for us, and to the grace which we know to be alone our strength. The vow is wholly passed away, but to make room for Christ's strength to rest upon us, our very infirmities to be gloried in on this account (2 Cor. xii. 9, 10). God's oath is sworn to us, that His abundant grace shall be our sufficiency.

38 The Lord now takes up the necessary principle of law, to contrast it with that non-resistance of evil which He enjoins upon His disciples. The righteousness of the law of course remains righteousness, but it does not require of any that they should exact for personal wrongs. There is no supposition of the abrogation of law or of its penalties. The government of the world is not in question, but the path of disciples in it. Where they are bound by the law, they are bound, and have no privileges. They are bound, too, to sustain it in its general working, as ordained of God for good. Within these limits there is still abundant room for such practice as is here enjoined. We may still turn the left cheek to him that smites the right, or let the man that sues us have the cloak as well as the coat which he has fraudulently gained: for that is clearly within our rights. If the cause were that of another, we should have no right of this kind, nor to aid men generally in escape from justice or in slighting it. The Lord could never lay down a general rule that His people should allow lawlessness, or identify themselves with indifference to the rights of others. He speaks only of what is personal to oneself,—"smite thee," "sue thee," "compel thee:" and here the law itself would recognize one's liberty.

His disciples are not only to yield, but to show readiness, at least, to do more. They are not to be overcome of evil, but to overcome it with good. They are under a higher than any earthly government, which will take abundant care of them, and are freed from the need of advocating their own cause, or taking arms in their own defense. And they are partakers of such royal bounty that they are to be themselves bountiful. "Give to him that asketh of thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away."

All this needs wisdom in following out, that it may answer its end:—that God may be honored in it, and men be blessed. It must not be allowed to degenerate into a moral laxity which may counterfeit it, but will then be its opposite. True love alone will find its way here, but will certainly find it,—clear-sighted, as all true love is. To this, therefore, the Lord now goes on.

43 Men understand, at least, that they ought to love their neighbor: but their qualifications narrow even their idea of such a duty, while they have invented a duty of hate, which no law-giver perhaps would dare inscribe upon his tables, but to which there is given nevertheless a too ready and practical obedience.

may be the sons of your Father who is in heaven: for he [r]maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain upon the just and unjust.

7 (46-48): the perfection enjoined.

7 For if ye [s]love those who love you, what reward have ye? do not the tax-gatherers also the same? And if ye greet your brethren only, [t]what do ye beyond others? do not even the Gentiles the same? Be ye then [u]perfect, even as your heavenly Father is perfect.

[r] Acts 14.17. Ps. 65.9–13. cf. Lk. 12.16, 17.
[s] Lk. 6.32–34. cf. 1 Jno. 4. 10.
[t] cf. ver. 20. cf. Lk. 10.25–37.
[u] cf. Gen. 17. 1. cf. Lk. 6.36. Eph. 5.1, 2; cf. 1 Pet. 1.15, 16.

"Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy" is what he would justify to his conscience, as he approves it in his heart. But the law has no other word than "neighbor" here, as it has no other duty than to love him; and the Lord specifically puts even our enemies into this class. "But I say unto you, Love your enemies;" not even do them good merely, though that might seem much, but "love them." Hard work, indeed, and impossible, save in the light of a greater love: for every day that the sun shines or the rain falls upon this evil world which has turned away from God, such love is demonstrated, leading men to repentance. God blesses those who curse Him, does good to those that hate Him,—sets us the sweetest and most wonderful example of infinite compassion, which He who was Speaker here has filled out to the full, by taking His place among those despitefully used and persecuted, and pouring out not only His heart, but His heart's blood for His persecutors. Thus that which might seem impossible even with God, is in God become Man made actual.

When the Lord spoke, this last word had not yet been uttered; but He was there who was to utter it, the Son of the Father, and opening to men the way into divine relationship, which He encourages His disciples to apprehend and realize in a way unknown till now. "That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven" implies acceptance of this wondrous place in such a way as to let it be manifest in the character displayed. And how responsible are they to whom such grace is given! To live in it is to acquire power to fill it out.

7 They must not, then, with this high place accept the moral code that would suit even those typical sinners, the publicans or tax-gatherers—those instruments of Roman greed and oppression. For these even were capable of returning love for love. For those whose Father is in heaven, nothing can be permitted as the standard but perfection—His own moral perfection. "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" is supreme, flawless perfection. And nothing else would do as a standard. The moment we admit evil into this, the evil has become part of the standard, and God is made to go with what He hates.

We must, however, distinguish between having perfection before us,—condemning ourselves for whatever is not that, and honestly pressing after it—and the self-flattery that can assert "we have attained it." It is in fact because perfection is before us that we cannot say so. Will any one indeed venture to assert that he is morally perfect as God is? The highest pretension must surely shrink a little from making such a claim. Yet here is the pattern: we are to be "imitators of God as dear children" (Eph. v. 1, Gk), aspiring after that which will always be beyond us, and which as being so, will always work in us self-abasement and humiliation, instead of self-complacency.

This, then, is to be the aim: and while it is owned that we fall short, let us remember that the very falling short implies an aim: if we do not aim, we cannot fall short. If we aim at something lower, the standard is given up: we are then doing our own will, and not God's.

Let us remember also that there are two kinds of perfection, which it is important to distinguish from one another: perfection in degree, something that cannot be exceeded, and perfection as wholeness, entireness. We say of a wheel,

3 (vl. 1-18): Before the Father.
1 (1-4): Righteousness manward.

3. [1] Take heed that ye do not your [v] righteousness before men, to be seen of them; otherwise ye have no reward with your Father who is in heaven. When therefore thou doest [w] alms, do not sound a trumpet before thee, as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and in the streets, that they may have [x] glory of men: verily I say unto you, they have their [y] reward. But when thou doest alms, v cf. Deut. 24. 13. cf. Ps. 112. 9. cf. Rev. 19. 8.

w cf. Rom. 12. 8. ctr. Lk. 18. 12.
x vers. 5, 16. cf. Jno. 12. 43 with Jno. 5. 44.
y ctr. Phil. 3. 7, 8; cf. Mk. 12. 41-44.

it is perfect, because it has all its parts; while, as to its workmanship, it may be very imperfect. Now, the child of God may be feeble, and is; but as a "partaker of the divine nature" he should not be maimed. In God, love and light belong together: no one of these, apart from the other, could represent His nature. Love without righteousness could not be divine love. Righteousness without love, would not be divine righteousness. So love, too, just to those who love us, may be, as the Lord tells us, only a publican's love, but not God's: it is not a feeble likeness, but a distortion. Where the new nature is, there the moral character of God is found,—infantile, perhaps, as to development, and yet in it the Father's image shines. "Love," then, "your enemies," says the Lord, "that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven."

This closes the second part of the sermon on the mount with the seal of divine perfection. In it the greater Prophet than Moses speaks, with a brighter glory in His face than Moses' face could show.

3. The third section occupies the first eighteen verses of the sixth chapter. It has upon it plainly the seal of a third section, as bringing us into the sanctuary, and teaching us to realize the Father's presence and to act as before Him.

The first verse furnishes the principle, which is then illustrated, amplified and enforced, in three different applications. The text is: "Take heed that ye do not your righteousness before men, to be seen of them: otherwise ye have no reward of your Father who is in heaven." The word is allowed to be "righteousness" here, as in the Revised Version, and not "alms," as in the common one. In the following verses "alms" is right.

This is then illustrated in three different applications, manward, Godward and selfward,—almsgiving, prayer and fasting. Each of these is, of course, but an illustration of the principle; but the illustration is in each case chosen in divine wisdom, and must therefore have special suitability.

[1] Almsgiving is chosen to express what is "righteousness" toward men. So it is distinctly called, and indeed was by the Rabbins also. Thus we can see how the Lord, in reproving a righteousness done before men, naturally takes this up as a most showy form of it, and which indeed was lauded in the most extravagant terms by the senseless formalists of the day.* He speaks of men sounding a trumpet before them, in the synagogues and in the streets, when they gave them: language which is perhaps only symbolical of the way in which they blazoned abroad their acts of charity, but for which also they might assign the most plausible reasons. In fact, among all people, at all times, almsgiving is a charity which readily enough has been accepted at its fullest value. While it can be practised with so little personal sacrifice, it yet ministers to need so various and so palpable,—it has so much the form of benevolence, that it seems like cynicism to question if the spirit be there; it is in itself so right, and puts one so plainly in the company, at least, of those who do right: all this makes it of priceless value, therefore, to those who seek the praise of men. They can in no way, perhaps, so readily attain their object: but then, alas, "they have their reward:" it is all they will possess for ever.

But, on the other side, almsgiving, as here classed by the Lord Himself as a

* Edersheim quotes a specimen as all-sufficient: "He that says, 'I give this sela as alms, that my sons may live, and that I may merit the world to come,' behold, this is the perfectly righteous."

let not thy [z]left hand know what thy right hand doeth: that thine alms may be in secret; and thy [a]Father who seeth in secret shall recompense thee.

2 (5-15): prayer.

[2]And when ye [b]pray, ye shall not be as the hypocrites: for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets, so that they may appear to men: verily I say unto you, they have their reward. But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy [c]chamber, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray unto thy Father who is in secret, and thy Father who seeth in secret shall recompense thee.

z cf. ch. 8. 4.
a cf. Lk. 14. 12-14. cf. Phil. 4. 17-19. cf. 2 Tim. 1. 16-18. cf. Heb. 6. 10.
b cf. Lk. 18. 10-12. ch. 23. 5-7, 14. Mk. 12. 38-40. Lk. 20. 46, 47.
c cf. ch. 14. 23. cf. Mk. 6. 46; cf. Lk. 5. 16.

form of righteousness, is a significant witness to us that mercy is not something supererogatory, but the ministry of love is itself a debt—a due. A man who withholds from another what he can give him for his need is not even righteous; and this removes also the thought of merit from the mercy shown. Only in a world of habitual *un*righteousness could the thought of the fulfilment of duty associate with it any thought of merit. "To him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin," says the apostle (Jas. iv. 17). And the Lord bids us on the other hand, "When ye shall have done all things that are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants: we have done"—not we have not done—"that which was our duty to do" (Luke xvii. 10). And with the comparative righteousness which is all that is ours at best,—a righteousness that still leaves us sinners,—how impossible should be the claim of merit! But to love, with all that this implies, is mere commanded duty; yea, to love one's neighbor as oneself is the injunction of the law. While the Christian standard rises higher still in its law of self-sacrifice, and all the marvelous enforcement of this in the example of Him who has given us life through His death. For those who have known this, there is no possible margin of devotedness outside of that duty which His love has endeared.

Almsgiving shrinks in this way into a small thing indeed; while this diminution of it cannot make it less imperative. All this, then, that our Lord addresses to a Jewish audience, our Christianity only emphasizes for us in every particular. We are of all men—to all men—the witnesses of grace. Debtors to it, absolutely, ourselves, we are debtors to show it to others.

And as to the secrecy of almsgiving, alas, how have Christians forgotten such words in their displayed charities, justifying the display as letting their light shine! The contrast is too manifest here to need enlargement.

[2] The second illustration of the need of being before God is furnished by what is itself a duty Godward. Prayer is the expression of creature-need and dependence. It is utterly inconsistent with any thought of pride and self-satisfaction. Yet, alas, we can unite these incompatible things together: think of the utter and awful contradiction in terms, of praying to God, in order to be seen of men! "As the hypocrites do," says the Lord; and yet, is it not a hypocrisy which creeps often into public prayers, where those who pray cannot, after all, be so characterised? Are not those who lead the prayers of others especially liable to act, in some measure, in this way? the consciousness of being before others influencing them often in the matter and style of their petitions! How much shorter, how much simpler, how different in various ways, might many of our prayers be, if we were alone before God, instead of in the prayer-meeting!

What records would not our chambers—our secret hours—afford, of our true state in respect of conscious dependence on and seeking after God, if we were perfectly faithful to ourselves in these respects! In secret prayer it is that our souls above all lay hold of God, and faith roots itself in His omnipotence. That prayer with us is to be characteristically in secret is here quite unmistakable.

But when ye pray, use not [d] vain repetitions, as the nations do; for they think that they will be heard because of their much speaking. Be not ye, therefore, like unto them: for your Father [e] knoweth of what things ye have need before ye ask him.

[d] cf. 1 Ki. 18. 26-39. cf. ch. 26. 39-44. cf. 2 Cor. 12. 8, 9. [e] cf. Rom. 8. 26, 27. cf. Is. 65. 24; cf. ver. 32.

And this will of itself very much exclude the vain repetitions against which our Lord warns His hearers, and which Christianity has by no means banished from our midst. If there be little need to explain or apply, the warning still needs serious attention on the part of Christians.

Our Lord follows this with that divine model for prayer, which for fullness combined with perfect directness and simplicity, so manifestly fulfils the conditions indicated. More than this, the order and proportion of the petitions are (with all else) perfect, and claim our earnest attention. They betoken a condition of heart which, where it is found, must ensure answer,—the state of one over whom God's will is supreme; for whom He is first and last, beginning and end. To realize such a condition would make us realize the meaning of those words of the Lord, "Ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done to you." Clearness of apprehension would go with it, and confidence of success: "the effectual fervent prayer of the righteous man availeth much" (Jas. v. 16).

A perfect model of prayer this is and must be: whether designed for a form, and especially whether intended for Christians, is another matter. The differences in Luke (xi. 2–4), now recognized in the Revised Version, would of course be the simplest argument against the first. Apart from this, the gift of the Spirit to Christians, for those who realize what is the characteristic feature of the present dispensation (John xvi. 7; Rom. viii. 26, 27), and who is distinctly named as the Intercessor within us according to God, would still more hinder such from interpreting it as a form to be used by Christians now. That it is not in the Lord's Name is evident upon the face of it, and confirmed (if it need confirmation) by His words to His disciples afterward: "Hitherto have ye asked nothing in My Name" (John xvi. 24); and this is a difference which cannot be remedied by supplying an omission where there is none, and making that really imperfect which is perfect. This very perfection, if we consider the state of the disciples at the time it was given them, would suggest once more its not being intended for Christians in the Christian state.

One is more concerned, however, to point out the actual perfection of the prayer, than to dwell upon such distinctions,—even though they have to do with differences vital to Christianity; but here is not the place for their examination. Let us consider now briefly the petitions in it, and what they imply.

The whole prayer is an address to God as Father: "Our Father who art in heaven." What underlies this title given to God is in fact a relationship never before made known in its true character, between Him and the true disciples of this blessed Teacher. "I have declared unto them Thy Name," He says elsewhere, "and will declare it, that the love wherewith Thou hast loved Me may be in them, and I in them" (John xvii. 26). This name of "Father" is something wholly different from those Old Testament titles, which have declared as the "Almighty" His power, or as "the Most High" His supremacy, or as "Jehovah" His enduring immutability. "Father" declares what His heart is toward us, while it gives us title to enjoy the love implied. The character of the tie is such as gives claim and confidence,—a claim He cannot deny. How great an encouragement to the prayer of faith!

No doubt, there had been long before anticipations of what is here conveyed. At the very birth of the nation God had announced, "Israel is my son, even my first-born" (Ex. iv. 22). And this, which had been repeated in the law, and made the foundation of preceptive argument—"Ye are the children of Jehovah your God" (Deut. xiv. 1),—might seem in itself to justify Israelites such as were these disciples who had gathered round the Lord, in taking the place He

After this [f]manner, therefore, pray ye, [g]Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be thy [h]Name. Thy [i]kingdom come; thy [j]will be done, as in heaven [so] also upon [k]earth. Give us this day our daily * [l]bread; and [f] Lk.11.1-4. ctr. Jno.16. 24. cf. Jude 20. cf. Eph. 6. 18.

[g] cf. ch. 5.9. 16. ctr. Rom.8. 15.
[h] cf. Mal. 1. 11; ctr. Rom. 2. 24.
[i] cf. Ps. 22. 28; cf. Obad. 21; cf. Dan. 2. 44; cf. Dan. 7. 17; cf. Zech. 14. 9.
[j] Ps. 115. 3; Dan. 4. 35.
[k] cf. Jer. 31. 34; cf. Is. 2. 2-5.
[l] cf. Is. 33; 14-16; cf. Ps. 37. 3, 25; cf. 1 Ki. 17. 1-16.

* Or "needed."

gives them here. But in fact this, in the national ruin that had intervened, had passed away. Israel was now Lo-ammi, "not my people," though with a promise for the future, of a restoration not yet fulfilled, whereby they should be called "the sons of the living God" (Hos. i. 9, 10). They could not comfort themselves with assurances thus forbidden to them, nor with a legal covenant to which God's faithfulness on His part could but make them partakers of a curse, rather than a blessing.

God is, however, the God of grace and of resurrection. He does not, indeed, patch an old garment with new cloth. He does not even merely restore what has failed and gone. But He can replace it with that which is better; and so much better, that the old and removed blessing shall be but the shadow of that which replaces it. Both together thus witness, if on the one hand to the failure of man, on the other to the changeless goodness and grace in God.

The old relationship to the Unchangeable had after all changed. The "children of Jehovah" were now as a nation outcast from Him. That tie, stable as it might look, had not the elements of endurance in it. As we look back upon it from the standpoint of the new revelation, it is simple to understand that Israel's sonship was not the result of new birth, as now it is for those in Christian relation. An Israelite was not necessarily, because that, a true believer in that God who had drawn nigh to him. A Jew was, as the apostle says (Gal. ii. 15), a "Jew by nature," but that nature was not a new nature. The child of law, as he afterwards shows by the type of Hagar and Ishmael (iv. 22–31), was but "born after the flesh," and showed the nature of the "wild man," as Ishmael did (Gen. xvi. 12). Thus there was no real nearness to God or fellowship with Him necessarily implied in sonship of this kind. Adoption there was in it, but not regeneration. Consequently it never secured from eternal judgment, nor even from day to day, except as obedience lasted or God's pity spared.

But the Father of whom Christ now spoke to His own, was not the Father of the nation in such a manner. Only the pure in heart should see Him; only the peacemakers be called His children. Even before this, though we do not find it in this Gospel, He had taught Nicodemus the absolute necessity of new birth, and that, while that which was born of the flesh was only "flesh," that which was born of the Spirit—a divine Person—was "spirit,"—divine in nature (John iii. 6). Here, it is plain, is the foundation of relationship to God, a real new yet divine life communicated, which is therefore "eternal life." For eternal life is not that simply which, when it begins, abides and has no ending. It is that which, though in us it begins, in itself never did. Receiving this, we are not merely adopted sons; we are that, truly; but none the less are we born into the family of God, and partakers of the divine nature (2 Pet. i. 4), children of God indeed.

How far all this had been entered into by the disciples as yet, is another question. That it was what was in the Lord's mind we know, and what He was leading them into,—what therefore underlies the teaching of the prayer. This Father in heaven, known for what He is, becomes thus rooted in the affections, supreme in the heart that has learned the cry of children. Of this, at least, the prayer is the expression. The first petition is one that shows how jealous for this Name revealed to it is the soul that has truly entered into the revelation: "Father, hallowed be Thy Name." May no thought come in to profane this wondrous intimacy now existing; may grace not be abused to license; may all

[m] forgive us our debts, [n] as we also have forgiven our debtors; and [o] lead us not into temptation, but [p] deliver us from evil.* For [q] if ye forgive men their offences,

* Or from the evil one.

[m] cf. Jer. 33. 8. cf. Dan. 9. 19. cfr. Col. 2. 13, 14. [n] Mark 11. 25, 26.

cf. Col. 3. 13. [o] ch. 26. 41; cf. Luke 21. 34-36; cf. Rev. 3. 10. [p] cf. Jer. 30. 7; cf. Dan. 12. 1; cf. ch. 24. 15-22. [q] Lk. 17. 3, 4; ver. 12; cf. Eph. 4. 32.

thy people worship with unshod feet in this place of nearness. Such surely will be the first cry of the heart that has felt—and in proportion as it has felt—the ecstatic joy of God so made known to us.

But the world knows not this joy, and the abounding evil in it is but the shadow upon hearts and lives that have turned away from the light of God. Hence the next cry necessarily is, "Thy Kingdom come! Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven!"

This, if true prayer, must be the outcome of a heart that is itself obedient. And what an absorbing desire this should be to us! The misery and moral ruin and dishonor to God on every side may well force from us such a prayer as this. Where is there another like it for the magnitude of that which is embodied in it? God, as it were, everywhere set in His place, every thing finding its relation to Him as the planets to their central sun; here is universal blessedness beyond which we can conceive no greater: all peace, happiness, goodness, are implied in it. And this is the practical power and glory of faith that it sets us where, from a full heart, such a prayer can well; that it enthrones God of its own free choice upon that absolute throne which alone His throne can be; that it realizes His will to be only the expression of His glorious nature,—in which every divine attribute blends and harmonizes.

For this Kingdom of the Father we must look beyond all dispensations to the sabbath of God's own rest. To confound it with the millennium would be an entire mistake, and necessarily lower its character terribly. The millennium, with all its blessedness, is but a step toward this glorious consummation. It is earth's "regeneration" (Matt. xix. 28); but after which, as in our own case, (not in it,) must come the eradication of evil and the change to eternal conditions. The millennium ends in an outbreak of evil, the most defiant that the world has ever seen (Rev. xx. 7-10). The judgment that follows reaches to the very frame-work of material things, and the earth and its heavens—the "firmament" of the second day (Gen. i.)—pass away in fire, to make way for that new heaven and earth in which righteousness shall dwell. Then, with all evil subdued and all things made anew, the Son of God, having brought about the very condition for which He teaches His disciples here to pray, will give up His separate human Kingdom to the Father (1 Cor. xv. 24-28) and the Kingdom of the Father here contemplated will at last have come.

Important it is not to confound the temporary with the eternal, the divine outcome with any intermediate step. Such confusion is no less mischievous for the heart than for the mind; for only where God rests should our hearts find rest. But for us it is true that the Kingdom of the Father will have come even before the millennium, when, caught up at the coming of the Lord to be ever with Him, the Father's house receives us into its "many mansions." And thus it is that in the parables of the Kingdom, (in the Gospel we are now considering,) when the present form of it is closed by the appearing of the King, it is said, "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun, in the Kingdom of their Father" (ch. xiii. 43). To this even then we shall have come.

With this petition for the coming of the Father's Kingdom, the first half of the prayer ends: the petitions following are of a different character. But what happiness would it not be for us, if the glory of God were thus, and as taught of the Spirit, the first desire of the heart, the first thing to utter itself, therefore, in our prayers!

But the remainder of the petitions are, as just said, personal; and here all is your heavenly Father will also forgive you; but if ye do not forgive men their offences, [r] neither will your Father forgive your offences.

[r] cf. ch. 18. 21-35. cf. Jas. 2. 13.

characterized by the most perfect moderation. A sense of dependence, of failure, and of frailty, manifests itself conspicuously in them; while the needs felt are realized as those of others of the same family of faith, who are associated, therefore, in all the petitions. The prayer is, indeed, a family prayer throughout; the expression of a common interest from which no one withdraws himself to walk alone. How well we should be cared for, indeed, if all were thus remembered by all, and the family tie united all the family.

It is not straining the request for daily bread, to make it comprehend also a spiritual application. With the Lord it would be simply impossible, while remembering the need of the body, to forget the immensely greater need of the soul. In both ways also the supply must be continual. The manna must be fresh every morning, and freshly gathered as the morning comes: hoarded, it breeds worms and stinks. There is no release from a dependence, which makes us sensible only of the love which constantly ministers, and keeps us near to the gracious Hand of Omnipotence. It is only treating us as children who are at home with the Father, not to provide for independence or absence from Him. We are not to renew the prodigal's experience, after being brought back from the far-off country; and it is not stint but love that deals thus with us.

The petition following needs more care to apprehend it, and Christians have lost much here by not realizing the fuller grace that has now come in for us, so far beyond what these disciples, though so near the Lord, could know. The great sacrifice was not yet offered, and the precious fruits of it could not yet be understood. The place of acceptance in the Beloved—identification with Him who has represented us before God in His atoning death, and now represents us in unending life—was yet among the things which could not be communicated. But with this, as quickened together with Him, is necessarily joined the forgiveness of all trespasses (Col. ii. 13). "By one offering He hath perfected for ever those that are sanctified" (Heb. x. 14).

Now it is certainly true that with this the prayer before us is in no wise in contradiction. The Lord could not mean to teach His disciples here that sins were only remitted from time to time, in answer to prayer about them. Yet those ignorant of the settled acceptance which the gospel teaches have used it, and continually use it, in this very way. On the other hand some would press, on account of such implication, the impossibility of the intelligent use, by the Christian, of such a petition. Both views are wrong, the prayer itself being perfectly in keeping—how could it be otherwise?—with the fullest revelation of divine grace. The simple fact that it is to the Father removes every difficulty. It is thus a Father's forgiveness that is besought by those who distinctly take the place of relationship. As between God and His creatures, the precious blood of Christ perfects forever those who, in faith, have taken shelter under it; but that only brings such under a Father's government who, "without respect of persons, judgeth according to every man's work" (1 Pet. i. 17), and who cannot but take notice of the conduct of His children, just because they are that, and of His love to them as that. Loss of communion, with chastening for restoration, are consequences of these trespasses; and the conditions implied in the petition itself, and emphasized by the Lord just afterward, show the holy character of this government. We must forgive, if we are to be forgiven. With an unforgiving spirit toward others we cannot enjoy communion with Him whose nature is love, and who must have His image reproduced in us.

This seen, there is no contradiction to the grace of Christianity. And yet it is true that in it we have nowhere any exhortation to prayer to the Father for what is here besought. It is Christ Himself rather who is declared to be our "Advocate with the Father" (1 John. ii. 1); and the same blessed Person offers Himself for the cleansing of our feet from the defilements of the way, that we s (16–18): fasting.

[3] And when ye [s]fast, be not as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance: for they disfigure their faces so that they may [t]appear unto men to fast; verily I say unto you, they have their reward. But thou, when thou fastest, [u]anoint thy head and wash thy face, so that thou appear not unto men to fast, but unto thy Father who is in secret; and thy Father who seeth in secret shall recompense thee.

s cf. Is. 58. 3-7. Lk. 18. 12.
t vers. 1,2,5. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 12.
u cf. I Sam. 16. 7. cf. Dan. 1. 12–16. cf. Prov. 14. 10. cf. 2 Cor. 6. 10.

may have part with Him (John xiii. 8). But all this awaited expression necessarily till the crowning work was done; and as to the last the Lord's own words are: "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know afterwards" (ver. 7). That we are not exhorted to prayer of this kind may well be due to the danger of such confusion of different things as we know to have been made here; while it could not be urged that such prayer intelligently used is in any wise inconsistent with Christian position.

Again, the sense of frailty comes out in the closing petition not to be led into temptation, but delivered from the evil. It is not in opposition to this that James bids us "count it all joy when we fall into divers temptations" (Jas. i. 2). The first is the expression of that self-distrust which is the fruit of self-knowledge. Who that knows himself but must realize this? and fear, therefore, what the hour of trial may manifest as to his weakness? But then this is just the spirit in which, if it be the will of God to bring him into circumstances of this kind, he will cleave to the only Source of strength and find it. In the trial he needs the consoling assurance of God's hand over it and working through it; and if he has come into it, not in self-confidence but in the path with Him, every element of it will work for good to him: it may well be a time of truest joy. Patience will be that which will work experience, and experience hope; and, patience having its perfect work, he will be "perfect and entire, needing nothing."

It would seem to be rightly here "deliver us from the evil," rather than "from the evil one," though either rendering is possible; but the larger view includes the narrower, and is therefore more suitable. The evil one is a most real and powerful enemy; but the evil in ourselves is still more to be dreaded, as only through this can he gain advantage over us. In this most concise prayer, the fullest meaning is the best.

It is characteristic of the law that, with all its forms, no form of prayer was ever prescribed to the people. When the disciples ask for one, as we are told they did (Luke xi. 1), they refer to John the Baptist as having taught his disciples, and not to Moses. The people of God, as conscious of their need, had always expressed it, and of course the Old Testament is full of examples of this: but all the more striking is it that the law did not prescribe anything of the kind. It was God's schoolmaster to teach man his weakness, but then it did this by claiming from him strength.

[3] In fasting the Lord touches that inward mortification which expresses the realization of what man is in the sight of God: in one's own sight, therefore, in proportion as we have attained to oneness of mind with Him. In the mount with God neither Moses nor Elijah ate or drank. "If then ye be risen with Christ," says the apostle,—"mortify your members which are upon the earth" (Col. iii. 1, 5). Fasting is treating them as if they did not exist,—not ministering to self: an unnatural condition which implies fallen nature; you can do nothing with it, but leave it out. The apostle speaks of this as the true characteristic of the children of God (Rom. viii. 13, 14): "if ye through the Spirit mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live; for as many as are led of the Spirit of God they are sons of God." It is as self-realization before God, that fasting comes here in its numerical place.

In fact, in Israel, with the Pharisaic externalism which characterized the

SECTION 4. (vi. 19–34.)

The way amid the temptation of the world.

1 (19–23): single-eyed integrity.

[1] Lay not up for yourselves [v] treasures upon the earth, where [w] moth and rust doth consume, and where thieves break through and steal; but lay up for yourselves treasures in [x] heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth consume, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: for where thy treasure is there will thy [y] heart

Lk. 16. 9; 1 Tim. 6. 18, 19. y cf. Col. 3. 1, 2; cf. 1 Pet. 1. 4; cf. Heb. 10. 34.

v 1 Tim. 6. 6-11. Prov. 23. 4. w Prov. 23. 5. 1 Tim. 6. 17. cf. Job 1. 8-19. cf. Luke 12. 15-21. Jas. 5. 1-5. x ch. 19. 21. Lk. 12. 33.

nation, fasting was abused to its very opposite. It was made to accredit self, instead of discrediting it. It brought it into prominence, instead of setting it aside. And it has always been a feature, not merely in asceticism (which the Lord is plainly not rebuking here), but in formalism also. He extinguishes this by making it a thing to be before the Father and not before men: before the eyes of Him who sees in secret. As to the practice of it, He does not really decide anything; and as to its place in Christianity, we must inquire about that elsewhere. That the true life is one that is to be lived before God is the main point upon which He is here insisting.

4. We pass now out of the sanctuary into the world, but carrying with us the sanctuary still, as Israel did in their journey through the wilderness. The way is thus not merely marked out morally for us, but we are empowered also for it; and we need this, for, wilderness as it is, the trials of the way are real ones, and if they are not in the way of allurement, the allurements of Egypt are felt through them, as we see with Israel. "The leeks, and the onions and the garlic" —earthy enough and never much above the earth,—displace (for they only compete with by displacing) the "bread from heaven;" and it is to Egypt that the heart turns back.

[1] Here we have the remedy for it all: a word which, if it could be spoken to a Jewish remnant in view of millennial blessing, is so fully and transparently our own as Christians that the natural thing is to take it as if it had no other application. Yet, for those who are to inherit the earth, in the day to which all this looks forward, there will be abundant need to lay up their treasures in heaven, in the care of Him who is coming to give reward to His saints, and while the earth is yet vibrating with shocks of upheaval, such as the Old and New Testaments combine to assure us will be, and which God will use also to make the frightened hind to calve (Ps. xxix. 9, see notes)—the nation of Israel thus to be born spiritually, as in one day (Isa. lxvi. 8).

From this, however, without losing sight of it, we may turn to consider our Lord's words in the way most profitable to ourselves; and here, as I have said, all is transparent. Heaven is where we belong; the earth is simply what we are traveling through. Our need and our privilege are one—to have our treasures there where nothing decays or corrupts, and where nothing can deprive us of them. Not only shall we then not lose the treasures, but the heart too will rest in undisturbed security, outside all alarms, and our feet will not be endangered by a loss of balance.

Let us note well that the Lord says, "where your treasure is, there your heart will be." He does not say, "ought to be," but "will." We are not allowed to escape with the easy assurance that what we are diligently accumulating our hearts are not engaged with. Why, then, accumulate it? We should say of a man who was heaping up sticks and straws and rubbish, that he was a maniac. But to him, nevertheless, the worthless pile is valuable; and that you can argue most surely from the fact of the accumulation. Who would not change worthless paper into good security? and this we are privileged to do; while treasure in heaven will keep the heart there, and draw the feet on to where the heart is.

And this alone gives a single eye: there is no confusion, no distraction of vis-be also. The [z]lamp of the body is the eye: if therefore thine eye be [a]single, thy whole body shall be full of light; but if thine eye be [b]evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. If, then, the light that is in thee be darkness, how [c]great the darkness!

2 (24): the contradiction of divided service.

[2] No one can serve [d]two masters: for either he will hate the one and love the other, or else he will hold to the one and despise the other: ye cannot serve God and [e]mammon.

3 (25, 26): the heart's sanctuary-refuge.

[3] Therefore I say unto you, Be not [f]careful for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink; neither for your body, what ye shall put on: is not the life [g]more than food, and the body than clothing? Consider the [h]birds of heaven that they sow not, nor reap, nor gather into barns, and your heavenly Father feedeth them: are ye not much [i]better than they?

4 (27–30): human impotence.

[4] And which of you by being careful can [j]add one cubit to his growth? and why are ye careful about clothing? Learn well as to the [k]lilies of the field, how they grow:

z Lk. 11.34-36.
a cf. Prov. 4. 25. cf. Heb. 2. 9. cf. 2 Cor. 3. 18. cf. Jno. 7. 17. ctr. 2 Pet. 1. 9.
b cf. ch. 5. 28. cf. ch. 20. 15. cf. Mark 7. 21, 22. cf. Prov. 23. 6, 7.
c cf. Mark 4. 11, 12. cf. Jno. 1. 5. cf. Jno. 8. 12. cf. Jno. 12. 35, 36, 40.
d Lk. 16. 13. cf. 1 Kl. 18. 21. cf. 2 Kl. 17. 41. cf. Rev. 3. 15, 16.
e Gal. 1. 10. Jas. 4. 4.

f Luke 12. 22-31; ver. 31; Heb. 13. 5, 6; cf. Phil. 4. 6, 7; ctr. Phil. 3. 18, 19; ctr. Lk. 10. 40-42. g cf. ch. 4. 4; cf. Mk. 8. 36; cf. 1 Cor. 15. 32. h Job 38. 41; Ps. 104. 12, 17, 27; Ps. 147. 9. i ch. 10. 29-31; cf. ch. 12. 12. j cf. ch. 5. 36. k cf. Song 2. 1, 2, 12.

ion, no unsteadiness therefore, or uncertainty. The eye is the lamp of the body; not the light, but what holds and fixes the light. The light comes from elsewhere: the organ of perception does not create the light, but receives it. The light for us is in the Word alone: it is this that judges and makes plain; but there must be spiritual reception and, for this, capacity of reception, which the Lord indicates here, as it is stated by the apostle (Eph. i 18, R. V.) to be in the heart and its condition. With the heart set on things above, the eye is single and clear: God is before it, and in His light we see light. Then the whole body becomes full of light:* the hands and feet have plenty of it for work and walk. On the contrary, if the eye be evil, the very light may blind one; and when the word of God becomes this, how great may the resulting darkness become.

[2] Separate interests distract thus and divide the heart. God and mammon—that is, the treasures of earth personified and viewed as an idol,—each claim the man in ways entirely incompatible with one another. Such service, if attempted, can only be a form on one side. One master will be despised, if not hated. "He who will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God;" he who cleaves to God will despise all the world can offer. Yet how many are seeking to unite things that cannot be united! the result being only a halting inconsistency of life in which the Christian side is necessarily that which suffers eclipse.

[3] But are there not, in going through the world, necessities which demand one's attention, from which one cannot escape, and which tend to such distraction as this, even when the heart would gladly be free? Yes, surely; but there is a remedy also, which is an effectual one,—a sanctuary-refuge which faith finds ever open: it is the apprehension of a Father's care, of which His creatures preach incessantly. The birds of heaven are fed, and we are of more value: the life, indeed, of too great value to make it a question of the food by which it is sustained; or the body, of what it may be clothed with.

[4] The human impotence that we feel has its own instruction. All one's anxiety cannot add a cubit to the stature; and how much there is in this way for which we are absolutely dependent on the will of another! why not, then, leave all things to Him to whom we have to leave so much, and who clothes the

* Not "luminous," as it has been strangely taken: for this is never the effect of the eye receiving light.

they toil not, nor do they spin; yet I say unto you, that even [l]Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. And if God so clothe the [m]grass of the field which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, will he not much more [clothe] you, O ye of [n]little faith?

5 (31-33): the good of being with God.

[5]Be not [o]careful, therefore, saying, What shall we eat? or what shall we drink? or what shall we put on? for all these things the [p]nations seek; for your heavenly Father [q]knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye [r]first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.

6 (34): the limit.

[6]Be not careful then as to the [s]morrow; for the morrow will be careful for itself: sufficient for the day is its own evil.

l cf. 2 Chr. 9. 1-28.
m cf. Ps. 103. 15, 16. cf. Is. 40. 6-8.
n ch. 8. 26.
o ver. 25.
p cf. ch. 5. 46, 47.
cf. 1 Cor. 3. 3. cf. Eph. 4. 17, 18. cf. 1 Thess. 4. 5. cf. 1 Pet. 4. 3.
q ver. 8.
r cf. 1 Ki. 3. 10-13. Mk. 10. 28-30. Lk. 12. 30, 31.
s Jas. 4. 13, 14.
cf. Acts 20. 22-24; cf. Acts 12. 6.

perishing lilies of the field with a glory greater than Solomon's? The weakness of a man's faith is the only really sorrowful weakness, after all.

5 And here, the Lord appeals to us, whether those who know God are to find His presence with them count for anything or not. The Gentiles, away from God, seek after these things as His people do; but we have a Father in heaven who knows our need. We have but to set the heart on His things, and let Him take the burden of ours. Seeking first His Kingdom and righteousness, all these things shall be added to us.

6 Finally, He gives us a limit for care, which by itself would very much exclude it. How much of the burden that we carry belongs really to the morrow,—a burden not yet legitimately ours: for who can really tell what shall be on the morrow? Each day will have its own sufficient evil—not too much, for a careful hand has apportioned it: but by borrowing trouble not yet come, we not only necessarily make the burden of the day too heavy, but we cannot reckon upon divine grace for that which is not come, and bear it thus so far without assistance. Nay, we have lost Him from our thoughts in all this calculation of the unknown future which is in His hands. How often has love in the most undreamed of way, disappointed all our fears!

In all this it is not taking thought for the morrow that is forbidden us, but taking care, (in the full sense of care). The word used has been claimed in these different senses by different interpreters; but it certainly is derived from one * which suggests "division," and so "distraction" of heart; and this is completely in accordance with the warning about singleness of eye and divided service. Moreover, James, where he is speaking explicitly of the boasting of those who say, "To-day or to-morrow we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain," corrects such a speech in this manner, that "ye ought to say, If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this or that" (ch. iv. 13, 15). He blames only the confident assurance of the speech, and not all "taking thought for the morrow." This, in fact, should be evident: the whole current of our lives would be changed by the contrary supposition, which those who make it have immediately and seriously to modify.

5. [1]The fifth section gives us lessons of divine government, the first of which is to remember that we are subjects under it, and not rulers,—so that we must keep off the judgment-seat. To put ourselves there is already a sign that personal feelings or interests are moving us; for if it were otherwise—if God were aright before us—should we forget that He Himself was Lord in His own Kingdom? If personal interests are moving us, then we are in the worst possible

* Μεριμνάω from μερίζω.

SECTION 5. (vii. 1-14.)
Lessons of divine government.

1 (1-5): accordant dealing.

1 Judge not, that ye [t]be not judged: for with what judgment ye judge ye shall be judged; and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you. But why lookest thou at the [u]mote in thy brother's eye, and observest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me cast out the mote out of thine eye; and behold, the beam is in thine [own] eye! Thou hypocrite, cast out [v]first the beam out of thine eye, and then thou shalt see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.

t Lk. 6. 37. Rom. 14. 4, 10, 13. 1 Cor. 4. 3-5. cf. 1 Cor. 5. 12. cf. 1 Cor. 14. 29.
u Lk. 6. 41, 42. cf. Rom. 2. 1, 21. cf. Gal. 6. 1. cf. 1 Cor. 10. 12.
v cf. ch. 5. 23, 24. cf. Jno. 8. 7. cf. 2 Chr. 28. 10.

condition to be judges, as is evident; for we are then judges in our own case: a thing that no law would permit, no sane mind tolerate.

But then we must understand what it is, this judgment which the Lord forbids. And here two things should be clear to us: first, that we are to judge of things,—of the evil and the good in either principles or acts presented to us. Here we have what touches ourselves: it is necessary that we should have our "senses exercised to discern both good and evil" (Heb. v. 14). It is true that we are to be "wise concerning that which is good and simple concerning evil" (Rom. xvi. 19); and this word "simple" (literally, pure, unmixed"*) is a warning as to the defiling nature of evil, which if realized will forbid unnecessary occupation with it, as the contrast with "wise" would lead us to understand. Yet we must know it so far as to know it to be evil, or we have no safeguard against it. Judgment, therefore, as to whatever lies in our path, is absolutely necessary for us; and the character of the world and the state of Christians both warn us to be watchful.

We are obliged then to judge of things as we meet them,—are responsible to the Lord, and in our own behalf, to do so; but more, we are obliged, and by the same authority, to judge persons also: "by their fruits ye shall know them,"—twice repeated here (vers. 16, 20)—is our direct warrant to do so: "do not ye judge them that are within?" asks the apostle (1 Cor. v. 12); we do and we must do it: it is, of course, not this, therefore, that the Lord is forbidding here.

The example that is given shows what is intended: to judge of things and of persons in the way of duty is to be obedient and to serve; to judge of what is not before us for judgment—to volunteer in it, or to pronounce as to motives and springs of action, to assume knowledge of that which is not open to us,—this is to take authority, not be subject to it, and indeed to assume what only belongs to the Judge of all, and is an intrusion, therefore, on His office.

This may be mere censoriousness; or passion, prejudice, self-interest may be at work with us: in any case, there is a beam in the eye, which effectually prevents a true and righteous judgment. The assumption is shown in the utterance, whether the mote in a brother's eye exists or not; and such a spirit awakes an adverse spirit: the harshness is paid back in harshness; the measure we mete to others is measured to ourselves. The language used shows that, while this is permitted in divine government, it is not the sentence of the divine Judge. In the parallel passage in Luke (vi. 38) this is plainly stated, "good measure, pressed down, shaken together, and running over shall men† give into your bosom."

---

*Ἀκέραιοι, which in Matt. x. 16 and Phil. ii. 15 is translated "harmless," and which Bengel gives as "sine cornu" (Gk. from ἀ (priv.) and κεραία,) "hornless." The general derivation, however, and which commends itself here, is from ἀ and κεράννυμι, to "mix," "unmixed."

† The word "men" is not actually expressed: it is "shall they give."

2 (6): division between holy and unclean.
3 (7–11): realized fulfilments.

[2] Give not that which is [w] holy unto dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn round and [x] rend you.

[3] Ask, and it shall be [y] given you; [z] seek, and ye shall find; [a] knock, and it shall be opened to you. For every one that asketh receiveth, and he that seeketh findeth, and to him that knocketh it shall be opened. Or [b] what man is there of you who, if his son ask bread, will give him a [c] stone? or if he ask for a fish, will give him a [d] serpent? If ye then, who are evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how [e] much more shall your Father who is in heaven give good things to those that ask him?

w cf. Prov. 23. 9. cf. Acts 13. 45, 46. cf. Phil. 3. 2. cf. Acts 8. 20–23.
x cf. Heb. 6. 7, 8. cf. 1 Thess. 2. 15, 16. cf. Acts 14. 1–5.
y Lk. 11. 9–13. ch. 21. 22. Lk. 18. 1, etc. Jno. 15. 7. cf. Jas. 4. 3 with Jas. 1. 5–8.

z Prov. 2. 4, 5; Prov. 8. 17; cfr. Is. 55. 6 with Prov. 1. 28. a cf. John 1. 38, 39; cfr. Lk. 13. 25. b cf. Is. 49. 15; cf. Heb. 12. 9, 10. c cf. ch. 4. 3, 4. d cf. 2 Cor. 2. 17. e Ps. 84. 11; Jas. 1. 17; cf. Luke 13. 15, 16.

You reap what you sow, and taste the quality of what you have been sowing; and this may be even mercy in result; for nothing is more likely to awaken in us the sense of what it is we have been doing, and of the omniscient Eye, that has been, unregarded, watching all. Thus God's mercy and His holiness are found together.

[2] The revolt from harsh judgment is apt to carry us into the opposite extreme of laxity, against which the Lord now proceeds to guard us. Dogs and swine are the very images which Peter uses in his epistle to represent those who manifest their still unrenewed nature after apparent conversion: the "dog" by "turning to his own vomit again, the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire" (2 Pet. ii. 22). Was he not thinking of the words of his Master here?

Christendom has in fact done shamelessly what the Lord here forbids, and has proved the truth of His words in consequence. Baptism and the Lord's Supper, perverted from their original meaning and application, have been used above all to give the grossest evils tolerance in the house of God, and to make Babylon the great "a cage of every unclean and hateful bird." They have thus been trampled under foot by the profane, and Christianity been rent and mangled fearfully, as all the centuries bear witness. The "judgment of charity" is continually invoked to take darkness to be light, and credit the most barren profession with what it dares not even claim for itself. But the false judgment of laxity has here its woe upon it, as much as the false judgment of censoriousness: upon that which puts good for evil, and that which puts evil for good alike. If grace is the spring of holiness, holiness is, by this very fact, the test of grace.

[3] And now the heart of God is declared as the ready and bounteous Giver, whose fullness cannot be exhausted, whose word to His people ever is, "Open thy mouth wide and I will fill it." There is no limit except the limit that little faith may put, or the guard on God's side (which is not limit) that the gift be good. And the Lord double clasps His exhortations with assurances that "every one that asketh receiveth, and he that seeketh findeth, and to him that knocketh it shall be opened." What a door is, in fact, opened for us here, and what possibility of blessing is here unfolded! How rich may we all be, if we only will be! and what free leave we have to covet the best things! And yet the apostle's words could find application in the fresh early days in which they were written: "Ye have not, because ye ask not; ye ask and have not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts!" (Jas. iv. 2, 3). Think of such an answer to the royal invitation here! what must man's heart be, that can answer so?

The appeal is backed with persuasive argument derived from affection subsisting even in earthly relationships. If we call God Father, do we expect to find [4] (12): the practical path.

[5] (13, 14): the way and end.

[4] All things, therefore, [f] whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, so do ye also unto them: for this is the [g] law and the prophets.

[5] Enter ye in through the [h] narrow gate: for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth unto destruc-

[f] Luke 6.31. ch. 5. 7. etc. ch. 18. 23-25. cf. Col. 3.12-14.

[g] ch. 5. 17. Lev. 19.18.

ch. 22. 39, 40. [h] Lk. 13. 24; cf. Jno. 10. 9 with Mk. 10. 23-27.

Him less than such a title implies, even among men? Is not this, in fact, however real, only a feeble suggestion of what God is as Father? It necessarily would be, even if men were unfallen; but "if ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more"—there, indeed, is a calculation for faith to make—"how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good gifts to them that ask Him?"

[4] The connection of the practical admonition following with this is surely of the same sort as that of what follows the prayer He has given to His disciples to one of the petitions in that prayer. If you realize this bounty of God, of which He has been speaking, you will practise bountifulness; the measure of your conduct to them will not be their actual conduct to you, but what you yourself would have desired it to be. Largeness of mind will be the result of living in the enjoyment of the King's bounty; and then, conversely, the practical conduct so inspired will react upon yourself, and help you to realize the conditions of successful prayer. A character thus formed will enable one to feel more the character of Him to whom we thus draw nigh. We understand Him as we are assimilated to Him; and faith strengthens itself thus by that which it has itself developed.

But, moreover, "this is the law and the prophets." The new dispensation falls into the same line, as has been already said, with all that has been before it. The same God has been all through aiming at the same results; and while with each step of progress the means used may vary, the end is continually kept in sight and steadily approaches. The righteousness which the law had in view grace has brought in, and yet law and grace are contrasts.

[5] This section closes with a solemn exhortation to "enter in through the strait gate," as the only way leading to life, and alas, found by few. The many would then (and still will) enter by another and wide gate, and throng a broad way, but a way leading to destruction and not to life. The words are figurative, of course, and the Lord does not further explain them here in any direct way. He leaves them as He does many other things, to awaken thought. There have, in fact, been very different thoughts about them: not, as to what they refer, in the mention of a gate and of a way, for the Lord speaks plainly of the way to life and the way to destruction; and these things are plain enough; but the gate, the way, are not themselves explained. We have but the description,—a "strait" gate and a "narrow" way, with few travelers, set in opposition to a "wide" gate, and a "broad" way, and many crowding them. We are left to ask what is this straitness, and what does it imply? Hard terms and difficult to comply with, with an uncertainty, on this account, of perseverance to the end? Surely not; although many have so taken it. The Lord once uses the first of these expressions in the Gospel of Luke, where He is answering one of those questions with which we so often perplex ourselves: "then said one unto Him, Lord, are there few that be saved?" which the Lord answers with a home-thrust at the questioner himself, "Strive to enter in at the strait gate," to which He adds also that "many would seek to enter in and would not be able" (Luke xiii. 24). But He bases this upon something else than the straitness of the gate: the difficulty, or rather, the impossibility of entrance is only found "when once the Master of the house is risen up and has shut to the door;" it was a shut gate that was to be dreaded, not a strait one. Thus the exhortation: be urgent to enter in while there is time.

Here in Matthew, there is no exhortation to strive, but simply to enter in tion, and [g]many there are that enter through it; because narrow is the gate and straitened is the way that leadeth unto life, and [i]few there are that find it.

[g] cf. Lk. 13. 23, 24. cf. 1 Jno. 5. 19.
[i] cf. 1 Cor. 1. 26. cf. Lk. 12. 32. ctr. Rev. 7. 9.

SECTION 6. (vii. 15–20.)
False prophets.

Beware of [k]false prophets, such as come to you in sheep's clothing, but within are ravening wolves. By [k] Deut. 13. 1–5. cf. Rev. 13. 11-17 with Rev. 19. 20; Jer. 5. 30, 31; Mi. 3. 5-7; Mk. 13. 22; cf. 1 Tim. 4. 1, etc.

there, and by no other gate. "Few there be that find it:" the mass go by a different road. It is not here the door being shut, but men mistaking which it is: the broad way of destruction being taken for God's narrow way of life.

This makes the picture of that broad way exceedingly solemn. Many have, no doubt, the thought of its representing the way of vice and open irreligion as opposed to the way of holiness; but closer consideration will convince us that it is not so. For no one expects, however careless he may be about it, the way of sin to lead heavenward. Whereas the Lord plainly intimates this to be what the writer of Proverbs speaks of—"a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death" (xiv. 12). The question is of finding the way of life. Hence the solemn warning to beware of false prophets which follows thereupon, men who would lead those listening to them upon the broad way of death.

"Few there be that find it." The great company of heavenward wayfarers, as they would consider themselves, are thronging another road, congratulating themselves upon the number and respectability of their companions. As they said in the days in which these words were uttered: "Have any of the rulers or the Pharisees believed on Him? but this people who know not the law, are cursed."

It is plain that the Lord affirmed Himself to be the door and the way. "I am the door of the sheep: by Me if any man enter in, he shall be saved" (John x. 9). Again, "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life" (John xiv. 6). Again, if they asked about the works that they should do, He answered: "This is the work of God, that ye believe on Him whom He hath sent" (vi. 29). Thus, if there are not two ways to life, (and He says there are not,) then the narrow way is Christ Himself. If the "gate" and the "door" are not different, it is still Christ who is represented by the gate. And then men miss the way of life, not because the terms are hard or He so unapproachable, but because men, glorifying themselves as good moralists, refuse the gracious Saviour of sinners, and seek out other ways. "They being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God; for Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth" (Rom. x. 3. 4).

The gate is "strait," because here is indeed an absolute condition: "no man cometh unto the Father but by Me." Self-righteousness must come down; Christ must be the absolute and complete Saviour, which He alone can be: too strict conditions for multitudes to submit to. The crowds do not yet "come to Him that they may have life" (John v. 40). Yet grace itself can make no other terms, and we shall find, as we pass on here but a little way, that these are in fact the terms which exclude many of those who even call Him Lord, but who have never known Him.

6. There follows now a warning about false prophets, which is in very plain connection with that about the different roads which men were taking to reach a common end. This is intensified by the fact that, wherever the true Voice speaks, there will come the false voice after it, its mocking echo; like Jannes and Jambres opposing by imitation, putting on the dress of the sheep, but as a lure, over the evil heart within. The fruit would manifest them, but we must remember that this is not necessarily immoral conduct, in which the sheep's their [t] fruits shall ye know them: do men gather clusters of grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles? So every [m] good tree bringeth forth good fruit, but the [n] worthless tree bringeth forth bad fruit. A good tree [o] cannot bear bad fruit, nor a worthless tree bring forth good fruit. Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is [p] cut down and cast into the fire. By their fruits, then, surely ye shall know them.

SECTION 7. (vii. 21–29).
The complete disciple.

1 (21–23): barrenness and true knowledge.

[1] Not every one who [q] saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven. [r] Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not [s] prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out [t] demons, and in thy name done many [u] works of power? and then will I avow unto them, I [v] never knew you: [w] depart from me, ye who work lawlessness.

2 (24–27): dependence, true and false.

[2] Every one, therefore, who heareth these words of mine and [x] doeth them, shall be likened unto a [y] prudent man, who built his house upon the [z] rock; and the [a] rain descended, and the streams came, and the winds blew, and fell upon that house; and it fell not, for it was founded upon the rock. And every one that heareth

5. [r] ch. 25. 12; Lk. 13. 25–30; cfr. Jno. 10. 14. [w] ch. 25. 41; cf. Rev. 20. 11, 14. [x] Lk. 6. 47–49; Jas. 1. 22–25; Jas. 2. 14–26; cf. ch. 23. 3, 4. [y] Prov. 22. 3; cf. Heb. 11. 7. [z] cf. Is. 28. 16, 17; cf. ch. 16. 18; cf. 1 Cor. 3. 11. [a] cf. Ps. 32. 6; cf. Gen. 7. 11–23; cf. Rom. 8. 1; cf. Jno. 5. 24; cf. 2 Thess. 1. 7, 8.

[t] ch. 12. 33, ver. 20. Lk. 6. 43, 44. cf. 1 Tim. 5. 24, 25. cf. Jas. 3. 11, 12.
[m] cf. 1 John 3. 7. cf. Gal. 5. 22, 23.
[n] cf. Gal. 5. 19–21.
[o] cf. Jno. 3. 6. cf. 1 Jno. 3. 9. cf. Phil. 1. 11.
[p] ch. 3. 10. Jno. 15. 2, 6. cf. ch. 25. 41–46.
[q] Lk. 6. 46. Is. 29. 13. Ezek. 33. 31. cf. 2 Tim. 3. 5. cf. Jude 4.
[r] cf. ch. 25. 11, 12. cf. ch. 22. 14.
[s] cf. Jno. 11. 50–52. cf. 1 Cor. 9. 27. cf. 1 Cor. 13. 2.
[t] cf. Lk. 10. 17–20.
[u] cf. Heb. 6.

clothing would no longer remain, but rather their doctrines tested by experience, as when men looking for grapes find nothing but at most the mockery of these.* Satan, when coming in as an angel of light, does not send out open evil-doers to commend his doctrines, while on the other hand an evil life may dishonor the preacher of substantial truth. But a true and needy soul, testing for itself the fruit of what is spoken, will assuredly find that the truth has its own witness to the heart and conscience, such as nothing but the truth can have. Here, above all, the Lord's words apply, that a good tree cannot bring forth bad fruit.

7. [1] We have now pressed what the complete disciple is in contrast with the mere barren professor, and the man who does not in fact build upon the rock. The time surely comes when the reality under all appearances will be made evident, and nothing will stand but what is real. Empty profession will not do: the saying, "Lord, Lord," is not necessarily subjection to Him. Prophesying, casting out demons, doing miracles, are no decisive proofs of true discipleship. For this there must be living acquaintance with Himself, that true knowledge without which, after all, the life will be lawless.

[2] The second illustration exhibits the true dependence of the soul on Him where He is known, in contrast with the false dependences which betray men to their ruin. In both cases we have pictured the builder of a house—the place of his affections and his rest, but above all, as it is viewed here, his shelter and refuge from the storm. Now for the stability of a house the foundation is the matter of first moment. If the foundation is not firm, no matter how solidly

* "'Ακανθαι, or ὄνειρα, is the general name for all kinds of thorns, of which the most common bears small black berries not unlike grapes, while the flower of the τρίβολοι may be compared with the fig." (Quoted in Lange's Commentary.) these words of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a [b]foolish man, who built his house upon the [c]sand. And the rain descended, and the streams came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house, and it fell, and [d]great was the fall of it.

3 (28, 29): manifestation to the heart.

[3] And it came to pass, when Jesus had ended these words, the multitudes were [e]astonished at his teaching: for he taught them as one having [f]authority, and not as their scribes.

b cf. Prov. 1. 22-32. cf. Lk. 12. 16-21.
c cf. Is. 64. 6. cf. Rom. 10. 3. cf. Rom. 3. 20.
d cf. Prov. 29. 1. cf. 2 Thess. 1. 9. cf. ch. 8. 12.
e ch. 13. 54. Mk. 1. 22; Lk. 4. 32. f cf. ch. 5. 22, 28, 32, 39, 44; Jno. 7. 46; cf. ch. 23. 1-33.

the house is built: it will go with the foundation. Christ and His words are here the rock that abides; all else, whatever be its nature, is but sand. He who puts His sayings livingly into practice shall build a house that will endure the storm. None else and nothing else will: while the fair weather lasts it is quite possible that this last may look better than the rock-set one, and the man who trusts it enjoy a passing triumph. Too soon! and when the storm shall come, too late to remedy it.

[3] No wonder that the multitudes were astonished; no wonder that they found this teaching different from the strange conceits, the externalism and traditionalism of the scribes. It was a Voice from another sphere than that of earth, and the strange authority that was in it suited it yet how well! Nothing else could have suited it: any other tone would have been the renunciation of His whole mission. This claim of authority demanded the miracles that accompanied it; and yet, on the other hand, rested itself not even upon these, but above all on the manifest holiness and love and truth which commanded mind, heart, conscience into His presence, compelling the whole man to reverence; where, at least, the man remained to recognize and answer such a claim.

Div. 3.

The Kingdom thus announced, and its principles declared, we have now in detail the signs that manifest the King. These are not, and could not be, mere works of power, but such as bear the stamp of divinity upon them, the evidence of whence this power is derived. Power alone might accredit what was evil—a thing most necessary to be remembered in the present day: "whose coming is according to the working of Satan, in all power and signs and lying wonders" (2 Thess. ii. 9), is said of Antichrist. But the power manifest now in Israel was displayed in goodness and holiness and truth, and in connection with that which appealed (as just now said) to the whole moral nature. The Lord refused the faith which was built but upon miracles (John ii. 23–25), and reproved the craving for them among the people with the words, "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe" (John iv. 48). Miracles were not with the Lord the foundation of anything, but what flowed naturally out of what He was, and from the intervention of God in behalf of a sin-ruined world. They testified to Christ in this way as the One whom nature owned and served, but who, therefore, was above it, and could not be debtor to it for His authentication. They were in place as they put Him in His place, and with all else served and worshiped Him.

The characters manifested in them were apart from this. They were His characters. They were impressed upon them as His acts,—were part of His living energy in its operation. And thus they had their inner significance,—as "signs:" they went with all else that He did to declare Him, and did so, acting in a sphere beyond what was merely human, where dull eyes saw better what was in all spheres the same. Faith was at all times in Christ Himself, the Son of the Father, wherever seen—"beheld His glory, the glory of the Only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth."

We are now to see Him in this manifestation of Himself, but to see, alas, that this manifestation did not of necessity bring men to His feet. On the contrary,

DIVISION 3. (Chap. viii.–xii.)

The Manifestation of the King; which manifests also the people's heart towards Him.

SUBDIVISION 1. (chap. viii.–ix. 26.)

Divine power in constant grace.

SECTION 1. (chap. viii. 1-17.)

His fore-known place.

1 (1-4): touching the leper, as present in Israel: the Son of God.

1 AND when he [g] had come down from the mountain, great multitudes followed him. And behold, a [h] leper came to [him] and worshiped him, saying, Lord, [i] if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. And he stretched forth his hand and [j] touched him, saying, I will: be thou cleansed. And [k] immediately his leprosy was cleansed.

g ch. 5. 1. ctr. Ex. 32. 15-29 with Rom. 8. 3. cf. Jno. 6. 38, 39.
h Mk. 1. 40-45. Lk. 5. 12-15. Lev. 13. 1-46. 2 Kl. 5. 1, etc. cf. Is. 1. 6. cf. Rom. 3. 10-19.
i cf. Mk. 9. 22, 23. ctr. Jno. 5. 6, 7. cf. 1 Tim. 2. 4.
j ch. 20. 34. cf. Lk. 15. 20.
ctr. Nu. 5. 2; ctr. Nu. 19. 11; cf. 2 Cor. 5. 21. k cf. Lk. 18. 14;

we are to find Him rejected by His people long taught to anticipate His coming as Messiah as the crown of all their blessings. The more He shows and proves His claim to be this, only the more decisively is He rejected; until grace can no more utter itself, and He turns in spirit from them to own relationship with those only who are doers of His Father's will. If the national refusal of Him is not yet complete, it is in sight; and the next division shows us anticipatively the Kingdom in its present Gentile form, and the New Testament "mysteries" begin to be unrolled to us.

SUBD. 1.

The signs themselves occupy the first subdivision; after which, as fully manifested, He sends His messengers through the cities of Israel to proclaim the Kingdom and do the works that confirm their mission; after which we find a remnant separated from the rest, who harden themselves in unbelief and impenitence.

Sec. 1.

In the first section, one of those dispensational pictures is presented to us such as we have already had in the second chapter. There it was impossible not to see in the Gentile magi coming up to worship a King of the Jews unknown in Jerusalem, the forecast of what was to come. In the present section after the leper has been healed, and sent in testimony to the priests, that they may themselves certify the divine power which is being displayed among them, the faith of a Gentile is declared by the Lord to be greater than any He has found in Israel. And thereupon He announces the coming in of the Gentiles into the Kingdom of God, while the sons of the Kingdom are cast out. Here we are left in no uncertainty, then, as to the larger meaning of what is before us. But the significance is not ended here: for in the healing of Peter's mother-in-law we find Him healing by touch again as in the leper, Himself present therefore, while in the case of the centurion's servant He heals at a distance, as in the present time. The touch assures us that here we have Him once more present as when He returns to Israel at a future time; while the healing of the sick of all kinds, with the reference to His human sympathy in the quotation from Isaiah, leads us out into a wider scene beyond. We seem to have Him thus in four different characters: as Son of God in the case of the leper; as Son of Abraham, in that of the centurion; as Israel's Messiah; and as Son of man. He fills in all this His predicted place.

[1] The cure of leprosy seems to have been unknown in Israel. It was a condition that only God could reach. On this account it was the fitting type of the incurable nature of sin, and a fitting case with which to begin the Lord's manifestation of Himself to Israel. We have seen that He could not take the Kingdom, except as the Son of God; and this was the character in which He was

2 (5-13): healing by His word as absent, where there is faith: the Son of Abraham.

And Jesus saith unto him, See thou [t]tell no one; but go, show thyself to the [m]priest, and offer the [n]gift that Moses commanded, for a testimony unto them.

2 And [o]when he had entered into Capernaum, there came unto him a centurion beseeching him and saying, Lord, my servant lieth at home [p]paralytic, grievously tormented. He saith unto him, I will [q]come and heal him. But the centurion answered and said, Lord, I am not [r]fit that thou shouldest enter under my roof; but [s]speak a word only, and my servant shall be healed. For I also am a man under [t]authority, having soldiers under me, and I say to this one, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it. And when Jesus heard it, he

cf. Lk. 24. 28. r etr. Lk. 7. 4, 5; cf. Lk. 5. 8. s cf. 2 Ki. 5. 9; cf. 2 Ki. 20. 4, 5; Ps. 147. 15; Ps. 107. 20. t cf. Mk. 1. 27; cf. Lk. 9. 1.

t cf. ch. 9. 30 with Jno. 4. 48. ctr. Mk. 5. 19, 20.
m Lev. 14. 1-3. cf. Lk. 17. 14. cf. Rom. 8. 33, 34.
n Lev. 14. 4-32. Deut. 24. 8. cf. Rom. 3. 21 with ch. 5. 17.
o Lk. 7. 1-10.
p Lk. 5. 18. cf. Rom. 5. 6. cf. Rom. 8. 3. cf. Is. 40. 29.
q ctr. Jno. 4. 47-54.

first of all rejected by the leaders of the people. Here He cures by a touch, which would have defiled another, and sends the healed man to the priest that he may certify the cure. But there is no response from this quarter, to which He appeals, as it were, alone, bidding the man tell it to no other. The clamor of a crowd would not have helped such an appeal, which would better be heard in the conscience as a case quietly submitted for their decision. But there is no response: Israel is dumb until her demon is cast out, and then only will she be a true witness to her glorious King.

2 But here it is that the Gentile comes in, with a faith not found in Israel; and if the contrast with the case of the leper is plain, it is the more striking that in fact they occurred at different times* and are brought together for an evident purpose. Moreover Luke, whose Gospel is the only one that has this story besides Matthew, while giving details omitted by the latter, omits on his part the assurance to the believing Gentile of sitting down in the Kingdom of heaven, and the warning to the Jew of sons of the Kingdom being cast out, which the Jewish Gospel records. Humbling all this was to the pride of those to whom it was addressed; and because humbling, most needful, — the proud must be abased. On the other hand with the centurion there is the most thorough humility. He is not fit for Christ to come under his roof, but in this already we see the faith that animates him. As self is behind the back, the vision becomes unclouded, and thus he realizes in Him One whom all things serve. Yet Himself is come to serve, and to serve such as have no worthiness— no fitness but in their need. Let Him speak the word then: every thing will do His bidding. He, the soldier, a man under authority, has yet his subordinates, the agents of his will, and knows how promptly his commands are executed. So, with a word, his servant shall be healed.

The experience of the Lord's delight has in it yet what gives rise to much grave question. Why should there be faith outside of Israel greater than any that could be found in Israel? Israel had every advantage in this respect that could have been given her. Do privileges neglected and misused tend to blight even the true faith that exists in the midst of an easy profession? When we speak approvingly of a "child-like" faith, do we not seem to mean that the faith of a man does not fulfil the promise of the child? that hardly it can be expected it should do so? If so, this surely cannot argue that a longer acquaintance with Christ will be unfavorable to development, or that there is inherent a

*This can be seen by a comparison of the connections in the other gospels, where notes of time are given. The healing of the centurion's servant occurred after the sermon on the mount (see Luke vii. 1,) but that of the leper earlier, so that its introduction here is parenthetical. Mark evidently gives in general the historical order, while Matthew and Luke arrange and adapt for their purposes.

"marveled, and said to them that followed, Verily I say unto you, I have not found so great [v]faith, no, not in Israel. And I say unto you, that [w]many shall come from the east and the west, and shall sit down * with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven; but the [x]sons of the kingdom shall be cast out into the outer [y]darkness: there shall be the weeping and the gnashing of teeth. And Jesus said unto the centurion, [z]Go thy way: as thou hast believed, be it to thee. And his servant was healed in [a]that hour.

3 (14, 15): touching again as returned to Israel: Messiah.

[3] And [b]when Jesus had come into Peter's house, he saw his wife's mother lying sick of a [c]fever. And he [d]touched her hand, and the fever left her, and she rose up, and [e]ministered to him.

* Literally "recline," as at table in the East.

u ctr. Mark 6. 6. cf. Rom. 4. 20.
v cf. Jno. 20. 29. cf. Heb. 11. 1. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 8, 9. cf. ch. 15. 28.
w Lk. 13. 28-30. cf. Lk. 14. 21, 24. cf. Is. 60. 3.
x ch. 21. 43. cf. Acts 13. 40, 41, 46–48. cf. Rom. 9. 6.
y ch. 13. 42, 50. ch. 22. 13. ch. 25. 30, 41, 46.

Jude 13. z Mk. 10. 52. a Jno. 4. 52, 53; cf. Jno. 5. 24. b Mk. 1. 29–31; Lk. 4. 38, 39. c Jno. 4. 52; Acts 28. 8; cf. Deut. 28. 22; cf. Rom. 6. 23. d ver. 3. e Lk. 8. 2, 3; cf. Rom. 6. 22; cf. Acts 16. 14, 15.

principle of decay in faith that affects this: and if not, what else can it be that does so but the breath of the outside air, the world-atmosphere that is unfavorable to such an exotic as faith is? Yet "this is the victory that overcometh the world, even your faith!"

Without meaning to excuse it in this way, it cannot surely be doubted that the atmosphere of what may be truly called a "Christian world" is more detrimental to development than that of a heathen world would be; and that because a Christian world stands as the very ideal of compromise, and compromise has in it as a first element disloyalty to Christ and to His word. Here you are faced, not with what is openly nor even intentionally hostile to Christ,—what would put you on your guard, and rouse up in you all your power of resistance; no, you find in it truth owned, but not taken very seriously; you are to follow it, but not be too extreme about it. And how naturally we grow up just to the stature, morally or spiritually as even mentally, of the company we keep! how we read Scripture itself with such a traditional interpretation put upon it as is in this way acquired, until we lose capacity for taking it simply and straightforwardly, as it would necessarily appear to the faith of a child, or of one outside the current rendering.

Who can doubt that the large and miscellaneous Christendom about us also, like the Pharisaic, Sadducean, Herodian Judaism of our Lord's time, is the greatest hindrance to true faith; and that the gospel is rendered so powerless as it is to-day, by the dead weight upon it of barren profession and the truth unfollowed and unfelt? The witnesses for Christ are just those who may be most terribly against Him, and who, however little they may mean it, can never be merely negative or neutral in their testimony.

I think we can scarcely help such an application of our Lord's words as to the simple faith of the Gentile centurion in the midst of formal, ritualistic hollow-hearted Judaism. But how great a thing to give refreshment to the heart of Christ as this man did! And by it His soul looks out anticipatively to those gathering multitudes who from opposite quarters should come to sit down at the glad feast of welcome with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the Kingdom of heaven:—then, when "sons of the Kingdom," the claimants now of title to that for which they had no heart, would be cast into the outer darkness, whence God the Light would be withdrawn, into the awful unavailing weeping and gnashing of teeth.

Here the Seed of Abraham is very clearly revealed.

[3] The third miracle here, as may be seen by the account of it in both Mark

4 (16, 17): healing all the sick: the Son of man.

16 And when the *e*evening was come, they brought unto him many possessed by *g*demons; and he cast out the spirits with a word, and healed all that were sick: so that it might be *h*fulfilled which was spoken through Esaias the prophet, saying, Himself *i*took our infirmities and bare our diseases.

e Mk. 1. 32-34. Lk. 4. 40, 41.
g Mk. 5. 1, 2, etc. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 4.
h cf. ch. 1. 22, etc. Is. 53. 4.
i 1 Pet. 2. 24. 2 Cor. 5. 21.

SECTION 2. (Chap. viii. 18-ix. 8.)
The various deliverances.

1 (viii. 18-27): Absolute Master; 1 (18-22): claiming absolute obedience,

1. 18 Now, *j*when Jesus saw great multitudes about him, he commanded to depart unto the other side. And one, a scribe, came and said unto him, Teacher, I will j cf. Lk. 14. 25, 26.

and Luke, is again out of the order of time, and in fact took place before the cleansing of the leper. It must, therefore, be inserted in this place for a purpose, and we have already glanced at its significance in this respect. The Lord in this case once more heals by touch,—is Himself, therefore, personally present where He heals. Natural relationship also is owned, as we see in "Peter's wife's mother," and even in its being in the house, the place of relationship. No doubt, such references will be thought by some too minute and trivial to find meaning in them; but the mistake is in supposing anything in Scripture to have that character. We shall find elsewhere just such things with similar meaning and in important connections (xiii. 1, 36). By and by the Lord will thus come back (the fullness of the Gentiles having been brought in) into the sphere of His old relationships, to bring in healing for Israel of a deeper kind. The fever of the old life will then be subdued by His presence: He will say to the tumult of human passion, "Peace," and it shall be still; and Israel will arise in the strength of a new devotedness, to minister unto Him. That the scene here is a picture of this must be judged by its fitness to represent it and by the connection with all that goes before and follows. So judged, it seems to answer well to such a thought.

4 For Israel's restoration will, it is certain, bring souls from every part, tormented with Satan's tyranny to Him who has been her Deliverer; and the casting out of Satan will bring in the blessing of those millennial times, while the sympathizing pity of which Isaiah speaks, and which marks Him as true Son of man, will remove the results of sin of whatever character. The principle here will not allow of blessing limited to Israel, as in fact the Lord never did so limit it; and thus the widest, fullest out-flow may be indicated here.

This sketch, then, as a sort of title of all that follows, may well show us the Lord filling all His predicted place: Son of God, Seed of Abraham, Israel's Messiah, Son of man. Mere picture it is not, but a display of personal characters that are found in Him, and this comes naturally in the first place, as the foundation of all else. The characters of the deliverance He brings come next, and in place as suited, and then, briefly, what is exceptional in Matthew, but needed for the full display of what He is, the presence of God is shown to be open to man, and His grace welcomes freely, the restrictions of the law set aside: the new wine is to be put into new bottles.

Sec. 2.

The various features of the deliverance are now, then, briefly but sufficiently shown to us. We begin with what is more external, and end with what is deepest and most personal, the heart of the whole matter. Circumstances are in His hands; the power of the enemy is prostrate before Him; sins are remitted, and the helpless and impotent one rises up in strength: such is the power and such the grace of our Redeemer. And yet, beyond this there is blessing for which all this is but the necessary preparation. To be with God: that is the complete and innermost joy of all; without which all else would be but vanity, and the soul's hunger wholly unappeased.

1. We begin with the first lesson first. Creation is in His hand: He has

[k] follow thee whithersoever thou mayest go. And Jesus saith unto him, Foxes have holes, and the birds of heaven roosting-places; but the Son of man hath not where to [l] lay his head. And another of the disciples said unto him, Lord, suffer me first to go and [m] bury my father. But Jesus saith unto him, Follow me, and leave the [n] dead to bury their own dead.

k Lk. 9. 57, 58. cf. Jno. 13. 37, 38. l cf. Lk. 2. 7. cf. Lk. 9. 58. m Lk. 9. 59, 60. cf. Gen. 11. 31, 32 with Acts 7. 4. cf. ch. 10. 37. n cf. Eph. 2. 1, made it and He is Lord of it; full of disorder as it may appear and is, the rod of power has not slipped out of His hand: faith's triumph is in owning Him amid what is real disorder, compelling even this to work out His purposes. So in the beginning of such a record of faith as we have in the catalogue of witnesses in the epistle to the Hebrews, the first thing of all is this, that "by faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God." Thus the scene of all our trials is in its whole framework and constitution His before whom faith walks. Whatever may be for the moment in the front, behind it rise the everlasting hills founded by divine strength, and bearing testimony to immutable faithfulness. The frost has riven them; the torrents have swept their shattered fragments into the valleys below; they seem to be the prey of every destructive agency which has license to work its will upon their passive forms. Yet the Hand that made them at first is still unseen raising them and sustaining them, while their very dust, spread out over the lower lands, is maintaining these also, and renewing their surface by its ministry. Death and destruction are in the hands of the God of resurrection; amid all the waste is nothing wasted; death ministers to life, and life springs out of it.

And here is the Master of all, in meekest surrender to circumstances in a path where all seems against Him, yet maintaining His absolute title untouched, as He must, or all were given up. Where would we be, if He resigned His authority?

As to circumstances, the foxes in their holes and the birds of heaven are better provided; and this He urges to test the zeal of a too ready disciple. On the other hand, if one would put even a father's claim before His own, He in the plainest manner refuses this. From Luke we learn that the Lord had called this man to follow Him, but there seemed no duty which could take precedence of burying a dead father. The man who is called is not fully ready; the one not called is more than ready. We may be sure that the state of enthusiasm in the one case was genuine enough; and he was one of a class not given to it in regard to Christ. The enthusiasm was all well, but there was in it a dangerous self-confidence, like that which we find in Simon Peter afterwards, and which we know betrayed him into a terrible fall. It was not that sincerity or love was wanting in him, but the consciousness of his own weakness: and this is why so much of early promise is apt to fail, and backwardness succeed, it may be, to confident energy. When Christ's call is heard distinctly in the soul, then it is as dangerous to be reckoning up difficulties, as in mere enthusiasm to lose sight of them. It is for Him who calls us to the path to reckon with the difficulties, and faith for the path also is found as we travel it. Assuredly, if we have not faith for the Lord's path, we shall not find it for any other.

In the second case, therefore, the Lord insists upon promptitude of devotedness. "Let the dead bury their dead" is distinct exhortation to lay aside every thing that would, under the idea of duty itself, delay compliance with what He has called to. Even Abraham suffered his father to lead in obedience to a word addressed to himself; and so we read that "Terah took Abraham his son, . . . and went forth with them . . . to go into the land of Canaan." What came of it? "And they came unto Haran, and dwelt there." While Terah was alive, they never got to the place for which they had set out: "Terah died in Haran."

In the case before us it was only a dead father needing to be buried; and here

2 (23-27): and able to ensure as absolute security of those embarked with Him

[2] And when he had entered into a ship, his disciples followed him. And behold, there arose a great [o]tempest in the sea, so that the ship was covered with the waves; but he was [p]asleep. And they came to him and awoke him, saying, Lord, [q]save: we perish. And he saith unto them, Why are ye fearful, O ye of [r]little faith? Then he arose, and [s]rebuked the winds and the sea, and there was a great [t]calm. But the men marveled, saying, [u]What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey him?

2 (viii. 28–ix. 1): Deliverance from the enemy.

2. And [v]when he had come to the other side, into the country of the Gadarenes, there met him two [w]possessed by demons, coming out of the tombs, exceeding dangerous, so that no one could pass that way. And, behold, they cried out, saying, [x]What have we to do with thee, thou Son of God? Art thou come hither to [y]torment us before the time? Now there was, a good way off from them, a herd of many swine feeding. And the o Mk. 4. 37-41. Lk. 8. 22-25.

p cf. Is. 26. 3.
q cf. ch. 14. 30, 31. Ps. 107. 28.
r cf. ch. 17. 20. cf. Mk. 16. 17, 18.
s Lk. 4. 39, 41. cf. Ps. 65. 7.
t cf. Ps. 89. 9. Ps. 107. 29.
u cf. Mk. 1. 27. cf. Lk. 5. 26.
v Mk. 5. 1-20. Lk. 8. 26-40.
w ch. 17. 14-18. cf. Eph. 2. 2. x cf. Acts 1. 25. cfr. Lk. 5. 8. cf. Acts 24. 25.
y cf. ch. 25. 41 with Rev. 19. 20.

the living disciple, the messenger of life, was not to be detained in the region of death, from the delivery of his gracious message. Let the dead attend to death, is the Lord's word; and, although the two deaths spoken of here are not the same, yet there is simple and evident connection between them.

If the Lord maintain His authority as Master, it is soon made manifest that Master He is, and able to ensure the safety of those that are with Him. On the stormy sea, He is asleep until, roused by their unbelieving appeal to Him,—and how much unbelief is expressed in our prayers!—He hushes with a word the winds and the sea. The application of this is familiar to us all, and made by every one: a pregnant example of how naturally these histories speak to us all of spiritual realities in the way of exhortation and comfort,—how truly they are meant to do so.

And the unbelief of disciples, how constantly has it been repeated since, and how often does the Lord shame us by coming in for us as here. How much is it all in contrast with that faith of the centurion, which we have so lately seen winning the Lord's wonderment, as here their unbelief does. This restless sea of Galilee, so often lashed with storms, is indeed a vivid picture of the world of our pilgrimage, much vexed, soon traversed; and we find it more than once again in this way, and human feet taught to walk in peace upon it, not without His help who Himself walked there and still walks, for faith, in the like fashion.

2. They come to the other side of the sea, only to find there the enemy's power rampant. Two possessed by demons, coming out of the tombs, stop the way against all comers. Matthew does not go into detail here, as Mark and Luke do. His object is just to show the power of the Lord as manifested in these various deliverances, and details have not for him the same importance. The ghastly horror of the dwelling of these living men in the abodes of death, and their insane fury before which men quailed, are given to put in contrast the absolute surrender of their prey by those who held them captive, when the Lord appears. Men, blinded of Satan, may dispute His right, not they. Striking it is that they give Him at once the title, which men deny Him, of Son of God, and recognize Him as their future Judge. But they plead that the day of judgment has not come, and can He be come to torment them before the time?

The story of the swine that follows seems as if it were designed to make manifest the reality of these demoniac possessions, than which nothing can be plainer, indeed, in the whole account of them. The demons, speaking with the demons besought him, saying, If thou cast us out, send us away into the [z]herd of swine. And he said unto them, Go. And when they had come out, they went into the swine; and, behold, the whole herd [a]rushed down the steep into the sea, and died in the waters. And they that fed them [b]fled, and went away into the city, and told every thing, and what had befallen those possessed by demons. And, behold, the whole city came out to meet Jesus; and, when they saw him, they besought [him] to [c]depart out of their coasts. And he entered into a ship, and passed over, and came unto his [d]own city.

3 (Ix. 2-8): "Arise and walk."

3. And, behold, they [e]brought to him a paralytic, laid upon a bed. And, when Jesus saw their [f]faith, he said unto the paralytic, Son,* be of good courage, thy sins are forgiven. And, behold, certain of the [g]scribes said within themselves, This man blasphemeth. And Jesus, knowing their thoughts, said, Why do ye think evil in your hearts? For which is easier, to [h]say, Thy sins are forgiven, or to say, Rise up and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of man hath [i]authority upon earth to forgive sins (then saith he unto the paralytic),

*Literally, "Child," τέκνον.

z cf. Lk. 15. 15, 16 with ch. 7. 6.

a cf. 1 Jno. 5. 19 with Phil. 3. 19.

b etr. Lk. 8. 35. cf. Jno. 6. 67-69.

c ver. 29. etr. Acts 16. 9. cf. Lk. 4. 29.

d ch. 4. 13. ch. 11. 23.

e Mk. 2. 1-12. Lk. 5. 17-26.

f ver. 28. ch. 8. 10.

g vers. 11, 34. ch. 12. 2.

h ch. 8. 8. Mk. 1. 27. cf. Rom. 10. 8-13.

i cf. ch. 21. 23-27. cf. Acts 4. 7-12.

voice of the possessed, recognize the Lord (always, as already said, with intelligence as to His Person), address and are addressed by Him, their testimony to Him being necessarily refused. They ask permission to go into the herd of swine, ("all the demons," according to Mark, taking part in this) and are granted it; and thereupon the whole herd of swine (about 2,000 in number) rush down the steep bank into the sea, and perish in the waters.

Matthew, again, gives us no after-picture of these delivered men. He is occupied with the deliverance itself, the manifestation of the glorious King, and along with this but with the shadow that creeps after it, His rejection, as already showing itself, at the hands of an unbelieving and impenitent people. They are more afraid of the Deliverer than of the awful power from which He would have delivered them, and imitate, in effect, the prayer of the demons themselves, in begging Him to depart out of their coasts. The Lord accepts His rejection and returns across the lake to His own city.

3. The jarring elements have owned Him; the power of the enemy has been broken before Him; the strong man's captives are delivered: we are next to see what is the stronghold of the enemy yield, and man's condition met in its innermost reality; the burden of guilt is lifted from the soul, and the paralysis which sin induces removed in consequence. We are surely to take in widest, fullest application what is given us here, just as we do instinctively, and not the less surely, the hushing of the storm upon the lake. All through these divine narratives, that which is manifested to the senses is but a parable of spiritual realities. The external facts are, none the less as that, a veil of the unseen, a manifestation in flesh of the divine. The miracles are not wonders merely but signs,—through and through significant.

The miracle that follows here is again taken out of the order of time, but all the more should it be manifest, with such purpose as we have already seen. Morally and spiritually it is here perfectly in its place; and again we find features that are dwelt upon in the other gospels omitted in order to bring into prominence the central fact. They bring to the Lord a paralytic, lying upon a bed; and He, seeing their faith, goes beyond the apparent need, and down to [j] Arise and take up thy bed, and go unto thy house. And he arose and departed to his house. And, when the multitudes saw [it,] they [k] feared, and glorified God, who had given such authority to men.

j Jno. 5. 8, 9. cf. 1 Thess. 1. 9. cf. Acts 14. 8–10.
k cf. Acts 2. 43. cf. Acts 5. 11.

SECTION 3. (Chap. ix. 9-26.)

Opening the presence of God to men.

1 (9-13): The call of grace.

1. And, as Jesus [l] passed on from thence, he saw a man named Matthew, sitting at the tax-office; and he saith unto him, [m] Follow me. And he rose up and followed l Mk. 2. 13–17. Lk. 5. 27–32.

m ch. 4. 18–22.

that in which all the distress that is in the world has its root: "He said unto the paralytic, Son, be of good courage, thy sins are forgiven thee."

He who spoke knew perfectly the state of soul to which He was addressing Himself, and the weight of his sins, which might hinder even bodily healing, was certainly pressing upon him. But the miracle of healing which was to follow was thus also to be a witness to that which in itself the senses could not realize or confirm. The sufferer was to have the assurance of this; but also the most unsympathetic and unbelieving there were to find openly the seal of divine power put upon His claim to forgive sins. As Son of man He claims it: but that was itself a Messianic title, and (as we have seen) implied in itself One higher than man; even while it assured them of the tender truth of that humanity. But why the need of assuring any one that He who was in their midst as man really was that? It was in fact the sweetest assurance, as it could only have arisen out of the most absolute conviction of His highest glory.

Even the accusation of Him in their thoughts, by the proof given of His knowledge of them, is made to turn to their conviction; and if none could forgive sins but God alone—and they were surely right in that—what, then, was He who could thus so completely prove His authority to do this?

How sweet and wonderful the assurance of sins forgiven, His word certifying it after this manner! Not that it was new that God met men in His grace upon the simple confession of their sins to Him. The psalmist had found it so, and published his experience for the help of others (Ps. xxxii.), and in this way David had described, as the apostle says, "the blessedness of the man to whom God imputeth righteousness without works" (Rom. iv. 6). This had been thickly overlaid with ritualistic practices and rabbinical prescriptions, and could scarcely have been understood by any with the simplicity which it appears to us to have. But who could have undertaken to apply this grace on God's part definitely to the individual, to pronounce him forgiven in this authoritative manner? Thus we see that all this is part of the manifestation of the Deliverer. It is not the doctrine of forgiveness that is declared, nor would this have aroused opposition in the form we find it here, but that the Son of man had authority to forgive sins.

The order of blessing is, however, pregnant with meaning. First, "thy sins be forgiven thee," and then "arise and walk." The load of unforgiven sin is too great for any one to lift and yet find power to walk in a way acceptable to God. Pardon assured from Him, the soul arises with the strength found in this new joy in Him. All is changed for it. The path is a path with Him, not to find Him. It is a path given of Him who is now known. Thus the limbs just now paralyzed with guilt and fear receive, as in a moment, life and energy. The impracticable legal principle, "do and live," has given way to the evangelical one, "live and do." Here is a change of order how significant: "arise and walk" speaks first of the wondrous gift bestowed; then, as the flush and vigor of health are felt, the "walk" becomes but prolonged ecstasy. Salvation in its fullness is not found till this is attained.

Sec. 3.

That which follows here is in extension of such thoughts as these, and fully assures us that we are to find this spiritual meaning in what has been

him. And it came to pass, as he "sat* [at meat] in the house, that, behold, many tax-gatherers and sinners came and sat down with Jesus and his disciples. And, when the °Pharisees saw it, they said unto his disciples, ᵖWhy eateth your teacher with tax-gatherers and sinners? But, when he heard it, he said, They that are ᵠwhole have no need of the physician, but they that are sick. But go ye and learn what that meaneth, I will have ʳmercy, and not sacrifice: for I came not to ˢcall righteous persons but sinners.

* Gk., "reclined."

n Lk. 14.12-14. Lk. 15. 1,2.
o ver. 3. Lk. 7. 39.
p ch. 11. 19. cf. ver. 14.
q cf. Jno. 9. 39–41. cf. Lk. 18.9-14.
r Hos. 6. 6. Mi. 6. 6–8. ch. 12. 7. cf. 1 Sa. 15. 22.
s Lk. 19. 10. Rom. 5. 8; 1 Tim. 1. 15.

before us. For now the Lord openly declares His grace and justifies it, telling men too that it cannot be used to patch up the legal system, nor will the spirit of it be confined within the Mosaic ordinances. Come for the need of men He the Representative (as He has proved Himself) of God on earth, freely receives sinners, and makes faith welcome to draw upon Him at all times. Thus the presence of God is opened to men. They may refuse, but they are not refused. While, though at present only to be told in parables for the wise, the truth of Israel's—and indeed man's—condition is that he is dead, and needing life, and Christ's mission needs must be, therefore, to raise the dead. This completes His manifestation, therefore; while the mystery in which it ends shows how little faith there is anywhere to receive it, and prepares us for the full rejection of Him by the mass, which is soon to appear.

1. The call of the taxgatherer* follows immediately the cure of the paralytic; and this in the order of time, as the words show. The challenge of His authority and the grace He is showing, only makes the assertion of it more imperative, as it would have made it weakness to give way. All was in question now; and now, therefore, He will make as plain as possible what is in His heart. "Tax-gatherers and sinners" are with them in natural association, and that association He never disclaims. But who are not sinners? If He refuse men on that ground He must refuse all; Matthew the tax-gatherer, called into the circle of His immediate followers, is to be the witness to all men of His grace for all.

The feast at which we find Him directly afterwards, took place in fact after His return from Gadara, as we see in Mark and Luke. The account of the healing of the paralytic and of Matthew's call are historically parenthetical. The special purpose is maintained all through.

We learn from Luke that Matthew made Him this feast. He knew well what would be that to Him, and showed it by the company he gathered. These persons had, at least, the consciousness of what they were, and grace could not offend them. At the very entrance upon fellowship with God we find it in learning to be with Him as to what we are, and the light of the first day of new creation breaks upon a barren, restless and shoreless sea. The weariness and distress and remorse of sin are witnesses for God which cannot be bribed, though they may not be listened to; while self-righteousness is lulled to sleep by its own monotone, and dreams of peace where there is no peace.

Yet the light troubles these sleepers and angers them; and so we find in the questioning of the Pharisees now. They could not be indifferent to what might seem so little to concern them as where One in whom, at any rate, they did not

* "Publican," borrowed from the the Latin, is not the proper rendering. This was the name of those who paid into the "public" treasury the fixed sum for which they farmed the taxes of special provinces. Under these, who generally lived at Rome, were overseers of districts, and under these again the actual collectors, who being in close relationship to the people, themselves in general grossly extortionate, and a sign of subjection to the hated Roman government, were of all men, it would seem, most bitterly hated by the people; and especially, as Edersheim observes, the custom-house official, such as Matthew was. His being a Jew, as many were, would naturally be the climax of his wickedness in the eyes of the people.

2 (14-17): the annulling of law.

2. Then come to him the disciples of John, saying, [t]Why do we and the Pharisees fast oft, but thy disciples fast not? And Jesus said unto them, Can the sons of the bride-chamber mourn, as long as the [u]bridegroom is with them? But there will come days when the bridegroom shall be [v]taken from them, and then shall they fast. No one putteth a [w]patch of unfulled cloth upon an [x]old garment: for that which filleth it up taketh from the garment, and a [y]worse rent is made.

t Mk. 2. 18-22. Lk. 5. 33-39. cf. Joel 1. 14. u Jno. 3. 29. cf. Jno. 17. 12. v cf. Jno. 16. 6, 20, 22. w cf. Lk. 15. 22. cf. Gal. 2. 16-21. x cf. Is. 64. 6. cf. Phil. 3. 4-8; cf. Heb. 8. 13. y cf. Gal. 3. 3, 15-17, 25-29; cf. Gal. 4. 9-11, 21-31; cf. Gal. 5. 2-4; cf. Gal. 6. 12-15.

believe, could find His company. They might have remembered, but chose rather to forget, that the Baptist also, than whom there could be no sterner preacher of righteousness, had found response to his message in just such a class (ch. xxi. 32). But the Lord answers. (what indeed they had not ventured to address to Him), that He was a physician; did not, of course, come after them, who were well enough, but to the sick ones; and that they had never learnt, what they needed much to know, that God had said in the Scriptures which they acknowledged, that He would have mercy, rather than sacrifice. It was little mercy indeed that rabbinism showed to these tax-gatherers, as, indeed, "sick" enough, as a class, they were, and needing the physician. But here was One who was the perfect expression of divine mercy, not merely receiving, but actively going out after the objects of it; One who came not to call the righteous but sinners. If so, the chief of sinners would have chief title. But divine love, and the wondrous power of it, are strange to the heart of the legalist at any time; and then Christ must be strange.

2. It is not only the Pharisee who has question as to the Lord's ways. The disciples of John find Him at variance with their master. But there is a notable difference between them: the disciples of John come straight to the Lord with their question, instead of assailing His followers with it: they do not find fault, but inquire. Moreover they may ask, why His disciples fast not: they could not put such a question as to the Lord Himself. Still what they needed was to know better the glory of Him whom they were addressing, as they needed also to realize the essentially secondary character of what had all its value from its being an expression simply of the spirit of the man who used it. To make it an iron or universal rule would be to degrade it really,—to make it a form from which the life has departed.

Christ had come to His own: and what would be the spirit of those who realized this? The Bridegroom had come to the bride, and should the children of the bride-chamber—the invited guests—clothe themselves with the array of mourners? That would be impossible to one who knew Him aright; but there would be time enough for fasting, when the Bridegroom would be taken from them; this, of course, implying His rejection: in those days fasting would be perfectly in place.

But the Lord goes beyond this to speak of the change of dispensation that was now at hand, and for which they must be prepared: a change which would be still more complete and radical; not a mere patch upon an old garment. The garment of legal righteousness was in fact wearing out, and man being exhibited as the prophet had declared him, "all his righteousnesses but as filthy rags" (Isa. lxiv. 6). What good in patching up what was so utterly gone? Between the new evangelical righteousness and the old legal one there can be only the strife of contradictory principles. There can be no fusion here: with all such attempts the rent is only made worse.

Nor only this: the spirit of the gospel, the free, expansive power of Christianity, cannot be put into the old skins of ceremonial Judaism. Here both the wine will be lost, and the skins will perish. And this has been proved experi-

Nor do they put [z]new wine into old [wine-] skins, else the skins [a]burst, and the wine is poured out, and the skins perish; but they put new wine into [b]fresh skins, and both are preserved together.

3 (18–26): faith realized and the dead raised.

3. While he spake these things unto them, behold, there came a [c]certain ruler and worshiped him, saying, My daughter hath by this time [d]died; but come and lay thy hand upon her, and she shall live. And Jesus arose and followed him, and [so did] his disciples. And, behold, a woman who had had an [e]issue of blood twelve years, came behind and [f]touched the border of his garment: for she said within herself, If I can touch but z cf. Jno. 2. 3, 9, 10. cf. Acts 2. 13-18. cf. Acts 13. 52. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 8.

a cf. ch. 13. 5, 6, 20, 21. cf. Heb. 6. 4-6, 9.
b cf. Jno. 3. 5-8. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 17.
c Mk. 5. 22-43. Lk. 8. 41-56.
d Lk. 7. 11-15; Jno. 11. 4-15; cf. Eph. 2. 1.
e Lev. 15. 19-27; cf. ch. 15. 19, 20.
f cf. ch. 8. 3; cf. Rom. 4. 5.

mentally: the thing has happened; ritualism of every kind is just such an experiment, with the result that we have neither Judaism nor Christianity left. The living organism can only clothe itself with the tissues woven by the life itself.

3. This is already parable, and a parabolic story follows it. We have a picture of things which could not as yet be spoken out: two incidents connected together, which, different as they are, throw light upon one another, and are found, in dispensational and moral application, to continue and complete the lessons which the Lord has been enforcing. The perfect fitness of the whole here, internally, and to the place in which it stands, vouches for the reality of the meaning which we attribute to it.

The truth has been coming more and more into recognition, that Israel, whom the Lord came to heal, is in fact but a corpse, like the ruler's daughter. We have not the name of this ruler in Matthew; but in the two other Gospels which narrate the miracle, we find that his name was Jairus or Jair (Judg. x. 3, see notes), the "enlightener,"* a name quite suited to those "fathers" of that generation of Israel which had, alas, become a nation of the dead, fathers through whom the enlightening Word has come down to us.

If such then be Israel's condition, we see why the principle of law must be given up, as just now declared. Law is not for the dead, but for the living; for the dead it is useless. But "if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily, righteousness should have been by the law" (Gal. iii. 21). These are the two things—life and righteousness—which we find in the Lord's words just now, and in the narrative here, connected together.

If the principle of law, then, be given up, and grace be shown by the mere goodness of God, the apostle's question becomes an unanswerable one: "Is He the God of the Jews only? is He not also of the Gentiles?" (Rom. iii. 29, 30,)—will such goodness confine itself within the limits of a feeble and scattered people, or much rather go out to meet the universal need?

So it is, then, that while the Lord is on His way to fulfil a special declared purpose, faith in the woman with the issue claims Him, and finds answer to its claim. Again we have not in Matthew the same detail as in either Mark or Luke, and for the same reason as was noticed before, that it is with the signs which manifest Him that Matthew is occupied. Her disease, an issue of blood, is given, which was not merely a slow sapping of the life away, but, according to the law, defiling also by contact (Lev. xv. 25–27): so that here again (as with the leper) there is uncleanness, the typical reminder of the effect of sin.

But in this case it is not the Lord who touches, it is faith that touches, not Him, but rather His garment. It is the activity of faith that is here seen, of his garment, I shall be healed. But Jesus turned and saw her, and said, Daughter, be of good [g]courage: thy faith hath healed thee. And the woman was healed from that hour. And when Jesus came to the ruler's house, and saw the flute-players and the crowd making a [h]noise, he said, Give place; for the maid is not dead, but [i]sleepeth. And they derided him. But when the crowd had been put forth, he went in and [j]took her hand, and the maid arose. And the [k]fame of it went out into all that land.

* This is one of the reasons assigned for a mythical interpretation of the history by Strauss and others, the symbolic meaning of the name; but they might for the same reason make all Scripture mythical; while all that shows inspiration shuts out myth.

[g] ver. 2. Mk. 10. 49. Lk. 7. 50. Lk. 17. 19.

[h] cf. 2 Chro. 35. 25. cf. Jno. 11. 33.

[i] Jno. 11. 11-14. cf. 1 Thess. 4. 13, 14.

[j] ch. 8. 3, 15. cf. Rom. 6. 10 with Eph. 2. 5, 6.

[k] ch. 4. 24.

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chap. ix. 27–x.)

The King's Messengers.

SECTION 1. (chap. ix. 27-34.)

The King indeed.

[l] (ix. 27-31); light given.

[1] AND as Jesus passed on from thence, two [l]blind men followed him, crying out and saying, [m]Son of David, have mercy on us. And when he had come into the course, and that lays hold, not of Himself personally, but of His robe—His character as displayed in His life down here. None the less certainly is virtue found in Him; and He pauses on His way to ratify her title to the healing and impute it to her faith. In principle it is the grace to the Gentiles during the present delay of Israel's blessing.

[l] ch. 20. 30-34. cf. 2 Pet. 1. 9.

[m] cf. ch. 15. 22. Lk. 18. 38, 39.

But He reaches the house at last, and finds the mourners busy, who mock at the quiet words which speak of the power of resurrection in His hands. But the unbelieving crowd being put forth, the maid arises: and so, in spite of her desperate condition and the unbelief that mocks at Him, will Israel, when He appears and at His word to her, arise. It is a figure we have often in the prophets, of the revival of the nation in the last days. (Isa. xxvi. 19; Ezek. xxxvii; Dan. xii. 2; Hos. vi. 2.)

Under this dispensational application we may without difficulty discover an individual one, in which the intertwining of the two miracles, if not presenting so clear a meaning, is yet significant. In Jairus' daughter we have man's state in its full reality discovered. The Lord is here the Life-giver: the dead hears the voice of the Son of God and lives. This is the divine side of salvation, and here man is passive and recipient merely. But there is another side, and the woman with the issue seems clearly to represent this. Her faith applies to the Saviour for its need, and the issue of blood is staunched. These are the two sides of a common history, to adjust which fully may transcend our power: and yet each has its place. It is Mark, however, especially, who brings out this individual view, as Matthew the dispensational; but the double application, with the place in which we find these in the different Gospels, confirms the whole.

The signs which manifest the King are here complete. We see how truly He is no merely human King, but One "marked out Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of holiness, by resurrection of the dead" (Rom. i. 4, Gk.) And such the fore-ordained King of Israel was to be. He is now, therefore, ready to be proclaimed as this over the land; and accordingly we find provision made for this proclamation now by the commission given to the twelve apostles.

SUBD. 2. Sec. 1.

[1] In all that we have hitherto had before us, the Lord has not once yet been owned as Son of David; nor, since the day of the magi, as the King. The question is first as to His higher title. The Father's voice is the first to own Him as the Son of God; and this is surely in due order. Afterwards, and as taught of Him, the Baptist does so (John i. 33, 34); but it is not Matthew who records house, the blind men came unto him. And Jesus saith unto them, [n]Believe ye that I am able to do this? They say unto him, Yea, Lord. Then [o]touched he their eyes, saying, According to your faith be it unto you. And their eyes were opened; and Jesus straitly [p]charged them, saying, Take heed, let no one know it. But they, when they were departed, spread abroad his fame in all that land.

2 (32-34): and speech, with deliverance from the enemy: yet rejected.

[2] And as they were going out, behold, they brought a [q]dumb man to him, [r]possessed by a demon. And, when the [s]demon was cast out, the dumb spake. And n Mk. 9. 23, 24. cf. Heb. 11. 6.

o ch. 8. 3. Mk. 8. 22-26. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 21.
p ch. 8. 4. Mk. 7. 24. Mk. 1. 45. q ch. 12. 22, 23. Lk. 11. 14. Is. 32. 4. Is. 35. 6. cf. Rom. 10. 9, 10. r cf. Lk. 13. 16. s cf. Mk. 9. 25-27; cf. Acts 26. 18.

this, nor have we heard it yet in Matthew upon the lips of men. The devils own it and tremble. Men call Him Master (i.e. Teacher) and Lord: and this He accepts, taking naturally and as of full right the highest place. Of Himself He ordinarily speaks as Son of man, a title which prophecy had given Him indeed, but with some indistinctness, and which claimed more than might at first sight appear: for why should one who was simply and only that, assume what is universal among men, as if it were unique in Him? The grace and tenderness of the title are what strike us most.

With all this, we have not heard Him here as yet openly claim to be the Christ or King. He seems to wait for human lips to pronounce this, and indeed pointedly asks the disciples the question at a later time, who do they say that He, the Son of man is? And when Peter answers, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," He refers this acknowledgment of Him to the Father's revelation of Him (ch. xvi. 16). In none of the synoptics does such a confession come before this; but in John, Andrew owns Him at the beginning to be Messias (John i. 41), and to the woman of Samaria (iv. 25, 26) He openly declares Himself. Still, upon the whole, we may say, He waits for faith to acknowledge Him, and always, in connection with the Kingdom, His divine Sonship is the first question. The manifestation of Himself in this way is now complete, and now we have the testimony, humble enough though it be, to the King of Israel.

Two* blind men appeal to Him on His way from the ruler's house, as Son of David: a testimony confirmed by Him with the miracle by which they receive their sight, when once it is seen that it is faith that speaks in it. Blindness indeed was upon Israel, for which there could be no remedy until in the sense of it they should cry to Him. Here, as with the leper, He heals by touch, and forbids them to make it known; an injunction which could not have been, as at a later time, because of His rejection by the people, for as yet the decisive rejection had not come—He was Himself going to send out a testimony far and wide among them. One would say that it must have been because the testimony to the Son of David was peculiarly liable to abuse among a carnal people who could be attracted by miracles and the display of power, while their hearts were far away from God. For this reason the acknowledgment of the Son of God must come before that of the Son of David. The latter title indeed He Himself never uses, though He could not but own it, where as here true faith expressed itself in it.

[2] Linked directly with this miracle we have another. A dumb demoniac is brought to Him, and when the demon is cast out, the dumb speaks. Here again surely, we have Israel's miserable enslavement to the prince of this world, which they showed in their rejection of the true King. The dumb will speak,

*This "two" of testimony to Him is comparatively common in Matthew: as in the case of the two demoniacs previously, where Mark and Luke have only one; and the two other blind men at Jericho, still in the other Gospels only one.

the multitudes marveled, saying, It was never so seen in Israel. But the Pharisees said, He [f]casteth out demons by the prince of the demons.

SECTION 2. (chap. ix. 35–x.)

His Messengers.

1 (ix. 35–x. 15): the authority given.

[1] And Jesus [g]went about all the cities and the villages, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the [h]gospel of the kingdom, and healing all sickness and all infirmity. And, seeing the multitudes, he was moved with [i]compassion about them, because they were harassed and [k]cast away, as [l]sheep that have no shepherd. Then saith he to his disciples: The [m]harvest indeed is great, but the [n]laborers are few: beseech, therefore, the Lord of the harvest, that [o]he would thrust forth laborers into his harvest.

And when he had called to him his [p]twelve disciples, he gave them [q]authority over unclean spirits to cast them out, and to [r]heal all disease and all infirmity.

f ch. 12. 24, etc. Mk. 3. 22, etc. Lk. 11. 15, etc.

g ch. 4. 23. Mk. 6. 6. Lk. 13. 22. Acts 10.38.

h ch. 4. 17. ch. 13. 19. ch. 24. 14.

i ch. 14. 14. Mk. 6. 34.

k ch. 10. 6. Ezek. 34. 1–6. Zech. 10. 2.

l Nu. 27.17. 1 Ki. 22.17. ch. 2. 6. Ps. 80. 1. Ezek.34.12–19. Jno. 10.12–14.

m Lk. 10. 2. Jno. 4. 35–38. a cf. Jno. 6. 9; cf. Acts 1. 15; cf. 2 Tim .4. 9–11, 16. b 2 Thess. 3. 1; cf. 1 Tim. 1. 12; cf. 2 Cor. 3. 5, 6. c Mk. 3. 13–19; Lk.6.12–16. d Mk. 6. 7–12; Lk. 9. 1–6. e ver. 8; cf. ch. 17. 16, 19–21.

only when the demon is cast out, and then it will be indeed to the praise of their Deliverer. But now the miracle is only provocative of blasphemy from the Pharisees, which they repeat more boldly at an after-time, and which then brings out the Lord's warning words as to blasphemy against the Spirit. It was a sign of hearts that were hardening themselves against all that divine love could do.

But it was yet to be seen whether Israel as a whole were going with such leaders. The pity of the Lord is only roused by it now to more importunate appeal to the people to whom He had come,—His people and the sheep of His pasture,—to listen to His voice.

Sec. 2.

The Lord refuses, then, the leaders of the people as representing the people themselves. They are mere misleaders, shepherds not feeding the flock, but injuring and rending them. As He goes up and down Galilee, constantly bearing testimony of the Kingdom at hand, and doing every where the mighty deeds which were the demonstration of the power of God already among them to bring it in, His heart is moved with the misery of their condition. Yet the sheltering wings of divine mercy were manifestly ready to be folded over them. It depended but upon themselves whether they would welcome the love that was seeking them. The abundant miracles, appealing as they did to the very senses of men, by the relief of need in every form and however desperate, could not but appeal to every legitimate self-interest on man's part. And, however it might be with the nation at large, He is assured of the harvest that will reward labor in these beckoning fields. But the laborers, where are they? He bids His disciples, therefore, supplicate the Lord of the harvest that He would thrust forth laborers into His harvest—not merely "send" but impel them to go out; and then He turns these praying ones into laborers themselves. He gives them authority to do the works that He is doing—power over the whole power of the enemy and every outward consequence of sin, and sends them out to testify thus by word and work of the Kingdom drawing nigh.

The messengers thus sent out are themselves significant. We are familiar with their manifest deficiencies from a mere human point of view, deficiencies which made them only the more dependent upon that divine power which worked in them and through them. The apostle of the Gentiles afterwards, himself a man of very different up-bringing from these Galilean fishermen, and

Now the [f] names of the twelve apostles are these: first, [g] Simon, who is called Peter, and [h] Andrew his brother; [i] James, the [son] of Zebedee, and [j] John his brother; [k] Philip and [l] Bartholomew; [m] Thomas and [n] Matthew the taxgatherer; [o] James, the [son] of Alphæus and [p] Thaddæus;* [q] Simon the Cananæan and [r] Judas Iscariot, who also delivered him up.

These twelve Jesus [s] sent away when he had charged them, saying, Go not away to any way of the [t] nations,

* Or, "Lebbæus, who was surnamed Thaddæus."

[f] Acts 1. 13. Mk. 3. 13-19. Lk. 6. 12-16. [g] Jno. 1. 41, 42. ch. 16. 16-19. ch. 26. 69-75. Jno. 21. 15-19. 1 Pet. 1. 1. [h] Jno. 1. 40. ch. 4. 18. Mk. 13. 3. [i] ch. 4. 21. Mk. 10. 35-42; Acts 12. 2. [j] Lk. 9. 49-56; Jno. 13. 23; Jno. 21. 24; 2 Jno. 1. [k] Jno. 1. 43, 44, 46; Jno. 6. 5-7; Jno. 12. 21; Jno. 14. 8, 9. [l] cf. Jno. 1. 45-51; cf. Jno. 21. 2. [m] Jno. 11. 16; Jno. 14. 5-7; Jno. 20. 24-29; Jno. 21. 2. [n] ch. 9. 9; Lk. 5. 27-32. [o] Mk. 15. 40; ch. 13. 55; Acts 12. 17. [p] cf. Jno. 14. 22; cf. Jude 1; Lk. 6. 16. [q] Lk. 6. 15. [r] Jno. 6. 70, 71; Jno. 12. 4-6; Jno. 13. 2, 26-29; Lk. 22. 47, 48; Acts 1. 16-20, 25. [s] cf. ch. 28; 16-20; etc. 1 Cor. 15. 8-10. [t] cf. Acts 1. 8.

just when addressing himself to the vain and luxurious inhabitants of a wealthy pagan city, expressly stripped himself of any natural advantages that he might have, and "came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom, declaring unto them the testimony of God." And this was expressly that his "speech and his preaching might not be with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power" (1 Cor. ii. 1, 4). It is certain that these rude instruments, as we should call them, yet moulded and energized by the Spirit of God, did a work such as has never since been done. Doubtless there was a fitness so given to them, transcending all the power of the schools to accomplish since. It is remarkable, with but an exception or two, how little we know of this or of them. In the Gospels themselves we much more often have them held up as warnings to us, than for our imitation. In the Acts, where most we should expect to find them, only one or two—fewer than in the Gospels—are at all prominent. And even these soon pass from our sight, and scarcely even a fragment of tradition of them remains. The "Acts" are, as has been well said, rather the acts of the Spirit of God, sovereignly using any that He will, than the "Acts of the Apostles," as they have come without warrant to be called; though Paul the apostle—not any of the twelve—is the principal figure in the latter half of the book. It is to the Spirit of God, evidently, that we are commended, and to practise the same utter dependence upon Him as they did.

No doubt, what we have of these earliest workmen should reveal to us much more than we have ever found in it. Even their names and their number should be significant. The Lord Himself connects them with the twelve tribes of Israel, over whom they are to rule in the day of the earth's "regeneration" (ch. xix. 28). And on the foundations of the heavenly city their names are also found (Rev. xxi. 14). Twelve is indeed the number of manifest divine rule, as we have often seen, and these twelve names should have lessons for us in such connection. Their ministry is specially connected with the Kingdom, as Paul's is eminently with the Church (Col. i. 25*), and thus, probably, it is that their names are on the foundations of the city of God, which is the centre of divine government in that scene to which the book of Revelation carries us forward.

But we have here only a preparatory testimony addressed to Israel, and the names are in pairs, six pairs, as they were sent out by the Lord, two and two, not disregarding apparently in this the natural or spiritual ties which link men together. Simon and Andrew are brothers, and Simon had been led by his brother to Jesus: here there were both links. The sons of Zebedee come next. Then Philip and Bartholomew, the latter supposed to be that Nathanael, whom Philip had brought to the Lord. Beyond this we are not able to go in realizing such connection, and as to the names and persons had better leave what can be said of them to develop naturally from the history.

* Where read "minister"—not "a minister"—"to complete the word of God."

and into any city of the [u]Samaritans enter ye not; but go rather to the [v]lost sheep of the house of Israel. And as ye go, preach, saying, The [w]kingdom of heaven is at hand. [x]Heal the infirm, raise the dead, cleanse the lepers, cast out demons: [y]freely ye have received, freely give. Provide neither [z]gold nor silver nor brass for your girdles, nor wallet for the way, nor two coats, nor shoes, nor staff: for the [a]laborer is worthy of his sustenance. But into whatever city or village ye enter, inquire who in it is [b]worthy, and there abide until ye go forth. And when ye enter into a house, salute it; and if the house be worthy, let your [c]peace come upon it; but if it be not worthy, let your peace return to you. And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hearken to your words, as ye depart out of that house or city, [d]shake off the dust of your feet. Verily, I say unto you, It shall be more [e]tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrha in the day of judgment, than for that city.

2(x. 16-23): a witness in the face of enemies.

[2] Behold, I send you forth, as [f]sheep in the midst of wolves; be ye therefore prudent as [g]serpents, and guileless as [h]doves. But [i]beware of men: for they will de-u cf. Jno. 4. 9, etc. Acts 8. 5.

v ch. 9. 36. cf. Gal. 2. 7-9. etc. 1 Cor. 1. 24-29.
w ch. 3. 2. ch. 4. 17.
x ver. 1. cf. 2 Cor. 12. 12.
y cf. 1 Pet. 4. 10.
z Lk. 10. 4. cf. Lk. 22. 35-38. cf. Acts 3. 6. cf. 3 Jno. 7, 8.
a Lk. 10. 7. cf. 1 Cor. 9. 4-15. cf. 1 Tim. 5. 18.
b cf. Acts 16. 15.
c Lk. 10. 5-8.
d Lk. 10. 10-12. cf. Acts 13. 51.
e ch. 11. 22.
f Lk. 10. 3.
g cf. 2 Cor. 12. 16; cf. Col. 4. 5. h cf. Phil. 2. 14-16; cf. 1 Pet. 3. 13, 14. i cf. 2 Tim. 4. 14, 15. etc. ch. 7. 15.

Here they are upon a special mission to the "lost sheep"—already that—"of the house of Israel," and are strictly forbidden to go whether to Gentiles or Samaritans. It is not at all an evangelization after the Christian pattern, and the directions given to them are only in part applicable to the present time. They were to proclaim the Kingdom as at hand, accompanying the proclamation with what the apostle calls, because of their connection with this, the "powers of the age" (not "world") "to come" (Heb. vi. 5). Sickness and death would yield to them; leprosy, (which had to do also with defilement before God,) and the power of the enemy: blessings to be scattered far and wide, as manifesting the grace which they themselves also had received. They were to take no supply, whether of money or clothing, as not going out into a heathen world but among those professedly owning God, with whose message they came, and as under the guardianship of the King their Master,—having a right, therefore, to expect the sustenance due to His laborers. Referring to this afterwards, and appealing to their own experience of how this expectation had been fulfilled to them, He distinctly recalls this commandment, in view of their going out into the world after His rejection (Luke xxii. 35, 36); and the laborers of an after-time are distinctly commended by the apostle, "because that for His Name's sake they went forth, taking nothing of the Gentiles" (3 John 7). But now the King's messengers were not to go as strangers: in every city or village those worthy were to be sought out, and with these they were to abide till they went forth from the city. The "peace" with which they greeted a house, made good, if it were worthy, with substantial blessing, would more than recompense all that they might receive. If it were not worthy, then the blessing would be as if it were not uttered. Finally, against house or city that would not receive them, they were to shake off the dust of their feet, as not willing to carry with them the least particle of that which belonged to those in hostility to their Lord. It would be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrha in the day of judgment than for that city.

[2] Invitation and warning thus went hand in hand; but the Lord does not hide from the disciples the fact that the nation, nay, the world, would reject Him, and therefore them. He puts this indeed fully before them, to prepare them for it and encourage them in view of it: He was sending them forth as liver you up to [j]councils,* and scourge you in their synagogues; and ye shall be brought before [k]princes and kings on my account, for a witness to them and to the nations. But when they deliver you up, be not [l]careful how or what ye shall speak: for it shall be given you in that hour what ye shall speak: for it is not ye that are the speakers, but the [m]Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you. But [n]brother shall deliver up brother to death, and father, child; and children shall rise up against parents and put them to death; and ye shall be [o]hated of all on account of my name; but he that [p]endureth to the end, he shall be saved. But [q]when they persecute you in one† city, flee to another: for, verily I say unto you, ye shall not have [r]completed the cities of Israel till the Son of man be come.

j Mk. 13. 9. cf. Jno. 16. 2.
cf. Acts 4. 5-7.
cf. Acts 5. 17-40.
k cf. Acts 12. 1.
cf. 2 Tim. 4. 16.
l Mk. 13. 11-13. Lk. 12. 11, 12. Lk. 21. 14-19. cf. Ex. 4. 10-12.
m cf. 1 Cor. 2. 1-5.
n cf. Jno. 7. 5. cf. vers. 35, 36.
o cf. Jno. 16. 1-4.
p ch. 24. 13.
q cf. Acts 14. 6.
r cf. ch. 24. 4-30.

* "Sanhedrim." † this.

sheep in the midst of wolves,—a hopeless thing to natural expectation; they were therefore to be as prudent—or wary—as serpents, but pure as doves,—without the serpent's deceit. Men would deliver them up to councils, or sanhedrim, spiritual courts connected with the synagogues themselves. But beyond this they would bring them before governors and kings, the secular Gentile powers, as we see in the Lord's case, necessarily under a different charge, and with a malice which He would turn to a testimony in the highest places and to the Gentiles at large, whom grace was content to seek even in such a manner. Paul's case illustrates all this fully at a later day.

But they need not be careful as to their defence at such times. They would not be left to mere unaided wisdom. As the cause of Christ the Spirit of their Father would take it up and give them words fitted. Yet the hatred of them would be so intense as to break through all natural ties, and change the strongest affections into bitterest enmity. Brother would rise against brother, father against child, children against parents: they must endure, and at the end would come deliverance. Fleeing from one city to another, they would not have gone over the cities of Israel till the Son of man was come.

These last words make it plain that the mission of the twelve, while a mission to Israel only, and necessarily broken off by the judgment upon Jerusalem and the dispersion of the people, if not before, yet is not in the Lord's mind at an end even now. It will be taken up again under similar circumstances, but in the face of bitterer persecution, and continued until the actual coming of the Son of man from heaven and the consequent deliverance of His own at a time yet future. No doubt the Lord's words could not as yet be understood by those to whom He spoke; and they have been a cause of great perplexity to commentators, and variously interpreted by them in consequence. Had they not mostly confounded this testimony to Israel alone with the general publication of the gospel since, they would have had their perplexity increased. The occurrence of the same exhortation and encouragement with the distinct and detailed prophecy of the coming of the Son of man, in the twenty-fourth chapter, assures us as to the meaning here. Again there we are told that "he that endureth to the end shall be saved," the special troubles of the last days are put before us, and the Lord's coming at the end "with all His holy angels with Him." But even as to the meaning of this, many have gone quite astray; while the lack of understanding of the parenthetical nature of the present Christian time has necessarily confounded things which should have been kept far apart. In the Old Testament prophecy the present time of grace to the Gentiles never appears; and to this character the words of the Lord here conform. The new dispensa-s(x. 24-33): but before God.

[3] The [s]disciple is not above the teacher, nor the servant above his lord. It is sufficient for the disciple that he should become as his teacher, and the servant as his lord. If they have called the [t]Master of the house Beelzebul, how much more those of his household? Fear them [u]not, therefore; for there is [v]nothing covered which shall not be revealed, nor hid which shall not be known. What I say to you in the darkness, [w]speak in the light; and what ye hear in the ear, preach upon the house-tops. And be not afraid of those that [x]kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but fear ye rather [y]him who is able to destroy both soul and body s Lk. 6. 40. Jno. 13. 16.

t cf. Jno. 8. 48 with Acts 2. 13.
u cf. Acts 4. 13, 19, 20.
v Mk. 4. 22. Lk. 12. 2,3. cf. 1 Cor. 4. 5.
w cf. Acts 5. 20. cf. Col. 1. 23.
x cf. Is. 8. 12, 13. cf. Dan. 3. 16-18.
y cf. 2 Cor. 5. 11.

tion was not yet in view, and could not be while yet the testimony to Israel was going on. But this is, on this very account, not yet the place to consider what will necessarily be before us a little further on. (See chap. xiii. 35.)

[3] The Lord urges now upon His disciples their necessary identification with Himself, so that they can expect no better treatment than He Himself received. If they had called the Master of the house Beelzebul,* how much more those of his household. Beelzebul means the "lord of the dwelling,"—the Satanic "master of the house," who made the demon-possessed his habitation. They called Him this who was the lawful Master, the One stronger than the strong, who set the poor captives free (xii. 29). What, then, would they call the men of His household? But then from such raving there was nothing to fear. All would one day be unveiled and brought to light; and in that confidence they might proclaim upon the house-tops whatever they had heard of Him in greatest privacy.

It was true that in their enmity to it men might kill the body: this was their limit; by doing so they would only deprive themselves of further power. The soul would survive beyond their reach. God could destroy both body and soul in hell,† and He who has this power is the One only to be feared. We cannot but remember, in view of the Lord's words here, that there was a Judas already among this little band of witnesses for Christ,—a man whose surname was "Iscariot,"‡ and who "from the beginning" was known by Him to be the

* So all the editors. Most commentators take it as a contemptuous alteration of Baalzebub, "lord of flies," the Philistine god of Ekron. Edersheim says that zebul means, in Rabbinic language, only the Temple, and suggests that zibbul may be referred to, which means "sacrificing to idols." Others take zebul as "dung;" but this is zebel. I give what seems most satisfactory, following Lange (Commentary on Matthew).

† Man has spirit as well as soul, but the Lord speaks of soul here, doubtless, because it is in closest connection with the body,—which is therefore called the "psychical" (not "natural) body" (1 Cor. xv. 44),—of which it is the "life." Psyche, like nephesh in the Old Testament, is thus used for "life" and "soul." Of "spirit" there is not in Scripture a possible question: of soul there might be; but the Lord affirms here its survival also. The common thought of body and soul being the whole man has clouded the truth of immortality, as if it had to be proved from a solitary text or so, as here: and also from its making man only what the beast is, in which there is also a "living soul" (Gen. i. 30). Spirit is what is distinctive of man (1 Cor. ii. 11).

Again, when the Lord speaks of body and soul in hell, He does not speak of "killing" any more, but of "destroying,"—a word used as to "ruin" of any kind. (See, for a full discussion, my "Facts and Theories as to a Future State.")

‡ The surname "Iscariot" has had many interpretations: commentators in general having pretty well settled down now into the belief that it means "Ish Kerioth," or the "man of Kerioth." If so, he was the one Judean among the disciples, who otherwise were of Galilee; and some see much significance in this. But is it not much more probable that it is from the same root with, and akin to Issachar, "there is reward," or "hire," too near identity being naturally avoided with one of the fathers of Israel? There seems to have been a form of the word, shacar, from which is derived the word eshcar (Ezek. xxvii. 15) of similar meaning. Iscariot might mean even thus the "trafficker," more closely connected with his crime than "hireling" would be. Notice how we are reminded of this surname (which may have been given him afterwards) at the very time when he puts himself into Satan's hands for the betrayal of the Lord (Luke xxii. 3).

in hell. Are not two [z]sparrows sold for a penny? and not one of them shall fall on the ground without your Father; but of you even the [a]hairs of the head are all numbered. [b]Fear not, therefore: ye are of more account than many sparrows. Every one, therefore, who shall [c]confess me before men, him will I also confess before my Father who is in heaven; but whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also [d]deny before my Father who is in heaven.

[e] (x. 34-38): the test of discipleship.

[e] Think not that I came to send* [e]peace upon the earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I came to set a man at [f]variance with his father, and the daughter with her mother, and the daughter-in-law with her mother-in-law. And a man's foes shall be they of his household. He who loveth father or mother more [z] Lk. 12. 4-7.

[a] Lk. 21. 18. cf. Acts 27. 34.

[b] ver. 26. cf. Heb. 13. 5, 6.

[c] Lk. 12. 8. Ps. 119. 46. cf. Rev. 3. 8.

[d] Lk. 12. 9. 2 Tim. 2. 12. cf. ch. 7. 23.

[e] Lk. 12. 49–53.

[f] Mi. 7. 6. cf. Jno. 9. 18–23.

* Βάλλειν is to put on over a thing, as clothes, armor, or to put [into the mind]; but rather the former here with ἐπί,—"put peace upon the earth," "clothe the earth with peace;" "send" is too much as if the sword were His intention, whereas it is the result of the world being away from God.

traitor (John vi. 64). Solemn words of our Lord in the presence of such an one; and surely for his ears.

But He goes on to encourage them with the blessed thought of being in relation to such an one as Father, without whom not one of those sparrows which men sold two for a penny,* could fall to the ground, and whose tender care had numbered every hair of His children's heads. They were of more account, then, than many sparrows.

But they must confess Christ before men: whoso confessed Him before men He also would confess before His Father in heaven; and whoso denied Him, He also would deny before His Father—He could not now say their Father—in heaven. Grace never sets aside the holiness of God, but conforms us to its conditions; while divine holiness does not set aside the grace, which always receives the penitent: and the chief of the apostles furnishes us with the illustration of this.

[e] The test of true discipleship is found then in the preference of Christ to all things whatsoever else. The Prince of peace had come into the world, and yet the effect of His presence would not be to produce peace as between man and man, but on the contrary to bring out all the opposition of the heart to Him. For this they must be prepared. Variance would be introduced into families,—an effect with which the truth has been invariably reproached. Professing disciples would have to take their choice, therefore, between Himself and all else, were it father, mother, son or daughter; the inmates of a man's house would be his foes. No one would be fit to be a disciple of His who did not accept this, and take up his cross to follow Him. Here for the first time He intimates the death before Him,—the shame which He has turned to glory: a dread word now for those whom He is sending out as heralds of His Kingdom, but with all the intimation of sorrow and rejection. Humbling Himself to all that the enmity of man can do, His language is that of serenest, fullest consciousness of a title far more than royal—a divine title. With the world thus against Him, He putting forth no power to subdue it, nor even to shelter His people from the vindictive hatred which He predicts, He claims from all that will be His disciples the most perfect devotedness that could be shown by man. He is to be dearer than the dearest, nearer than those bound by the closest of ties. And under than me is not [g] worthy of me; and he who loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me; and he who doth not take up his [h] cross and follow after me is not worthy of me.

* An assarion, really equal to a cent, or a halfpenny sterling.

5 (x. 39-42) a recompense.

5 He that [i] findeth his life shall lose it, and he who hath lost his life for my sake shall find it. He that [j] receiveth you receiveth me, and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me. He that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet shall receive a prophet's reward; and he that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man shall receive a righteous man's reward. And whosoever shall give to drink to one of these little ones a [k] cup of cold [water] only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward.

1 (1-15): Sufficiency and unity of the manifestation.

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chap. xi.)

The Separation of a Remnant.

1 (1-6): the divine accord in signs of His presence.

1. [l] AND it came to pass, when Jesus had finished commanding his twelve disciples, that he [l] passed on thence to teach and to preach in their cities. Now,

[g] Lk. 14. 26. cf. Deut. 33. 9. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 16.
[h] Lk. 14. 27. Lk. 9. 23. ch. 16. 24. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 10.
[i] ch. 16. 25. Jno. 12. 25. Mk. 8. 34, 35. cf. Acts 20. 24.
[j] ch. 18. 5. ch. 25. 40, 45. cf. Gal. 4. 14. cf. Heb. 6. 10.
[k] cf. Lk. 21. 1-4. cf. 1 Ki. 18. 4.
[l] cf. ch. 9. 38 with John 6. 38.

such constraint they are to follow Him as the perfect, supreme example of all that is highest to be attained: to be "worthy of Him" their whole ambition! How His glory shines out here from the depth of self-abasement.

5 He goes on to declare the recompense, connecting it with the conditions already laid down. "He that findeth his life shall lose it, and he who has lost his life"—not simply as having done this, but—"for My sake, shall find it." This is no principle of asceticism, or anything like that: it is His love governing in the face of a hostile world. Then He identifies Himself in the fullest way with those sent forth by Him: "he that receiveth you receiveth Me, and he that receiveth Me receiveth Him that sent Me." This principle He now extends beyond those He is addressing: "He that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet shall receive a prophet's reward; and he that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man shall receive a righteous man's reward." That is, where mind and heart identify one with the prophet or the righteous man, God will identify him: the receiver of a prophet shall be blessed with the prophet. And divine love will forget nothing that is done for love's sake: "whosoever shall give to one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, he shall in no wise lose his reward."

SUBD. 3.

We have now the separation of a remnant to Himself, while the mass are going on to complete rejection. This we see through all this manifestation of Himself; the more fully He is manifested, the more this rejection of Him appears: for it is just His divine glory which they refuse most utterly. But it is this also which brings out the faith of those divinely taught, the babes, conscious of their own nothingness, to whom the things of God can be declared. These are wisdom's children who justify wisdom, even in ways that seem most opposite; while the rest reject alike whatever God may please to use in the way of witness to them. In the Lord's words to those who listen to Him the coming grace begins to be more distinctly seen.

1. [1] First of all, we have brought before us the sufficiency and unity of the manifestation made. And this is emphasized in a message to the Baptist, who from Herod's prison in which he is shut up, sends by his disciples to the Lord, when [m]John had heard in the prison the works of Christ, he sent by his disciples, and said unto him; Art thou he that cometh, or are we to expect another? And Jesus answered and said, Go your way, and tell John the things ye hear and see. The [n]blind recover sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the m ch. 4. 12. ch. 14. 3. cf. Jer. 32. 2, etc. ctr. Phil. 1. 12-21.

n ch. 9. 27, etc.

to ask if He is indeed the Coming One, the One they had been expecting; or were they still to look for another.

It is evident that, in some measure at least, doubt was assailing the mind of the Baptist. Indeed, with regard to such a matter as this, the smallest question unanswered is an agony. No doubt, he had expected in the One to whom he had borne witness, conduct in some way different from that which he had since heard of Him. It is generally and naturally said that he expected, as the mass of the nation certainly did, the Kingdom to be established in power which would put down all opposition, and yet here was he, the messenger to prepare His way, languishing in the power of an immoral usurper of the Kingdom that was Christ's alone. But John had proclaimed Him as the Lamb of God, and evidently the Lamb of sacrifice,—nay, as taking away the sin of the world (John i. 29). How, but by suffering and death? Must he not have understood, then, that this might involve suffering for His disciples also, even as the Lord had spoken of days to come in which the Bridegroom would be taken away from them, and that then they would fast?

Perhaps the reserve the Lord had hitherto maintained as to His Messiahship, and for which we may find reason in the carnal views held by the people as to it, may have, at least, prompted the desire that He would explicitly declare Himself. This seems the simplest account of the question put through his disciples. It was from the Lord Himself he sought the answer: and if he could not put this and that together, the Lord would know how to help him, and to have compassion on him.

The Lord answers by referring the messengers to what they heard and saw. The signs spoken of by Isaiah (xxxv. 5, 6) were being given before them: the blind were receiving sight, and the lame were walking; more than that, the lepers (whose uncleanness cast them out from man and from the house of God, and which only God could heal) were being cleansed, and the deaf heard—a blessed thing, when now there was so much to hear,—these were such things as the prophet had spoken of, to be fulfilled in Messiah's days.

But more, the dead were being raised:—the sign which marked out Christ as "Son of God with power according to the Spirit of holiness." * For, although prophets had done this before, yet never as the seal of such a testimony as His, that "as the Father raiseth up the dead and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whom He will" (John v. 21). Thus now there was indeed "good news" for the poor: we may say "gospel," for it is the same word; only we must understand that the gospel, as we think of it now, is a very different thing. Then it was that "the Son of man had power on earth to forgive sins;" now it is the precious "blood of Jesus Christ His Son" that "cleanseth from all sin" (1 John i. 7). The blood shed was the emphatic sign of His rejection by the world, as it is for us that by which we are brought to God. That death of His was not, therefore, yet preached; He was not preaching it: and though He had indeed spoken to His disciples of taking up their cross, it was only after this that He began to speak to them of His own, to the consternation of all, and to be "rebuked" by Peter for it (ch. xvi. 22). When His death came, though they had been then fully warned of it, it seemed the collapse of all their hopes; and when the women declared His resurrection, "their words seemed to them as idle tales, and they believed them not" (Luke xxiv. 11).

* Rom. i. 4: where it should read, "by resurrection of dead persons," and cannot be limited therefore to His own resurrection, as the common version is taken to mean.

deaf hear; the dead are raised, and the poor have good news preached to them:* and [o]blessed is he who shall not be stumbled by me.

2 (7-15): His witness to John, and John's witness.

[2] And as these went their way, Jesus began to say to the multitudes concerning John: [p]What went ye out into the wilderness to look upon? a [q]reed shaken with the wind? [Nay] but what went ye out to see? a man clothed in [r]soft raiment? behold, they that wear soft clothing are in king's houses. But why went ye out? to see a prophet? Yea, I say unto you, and [s]more than a prophet: this is he of whom it is written, [t]Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, who shall prepare thy way before thee. Verily I say unto you, that among those that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist; but the [u]lesser one in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he. But o cf. Jno.12. 37. cf. Jno. 15. 24. cf. 1 Cor. 1. 23, 24.

p Lk. 7. 24-30.
q cf. Eph. 4. 14. cf. Jas. 1.6-8.
r cf. ch. 3. 4. cf. 2 Ki.1.8.
s *cf.*ch.13.17. *cf.*Jno.5.35.
t Is. 40. 3. Mal. 3. 1.
u *cf.*Heb.11. 40. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 10-12. cf. Eph. 3.4 -10.

* Literally, "are evangelized."

Yet how sweet this gospel preached to them by the Son of God among them, and confirmed by the abundant signs of divine power working far and wide. "To the poor" also—poor in every sense—He proclaimed it; to "publicans and sinners," as we know: One come to seek and save the "lost"—though that is not quite what we have reached yet, and as yet He is acting as "Minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made to the fathers" (Rom. xv. 8). Israel's rejection of Him, without being able to destroy this as the final purpose of His love, was soon to bring about the revelation of purposes still more glorious, the display of which would be, characteristically, among sinners of the Gentiles.

The Lord adds therefore, as admonition for John, but in the gentlest terms, "And blessed is he who shall not be stumbled by Me." His reserve as to taking His title as Messiah was already the foreshadow of the blessing passing, in the meantime, from the people with whom all the Scriptures had connected it—to whom belonged "the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service, and the promises" (Rom. ix. 4)—heart-break enough for a Jew, that! And He had already spoken of "days in which the Bridegroom should be taken away from them!" Here was danger, indeed, of stumbling over the stumbling-stone. The exercise as to this John could not escape: it was forced upon him by his own circumstances. But then this new beatitude was to be his also. And every honest exercise, if it be for the time an agony, will be found in the end the travail-pain of a new beatitude.

[2] But thus now it is the Lord whom we find bearing witness to John, instead of John bearing witness to Him. His own words are fulfilled, "I receive not testimony from man" (John v. 34). Right and meet it is that He should be His own sufficient witness; and blessed it is to see now how, where John had brought his own testimony into question, the Lord comes forward on his behalf. What was it that the multitudes had gone out into the wilderness to look upon? in fact it was what John was that had largely drawn them out to him. Had they been thus moved by a mere reed, to be shaken by the wind? No, spite of all seeming now, they knew better. Was it a soft luxurious man that they saw in the wilderness? It was the wrong place in which to find such. Had they not rather believed him to be a prophet? And they were not mistaken: he was that and more. For, indeed, among those merely born of women, there had not arisen a greater than this man with his strange baptism; and yet, the Lord adds emphatically, "the one comparatively little in the Kingdom of heaven is greater than he."

He does not say, "the least," nor does the expression seem the equivalent of from the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven is [v]taken by violence and the violent seize upon it. For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John. And, if ye will receive it, this is [w]Elias, who was to come. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

2 (16-24): Israel rejecting the way of righteousness and grace alike.

2. But to what, then, shall I liken this generation? It is like [x]children sitting in the markets, and calling unto their companions, saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned to you, and ye

[v] Lk. 16. 16. cf. Lk. 3. 19, 20.

[w] ch. 17. 12. Mal. 4. 5.

[x] Lk. 7. 31–35.

this; and we must first of all consider in what this greatness which the Lord ascribes to John consists, before we can properly estimate the force of His words.

Plainly, it cannot be that even the little one in the Kingdom of heaven can be greater morally than John the Baptist; but then it can hardly be thought that John himself was greater in this respect than all the men that had preceded him. That is not the point of comparison: it is in the place given to him as the predicted messenger who was to prepare the way before Messiah. Certainly spiritual greatness could not be wanting in one put in such a position; but that is another thing. "All the prophets and the law prophesied until John?" they all pointed onward to the time of which John was able to say, "It is just at hand." It was for him to change the whole character of testimony hitherto, and to sound the note of Jubilee which announced a Kingdom not of earth but of heaven, and the King Himself even at the door. And, this being his greatness, it is easy to understand that he would be in the greater position, who was in the Kingdom itself, and could say in the language of the psalmist anticipating this, "As we have heard, so have we seen, in the city of Jehovah of hosts, in the city of our God" (Ps. xlviii. 8).

The Lord's words are commonly taken indeed to refer to the Kingdom in its present Christian and parenthetic character; and no one would deny that such an application could be made. But the testimony as to this was not that given by the Baptist, nor was it yet given when these words were spoken. The Kingdom in this form only began to be spoken of, and in parabolic utterance, when once it was clear that Israel had indeed rejected Him. And that time was now close at hand, and of course foreseen by the Speaker here, but not yet made definitely plain, even to disciples. Every thing would indicate to us that the Lord is declaring the blessedness of that of which all the prophets prophesied, and which John himself had announced, and when Israel will be lifted up to a greatness, which has never yet been paralleled in all the history of that favored nation. That they then put it away from them does not in the least affect this application, which relieves all difficulties at once, and yet leaves room for another application. This must, however, as I believe, be a secondary one.

The next words of the Lord have more real difficulty than those preceding them. They have been taken in opposite ways: the "violent," who seize upon the Kingdom having been thought to refer to the opposition of the scribes and Pharisees, as if they were forcibly taking possession of it; but this is hardly possible as the meaning of the words. "Seize upon it" they could not, though they could obstruct the way of those who were seeking to enter. But their opposition compelled men to violence who would possess themselves of it. As yet, indeed, it was only preached, or presented in the person of the King, and not set up; but the adversaries and those who laid hold of it as thus proclaimed were being distinguished. Until John there had only been the prophesying of what was yet at a distance; John was in fact, if men would receive him, the Elias who was to come. Elias then had come and gone: his "days" could be spoken of as past already. So urgent was the call, then: he that had ears at all must now give ear.

2. The Lord goes on to speak of the way in which, in fact, the senseless generhave not beaten the breast. For John came [y] neither eating nor drinking, and they say, He hath a demon; the Son of man came [z] eating and drinking, and they say, Behold, a glutton and a wine-bibber, a friend of taxgatherers and sinners. And wisdom is [a] justified by her children.

Then began he to [b] reproach the cities in which most of his mighty works had taken place, because they repented not. Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethsaida! for had the mighty works which have taken place in you, taken place in Tyre and Sidon, they would have long ago repented in sackcloth and ashes. But I say unto you, that it shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon in the day of judgment than for you. And thou, Capernaum, which hast been [c] raised up to heaven,* shalt be brought down to hades: for if the mighty works which have taken place in thee had taken place in Sodom, it would have remained until this day. But I say unto you, that it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the [d] day of judgment than for thee.

3 (25-30): the revelation of the Father and the Son.

3. At [e] that time Jesus answered and said, I give thee thanks, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast [f] hid these things from wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto [g] babes. Yea, Father, for so it hath y cf. ch. 3.4. Lk. 1. 15. Lk.5.33–35. cf. ch. 3. 2.

z Lk. 5. 29–32. Jno.2.1–11. Lk. 7. 36. cf. Jno.3.16.
a cf. Prov.8. 8, 9. cf. Jno.8.43.
b Lk. 10.13–16. ch. 10. 15. cf. Heb. 2. 1–4. c cf. Lk. 18. 14. cf. Rev. 18. 7. Is. 25. 12. Is. 26. 5.
d cf. Jonah 3. 7, 8. ch. 10. 15. cf. Lk. 12. 47, 48. cf. ch.25.31. etc.
e Lk. 10. 21, 22.
f I Cor. 1.19–21, 27–31. Is. 6. 9, 10.
g Ps. 8. 2. cf. ch.16.17. I Cor. 3.18.

* Others read, "shalt thou be raised up to heaven?"

ation to which God had thus been speaking had treated the divine appeal that had been made to them. They were merely like children in the midst of the serious business going on around them, idling away their time in mocking the realities of life. They trifled in their pleasure, they trifled with sorrow, even with that which was upon man for his sins, and carried him away from both his pleasures and his sorrows. They would have had John dance to their piping, and Jesus and his disciples beat their breasts to their idle dirge. The ways of God never suited them; if John came in the way of righteousness and so with his call to repentance, they said he had a demon—would drive us among the tombs. If the grace of God in Christ came among them as not shunning contact, but eating and drinking even with the sinners whom it had come after to win them to the Giver of all good they knew not, then they reviled it as licentiousness, and the Saviour as fit company for those whose need had brought Him to their help. No way would suit them that divine love could take; while wisdom's children justified her in all her ways.

So then they but turned the mercies shown them into occasions of judgment and self-degradation. Tyre and Sidon would have repented, had they seen the glorious things which Chorazin and Bethsaida had beheld unmoved. Sodom would have remained to that day, if it had had the privileges of favored Capernaum. But therefore the judgment of Tyre and Sidon and of Sodom would be lighter in the day of judgment, than that of Israel's cities. Capernaum, the city of His choice, had come near to heaven by the Presence which indeed makes heaven for those that have received His grace. It would sink down under the weight of its rejection of Him to a mere abode of death and desolation.* And such it has long been, whether the identification of its site be correct or not.

3. The Lord turns from it all, to approve, spite of the sorrow that filled His heart, the Father's perfect ways. It was right to hide from the world's wise been pleasing in thy sight. All things have been [h] delivered unto me by my Father; and no one [i] knoweth the Son but the Father; neither knoweth any one the Father but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son may will to [j] reveal [him]. [k] Come unto me, all ye that labor and are burdened, and I will give you [l] rest. Take my [m] yoke upon you, and learn of me: for I am [n] meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls: for my yoke is [o] easy, and my burden light.

* To Hades, "the unseen," the region of departed spirits; not "hell" or Gehenna.

h cf. Jno. 5. 27. Jno. 13. 3. Jno. 17. 2. cf. Heb. 2. 8. i cf. Ex. 16. 15. cf. Lev. 1. 17. cf. Eph. 3. 19. j Jno. 1. 14, 18. Jno. 6. 46. Jno. 17. 6, 26.

k Jno. 6. 35, 37; Jno. 1. 38, 39. l etr. Is. 57. 20, 21; cf. Is. 30. 15; cf. Is. 32. 17, 18; cf. Rom. 5. 1. m cf. 1 Cor. 9. 21; cf. 1 Pet. 1. 2. n Jno. 13. 15; Phil. 2. 5; 1 Pet. 2. 21-23; cf. ch. 26. 67, 68. o 1 Jno. 5. 3; etr. Acts 15. 10.

and prudent what to babes He could reveal. This is not hiding anything from men as men, but from men that cleave to their own wisdom,—are wise enough to judge God, but not to judge themselves. In that condition it is impossible that He and they should come together. It is a first necessity that God should have His place—should be God; and therefore man be the puny creature that he is, a babe indeed before Him. If there be true wisdom, he will find it no hardship to take his place as this before the Lord of heaven and earth: and here is the condition of all true blessing.

Here, then, was the Son of the Father; Himself the Repository of all blessing: all things in His hand, whose very Person was to man an inscrutable mystery, before which all the pride of man must humble itself; but a mystery of grace in which as nowhere else God is revealed. The Son makes known the Father,—He, and He alone. We find here, beyond all that had been predicted as to Messiah, the glory which is not, so to speak, officially, but personally His. It passes knowledge, and yet it is for us to know: it is not God shrouded in the darkness, but the glory of the Light; inaccessible, though most accessible; an infinite fullness, in which we are filled up. Here we need but capacity to receive; emptiness in ourselves, not fullness; the "babe's" capacity to draw from and live upon Another, and to such need it is that He wills to reveal Himself, and in revealing Himself to reveal God—Lord of heaven and earth, and yet the Father, for the "babe" to call upon as such.

Practically rejected already by the people to whom He came, He appeals, then, to these needy ones wherever they may be—to those who have found the world but a weary place, in which those "laboring" after satisfaction only find, in proportion to the eagerness of search, the heavier weight of disappointment—He appeals to these to come away from this fruitless labor to Himself for rest. He will give rest. The responsibility of fully satisfying them shall be His own.

In this way, He is practically outside of Israel: for wants of this kind are not the birth-right privileges of the chosen nation. He, too, is more and higher than a mere King of the Jews; as His call and offer show, by the character of those invited and by the freeness of the gift, that it is not law but grace that He is declaring. But He is a King; and in submission to Him all hope for man is found. He gives rest, but not to those going on in rebellion. Seeking and following one's own will, no rest is practicable; it would be rest in sin. "Take My yoke upon you," He says, "and learn of Me, for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls."

What an example for our imitation! When God raised up a leader for His people of old, to bring them out of Egypt and into the land, He gave them one after this pattern: "the man Moses was very meek above all men that were on the face of the earth" (Num. xii. 3). That was God's choice for a ruler of His people. But now here is the One to whom all things are delivered, and how perfectly does He exemplify this character! Maker and Lord of all, He has come down among men as one that serveth: doing, throughout, His Father's will, and learning what obedience is, in a strange path of human suffering.

SUBDIVISION 4. (Chap. xii.)

The Passing of Divine Long-suffering.

1 (1-13): Christ the source of all authority.

1 AT that time Jesus went on the sabbath through the [p] corn-fields; and his disciples were hungry, and began to pluck the ears and to eat. And when the Pharisees saw it, they said unto him, Behold, thy disciples do that which is not lawful to do upon the [q] sabbath. But

[p] Mk. 2. 23-28. Lk. 6. 1-5. cf. Deut. 23. 25.
[q] Lk. 13. 10-17. Jno. 5. 9-17.

Well may we learn such a lesson from such a Teacher! and, submitting ourselves to such a yoke as He will impose, find rest from the unrest of our own self-will!

Some think of His yoke here, as if it were a yoke He had borne that He gave us, or as if we shared it with Him. But the "red heifer" is His picture, "upon which never came yoke" (Num. xix. 2): the doing of His Father's will was never that to Him. For a yoke implies restraint; and then there must be something to be restrained: and this for us is true, as for Him it could not be. He speaks both of a yoke and of a burden; but the yoke is not that of the law, but a gentle as well as salutary one; and His burden is light.

SUBD. 4.

The fourth subdivision now closes this part with the full manifestation of the breach between the Lord and Israel. The incidents are grouped together, however, not altogether historically, but according to the usual manner in Matthew, for the purpose of illustrating clearly the great dispensational change that is beginning. The story of the corn-fields and the healing of the withered hand is brought in here from the earlier place to which it belongs chronologically, because the Sabbath was a sign of God's covenant with the nation, and Christ being Lord of it shows how absolutely dependent upon Him their blessing was. The repetition of their awful charge of casting out demons through the prince of the demons, gives occasion to the Lord's warning as to blasphemy against the Spirit as the unpardonable sin. While at the end of the twelfth chapter He formally refuses the claim of fleshly relationships, such as Israel's was ("of whom, as concerning the flesh Christ came,") and declares the spiritual tie between His disciples and Himself as that which replaces it,—the new principle of Christianity. In the next chapter we have the parables of the Kingdom in its present form, and the very style (the parable) shows the mass of the people as given up to hardness of heart (xiii. 11-15). It is true that after all this the Lord presents Himself definitively to the nation, riding into Jerusalem as her King in fulfilment of Zechariah's prophecy, and this brings on the closing scenes; but it is the full public confirmation which they here give, and which it was designed of God that they should be permitted to give, of a rejection which had virtually taken place before. At this, and the principle involved in it, we shall have to look, when we reach that portion of the Gospel.

1. [1] The question of the Sabbath is that which we find first raised; and Christ declares Himself the Lord of the sabbath on a double ground, that of His Person and that of His work. At this we must look more closely. The two incidents given here are found in both the other synoptic Gospels, and the question (somewhat differently answered) is found in all.

If the ten commandments were, as Scripture positively declares (Ex. xxxiv. 27), God's covenant with His people, the Sabbath as the fourth of these had evidently a peculiar place among them. It was the only commandment that was positive, not moral,—something, therefore, which, with the failure of the covenant itself, might fail and be set aside, as those which were moral could not. Covenant or no covenant, every other part of the "ten words" has its ground in the nature of God Himself, and must be as unchanging as He is. Thus, although the "rule" of Christianity is not that of the law but a higher one (Gal. vi. 16), yet it is none the less true that "the righteousness of the law"—the "righteous requirement" (δικαίωμα), that which was essentially right-he said unto them, Have ye not read what [r] David did, when he was hungry, and those with him: how he entered into the house of God, and ate the show-bread, which it was not lawful for him to eat, nor for those with him, but only for the priests? Or have ye not eous in it—"is fulfilled in us who walk, not after the flesh, but after the Spirit" (Rom. viii. 4). In the sabbath, then, we find something which in its being set aside could be a "sign" of their relationship with God broken by their sin, as no other commandment could.

[r] 1 Sam. 21. 1-6. Ex. 25. 30. Ex. 29. 32, 33. Lev. 24. 5-9.

And the Sabbath was a "sign." "I gave them My sabbaths," says God by Ezekiel, "to be a sign between Me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them" (Ezek. xx. 12). For this purpose it was, in fact, every way fitted. As first given in the book of Exodus, it is a memorial of God's rest as the Creator, when satisfied with the goodness of all His hands had made. Thus alone could He rest ever; and as a sign of God resting as satisfied, we can see at once how much the maintenance of the sabbath meant for an Israelite,—how fiercely the Pharisee would resent the thought of its being set aside. In Deuteronomy (v. 15) they are commanded to keep it as a people redeemed from Egyptian bondage; and here also the loss of it would be most serious. As the sign of a people set apart to God they had often submitted to all kinds of injury rather than themselves violate it.

With their multiplied guards against infringement—the hedge round the law—the disciples rubbing the ears of corn between the hands could be thought of as a work: the gathering for personal use, if hungry, was permitted. The Pharisees boldly appeal to Him about the conduct of His disciples in doing what was not lawful to do upon the sabbath; not unlawful in itself, or at other times, but as a violation of the day of rest. The Lord replies, justifying them against the charge, but not at all in the way we should expect Him to have done. He does not attack their human additions to the divine Word, nor their fine spun interpretations of it: He takes higher and stronger ground, exposing the whole condition of the people as before God, and through their unbelief in Him, who was Lord of the sabbath, and with whose rejection the sabbath could no longer be with them at all.

David was ahungered, and those that were with him: did they remember how he entered into the house of God, and ate the show-bread, which was not lawful for him to eat, nor for those with him, but only for the priests? This was not a doubtful point, not a question of human additions to the law or interpretations of it, but a direct opposition to the Levitical statute. But how, then, could the Lord justify this? Was it on the ground of hunger, merely? and were they so far from possibility of help as to justify the setting aside of the law in their case? and was every hungry man entitled with David here to set it aside?

The answer must be surely sought elsewhere: David, who took the show-bread, was in fact the anointed King of Israel, Saul having been rejected of God for his disobedience to the divine commands. Yet David was now fleeing, a well-nigh solitary man, from the causeless wrath of Saul. Moreover upon the King all Israel's relation to God now depended. The priesthood had utterly failed; the ark was in practical banishment all the days of Saul (1 Chron. xiii. 3). And, according to the prophetic word of the man of God to Eli, even the "faithful priest," raised up of God, was to "walk before" His "anointed" king "continually." (1 Sam. ii. 35, 36, and contrast Num. xxvii. 21.) Thus David brings the ark to Zion, and assumes afterwards the ordering of the service in connection with it.

David, then, being in rejection, the whole relationship of God with Israel had suffered eclipse, and the sanctity of the consecrated things was departed from them: and this is, no doubt, the meaning of his words to the high-priest upon the occasion referred to: "and the bread is, as it were, common, though it were read in the law that on the sabbaths the [s]priests in the temple profane the sabbath, and are guiltless? But I say unto you, that here is one [t]greater than the temple. But if ye had known what that is, "I will have [u]mercy and not sacrifice," ye would not have condemned the guiltless. For the Son of man is [v]Lord of the sabbath.

And, when he was departed thence, he came into their synagogue. And behold, a man having a hand [w]withered. And they asked him, saying, Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath? that they might accuse him. But

[s] Num. 28.9, 10. cf. Jno. 7. 22, 23.
[t] cf. 2 Chro. 6. 18. cf. Is. 66. 1, 2.
[u] Hos. 6. 6. Mi. 6. 6-8. cf. 1 Sam. 15. 22. cf. ch. 15. 4-6.
[v] cf. Jno. 5. 17. cf. Col. 2. 16.

12. [w] Mk. 3. 1-6; Lk. 6. 6-11; cf. Lk. 14. 3, 4; cf. Is. 56. 3-8.

sanctified this day in the vessel." All was, for the moment, in abeyance in Israel, and that because of the rejection of the anointed of Jehovah. How much more surely, then, when the antitypical David was in their midst, only to be rejected, was it the uttermost folly to contend for a sabbath! How could the sabbath remain for those who were refusing the Lord of the sabbath?*

The Lord cites from the law itself another witness. The priestly service of sacrifice did not cease upon the sabbath: the morning and evening sacrifices were even increased (Num. xxviii. 9, 10). Here man's sin was the cause, but the grace of God also that provided for the sin. This whole typical sacrificial system, much older than the law, and dating really from the gate of Eden, though incorporated with the legal system when this was established, was the constant, though veiled, witness of the grace running through all previous dispensations. Before it, wherever there was conflict, the "sign" of the legal covenant gave way, as here. Thus, even now, Israel's sin, and yet also the incoming grace of God along with it, were setting aside the legal covenant. "The temple" thus insisted on this violation of the Sabbath, for the glory of Him whose abode it was, and in the interests of those who could only in such a manner be maintained in relation to Him. But here was what was greater than the temple as much as the antitype was greater than the type: temple and sacrifice, the glory of God and the blessing of man, were all represented there in Him, as never before had been. No doubt, they were ignorant of it: alas, they were ignorant of plainer things, in which the character of God whom they professed to serve declared itself. He had said: "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice," but with them sacrifice (in the mere external way) overshadowed mercy. God was a God of requirement rather than of bounteous giving. Had they known Him as such, they would not have condemned the guiltless.

For the truth was here, the seal of all that He was saying, that "the Son of man was Lord of the Sabbath,"—the One, therefore, who had in His hand the whole adjudgment of their case; which in law, too, had gone so entirely against them. The Giver of divine rest was, indeed, among them: as that, we have just heard him proclaim Himself; for no rest could there be for man, except at the same time God could rest also. In Christ He has declared His delight; on Him the Spirit of God, dove-like, rests; He is the "Father of eternity," the One who brings about the eternal rest of God, and who, by His work, brings sinners to partake of it. But thus also, if He be rejected, Sabbath there can be none, and for ever none.

[2] The claim of His work is more distinctly affirmed in His healing the withered hand in the synagogue afterwards. Here He does work Himself, and in answer to their challenge. With distinct purpose to accuse Him, they ask, "Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath?" to which He answers by another question: would they not lift a sheep of theirs out of a pit upon the sabbath? and was not a man more than a sheep? Then, having silenced them with His word, He silences them with His deed: divine power heals the man before their eyes. Who shall he said unto them, What man shall there be of you, who if he have one [x]sheep, and it fall into a pit upon the sabbath, will not lay hold of it, and lift it out? How much, then, is a man better than a sheep! so that it is lawful to do [y]well upon the sabbath. Then saith he to the man, [z]Stretch forth thy hand. And he stretched it forth, and it was restored, as sound as the other.

* See for further remarks, and especially the relation of the shew-bread to a rejected Christ and to Christianity, 1 Sam. xxi. notes.

[x] Lk. 13. 15, 16. Lk. 14. 5.

[y] cf. Jno. 7. 23, 24.

[z] cf. Ex. 4. 6, 7. cf. chap. 9. 6, 7.

2 (14-21): acceptance of rejection.

[2] But the Pharisees went out and took [a]counsel together against him, how they might destroy him. But Jesus, knowing it, [b]withdrew himself from thence; and many followed him, and he healed them all; and he [c]charged them strictly that they should not make him known: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken through Esaias the prophet, saying, [d]Behold, my servant whom I have chosen; my beloved, in whom my soul is well pleased: I will put my spirit upon him, and he shall show forth judgment to the nations. He

[a] Mk. 3. 6, 7. Lk. 6. 11.

[b] cf. Lk. 4. 30. cf. Jno. 10. 39, 40.

[c] chap. 8. 4. chap. 9. 30. Mk. 8. 26.

[d] Is. 42. 1-4. chap. 3. 17. cf. ch. 11. 29.

stay God's love from going forth? and yet they but respond to this with more determined hatred.

[2] We now, for the first time, hear of a council held to put Jesus to death. Aware of it, He withdraws Himself, but cannot withdraw from the need which continually appeals to Him. Still the stream of mercy flows; but He charges them strictly not to make Him known: He accepts rejection, will not gather the multitudes after Him by the fame of His abundant miracles, nor raise up any against His enemies. There was plenty of material to work upon, plenty of readiness, as we know, to follow a leader of such a kind as had arisen and still would rise; but He was upon a different path and with a different purpose from any of theirs. The Spirit of God quotes from Esaias to show this. The Son-Servant (ὁ παῖς) of God, His Chosen, His Beloved, in whom His soul delights,—terms by which He is characterized in answer to the enmity and reproach which manifest themselves upon man's part,—characterized, too, by the Spirit that abides upon Him, in the fulness of that Spirit He is going to show judgment to the nations. Judgment is here the absolute right of things. Quietness, patience and gentleness characterize Him: "He shall not strive, nor cry, nor cause His voice to be heard in the streets. A bruised reed"—the perfect symbol of weakness surely—"will He not break, and smoking flax will He not quench, until He send forth judgment unto victory. And in His name shall the nations trust."

The application here is perfectly evident. Rejected of Israel, He is turning to the Gentiles, and we think, and are intended to think, of the present grace going out to the Gentiles during the Christian dispensation. But such a Gentile dispensation is never contemplated in the Old Testament prophets: it is a gap of time in the working out of God's purposes as to Israel, which in this way foreshortens their perspective, and brings the first and second comings of the Lord between which it lies, into a closeness of connection which is confusing enough to those who are not aware of this.* Isaiah in the passage quoted does not, in fact, speak of such a dispensation. He begins with the character of the Lord's ministry in Israel as Matthew here exhibits it, and then contrasts with this His showing judgment to the nations, and the final blessing which will flow out to them, in words which are quite capable of taking in the present time; and Matthew uses it in this way. There is no statement of any change of dispensation, as is clear; none the less it suits well with what is now taking place,

* The principle itself is clearly stated, chap. xiii. 11, 35; Rom. xvi. 25, 26; Eph. iii. 6, 9, 10; Col. i. 25-27, and will be considered under these texts.

shall not strive nor cry out, nor shall any hear his voice in the streets; a bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench, until he bring forth judgment unto victory. And in his name shall the nations trust.

3 (22-32): the blasphemy of the Spirit.

[3] Then was brought to him one [e]possessed by a demon, blind and dumb; and he healed him, so that the dumb man [f]spake and saw. And all the multitudes were astonished and said, Is this the [g]son of David? But the Pharisees, when they heard it, said, This man doth not cast out demons, but by [h]Beelzebul, the prince of demons. But he, knowing their thoughts, said unto them, Every kingdom [i]divided against itself is brought to desolation, and every city or house divided against itself will not stand; and if Satan cast out Satan, he is divided against himself, how then shall his kingdom stand? If I also by Beelzebul cast out demons, by whom do your [j]sons cast them out? therefore they shall be your judges. But if I by the Spirit of God cast out demons, then surely the [k]kingdom of God hath come upon you. Or how can any one enter into the [l]strong e cf. chap. 9. 32, 33.

f cf. Is. 35. 5, 6. cf. Ps. 126. 1, 2.
g ch. 9. 27. ch. 21. 9.
h chap. 9. 34. Mk. 3. 22-30. Lk. 11. 14-20.
i cf. Jn. 7. 20. cf. 2 Chron. 20. 23.
j cf. Lk. 9. 49, 50. cf. Lk. 10. 17. cf. Acts 19. 13-16.
k cf. Ex. 8. 19. cf. ch. 4. 17.
l cf. Is. 49. 24, 25. cf. 1 Pet. 5. 8.

—the shadow of the cross now beginning to fall across the path of One who meek and lowly of heart, and knowing what is before Him, accepts rejection and this uttermost sorrow with it, finding His joy meanwhile in such service of love as grace had brought Him down to, His precious compensation for the cross itself.

[3] And the road still leads downwards. One possessed by a demon is brought to Him, blind and dumb; and, the demon cast out, the blind and the dumb is at once restored. The multitudes, astonished, cry out, "Is this the Son of David?" and yet, as the question implies, only half convinced. The Pharisees hasten to extinguish the spark of this conviction by repeating their former blasphemy. They could not deny the power that was so manifest. They were driven then, if they did not submit and own God in it, to the awful alternative of imputing this to Satan. To Himself, it would seem, they dared not do this. The Lord read it in their hearts, however, and answered it. If Satan could cast out Satan, as they supposed, his kingdom would be divided against itself, and such a divided kingdom could not stand. Division there might be, no doubt, and discord in many respects, and in fact evil is in this way ever discordant, as truth and goodness are the only perfect unity. But with these healed demoniacs, it was not insinuated even that merely one form of evil had contended with another,—one had given place to another. Nay, the power of Satan, they confessed, was broken and gone: Satan was really cast out. Satan, then, had not done this. To say so would be but to confound good with evil, and lose the power of discernment altogether.

Moreover their sons professedly cast out demons. How was it, then, if they admitted, as they did admit, this? Was it an opposite power that worked in the same way? or how did they distinguish? These, then, would be their judges.

If, on the other hand, it had to be admitted that this was the work of the Spirit of God, the kingdom of God had come upon them unawares. The expression here suggests the idea of surprise: here it was, not indeed as established outwardly, but in the power which belonged to it, and that as manifested in the King Himself. Yet they were not prepared for it and did not recognize it, when before their eyes! Who, then, could enter into a strong man's house, man's house, and seize his goods, except he first [m] bind the strong man? and then he will plunder his house. He that is not [n] with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth. Wherefore I say unto you, [o] All sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men, but the blasphemy against the Spirit shall not be forgiven. And whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever shall speak against the [p] Holy Spirit, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in [q] this age nor in that to come.

4 (33–37): The test of the tree.

[4] Either make the [r] tree good and its fruit good, or make the tree corrupt and its fruit corrupt: for the tree is known by its fruit. Ye [s] offspring of vipers, how can ye, being evil, speak good things? for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. The good man out of his good treasure bringeth forth good things; and the evil man out of his evil treasure bringeth forth evil things. But I say unto you that every [t] idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account of it in the day of judgment: for by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned.

5 (38–42): the end in divine government.

[5] Then some of the scribes and Pharisees answered him, saying, Teacher, we wish to see a [u] sign from thee. But he answered and said to them, An evil and [v] adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall no sign be given to it, but the sign of Jonas the prophet.

[m] cf. chap. 4. 10, 11. cf. Heb. 2. 14, 15.
[n] cf. Lk. 9. 50. cf. Rev. 3. 16.
[o] Lk. 24. 47. Acts 13. 38, 39. cf. 1 Jno. 1. 7.
[p] cf. ch. 21. 37, 38. cf. ch. 27. 18. ctr. Acts 3. 17. cf. Acts 7. 51.
[q] cf. ch. 19. 28. ctr. Is. 35. 24. ctr. Jer. 50. 20.
[r] ch. 7. 17, 18.
[s] ch. 3. 7. ch. 23. 33. cf. Ps. 140. 3.
[t] cf. Rom. 2. 16. cf. Jude 15.
[u] ch. 16. 1–4. Mk. 8. 11. cf. Jno. 2. 18–22.
[v] Is. 57. 3. Mk. 8. 38. cf. Jas. 4. 4.

and seize upon his goods, if he did not first bind the strong man? Strong enough Satan had shown himself in the case of these poor demoniacs; yet his power had been vanquished, the enemy bound. And by whom?

It had come, then, to this: there must now be an open decision; neutrality could not be permitted. "He that is not with Me is against Me; he that gathereth not with Me scattereth." Mercy could no longer be shown where the power of the Spirit of God had, as power, to be owned, and yet attributed to Satan himself. This blasphemy was no longer ignorant unbelief: it was open-eyed opposition to God and to all that was of God. A word spoken against the Son of man might be forgiven; the lowly place that He had taken—though it were but fullest grace and to meet the need of man—might yet hide His glory from the eyes of carnal men; but here was what had to be owned, could not be hidden: open-eyed hatred could not be forgiven, could never be. They expected fuller mercy in the age to come—in Messiah's day—than in the present age of law: but this could never be forgiven, in this age nor in that to come.

[4] That generation had proved its condition; the tree was known by its fruit. It was a viper's brood, from which no good thing could be expected any longer. Their mouth was speaking now out of the fulness of the heart. The treasures of the good man were good things, but the treasures of the evil, evil. Thus an idle word might prove a man's condition, and in the day of judgment all such would be taken into account,—by his words a man be justified or condemned. How impossible, then, for any to escape, who has not found his shelter in Him whom Israel here refuses!

[5] The end, then, had been reached morally. It was no use asking now for signs. An evil and adulterous generation could not be helped by signs. One they should have, the sign of the prophet Jonah. Jonah, three days and three nights in the belly of the great fish, had been a sign to the Ninevites, and thus

For, as [w]Jonas was three days and three nights in the belly of the great fish, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. The men of [x]Nineveh shall rise up in the judgment with this generation and condemn it: for they repented at the preaching of Jonas; and behold, more than Jonas is here. The [y]queen of the south shall rise up in the judgment with this generation and shall condemn it: for she came from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon: and behold, [z]more than Solomon is here.

[w] Jonah 1. 17.
[x] Jonah 3. 5-9. Lk. 11. 32. ch. 11. 20-24.
[y] 1 Ki. 10. 1-13. Lk. 11. 31.
[z] ver. 6. cf. Ps. 72.1, etc.

6 (43-45): the evil mastering.

[a] But when the unclean spirit is gone out of the man, he goeth through dry places seeking rest, and findeth none. Then he saith, I will return unto my house whence I came out; and when he is come, he findeth it [b]empty, swept and adorned. Then goeth he and taketh with him [c]seven other spirits more evil than himself, and they enter in and dwell there; and the [d]last state of that man becometh worse than the first. So shall it be also to this evil generation.

[a] Lk. 11.24-26. cf. Ezra 1. 1-3.
[b] cf. ch. 2. 3 with Lk. 2. 7. cf. ch. 23.27-31. cf. ch. 24.1, 2.
[c] cf. Lk. 16.9.
[d] cf. Jno. 5. 43 with 2 Thess. 2. 8-12. cf. Rev. 18. 11-18.

7 (46-50): the rejection of natural ties complete.

[e] While he was yet speaking to the multitudes, behold, his [f]mother and his brethren stood without, seeking to speak with him. And one said to him, Behold, thy mother and thy brethren stand without, seeking to speak to thee. But he answered and said to him that the preaching of a man, as it were risen from the dead, had brought that great city to repentance. Well, the Son of man would be really in the grave three days and nights, rejected and cast out, but at His preaching by His resurrection they, more hardened than Nineveh, would not repent. The Ninevites would rise up in the judgment to condemn them; so much the more as the Son of man was greater than Jonah. The queen of the south also, would rise up in the judgment against them, who came from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon: and here was One how much greater!

[e] Mk. 3. 31-35. Lk. 8.19-21.

[a] The Lord goes on to predict the end of this reformed and law-boasting generation, which rejected Him. They were cleansed from idolatry indeed, but it was but as when the unclean spirit had gone out of a man, not cast out, but of its own will. Swept and adorned its house might be, but, empty, it only invited the return of its former occupant. The occupant would return: idolatry will again take possession of Israel in the latter days, and with seven other spirits worse than this: and they will enter in and dwell there. The last state of that generation* will be worse than the first. We shall see later on in the Gospel (ch. xxiv) to what the Lord refers.

[f] All this is closed, on the Lord's part, with a significant word. While still speaking to the people, He is told by one of the bystanders that His mother and His brethren stand without, desiring to speak with Him. The cry had been raised, as we learn from Mark (iii. 21), even among His "friends," that He was beside Himself; and this attempt to speak with Him on the part of His relatives no doubt was a consequence of this. The opposition had grown so great, that alarm for His personal safety may have actuated them, and the desire to induce Him to take in some respects a different course. But if such were their thought Matthew gives no hint of it; and the omission is significant. The Lord's words are not to be taken as if they referred merely to any conduct of

* "Generation" in Scripture is often used with a moral application rather than in a time sense,—for a succession of people with the same moral characteristics, see Ps. xii. 7. This is, no doubt, the sense here.

spake to him, Who is my mother? and who are my brethren" And, stretching out his hand over his disciples, he said, Behold, my mother and my brethren: for whosoever shall [f] do the will of my Father who is in heaven, he is my brother, and sister, and mother.

[f] Lk. 11. 27, 28.

this kind, as far as this Gospel is concerned. They are to be taken rather in connection with what has gone before and what follows here; that is, as referring to the dispensational change beginning. Judaism was essentially a national religion: men were "Jews by nature," as the apostle says, although of course, proselytes were admitted. Christians are such by new nature only: the spiritual tie is the whole thing. And that is what the Lord here affirms: "He answered and said to him that spake to Him, Who is My mother? and who are My brethren? And, stretching out His hand over His disciples, He said, Behold My mother and My brethren: for whosoever shall do the will of My Father who is in heaven, he is My brother, and sister, and mother."

DIV. 4.

We have now come, therefore, to that which directly appeals to us, the Kingdom as we know it at the present time, Israel while refusing the King having necessarily lost it, as the Lord declares to them (chap. xxi. 43). But this involves a momentous change: for the promises concerning it, all contemplated Israel as in the central place of glory and power in that day, the law of Jehovah going forth from Zion and His word from Jerusalem, the glory of God being manifested there, and the Lord reigning openly in power to the ends of the earth (Mic. iv.) These promises still belong to Israel, because His counsel shall surely stand,—His gifts and calling are without repentance (Rom. ix. 4; xi. 29). But this being so, either the Kingdom itself must be delayed till Israel is brought to receive the Lord; or else, it must in the meantime come in in a different manner from that contemplated in the prophets. This last it is which has actually taken place; not, surely, as an after-thought on God's part, for there is no such thing with Him as this, but on the contrary, revealing the riches of His grace according to counsels hidden, indeed, from ages and generations past, but now to make known to principalities and powers by means of the Church the manifold wisdom of God (Eph. iii. 10).

The whole time of the working out of these counsels is necessarily, therefore, a gap in Old Testament prophecy, and a time of delay as to the accomplishment of blessing for the earth, —a blessing which is inseparably bound up with that of Israel nationally. Christianity is indeed universal in its character, the call of the gospel being world-wide—"to every creature which is under heaven;" but it is not a call to earthly but to heavenly blessings, and to strangership and pilgrim character upon earth. And this is, so far, only what the family of faith has all along confessed (Heb. xi. 13–16.) Israel's inheritance nationally is another matter: and here the voices of the prophets unanimously direct us on to such a scene as we have seen Micah picture. Heaven in the prophets is the place of God's dwelling, but little is known of what is inside, even though Enoch went there, and Elijah went there, in days long since. For us it is opened and furnished; Christ has come out and gone in, and now we know it; and He is coming again to receive us to Himself. Our blessings are in heavenly places in Him; our home is with Himself.

In two different ways people get confused and confuse others, as to things as plain as this. Some, in the enjoyment of what is simple Christian truth to-day, read their Christianity back into the Old Testament, and can think of nothing else but a heavenly inheritance for all the saints of all times. Some, on the other hand, read the Old Testament forward into the New Testament, and make the earth the final habitation for all. Scripture is larger and more diverse than either of these understand. The Old Testament outlook is earthly unmistakably, the New Testament revelation is what our Joseph, rejected of his brethren, is telling as the "Revealer of secrets" in the ears of His Gentile bride.

These are the "mysteries," which characterize Christianity, so that the apostle bids us account of his fellow-laborers and himself "as ministers of Christ and stewards of the mysteries of God" (1 Cor. iv. 1). The first great mystery is that of Christ Himself—"the mystery of godliness, God manifest in the flesh" (1 Tim. iii. 16). Along with this, however, and as part of it, we have His whole life here, "justified in the Spirit"—by the descent of the Spirit of God upon Him,—and again by His resurrection from the dead,—"seen of angels, preached among the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up in glory." It is Christ actually come, and known in His whole life down here, that is the mystery: not the prophetic picture merely, which certainly and clearly made known His Deity (e. g. Mic. v. 2), but the fulfilment of this in the person of Jesus Christ. Next we may put "the mystery of God's will . . . to head up," as the word really is, "all things in Christ, things in heaven and things on earth" (Eph. i. 9, 10)—the Headship of Christ over the (new) creation. Then we have "the mystery of the Christ"—not simply of Christ personally, but that in Him "the Gentiles should be joint-heirs, and a joint-body" (σύσσωμα), a body formed of Jews and Gentiles brought together,—"and joint-partakers of His promise in Christ by the gospel (Eph. iii. 4, 6). Then the mystery of Christ and the Church, His Bride (Eph. v. 32). Then the mystery of "Christ in you" (Col. i. 27). The change of the living concurrently with the resurrection of the saints at the coming of Christ (1 Cor. xv. 51), the present blinding of Israel until the fulness of the Gentiles is come in (Rom. xi. 25), even the "mystery of iniquity" working out in Christian times, (2 Thes. ii. 7), and which the woman "Babylon the Great" bears as a brand upon her forehead (Rev. xvii. 5),—all these are "mysteries" connected with the Christian dispensation, hidden, therefore, in Old Testament times (Rom. xvi. 25; Eph. iii. 5; Col. i. 26); secrets made known to those initiated into Christianity.

It is not the place here to inquire further into these: none of them are mentioned as such in the Gospels; but we can see that in them the essential and distinctive features of Christianity are to be found. In that part of Matthew to which we have now reached, such secrets begin to be told out; and according to what we have seen to be the theme of this Gospel, they begin with the "mysteries of the Kingdom of heaven,"—the Kingdom in the new form which it acquires by the rejection of the King, and His consequent absence from the place of His Kingdom. He reigns indeed, but on the Father's throne (Rev. iii. 21),—a higher place, and which manifests His glory as the divine Son: none could sit upon such a throne but He; still it is not His human throne as Son of man. The Kingdom is administered for Him in His absence by His servants, and the fashion of it, therefore, greatly changed. In a parable in Mark, the Lord compares it to a man casting seed into the earth, and seeing it no more till the time of harvest: it springs up and grows, he knows not how (Mark iv. 26–29). This is already significant as to the possibility of failure. Left in the hands of men, we know, only too well, what man is. Divine wisdom and love cannot really be baffled; and yet we must be prepared for this seeming to be so.

These mysteries of the Kingdom speak of "things that had been hidden from the foundation of the world" (verse 35), and he that is now discipled unto the Kingdom of heaven has, therefore, in his treasures things "new" as well as "old" (verse 52). Of the bringing together of these the parables that follow here will give us decisive proof.

Subd. 1.

The history of the Kingdom is given us before the principles. It was necessary to have clearly before the eye the character of that to which the principles apply. And more especially is this so because of the opposition between the Kingdom in its initiation and in its after-development, which the history

DIVISION 4. (Chap. xiii.-xx. 28.)

The Kingdom in the hands of Men.

SUBDIVISION 1. (xiii. 1-52.)

Viewed as a Whole.

SECTION 1. (1-35.)

As left to itself,—the King absent.

1 (1-30): Individual aspects. 1 (1-23): a kingdom of the truth.

1. [1] ON that day went Jesus out of the [g] house, and sat by the [h] sea-side. And there were gathered unto him great multitudes, so that he entered into a ship himself, and sat down; and the whole multitude stood on the shore. And he spake to them many things in parables,

[g] cf. ch. 23. 38.

[h] cf. Rev. 13. 1, etc. cf. Rev. 17. 15. Mk. 4. 1.

so clearly shows, and which would naturally raise question of their application altogether, if this contradiction were not accounted for.

On the other hand, the veil of parable is thrown over the whole; and the Lord's explanation of the reason of this (verses 11-13), while applying primarily to unbelieving Jews, has in it most important principles of far wider application.

History given before-hand, as One alone is competent to give it, is given, not to gratify curiosity about the future, but as practical wisdom for the wise in heart, that the servants of the Lord may find the path wherein to walk and to serve Him (Rev. i. 1). Exercise of conscience will be needed to understand it, far more than grasp of intellect, and we need not wonder at diverse interpretations. Yet the Lord expects us to be able to see clearly through the veil (Mark iv. 13); and without certainty no application can be safely made: Scripture must first of all be for "doctrine," in order that it may be for "reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness" (2 Tim. iii. 16).

Matthew gives us here seven parables—the usual number indicating completeness. In some sense, surely, they are designed to give us a perfect picture of the Kingdom, but in what sense we are not entitled to decide without examination of the whole series; which is divided by difference of place and audience into four and three, the usual division of a septenary series. Four are spoken to the multitude upon the sea-shore; the last three to the disciples in the house. The numbers concur with the circumstances to lead us to expect in the first four a more external, in the last three a more internal and spiritual view. The explanation of the second parable has its place also with the three.

Sec. 1.

The first four parables also are plainly susceptible of another division. Four is often divided in Scripture into 3+1; and in this way is significant of what is good: the number of the creature (4) resolves itself into the numbers which speak of divine manifestation. On the other hand it may divide into 2x2, which as true division seems generally to have in it an evil significance. The four parables here divide in the latter way: the first two giving individual aspects,—the wheat and the tares; while the last two give us the collective aspect, the seeds gathered, as it were, into one seed; the leaven permeating the meal. We shall see as we go on, the importance of these divisions.

But the character attaching to the whole four parables may first of all be emphasized. The series as a whole has been already spoken of as applying to the Kingdom in its present "mystery" form; but we shall find that in fact only the first four parables develop this,—the fact that it is a Kingdom left to itself,—the King absent. This certainly does not characterize in the same way the last three, inasmuch as in two of them we find the figure of the King Himself. The man who in the one sells all that he has to buy the "field"—if the interpretation of the second parable hold good here ("the field is the world")—can be saying, Behold, the [i]sower went forth to sow; and as he sowed, some [seed] fell by the [j]wayside, and the birds came and devoured them. And some fell on [k]rocky places, where they had not much earth; and forthwith they sprang up, because they had no depth of earth; but when the sun arose, they were scorched, and because they had no root, they withered away. And some fell among [l]thorns; and the thorns grew up and choked them. And some fell upon [m]good ground, and yielded fruit, this a hundredfold, this sixty, this thirty. He that hath ears, let him hear.

[i] Mk. 4. 3–9. Lk. 8. 5–8. [j] ver. 19. [k] vers. 20, 21. [l] ver. 22. [m] ver. 23.

no other than the Lord. And then also the similar action of the merchantman who buys the pearl must surely point out the same blessed Person. Here, then, we are in another line of thought to that of the first four parables. Of course, this waits for confirmation or disproof upon a closer examination.

1. The first two parables are in evident contrast with one another in this respect: in the first we have the various success—as to three parts out of four we must say the ill success of the good seed. In the second we have the enemy and the bad seed. Even thus far, it seems to be a picture of decline that is before us; or at least, the scene in the meanwhile grows darker and not brighter; and the tares remain, we are authoritatively told, until the harvest. But let us now take up the parables in detail.

[1] The Lord goes out of the house and sits by the seaside. He has just declared the principle which carries Him outside of Judaism. The doers of His Father's will are now alone to be His kindred. He leaves therefore the house, the sphere of natural relationship, and takes His place by the sea, the figure of man in the restlessness and barrenness of nature, of man apart from God, and so of the Gentiles. The concourse of the multitude, instead of detaining Him, hastens His departure: He enters into a ship and sits down there—takes His place definitively in separation from them.

He speaks to them indeed from this new place that He has taken, but He speaks in parables. The nation as such is given up to hardness of heart: there is no use in increasing their condemnation by more light. And yet the very addressing them shows that all are not given up. "Blindness in part is happened to Israel:" if there are those who have earnestness of heart to penetrate within the external form they shall find still a gracious heart that beats towards them. The national rejection leaves individual responsibility where it ever is. He that hath an ear, as the Lord tells them, still may hear.

Yet behold, a Sower is going forth to sow; and here is a decisive change. Israel had been God's vineyard planted once and enclosed and nurtured by God's unforgetting love. That had now long been given up: the fence had been taken away; the boar out of the woods had wasted it; the people had long been scattered. Still, though this were so, the end had not then been reached: after seventy years a remnant had been permitted to return to the desolate land, and a "fig-tree" had been "planted in the vineyard" (Luke xiii. 6). But this, too, had now failed to bring forth fruit; if such was to be found, there must be a fresh labor of the husbandman and in fresh fields: the sower must go forth to sow.

There is not now the planting of vines or fig-trees, but what better suits the character of work among the Gentiles,—the broad-cast sowing of seed. Are we not to think also of our Lord's words, "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone" (John xii. 24) and to realize the new form of the gospel which would follow that death of His, now coming so plainly into sight? Its being, as the Lord in His interpretation calls it, "the word of the Kingdom" does not hinder this; for the apostle shows us in the epistle to the

And the disciples came and said to him, Why speakest thou unto them in parables? And he answered and said unto them, Because unto you it is given to know the [n]mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given. For whosoever [o]hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have abundance; but whosoever hath not, even that which he hath shall be taken away from him. Therefore speak I unto them in parables, [p]because seeing they see not, and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand. And in them is fulfilled the [q]prophecy of Esaias, which saith, In hearing ye shall hear, and not understand, and seeing ye shall see, and not perceive: for this people's heart is grown fat, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed, lest at any time they should perceive with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them. But [r]blessed are your eyes for they see, and your ears for they hear. For verily I say unto n Mk. 4. 10, 11. Lk. 8. 9,10.

o ch. 25. 29. Mk. 4. 25. Lk. 8. 18.
p cf. Jno. 7. 16, 17. cf. Jno. 8. 43.
q Is. 6. 9, 10. Mk. 4. 12. Lk. 8. 10. Jno. 12.39-41. Acts 28.25-27.
r Lk. 10. 23, 24. Lk.8.11-15.

Romans (x. 9–13) the gospel of the Kingdom in its present form, as based fully upon the death and resurrection of Christ. Death and resurrection both we have, wherever the seed springs up; and that is what we are called to watch now, where and with what final result the seed springs up. What success in its world-wide sowing is the word of the Kingdom now to have?

We are at once made aware that it is not world-wide success we are to expect from it. First of all, we see in the seed received by the wayside, the hard, unreceptive heart, hardened like the road by the constant traffic of the world, so that the seed never really finds lodgment in it. True, it is said to have been "sown in his heart," and that is a solemn thing. It is what the apostle's words imply, where he speaks of "by manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God" (2 Cor. iv. 2). And yet he goes on immediately to speak of those to whom his gospel is hidden, "in whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of those that believe not, lest the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them." These two things are easily reconcilable, and we can see that the case here is quite similar to the first one in the parable, where the "birds of the air" are interpreted by the Lord as "Satan." In the parable the word has first been sown in the heart: Satan could not prevent that. It has made its appeal to the conscience, commended itself as truth to it, been sown in the heart for acceptance or rejection.* Conscience commends it, but that is not faith; in which always the personal will is concerned. Conviction is not acceptance. The soul may tremble, Felix-like, before the truth, and yet refuse it: the seed after all lies outside; and now comes Satan's work,—the god of this world blinding the minds of those that believe not, Satan catching away that which was sown in the heart, but which the heart has not accepted. Those may well tremble who have not been true to what they could not but recognize as truth: for here Satan has his opportunity with them, and he never fails to use his opportunity. Well he knows what blessedness lies for them, contained in what they so lightly refuse. His business is to prevent their knowing that,—to hide the glory of Christ from those who might be attracted by it.

For Christians also the same principle holds good. For every truth in the word of God has to be accepted thus in the soul or rejected, and we are tested

* Compare Rom. x. 8, 9: "the word is . . . in thy heart: that is, the word of faith which we preach: that if thou . . . shalt believe in thy heart," etc., The "heart" in Scripture is not necessarily the affections, as we generally take it, but the man himself, the real man.

you, that many prophets and righteous men have longed to see what ye behold, and have not seen them, and to hear the things that ye hear and have not heard them.

Hear ye, therefore, the parable of the sower. When any one heareth the word of the kingdom and [s]understandeth it not, the wicked one cometh and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart: this is he that received seed * by the wayside. But he that received seed * upon the rocky places is he who heareth the word and immediately with [t]joy receiveth it; but he has no root in himself, but endureth for a while; and when [u]affliction or persecution cometh on account of the word, immediately he is stumbled. But he that

[s] cf. 1 Cor. 2. 14. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 3, 4.

[t] cf. Is. 58. 2. cf. John 5. 35. cf. Gal. 3. 1. cf. Gal. 5. 7.

[u] cf. Heb. 6. 4–9 with Heb. 10. 34. Acts 14. 22.

* Literally, "is sown."

by it as to how far we also are "of the truth:" "every one that is of the truth heareth" Christ's "voice" (John xviii. 37). Not of mere ignorance, but by the refusal of truth, have all systems of error flourished and been built up. And how few, alas, comparatively are there who have not admitted some darkness into their souls by the lack of perfect absolute uprightness before God in every particular! And in some respect it is always the glory of Christ that is thus hidden. What need have we to be cleansed according to His mind that we may have (as He desires for us) "part with Him."

Here, then, in this first failure of the good seed, the opposition of Satan is manifest. We are at once made aware that it is in a world which lieth in the wicked one that the Kingdom of heaven (in this new phase of it) is to be found. Man's responsibility is carefully maintained; but, alas, he is a fallen being, and manifests himself as such: the world, the flesh, and the devil are but too fully united in opposition to Christ. This may be detected even in the first case: for the heart has rejected the truth, and the world's traffic has hardened the heart, and Satan has only taken away that which was unwelcome. But each element of opposition must be fully shown, and we go on to see other forms of it in the seed upon the rocky ground, and that sown among the thorns.

Rocky ground it is, not stony: bed-rock, with a slight layer of earth over it, in which the seed grows rapidly but superficially, the very cause of its destruction in a little while, operating at first to produce hot-house growth: "forthwith it sprang up because it had no depth of earth;" by and by the sun growing hotter scorched it; and, because it had no root, it withered away.

Here it is the nature of the ground that is at fault. In the case of the wayside hearer it might be urged that circumstances had made him what he was: the traffic over it had made the ground hard. Here it was the nature of the ground itself. The prophet—or rather, God by him—speaks of a "heart of stone" (Ezek. xxxvi. 26); and this, without any question, is exactly pictured here. Yet there is earth also, a superficial susceptibility, which promises largely at the beginning: "he heareth the word, and immediately with joy receiveth it;" this is, as the parable states it, a sign of a lack of depth. There has been no deep conviction, no true repentance: the sentiments are engaged, but not the conscience; and such an one may be warm and enthusiastic, and make rapid progress in the learning of truth; but he has not counted the cost: "when affliction or persecution ariseth because of the word, immediately he is stumbled."

This is the flesh at its fairest; capable of coming so near to the kingdom of God, and all the more manifesting its hopeless nature. There is the unbroken rock behind that never yields itself to the word, and gives it no lodgment; and the class of hearers pictured here are born of the flesh only, and so only flesh. Let things be outwardly favorable to profession, it is plain that the received seed * among thorns is he that heareth the word, and the [v] care of this life † and the deceitfulness of riches choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful. But he that receiveth seed * on the good ground is he who heareth the word and understandeth it, who also heareth [w] fruit and bringeth forth, [x] this one a hundredfold, and another sixty, and another thirty.

[v] cf. ch. 19. 16–26. cf. Lk. 12. 13–21. cf. 2 Tim. 4. 10. cf. 1 Tim. 6. 9, 10.
[w] cf. Phil. 1. 11. cf. Col. 1. 6.
[x] cf. 1 Cor. 15. 41. cf. 2 Cor. 9. 6. cf. ch. 25. 14–29.

* Literally, "is sown."
† αἰῶν, usually "age," but its oldest meaning (in Homer) was "life."

number of these may multiply largely, and may stick like dead leaves to a tree that has no rough blast to shake them off. But life is none the more in them.

There is still a third class of the unfruitful, and in these the influence of the world is paramount. The seed sown among thorns represents those in whom the cares of this life and the deceitfulness of riches choke the Word. Poverty and riches, as Agur long before noted (Prov. xxx. 8, 9), are seen here as alike unfavorable to spiritual life. Yet riches may entice the poor, and care weigh heavily upon the prosperous rich man. The deceitfulness of riches is so great a snare that the Lord has elsewhere said that the rich man could hardly enter into the Kingdom of heaven (Matt. xix. 23). But He expressly guarded this from any implication of its applying to salvation, as if salvation (when men sought that) were different for different classes. Of those who realize their need of salvation there is but one class: "Christ died for sinners" covers every case. But if it be a question of men seeking after it, the more they have to satisfy themselves with here, the less real is eternity likely to appear. How many have had the interest awakening within their souls stopped by such things as these the day will declare.

And so one part alone out of four of the good seed becomes fruitful really. Not, of course, that this is to be taken as numerical proportion. One fears, indeed, that any reckoning in this way would give less satisfactory results rather than more; but we must leave this with Him who "knoweth them that are His." At any rate we know well that the success of the good seed is partial; and with those in whom it does bring forth fruit, there are still various measures of fruitfulness: "one a hundredfold, another sixty, another thirty," says our Lord. The devil, the flesh, and the world, are the unchanging, untiring foes of all that is of God, and the true people of God have no discharge in this life from this war.

In this first parable, then, we see the beginning of the Kingdom to be in the sowing of the word of the Kingdom. The Kingdom is, ideally at least, a kingdom of the truth (John xviii. 37). The subjects are "disciples" (ver. 52). How far the Kingdom being in the hands of men may affect this we have yet to see; but even as we find it already, we find in it unreal disciples as well as true; and this the after-parables confirm. The sphere of the Kingdom is profession, a profession which will be in due time tested by the fruit it bears. There is no undue haste to realize this: the picture is that of a field of growing wheat, as to which the harvest alone can properly decide what the fruit may be; and the harvest itself is not yet spoken of. Manifestly it is a kingdom introduced in a very different way, not merely from any Jewish conception, but from anything that the prophets had announced. Thus it is of the mysteries of the Kingdom that the Lord is speaking. Of the sower himself we do not hear: it is upon the seed that our attention is fixed, and whoever sows that is the sower. Thus it might be the Lord Himself in His work on earth, although the Kingdom does not begin till the end of the Gospel * (xxviii. 18); it might be any one

* Which is probably the reason why this parable does not begin, as the others do, with "The Kingdom of heaven is like"——. The eleventh verse guards against any mistake resulting.

2 (24-30): the enemy and the spurious wheat.

24 Another parable set he before them, saying, The kingdom of heaven is like unto a man who sowed y good seed in his field; but while men z slept, his a enemy came and sowed* b darnel among the wheat, and went away. Now when the blade shot up and produced fruit, then appeared the darnel also. And the servants y cf. 1 Pet. i. 23 with 1 Jno. 3. 9. z cf. Eph. 5. 13-15.

a vers. 36-43.
b cf. Acts 20. 29, 30.

*Literally, "oversowed."

afterwards. In the sense in which the second parable speaks (ver. 37), wherever the good seed is sown, the Sower is the Son of man: personally or by His agents, it is all one sowing.

24 The second parable now shows us the work of the enemy to defeat, as far as he may, the work of Christ. Satan as the prince of the world, which has rejected and cast out the true King, will not receive now His Kingdom; and he is permitted to work without the curb of manifest power to restrain him. It is the "kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ," as the apostle at the beginning of Revelation fittingly reminds us (chap. i. 9); and Satan remains throughout, not only the "prince of this world," but the "god" of it (2 Cor. iv. 4). The expression used in the last passage is, in fact, much stronger than even this: it is "the god of this aion" or "age"; which shows conclusively, therefore, what the "spirit of this age" must be. It shuts out hope of any effectual change of this until the Lord comes and Satan is shut up in that prison (Rev. xx. 1-3), in which so many, who ought to be wiser, suppose him to be already, but which will be then a more effectual restraint than even these can persuade themselves is upon him now.

Yet it is not by persecution of the saints that we see Satan acting in this parable. He has practised this often enough, and always will, as far as he can realize that the time is favorable; but he knows, too, and that by plentiful experience, that the "blood of the martyrs is" apt, at least, to be "the seed of the church," and he has found for his purposes what is a better way. This is the way of imitation, "as Jannes and Jambres," in Egypt long since, "withstood Moses" (2 Tim. iii. 8), counterfeiting God's miracles with lying wonders; and such is his method in the parable before us now.

The good seed has been sown and is growing up: the "word of the Kingdom" preached has developed into "sons of the Kingdom;" so far, we have just what the previous parable has put before us, the effect of the sowing of the good seed only. The work of the enemy cannot be accomplished by sowing seed of the same kind: he sows darnel in the midst of it, and goes his way. Such "oversowing" is to-day in the East a common piece of malice; and darnel is a poisonous kind of rye, which among the Jews was credited with being a degenerate wheat: its grain is black and bitter. Thus it is evident that we have not here false profession merely, but error and its fruit: at first, deceptive and appearing at any rate not very different from the truth, but by and by developing radical opposition. The dissemination of this is accomplished "while men slept," a thing that shows an evil state among the "children of the day," however natural it may be with others (1 Thess. v. 5–7).

Notice that, throughout the New Testament, if the flesh is opposed to the Spirit, and the world to the Father, the devil is the constant enemy of Christ, and the perversion of the Word and the denial of the Person of Christ are his special work. As Christ is the truth and the true Witness, Satan is "a liar, and the father of it" (John viii. 44). The tempter of Christ in the wilderness, he enters into Judas for the betrayal at a later time. He it is who "deceiveth the whole world" (Rev. xii. 9), and who is cast into the bottomless pit to deceive the nations no more until a thousand years are fulfilled. At the end of this time, being let loose, he again goes out as of old to deceive, and is then cast into the lake of fire (Rev. xx. 3, 8, 10).

The "children of the wicked one" in the parable are thus those who are the of the householder came and said to him, Sir, didst thou not sow good seed in thy field? whence, then, hath it darnel? And he said unto them, An enemy hath done this. And the servants say unto him, Wilt thou then that we go and gather it up? But he saith, Nay; lest when ye gather up the darnel, ye root up also the wheat with it. Let [c] both grow together till the harvest, and in the time of harvest I will say unto the offspring of his deception, by whom he seeks to antagonize the truth. And the New-Testament epistles give us plenty of proof of such a state of things already begun a good while before the canon of inspiration was completed. It is not needed to do more than refer to this. They show us how insidiously the "mystery of iniquity" began its work (2 Thess. ii. 7), which, however it might be hindered, would never cease until the "wicked one," energized by Satan, should be destroyed at the appearing of Christ (ver. 8). Thus the darnel would remain until the day of harvest, no human hands being competent to accomplish the separation of Christian profession from it. After many centuries now, we are all clear, whatever may be our standpoint, that this separation in fact never has been attained.

[c] cf. Phil. 3. 18, 19. cf. 1 Cor. 5. 5–13. cf. 2 Thess. 3. 6.

But we must remember, however, that it is of the Kingdom that the parable speaks, and not of the Church or Assembly, of which we have not heard, in fact, as yet. A large mass of Christians make no distinction between these, although here it should be plain that "the field is the world,"—the Kingdom in its present phase, the profession of Christianity in the world, or what men call Christendom; and we have no capacity, authority or responsibility to purify Christendom after this fashion. But, if we are truly Christians, we have responsibility to purge out from our assemblies "all things that offend, and those committing lawlessness," the thing which the angel-reapers alone can do as to the profession at large.

Rome has taken in hand, and insists upon her authority to anticipate the time of harvest; and the state-churches, following her, have feebly and spasmodically attempted the same thing. Necessarily that has followed which the Lord declared: with some darnel, they have rooted up the wheat also, and indeed this most of all. Yet the prohibition, to these Jewish disciples of the Lord, (taught as they were by the Old Testament to expect the kingdom of Messiah to be an open display of judgment upon transgressors,) would naturally be a mystery indeed; and so to those who confound the New with the Old Testament. But the Lord recognizes fully the coming of the judgment. It is only delayed, not set aside. Evil is allowed in the meanwhile to manifest itself: in the time of harvest, He will say unto the reapers, "Gather together first the darnel, and bind it in bundles for the burning; but gather the wheat into my barn."

We shall find that the Lord in His interpretation carries this further: the darnel is actually burnt, and the righteous shine forth as the sun in the Kingdom of their Father. This we must look at in its own place. At present we have only the preparatory work with the darnel, which is bound in bundles with a view to its being burnt; and then the wheat is gathered into the barn. The last is clear enough: it speaks of the removal of the true saints to heaven; but the binding of the darnel in bundles is not so clear. It cannot refer to the associations now so characterizing the days in which we are, except we take the ground that harvest-time has already begun; and indeed it does begin, as is plain, before the saints are taken home. If this were true, it would show the end very nigh. The multiplication of associations, the prevalence of the principle more and more, every one must admit. We should look for it to take a form which would more and more gather the false and shut out the true, while at present true and false are sadly mixed together. With the growth of infidelity, so manifest as it is to-day, this might very quickly result. Even the reapers, [d] Gather together first the darnel, and bind it in bundles for burning; but gather the wheat into my barn.

2. [1] Another parable set he before them, saying, The kingdom of heaven is like a grain of [e] mustard seed, [d] cf. Is. 8. 12. cf. Rev. 3. 17. cf. Rev. 18. 7.

[e] Mk. 4. 30-32. Lk. 13. 18, 19; cf. Acts 1. 15, etc.

2 (31-33): Collective aspects.

[1] (31, 32): In independence.

religious associations are swallowing up the churches, and taking their work into their own hands; and all things move to-day with marvelous rapidity, as the stream grows quicker near the brink of the precipice.

2. The two parables that follow differ strikingly from those that have preceded them, and agree together in this, that we have no longer individuals before us but the mass. In the grain of mustard seed the many grains of the wheat-field are massed together: the "sons of the Kingdom" are no longer seen, nor indeed the "sons of the wicked one," but a general condition,—I believe we may add, resulting from their mixture. The "woman" of the second parable here, the common figure of the professing church, gives us in this the collective aspect, and not the leaven, nor the three measures of meal. This we must examine fully in its place; and as to both parables there has been sufficient disagreement among interpreters to make us look carefully at every step we take. Nor have we as to either of them the help in this way that the Lord gives as to the first two.

All the more thankful we may be, therefore, that the second parable has already carried us on to the time of harvest, mournful as it is to realize that it is thus settled without possibility of successful question, that the evil result of the oversowing of the field of profession with false doctrine never will be repaired,—that the crop, as a crop, is very much spoiled, however much the good wheat still reproduces its own likeness. But this, at least, assures us that the parables to follow cannot alter this: they cannot take away the certainty of the failure of things in man's hands which the whole history of the past declares. We have indeed but shown ourselves all along the road the too faithful imitators of our first parents in the violation of every trust that God has committed to us. One might perhaps have hoped that, with the new power of Christianity, a new history might have begun for man; but, on the contrary, every feature of Israel's history has been reproduced in that of Christendom. It is even a proverb that "history repeats itself." Prophecy and history unite to assure us that as to this Christianity is not an exception to the rest.

[1] The parable of the mustard-seed is similar to those that have gone before it in its being the growth of a living thing that is brought before us, but that which is to be remarked in it now is its disproportionate growth, in which it seems to overstep the limits of its nature. The round seed of the mustard was used proverbially among the Jews for the smallest of things, which it was relatively to the other seeds they sowed. Its development in the East in favorable places is indeed in conspicuous contrast with its growth elsewhere. But the question is raised at once, Is the world, then, a favorable place for the growth of a kingdom "not of this world," and where the devil and the flesh unite with the world in unceasing opposition to it? Either the world must (measurably, at least,) cease to be what it is, or the seed must change in some respects its character, for the Kingdom of heaven to take its place among the kingdoms of the earth: and this is, in fact what the parable shows.

"And the general meaning," says Edersheim, "would be the more easily apprehended, that a tree, whose wide-spreading branches afforded lodgment to the birds of heaven, was a familiar Old Testament figure for a mighty kingdom that gave shelter to the nations. Indeed it is specifically used as an illustration of the Messianic kingdom."

He refers in the first place to Ezek. xxxi. 3–6, where we have the picture drawn by God Himself of the Assyrian power: "Therefore his height was ex-which a man took and sowed in his field; which indeed is less than all seeds, but, when it is grown, it is greater alted above all the trees of the field, and his boughs were multiplied, . . . all the fowls of the heaven made their nests in his boughs, and under his branches did all the beasts of the field bring forth their young, and under his shadow dwelt all great nations." In Daniel we have a similar picture of the Babylonian in Nebuchadnezzar's dream, which is interpreted by the prophet (chap. iv. 20–22): "The tree that thou sawest, which grew and was strong, whose height reached unto the heaven, and the sight thereof to all the earth; whose leaves were fair, and the fruit thereof much, and in it was meat for all; under which the beasts of the field dwelt, and upon whose branches the fowls of the air had their habitation: it is thou, O king, who art grown and become strong; for thy greatness is grown and reacheth unto heaven, and thy dominion to the end of the earth."

The likeness here to the "tree" of the parable cannot surely be doubted: it is a figure of earthly greatness that is pictured. And yet it cannot but be remarked that there is not in the parable after all anything like the greatness of the Assyrian or Babylonian empire. The passage in Ezek. xvii. also, to which Edersheim refers as picturing the Messianic kingdom,—in fact, the resurrection of the house of David in Messiah's day,—still represents a cedar, the stateliest of trees, under which "dwell all fowl of every wing, and in the shadow of the branches thereof shall they dwell." But this speaks of a future time, and a very different dispensation.

The tree of the parable is a garden shrub out-doing itself. It grows into a tree, and the birds of heaven lodge in its branches; but if you look at this as divine increase, it will naturally be asked, why then is there nothing more glorious than this? As growth it is dubious, and the mention of the birds of heaven cannot but remind us that the birds of heaven carried away the good seed in the first parable, and that the Lord's interpretation is, "Then cometh the wicked one." Great Babylon, the figure of a professing Christian body in guilty connection with the kings of the earth, becomes "a cage of every unclean and hateful bird" (Rev. xviii. 2). If we remember that this seed and its development give the Kingdom as a whole, and that the previous parable has shown us a mixed condition in fact, the result of the enemy's work, then the anomalous tree becomes perfectly intelligible. The state of the whole has been affected by this mixture of diverse elements. There has resulted from it what we know as Christendom to-day. Christianity has been more or less assimilated to the principles of the world; the world, in consequence becomes more favorable to the adulterated Christianity. The shrub grows,—overgrows its nature, if you consider what its character is as defined at its first beginning. A people unknown by the world (1 John iii. 1), and strangers in it (1 Pet. ii. 11), followers of One it crucified, and crucified to it by His cross (Gal. vi. 14), not of it, even as He is not of it (John xvii. 14), become a people well-known, honored and at home in it. Nay, they acquire the right to rule, and like their predecessors at Corinth, "reign as kings" (1 Cor. iv. 8), quite without fear of apostolic rebuke for it. Yet after all, the spiritual and political interests can never become so accordant that the tree shall assume the dimensions of full imperial power. The woman may ride the beast, but even so these are diverse. Alas, this political Christianity is more powerful to corrupt the Church than to elevate the world, and she that rides the beast is but a painted harlot. It passes the subtlest imagination to conceive how what is "not of the world" can become of the world and yet retain its character. The birds of the heaven are wiser: they understand their claim upon the abnormal tree for lodgment, and find it there.

The Kingdom is now, in the form it has taken, in independence of its King. To the Corinthians the apostle could say, "Ye have reigned as kings without us:" they were not in communion any longer with men "appointed to death," for their sufferings "a spectacle to the world and to angels and to men." "I than herbs, and becometh a *f*tree, so that the *g*birds of heaven come and lodge in its branches.

[2] (33): the leaven of falsehood.

[2] Another parable spake he unto them, The kingdom

f cf. Ezek. 17. 22-24. cf. Ezek. 31. 3-9. cf. Dan. 4. 20-22. g cf. vers. 4, 19; cf. Rev. 18. 2; cf. Rev. 2. 20.

would to God," he says, "that ye did reign, that we also might reign with you." If the saints reign now, they are still reigning without the apostles. Time can make no difference in this respect, so long as it is still true that all the saints are not reigning together. And that time will not come until the Lord takes His own throne as Son of man,—a human throne that He can share with others. True, He reigns now, but on His Father's throne, which no mere man can ever sit upon (Rev. iii. 21); and He reigns, distinctly, as rejected by the world: "Sit Thou at My right hand, until I make Thy foes Thy footstool" (Ps. cx. 1). Thus the saints cannot reign now, except in unfaithfulness, in independence of their Lord Himself. The tree is thus anomalous, and the condition evil.

[2] A worse thing follows, which clearly connects with what precedes it here: "The Kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened."

Here the explanations ordinarily given are so generally in contradiction to the truth, that it will be well to look at them more particularly before attempting to develop this. Edersheim gives thus briefly the generally accepted view:—

"To this extensive power of the Kingdom [as shown in the Mustard-seed] corresponded its intensive character, whether in the world at large or in the individual. This formed the subject of the last of the parables addressed at that time to the people—that of the Leaven. We need not here resort to ingenious methods of explaining the 'three measures,' or seahs, of meal in which the leaven was hid . . . To mix three measures of meal was common in Biblical, as well as in later times (Gen. xviii. 6; Judg. vi. 19; 1 Sam. i. 24). Nothing further was therefore conveyed than the common process of ordinary, every-day life. And in this, indeed, lies the very point of the parable, that the Kingdom of God, when received within, would seem like leaven hid, but would gradually pervade, assimilate, and transform the whole of our common life."

Alford's view is similar, but he adds:—

"Leaven has its good as well as its bad side, and for that good is used: viz., to make wholesome and fit for use that which would otherwise be heavy and insalubrious. Another striking point of comparison is that leaven, as used ordinarily, is a piece of the leavened loaf put among the new dough, just as the Kingdom of heaven is the renewal of humanity by the righteous Man, Christ Jesus."

Lange still adds:—

"The woman is an apt figure of the Church. Leaven, a substance kindred, yet quite opposed to meal,—having the power of transforming and preserving it, and converting it into bread, thus representing the divine in its relation to, and influence upon, our natural life. One of the main points of the parable is the 'hiding,' or the mixing of the leaven in the three measures of meal. This refers to the great visible Church, in which the living gospel seems, as it were, hidden and lost. It appears as if the gospel were engulfed in the world; but under the regenerating power of Christianity it will at last be seen that the whole world shall be included in the Church."

Trench remarks:—

"In and through the Church the Spirit's work proceeds; only as that dwells in the Church is it able to mingle a nobler element in the mass of humanity, in the world. The woman took the leaven from elsewhere to mingle it with the lump; and even such is the gospel, a kingdom not of this world, not the unfolding of any powers which already existed therein, a kingdom not rising, as the of heaven is like unto [h]leaven, which a [i]woman took and [j]hid in [k]three measures of meal, till the [l]whole was leavened.

[h] cf. Lev. 2. 11. cf. Ex. 12. 15. cf. ch. 16. 6.
[i] cf. Eph. 5. 24; cf. 2 Cor. 11. 2; cf. Rev. 17. 1-6.
[j] cf. ver. 25; cf. Gal. 2. 4; cf. Gal. 3. 1; cf. Eph. 4. 14.
[k] cf. Num. 15. 8, 9 with John 6. 32-35.
[l] cf. 1 Cor. 5. 6; cf. 1 Cor. 15. 33; cf. Gal. 5. 6-9.

secular kingdom, 'out of the earth' (Dan. vii. 17), but a new power brought into the world from above: not a philosophy, but a revelation."

This is a sufficiently full account of the most widely accepted interpretation; and, if not absolutely harmonious in detail, as presented by these different writers, it is still as much so as it would be reasonable to expect, and has in itself a very reasonable appearance. From the Scriptural point of view, however, it must be judged; and it has been often pointed out that in this way there are insurmountable difficulties to our receiving it.

In the first place, it is contrary to the general tenor of the previous parables. After all that has been before us, we do not expect a change so sudden and complete as this seems to involve. If the three measures of meal speak of humanity in general, or the world, the progress of the leaven is distinctly declared to be, "till the whole is leavened." But the other parables, from the very first one, are entirely against this; and the whole witness of prophecy as to the Christian dispensation. To apply it, as some would, simply to the work of regeneration in individuals, destroys in another way its harmony with the series of pictures of which it forms a part, all of which give us the public and general history. "Three measures of meal" seems a strange figure for the world, and the "measure" seems not realizable. Not that this would be a weighty objection with the many who deprecate any particular attention to such minutiæ as they would consider this. For such, a general resemblance is all that one need expect: which would leave in result a large uncertainty of interpretation, and Scripture to the reproach of many unmeaning words.

The signification of "leaven" in every other passage in which it is used is a great difficulty also. The Lord applies it to the "doctrine of the Pharisees and Sadducees" (chap. xvi. 12), and to their hypocrisy (Luke xii. 1). He speaks also of the "leaven of Herod" (Mark viii. 15); the apostle again of the "leaven of malice and wickedness" and of "the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth" (1 Cor. v. 8). Twice we are warned how "a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump" (1 Cor. v. 6; Gal. v. 9). That very piece of old dough which Dean Alford interprets so strangely of the Lord's humanity, the apostle applies in quite another manner, when he bids the Corinthians "purge out, therefore, the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump," and this where he is interpreting the Old Testament feast of unleavened bread in its connection with the passover, and which must remind us how absolutely leaven was to be excluded from every "offering of the Lord made by fire" (Lev. ii. 11).

It will be urged in answer to this that it is the Kingdom of heaven itself which is here compared to leaven, and the Kingdom of heaven cannot be evil. But we have to go no further than these parables themselves to perceive that this objection cannot be sustained. In the very next one, if we interpret in a similar way, the Kingdom is compared to the treasure which a man found, but in that which follows, not to the pearl which corresponds to this, but to the merchantman who seeks it. Evidently, the whole parable it is which is the similitude of the Kingdom, and not separately either treasure or finder: and this is completely confirmed upon examination.*

In this way, too, it will be seen that, while the Kingdom of heaven cannot indeed in itself be evil, it may still be in an evil condition. This series of parables have surely exhibited in it a steady growth of evil, which in that of the mustard seed affects the form which as a whole it takes. We may naturally expect, therefore, to find here this development going on; and if, as Edersheim

* See also chap. xviii. 23; xx. 1.

3 (34, 35): things hidden manifest.

3. All these things spake Jesus unto the multitudes in parables, and without a parable spake he nothing unto and others truly say, the leaven in contrast with the mustard-tree gives us intensive character rather than extensive growth, then we may expect to find this inward character affected now in a way corresponding to the outward form before. And this is in fact the meaning of the leaven: it is an energy, but alas, of evil from without, which transforms the character more and more of what it works upon, and completes the sorrowful picture of decline at which we have been looking. From this point of view also, all the details of the picture assume significance, and give a definiteness of meaning to the whole which vindicates the parable from the reproach of ambiguity or of useless verbiage.

The safest of rules that we can have is to let scripture be the interpreter of scripture. Now, if in carrying this out we ask ourselves, what leaven put into the meal may mean, we are at once reminded of the meat or meat-offering, as to which it is distinctly said (Lev. ii. 11): "No meat-offering which ye shall bring unto the Lord shall be made with leaven: for ye shall burn no leaven . . . in any offering of the Lord made by fire." If then this be the application here, at once we see that the parable falls into line with the previous parables in this that it continues that thought of evil and opposition to the Word which they all more or less exhibit. The woman is doing what the word of God prohibits: she is putting leaven into the meal-offering.

But what, then, is the significance of this? A terrible one indeed: for the meal-offering speaks, as these offerings in general do, of Christ as the food of His people, of which they partake in communion with God (see Lev. ii., notes); and thus we see that to bring in the merely natural thought (whether it be true or not) of the wholesomeness of leavened bread, as Alford does, is most misleading. God insists upon the feast being kept to Him with *un*leavened bread: all mixture with leaven is adulteration; and if the Church, as Trench with Lange and others rightly says, is intended by the woman, then the professing church is here seen as adulterating the pure doctrine of Christ, the bread of life, with impure admixture.

"Three measures of meal:" does that add nothing to the significance? Is it merely, as Edersheim says, the usual quantity, and is that what his texts suggest? Not, surely, to one who is accustomed to see the New Testament in the Old, and to read the histories contained in it, as the apostle does that of Abraham (Gal. iv.) as types and prophecies of spiritual things. In this way it is most instructive to observe that Gideon's ephah of flour, which is the equivalent of "three measures" was offered to the Lord; and that Hannah likewise brought her ephah to the house of the Lord in Shiloh. The third case he adduces (and the only other) is still more in point: for Abraham's food with which he entertains his heavenly visitants was undoubtedly overruled, at least, to show us again Christ in His Person and work (three measures of fine meal and the calf—life sacrificed) as the means of communion between heaven and earth.* "Three measures" are the full divine measure, God in manifestation, and that is the right measure surely of the true Meat-offering, the Man Christ Jesus.

How all this brings out what is before us! Christ, the bread of life, is what the professing church has had entrusted to her for her own sustenance and for the blessing of others. The doctrine of Christ is her most precious deposit, and the maintaining this in purity her great responsibility. Alas, she has adulterated it with leaven: the Lord's own explanation of this as "the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees" and the "leaven of Herod," remains still for us in Christian times as wherewith to interpret His parable of the Kingdom. Formalism, ritualism, rationalism, the corrupting tendencies of world-pandering them: so that that was [m]fulfilled which was spoken through the prophet, saying, I will open my mouth in parables: I will utter things that have been hidden from the foundation of the world.

*These are not random or fragmentary applications, but have their place in a history completely significant throughout, in which by the significance of the whole each part is certified (see Gen. xviii. notes).

[m] Ps. 78. 2.

Herodianism, have all had their share in perverting the precious doctrine of Christ. And here distinctly the "woman's" form appears in that which Scripture itself stamps as "the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth" (Rev. xvii.), she who, claiming to be emphatically the "CHURCH," at the same time assumes the power of adding to it her own authoritative interpretations. Doubtless she is not alone in this: others have followed her more or less distinctly, in claiming to give the "voice of the church," whether in the "catholic" or some lesser form. In whatever way this may be done it is an intrusion upon Christ's office as the only "Master* and Lord;" and wherever it is done, some kindred evil will spring out of it. Christ's voice, and that alone, must be authoritative for the soul.

The leaven is leavening the whole lump. No doubt, there is a present hindrance to this in the power of the Spirit working, and as long as the present purpose of God is not complete, the lump as a whole cannot be leavened. God will preserve His truth, which never has been as a whole allowed to be in the woman's hands to be leavened. Once let the true Church be removed, the truth of God will be removed with it, and the leaven of falsehood do its fatal work upon all that is left.

3. With this the parables spoken to the multitude are ended; and except in parables He did not speak to them. The prophet's word was being fulfilled in Him (Ps. lxxviii. 2): He was taking the place of another Asaph, to speak of things more deeply hidden than those of which Asaph spoke. The psalmist's words therefore are not exactly but freely quoted: his deep things were contained in a past history, the meaning of which it is given to him to utter; Christ's in a history of things to come, but which mournfully reflect in their general lesson that older story of another people. Alas, man's history does repeat itself: now, however, it was of a state of "things hidden from the foundation of the world"—of which the prophets of the Old Testament themselves knew nothing.

Sec. 2.

The Lord now leaves the multitude and goes into the house: the audience is changed, and He is now with His disciples only, and able to speak out. He does now give them the explanation of the parable of the darnel, carrying it further also than the parable itself had done. But to this he adds three other parables, the third of which He partially explains, but not the others. We are left to spiritual apprehension to discern these.

Between these last three and the first four we shall find the difference which the numbers indicate. Four is the number of the world, and they are spoken in the world—before the multitude. We find in them, in fact, what we can see to be the external aspect of things,—the Kingdom in the form which it has taken manifestly, even though those who see it may discern little of its import. In what is said to the disciples in the house we shall find what is for those of the present time only spiritually discerned,—what is not public fact, but either lies beyond Christian times, or else is of such a nature as only to be understood by those who have learned it from God, from His word. It is faith's view, then, that we now are to be occupied with, and it need not be a strange thing to us to find that we have very different interpretations to consider, and which it will be necessary to consider seriously, before we shall be entitled to speak with conviction upon the subject.

[1] But first of all we have what is itself an explanation. The interpretation of the parable of the darnel finds its place with the last three parables, and for this

* "Teacher" (John xiii. 13).

SECTION 2. (36–52.)
Faith's view.

1 (36–43): the beginning of the reign of righteousness.

[1] Then, having sent the [n] multitudes away, he went into the house; and his disciples came and said unto him, [o] Explain unto us the parable of the darnel of the field. And he answered and said, He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man; and the field is the world, and the good seed, these are the sons of the kingdom; and the darnel are the sons of the evil one; and the enemy that sowed it is the devil; and the harvest is the [p] completion of the age, and the reapers are angels. As then the darnel is gathered and burned in the fire, so shall it be at the completion of the age. The Son of man shall send his angels, and they shall [q] gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and those committing lawlessness, and shall cast them into the furnace of fire; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the [r] righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. He that hath ears let him hear.

n ver. 2. cf. Lk. 10. 23, 24.
o Mk. 4. 13, 33, 34.
p cf. ch. 24. 3, etc.
q cf. Lk. 17. 26–37.
r cf. Col. 3. 4. cf. 2 Thess. 1. 5–10.

there must be some special reason. It would not be enough to say, it is an interpretation; for the Lord had before this explained that of the sower apart to His disciples, without reserving it for the after-teaching in the house. The true reason seems to be in that which is manifest in it, that it goes beyond the parable itself, and therefore beyond the end of the Christian form of the Kingdom of heaven. It presents, therefore, what must be to us as long as we are down here a matter of faith simply: and thus it comes into the second section here, and finds its place with the last three parables.

The parable ends with the gathering of the wheat into the barn. The saints of the present are removed, while the darnel, the fruit of Satan's sowing, is left in the field—in the world; bound in bundles for the burning, but not burnt. It is noticeable that there is nothing else but this mentioned now. There are no mere lifeless professors, but only the followers of false doctrine,—the reason for which is an unspeakably solemn one, as explained by the apostle in the second epistle to the Thessalonians: the mere professors will be swept off by that "strong delusion" which will come with the apostasy of the last days upon all that "have not received the love of the truth that they might be saved" (ii. 7–12). The public judgment here is upon those in manifest rebellion, not upon what is hidden but what is manifest. The words in the epistle are decisive as to this.

It is with what takes place after the saints are taken home that the interpretation of the parable has mainly to do: "As then the darnel is gathered and burned in the fire, so shall it be at the completion of the age. The Son of man shall send His angels, and they shall gather out of His Kingdom"—it is now His Kingdom, He is not simply sitting on the Father's throne—"all things that offend, and those committing lawlessness, and shall cast them into the furnace of fire: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the Kingdom of their Father."

Notice the contrast: the Kingdom of the Son of man below, the Kingdom of the Father above: the righteous reign in the Kingdom of the Son of man; they shine in the Kingdom of their Father. The Sun of righteousness is risen upon the earth; and this is why the righteous shine as the Sun: they are with Him, sharers of His glory; not suns—central, independent orbs,—but lustrous with the glory put upon them. But this carries us, as is plain, beyond the present form of the Kingdom, as also we shall find the parable of the net does. For us,

[2] (44): preserved and reserved.

[2] Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto [s]treasure hid in the [t]field, which a man having found, hath hid, to whom all these parables of the Kingdom belong, it is a matter of faith alone. The numerical symbolism stamps this, I doubt not, as what it so plainly is, the beginning of the reign of righteousness.

[s] cf. Ex. 19. 5. cf. Deut. 4. 20. [t] cf. Deut. 32. 8, 9, 10; cf. ver. 38.

[2] We come now to two parables which ought, by their evident likeness to one another, to render mutual help in their interpretation — the parables of the treasure and the pearl. They are commonly understood by Christians as portraying in somewhat different ways the value of Christianity or of Christian blessings, and the need of sacrificing all else in order to secure them. But we must take them separately.

"Again, the Kingdom of heaven is like unto treasure hid in the field, which a man having found hath hid, and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field."

An old note of Luther gives what is still the common view: "The hidden treasure is the gospel, which bestows upon us all the riches of free grace, without any merit of our own. Hence also the joy when it is found, and which consists in a good and happy conscience, that cannot be obtained by works. The gospel is likewise the pearl of great price."

"True Christianity," says Lange, "is ever again like an unexpected discovery, even in the ancient Church: the best possession we can find, a gift of free grace. Every one must find and discover Christianity for himself. In order to secure possession, even of what we have found without any merit of our own, we must be willing to sacrifice all; for salvation, though entirely of free grace, requires the fullest self-surrender."

He is naturally perplexed, however, about the purchase of the field, to get the treasure. His solution of the difficulty is so strange that it can only be of value as showing to what strange methods people have to resort to interpret consistently: "If 'the field' refers to external worldly ecclesiasticism, the expression might mean that we were not to carry the treasure out of the visible Church, as if we were stealing it away, but that we should purchase the field in order to have full title to the possession hid in it. Accordingly it would apply against sectarianism." It is hardly worth while to go further.

In fact the interpretation is scarcely scriptural in any part. A man like Luther may speak of "buying" the riches of free grace, and so, no doubt, does Scripture; but it never speaks of selling all that one has to do it. God says rather, "Come ye, buy wine and milk without money and without price." And the Lord does indeed say, "Whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be My disciple" (Luke xiv. 33); but He has taught us elsewhere how to understand all such expressions, and that the would-be disciple does not by this "buy" the grace of God, but must receive that grace first to enable for such whole-hearted discipleship. Not "whosoever will lose his life," in order to find it, but he who does so "for My sake, shall find it" (chap. xvi. 25). For "though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not love, it profiteth me nothing" (1 Cor. xiii. 3). Love must be the motive power, or there is nothing that can count; but then we cannot love in order to gain for ourselves by it: there is but one way of acquiring it, and that is, as flame lights flame. So love alone kindles love: "we love Him, because He first loved us" (1 Jno. iv. 19).

To sell all that one has to buy the free grace of God is not according to the gospel: that alone wrecks this interpretation; but, if we inquire further, What is the "field" that is bought to get the treasure? the Lord has Himself answered, not with Dr. Lange that it is "external worldly ecclesiasticism"—a strange thing indeed to buy at such a cost!—but the "world," simply the world. That is the field in which the Word is sown, clearly; ecclesiasticism may spring up in it, but only after the sowing, and must always be a very different thing.

and for joy thereof goeth and [u]selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field.

[u] cf. Is.53.4-10. cf. Ps. 22. 1. cf. 2Cor.8.9.

But, if "the field is the world," are we to sell all we have to buy the world, to find the gospel in it? That is mere absurdity, of course.

This interpretation breaking down, then, it only remains to reverse the order of thought, and find in it the Saviour seeking the sinner, instead of the sinner seeking the Saviour. Divine love is first and worthiest: and then how the central figure here shines out! HE went and sold all that He had—"emptied Himself," as the word in Philippians literally is (ii. 7, R. V.): "though He was rich, yet for our sakes He became poor, that we through His poverty might become rich" (2 Cor. viii. 9). Texts are easy enough to find in this direction, and simple enough, too, in application. Here is a view of the Kingdom which lies outside of the range of the first four parables, as the continuation of the second parable does, but antecedent, not consequent to them. But it is the foundation upon which all rests, and which could not be omitted from faith's view of things. It is the fundamental view of the Kingdom itself, and now its being the field of the world that He buys, instead of being out of place, or difficult to understand, is most exactly accordant and most perfectly intelligible. "Even denying the Lord that bought them" is said of those who bring in "damnable heresies," and bring upon themselves swift destruction (2 Pet. ii. 1). They are not, therefore, of His redeemed (for redemption involves the forgiveness of sins, (Eph. i. 7,) and is much more than purchase); nor of the treasure, therefore, for which He buys the field; but they are purchased, as all the world is purchased, and He is Lord over them: the word used here being not the usual title of authority, but "despot" (δεσπότης), "owner."

The world, then, belongs to Him, and the treasure He has found in it, and for which He buys it, must be His people, who are therefore His purchased ones, the people of His possession (Acts xx. 28; 1 Pet. ii. 9, Gk.). Yet there are still points of difficulty about this parable, if we apply it to Christians now, as is usual and natural with those who accept the interpretation which we must believe to be the true one. For, according to this view, neither the (implied) first hiding, nor the finding, nor the re-hiding of the treasure is accounted for, and even the buying of the field does not seem fully explained, though the meaning of it in itself is clear enough. But beyond all this the parable that follows it, so similar, and which yet cannot be so close a repetition of it as it appears, needs explanation. We must go on, therefore, to this and compare the two together, before we can get a satisfactory view of the whole matter.

[3] Here "the Kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchantman, seeking goodly pearls; and when he had found one pearl of great price, he went and sold all that he had, and bought it."

Such interpretations as those of Lange need not long detain us, since they are but slight variations of what we have, in the case of the former parable, already rejected. "The following points," says Lange, "are plain: he who obtains the Kingdom of heaven is no longer represented, merely as a fortunate finder, but at the same time as an untiring searcher. He is consciously seeking and striving after goodly pearls, or precious spiritual goods. At the same time what was formerly described as a treasure is now characterized as a pearl of great price: it is presented in a concentrated form as the one thing needful, bright and glorious in its appearance,—i. e., the person of Christ and life in Him, are now all in all. Accordingly, all former possessions are readily surrendered." Surely, one would not expect two parables to present things no wider apart than these; and the buying of Christ after this manner is an unscriptural thought. If we have had to refuse, moreover, the similar interpretation of the treasure, the parallel features in the two forbid our acceptance of dissimilar explanations for them. If Christ be the Finder of the one parable, He must be also the Seeker in the other.

But why, then, the two parables? If Christ be the central Figure in each [3] (45, 46): His own and for His glory.

[3] Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchantman, [n] seeking goodly pearls; and when he had case, there must be surely difference as to the object before Him; but the general thought of those who accept this view is that it is only one and the same object, though differently presented: "'The parable of the hidden treasure,' it is said, 'did not sufficiently convey what the saints are to Christ. For the treasure might consist of a hundred thousand pieces of gold and silver. And how would this mark the blessedness and beauty of the Church? The merchantman finds "one pearl of great price." The Lord does not see merely the preciousness of the saints, but the unity and heavenly beauty of the assembly. Every saint is precious to Christ; but He "loved the Church and gave Himself for it."'"

[n] cf. Lk. 19. 10. cf. Jno. 15. 16.

This, however, does not adequately distinguish between the two parables, and indeed passes over entirely some of the most conspicuous differences between them. One cannot understand, if this be all, why the "pearl" should not by itself suffice for both.

That the pearl is the Church is indeed capable of fullest demonstration. If, then, the Church, the heavenly object, be pictured in the second parable, does not this naturally raise the question whether the "treasure hid in the field" of the world is not intended to mark a contrast in this respect? If so, and in connection with the Kingdom of heaven, our thoughts are at once directed to Israel as brought before us in the treasure. Let us examine the possibility of such an application, and see whether it may not help us with regard to some of the otherwise unexplained differences between the two parables.

We have seen that the Kingdom was first announced to Israel. But they rejected the King, and on this account it passed from them. This is, no doubt, why the thought of Israel being before us here has not been more frankly entertained. The parables are "mysteries" of the Kingdom; but is not Israel's rejection from that which according to Old Testament prophecy belongs to her (and which shall be yet hers in a day to come) part of these very mysteries? The words of the apostle of the Gentiles seem to be clearly in the affirmative with regard to this. He says: "For I would not have you to be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits, that blindness in part is happened unto Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in" (Rom. xi. 25). Thus he names the very thing which has caused the rejection of Israel for the present time as among the mysteries of this time. Is it not, then, antecedently probable enough that among these parables Israel's relation to the Kingdom should be found to have a place?

When we look at the parable again, we cannot but be confirmed in this. To Israel it was promised that if they obeyed Jehovah's voice, and kept His covenant, then they should be a peculiar treasure unto Him above all people (Ex. xix. 5); and the psalmist would wake up their praise by the recollection that "Jehovah hath chosen Jacob for Himself, and Israel for His peculiar treasure" (Ps. cxxxv. 4). Yet when the Lord came to His own this treasure as such was hid in the field of the world,—as it were, lost among the nations. He discovered it, but could not possess Himself of it. He must first purchase it as at the cross, where Caiaphas' unconscious prophecy declared He would "die for the nation" (John xi. 51). We see also why the field must be bought: it is in the world that Israel is yet to be displayed as Jehovah's treasure. But the purchase being made, there is nothing further done as to possession: here the parable stops; the end of this belongs not to the "mysteries;" and in the meanwhile another purpose comes into sight, and is the very thing of which the next parable certainly bears witness.

Thus the interpretation in this way fairly and fully unlocks the whole parable; and a scriptural interpretation which does this must needs be the true one; for if not,—if two interpretations, equally consistent, could be given of the same words, then the words would not distinguish, would be defective in found "one pearl of great price, he went and sold all that he had, and bought it. w cf. Eph. 5. 25-27. cf. Rev. 21. 21.

significance, as the Lord's words could not be. We would have no means of discerning between the true and the false: a conclusion which would be the destruction of the power and authority of Scripture: for that whose meaning cannot be known ceases by that fact to have authority.

In the pearl of great price it is no wonder that Christians should imagine the Lord to be intended. But it is the Church which is thus spoken of, and its preciousness is not only insisted on, but in measure explained also. Its value is estimated by One who knows fully what it is He values. It is now not merely a man who finds, but a merchant who is seeking goodly pearls. The thing he finds he is in pursuit of, and with the practised eye of the skilled observer. Notice, too, that it is intimated that there are other pearls. This is one, however, whose value is such that, having found it, he will sell all he has to buy it.

But what is a pearl? It is, first of all, the product of a living being: it is the only jewel, as far as I am aware, that is so; and this is the first thing, surely, that we are intended to realize in it.

A pearl is the result of injury done to the animal that produces it. Its material is the nacre, as it is called, or "mother of pearl," which lines the interior of the shell, and which is renewed by it as often as injured or worn away. A particle of sand getting between the animal and the shell, the irritation causes a deposit of nacre upon it, which goes on being deposited, layer after layer, till a pearl is formed. But "completely spherical pearls"—and these are the valuable ones—"can only be formed loose in the muscle or soft parts of the animal. The Chinese obtain them artificially by introducing into the living mussel foreign substances, such as pieces of mother of pearl fixed to wires, which thus become coated with a more brilliant material."

The pearl is thus, as we may say, an answer to an injury; and it is the offending object that becomes, through the work of the injured one, a precious and beauteous gem. It is clothed with a comeliness put upon it, as the objects of divine grace are, with the beauty and glory of Him we crucified! It is in truth nothing else that He sought in coming among us but objects of divine grace.

Between a common pearl and one of great price, the difference is only of degree. The size and brilliancy depend, not upon the grain of sand which may be inwrapped, but upon the number of layers of nacre which inwrap it. The greatness of the grace bestowed is the distinguishing feature in what is here. Different bestowals of grace there are, and Scripture asserts this in the fullest way. The calling of Israel is not that of the Church, which is Christ's body; and though the departed saints of former dispensations will plainly be in heaven as we shall be, Scripture again makes a difference between "the Church of the first-born ones whose names are written in heaven," (Israel being the first-born upon earth) and the "spirits of just men made perfect" (Heb. xii. 23). God is going "in the ages to come to show the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness toward us through Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 7).

Israel may be the treasure in the field, but the pearl speaks of personal adornment. Christ will have the Church in heaven with Himself, putting in the highest place what is to show most conspicuously the glory of His grace. It is one pearl; as the body of Christ is one. There cannot be, it is evident, another body of Christ. The "fullness" or complement "of Him that filleth all in all" admits of no other.

The treasure and the pearl both speak of what is faith's view as to the Kingdom, not the external view presented in the first four parables. In the treasure we find Israel preserved for blessing, but reserved, they having in the meanwhile rejected the only possible way in which it could be theirs. In the pearl we have that in which, during this reservation, the purpose of God as to the Church comes out. It is the first expression of it, and as yet we do not realize [4] (47-52): the mercy to the world.

[4] Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a draw-net, cast into the [x] sea, and gathering of every kind: which when it was filled, they drew to shore and sat down and [y] gathered the good into vessels and cast the worthless away. So shall it be at the completion of the age: the angels shall go forth, and separate the wicked from among the righteous, and shall cast them into the [z] furnace of fire: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

[Jesus saith unto them],* Have ye [a] understood all these things? They say unto him, Yea, Lord. And he said unto them, Therefore every scribe who is made a [b] disciple of the kingdom of heaven is like unto a householder that bringeth out of his treasure things [c] new and old.

[x] cf. Rev. 17. 15 with Gen. 1. 20-23.
[y] cf. ch. 25. 31-46.
[z] cf. Rev. 19. 20. ver. 42.
[a] cf. Jno. 16. 25-30.
[b] cf. ch. 11. 11.
[c] cf. Eph. 3. 3-5. cf. Song 7. 13.

* Omitted by some.

just what it is: as the "assembly which is His body," or even as "the house of God," it is not yet mentioned, but as people for Himself, destined to display His glory—the glory of His grace: heavenly, therefore, not earthly, the earthly promises being Israel's still. The revelation will, of course, become fuller as we go on. The light increases to the perfect day.

[4] Israel comes no more into this picture: all has been said about it that needs. The rest is told fully in the Old Testament prophets. What we have in the last parable here concerns neither Israel nor the Church, as is plain by the interpretation which our Lord Himself gives: it is the mercy to the Gentiles, after the purpose of God as to the Church is complete. A new gathering now begins with the net cast into the sea, the figure of the Gentile nations. It gathers of every kind, and is then drawn to shore, and the sorting of the good from the bad is by angel-hands alone. This is at the completion of the age, and while coincident with the final harvesting of the wheat-field, is a different thing from it. To the present time it cannot apply: the putting the fish into denominational vessels, as some have applied it, is not a possible thought here: for we are not in the "completion of the age,"* which is, as our Lord explains, the time of harvest; and the sorting in this case is not by human but angelic hands.

The net applies to the going out of the "everlasting gospel," as in Rev. xiv. 6, 7, after the Church is removed to heaven, and where the terms of it show at once the difference between it and the gospel at the present time. We cannot say, "Fear God and give glory to Him, for the hour of His judgment is come," and on the other hand the grace which it is ours to proclaim is infinitely fuller. The issue of what is here is, no doubt, seen in the separative judgment of the living, when the Lord appears, as shown forth in the "sheep" and "goats" of the twenty-fifth chapter. In the wheat-field of Christendom there will be at the end no separation of the wicked from among the righteous, but the righteous will be gathered first of all, and removed to heaven; after which nothing but the darnel will remain to be gathered and burnt. With the fish here and the sheep and goats in the later chapter, there is a true judicial separation of the "sheep from the goats," the wicked departing into everlasting fire, and the righteous left for blessing upon earth under the "Shepherd" rule of the Son of man now come.

This is the end of the parables of the Kingdom; and the Lord's words that follow to His disciples are self-evident in their application to them. New things have been declared and put in connection with the old; all the latter part being

* The full explanation of this term will be given in the notes on the twenty-fourth chapter, where the whole prophecy relates to it. The "end of the world" is a wrong translation.

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chap. xiii. 53–xiv.)
Features of a day of rejection.

1 (xiii. 53–xiv. 12): Men alike in rejecting.
1 (xiii. 53–58): the pride that refuses conviction.

1. [1] And it came to pass, when Jesus had finished these parables, he departed thence. And coming into his [d]own country, he taught them in their synagogue, so that they were [e]astonished and said, Whence hath this [man] this wisdom and these works of power? Is not this the [f]carpenter's son? is not his mother called Mary, and his brethren James and Joseph and Simon and Judas? and his sisters, are they not all with us? whence hath this [man], then, all these things? And they were [g]offended at him. But Jesus said unto [d] cf. ch. 2. 23. Mk. 6. 1-6. Lk. 4. 16-30.

[e] cf. Jno. 7. 15.
[f] Jno. 6. 42. cf. Jno. 7. 41, 48, 52. cf. Is. 49. 7.
[g] cf. 1 Cor. 1. 22, 23. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 7, 8.

such an adjustment. The scribe of the old dispensation, becoming now the disciple of the new, is brought into the fullness of the whole revelation of God.

SUBD. 2.

We return now to the personal history of the Lord, but to find in it also the foreshadow of such things as the parables have put before us. The fact of His rejection by man is now a governing thought; and this involves rejection for His people, and a path in separation from a world in estrangement from Him. This is especially what characterises the next portion of the Gospel which developes for us the features of a day of rejection, but in which grace still works, and finds among men not its objects only but its instruments. But the world is at the same time on the one hand a desert, on the other a stormy sea. Soon He Himself also is absent, and His disciples are left in the darkness, toiling over the waters in the face of the adverse wind. But again there is a change: He is coming back to them over the waters; and faith, discerning Him and seeking to be with Him, is fain to leave the boat and at His invitation walk upon the waters too to go to Him. Here the Church's path is clearly presented to us, the boat imaging the position of that remnant of Israel which as to their hopes the disciples were, when He went away, and to which (accompanied by His heavenly people) He will again return. Then the wind ceases, and the boat having reached the shore, mercy flows out to men far and wide as it will in millennial days. Let us now seek to apprehend this in detail.

1. First of all, we have a two-fold witness to His rejection. All classes of men are concerned in this: for the reception of Christ alike wounds their pride and opposes their lust; and thus Christ Himself and he who would prepare His way must share together.

[1] First, Nazareth rejects Him,—the place where He had been so long, and where the glory of a life to which all else was darkness had shone before their eyes. They have perforce to own His wisdom and His mighty work; but what right has He to them? They know His mother and His kindred; and these suggest no such greatness. They ought surely to have argued therefore that all this in Him was not natural but supernatural—that there was more in Him than nature could account for: but no! they will rather discredit what they see and know, than accept such things from a carpenter's son. Divine power must not work without human credentials. The root is out of a dry ground: the plant may be anything you please, but it is a sufficient condemnation of it that the ground is dry.

That was His glory for which they despised Him. He was no creature of His circumstances; He derived not from man, He received no honor from him. Nor could He thus, on His part, put honor on man, nor accredit him who had fallen away from God. He could serve, and for this come into the lowest place, when from man He could not accept the highest. Those who had not judged aright the world or themselves, could not judge Him aright. And still the proverb holds that a prophet may be in honor anywhere rather than among those who them, A [h]prophet is not without honor, save in his country and in his house. And he did not many mighty works there [i]because of their unbelief.

[2] (xiv. 1-12): the opposition to men's lusts awakening enmity.

[2] At that time, Herod the tetrach [j]heard the report concerning Jesus; and he said unto his servants, This is John the Baptist: he is risen from the dead, and therefore do these powers put forth energy in him. For Herod had [k]laid hold on John and bound him, and put him out of the way in prison, because of Herodias his brother Philip's wife: for John said unto him, It is not lawful for thee to have her. And when he would have killed him, he [l]feared the multitude, because they held him for a prophet. But when Herod's birthday came,* the daughter of Herodias [m]danced in the midst, and pleased Herod; whereupon he promised with an [n]oath to give her whatsoever she might ask. But she, being incited by her mother, said, Give me here upon a dish the head of John the Baptist. And though the king was [o]grieved, [yet] on account of his oaths and those at table with him, he commanded it to be given. And he sent and [p]beheaded John in prison; and his head was brought upon a dish and given to the damsel, and she bare it to her mother. And his disciples came and took away the corpse, and buried it, and went and [q]brought word to Jesus.

* Or, "was kept:" a difference of reading.

[h] Jno. 4. 44. cf. 2 Ki. 5. 8.

[i] cf. ch. 17. 19, 20.

[j] Mk. 6. 14-29. Lk. 9. 7-9.

[k] Lk. 3. 19, 20. cf. Acts 7. 51-54.

[l] cf. ch. 21. 26.

[m] cf. Gen. 27. 1-5. cf. Dan. 3. 5. cf. 1 S. 5. 11, 12.

[n] cf. ch. 5. 33-37.

[o] cf. Prov. 29. 25. cf. Lk. 18. 23.

[p] cf. Acts 7. 52.

[q] cf. Jno. 1. 35-37. cf. Jno. 11. 21.

know him in his earthly relations best. Did not this for long dim the eyes even of His brethren (John vii. 5)? and does not its influence appear even in the tender solicitude of His mother?

So Nazareth shuts itself out from the blessing which was ready to be poured out upon them: "He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief."

[2] Prince and people were alike in this; and now we hear of the murder of the Baptist at the hands of the licentious Herod. Conscience he has, enough to trouble him; religion enough to bind him to the abominable wickedness in which he is ensnared by the evil influences to which he has already surrendered himself. The spirit of uncleanness is quite ready to take to himself other spirits more wicked than himself, and with the key of the house in his hand, it is too late to shut the door upon them. Scrupulous the adulterer may be as to his oath, and for his honor before those who are at table with him,—the poor remains of honor which are so apt to increase in value in proportion to the little left. So the death of the prophet is cheaply purchased by the dance of a light girl, and the king's oath is kept inviolate. What a world it is in every view that can be taken of it, whether in its pleasures, its morals, or its underlying passions and malignities! In such a world what an honor to be persecuted! what a reproach to be in esteem! The Spirit of God sums it up morally thus: "All that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life," and adds that "it is not of the Father" (1 John ii. 16). The Father has been seen and hated in the Son (John xv. 23, 24).

2. The Lord accepts the news of the Baptist's murder as His own rejection. He withdraws into a desert place apart; but those who are drawn to Him by their necessities flock after Him still, and He cannot withdraw Himself from the need which appeals to Him. The wilderness thus becomes a place of plenteous provision, and the Lord's grace and power are manifest for all that come.

2 (xiv. 13-21): Ministry in the place of rejection.

2. But when Jesus heard it, he [r]withdrew from thence by ship into a desert place apart; and when the multitudes heard it, they followed him on foot out of the cities. And he went out and saw a great multitude, and had [s]compassion on them, and healed their infirm. And when even was come, the disciples came to him, saying, The place is desert, and the time already gone by; dismiss the multitudes, that they may go into the villages and buy themselves food. But Jesus said unto them, They have no need to go away: [t]give ye them to eat. But they say unto him, We have here but [u]five loaves and two fishes. And he said, Bring them hither to [v]me. And he commanded the multitudes to recline upon the grass, and taking the five loaves and the two fishes, he looked up to heaven, and [w]blessed and brake, and gave the loaves to his [x]disciples, and the disciples to the multitudes. And all ate, r ch. 12. 15. Mk. 6. 32-46. Lk. 9. 10-17.

s ch. 9. 36.
t cf. ch. 10. 8. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 5, 6.
u Jno. 6. 1-14. cf. 1 Cor. 14. 19. cf. Ex. 4. 2.
v cf. ch. 17. 17. cf. 1 Ki. 17. 8-16.
w Jno. 6. 23. cf. Jno. 11. 41, 42. cf. 1 Cor. 11. 24.
x ver. 16.

He heals all the infirm among them; and as night comes on, and the disciples remind Him of the need of the multitude there in a desert place, He casts them for all this upon the disciples themselves: "They have no need to go away," He says, "give ye them to eat." But they do not realize what this implies, and that they can avail themselves of His power for ministry such as this. They have but five loaves and two fishes: how plainly we may read ourselves in them! What use to put such a pitiful morsel even into His hand to satisfy so many with! But He does not disdain it, or set it aside, to work independently. If a miracle were in His mind, this might seem more worthy of Him; but on the contrary He will rather lower the miracle than set aside those whom He would identify with Himself and use in service. They are to find the little that they have, enough, if but His blessing be with it; and so are we.

But they are to bring it to Him first, and to receive it from Him; and then He bids the multitude recline upon the grass: His way is to give rest and then refreshment. Then He blesses and breaks, and puts it back into His disciples' hands to distribute; and they distribute it all; and there is more than enough for all the multitude. How good to know that out of that insignificant quantity there is positively enough for every one there; yea, and more than enough: "twelve handbaskets full of fragments that remained" over and above all that had been eaten! Thus there is actually more left than they had had at the beginning; and this is constantly the way of spiritual increase, scattering and yet increasing. Would that we all and always remembered it:—the responsibility of the possession of whatever ministers to the need of man, but above all, of that which ministers to what is truly life,—and then the gain resulting. Every particle of truth we have, brings with it corresponding responsibility, proportionate privilege, and opportunity of greater gain. "To him that hath shall more be given, and he shall have abundantly; and from him that hath not, even that which he hath"—hath and hath not, hath as if he had it not, without practical use or advantage—"shall be taken away."

Such grace was still going forth in Israel: the power of Jehovah was manifesting itself among them, to "satisfy her poor with bread" (Ps. cxxxii. 15). The twelve baskets full may point to the resources of power for them in the presence among them of their King; the five thousand men, the responsibility of such realized capabilities (5×10^3), which yet unbelief might make of no effect. And this is in fact the result. The stream of grace that was flowing then could not, indeed, be dammed back by all that unbelief could do, but it might be forced to flow in other channels; and this was in fact the result. The Gospel of John and were filled; and they took up of the fragments that [y]remained twelve hand-baskets full. And those that ate were about five thousand men, besides women and children.

[y] cf. 2 Ki. 4. 1-7, 42-44. cf. ch. 15. 37.

3 (xiv. 22-33): separation by the apprehension of the Lord.

3. And immediately he compelled his disciples to go on board ship, and go before him to the other side, until he should send the multitudes away. And when he had sent the multitudes away, he went up into the [z]mountain apart to pray; and when even was come, he was there alone. But the ship was already in the midst of the sea, [a]distressed by the waves, for the wind was contrary. And in the fourth watch of the night he went toward them, walking upon the sea. But when the disciples saw him walking upon the sea, they were [b]troubled, saying, It is an apparition; and they cried out for fear. But immediately Jesus spake unto them, saying, Be of good [c]courage: it is I; be not afraid.

[z] Mk. 6. 46. cf. Lk. 5. 16.
[a] Mk. 6. 47-52. Jno. 6. 16-21.
[b] cf. Lk. 24. 36-40.
[c] cf. Jno. 14. 27. cf. Jno. 16. 33.

it is which gives us insight (chap. vi.) into the spiritual condition of those to whom the Lord ministered here, and to whom He had to say, "Ye seek Me, not because ye saw the miracles,"—not because ye realized divine power in them,—"but because ye did eat of the loaves and were filled." These were they who would after this carnal manner, "have taken Him by force, to make Him a king" (ver. 15). Such was the nation; and, as such, He had to turn away from them.

3. We find Him therefore urging His disciples to re-enter the ship, and go before Him to the other side, while He Himself, having dismissed the multitudes, goes up into the mountain apart to pray. This is simple, as significant of His present place and work, Israel being in the meantime left to the consequences of their unbelief. Gone up to God, He intercedes for His own, tossed on the sea of this world, and with the wind contrary: for Satan is "the prince of the power of the air," by whom "the course of this world" is directed (Eph. ii. 2). The "ship" does not represent, however, what is proper to the present dispensation, but the means by which, when faith has not Christ before it, we are sustained upon the waters. Such means are essentially Jewish, no doubt, and it was practically a Jewish remnant which the Lord left upon earth when He went up, as it will be a Jewish remnant to which He will by and by return. The question put by the disciples to the Lord immediately before His going up, "Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore the Kingdom to Israel?" (Acts i. 6) shows how little beyond the national hope they were at this time. Long after, they "walked orderly," thronged the temple, and were "zealous of the law" (Acts xxi. 20, 24), and Paul it is who speaks the decisive word by which the Christian company separate themselves from the Jewish ship to take the true path of faith upon the waters.

The ship speaks not properly of help given to faith, but of help to do without it. "The law is not of faith," and in the notable chapter in which Paul insists to the Hebrews upon the path in which the elders walked, and in which they obtained a good report, it is striking how little the times of walking orderly and keeping the law furnish him with examples (Heb. xi.) Faith lives in the unseen and is built up by that which is spiritual, not natural. Nay, the mighty miracles of the wilderness did not beget a generation of believers, as we well know. The law, being the trial of man, gave every assistance to man naturally: the eye, the ear, the senses generally, through these the whole sensitive being, were appealed to,—only to end in more emphatic witness to his utter impracticability. The schoolmaster's reign, therefore, is at an end, though the lessons learnt abide: "after that faith is come, we are no longer under the schoolmaster" (Gal. iii. 25).

And Peter answered and said, Lord, if it be thou, [d]bid me come to thee upon the waters. And he said, Come. And Peter, having descended from the ship, walked on the waters to go to Jesus. But seeing the [e]wind strong, he was afraid; and beginning to sink, he [f]cried out, saying, Lord, save me. And immediately Jesus stretched out his hand and took hold of him, and saith unto him, O thou of [g]little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt? And when they had gone up into the ship, the wind [h]ceased; and they that were in the ship worshiped him, saying, Thou art indeed the [i]Son of God.

4 (xiv. 34–36): the mercy to the world.

4. And when they had crossed over, they came to the land of Gennesaret. And when the men of that place recognized him, they sent into all that region round about, and they [j]brought unto him all that were sick. And they besought him that they might only [k]touch the border of his garment; and as many as touched were made perfectly whole.

d cf. Heb. 13. 13.

e cf. Heb. 10. 32–34.

f Lk. 8. 24, 25.

g ch. 8. 26.

h cf. Ps. 107. 29, 30.

i cf. Ps. 46. 10. ch. 16. 16. Jno. 1. 49.

j Mk. 6. 53–56.

k cf. Lk. 5. 29–34.

Faith could not be more strikingly pictured than in this solitary man stepping out of the ship upon the waters to go to Jesus. And this has been in fact the Church's path ever since. True, the "ship" has come back again, with the return of Jewish principles with church establishments and the patronage of the world; but this has made the picture only a more striking one, by separating even disciples from disciples, and making the Church's path in result more absolutely the individual, isolated path, which for the saint, in character as such, it has ever been. Faith is, of necessity, personal and individual. A "Christian world" means only a corrupt and degenerate Church-profession. The Church itself, as well as the open world, becomes a scene in which the word of the Lord calls for "overcoming" and more and more appeals to the individual only,—to him "that hath an ear to hear" (Rev. ii., iii.).

Indeed, this Figure on the water is not seen except by faith; even those who are disciples may count it an "apparition" only, and fear, instead of being drawn by it. Notice, that it is to the soul that invites the invitation that the Voice says, "Come." It speaks to no other. Nor does it speak other than approvingly, though the one inviting it proves thoroughly his weakness in his response to it. But he gets no rebuke for a rash venture. The other disciples might have given him that: there are many who are in no danger of this kind of failure, who would justify themselves by it from all such attempts; but the Lord says only, "Wherefore didst thou doubt?" And surely this doubting is as foolish as disastrous. For the moment, at least, he had proved the power of Christ: he had actually walked upon the water, and why should boisterous winds put him now in fear? The power was not his own, and he might reckon on it as much for rough water as for smooth. But with the eye off Christ, one cannot reckon right. He doubts and he begins to sink; but at his cry there is a Hand outstretched to him, and he is held up. It is not the ship that rescues him, nor is he taken from the path, but supported in it. Good is it to remember and realize this as grace which acts towards us in our failure now.

Peter and his Lord come back to the ship together; then the wind ceases, and those in the ship come and worship Him with the acknowledgment, "Indeed Thou art the Son of God." This is again not difficult to understand; for when He returns to Israel, we shall be with Him still, and for them and us the wind will be at rest. Satan's power will be over, himself shut up in the bottomless pit, the power of Christ supreme over all.

4. We see now therefore in Gennesaret the mercy flowing out which will characterize this blessed time. "Gennesaret" may even mean "the protection of

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chap. xv.-xvi. 12.)

The heart of man manifested, and God's heart told out: the way of sanctification.

1 (xv. 1-20): Commandments of God and traditions of men.

1. THEN come to Jesus Pharisees and scribes from Jerusalem, saying, Why do thy disciples transgress the [t]tradition of the elders? for they wash not their hands when they eat bread. But he answered and said unto them, Why do ye also transgress the [m]commandment of God for your tradition? For God commanded, saying, [n]Honor thy father and thy mother, and he that speaketh ill of father or mother, let him [o]die the death. But ye say, Whosoever shall say unto his father or his mother, It is a [p]gift, that by which thou mightest have been profited by me, he shall in no wise honor his t Mk.7.1-23. cf. ch.23.16-18.

m cf. ch. 23. 23. cf. Jno. 18. 28. ctr. Rom.3. 31.
n Ex. 20, 12. cf. Jer. 35. 18, 19.
o Lev. 20. 9. Deut.27.16. Prov.30.17. *cf.*1 Tim.5. 4, 8. p ctr. ch. 5. 23, 24.

the prince." Sickness and distress are banished by the presence of the "Prince of life." It is but the shadow; what will the reality be?

SUBD. 3.

We are now shown in the teachings of Israel's leaders the blindness of man's heart, both as to man himself, and as to the way of blessing for him. The one error of course involves the other, and it is an error, not of the mind only, but of the heart as well. The heart is in fact what is in question everywhere as to man—teacher or taught: out of the heart all evil comes, and dealing with the outside will not help it. Sanctification is not an external thing; and it can only be learnt, moreover, in the sanctuary,—in the presence of God from whom man has deeply revolted. The prodigal must return to his Father; and God is ready to welcome him. Let him take but the place to which his need should bring him, he shall find that Heart that never has been alienated or indifferent poured out over him. This is seen in the person not of a privileged Jew, but of a Canaanitess; and then in Israel we find the table of the Lord spread, and the bounty with which He would attract wanderers to Himself. The closing section returns to that with which it began, and warns against the leaven of the doctrine of the Pharisees and Sadducees.

1. The question with which we begin is raised by themselves, by Pharisees and scribes from Jerusalem, the headquarters of all the religious opposition to the Lord. They come to Him directly with the inquiry, which of course is an accusation, and as a charge against His disciples, impliedly against Him their teacher: "Why do Thy disciples transgress the tradition of the elders? for they wash not their hands when they eat bread." They had here what in their minds convicted the disciples indeed as very manifest sinners; for the breach of such a tradition was with these men a greater sin than the breach of the law itself; nay, by a manifest perversion of Ex. xxxiv. 27, it was argued that this oral law it was that contained the terms of God's covenant with Israel,* and not the other.

Thus here was a challenge which the Lord could not allow to go unanswered. He answers them with another question, which even to themselves would destroy the authority to which they appealed, if they could not answer it: "Why do ye also transgress the commandments of God for your tradition?" And then He takes up the commandment to which in a special way God had been pleased to attach a promise for the observance of it, a signal punishment for disobedience to it, and shows how thoroughly their tradition left the door open to any who pleased, to violate it with impunity. A man had only to say it was "corban"—a gift to God—that by which he might have ministered to the need of his father or his mother; and ye have made void the word of God for your tradition. Hypocrites! well did [q]Esaias prophesy of you, saying, "This people honoreth me with their lips, but their heart is far away from me: but in vain do they worship me, teaching as doctrines commands of men."

*See Edersheim's "Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah," for much else and worse upon this subject.

And having called unto him the multitude, he said unto them, Hear and understand: [r]not that which entereth into the mouth defileth the man; but that which [s]cometh out of the mouth, that defileth the man. Then q Is. 29. 13. Ezek.33.31.

r Rom. 14. 14-23. cf. Col.2.20-23.

s cf. Jer. 17. 9, 10. cf. Rom.3. 10-18. cf. Tit.1.15.

father or mother, to be completely excused from such a duty. "Of course, the 'Ten Words,'" says Edersheim, "were the Holy of Holies of the Law; nor was there any obligation more rigidly observed—indeed, carried in practice almost to the verge of absurdity,—than that of honor to parents. In both respects, then, this was a specially vulnerable point, and it might well be argued that if in this law Rabbinic ordinances came into conflict with the demands of God's word, the essential contrariety between them must indeed be great.

"It must not be thought that the pronunciation of the votive word 'Corban,' although meaning 'a gift' or 'given to God,' necessarily dedicated a thing to the Temple. The meaning might simply be, and generally was, that it was to be regarded like Corban,—that is, that in regard to the person or persons named, the thing termed so was to be considered as if it were Corban,—laid on the altar, and put entirely out of their reach. For, although included under the same name, there were really two kinds of vows: those of consecration to God, and those of personal obligation—and the latter were the most frequent.

"There can be no doubt that the words of Christ referred to such vows of personal obligation. By these a person might bind himself with regard to men or things, or else put that which was another's out of his own reach, or that which was his own out of the reach of another, and this as completely as if the thing or things had been Corban, a gift given to God. . . . And so stringent was the ordinance that (almost in the words of Christ) it is expressly stated that such a vow was binding, even if what was vowed involved a breach of the Law. It cannot be denied that such vows in regard to parents would be binding, and were actually made. Indeed the question is discussed in the Mishnah, in so many words, whether 'honor of father or mother' constituted a ground for invalidating a vow, and decided on the negative against a solitary dissenting voice. And if doubt should still exist, a case is related in the Mishnah, in which a father was thus shut out by the vow of his son from anything by which he might be profited by him" (Edersheim, vol. ii. pp. 17-21).

Thus was Rabbinism convicted out of its own mouth of the most glaring substitution of its traditions for the word of God, and the moral character of these involved in hopeless condemnation. Nor has traditionalism ever escaped from such a violation of conscience and the word of God. Man being what he is, it could not be otherwise: the maintenance of the word of God in absolute supremacy is his only salvation from the grossest immorality, as the "teaching for the doctrines the commandments of men" is itself rebellion against the Source of all morality.

The Lord calls the multitude together to Him therefore, to give the most public utterance to that which may seem to us so simple, and yet to which a large mass of Christians by profession have not even yet attained; that "not that which entereth into the mouth defileth a man." The source of defilement for a man is, alas, within him; and Christianity by taking away the suppositious sources has lifted the true moral element out of all confusion, and placed it upon an immutable foundation. Brought into the clear light, such a principle commends itself to every man's conscience; but all the more would the Pharisees resent it. The disciples, in some alarm, represent this to Him; but came the disciples and said unto him, Knowest thou that the Pharisees were offended when they heard that word? But he answered and said, Every plant that my heavenly Father hath not planted shall be [t]rooted up. Let them alone: they are [u]blind leaders of the blind; but if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch.

t cf. ch. 5. 20. cf. Acts 15. 10.
u Is. 9. 16. Mal. 2. 8. ch. 23. 16. Lk. 6. 39.

And Peter answered and said unto him, Explain to us this parable. And he said, Are ye also even yet without understanding? Do ye not perceive that whatever entereth into the mouth passeth into the belly and is cast out into the draught? but the things that come out of the mouth proceed from the [v]heart, and they defile the man: for out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witnessings, blasphemies. These are the things that defile the man; but to eat with unwashed hands defileth not the man.

v cf. Jas. 3. 10–12. Gen. 6. 5.

2 (xv. 21–28): Faith confirmed.

2. And Jesus going forth from thence, withdrew into the parts of [w]Tyre and Sidon. And behold, a Canaanitish woman coming out of those coasts cried out, saying, w Mk. 7. 24–30.

He at once in most decisive language condemns their principles as what were no plants of His Father's planting, but as it were weeds that must be rooted up; while they themselves were but blind leaders of blind followers: they would fall into the ditch together. For man cannot escape from the responsibility which the moral faculty entails on him, and which would for the simplest, if they would listen to it, break such snares as these.

Yet, so great is the blinding force of association and habits of thought, that even the disciples, as represented by the ever foremost Peter, desire to have "this parable" explained to them; and He has to reprove them for their spiritual slowness. How constantly was there found in this the cause of this lack of understanding which we would rather even impute to mere mental feebleness. Cannot they perceive the difference between the moral and the material? Here is indeed a fountain of evil which it may pass human ability to cleanse, but it has to be reckoned with. It is an easy thing to legislate about meats and the washing of hands, and by such poor righteousness as this satisfy oneself perhaps but too well; but even this satisfaction convicts the soul of its unrighteousness and lack of truthful dealing with itself. The evil must be faced in order to deliverance; but where shall deliverance be found?

2. The answer we have in the next incident, the story of the Canaanitish woman. From the pitiable self-righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, which is but hypocrisy, the Lord withdraws into the parts of Tyre and Sidon. Here are open sinners, long since under the divine curse for their sins; but here too, as everywhere, are the needs which under God force men to reality. Thus they are mercies in disguise,—a divine Voice, which must have mercy in it, even though this may not be recognized as such.

A woman out of these coasts comes crying after Him. With her it is need that brings her, that blessed need that in one shape or another has brought us all. But she appeals to Him by a strange title for a Canaanite—"the Son of David," and as such she could have no claim upon Him. He answers her, therefore, not a word. With a heart full of blessing for her, He yet could not bless her on false ground: for her it would not be good; for Him it would be impossible. But to come to Christ without a claim seems also at first impossible, not knowing aright either ourselves or Him. We try to claim Him by some betterness beyond our neighbors, or by our repentance and good resolu-

Have pity on me, O Lord, thou [x]Son of David! my daughter is grievously vexed with a demon. But he answered her not a word. And his [y]disciples came and besought him, saying, Send her away: for she crieth after us. But he answered and said, I am not sent save to the [z]lost sheep of the house of Israel. But she came and worshiped him, saying, Lord, [a]help me. But he answered and said, It is not meet to take the children's loaf, and to cast it to the [b]dogs. But she said, Yea, Lord: for the dogs also eat of the [c]crumbs that fall from their masters' table. Then Jesus answered and said unto her, O woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee [d]as thou wilt. And her daughter was healed from that hour.

x ch. 1. 1. ch. 22. 41, 42. cf. Ps. 132. 11.
y cf. Lk. 18. 15. cf. Lk. 9. 54, 55.
z ch. 10. 5, 6. cf. Jno. 1. 11.
a Ps. 145. 18.
b cf. ch. 7. 6. cf. Jno. 4. 22.
c cf. Ex. 22. 31. cf. Lev. 23. 22. cf. Ruth 2. 12. cf. Is. 56. 6, 7. cf. Acts 10. 9-18, 28.
d cf. ch. 9. 27-29; cf. ch. 21. 21, 22.

tions, or in some other way by which we may avoid the full facing of our need —of that which has given the devil power against us. But the Canaanite under the curse is still our picture if we put it that way, and Christ is the Son of David, silent and afar off. He had, in fact, to take a far different position, in order that either Jews or Gentiles might have part in Him.

Yet she cries on, till the disciples also beg Him to dismiss her; impliedly (for they knew His grace) by granting her request. But he answers, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." He speaks, let us notice, not of what is in His heart, but in His mission; and He speaks as Son of David, not as Son of man or Saviour. But even the house of Israel were lost sheep, little as they realized it; and if they were "lost," what hope for any, save in pure and utter grace?

She takes heart, as it seems, by this, to draw near to Him: for if Israel be lost, and He has come after them, may not a lost one from outside have hope also? and will not grace be consistent with itself? can it be local merely, and limited—not universal? how could such light shine, and not shine all round? Has he not here, in fact, supplied her with the argument which presently she uses? Did He not mean to do so, when He dropped that word, so penetrating, so assuring, into her heart?

So she comes, now worshiping, and dropping the formal title; while she owns in her simple "Lord," in a more personal way, His title over her. Will He not give help to one who needs it? So she drops all other claim than this: "Lord," she says, "help me." "But He answered and said, It is not right to take the children's loaf and cast it to the dogs."

That might seem as if she had gained nothing, but she has. Again He has dropped a word for her, if she be lowly enough to take it. For the last word "dogs" is not the word for the wild houseless, offal-hunting creatures of the eastern streets, but though still "dogs," yet the "little dogs," the house or pet-dogs even, such as would look, as she was doing, for something in the house. So that the way for her into blessing has really been laid open: if only she has humility enough to take it. And indeed faith and humility—which in a sinner is repentance—are twin companions, never to be disjoined. He that is lowly enough to take the place of dog will soon discern God's way of grace. She sees at once the steps by which He has been leading her—"the lost," the "dog," yet the house-dog, dependent and to be cared for in some way. And then His bounteous table! perhaps she may have heard of those baskets of fragments taken up after five thousand men had been fed at it: at any rate, she did not ask,—had no need to ask the children's loaf: the fragments—in her humility and faith, she says, "the crumbs"—would be enough for her: "Truth, Lord; for the dogs eat of the crumbs that fall from their masters' table."

No fear of that argument failing: He himself has given it her; and He would

3 (xv. 29-38): Divine fullness.

3. And Jesus departed thence and came nigh to the sea of Galilee. And he went up into the mountain and sat down there. And there came unto him great multitudes, having with them, the [c]lame, blind, dumb, maimed, and many others, and they cast them at his feet, and he healed them: so that the multitude wondered, seeing the dumb speaking, the maimed whole, the lame walking, and the blind seeing; and they [f]glorified the God of Israel. And Jesus, having called his disciples unto him, said, I have [g]compassion on the multitude, because they have been with me now three days, and have nothing to eat; and I will not send them away fasting, lest they faint by the way. And his disciples say unto him, Whence should we have so many loaves in the wilderness as to fill so great a multitude? And Jesus saith unto them, How many loaves have ye? And they said, [h]Seven, and a few little fishes. And he commanded the multitudes to recline on the ground; and he took the seven loaves and the fishes, and gave thanks and brake and gave them unto the disciples, and the disciples to the multitudes. And they all ate and were filled; and they took up what was over of the fragments seven baskets full. And they that had eaten were [i]four thousand men, beside women and children.

c ch. 11. 5. Ps. 146. 8. cf. Is. 35. 5, 6.

f Lk. 5. 25, 26. cf. Lk. 19. 37, 38. ctr. ch. 11. 20-24.

g Mk. 8. 1-9. cf. ch. 9. 36-38.

h cf. ch. 14. 17. ver. 37.

i cf. ch. 14. 21.

deny His very nature did He say, He was not good enough for that. But He has no thought of this, no need of the argument, which yet, for her sake, He rejoices in: His heart leaps to His lips, as He exclaims, "O woman, great is thy faith! be it unto thee even as thou wilt." And her daughter is healed from that very hour.

Here is how a human heart is led into the sanctuary; and the holy, pure, revealing light is that of grace. What work has been done in it is plain enough, and what no cleansing of the hands could ever have effected. Here is the divine remedy for the heart's vileness, the revelation of the heart of God to it. But Pharisaism could not even understand it, and the double miracle, wrought for a Canaanite, would only have been a double offence. It is not even presented to them, therefore, but has to be done afar off, though under the eyes of His disciples, a sweet appealing picture for those that have hearts to understand it. To how many hearts has it not appealed since then!

3. So now the table of the Lord is spread, and divine fullness is poured out for man's need. The dispensational character so largely found in Matthew still characterizes what is here, and after the blessing of the Gentile in the Canaanitish woman, the Lord is here again among the Jews, and the multitudes who are witnesses and recipients of abundant goodness, glorify the God of Israel. This is all in perfect order; and the feeding of the people has in the numbers connected with it a witness that must not be despised. There are seven loaves now, and seven baskets* full of fragments, the number of perfection being thus doubly stamped on the divine bounty, and carrying us on in thought to the final blessing.

4. A new demand is now made upon Christ for a sign from heaven, the Pharisees uniting with their constant enemies, the Sadducees, to make it. The com-

* Larger baskets than in the former miracle; here σπυρίδες, "round, plaited-baskets; fish- or provision-baskets;" in the former case, κόφινοι, "hand- or traveling-baskets. The distinction is always preserved, as in the next chapter.

4 (xv. 39-xvi. 4): Israel's failure to discern the time.

4. And when he had dismissed the multitudes, he went up into the ship, and came unto the coasts of Magdala.* And the Pharisees and Sadducees came and, tempting [him], desired him to show them a [j]sign from heaven. But he answered and said unto them, When [k]even is come, ye say, Fine weather, for the sky is red; and in the morning, A storm to-day, for the sky is red and lowering: ye know how to discern the face of the sky, but the signs of the times ye cannot. A [l]wicked and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and no sign shall be given to it, but the sign of Jonas. And he left them and departed.

[j] ch. 12.38-41. Mk. 8. 10-13.
[k] Lk. 12.54-57.
[l] cf. ch.21.23-27.

5 (xvi.5-12): warning as to the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees.

5. And when his disciples had come to the other side, they had forgotten to take bread. And Jesus said unto them, Take heed and beware of the [m]leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees. And they reasoned among themselves, saying, [It is] because we have no bread. And Jesus knowing [this], said, Why reason ye among yourselves, O ye of little faith, because ye have taken no

[m] Mk. 8.14-21. Lk. 12. 1. cf. Gal. 5.9.

* Or "Magadan."

ing together of those otherwise so opposed was but a sign of the strength of that opposition to Jesus which united them. There was not even truth in the desire they expressed; and the character of it showed the reason why they could not see in Him the reality of His claim. A sign that could work upon a carnal people was what they sought, and which would have left them a carnal people still. The faith so awakened would have had none of the moral qualities of faith in it: conscience and heart would have been alike wanting, and God so displayed would have been half dethroned. What a slight, too, would be put upon the Sign of signs, Himself, the Son of God, come in power, yet in all the grace of humanity, among men His creatures! From Him, indeed, the supernatural was natural; but on that account it could not accredit Him: He was above it, though it bore witness to Him. To those who believed on His Name when they saw His miracles, He could not commit Himself (John ii. 23–25).

In fact, they were prophets of the external and could read well enough the face of the sky: the spiritual condition, which always rules in the signs of the times just because God is a moral Governor, this they could not see. Had they done so, they would have judged first their own condition and have been brought by their need to the supply provided.

But "a wicked and adulterous generation" it was that sought after a sign, and they would get none but the sign of Jonas. His death and resurrection would be a sign against them, that they had rejected the message of God and His grace, such as Nineveh had known nothing about. Already He had declared this as now inevitable, and briefly refers to it here, as to a sentence pronounced. Then He leaves them and departs.

5. But these Pharisees and Sadducees do not present an evil wholly outside of the circle of His disciples. We have all of us, alas, within us that which makes us from the side of nature but too much akin to them, and in our hearts that which offers itself as a ready and kindly soil for their most seemingly opposite errors. The Lord therefore, in that enigmatic way which He so much used, and which is so well adapted to awaken thought and searching of heart, bids His disciples "beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees." They can think only that it is because they have taken no bread; although it would be enigmatic enough how the ritualism or rationalism of these could affect their breadmaking. But this manifested again the terrible unbelief of those who bread? Do ye not [n]yet understand nor remember the five loaves of the five thousand, and how many hand-baskets ye took up, nor the seven loaves of the four thousand and how many baskets ye took up? How is it that ye do not understand that I spake not to you of loaves, to beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees? Then they understood that he spake not to them to beware of the leaven of bread, but of the [o]doctrine of the Pharisees and Sadducees.

[n] cf. Jno. 12. 37. cf. Lk. 24. 25. cf. Heb. 5. 11, 12.

[o] cf. Gal. 1. 6-9. cf. Col. 2. 4, 18.

[1] (xvi. 13-19:) Christ's purpose as to His assembly, and the administration of the Kingdom.

SUBDIVISION 4. (Chaps. xvi. 13–xvii. 21.)

"The Kingdom and patience" in man's world and day.

[1] AND when Jesus came into the parts of [p]Cæsarea Philippi, he asked his disciples, saying, Who do men say that I, the Son of man, am? And they said, had twice so lately seen Him multiply the loaves so as to satisfy thousands. Yet they could think that He was troubled about the supply of bread! Nay, it was of the doctrine of the Jewish leaders He was speaking, and of its subtle pervasive working; by which indeed Christendom has been so largely corrupted since. We have already seen His own use of the figure in this way, and it might have prepared them to understand of what He was now speaking. They were slow to understand; but how slowly indeed does that which is of God dawn upon us in general!

[p] Mk. 8. 27-33. Lk. 9. 18-22.

SUBD. 4.

We come now to what furnishes the ground of Peter's two epistles,—what John speaks of as "the Kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ" (Rev. i. 9); set up in a world of which Satan is still the prince, through the lusts by which he holds men captive. Thus the world is that which knew not Christ when He came into it, and of which the cross is the characteristic sign. The cross for the Master means, therefore, the cross for the disciple, as He declares here, if indeed we will be true to Him. The light for the path is a glory outside the world, and which is in His face whom the world has rejected and cast out. Thus we are "called," as Peter says, (2 Peter i. 3) "by glory and virtue"—the last being the soldier's virtue, "courage," the virtue of the Church militant; and as in Colossians (i. 11), "strengthened with all might, according to the power of His glory, unto all patience and long-suffering with joyfulness."

We have in connection with this the first plain announcement of Christ's assembly, not as Paul long afterwards was given to declare it, as Christ's "body" or "bride," but rather as the house of God, "a spiritual house" of "living stones," as Peter preaches from this very text (1 Pet. ii. 5). Moreover the administration of the Kingdom is committed to Peter, as representative of the assembly, no doubt (comp. chap. xviii. 17, 18). We have already seen its history (chap. xiii), and that the opposition of the world which is the necessary consequence of moral oppositeness, comes to be introduced within the Christian profession itself, so as to entail the need of overcoming in this way also: of which the epistles give us everywhere abundant proof, if indeed the experience of any true disciple permitted him to doubt it.

[1] It is in the coasts of Cæsarea Philippi—stamped thus doubly with the assertion of the power of the world rulers, the Cæsars and the Herods, there where Israel should have been sole possessor of the land, upholding and upheld by the name of her God,—that this revelation of the Divine purpose in the assembly is made. Israel is but as a wanderer among the nations now. Her doom is upon her, although not as yet fully carried into effect; and the world which is uniting with her in the rejection of the one hope of deliverance must still be left for Cæsar and Herod to divide between them. Out of it God is going to

Some, John the Baptist; but others, Elias; and others again, Jeremias, or one of the prophets. He saith unto them, But [q]ye, who do ye say that I am? And Simon separate a people for Himself, and in the over abounding of divine grace to give them an inheritance in heaven. But this they are to reach by His own pathway of suffering in the world, the fellowship of His sufferings being the fit training for fellowship upon the throne and in the glory.

[q] Jno. 6. 67.

The first point here is in the apprehension of Himself; and so He asks His disciples now. "Who do men say that I, the Son of man, am?" He uses the term by which we find Him, in the synoptic Gospels, most commonly speaking of Himself, the term so perfect in its lowliness, so tender in its intimacy, so unique in its very generality: for, just because all were "sons of men," the claim to be the Son of man would by itself be suited to awaken attention. If Daniel, and, still more, Ezekiel were addressed by the Lord as "son of man," this of course was a thing quite different. Whatever else it signified, the reminder of essential difference between the glorious Speaker and the frail instrument by whom He pleased to speak to men, was obviously in place. But, just on that very account, no prophet of them all, in speaking to other men, could have called himself the "Son of man." On the other hand, Daniel had spoken of "One like unto a son of man" coming in the clouds of heaven to receive universal dominion (chap. vii. 13, 14), a passage to us abundantly clear, but which does not in fact give Messiah this title, as is plain, and by the Jews in general it does not seem to have been even applied to him.* The question put by them afterwards would apparently indicate this: "We have heard out of the Law, that Christ abideth for ever; and Thou sayest, the Son of man shall be lifted up: who is this Son of man? (John xii. 34). As a title indeed, to those whose expectations of the Messiah were so different, its lowliness would not commend it to such use as the Lord constantly made of it. The form of it in Daniel (Bar Enahsh) is the very lowliest, "a son of frail, or mortal, man," so that we are naturally reminded of the "likeness of sinful flesh" (it could only be "likeness" here of which the apostle speaks, Rom. viii. 3). Little fit would they be to understand the tenderness of the adoption of such an epithet as "Son of man."†

What did they make of One who came after this manner: not emblazoning His name upon the skies, but writing it upon the hearts of those relieved by divine mercy through Him? of One who, instead of skimming over the surface of the sore of humanity, probed it to the bottom, though but to heal it effectually? "Who do men say that I, the Son of man, am?"

The answer only takes the judgment of friends into account, and this is various: "some say, John the Baptist; some Elias; some, Jeremias, or one of the prophets." But this various judgment is, in fact, but one: no one really knows; among the crowds around, and recognizing too, the best that could be said for them, the desire to do Him honor, there is yet, so to speak, no true faith. No matter as to the difference between these thoughts, compared with their amazing unanimity. Well might He say, "I have labored in vain; I have spent my strength for nought and in vain." Israel is surely not now to be gathered, though there is still an election of grace. He turns to the disciples with the same question: "But ye, who do ye say that I am?" And Peter breaks out with his answer for the rest: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God."

* Edersheim in his "Life and Times of Jesus," so often referred to, in a list of Old Testament passages so applied, says of this one only: "Dan. vii. 13 is curiously explained in the Talmud (Sanh. 98 a) where it is said that, if Israel behaved worthily, the Messiah would come in the clouds of heaven; if otherwise, humble, and riding upon an ass." In the "Book of Enoch" also, the Messiah appears in the clouds of heaven "as a son of man," amid the angels of the divine judgment-seat; and in the Sibylline Oracles there are allusions.

† Now, however, the equivalent of Bar Enahsh, but of Ben Adam, ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, "of man" generically.

Peter answering said, Thou art the [r]Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answering said unto him, [s]Blessed art thou, Simon bar-Jona: for flesh and blood [r] ch. 14. 33. John 6. 69. John 11. 27. Acts 9. 20. [s] 1 Jno. 4. 15. 1 Jno. 5. 1, 5; cf. Jno. 1. 12, 13 with ch. 11. 27.

Here, then, while Israel remains in unbelief, is the faith of the Church. It is founded on Scripture, but along with this on the knowledge of Christ Himself,—on the revelation of Christ by the Father to him, as the Lord immediately declares. The Spirit and the Word act together, and so constantly: the Shepherd comes in by the door, and the porter opens to Him; He speaks, and the sheep hear His voice.

That the Christ would be the Son of God, Scripture had again and again declared. The second psalm expressly represents Him as rejected by men, yet owned of God as His Son by nature, yet in manhood, and to be (in spite of all opposition) King at last on Zion. And this is the Scripture which with one accord the disciples quote, after the first appearance of the apostles before the rulers of the Jews, when dismissed, they go to their own company (Acts iv. 25-28).

Similarly, according to Isaiah, the virgin's Son would be Immanuel, and this no mere or hyperbolical name: the Child born, the Son given, upon whose shoulder was to be the government in Israel, would be "the mighty God, the Father of eternity, the Prince of peace" (Isaiah vii. 14; ix. 6).

His deity, though born in Bethlehem, but whose goings forth had been of old, from everlasting, Micah had borne witness to, in those words which the scribes and chief priests, so unavailingly for either, could quote to Herod.

Other scriptures there were to shame Israel's unbelief in God's marvelous grace to her, and her great glory. But Peter, taught of God, expresses his faith in a way that shows it to be personal, not traditional nor mere orthodoxy, but a divine energy within his soul. It is the Eternal Life that He has seen in Christ—that indeed was in Him "the Light of men" (John i. 4). Thus he calls Him not simply the Son of God, but "the Son of the living God." Living power it is that he has realized in Him, the manifested Life, the incarnate, creative Word, and in the sense of this he bears witness to Him.

Striking it is, too, that John, His most intimate disciple, speaks of Life so much. And with Peter, if we look at his first epistle, we shall find that "living" is a characteristic word. A "living hope," "the living word," "living stones" built up upon the "Living Stone," living unto righteousness, living according to God: all these harmonize with his confession of Christ here; while some of them carry us right back to the confession itself or to the Lord's words in response to it. They combine to assure us of the Presence in which he had lived and walked, and of its power over him.

The Lord answers immediately: "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father, who is heaven. And I say unto thee, that thou art Peter (Petros), and upon this rock (petra) I will build my assembly; and the gates of hades shall not prevail against it."

Peter's faith is thus a divinely given faith, the fruit of a divine revelation to his soul, and thus he is a true "bar-jona," (son of a dove,) born of the Spirit of God; and, Israel having rejected Christ, he must have a new place provided for him, and for those of like faith. Thus he becomes Peter, a stone in a new spiritual building which will be Christ's assembly. It is not yet said that this is the house of God, which in Israel, as we know, had been always a material building. Relationship to God is not yet opened up, but rather to Himself as the Builder of it. It is to be His assembly, a people "called out," as the word indicates,* to Himself; and Peter himself explains it to us as consisting of "living stones," who "coming to" Him, the "Living Stone," "are built up a

* Ecclesia (ἐκκλησία) from ἐκκαλέω, to "call out."

hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father, who is in heaven. And I also say unto thee, that thou art spiritual house" (in opposition to Israel's material one). He thus very simply settles the old controversy which Rome has raised upon the Lord's words to him,—none more competent to settle it surely than the one to whom the words were spoken, and, moreover, Rome's own chosen interpreter, whom for very shame they cannot refuse, and by refusing whom they still destroy their own interpretation: so has God doubly guarded the truth against their perversion. Peter assures us that the "Rock" upon which the assembly is founded is not Peter but Christ Himself. The Petra is not the Petros, near as these may be together: for indeed the "stone" derives all its rock-like qualities from the "rock,"—is, so to speak, quarried out of the rock upon which it is founded.

There is no question here, then, to raise or to settle: the "prophetic scriptures" have settled it for us in anticipation, before it was raised. The assembly called out to Christ, is built upon Christ, and every way His assembly: relationship to Himself is now the whole question. And He being the Son of the living God, the gates of hades—of death—cannot prevail against it. Death has prevailed over the whole human race, but in the Son of God become Son of man, a new and eternal life has come into humanity, annulling, for those who believe in Him, him who had the power of death, that is, the devil. For these death is abolished, and life and incorruption are brought to light through the gospel.

Here, then, the assembly stands, upon the rock of resurrection, though resurrection has not yet been mentioned in connection with it. But Christ, says the apostle, is marked out Son of God by resurrection of the dead (Rom. i. 4). Life is thus not in Him simply, but in Him meets the power of death and vanquishes it: the assembly (though in the meanwhile on earth) belongs to the other side of death, yea, to heaven: the gates of hades open in vain for it.

This is not, therefore, as Rome again alleges, an affirmation of the infallibility of the Church, but rather of its continuance; and it does continue until at the coming of Christ it is removed to heaven. Of the saints of the Old Testament the apostle could speak as "the spirits of just men made perfect" (Heb. xii. 23); and if by the latter expression he intimates, as he surely does, their resurrection, that still shows that, as a body, they had been removed by death. But the Church of Christ could never be spoken of in such a manner: spite of all that it has come through—all the opposition of men and Satan through which it has come,—the yawning jaws of the grave have never ingulfed it. Though in its character an exotic, and not of earth, the power of the Spirit has maintained it here without interruption, a witness even in her failure and suffering to her absent Lord.

But under all this, and shining through it, there is a higher truth, as has been already said: the Church is that in which, first of all, the power of life over death, death itself made to minister to it and sustain it, comes out in its full character. The eternal life has come in Christ in its perfection, but in Him as a corn of wheat which, falling into the ground and dying, brings forth fruit in which it is perpetuated and multiplied. This is, of course, John's doctrine, or that of his Gospel rather, and Paul also must come in to give it full utterance; but it is wrapped up here in the Lord's first announcement of the Church to Peter.

He is going to build it. His words are as yet but prophecy, not a declaration of what He has done, or is doing, but of what He is going to do. Between that and the present lies for Him, as He begins now to declare explicitly, that awful valley of the shadow of death through which a deeper death darkens,—an uttermost woe which He alone can bear, a depth in which no foot but His could find standing. Then the "light of life" will have come, the weight be removed from off man's heart, the cloud from his path, but more,—the veil rent which covers the sanctuary, he will draw near to God, distance done away for ever, to where the full glory of God in a Human Face shall greet and bless and glorify

Peter, and on 'this rock I will build my "assembly; and the gates of "hades shall not prevail against it.

l cf. ch. 7. 24, 25. cf. Is. 28. 16 with 1 Cor. 3. 11; Ps. 18. 2. u cf. Eph. 2. 20; cf. 1 Pet. 2. 4, 5. v cf. Rev. 1. 18; cf. 1 Cor. 15. 50-58.

him with its radiance. This is what Christianity means for us even here; and oh that one could tell it out, but it is impossible. Christ must be for Himself the Speaker, and every one must hear from His own lips, find in His own face, drink in from His own love, that else ineffable reality.

From the announcement of the assembly (or, as it is commonly called the Church *) and of Peter's place in it, the Lord goes on to speak of the Kingdom and his place in it: two things which are surely connected together, while they are different, and of which it is important to see both the connection and the difference. Here also there has been on both sides as much confusion of thought as in the former case, and far more widely spread. We shall do well therefore to examine with the more care the meaning of what is here before us.

A common confusion is that of the Church and the Kingdom, and which has both proceeded from and led on to very serious confusion in other respects. We have already seen sufficiently what the Kingdom is, to be delivered from the possibility of any absolute identification of them. It certainly was not the Church which John the Baptist proclaimed to be "at hand." Israel was alone before him as the people of God, though needing to be purged by the Lord for entrance into His Kingdom. Even so, people and Kingdom were plainly different thoughts, however closely they might be connected together.

The Kingdom in its Old Testament character being for the time set aside, on account of Israel's rejection of the King, the "assembly" which Christ owns as His, in the day of that rejection, becomes the recognized people of God; and in the same relation to the "Kingdom and patience" that Israel will yet have in relation to His "Kingdom and glory." Still the Kingdom and the people are very different thoughts; although in any picture of the Kingdom we necessarily see the people. So it has been in that history of the Kingdom which we have had put before us in the parables of the thirteenth chapter. But there even, if we have been able to interpret them aright, the people before us in the first parables are not the same people as in the closing one at all; and the Kingdom, while changing in character at the close, goes on beyond the time of the "assembly," of which we have been speaking, altogether.

Church and Kingdom are not, then, even for the present time, the same; though it may be urged that (in the same way as with Israel) in some sense we may identify them. Yet even here, for any right interpretation of the passage before us, we must learn to discriminate. We shall surely find, if we look closely enough, that we cannot even say that (even for the present time) the limits of Church and Kingdom are practically the same: there is a difference here also which must be taken into account, although we may not be able, at the point which we have reached in the Gospel here, fully to define it.

The Kingdom, it is plain, in its mystery-form, is established in the world, not by any open act of divine power, but by the sowing of the "word of the Kingdom" in the hearts of men. It is thus not territorial, as the kingdoms of the world are, but a Kingdom of the truth, a sphere of discipleship; which may be, however, merely outward and nominal, a profession true or false, which the end will declare. This is plain by the parables that have been before us. Its blessings are thus conditional, dependent upon character and conduct, as the parable of the unforgiving servant especially declares (chap. xviii).

That it is administered by men, as representatives of the absent King, the

* While in common parlance we may still use this term, it is important in all interpretation of Scripture to keep to the true word, "assembly," which, if it had been always adhered to, would have done much of itself to prevent some of the perversion of thought which has connected itself with the other. Church, as is perfectly well known, comes from the Greek Kuriake, "of the Lord," which (as is evident) leaves out the very thing which ecclesia defines, and so permits the free substitution of other thoughts in its place.

And I will give unto thee the [w]keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou mayest [x]bind on earth shall [w] cf. Acts 2. 14, 42. cf. Acts 10. 46-48.

[x] ch. 18. 18; Jno. 20. 22, 23; cf. Acts 5. 1-11.

Lord's words to Peter here are clearly in proof, for the keys of the Kingdom are committed to him: not, I believe, distinctively, but as connected with that place which the Lord had just assigned him. As his confession of Him was just that of the others—of all true disciples, so the place of a stone in Christ's spiritual building was not Peter's alone, but that of all disciples; and the keys of the Kingdom go with this: the Church (that is) administers the Kingdom. In the eighteenth chapter, the power of binding and loosing, given here to Peter, is given to the assembly as a whole (ver. 18): and when we consider what the power of the keys implies, we shall find that in fact it is not peculiar to Peter at all. The two statements here go perfectly together, and as Peter is but a living stone founded upon the Rock, Christ Jesus, so every living stone is thus a Peter, and addressed as such through him.

After all that Rome and ritualism and even more evangelical systems have found in these keys, it may be hard to credit such a view as this; and with many it has been customary to point to Peter's eminent place on the day of Pentecost in opening the Kingdom to the Jews, as afterwards in the person of Cornelius to the Gentiles. But an eminent place may be fully allowed him in this way, while yet we deny him any exclusive place; and in fact we cannot exclude others on the day of Pentecost; nor even at Cæsarea allow that this was the sole use of the key in relation to the Gentiles, any more than the use of another key than that which before had opened the Kingdom to the Jews. One act did not surely exhaust the service of the key, nor to open the door twice require two keys. Can it be thought that the door once opened simply remained open, and needed no more opening? On the contrary, I believe it can be conclusively shown that the administration of the Kingdom, which these keys stand for, is not yet over, is not all come to an end in one initial authoritative act. Men still receive and are received in; and if the power of the keys speaks of admission into the Kingdom, and the Kingdom be the sphere of discipleship, then the key is in fact but authority to disciple.

Now there are keys, not simply a key; and so, if we are right, a double way of doing this is implied. The first is what the Lord Himself speaks of as "the key of knowledge," and which He reproaches the lawyers for taking from the people (Luke xi. 52). Similarly in this Gospel He denounces the Pharisees for shutting up the Kingdom of heaven against men. "Ye neither go in yourselves," He tells them, "neither suffer ye those that are entering to go in" (Matt. xxiii. 13).

But while the key of knowledge is thus the first and fundamental form of what is here, it is not the whole. There is also an authoritative reception, which the Lord has enjoined, and which, just as submission to authority, is most suited in entering the Kingdom. Baptism is thus "unto Christ" (Rom. vi. 3), and "unto the name of the Lord Jesus" (Acts viii. 16), an open "putting on of Christ" (Gal. iii. 27). It is thus a bowing to the authority of the King, as entering the Kingdom: "Arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling upon the name of the Lord," says Ananias to Saul (Acts xxii. 16). But the Lord Himself most distinctly puts the two keys together when, after His resurrection, with all authority given to Him in heaven and earth, He sends out the eleven with the commission of the King, saying: "Go and disciple all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the completion of the age (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20).

All this is in perfect harmony with the words to Peter here, and sufficiently explains them. Thus read, they are in the highest degree appropriate to the occasion upon which they were spoken, as introducing to the new state of things be bound in heaven, and whatsoever thou mayest [y] loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.

[y] cf. 2 Cor. 2. 6-8.

which was at hand. Their very character as outlining, rather than filling in, leaving much to be explained at an aftertime, is perfectly suited to their introductory position. This is not, however, all that the Lord announces here; He adds, "And whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven:" words which have been perhaps as much in contention as to their meaning as any of those connected with them here.

There need be no doubt that the terms "binding" and "loosing" have reference to, and are indeed but the application, in a Christian manner, of those in use among the Rabbins, and the Lord's extension of them to the assembly in the eighteenth chapter shows absolutely that such power as is implied in them was not simply to belong to Simon Peter. Two or three gathered to Christ's name have exactly the same authority, the same sanction of their acts; in either case the Lord uses the very same words: "Whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth," or "loose," "whatsoever ye shall bind," or "loose, on earth shall be bound (or loosed) in heaven." If this were the communication of even apostolic power to Peter, then every two or three gathered to Christ's name have similar apostolic power. No one doubts, of course, that Peter had this; no one, I suppose, would claim it for the two or three. That is not in contention: the question is solely now of what these words convey. The same words must have the same meaning, if there is to be any certain meaning in words at all: the application, or limitation, must be found in the connection. Not even the Romanist would say that there was to be absolutely no limitation, even in Peter's case; and if any did, he would have (if he would be consistent) to say exactly the same of every little gathering to the name of Jesus. No one certainly could press a conclusion in the one case that would not have exactly the same title to be pressed in the other.

Now, if we seek the limitation in the context, that in the case of the two or three is easily seen to be to cases of discipline needed to maintain the Lord's honor in their midst. The assembly does not define doctrine, and has no right to "teach for doctrine the commandments of men." Christ alone is the authoritative Teacher, by His Spirit, and all we are brethren (chap. xxiii. 8). But the assembly has to maintain by a holy discipline what is due to Him who is Head and Lord, and whatsoever is truly bound in this way is bound in heaven. Here moral conditions also, in the very nature of things, impose a limitation: for to "bind" a saint to do evil cannot be authorized in heaven, and it would be wickedness to maintain this.

When we take this back with us to Simon Peter's case, we shall find similar limitations. The context does not speak of the discipline of an assembly, but of administration in the Kingdom of heaven. This is not the Church, but the sphere of individual responsibility to the Lord, and hence the individuality of the assurance, "thou" not "ye." The connection here is with the keys of the Kingdom,—with discipling into it: here individual teachers teach, and disciples baptize. There is no limit to any class that Scripture gives us, except the limit of capacity, and no control over others recognized except as all are subject to the common discipline of which we have been speaking.

Peter, therefore, in what the Lord says to him here, is not the apostle, but the confessor of his Lord. In his faith he does not stand alone, but is the representative of others. As Peter, the living "stone," he does not stand alone either. In his use of the "keys" he is not alone; and in teaching and baptizing, the sanction of heaven is put upon what is done on earth; but nowhere apart from such necessarily implied conditions as we all own must come in in the case of two or three gathered to the Lord's name.

There is really no special difficulty in all this. The difficulties have been created for us by ecclesiastical views and claims which have grown up, as the [2] (xvi. 20-28): The cross the badge of the followers of the Crucified.

[2] Then [z]charged he his disciples, that they should say to no man that he was the Christ. From that time Jesus began to show to his disciples that he must go away to Jerusalem, and [a]suffer many things from the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and on the third day be raised again. And Peter taking him began to [b]rebuke him, saying, [God] be propitious to thee, Lord: this shall never be to thee. But he, turning round, said unto Peter, Get thee behind me, Satan; for thou art an [c]offence to me: for thou hast not a mind toward the things of God, but toward the things of men. Then Jesus said unto his disciples, If any one [z] ch. 17. 9. cfr. 2 Cor. 3. 12.

[a] ch. 17. 12.

[b] cfr. ver. 16. cf. Jno. 13. 36-38.

[c] cf. Gal. 1. 8. cf. Jno. 18. 10, 11.

Church, in the decline of spiritual power, came to lean upon external supports and to adopt a legal system as a refuge from license—the boat, as easier than walking on the water. Alas, it must be confessed it is; but oh, that Peter might here be suffered to speak to us of what he found in his walk upon that boisterous sea to meet His Lord, and of that Hand stretched out to meet him when the storm was beyond his strength, with the words which rebuked, not his rashness in walking there, but the little faith that had made it to appear but rashness.

[2] All this already tells of rejection of the King. Now He declares it to them in plain words such as He had not uttered yet. Those who have just expressed their faith in Him as the Christ are now told that they are not to utter this to any man. There is no hope as to the nation, and He shows them that He must "go to Jerusalem, and suffer many things from the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and the third day be raised up." It is not atonement of which He speaks, but of rejection by men, the human side of His death, and not the divine. But this brings out in him who had been the spokesman of the apostles the working of that which was not faith but the opposite of it, and in which the Lord discerned the attack of the enemy. "Peter took Him and began to rebuke Him, saying, God be propitious to Thee, Lord: this shall never be to Thee!" But He, turning round, said unto Peter, "Get thee behind Me, Satan; for thou art an offence unto Me; for thou hast not a mind toward the things of God, but toward the things of men."

Thus quickly are the thoughts rebuked of those who would put Peter upon a throne of infallibility above all others. He is now sunk down into a mere ordinary man, with nothing but the thoughts of men, nay, an instrument of Satan to tempt the Lord Himself. Satan too would willingly have spared Him that Cross that He foresaw: for all the counsels of God hung upon it. From one side it was, indeed, but the awful wickedness of man; but from another the display of the glory of God, at once in righteousness and in love towards men. Peter knew not yet his own need, nor yet the unique place and dignity of his Master. He is praying God to be propitious to Him who is to be Himself the one propitiation for others; and to spare Him that by which propitiation could alone be wrought. Thus human wisdom may mistake its way, and human affection set itself against the path of divine love. And thus may the same man who has just now been drinking in, in faith, the revelation of God, without any consciousness of the transition, presently with equal zeal and earnestness be listening to the adversary! How we need constantly to pray, "Search me, O God, and try me!"

But the Lord not only declares His own path; He announces it as the path also of all His followers. What was peculiar to Himself in it, the cup that none but Himself could drink, He does not speak of, and here there is indeed an infinite difference; but as far as man's part in it is concerned, He warns us all. "If any one will come after Me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow Me. For whosoever will save his life shall lose it; but whosoever shall will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his [d]cross and follow me. For whosoever will save his life* shall lose it; but whosoever shall lose his life* for my sake, shall find it. For [e]what shall a man be profited, if he gain the whole world, but suffer the loss of his soul*? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul*? For the Son of man is about to come in the [f]glory of his Father with his angels, and then shall he render to every one according to his doings. Verily I [d] Mk. 8. 34-38. Lk. 9. 23-26. cf. 2 Cor. 4. 10, 11.

[e] Mk. 8. 36, 37. cf. Lk. 12. 20, 21. cf. Jas. 5. 1-6.
[f] ch. 25. 31. cf. 2 Cor. 5. 10, 11. cf. Jude 14, 15. cf. Rev. 19. 11-21.

* ψυχη, soul or life.

lose his life for My sake shall find it." Thus the conditions of discipleship are laid down with the most decisive plainness, for all without exception. It is a world which has crucified Christ through which our path lies, and we have to make up our mind to face it. It is evident that He does not hold out any hope of the world changing, nor therefore of the path changing. The style of its opposition perhaps may change—even in His case it varied; but the opposition itself, proceeding from its unbelief in Him, could not possibly change, except by that unbelief being given up; and that would mean, of course, the world ceasing to exist, in all that which, according to Scripture, constitutes it the "world."

Its moral characteristics the apostle John describes for us, where he says that "all that is of the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world" (1 John ii. 16). When men are no more characterised by these things, then the world (as such) will have ceased to exist. We know that this has not taken place, however, and Scripture never contemplates such a state before the Lord comes, at least. The path still exists for us, therefore; and the conditions of the path exist.

The Lord calls upon His people, therefore, to take their life in their hand, if necessary in order to follow Him. We must not "will" to keep it, if we "will" to follow Him. That is to be the spirit of our discipleship, and with the implication, of course, that we shall be tested as to it. We know how fully the generations immediately following the days of the Lord on earth were tested—how often the cross and the sword and the flame made His people fully understand the conditions which He here proclaims. Can we fairly refuse the application to ourselves to-day? or to ask whether there is not still, and for all of us, such a test remaining? or if the spirit of such discipleship must not be found with us at least in order to abide the test?

Our lot may be cast in so-called Christian times and lands, and the arm of open persecution may seem to be, if not shattered, at least so weakened, as to permit us to look upon a test of this kind, for most of us, as hardly to be made. Christian profession is mostly in repute; Christians themselves are in high places of authority, the government as a whole would not wish to be considered other than Christian. The world still exists, but, as the parables we have considered show, and as we all must recognize, has changed its tactics. As Pharisees and Sadducees followed John when all the rest were doing so, so the world largely follows Christ now, after its own worldly fashion. The Church too, bids for popularity, and does not disclaim but is glad of the alliance. Amid all this, is it not possible for the spirit of discipleship any longer to find a cross, when the Church and the world unite to say, "Lord, Lord," and you are only asked not to take too seriously the things that He says?

Some way it must surely be that the Lord's words here must have to us also, if we are disciples, some present application; and that straightforward obedience, in the laxest and easiest times, would (even on that very account) find penalty of some real kind in seeking to follow Christ according to His word rather than popular interpretations of it. If this be not just the losing life, this say unto you that there are some of those [g]standing here who shall not taste of death until they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom.

[3](xvii. 1-8): The glory as goal and portion beyond.

[3] And [h]after six days Jesus taketh with [him] Peter and James and John his brother, and bringeth them up into a high mountain apart; and he was [i]transfigured

[g] cf. Mk. 9. 1 with 2 Pet. 1. 16–18. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 51.
[h] Mk. 9. 2–10. Lk. 9. 27–36.
[i] cf. Rev. 1. 13–16. cf. Heb. 2. 9; cf. 2 Cor. 4. 6.

cannot make it less imperative for one to suffer it; and good it is to go back in thought to times in which men in reality "suffered the loss of all things," and even "counted them but dung that they might win Christ." There can be no question that the Christ they went after in that way seemed to them unspeakably glorious; and for us it will be well indeed if, being the same Christ, He shine as bright.

The Lord closes here with that appeal to consider the soul's value which has rung through so many hearts since then: "For what shall a man be profited if he gain the whole world but lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" The question needs no answer: the impossibility to answer it is the answer. He adds, that it is the Son of man, soon to come in glory, who will render to every one according to his doings. Some of those standing there, moreover, should not taste of death until they saw the Son of man coming in His Kingdom.

[3] The reference made by one present at the Transfiguration (which now follows) to this as making visible "the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (2 Pet. i. 16) should settle all question as to meaning of the last quoted words; opinions as to which have been, however, most various. The great variety has all arisen from taking "the Son of man coming in His Kingdom" in a non-natural way as applying to the destruction of Jerusalem and the going out of the gospel and its successes,—both entirely different things. The "Son of man coming in His Kingdom" is a plain reference to the vision of Daniel (vii. 13, 14), which indeed in like manner has been interpreted as applying to the "gospel dispensation," or the Kingdom in that "mystery" form in which we have seen it in the parables of the thirteenth chapter. But this is not the Kingdom of the Son of man as Daniel and the New Testament agree in representing it. We find the expression, no doubt, in the interpretation of the parable of the "tares of the field" (ver. 41) but only when in time of harvest the end of the present time is reached, and the Son of man (having come) sends forth His angels to gather out of His Kingdom all things that offend and those that work iniquity, and cast them into the furnace of fire. Then, clearly, the gospel dispensation will be over, and the Kingdom will have taken its open and millennial form.

That the Kingdom of the Son of man is not the present one, the Lord's words to the overcomer in Laodicea (Rev. iii. 21) make absolutely plain, in which He distinguishes between the throne on which He had sat down with His Father—where no mere man could ever sit—and His own throne, which He will share with His people. The opening vision (chap. i. 13) assures us that it is as "Son of man" that He is speaking here. Thus, then, the "Son of man coming in His Kingdom" cannot refer to the present period.

The second epistle of Peter again helps us as to the meaning of the transfiguration, when it speaks of our being called "by glory and virtue" (i. 3). Glory at the end awaits us, to be reached by a pathway of trial, which necessitates "virtue" (or "courage") to endure it. The apostle evidently refers to what is recorded in the Gospel here, the transfiguration being directly spoken of in the latter part of the chapter, as we have already seen. In it he could not but realize the call of the glory. That which is at the end of the course is in it brought before the disciples at the beginning, to animate and strengthen them in view of what has just been declared as to the conditions of discipleship, and he can appeal to before them, and his face shone as the sun, and his garments became white as the light. And behold, there appeared unto them [j] Moses and Elias talking with him. And Peter answered and said to Jesus, Lord, it is [k] good for us to be here; if thou wilt, let us make here three tabernacles, one for thee, and one for Moses, and one

[j] cf. Deut. 18. 15, 18 with Acts 3. 22. cf. Mal. 4. 4, 5.
[k] Ps. 73. 28.

it in proof that "we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known to you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of His majesty: for He received from God the Father honor and glory, when there came to Him such a voice from the excellent glory, This is My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; and this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with Him on the holy mount." Thus it is the goal before them that is here exhibited to them, but the glory of the Kingdom, not the still more wondrous glory of which John speaks, "the glory of the Only begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father." It is the human side that is here dwelt upon, though of course one cannot be separated from the other. John does not give us the transfiguration, because the Only-begotten (as such) cannot be transfigured.

The "after six days" with which the account begins, both here and in Mark, (in Luke differently expressed as "about an eight days after,") has reference, I believe, to the final character of what the scene here pictures, after the time of labor and of overcoming is fulfilled. The three disciples whom alone the Lord takes up with Him to witness it, point out to us the need of intimacy with Him such as only the comparatively few possess, if we would enjoy such disclosures. The "high mountain" most probably was Hermon, which was near Cæsarea Philippi, but it is not named, and were this certain, we could base nothing on it. Earth has in fact no knowledge of the elevations where such visions of the future may be enjoyed, though even yet it is not so poor as to be without them; and at these times and places it is still the Lord Himself who puts on special glory before the eyes of those so blest as to behold it, and who is the glorious Centre around which all else revolves. So it surely will be in the day of His coming which is here before us. His face will shine as the sun,* for with Him the day will come—the blessed day in which the watch-night ends; and His apparel will be as the light, for it is with the light the sun apparels itself. It is God who is manifested in Him, and God is light. Earth is no more an outcast, but brought nigh.

Another thing takes place which strikes them with special wonder. "And behold, there appeared unto them Moses and Elias talking with Him." In the two other Gospels there are slight differences which yet must have significance: Mark says, "Elias with Moses;" Luke, in evident accordance with the character of the truth as he presents it, presses the fact of men being in such a place: "two men, which were Moses and Elias." In Matthew the lawgiver and the prophet of judgment because of the broken law, are mentioned in the natural order to remind us of this relation to each other. And they are talking with Jesus: so they had been, we may say, all through the centuries. Law in its fulfilment and law in its non-fulfilment, both alike required and foretold Him whose coming as the Priest-King is the full end of them reached. With Elias judgment itself is in view of restoration, and the last note of the Old Testament prophecy ends with the announcement of his preparation work. Thus Moses and Elias have each a special suitability in connection with this anticipation of the coming of the King. The ages are thus seen all through in harmony; and with power in the hand of Christ eternal harmony is perfectly secured.

Peter's voice breaks in, even here, and with words which show how he has

* Notice, that it is only Matthew who says this. Mark draws attention altogether to His garments. Luke says, His countenance was altered, and His raiment was white and glistering. The dispensational character of Matthew is here again strongly marked.

for Elias. While he was yet speaking, behold, a bright [k]cloud overshadowed them, and behold, a voice out of the cloud, saying, This is my beloved [m]Son, in whom I am well pleased: hear him. And when the disciples heard it, they fell upon their faces, and were exceedingly afraid. But Jesus came to [them] and [n]touched them, saying, Arise and be not afraid. And when they lifted up their eyes, they saw no man, but Jesus only.

[4] And as they descended from the mountain, Jesus [o]charged them, saying, Tell the vision to no one un[k] cf. Ex. 13. 21, 22. cf. Ex. 40. 34–38.

[m] ch. 3. 17. cf. 1 Pet. 1. 21.
[n] cf. Dan. 10. 10. cf. Rev. 1. 17.
[o] ch. 16. 20. cfr. Acts 9. 20.

[4] (xvii. 9–13): "Cut off and having nothing."

failed to realize the meaning of the glorious vision. Terribly like his would-be followers to-day, he would enshrine the saints alongside of Christ, and make the Kingdom which is to come a present thing; giving, moreover, his help as if it were needed to accomplish this! But here he is stopped at once, and by an overwhelming spectacle: "There came a bright cloud and overshadowed them"—the well-known token of the Divine Presence as it had led Israel of old through the desert, and dwelt in the sanctuary,—"and behold a Voice out of the cloud which said: This is My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear Him." No wonder that, "when the disciples heard it, they fell on their faces, and were sore afraid." It was, in fact, the holiest of all unveiled. They stood where, only once a year, and with covering incense and atoning blood, the feet of the high priest alone might stand. And they were but men of the people, no sacrifice in their hand, no covering incense, and the glorious Presence, which had long been absent from the temple,—nay, had never appeared since the captivity in Babylon,—was indeed here. He whom none could see and live, had drawn nigh to them, and they heard His voice, as the people had heard it of old, when they prayed, in their fear, that they might no more hear it.

Yet all else was changed from the time of the shaking mount. Nor was it the Law which was now proclaimed to them, a law which brought but the knowledge of sin, and was, indeed, its "strength" (1 Cor. xv. 56). This Voice pointed them but to the Son of God, whom Peter had but just now confessed as this, their own gracious Master; to put Him in His rightful place, and separate Him from all their misconceptions—from the misconceptions which, alas, have nevertheless followed Him since, and still follow Him. Moses and Elias had but been drawn thither by Him who had drawn them also, and opened heaven to them. Moses cannot open heaven, Elias brings but fire out of it, though he himself is caught away there: in Christ, the Son, the Father's Name is revealed, the object of the Father's heart is found, communion with God is attained, the throne of God becomes a throne of grace, His "Kingdom righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost." (Rom. xiv. 17). In all this He is alone, and thus alone is to be heard.

He comes now, therefore, and touches them, and says what He alone is able to say to such as we are, "Arise, and be not afraid." And now all else has disappeared: they see no man but Jesus only.

Here we have, then, the central features of the Kingdom, as Christ Himself will introduce it. In Moses and Elias, the dead and the living saints are represented; the glory in which He is seen is that of the Son of man; and the glory of His Father is also here. Thus the hearts of the disciples are strengthened in view of the cross by the knowledge of the end before them. "The knowledge of His glory" is given to sustain them by the way: "glory and virtue" are linked together as principles of the divine calling; for "if we suffer, we shall also reign with Him."

[4] After all, as yet even these favored disciples know little of what is implied by this glorious vision; and the rest seem not to have been prepared for it in any way, so that it is forbidden to be told them. It would not have given light, but dazzled. They themselves, as Mark tells us, did not know what the til the Son of man be risen from among the dead. And the disciples asked him, saying, Why then say the scribes, that Elias must first come? But he answered and said unto them, [p] Elias indeed cometh and shall restore all things; but I say unto you, that Elias is come already, and they did not recognize him, but did unto him whatsoever they would. So also the Son of man is about to suffer from them. Then the disciples understood that he spake to them of John the Baptist.

[p] ch. 11. 14, Lk. 1. 17. Mal. 4. 5. Mk. 9. 11-13.

[b] (xvii. 14-21): The conditions of availability of entrusted power.

[5] And [q] when they came to the multitude, there came to him a man falling on his knees to him and saying, Lord, have pity upon my son, for he is lunatic and suffereth sorely: for ofttimes he falleth into the fire, and oft into the water; and I brought him to thy [r] disciples, and they could not heal him. And Jesus answered and said, O faithless and perverse generation, how long shall I be with you? how long shall I bear with you? bring rising from the dead of which He spoke could mean; yet it was to be so soon the heart of their message. That Elias was to come and restore all things, as the scribes declared, they could not reconcile with the fact that Messiah was here, and as to the general condition nothing seemed accomplished. Elias they had just seen, but in what different connection! and the very glory of the heavenly vision only seemed, doubtless, to show the more the darkness of things on earth. They turn to Him with this question, which He answers with the assurance that Elias was indeed to come and to restore; but he had already come unrecognized, and men had treated him according to what was in their hearts. So too the Son of man was presently to suffer from them. And then they know that He has been speaking of John the Baptist.

[q] Mk. 9. 14-29. Lk. 9. 37-42. cf. Ps. 72. 4-6. cf. Is. 51. 21-23.

[r] cf. ch. 10. 1, 8. cf. John 14. 12. cf. Is. 63. 5.

But in fact it was difficult for them to reconcile what was so opposite: Messiah upon whom all depended for them, yet cut off and having nothing. And the divine purpose could not fail; but how could they imagine a victory by defeat, a cross as the way to glory? Israel rejecting also and rejected, and yet the promises to be fulfilled to her in spite of all. In fact, as Christians, we from another side have found it hard to keep the even balance of truth as to just these things. John was the Elias for his day, but "if they would receive it," as the Lord had already declared. It was in the wisdom of God that he should be so offered them for their acceptance, that there might be the complete trial of man thus: John being "sent to bear witness of that Light" whom he preceded, and who yet (as Light) needed no such witness, if they had had eyes to see. Alas, they had not eyes or hearts; and Elias, for the fulfilment of the message of Malachi, has yet to come, as Christ has also, to bring in the blessing of Israel to a repentant people. Meanwhile more wondrous purposes are being disclosed.

[5] The weakness and folly of man (which are but his perversity) are now exhibited among those who have received Christ, and have received from Him also a power which they are not competent to use. It is this which the case of the lunatic child is evidently intended to impress upon us. The disciples had been applied to, to cast out the demon, for which they had had authority given them by the Lord, and they had failed to do so. The father brings his child to Christ with this statement; and it is this which forces from Him the groan over a "faithless and perverse generation" by whom the love which bound Him to them was made to suffer through their unbelief. Seldom does the Lord exhibit to us so clearly the trial of uncongeniality which was His amid His chosen associates. Here it is openly exhibited, and the occasion was such as to require that the cause of a failure which had been manifest should be manifest also.

him hither to ˢme. And Jesus rebuked him, and the demon went out from him; and the child was healed from that hour. Then the disciples came to Jesus apart and said to him, Why could not we cast it out? And he saith unto them, Because of your ᵗlittle faith: for verily I say unto you, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard-[seed], ye shall say to this mountain, Depart hence to yonder place, and it shall depart; and nothing shall be impossible to you. But this kind goeth not out, except by ᵘprayer and fasting.

s cf. ch. 14. 18. cf. Jno. 15. 5. cf. Phil. 4. 13.

t cf. ch. 16. 8. cf. ch. 21. 21. cf. Lk. 17. 6.

u cf. Acts 13. 2, 3. cf. 2 Cor. 12. 9.

SUBDIVISION 5. (Chap. xvii. 22–xx. 28.)

Responsibility and Reward.

1 (xvii. 22–27): The place of sons of God, but to be held in grace.

1. AND while they abode in Galilee, Jesus said unto them, The Son of man is about to be ᵛdelivered up into the hands of men; and they will kill him; and on the third day he shall be raised up: and they were grieved exceedingly.

v ch. 16. 21. Mk. 9. 30–32. Lk. 9. 43–45.

But He remained still, only the more seen as the unique dependence of His people. "Bring him to Me," is the assurance of resources that cannot be overtaxed, at the command of a love that cannot be too absolutely relied on. Accordingly the demon departs, and the child is healed. Matthew does not give us the details which we find in Mark, but leaves thus the main point clearer, the glorious power so freely used, where disciples have failed, with all else. But the failure must be searched out, and the disciples themselves inquire about it. They are not conscious of the cause of it, which the Lord had already implicitly declared, and now does explicitly: "Because of your little faith: for verily I say unto you, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Depart hence, and it shall depart; and nothing shall be impossible to you." This implies, of course, that we are on the path of His appointment for us: for, indeed, faith is impossible for any other; and the suggestive figure of the mountain speaks clearly of the disappearance of the most firmly rooted obstacles in a path like this. In the path of self-will and self-indulgence, how vain would it be to expect anything of this kind! And this the closing words here show: for "prayer" is vain—"we ask and have not," when we "ask amiss, to consume it upon our lusts"—or "pleasures" (Jas. iv. 3);—and "fasting," if it is to have any spiritual value, implies self-mortification. People often speak of having (or not having) faith for the path; the truth is, we must have the path for faith: faith for any other path than God's is plainly an impossibility.

SUBD. 5.

The responsibilities of the Kingdom follow, by an easy transition, upon the principles of it as thus declared; closing with a view of the rewards of grace in which love will satisfy itself at the end of the way. We have here, not merely the fact that there are such, but the doctrine as to them—a most important one—and giving us a precious and wonderful insight into heaven itself, which is a sweet and how fitting conclusion to all this part. After this the Lord presents Himself openly to Israel, and the final scenes draw on.

1. The governing principle is what comes first before us; and this, as we have seen, is the cross. Accordingly the Lord again speaks of it to His disciples now. He does not apply it; and nothing further is connected with it here, except the exceeding grief of His disciples. But it is not difficult to trace it as in moral connection with what follows. The Son of God as Son of man passing through the world, is not discerned by the men of it. Had they possessed this wisdom, "they would not have crucified the Lord of glory." True, it was guilty ignor-

And when they came into Capernaum they that received the half-shekel * came to Peter and said, Doth not your teacher pay the half-shekel? He saith, Yea. And when he came into the house, Jesus anticipated him, saying, What thinkest thou, Simon? From whom do the kings of the earth take custom or tribute? from their sons, or from strangers? And when he said, From w cf. Ex. 38. 26.

* Literally, "the didrachma," equivalent to the Jewish half-shekel, which was the annual tribute for the temple-service. The value of the shekel is variously estimated at from 2*s.* 3*d.* to over 3*s.* or from 50 to 70 cents.

ance, the result of being so absolutely in contrast with Him spiritually; and the followers of their Master are, just in proportion as they resemble Him, in the same way unknown. "Therefore the world knoweth us not," says the apostle, "because it knew Him not" (1 John iii. 1). Being thus rejected, He accepts it without contention, and in this too calls upon His disciples to follow Him. At Capernaum those that collected the half-shekel which was the temple-tribute, come to Peter and ask him: "Doth not your Teacher pay the half-shekel?" He at once answers, in entire forgetfulness of the glory of Him whom He had confessed as the Son of God, that He did pay it. If it were the atonement-money, the dishonor done to Him would be most manifest, yet the Lord raises no question upon this ground; and, according to the institution of Ex. xxx. 11–16 that was only required upon the occasion of a numbering of the children of Israel. Joash, however, refers to it (2 Chron. xxiv. 6), when urging contributions for the temple-service; but evidently as a precedent only, as the restrictions of the law were not carried out in the answer to his exhortation. "After the return from the captivity," says Farrar, "this bekah, or half-shekel, became a voluntary annual tax of a third of a shekel"—showing it was hardly looked at as carrying out the original enactment of the law of Moses—"but at some subsequent period had again returned to its original amount." The Lord treats it as a simple temple-tribute, but even on this ground cannot let pass the question of its claim upon Him. He does more than as such resist it for Himself: He puts His rash and forgetful disciple along with Himself, as free.

He does not wait for Peter's question, but shows His divine knowledge by anticipating it. "What thinkest thou, Simon?" He asks; "from whom do the kings of the earth take custom or tribute? from their sons, or from strangers?" There could be but one answer: "From strangers." "Surely then," the Lord replies, "the sons are free."

But, though He vindicate this liberty, in practice He does not insist upon it. Personal right one is always entitled to surrender, and the "giving offence"—the causing spiritual injury—to any one, by any claim of it, though misunderstood wholly, that were indeed for Him, the Lord and yet the Servant of His people's need, impossible to be thought of. "But that we may not give them offence, go to the sea, and cast a hook, and take up the fish that cometh up first; and when thou hast opened its mouth, thou shalt find a shekel: that take, and give unto them for me and thee."

Thus He veils His glory, yet declaring it in the very way in which He veils it. To summon a fish of the sea to pay the tribute for Him, guards indeed well His glory, as the Lord of that higher temple which Israel's temple figured, and which is the universe that His hands have made (Heb. ix. 23, 24). There is not even the appearance of compromise as to what He is, and only His grace is shown in thus stooping. Not an adversary even can cavil at it; and the weakest instead of stumbling, can find in it only measureless comfort in the realization of this union of power and grace in Him.

But not only so: as "Son over" this "house of God" (Heb. iii. 1–6), He can make others free of it (John viii. 36). Yea, He can set free the very slaves—

[x] strangers, Jesus said unto him, Surely then the sons are free. But that we may not give them offence, go to the [y] sea and cast a hook, and take the fish that cometh up first; and when thou hast opened its mouth, thou shalt find a shekel *: that take and give to them for me and thee.

x cf. Is. 60. 10, 16, 17. cf. Is. 49. 23.
y cf. Rev. 17. 15 with Is. 60. 3-9. cf. Hag. 2. 7-9.

2 (xviii. 1-14): The lowliness which exalts.
1 (1-5): needed for entrance into the Kingdom.

2. [1] At that time the disciples of Jesus came unto him, saying, [z] Who, then, is the greater in the kingdom of heaven? And he called to him a little child, and set it in the midst of them, and said, Verily I say unto you, Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven.

z Mk. 9. 33-37. Lk. 9. 46-48.

* Greek: "stater;" equal to a shekel.

and there is no slavery in God's universe but that of sin—and make them sons of the house of which He is Master. And this is what He shows us now in Peter, the representative disciple, as we have so lately seen him. The fish brings the tribute-money for him also, a piece which is the equivalent of two half-shekels: "For Me and thee," the Lord says; not "for us": for if He had not His unique glory, we could not have our blessing. "For Me," and so, through My grace, "for thee:" and in this (or what is implied in it) we all have part.

We, through His grace, are sons of God, and free. Yet must we be content to wait for the time when we shall be recognized as this, and in the meanwhile to pay tribute, as if we were not what we are. Not expecting recognition, and not claiming rights, and earnest to avoid giving offence by any self-assertion, our privilege, as well as our responsibility, is to walk in the steps of Him with whom the path of humiliation and of service was His choice and glory.

2. [1] This lowliness of spirit is now insisted on in the strongest way, the Lord using a little child as His text throughout, and in answer to a question proposed by His disciples which evidenced their need of such instruction. There had been a dispute among them, the other synoptists tell us, as to who among them should be the greater. The Lord's words about the keys to Peter, and His joining him with Himself in payment of the temple-tax, may have led to this; but the cause is not stated, nor is it important. The important thing was the condition of soul which the question itself revealed. Greatness was what they sought; and in that which they owned to be the Kingdom of heaven, yet which (as they are shown later) they are making but a kingdom of the Gentiles in their thoughts, a place for the gratification of ambition and self-seeking. In this a little child was capable of being their instructor. Jesus called to Him a little child, and placed him in the midst of them and said, with one of His emphatic affirmations, "Verily I say unto you, Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall in no wise ENTER into the Kingdom of heaven."

The question was here a more fundamental one than that which they had started. One must enter it, in order to be great in it; and ambition could not even enter. It is plain that, while merely the ordinary term is used here, which applies both to the mystery- and the final form of the Kingdom, yet it is of the latter both the disciples and the Lord are speaking. They have in mind the time when "greatness" will be estimated by the King, and receive its reward, and the Lord states the necessary condition for even entrance into it at that time.

The word for "be converted" is simply "turn yourselves," though surely here having reference to that spiritual change, for which a compound form of it is generally used, of somewhat stronger meaning. The little child as a symbol reminds us of the way in which God has ordained that men should enter the present life, most surely in lowliness and feebleness enough. The long drill and discipline of childhood might well seem intended to "hide pride from man,"

Whosoever then shall humble himself as this little [a]child, he is the greater in the kingdom of heaven. And whosoever shall receive one such little child in my name, receiveth me.

[a] Lk. 18. 14, 17. cf. Ps. 131. 2.

2 (6-9): offences against little ones.

2 But whosoever shall [b]offend one of these little ones that believe in me, it were better for him that a great millstone had been hanged about his neck, and he sunk in the depth of the sea. Woe to the world because of offences! for offences must needs come; but woe to the man by whom the offence cometh! And if thy [c]hand or thy foot cause thee to offend, cut it off and cast it from thee: it is good for thee to enter lame or maimed into life, rather than having two hands or two feet to be cast into the eternal fire. And if thine eye cause thee to offend, pluck it out and cast it from thee: it is good for thee with one eye to enter into life, rather than having two eyes to be cast into the hell of fire.

[b] Mk. 9. 42. Lk. 17. 1, 2. cf. Rom. 14. 13, 15. 21.

[c] ch. 5. 29, 30. Mk. 9. 43–48.

3 (10-14): the Father's face and heart.

3 See that ye despise not one of these little ones: for I say unto you that their [d]angels in heaven continually behold the face of my Father who is heaven. For the [d] cf. Acts 12. 15 with 2 Cor. 5. 8.

and the mercy of God it is that provides for beings so helpless, the love and care which after all, in such a world as this, so generally wait upon the birth of children. So also is it with the beginning of spiritual life, which we enter not as doers of something great, but in feebleness and poverty to receive grace, not due. And the end is as the beginning: it is in grace we grow; at the end as at the beginning, it is salvation that we receive; reward at last is not claim but mercy. In this way it is as little children that the Kingdom of heaven must be entered; and in proportion to the simplicity with which this is done will the true character of the Kingdom be attained. "A little child" may, indeed, have in its heart the seed of ambition as of all other evil, but not the man who estimates himself but as that. To him no ambitious thought is possible. While the Lord in His grace identifies Himself with the least of His own; so as to assure every one that his littleness will not make him of little account to Him. This is an assurance which prevents the consciousness of nothingness becoming a distress; nay, rather, enables us only the more to realize the sweetness of a love so great.

2 Thus it wraps itself about the objects of it, like a mother with a babe, and grows, as one might think, passionate in denouncing those who would injure them. "But whosoever shall offend one of these little ones that believe in Me, it were better for him that a great mill-stone were hanged about his neck, and he sunk in the depth of the sea;"—so does God care for the feeblest of His own!

But offences would come: "woe to the world because of" them; yea, "woe to the man by whom the offence cometh!" And here the Lord repeats, with more general application, what He had said in the sermon on the mount with more special reference to the seventh commandment of the law. Better to cut off hand or foot,—better to pluck out an eye, if it caused offence, than to retain these and be cast into the hell of fire. It is the Saviour of men, He who died in His love to redeem them, who ever gives the most earnest and emphatic warning of that to which sin of necessity brings those who cleave to it.

3 But His heart turns to what is more congenial; "See that ye despise not one of these little ones; for I say unto you that their angels in heaven continually behold the face of My Father who is in heaven." Well, then, may they be held in loving regard by men. But the doctrine of the passage has its difficulty. De Wette, as quoted by Lange, says with regard to it: "In the Old Son of man came to save that which was [e]lost. What think ye? If a man have a [f]hundred sheep, and one of them be gone astray, doth he not leave the ninety and nine upon the mountains, and go and seek that which is gone astray? And if it be that he find it, e Lk. 19. 10. cf. Rom. 3. 23 with Rom. 5.12.

f Lk.15.4-7.

Testament we only read of guardian angels of empires (Dan. x. 13, 20). But at a later period the Jews believed also in the existence of guardian angels for individuals (Targum of Jonathan on Gen. xxxiii. 10, xxxv. 10, xlviii. 16). Similarly also the New Testament (Acts xii. 7?)" Yet he takes it as figurative, in which way it would be hard to understand it. Meyer, approved by Lange, in opposition to this says, "The belief in guardian angels is clearly admitted by Christ." Probably most agree with this; Dr. Brown remarks: "Among men, those who nurse and rear the royal children, however humble in themselves, are allowed free entrance with their charge, and a degree of familiarity which even the highest state ministers dare not assume. Probably our Lord means that, in virtue of their charge over His disciples (Heb. i. 14; John i. 51), the angels have errands to the Throne, a welcome there, and a dear familiarity in dealing with His Father which is in heaven, which on their own matters they could not assume." This, however, seems too much like the state of an earthly court, from which it is rash to draw analogies for heaven. The difficulty as to interpreting our Lord's words as referring to guardian angels is that it seems a very indecisive passage to stand alone for the doctrine, which assuredly the verses in Hebrews and in John's Gospel do not teach. Daniel more nearly approaches it, though the angels representing the empires there seem all to be evil, and only Michael as "prince" of the Jewish people is really in any sense a "guardian" (see Dan. x. 21).

But the Lord's words seem to apply strictly to "little children," and not simply to believers as designated in that way. He is not telling His disciples not to despise believers, but certainly what might seem to them comparatively of little account, which believers as such would not. (Comp. chap. xix. 13.) On the other hand, we have no reason that I am aware of, for introducing into what is here the additional thought that there is restriction even among the unfallen angels as to seeing the Father's face. The fallen condition in which we are is that, rather, one would suppose, which makes such a restriction seem necessary or natural.

The passage in the Acts referred to, though commonly taken to imply also the Jewish doctrine of guardian angels, hardly seems capable of being reconciled with it: for why should a guardian angel assume Peter's voice, so as to be mistaken for him? and in this place Brown interprets "his angel" to be "his disembodied spirit, his ghost." The two passages in this case would strengthen one another; and the children's angels, or spirits, being permitted to behold the Father's face in heaven would be indeed an admonition not to despise them, as well as an unspeakable comfort as to the condition of an infant after death.

The next clause is omitted in some ancient MSS. and versions, and it has been thought to be an insertion from Luke xix. 10; but, as others have remarked, the omission of "to seek"—simply, "the Son of man came to save that which is lost"—is significant. They are lost ones needing a Saviour; but seeking implies a condition of active wandering from God such as in their case is hardly begun yet.

His own joy in salvation—the joy of the Shepherd over a lost sheep found—the Lord then emphatically declares. It is but a glimpse of what we have in Luke poured fully out, and here without the contrast of Pharisees with "tax-gatherers and sinners," there brought out so vividly. The ninety and nine in this case seem but brought in to emphasize how the one lost has concentrated upon him in the meantime all the solicitude, and, when found, the tenderness of the Shepherd, as if there were not another. Yet this over-abounding joy

3 (15-20): Holiness and satisfaction in the place of Christ's Name.
1 (15-18): Authority to maintain holiness given to the assembly.

verily I say unto you that he rejoiceth more over it than over the ninety and nine that went not astray. Even so it is not the will of your Father who is in heaven that one of these little ones should perish.

3. [1] But if thy [g]brother sin [against thee],* go and show him his fault between thee and him alone: if he hear g Lk. 17.3,4. cf. Gal.6.1,2. cf. Eph. 4. 30-32.

*Some old MSS. omit "against thee."

does not, in fact, disparage the interest in them which is only for the moment not in the same way realized. Let any of these become the lost, they too would arouse the same anxiety and tenderness. In Luke the parable is uttered to a different audience, and in other circumstances which combine to present these ninety and nine in a manner in some respects very different from this.

Here it is the Father's will which He has come to carry out, and it is not the Father's will that one of these little ones should perish. How sweet and perfect an assurance! It is only the contrary will of man that hinders his salvation: on God's part there can be no contrary one: "As I live, saith the Lord, I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth." Thus the little ones removed from us by death we may trust confidently to the divine love which waits on them. Our assurance as to them is rooted in the unchangeableness of the divine nature.

3. The Lord goes on to speak of holiness, which is also absolutely characteristic of God, and which must be maintained by all who are associated with His name on earth: "Let him that nameth the name of the Lord," says the apostle, "depart from iniquity." The assembly comes here, therefore, into a special place of responsibility; and for the first time we find it assuming a position and exercising powers for which He has endowed it with authority as representing Him. On the other hand, in most suited connection with this, we find His people reminded of their weakness and dependence upon Him: a dependence which, when realized, brings in that assured and ready help which makes it but a means of realizing in turn the resources and nearness of the living God. The whole is crowned with the assurance of His presence in the midst, where two or three are gathered to His Name; and this at once seals their commission to maintain what is due to Him under whose authority they act, and pledges Him to meet all their necessities.

But this is another text which, having been variously interpreted, calls for careful examination at our hands.

[1] The disciples having been charged to avoid what would be offence against another, and as to themselves rather to get rid of what might seem like hand or foot than go on with what was matter of offence, are now taught how to deal with sin in another.

But at once question begins: What is the sin which we have to do with here? and are we to take it as generally taken, as simply personal trespass? For some of the most ancient MSS. and some editors omit the "against thee" of the common version, and have only "if thy brother sin," which would seem to make it wider. This can however, I think, be better settled as we go on, and we may leave it for the present undecided.

But undoubtedly we are to remember that, in any case, the thing to be considered by us is what the Lord calls "sin," and we must not allow ourselves to admit practically a lighter word than that. "Sin," whether it be against oneself or not, is something which should bring up at once before us the psalmist's deep realization, "Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned" (Ps. li. 4); words which only appear the more striking as we think of the dreadful character of that which he had committed against his neighbor. Sin can only be viewed rightly as against God; and to treat it so we must be before God about it. We must know how, in Old Testament language, to eat the sin-offering in the holy place.

thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if he do not hear [thee], take with thee one or two more, that by the mouth of [h]two or three witnesses every word may be established. And if he will not listen to them, tell it h 2 Cor. 13. 1. Deut. 19. 15.

This is the only fully effectual corrective of the danger from any personal element, wherever (as in the present case is generally taken for granted) that may be found. In the presence of God sin is truly judged, but therefore judged in ourselves first; and so it is we obtain that "spirit of meekness," in which alone we are able to "restore" those "overtaken in a fault" as considering our own proneness to temptation (Gal. vi. 1). That is the first thought here, and always as regarding one who has sinned—restoration: "if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother." There is not to be the thought, as presently and plainly insisted on, of "pay me that thou owest," but of gaining a brother: of winning him back to all that belongs to Christian brotherhood. For sin means collapse, estrangement from this,—a shadow over the glory of "what is really life," and dishonor to Christ and to God. How in the apprehension of this, could one even think of one's own things, save as one may truly find them in the thought of a "brother"!

And this governs all in this first step taken: "go and show him his fault"—literally, "convict him," bring him to conviction—"between thee and him alone." Let there be no needless exposure, no pain that can be spared, nothing that would arouse resentment, and so most surely hinder recovery. He is to feel that, as Elihu with Job, you desire to justify him,—if that may not be, yet to put his case into his own hands for trial, and lift him up into the Christian place of judgeship, master of himself once more.

Grace is in anywise the only power over sin. It is not laxity, as people misconceive it, but always sin's unsparing enemy and scourge. "Sin shall not have dominion over you, because ye are not under law, but under grace." Yet how often do those who are themselves wholly debtors to grace, use the law without hesitation in their dealings with one another. Of course, they betray in this their own slight knowledge, while the fruit is reaped in failure to maintain the holiness they seek. We cannot, by our will to do it, make that which is the "strength of sin" become its antidote.

But if this, then, be the divine principle in dealing with it, it is plain that whether it is sin against myself or against another can make no difference. This does not come into consideration, and the reading which would leave it out seems practically right. If it is grace that is moving me for a brother's deliverance, it can make no difference against whom the sin is. Nay, if it is in my brother, it is against me necessarily, if not directly: it injures me, aggrieves me, as one of the family. It will in any case work the same misery: it is equally against God my Father, against Christ my Lord, and against the soul of him who has committed it; while again grace requires not to find a legal title to proceed, as in my own matters, but in the needs to which it ministers finds its sufficient justification. In any case, the principle applies, wherever and so far as the circumstances permit the application; there is supposed, as we see, a condition of things in which love finds its call and opportunity, and which cannot, perhaps, and need not, be further defined.

The next step to be taken, if the first be ineffectual, is to "take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established." These witnesses are not to establish the truth of the charge: for of this the one who has sinned is already "convicted," but to bring the influence of the truth to bear upon him the more by their confirmation. They are a jury of appeal to make him realize the gravity rather than the truth of his sin, —a midway step between the private reasoning and the full publicity of the assembly. Love would yet spare the person, while it cannot spare the sin; and therefore the present procedure.

to the [h]assembly; but if he will not listen even to the assembly, let him be unto thee as a [j]Gentile and a tax-gatherer. Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall [h] ch. 16. 18. cf. 1 Cor. 5. 4. cf. 1 Tim. 3. 15.

[j] cf. 2 Thess. 3. 14, 15; cf. 1 Cor. 5. 9-13.

The third appeal is to the assembly as a whole, which is defined in what follows as a gathering to the name of Christ. It is astonishing that any could have had the thought here of the Jewish synagogue, although it is true that the Christian assembly did not yet exist, and that the Lord is speaking anticipatively; but the same could be said in general of what is before us in all this part of Matthew. The Christian assembly has as yet only once been spoken of, and in the present case it is a local one—a "gathering," for which we must wait historically for the Acts. Here we have it strikingly for the first time as entrusted with the maintenance of holiness in connection with Christ's Name on earth. It is, as we see, the last court of appeal, and to whose acts He gives, in the most solemn way, authoritative sanction. The case is left in its hands for final decision, which is supposed to be in accordance with what has been done before; and now, "if he refuse to hear the assembly, let him be unto thee as a Gentile and a tax-gatherer."

This is the fourth step therefore: the man is now to be treated as in an outside place, as a Gentile, a "man of the nations," by itself expresses. A "tax-gatherer" adds to this the thought of having lost the place inside by his unworthiness. The outside place is manifest: of course, in the Lord's lips it could not mean any dismissal of care and thought and labor after the one so treated. It is one of that hated class—the tax-gatherers—who records, and alone records, this injunction: himself the most signal example of the grace that sought all such. On the other hand, while business intercourse and communications might go on, even in all this would it be but the more apparent that what was Christian had come to an end, till divine grace should restore it. The Christian in the world was to be but the reflex of his Master's mind; and as surely as He could not go on with sin, no more could those who were to act on earth for Him who had left it.

It is true that it is said here, "let him be to thee," and this is the binding of this conduct on the individual; but any proper consideration given to the matter will assure us that this could not possibly mean that this refusal of Christian fellowship was to be merely on the part of the one against whom the sin had been. Were the witnesses who had shown their sympathy up to this point with the brother who had been sinned against, now to withdraw it, and go on in fellowship with him they had condemned, because the case was not their own? Was the brother offended, and to whom at least this must apply, to act in such a way, not because of the sin, but because he himself was the person wronged? How this would destroy the whole character of discipline, as well as the spiritual character of Christian fellowship!

The assembly would be little Christian which could become partner to any thing of this sort, or look at sin as having merely a particular reference, and not being the general concern of all. The next verse also, which applies, of course, to the assembly as a whole, negatives absolutely any such conclusion. For here, in the fifth place, the numerical order certifying it as a principle of divine government in the kingdom of God at hand,—the power of God allying itself here to human weakness—the Lord adds, with one of His "verilies," the oath for confirmation, which is an end of all dispute: "Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven."

The Church on earth acts for its absent Lord; and, as so acting, He gives it His authority with the broad seal of royalty attached to the commission. Without this it could not move in the regulation of such matters at all: all the authority that it has is delegated to it by the King: it is not a democracy, but a monarchy most absolute,—a Kingdom not of man but of God.

[k] bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. k ch. 16. 19.

2 (19): The assurance to united prayer.

[2] Again I say unto you, that if two of you [l] agree on earth concerning any matter about which they may ask, it shall come to pass for them from my Father who is in heaven. l cf. Heb. 13. 18. cfr. Acts 5. 9.

It is plainly also in the moral sphere that the commission applies; and this at once makes known its limitations. In nothing so plainly as in the moral sphere is every thing based upon the character of God Himself. Every thing here is fixed, therefore, and unchangeable. The Church cannot so much as define what good or evil is. Every conscience here is subject to God alone, and the only appeal to it is as the appeal of light to the eye—the appeal of self-evidence. The eye may be diseased, the conscience hardened, the appeal useless; but this is always a result of rejecting the light: the light itself is divine, not human; and brings the soul before God, not man, not the Church. The rule of conscience means in result the rule of God, just as that of the eye would mean that of the light. Though light and the eye are very different things, yet the "light of the body is the eye."

The Church is a body not legislative but executive: it does not decree what shall be, but decides upon what is. It has authority to act, but upon lines laid down for it; and authority to act does not guarantee the action. But unless the action be according to His mind, it should be plain that the Lord could not sanction it. He could not "bind" sin upon one who had not sinned, nor "loose" it where there had been no repentance. This would be to put evil for good and good for evil, and to put the Church above her Lord. Either, then, the Church's action is secured infallibly, or there are conditions implied which we shall be able to gather from the context.

In the specified case to which this assurance is appended, it is abundantly plain that it is a case of real "sin:" "if thy brother sin." Of this he is to be convicted, and witnesses brought in, and then it is to be told to the assembly. This is the case in which the assembly is authorized to act, and only in such plain cases. As far as we read here, if the case were not plain,—if there were not, therefore, agreement about it,—it would not be such as would give title, or (to speak better) impose responsibility, to act at all. It must be in the light, not in the dark, we walk. The fact is, that it is not here that the Church has ever realized its real difficulties, although, of course, here also there may be unfaithfulness to the Lord, and what is to be done then is not yet taken up. We are here at the beginning of things, and must expect, in this, as in other matters, to have the truth gradually unfolded to us. The point is here, that the Church is guardian of the holiness to be always associated with the profession of the name of the Lord; there is no question at present of doctrine at all, and it would be premature to speak of it yet in any explicit way; though something may be inferred in what almost immediately follows: but that is another thing.

[2] The sense of responsibility should lead ever to the sense of weakness, and this is the order of thought here. Remembering the need of His people, the Lord now assures them of the way in which they may count upon Him for the supply of all their need. And, like Him, He does not limit it to this or any particular need: "Again I say unto you, that if two of you shall agree together on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of My Father who is in heaven." Above all is this assurance needed where, as the connection would imply, and in some measure the agreement also, the acting together as representatives of Christ on earth is that as to which need is realized. Here one cannot but feel the grace of this lowest possible number for consent or united action. Supposing there were no more together in a place, or that others failed to realize the need, yet here would the Lord meet those who did so. Thus, while not necessarily implying the failure of His people, He provides for it. How tender are these all-seeing Eyes that contemplate us!

[3] (20): the place of His presence.

[3] For [m] where two or three are gathered together unto my name, there am I in the midst of them.

[m] cf. Acts 20. 7. cf. 1 Cor. 11. 20.

cf. Deut. 12. 5; etc. 1 Cor. 1. 10-13.

[3] And He adds this assurance, the unspeakable comfort of His people ever since: "For where two or three are gathered together unto My Name, there am I in the midst of them."

It is not "in My Name," as in the common version, but "unto:" His name being thus the central point of gathering. "In His name" would be by His authority, or as representing Himself: both things, of course, true, but neither of them defining, as this does, the Christian assembly. His Name speaks of doctrine—the truth of what He is, Himself being absent; and where He, apprehended by faith, thus draws His people together, there He promises Himself to be among them, their sufficient resource and the sanction of what they do in the manner already enjoined to maintain in love the holiness of His name.

It should be evident that more is intended here than to declare His readiness to meet the need of two or three who unite to supplicate Him in some common interest. This is simply appended to what has been before enjoined in the matter of assembly discipline, and both are sealed with this final promise of His presence where two or three are gathered to His name: words which must apply to the assembly so gathered. His presence in their midst is more directly called for by their action in the first case as representing Him than by their supplication in the second. Compare the apostle's words to the Corinthians (1 Cor. v. 3–5), though the Lord's here are so much more, as He is Himself beyond all other.

No body of people gathered to aught but the truth as to what Christ is could have any claim to the promise here, as none who fulfil this condition could be excluded. If those are admitted among the orthodox who are themselves unorthodox, and this be deliberate, then it is plain His Name ceases to be that to which such a company is gathered. The orthodoxy even of the mass cannot make up for the failure as to the gathering-point. However many the Christians there, the gathering is not Christian.

A false Christ is not Christ; deliberately held to, it is the denial of Christ; and here it is important to remember that ignorance is by no means the same thing as denial, which assumes knowledge. As to the blessed Person of the Lord His own words declare our common ignorance as to much: "No man knoweth the Son but the Father." But that which Scripture declares of Him is by that fact no longer to be beyond our knowledge, but what is committed to our trust as the vital centre of all truth and blessing. Christ is the manifestation of God, the Redeemer of men; as the Word of God, by whom and for whom all things were created, He is the Sum of all knowledge that is really such. Aberration here is quick distortion of all other things. Thus "gathered to My name" is vital to the Assembly. They are in the world as His representatives; the Spirit by which they are baptized into one body is in them to glorify Him. How would every thing be lost if His Church could accept a substitute for Him; or allow the darkening of one glory of the "Light of men"!

Here, then, is the Church as it is presented to us for the second time and in living activity in the Gospel of Matthew. In no other Gospel is it presented to us at all. And here it is seen, as we may say, according to the constant character of Matthew, as in the Kingdom, and in the exercise of authority suited to the Kingdom of heaven. We have nothing as yet of the Body of Christ, or of espousal to Him; nothing of it even as indwelt of the Holy Spirit, nor explicitly as the house of God—though it is what He builds, and Peter and such as he are "stones" in the building: a building instinct with glorious life, against which the gates of hades cannot prevail: a living Church, manifesting its life in love and holiness, finding its centre of attraction and controlling authority in Him who is its Creator and Lord, refusing all other. Such is the picture given to us in the Gospels.

SECTION 4. (Chap. xviii. 21-35.)

The failure in mercy of one who has received mercy.

1 (21, 22): Grace to be constant.

[1] Then Peter came and said to him, Lord, [n] how often shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? till seven times? Jesus saith unto him, I say not unto thee, until seven times, but until [o] seventy times seven.

2 (23-27): The debtor forgiven.

[2] Therefore is the kingdom of heaven likened unto a human king* who would have a reckoning with his servants. And when he had begun to reckon, there was brought to him one who owed him [p] ten thousand n cf. Ps. 78. 40. ver. 15.

o Lk. 17.3,4. cfr. Gen. 4. 24.

p cf. Ps. 40. 12.

* Literally, "a man, a king."

Sec. 4.

We have now a solemn word upon the responsibility of showing grace in a day of grace. In His teaching as to prayer the Lord has already warned us to the same effect, in words which are almost identical with those which close the parable before us. But here the principle is shown us in the full extent of its application, and enforced in the most absolute way.

[1] The first object in dealing with a brother who has sinned is, as we have seen, restoration. If he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. Forgiveness is necessarily grounded upon the "hearing," for that alone would show restoration. But Peter has a question here: how often is there to be forgiveness? The Rabbins had already decided as to this, and their limit was three times. Peter has so far appreciated the spirit of the Lord's words as to more than double this number. Seven was the perfect number: shall his forgiveness of an offending brother be "till seven times"? But the Lord answers, He has put no such limit; and then He puts one which is practically none at all: "I say not unto thee, until seven times, but until seventy times seven." I suppose it would test Christian grace in us, to go even half way to such a boundary line; but the Lord does not mean us seriously to contemplate this. Could it be a question how often I should gain my brother? Peter is after all still viewing things from the stand-point of personal rights. He must still be seeking in some measure his own; but "love seeketh not her own." Hence the personal element still rules here—"sin against me, and I." The Lord takes up, therefore, this very side of things, but to turn it in another direction: "how oft shall I sin against God, and God forgive me?" If there be no limit here, and I am in the sense of this, how can this question of Peter be asked at all?

[2] The similitude which the Lord draws for us here is necessarily a similitude of the Kingdom of heaven. It is not after all a picture of perfect grace, such as we know it in God, although this is as nearly approached as possible for the purpose of the illustration; and, of course, it is a true presentation of God, in no wise inconsistent with the fullest grace. But the Lord will not image one of His own people in the picture that He gives of this unmerciful servant. He is one with the responsibility of such a profession, but without the real apprehension of divine grace, as his conduct shows. Hence the grace shown to him is not the unconditional grace of the gospel, but that which, in fact, is manifested in the Kingdom, as in "baptism for the remission of sins" (Acts ii. 38) where the grace witnessed to is manifestly conditioned, as here, upon the truth of discipleship. The Kingdom, as we see in the parables, embraces the true and the false, and in it all is governmental, conditional blessing.

The Kingdom of heaven is likened here unto a human king; which prepares us for certain points in it which we must not attribute to the divine. The king here will have a reckoning with his servants; and no sooner has he begun to reckon than there is brought to him one with an overwhelming debt, which argues in itself surely something more than any misfortune can account for. He is ordered, therefore, to be sold, with his wife and children and all belonging talents.* But, forasmuch as he had [g] not wherewith to pay, his lord commanded him to be [h] sold, and his wife and children, and all that he had, and payment to be made. The servant therefore [i] fell down and worshiped him, saying, Lord, have patience with me, and I [k] will pay thee all. But the lord of that servant, being moved with [l] compassion, loosed him and [m] forgave him the debt.

3 (28–30): The heart exposed.

[3] But that servant went out and found one of his [n] fellow-servants, who owed him a [o] hundred pence †; and he laid hold of him and took him by the throat, saying, Pay what thou owest. Then his fellow-servant fell down and besought him, saying, Have patience with me, and I will pay thee. But he [p] would not, but went off and cast him into prison till he should pay that which was due.

4 (31–35): The failure of mercy, for him with whom mercy fails.

[4] Then his fellow-servants, when they saw what had g cf. Ps.38.4.

h cf. Ps.130.3.
cf. Rom. 3. 19, 20.
i cf. ch.5.26.
cf. 2 Kl.4.1.
k cf. ver. 29.
cf. ch.15.25.
l cf. Lk. 15. 19.
cf. Ezek.18. 21.
m cf. Lk. 10. 33.
n cf. Acts 2. 38.
o cf. ch. 24. 49.
Prov. 28. 3.
p cf. ch. 7. 3.
q ctr. Col. 3. 13.
ctr. Eph.4. 32.

* Probably, about £2,400,000 sterling, or $12,000,000.
† Literally, "denarii," for which we have no equivalent coin. The denarius was worth about 8½ pence, or 17 cents.

to him, for the debt. We see in this the "human" king, of course; yet there is this truth in it, that the sinner against God, as far as he can do it, wrecks not himself alone, but all connected with him. No man can be his own enemy only, as men sometimes assert; and we need no argument to prove how the sins of the fathers are visited upon the children in this world, although in the final account every one answers simply for his own.

So helplessly are we all indebted to the supreme King. Good it is that there is mercy with Him for which all figures fail. The debtor falls at his lord's feet with an impossible plea for mercy in his own case,—how impossible in our own! "I will pay thee all." The king can accept no such agreement, takes no notice of it; but his heart is moved with compassion, and taking counsel of that, "he loosed him, and forgave him the debt."

[3] All this, thank God, the blessed Speaker has now made very plain to us; but the point of the parable has yet to come. "But that servant went out"—out from an experience like this!—"and found one of his fellow-servants, who owed him a hundred pence"—denarii (about a 700,000th part of his own debt just forgiven); "and he laid hold of him, and took him by the throat, saying, Pay me what thou owest."

It was his own that he was demanding. Apart from the violence used, he was, as men say, quite within his rights. That was not the question; and every one at once understands that that was not the question. We too, in the exaction of our own from others, may be within our rights; and why is it that in our own case we are not as simple in judging of the real state of things as we are in the case of the man before us? We have been forgiven (if we are Christians) as well as he; and with regard to a debt in proportion to which his was as nothing. How is it that we can look upon grace or mercy shown to others as if it were anything more than the merest righteousness on our part, from the standpoint of forgiven men?

There follows an appeal, so like his own recent one, save only in its greater reasonableness and simplicity, that it should have pierced the heart of the hardened man: "Then his fellow-servant fell down and besought him, saying, Have patience with me, and I will pay thee. But he would not, but went off and cast him into prison till he should pay the debt." It is the grace shown him that fully exposes the obduracy of his unmerciful heart.

[4] Plain as the matter seems, it is developed and enforced upon us. The grief come to pass, were grieved exceedingly, and went and related to their lord all that had taken place. Then his lord called him to him, and saith to him, Thou wicked servant, [z]I forgave thee all that debt because thou besoughtest me: shouldest not thou also have had mercy on thy fellow-servant, even as I had mercy on thee?

And his lord was wroth, and delivered him to the [a]tormentors till he should pay all that was due. So also shall my heavenly father do unto you, if ye forgive not every one his brother, from your [b]hearts.

z cf. Lk. 7. 41–43. cf. ch. 5. 7.

a cf. ch. 5. 25, 26. cf. ch. 25. 41, 46.

b cf. ch. 6. 12–15. Mk. 11. 25, 26.

SECTION 5. (Chap. xix. 1–15.)

Nature and the Kingdom of God.

1 (1-12): The Creator's ordinance governing still.

1 (1-6): "one flesh" as at the beginning.

1. [1] And it came to pass, when Jesus had finished these words, he [c]withdrew from Galilee and came into the borders of Judæa beyond Jordan. And great multitudes followed him, and he [d]healed them there.

And the Pharisees came to him, [e]tempting him, and saying, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause?

c Mk. 10. 1. Jno. 10. 40.

d ch. 12. 15. cf. Mk. 7. 24, 25.

e ch. 22. 15. Mk. 10. 2–12.

of his fellow-servants who bring the account of it to their lord; who on his part summons the guilty man and puts before him the wickedness of his conduct with abhorrence. The close of the parable has the moral of it, that mercy fails for him with whom it fails: "his lord was wroth, and delivered him to the tormentors till he should pay all that was due"—an impossible thing, and typical therefore of an eternal recompense.

A tremendous failure, when divine mercy fails to impress its image on the soul that has been subjected to its influence! Love that subdues not saves not, and this is, of course, the history of an unsaved soul. But the lesson that is to be learned is not to be limited by this, as the Lord's application of it shows. His government is over sinner and saint alike; and He is the same with sinner and saint in His unchanging reprobation of sin. Communion can only be in the holiness and love of the divine nature; and through all degrees of resemblance to that which has been before us, the principle applies. "So also shall My heavenly Father do unto you, if ye forgive not every one his brother, from your hearts."

Sec. 5.

In the fifth section the Lord shows to His disciples the relation of the Kingdom to what God as the Creator had established for the blessing of man: an important matter, as to which, it is evident, there would be need of instruction, as also the history of the professing Church has made manifest how easily the mind can get astray. Here was One who had declared Himself Lord of the sabbath, and revoked with His emphatic, "But I say unto you" the sayings of ancient days. It might naturally be questioned, how the new relationships which He had proclaimed would affect those of nature. He had bidden one whom He had called to "leave the dead to bury their dead," as called into a new sphere and power of life. It was necessary to show whether and how far nature was to have a place in the Kingdom of God; and the two questions of marriage and of children are such as would throw light upon this.

In the epistles, and with the advance of knowledge as to Christian place and privilege, such things had to be expanded and given practical application also; and it is significant that it is in those two of Paul's epistles in which the position of the believer is shown at its highest (Ephesians and Colossians) in which the duties arising from natural relationships are insisted on in the fullest way.

1. [1] Here it is the Pharisees who bring up the question of marriage, or of its

But he answered and said, Have ye not read that he who made them f from the beginning made [them] male and female, and said, On account of this, a man shall leave his father and his mother and be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh? So then they are no longer two, but one flesh. g What, therefore, God hath joined together, let no man put asunder.

2 (7-9): Moses and divorce: does the law contradict?

f Gen. 1.27. Gen. 2. 24.

g cf. Eph. 5. 25-33. Heb. 13. 4.

[2] They say unto him, Why, then, did h Moses command to give a writ of divorce, and to put [her] away? He saith unto them, Moses for the i hardness of your hearts suffered you to put away your wives, but from the beginning it was not so. And I say unto you that h Deut. 24. 1. ch. 5. 31.

i cf. Rom. 8. 3. cf. Heb. 7. 18, 19.

obligation, in order, as it has been reasonably conjectured, to seek to involve Him in the disputes between the rabbinical schools of Hillel and Shammai, who were at issue as to divorce. The question, "Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause?" seems indeed to refer to the opinions of the former, who went as far as to decide that a wife spoiling her husband's dinner was cause enough. But in answer the Lord goes further than Shammai himself, and removing all that man had in the meantime obscured it with, finds His argument in the institution of marriage at the beginning,—an argument which strikes at polygamy, as well as the loose holding of the marriage tie, and brings us beyond all that has come in with sin, to the first design of the Creator for His creatures.

He had made them male and female, each adapted for the other, each completed by the other; and had said as to what the union implied, "they two shall be one flesh." Two, and only two, are spoken of, as with Adam and his wife at first, where neither polygamy nor divorce could be thought of; and "one flesh" would make either polygamy or divorce abomination. Man's own voice, before sin had beclouded the mind, thus had given utterance to what the Lord speaks of as a divine utterance: for God and man were then at one. He who with true insight had before named the beasts and found among them all no helpmeet, spoke now in the joyful discernment of that helpmeet found.

[2] They have their objection from the law ready: "Why then did Moses command to give her a writing of divorcement and to put her away?" But they did not apprehend aright either Moses or themselves; and their argument is turned against them in the simplest manner: "Moses, for the hardness of your hearts, SUFFERED you to put away your wives; but from the beginning it was not so." It was Moses himself who was furnishing the evidence, and what an evidence, of their own condition! The law, which was "weak through the flesh," could not perfect anything because of the resistance to it of a carnal people. That which they objected proved but at the same time their own evil and the hopelessness of it under law. And He turns upon them with one of those imperial sayings which put aside all power of resistance as with the lightning-flash of truth: "And I say unto you, that whosoever shall put away his wife except for fornication, and shall marry another committeth adultery; and whoso marrieth her that is put away committeth adultery."

One cause alone is permitted for divorce; and that where the bond of marriage has already been broken through. Where not so justified, another marriage on the side of husband or of wife is but adultery. Courts of law may legalize adultery of this sort, if they will, but they cannot sanctify it, or take away the brand which the Lord here puts upon it. How evident that the grace of Christianity is as far as possible from laxity!—that law is more tolerant here than grace can be. But the palliatives of law were only the proof that it could not heal; grace will not palliate, because it heals.

This, let us remember however, is the abstract right of the matter—binding of course, as such, with all the authority that the Lord's words can give it upon [j] whosoever shall put away his wife, (except for fornication) and shall marry another, committeth adultery; and whoso marrieth her that is put away committeth adultery.

3 (10-12): the special exception as to marriage.

3 The disciples say unto him, If the case of the man with his wife be so, it is not good to marry.

But he said unto them, Not [k] all have capacity for this, but those to whom it hath been given: for there are eunuchs who were born so from the mother's womb; and there are eunuchs who were made eunuchs by men; and there are eunuchs who have made [l] themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. He that is capable of it, let him go forward.

[j] ch. 5. 32. Lk. 16. 18. 1 Cor. 7. 10, 11.

[k] 1 Cor. 7. 7, 17. cf. 1 Tim. 5. 14.

[l] 1 Cor. 7. 32-34. 37, 38. 1 Cor. 9. 5, 15.

every one of His own. He does not pursue it further, nor consider the complications that may arise in a world such as this which knows Him not, and where His people may be entangled with alliances with the unbelieving, or followed by the consequences of their conduct before conversion. This manifestly belongs rather to what concerns the discipline of the Church, and we shall find the principles applying to it in their place in the epistles. It will be the proper place, therefore, to consider them there, though for the help of souls a few words here may be in place.

We are all born in sin, and go astray naturally from the womb, except as the grace of God may prevent this. When converted to God we may have spent a large part of our lives in disobedience; the effects of which are not necessarily removed by our conversion. With the truest desire to do so, it may be absolutely impossible to return to the position in which we were before the sin was committed. Thus the Lord has Himself decided in the case of a divorced wife, after marriage to another, even though death has dissolved the newer relationship. For the former husband then to take her back again is declared to be an "abomination" to Him (Deut. xxiv. 4); and no change of dispensation can affect what is clearly grounded in nature itself, as an ordinance of the God of nature. Hence restoration to a past state may be, and will commonly be, where divorce has taken place, a thing impracticable. We have but to accept things as they are, and rejoice in the mercy that has blotted out the past, and enables us to start afresh, with Him.

Again, there are cases in which separation may be a necessity or allowable, where divorce could not be according to God; separation leaving yet room for the mercy of God to come in and restore; and this door the apostle opens in Corinthians (1 Cor. vii. 15), not too widely. Divorce he does not touch: for the Lord has decided there.

3 To return now to our text: the disciples show out now the state of their own hearts. "If the case of the man with his wife be so," they say, "it is not good to marry." And the Lord replies: "Not all have capacity for this,* but those to whom it has been given." The word of God having pronounced from the beginning, to which our Lord has been referring us, that "it is not good for man to be alone," we cannot expect that the gift to abide alone will be other than exceptional. Christianity leaves the general truth unaffected, while it may and does give power over nature where special circumstances call for this.

*"This of which ye speak,"—λόγος being here used for the "matter of speech." The common translation here and in ver. 12 does not seem to me to give the sense: for what saying is it that all men are "not able to receive"? Certainly the Lord does not mean to agree with what they have said, that "it is not good to marry," and as certainly does not mean to apologize for the non-reception of what He has just so emphatically stated. The single state is, of course, what all have not the gift for. Χωρέω means both to "have room," and to "make room for;" and to "make room for oneself," so "to advance, go forward."

2 (13-15): The relation of children to the Kingdom.

2. Then were brought unto him [m]little children, that he might put his hands on them and pray; and the disciples [n]rebuked them. But Jesus said, Suffer the little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me: for of [o]such is the kingdom of heaven. And he put his hands on them, and departed thence.

m Mk. 10.13-16. Lk. 18. 15-17.
n cf. ch. 15. 23.
o ch. 18. 3. cf. 1 Pet. 2. 2.

Nature itself has imposed this necessity upon some: the cruelty of men has imposed it upon others. But the Kingdom of heaven, as a motive in the heart, may lift men above all necessity, and enable them to take this place freely. How different a thought, however, from the selfishness which had just spoken out in the disciples, and of which their Master takes no further notice. The shining of the light sufficiently reveals the darkness which it displaces.

2. We pass on to a different scene, and a far happier one, though still to find the painful contrast between the Master and the disciples. It is in this case so much the more so, as He has already declared the spirit of His Kingdom by the example of one of these little children who are now brought to Him, that He may "put His hands on them and pray." But they seem full of nothing but of His dignity as a Rabbi, in which they found also, without doubt, their own. Of what use to bring such mere babes to Him? But the Lord answers their rebuke Himself by bidding them place Him higher in their thoughts, and recognize what the parents here more truly apprehended in Him,—the power which had all within its absolute control, the love which wielded this power. To put His hands on them and pray: would this be barren? In the Kingdom of God in Israel had there been no place for babes? And now that heaven was manifesting itself, and the Father's name being declared, in the Kingdom of heaven was there to be no place for babes? Yes; emphatically yes: for "of such" it was, and of no others. If men had to become like babes to enter it, the spirit of the babe was the very spirit of the Kingdom; and who should shut them out? "Suffer the little children," He says, "to come unto Me, and forbid them not; for of such is the Kingdom of heaven. And He laid His hands on them, and departed thence."

It is to be observed, however, that Matthew excludes, what Mark and Luke both record, the Lord's words as to moral resemblance. The latter is not here the point, but the place with Him of little children themselves, the answer to the heart's affections, given of God Himself, to those who are manifestly put in their weakness and need, to be nurtured, trained, reared amid the contrary influences of the world, to be for the glory of Him whose they are, while in it. How gracious and comforting is the assurance then, that we may come in the confession of our weakness to Him who is Lord of all, though yet the world does not own Him, and in faith still put our little ones into His hand, assured of His reception of them, and that He recognizes them, not as part of the outside world, but as subjects of His Kingdom and disciples in His school. Here is our warrant and encouragement to "bring them up in the discipline and admonition of the Lord" (Eph. vi. 4), expecting from Him the grace of the Spirit, which alone can make it effectual. For the word abides for us, if we do not through our unbelief make it barren, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house" (Acts xvi. 31).

The Kingdom of heaven was not yet come: it is only at the end of this Gospel and after His resurrection that we find the Lord announcing all authority as given to Him in heaven and on earth (xviii. 18). The words are, therefore, anticipative of that time, and perpetuate the value for us of His action here.

Sec. 6.

The sixth section shows us man in his creature place, limited necessarily because of this, but still more as fallen and in his sins; but it shows us also how God, who alone can, overcomes for him the straitness of his condition, and brings him out (as the psalmist says) into a large place.

SECTION 6. (Chap. xix. 16—xx. 16.)
Human limitation, and how overcome.

1 (xix. 16–22): Eternal life, and God alone good.

1. And behold, one [p] came to him and said, Teacher, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life? But he said unto him, Why askest thou me about that which is good? There is One good; but if thou desirest to enter into life, [q] keep the commandments.

[p] Mk. 10. 17–22. Lk. 18. 18–23.
[q] Lk. 10. 25–28. Lev. 18. 5.

This is developed in two ways, which are in beautiful connection, while yet very different: as regards the salvation of the sinner, and as regards the reward of a saint. For rewards there are, in which divine love sovereignly displays itself, for they are "mercy" (2 Tim. i. 18) and not a claim of right; as the Lord has emphatically taught us to say, when we have done all, we are unprofitable servants: we have done but that which it was our duty to do.

Creature merit is thus impossible,—a doctrine which destroys at once not only the supererogatory works and merits of the saints as Rome teaches them, but very much else held quite outside of Rome; while it makes eternal life for the sinner (such as we all are) only possible to grace.

But, alas! we are as naturally self-righteous, as we are absolutely without the least true claim to righteousness. If we will look around, we may quite easily find the Pharisee in the felon's coat; and nearer still, in our own hearts, the spirit of Pharisaism ready to spring out from under the shadow of the Cross itself, its God-ordained condemnation.

Here we have the beginning and the end of it, as we may say, the self-assertion of the sinner and of the saint; and in the last case creeping, if it might be, into heaven itself in the abuse of the truth as to rewards. In the glimpse of heaven which immediately follows we shall have at last a scene from which it will be perfectly and forever banished. The victory of divine grace over us will then be fully accomplished.

1. We begin here with a question addressed to the Lord, not, as so often, by one tempting or caviling, but, on the contrary, earnestly seeking the way of life: "Teacher, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life?"

It is "what good thing:" he does not doubt at all that some good thing is what is needed. Too many are on that road to allow him to doubt its being the right one. At the same time he is conscious of a lack,—not self-satisfied, and yet, as we see directly, with no conviction of sin, no thought of inability to attain his goal, if only the means were pointed out to him. Yet there were many instructors on such points whom he must, with the anxiety that he has, have sought out, but had not gained satisfaction from them. He confesses himself ignorant of the way of life, and has confidence, as it seems, that Christ can teach him. All this is encouraging, and yet he is on the broad way still with the multitude (no sign for good, that) and expecting God to give eternal life to the doer of "some good thing."

The Lord meets him, therefore, where he is: not, as we might have expected, perhaps, with the gospel and the declaration of His grace, for he has as yet no need of grace. Law must do its work with him, for "by the law is the knowledge of sin." Yet He does, at the same time, intimate the result, and so had the law itself done with its unrent veil, God in the darkness,—whether men realized it or not: witness and warning on God's part can never be wanting, and so here: "Why askest thou Me about that which is good? there is One good," and only One.

That blocks the way for the legalist entirely; which yet in a sense the Lord opens directly, that one who must learn by experience may do so: "but if thou desirest to enter into life, keep the commandments."

There was nothing fresh to be pointed out as to such a path. The law had long since precisely defined every thing, and not left men to search for some good thing additional or other than this. It is true they had not found life in

He saith unto him, Which? And Jesus said, [r] Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Honor thy father and thy mother, and Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

The young man saith unto him, All these have I [s] kept; what [t] lack I yet? Jesus said unto him, If thou wouldst be perfect, go, [u] sell what thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have [v] treasure in heaven; and come, [w] follow me.

But when the young man heard that word, he went away [x] grieved, for he was one who had great possessions.

2. And Jesus said unto his disciples, Verily, I say unto you that a [y] rich man shall with difficulty enter into the [r] Ex. 20. 13 etc. cf. 1 Jno. 4. 20, 21.

[s] cf. Phil. 3. 6, 7.
[t] cf. Jas. 2. 10, 11.
[u] Lk. 12. 33. cf. 1 Cor. 13. 3.
[v] ch. 6. 20. cf. Lk. 16. 9. cf. Acts 2. 45.
[w] cf. ch. 8. 19–22.
[x] ctr. Heb. 10. 34. cf. Rom. 8. 3, 4.
[y] Mk. 10. 23–27. Lk. 18. 24–27; Prov. 11. 28; cf. 1 Cor. 1. 26–29.

[z] xix. 23–26; Impossible to man, but possible to God—salvation.

this way, and hence resulted the uneasiness that prompted such inquiries as that of the young man now. But the law had nevertheless precisely defined all the good required: "the man that doeth these things shall live in them." True, "that which was" thus the way "to life, I found to be to death," says the apostle; and so will all true experience find it, a "ministration of death" (2 Cor. iii. 7),—the very thing man needs to shut him up to the grace of God in Christ.

But the young man has not received this ministration of death: he had no "sentence of death in himself, that he should not trust in himself, but God that raiseth the dead." He was unsatisfied; the light of God was not on his path,—that he knew. There was no burden of sin to be lifted. He lacked, but confessedly knew not what he lacked. How many are in just such a condition! rich, and comfortably able to thank God for that; ignorant of such trials as even a Job had to learn before the depths of his heart could be made known to him, but, like him, not at rest. As to "commandments," which did the Master mean? The Lord tests him by the second table of the law, the human side, summing it all up in "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." But he is with Saul of Tarsus, "touching the righteousness which is in the law blameless." There is no shadow upon the honest face with which he turns to Him he is questioning, with the assertion, "All these have I kept; what lack I yet?" And then the bolt falls for him out of a summer sky: "If thou wouldst be perfect, sell what thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come, follow Me."

People ask, how could the Lord make that the condition of eternal life for him? But it was the law that had made that necessary which would have made this easy—that he should love his neighbor as himself: and this he had declared he actually did. Why not, then, sell what he had, and give to the poor? Would it be more to him than giving it back to himself, to give to the neighbor whom he loved as himself?

Evidently the Lord is but searching out a heart that sorely needed it. He does not make it a condition of eternal life; for that is a gift which He Himself had come to acquire for us; but He speaks to the young man according to the character which he professed; adding to it that tender assurance of a heart open to him, which was ready to give him a place among His followers and intimates. "Jesus, beholding him, loved him," says Mark in connection with these very words. And this love, may we not hope, might, even spite of present failure, wake up to consciousness of its condition the heart that could now, alas! turn from it, though grieved, to enjoy in its now exposed selfishness its "great possessions."

2. But of this we have no knowledge. The Lord makes use of this case now kingdom of heaven; and again I say unto you, it is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God.

And when the disciples heard it, they were exceedingly amazed, saying, Who then can be saved? And Jesus looking upon them said, With men this is [z]impossible, but with God all things are possible.

3 (xix. 27–29): The portion in glory.

3. Then Peter answered and said unto him, Behold, we have [a]left all and followed thee: what shall we have then? And Jesus said unto them, Verily, I say unto you, that ye who have followed me, in the [b]regeneration, when the Son of man shall [c]sit on the throne of z Gen. 18. 14. cf. Lk. 19. 2–10.

a Mk. 10. 28–31. Lk. 18. 28–30. cf. Lk. 5. 10, 11.
b cf. Is. 65. 18–21.
c cf. ch. 25. 31.

to impress upon His disciples the difficulty, nay, the impossibility, of a rich man entering into the Kingdom of God. The camel may more easily pass through a needle's eye, He says; and we must leave these words in all their simplicity,—the thing completely passes nature. The camel is, no doubt, the suited figure of one burdened with his possessions, after the manner of the young man here. The things of the world thus claim and control the natural man; and how often is their influence seen upon one who is through grace a Christian! Only the almighty grace of God can change this, that is, can change the nature of man; and so, when in dismay the disciples ask, "Who then can be saved?" the Lord assures them, salvation is not of self, but of God.

3. The question of Peter cannot but suggest how readily in a saint also the spirit of self-seeking can intrude into the most sacred themes and places. The Lord's answer perfectly recognizes and provides for this, which comes out presently in a more offensive form in the other two of His most privileged disciples. But we may be thankful for that which exposes what is our own need as well as theirs, and has been the occasion of such an answer to it as we find here.

"Peter answered and said unto Him, Behold, we have left all and followed Thee: what shall we have then? And Jesus said unto them, Verily, I say unto you, that ye who have followed Me, in the regeneration when the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." This is found only in Luke and in this Gospel, and in perfect suitability with the character of it. It shows us how literally the reign of the saints with Christ is to be taken, and in the term "regeneration" applied to the millennial Kingdom presents an instructive parallel between the work of God in the individual and in the world at large. That these are, in fact, in correspondence with one another, the first chapter of Genesis has already made us fully aware (see notes). The only other place in which we find this word "regeneration" (παλιγγενεσία) is in the epistle to Titus (iii. 5) and it is there applied to the individual state: "according to His mercy He saved us by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost." In the present state of the world sin not only dwells, but reigns; in the coming Kingdom sin exists but reigns no longer, as in the soul that has truly bowed to Christ; then comes the change of the heavens and earth, as for the saint the bodily change into His likeness; and so finally for each, sin neither reigns nor exists. Thus there is a complete parallel between the ways of God in grace with the individual and with the world at large, a unity which is the stamp of the perfect workmanship of the One God in every sphere of His working, whatever may be the variety also which testifies to His infinite resources.

The Lord goes on to assure us that His love can forget nothing of whatever any disciple of His may have renounced for His name. He shall receive a hundredfold and inherit everlasting life. These distinctive rewards, whatever may be the blessing in them, we must remember always to keep apart from what is the common portion of believers, which it is good to realize, as being simply the fruit of Christ's work for us, must be by far more blessed than anything which his glory, ye also shall [d] sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. And [e] every one who hath left houses or brethren or sisters or father or mother or children or lands for my name's sake shall receive a hundredfold, and inherit eternal life.

4 (xix. 30–xx. 16): But mercy only.
1 (xix. 30–xx. 2): the agreement.
2 (xx. 3-7): dependents upon mercy.

4. [1] But [f] many first shall be last, and last first. For the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man, a householder, who went out with the [g] early morn to hire laborers for his vineyard. And when he had agreed with the laborers for a penny* a day, he sent them into his vineyard.

[2] And he went out about the third hour, and saw [h] others standing idle in the market-place, and said unto [d] cf. 2 Tim. 2. 12. cf. 1 Pet. 4. 13. cf. ch. 20. 21. cf. Lk. 22. 29.

[e] ch. 10. 37–39. cf. 2 Cor. 8. 9.
[f] ch. 20. 16. ch. 21. 31, 32. cf. 1 Cor. 15. 8. g cf. Jer. 7. 13, 25.
[h] cf. Lk. 14. 21. cf. ch. 21. 43.

* a "denarius."

even in divine mercy can be accorded to our own. The place of children with God, of membership in the body of Christ,—these and such things as these are to us the fruit of divine grace alone, and have nothing whatever to do with reward of our work. This is so simple that there should be no need even of mentioning it; and yet many Christians confound, more or less, things so different as these; as even the "many mansions" of our Father's house have been taken to imply different degrees of reward, and to put the children of God at various degrees of distance from their Father,—the very thing which assuredly is most opposite to the Lord's intention of comfort in it. But, in fact, the legality of the human heart is such as to make the whole matter of reward require the most jealous guarding from abuse; and this the Lord proceeds now to supply in the parable which follows here.

4. The meaning of the parable is given both at the beginning and the close; so earnestly is it pressed upon us. We must not allow ourselves to be carried away from this by any supposed demand of special features, as to which we are cautioned here in the same way as in the case of the previous parable of the unmerciful servant (ch. xviii. 23). There it is "a man, a king"; here, "a man, a householder." In the application we are bidden to remember that we must distinguish between the ways of men and the ways of God, even where the one may be taken to illustrate the other. God certainly does not "hire" laborers after the manner of men, where work in His vineyard is in question; but this is human misunderstanding of His way. The prodigal still afar off may talk of the "hired servants" of his father's house; but we are not to take this as a representation of the actual truth. And the very design of the parable here is to warn us by the issue against such perversions. It would seem, therefore, plain that to seek to interpret everything in it as if it stood for absolute truth would be to fall in measure into the very misconceptions from which it is intended to deliver us.

[1] The agreement with the laborers illustrates but the legality of souls who so misconstrue the Lord's gracious recompense of what is done for Him. Just so far as this is made the end for which we labor, it is clear that the character of what is done is deteriorated, and its value to Him lost. We are living to ourselves, the misery from which divine grace has delivered those that are Christ's.

We are not, therefore, to conceive of this either, as if any child of God could be a mere hireling. The principle, given broadly in the parable, is by this means put before us in its proper repulsiveness, and the picture is an ideal one solely. Were we to take it as literally exact, we should have to imagine God giving in the day of recompense some stipulated measure of reward to those who have worked for it; which, whether it were saint or sinner, would be positive error. Recognizing it as ideal only, the lesson remains, and with no perplexity.

[2] In those who are called to labor at various hours in the day, we find the them, Go ye also into the vineyard, and whatsoever is just I will give you. And they went [their] way. And again having gone out about the sixth and ninth hour, he did likewise. And he went out about the [i]eleventh hour, and saw others standing, and saith unto them, Why stand ye here all the day idle? They say unto him, Because no man hath hired us. He saith unto them, Go ye also into the vineyard.*

[i] cf. Lk. 23. 39–43.

3 (xx. 8-10): the realization.

[3] Now, when [j]evening was come, the lord of the vineyard saith unto his steward, Call the laborers, and pay them their hire, beginning from the last even unto the first. And when they came who [began] at the eleventh hour, they [k]received every one a penny. And when the first came, they supposed that they would receive more; and they also received every one a penny.

[j] cf. 2 Cor. 5. 10.

[k] cf. Rom. 4. 4, 5. cf. 1 Cor. 4. 7.

4 (xx. 11,12): murmuring.

[4] And when they had received it, they [l]murmured against the master of the house, saying, These last have worked but one hour, and thou hast made them [m]equal unto us who have borne the burden of the day and the heat.

[l] cf. Rom. 14. 10, 11.

[m] ctr. Lk. 17. 7–10. ctr. 1 Cor. 4. 16, 17.

5 (xx. 13-16): conditions of the result.

[5] But he answered one of them and said, Friend, I do thee no wrong: didst thou not agree with me for a penny? Take what is thine, and go thy way: I will thought of a stipulated agreement more and more given up, and those who go into the vineyard becoming correspondingly more dependent upon the goodness of the householder to give to them as he sees fit. To those called at the third hour it is simply said, "Whatsoever is just I will give you." At the sixth and ninth hours, "what is just" becomes a more and more slender hope. In the case of those at the eleventh hour, nothing seems to be said of this at all:* they are left entirely to the owner of the vineyard to give as he please, or not.

* Some old MSS. add, "and whatsoever is just ye shall receive."

[3] At the end of the day, the laborers are called and paid; and then those called at the eleventh hour receive a whole day's wages. Of those called at the intermediate hours we are told nothing, but it is implied that they all receive the same: for when the first come, expecting to receive more, they also are paid every one a penny. From this some have deduced the doctrine of an equality of reward for all; but that is not the doctrine of Scripture; and the rewards here are plainly according to the moral of the parable given to us, that the "first shall be last and the last first;" which again is not equality.

[4] It is the first alone who murmur: it would be impossible for any of the rest, one would say, to do so; for they are all, in fact, overpaid. Ah, were we not, how little would we any of us receive! In the day of reward will there be a legalist found to murmur against the amount of his recompense? Surely, not one; all is again only ideal here. And yet even the first can only complain that they have not received more than they bargained for.

[5] The answer of the householder to one of those that murmur brings before us the conditions which have determined that result of which they now so foolishly complain. They cannot say they have not received what they contracted for. They had got what was just; grace they had not trusted nor sought: how can they complain that to those who were dependent upon it it has been shown? —and indeed in the measure in which they were dependent.

* Though some ancient MSS. add a similar clause; but the oldest and the drift of the parable are against it.

give to this last even as to thee. Is it not lawful for me to do [n] what I will in mine own matters? is thine eye evil because I am good? So the [o] last shall be first, and the first last; [for many are the called, but few chosen.] *

n cf. Rom. 9. 20, 21.
o ch. 19. 30.

SECTION 7. (Chap. xx. 17–28.)

The perfection of the Kingdom.

1 (17–19): The will of the Master.

1. And Jesus, going up to Jerusalem, took the twelve disciples apart, and said to them on the way, [p] Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and the Son of man will be delivered up to the chief priests and scribes, and they will condemn him to death, and deliver him up to the Gentiles, to mock and scourge and crucify [him]; and the third day he shall rise again.

p Mk. 10. 32–34. Lk. 18. 31–34. ch. 16. 21.

* Some omit.

For them it was a matter of bounty, not of right; for the giver of it, had he not the right to be bountiful? What I am entitled to must be measured by what I am; what grace shall give can only be measured by what God is. Human measure and divine! put it at the best you can for man, what a difference here!

The more we think of our service, the less must we think of Him to whom the service is done; the more we imagine claim, the less must His grace appear: that the first should thus be last is absolutely simple. Think of it as the Lord once put it, a supper at which the guests take their places as they estimate themselves. No one here, however, says to another, "Give this man place." They are permitted to assign to themselves just the rank they claim. Only, when the King comes in to take His own place among the guests, He takes it at the opposite end of the table from that which they imagined! Then, of course, "the first is last and the last is first;" and yet their places are decided by their own self-measurement.

"For many are the called," says the Lord in closing, "but few the chosen ones:" words which here tell us that among the guests few are they that are according to His mind indeed. Alas! how slow we are indeed in the true judgment of self! how difficult is it for divine grace to obtain full possession of us!

See. 7.

The seventh section, in close connection with the last, gives us a gleam of the glory of the Kingdom which displays its moral perfection, in contrast with all the kingdoms of men. The spirit of the disciples also is shown out in contrast with the spirit of their Lord, and their painful misconception of all that constitutes true glory. But it is upon the Lord Himself that the eye rests here, who is the Light and Glory, as of the heavenly City so of the earth in the blessing that it soon shall know. And with this, suitably, this fourth division of the Gospel closes.

1. We have first the Lord going up to Jerusalem, with the perfect consciousness of all that is before Him there. He takes the twelve apart in order to make known to them again what He would have them realize as to Him—no unforeseen thing, but that for which He had come, and to which He had devoted Himself. He knew every bitter ingredient in that cup which He was going to drink: the betrayal, the condemnation by the heads of the people—His own, their delivering Him to the Gentiles, the mockery, the scourging, the crucifixion. Of all this He speaks to them, adding the blessed comfort of His resurrection also, on the third day. Mark tells us of the fear that had already fallen upon them in the way; Luke, that nevertheless they understood none of these things, but that this saying was hidden from them. No doubt, all this went together. They

2 (20-23): The lust of the disciple.

2. Then came to him the [q]mother of Zebedee's sons with her sons, worshiping him, and asking something of him. And he said unto her, What wouldst thou? She saith unto him, Say that these my [r]two sons may sit, one on thy right hand, and the other on thy left, in thy kingdom. But Jesus answering said, Ye [s]know not what ye ask. Can ye drink the [t]cup which I am about to drink? They say to him, We can. He saith unto them, My cup ye shall drink indeed; but to sit on my right hand and on my left is not mine to give, except to those for whom it has been [u]prepared of my Father.

3 (24-28): The actuality of glory.

3. And when the ten heard it, they were [v]indignant about the two brethren. But Jesus called them to him and said, Ye know that the rulers of the nations lord it over them, and the great exercise authority over them.

q Mk.10.35-45.

r ch. 19. 28. ctr. Rev.4. 10.

s cf. Lk.9.46-56.

t cf. ch.26.37-39, 42. cf. Jno. 18. 11.

u cf. Rev.3. 21.

v cf. Lk. 22. 24-30.

were dazed and stupefied with the apprehension of a great sorrow which they had no courage to face nor take in. Matthew simply speaks of the Lord's making it known to them, putting this in sharpest contrast with the appeal of the sons of Zebedee with their mother which follows next, and which shows so perfectly in which direction they were looking at that time,—how quickly they had rallied from the unwelcome announcement of the Cross, to comfort themselves with that which, true as it was, they were soon to show they little apprehended. The glory itself they would find morally conditioned by that Cross of which it was the outcome, and from which they turned away.

2. After the will of the Master, therefore,—a will in which self-seeking had no place,—we come to the lust of the disciple, to see how the most precious truths can be distorted by the mirror that reflects them, were it a James and a John, the nearest intimates of the Lord on earth, who furnish the mirror. How jealous should we be of ourselves, lest we should pervert what we imagine we but receive, and turn our blessing into loss and shame!

Nature is leading here, as is evident; the mother of Zebedee's sons is a witness to us of how our natural relationships need to be watched and not suffered to intrude into the things of God. We see in the Lord's case how He refuses all control of this kind, as we see in the Popish doctrine how readily, if allowed, it will come in. "Say that these my two sons may sit, the one on Thy right hand, the other on Thy left hand, in Thy kingdom."

But the way of the Cross from which they have turned is the way of glory: "Can ye drink of the cup that I drink of?" The moment it presents itself to them as a personal gain, they are ready. The Lord answers, "Ye shall indeed drink of My cup; but to sit on My right hand and on My left is not Mine to give, except to those for whom it is prepared of My Father."

He is the perfect Servant all the way through; just because—

"Serving in the joy of love."

In exaltation and in lowest humiliation, the Father's will rules for Him—is all to Him. We have the wonderful example, in One perfect in wisdom and in goodness, of how service is the characteristic sign of love. In Him in whom all is absolute freedom, there is never a thought of anything but the Father's will. To us, what a commendation of it! What a bond of perfection for the universe will it be in all eternity, the Son of God in manhood, Himself "subject to Him who put all things under Him"!

3. But the indignation of the ten at the two brethren shows their kinship with them morally. And now the Lord lets them see their common error, and the true glory of that Kingdom which they had been thinking of as if it were but like a kingdom of the nations. What! did they imagine that in His Kingdom

So it shall [w]not be among you; but whosoever will be great among you shall be your minister, and whosoever will be chief among you shall be your bond-servant: even as the [x]Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a [y]ransom for many.

[w] 1 Pet. 5.3. cf. Ezek. 34. 21. cf. Eph. 3.8. [x] Phil. 2. 7. [y] Is. 53.10,11. cf. 1 Tim. 2. 6. cf. Tit. 2.14.

there would be the gratification of ambition, of the desire for lordship? or that the places of rule with Him could be such as this would imply? No: for service was the road to rule, and this could only be because rule itself would be but more ample service. Whosoever would be great among them would be their minister, and the chief among them by that very fact be but bound to serve them. Must it not be plain that the Son of man, the King, "came not to be ministered unto but to minister"? Glory might change the character of this service—not the spirit nor the fact of it. The Cross might be lowest humiliation for Him, but it was His glory too. Could they cease to remember it? Could the love shown there be measured by aught else? Could it change or be exhausted? Would He be upon the Throne to be ministered unto or to minister? What must the places of rule be in the Kingdom of which He would be the King!

Div. 5.

Clear as it already was that Christ would not be received by His own, there yet had to be His formal presentation to Jerusalem as its King, so that they might openly and manifestly accept or reject Him. Moreover, this could not be too early, before not only His works of power had been done among them, but also He Himself had been fully before their eyes, and His teaching was sufficiently known to those who cared even to listen to it. For these were in fact the credentials of His power, as from God. The people as a whole would have responded to what had been the devil's suggestion, and have welcomed one who had cast himself down unhurt from the pinnacle of the temple before their eyes. But that could have been no settlement of anything in any way acceptable to God. The people who did, in fact, believe when they saw the miracles that He did, He could not trust. God is not Power only, nor Power and Wisdom, but Righteousness and Holiness and Love as well. All was fully now displayed, and they were called to make their momentous decision.

Now therefore He openly accepts the title of the Son of David given Him by the acclamation of the multitudes who accompany Him to the city, and who had perhaps been first wrought upon by the miracle at Jericho, which was expressly an acceptance of that title. The blind men to whom He had given sight were with Him as His witnesses, as once before two blind men (chap. ix. 27) had been; but then forbidden to let any know it. Here all is in public, and they follow Him without prohibition. His claim of the asses afterwards, expressly as fulfilling Zechariah's prophecy, is still more outspoken; and the children crying in the temple are commended by Him in the fullest way.

But the acclamations die out in the air of the rebellious city, whose pollution of the temple proclaimed its rottenness at heart; and His judgment of the fig-tree is that of the people themselves, of whom the "fig-tree planted in a vineyard" is elsewhere distinctly used by Him as the figure (Luke xiii. 6, 7). This is the prelude only to that open opposition which follows on the part of all the various sects and classes among them, who set aside their strife with one another to unite in vainly seeking to ensnare Whom they cannot confute. And this ends with the "woe" upon the leaders, and His lament over the city.

Subd. 1.

The presentation of the King occupies the first subdivision here, which ends with the judgment of the fig-tree. All is quickly over, for the decision of the people has been really made before, and here they but re-affirm it. Babes and

DIVISION 5. (Chaps. xx. 29–xxiii.)

The Governmental Presentation and the End as to Israel.

SUBDIVISION 1. (Chaps. xx. 29–xxi. 22.)

The King.

1 (xx. 29-34): The gift of light.

1. AND as they [z] went out from Jericho, a great multitude followed him. And behold, [a] two blind men sitting by the way-side, when they heard that Jesus was passing by, cried out, saying, Lord, have mercy on us, [thou] Son of David.

And the multitude [b] rebuked them, that they should hold their peace; but they cried out the more, Lord, have mercy on us, [thou] Son of David.

And Jesus stood still, and called them, and said, What [c] would ye that I should do for you? They say unto him, Lord, that our eyes may be opened. And Jesus had [d] compassion on them and touched their eyes, and immediately they received sight and followed him.

2 (xxi. 1-11): The announcement.

2. And when they drew [e] nigh to Jerusalem, and had come to Bethphage, to the Mount of Olives, then Jesus sent two disciples, saying to them, Go into the village over against you, and immediately ye will find an ass tied and a colt with her: loose them and bring them to me. And if any one say aught unto you, ye shall say, the Lord hath [f] need of them; and he will send them immediately.

z Mk.10.46-52. Lk. 18. 35-43.

a cf. ch. 8. 28. cf. ch. 9. 27 with 2 Cor. 13. 1.

b cf. ch. 19. 13.

c cf. ch. 15. 28.

d Mk. 1. 41. cf. Heb. 4. 15.

e Mk. 11. 1-11. Lk. 19. 29-40. John 12. 12-19.

f cf. Ps. 50. 10.

sucklings may welcome Him, but the people are far from being of the spirit of such, and therefore far from the Kingdom. The cry "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord" will have, as the Lord declares, to be taken up again and in earnest at a future time.

1. The royal proclamation begins at Jericho, the city of the curse; which does not and cannot, however, prevail over the blessing. Jericho, which even in Joshua's day had witnessed the salvation of Rahab from its own doom, now witnesses the grace of the Son of David. Two blind men, sitting by the wayside, cry out to Him as this, only to find the rebuke of the multitude, as by and by a remnant of Israel will awake up to their darkness and their need of Him, only to meet the opposition of a growingly apostate mass. But they cry the more, until He who can never turn away from the voice of need answers and heals them. The light dawns upon those sightless eyes, and the Person of their Saviour becomes revealed to them; then they follow Him.

The two men in this case, where in the other synoptics is but one, are, as we have seen, characteristic of Matthew, as the two blind men before (chap. ix.) and the two demoniacs (chap. viii), in both which cases Mark and Luke speak but of one. There is surely, therefore, design in this difference, which in Matthew, no doubt, speaks of witness-bearing to the Lord, now in the character which at this time He is taking. And this witness He does not, as in the former case, forbid; as the healing also is now in public. Publicity He designs, as His time is at last come for "showing Himself to the world;" and these, delivered from the "land of darkness and of the shadow of death" are suited witnesses.

2. Accordingly now upon His approach to Jerusalem, at Bethphage, the "house of unripe figs,"—and the typical significance of the fig comes shortly into prominence,—He sends two of His disciples to claim for His service the ass and colt, upon the latter of which He rides into the city. The animal was characteristic of the Prince of peace, in contrast with the war-horse upon which we Now this was done that it might be [g] fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying, Say unto the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy King cometh unto thee, meek, and mounted upon an ass, yea, upon a colt, the foal of a beast of burden.

[g] Zech. 9. 9. Is. 62. 11.

And the disciples went and did as Jesus had commanded them, and brought the ass and the colt, and put their garments upon them; and he sat upon them. And a very great multitude spread their own garments in the way, and others cut branches from the trees and strewed them in the way. And the multitudes that went before him and that followed cried, saying, [h] Hosanna to the Son of David: [i] blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord! Hosanna in the highest.

[h] Ps. 118. 25.
[i] Ps. 118. 26. cf ch. 23. 39.

And when he entered into Jerusalem, all the city was moved, saying, Who is this? And the multitudes said, This is Jesus the [j] prophet, from Nazareth of Galilee.

[j] Lk. 7. 16. cf. ch. 16. 14.

3 (xxi. 12-17): The cleansing of the temple.

3. And Jesus went into the temple of God, and [k] cast out all the sellers and buyers in the temple, and overturned the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of those that sold doves. And he saith unto them, It is written, My house shall be called a house of prayer; but ye have made it a robbers' den.

[k] Lk. 19. 45, 46. Mk. 11. 15-17. cf. John 2. 13-17. cf Mal. 3. 2, 3.

see Him in Revelation (xix. 11). The young animal also, before unridden, shows the new and free spirit of obedience which alone could bring Him into His place among His people—thus to be "willing in the day of His power" (Ps. cx. 3).

As to the other ass accompanying, it is impossible not to think of the past in connection with it, as the patristic commentators did. Is it more suitable to regard it merely as necessary to quiet the foal for its service to its Creator? Those who can think so we must leave to such sober interpretation. It was a time when the very stones were ready to cry out, and all, we may be sure, has its significance for us. The "foal of a beast of burden" seems even as if it were intended to remind us, not surely of the unbelieving synagogue, nor yet of the law itself, which imposed, but did not bear, burdens, but rather of those who as belonging to the legal dispensation could be so pictured, even though the true people of God by faith. Thus only, as inheritors of that faith, could the after-generation, destined to freer service, be counted as their offspring. But with these the elder generations could be seen, as linked with them in the triumph of the Christ now come.

Thus all is surely consistent, though even for that time it was but a gleam of light which, as far as Israel nationally was concerned, went out in darkness. And the prophecy of Zechariah is carefully abridged on this account. "He is just and having salvation" is omitted, because in fact salvation could not then come. The crowds might exhibit a temporary enthusiasm, and genuine disciples add their truer homage to the King,—the city meets it with a question merely, however "moved;" and the "Hosannas to the Son of David" weaken sadly into the how different reply, "This is Jesus the prophet from Nazareth of Galilee." The King of glory is for them already discrowned.

3. But He, not dependent on the voices of the multitude, goes on into the temple which was in fact the place of His throne, but now desecrated by the abominations of priestly avarice, for which the people, three years before the destruction of the city, themselves suppressed the traffic that defiled

And [l]blind and lame came to him in the temple, and he healed them.

But when the chief priests and the scribes saw the wonders which he wrought, and the children crying in the temple and saying, Hosanna to the Son of David, they were [m]indignant, and said to him, Hearest thou what these say? But Jesus saith unto them, Yea; did ye never read, [n]Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise? And he [o]left them, and went out of the city to Bethany, and he passed the night there.

4 (xxi. 18–22): Failure under test.

4. Now early in the morning, as he returned to the city, he [p]hungered. And seeing one [q]fig-tree by the wayside, he came to it; and he found nothing thereon but [r]leaves only. And he saith to it, Let no fruit be henceforth on thee for ever. And forthwith the fig-tree [s]withered away.

l cf. Acts 3. 1, 2 etc. cf. Lk. 14. 21.

m cf. ch. 20. 31. cf. John 11. 47, 48. cf. John 12. 19.

n Ps. 8. 2.

o cf. Jno. 11. 54.

p cf. Jno. 4. 6. Mk. 11. 12–14, 20–23.

q cf. Lk. 13. 6–9.

r cf. Gen. 3. 7 with Is. 64. 6.

s cf. 1 Sam. 2. 5. cf. Is. 5. 5–7.

it.* There it was before His eyes, with its loud-voiced iniquity, just as He had met it at the beginning of His ministry, and then purged out the defilement as He afresh purges it now. Quick work for Him to establish His authority there in the very presence of His fiercest enemies, in the heart of Jerusalem, in His Father's house itself, which, as He tells them, they had changed from the "house of prayer" for which it should have been known, into a robber's den. And there, in the now empty place, "the blind and the lame" (characteristic and concurrent types of those that needed the touch of the true King) "came to Him in the temple and He healed them." Thus He is owned of God and of man alike,—though of man, alas, unchanged and hostile still. There are no "willing people;" and for them it cannot be the "day of His power." He may prove His title, but cannot take His throne.

This is for Him, then, no triumph: only the children's voices make music for Him now, with whom the hosannas that have died out in the streets are taken up again. What is hidden from wise and prudent is revealed to babes; and the rebuke which they look for from Him as to it, they find themselves. No: they had never read that "out of the mouth of babes and sucklings He perfected praise." How much of our Bibles, it may be, we have never read, though our eyes may have often enough been upon what they have never seen there! Had they been spiritually little ones, would they not have seen this? Even our involuntary ignorance may tell—must tell—thus against us!

They were not little ones, and therefore for that generation of Israel the Kingdom could not come. The Lord withdraws from the city to spend the night at Bethany among those whose hearts had answered to the grace that was seeking men.

4. In the morning He returns early to the city, and is ahungered. A fig-tree is before Him by the wayside, and He comes to it to satisfy His hunger, but finds no fruit. Mark tells us that it was not the season yet for figs; but the leaves upon this tree promised for it fruit, as Israel stood alone among the nations in the profession of allegiance to the One True God. Fruit therefore could be expected from her, if nowhere else; and He with hunger of soul unsatisfied had been seeking it. His own parable of the fig-tree had been long before spoken (Luke xiii. 6–9) with evident application to the people also; and now the judgment is to be pronounced. "Let no fruit be henceforth on thee for ever," is answered by the rapid withering away of the fruitless tree.

The disciples are in amazement when they see the fig-tree withered; but the

* Edersheim, vol. i., p. 372.

And when the disciples saw it, they wondered, saying, How suddenly is the fig-tree withered away! But Jesus answered and said unto them, Verily I say unto you, If ye have [t]faith, and doubt not, ye shall not only do what is done unto the fig-tree, but if ye shall say to this mountain, Be thou removed and cast into the sea, it shall come to pass. And [u]all things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive.

[t] ch. 17. 20. Lk. 17. 6. cf. 1 Cor. 13. 2.

[u] ch. 7. 7-11. John 15. 7. Jas. 5. 16-18.

SUBDIVISION 2. (Chap. xxi. 23–46.)

Rejection and its Consequences.

1 (23-27) The question of authority.

1. AND when he was come into the temple, the chief priests and elders of the people came to him while he was teaching, saying, By what [v]authority doest thou these things? and who gave thee this authority?

[v] Mk. 11. 27-33. Lk. 20. 1-8.

Lord uses the miracle to assure them of the power which was ready to manifest itself for them in response to faith. Not only should they do what was done to the fig-tree, but if they had faith and doubted not, even a mountain standing in their way should be removed and cast into the sea, and whatsoever they asked in prayer, believing, would be done. We may well see in this a veiled assurance of how Israel, now nothing but an obstacle in the path of faith would disappear politically in the sea of the nations. But the promise here is of course, of very various application, and it would be entirely wrong in any way to limit it, save as the Lord Himself does; who distinctly makes His last assurance as full as possible. To faith nothing shall be denied; but it is not limitation to insist that faith must be faith.

SUBD. 2.

The opposition gathers strength, although still kept in check by the power displayed in Him, and by the revealing words in which He lays bare the condition of things and their hypocrisy and unfrankness in their rejection of Him. They are made to feel how well He knows them, and their intent, and how its success would leave Him Master still, themselves alone undone by it. Quiet, simple, strong, irrefutable words, they penetrate through all the defenses of a seared conscience and a hardened heart, and confound, if they do not convert. We do not read of conversion; but then we are here occupied with another and very different subject, and tracing Israel's rejection of her King, as it goes on step by step to the end now so near, when He leaves desolate the House (no longer His Father's, but their own) to the Gentile invader.

1. For the moment He is in the House which He has cleansed, teaching publicly, as was His wont, and there the chief priests and elders of the people come upon Him with the question, "By what authority doest Thou these things? and who gave Thee this authority?"

It was the Sanhedrim, the highest religious authority itself among the people, that asked this; and their question implied their disclaimer of any authorization on their part. But it was a vain and foolish question: for as they knew on the one hand that He was no Rabbi of the schools, so on the other, as we know, the testimony of Scripture united with that of His miracles to proclaim Him what He was even now declaring Himself to be. But for those who were questioning Him there was a yet more simple ground of appeal. They had sent a special mission to the Baptist to investigate his claim; and the Baptist's own recognition of the Lord was known to all. They "sent unto John, and he bare witness unto the truth." What then was "the baptism of John? was it of heaven or of men?" Either they had decided about John's authority, or else they were incompetent to pronounce as to the Lord; and their verdict as to the one would necessarily include both: in any case they had the means of answering their own question.

And Jesus answered and said unto them, I also will ask you one thing, which if ye tell me, I also will tell you by what authority I do these things: the [w]baptism of John, whence was it? From heaven or of men? But they reasoned among themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven, he will say, Why did ye not then believe him? But if we shall say, Of men, we [x]fear the people; for all hold John as a prophet. And they answered and said to Jesus, We know not. And he said unto them, [y]Neither do I tell you by what authority I do these things.

2 (28-32): The two sons.

2. But what think ye? A man had two sons; and he came to the first, and said, Son, go work to-day in the [z]vineyard. And he answered and said, I will not; [but] afterward he [a]repented and went. And he came to the second, and said likewise; but he answered and said, I [go], sir; and went [b]not. Which of the two did the will of his father? They say, The first. Jesus saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, that the [c]tax-gatherers and harlots go into the kingdom of God before you. For John came unto you in the way of righteousness, and ye believed him not; but the tax-gatherers and the harlots [d]believed him; and ye, when ye saw it, did not repent afterwards, to believe him.

3 (33-46): The vineyard and the Heir.

3. Hear another parable: there was a man, a householder, who planted a [e]vineyard, and put a [f]hedge round it, and dug a wine-press in it, and built a [g]tower, and let it out to [h]husbandmen, and went abroad.

[w] cf. Jno. 1. 19-28.
[x] Prov. 29. 25. ver. 46.
[y] cf. ch. 3. 3. ver. 32.
[z] cf. ch. 20. 1 etc.
[a] cf. Lk. 15. 7.
[b] cf. ch. 7. 21-23. cf. ch. 15. 8.
[c] cf. Lk. 7. 29-50.
[d] cf. Lk. 3. 12, 13.
[e] ver. 28. cf. Is. 5. 1-7. cf. Jer. 2. 21.
[f] Ps. 80. 8-13. cf. Num. 23. 9.
[g] cf. Ps. 18. 10.
[h] cf. ch. 23. 2. cf. Ezek. 34. 2, etc. cf. Song 8. 11, 12.

Answer it, however, they cannot: if they said the mission of John was from heaven, they had to believe the testimony that he gave; if they said, of men, they would be in direct opposition to the people, and theirs was no martyr-spirit to suffer for their convictions. It was easier, with all the humiliation it involved, to profess their ignorance; but then they were no court to adjudicate in claims of this kind: "Neither do I tell you by what authority I do these things."

2. Plainly it was conscience they needed, and the Lord has in turn a question for them. A man had two sons: one who to his bidding, "Go, work to-day in my vineyard," answers openly and defiantly "I will not;" while the other expresses at once his ready obedience. After all, the first repented and went; the second never did go. Which, then, did the will of his father? The answer is put into their mouths: they could only say, The first. Then He makes application for them: the tax-gatherers and harlots would go into the Kingdom of God before them. For John came in the way of righteousness, only demanding on their part an upright conscience to receive manifest truth, but, built up in legal self-righteousness, they had turned from him; while the people of evil life had been convicted and believed; and even this witness of repentant sinners they had refused.

3. He searches them out with another parable, in which Israel's history as a whole is shown to be of a piece with this, while He follows it on to the end soon coming, and shows them how their success against Him would only be ruinous defeat for themselves at last.

The figure of a vineyard had been used of old in the prophets with reference to Israel. The "man," the householder, could only partially represent God. Was it not a representation of things according to their own thoughts merely,

But when the [h]time of fruit drew nigh, he sent his servants to the husbandmen, to receive the fruits of it. And the husbandmen took his servants, and [i]beat one, and killed another, and stoned another. Again he sent other servants, more than the first, and they did to them likewise. And afterwards he sent to them his [k]son, saying, They will respect my son. But when the husbandmen saw the son, they said among themselves, This is the [l]heir: come, let us kill him, and lay hold of his inheritance. And they took and cast him out of the vineyard and slew him. When, therefore, the lord of the vineyard cometh, what will he do to those husbandmen? [m]They say unto him, He will miserably destroy those wicked men, and will let out his vineyard to other husbandmen, who will render to him the fruits in their seasons. Jesus saith unto them, Did ye never read in the scriptures, The [n]stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner:

h cf. Mk. 11. 13.
i ch. 23. 35.
k cf. ch. 22. 42–45. cf. John 3. 16.
l cf. Gen. 37. 18. cf. Ex. 2. 14. cf. Acts 3. 13, 14, 17.
m cf. 2 Sam. 12. 5–9.
n Ps. 118. 22, 23. 1 Pet. 2. 7, 8.

that God was like a man in a far country, and things were in their hands as they proudly assumed? Yet their responsibility was fully granted, and let them take heed to it. All through the ages down, God had been sending to those in trust for Him, to get the fruit of His vineyard; and the prophets had been His messengers to them to present and urge His claim. How had they treated them? Certainly they well knew, whose claim had been, that if they had lived in their fathers' days, they would not have been "partakers with them in the blood of the prophets." They had beaten one, killed another, stoned another, and so whenever God had sent fresh witnesses.

But now He had sent His Son: there the full glory of the Speaker is flashed upon them; had He not title to say, without taking into account His divine knowledge, "They will respect My Son"?

But indeed He is not ignorant to what He sends Him: and now all that is in their hearts to do and what they will accomplish is pictured for them, as if it were a history of the past. What a testimony to the actors in it that are to be, —He face to face with them, with those clear, deep, always compassionate eyes looking into theirs! think after this of their going on to fulfil it. "But when the husbandmen saw the son, they said among themselves"—not, who art Thou? or who gave Thee this authority? but on the contrary, "This is the heir;" and their after action is all grounded upon this.

Yes, they could have been very tolerant of a false claim: the true one was quite another matter. The claim of God is uncompromising, and His yoke intolerable to the natural heart. The second psalm represents the refusal of Messiah as the Lord does, as the manifestation of the spirit which said, "Let us burst their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us." Here it breathes of murder,—"Come, let us kill Him, and lay hold of His inheritance."

And the thing is done. The Lord quietly assures them, as He had done before with His disciples, that He is in fact to die. But if He be in reality the Son, will that secure them what they seek? "when the lord of the vineyard cometh, what will he do unto those husbandmen?" and they are forced to pronounce what is their own doom.

He confirms it from their own scriptures: for was not the chief corner stone of which the psalmist spoke to be a stone rejected by the builders in Israel? Was not "the Lord's doing" to be the reversal of their deed? But the result of it for that generation would be the taking from them of that Kingdom which in the person of its King they were thus refusing. It would be given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof: that is, not the Christian Church, but the

this is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes? Wherefore I say unto you, that the kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given unto a [o] nation bringing forth the fruits thereof. And whosoever shall [p] fall on this stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will [q] grind him to powder.

And when the chief priests and the Pharisees heard his parables, they knew that he spake of them. But when they sought to lay hands on him, they [r] feared the multitudes, because they held him for a prophet.

o cf. Ezek. 37. 21-24. cf. Hos. 1. 10, 11. cf. Is. 26. 1, 2.
p Is. 8. 14, 15. cf. Acts 13. 41.
q cf. Dan. 2. 34, 35, 44, 45. cf. 2 Thess. 1. 7-10.
r cf. John 7. 44-46.

SUBDIVISION 3. (Chap. xxii. 1–14.)

The marriage of the King's Son.

1 (1-4): Called.

22 [1] AND Jesus answered and spake again to them in parables, saying: The [s] kingdom of heaven is like a man, a king, who made a marriage for his son, and sent his servants to call those that had been [t] invited to the marriage, and they would not come. Again he sent other servants saying, Tell those that have been invited,

s cf. Lk. 14. 15-24.
t cf. ch. 21. 33.

Israel of the future; in fact the first nation which will be all holy. The terms of the new covenant expressly assure us of this.

Meanwhile "whosoever shall fall on this stone"—as the nation then were doing—"shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall"—in the day when it strikes the feet of the image, as Nebuchadnezzar, the head of the image, saw it—"it shall grind him to powder." At the coming of the Lord judgment will do its complete and effectual work.

The chief priests and Pharisees knew that it was of them that He was speaking; but His words held the people, and they could as yet do nothing. Those who have lost the fear of God are just those who will be most completely dominated by the fear of man.

SUBD. 3.

The parable of the marriage of the king's son is a parable of the Kingdom of heaven. Its subject, therefore, is not the response of Israel to God as under the law, or even to Christ come unto His own, as in that of the husbandmen. Responsibility as to the vineyard is no more in question, but as to the offer of grace made to them in the gospel after the Cross, and when the Spirit of God was in marvellous grace testifying through the apostles that upon their repentance there would still be for them the blotting out of their sins and the coming of times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, whom, though rejected, God would again send to them.* Not till after the definite rejection of this offer by Israel, does the message of the gospel go out to the Gentiles, as in the parable, which goes on to the end of this also, when the man that has not on a wedding garment is cast out. In this, too, the rejection of grace is figured, though here in one who might seem to have accepted it.

[1] We find the same parable in the gospel of Luke (chap. xiv. 16–24), but in briefer form, and without the dispensational character which is so manifest and appropriate in Matthew. In Luke it is simply a man who makes a feast: here it is the marriage-feast of a king's son. Marriage was in the Old Testament a familiar figure of covenant relationship between the people and their God; here with the Son of God—Messiah. The bride does not, however, come into the scene, but only those invited to the marriage, the joys and blessings of union being symbolized as a feast. The Jews are the already invited guests,

* Acts iii. 19-21. The Revised Version has here set right the strange error of the common one, which has "when the times of refreshing shall come," instead of "so that the times of refreshing may come."

Behold, I have [u]prepared my dinner; my oxen and fatted beasts are killed, and all things are ready: come unto the marriage.

[u] cf. ch. 4. 17. cf. Prov. 9. 2.

2 (5-7): Rejection on either side.

[2] But they made [v]light of it and went off, one to his field, another to his merchandise; and the rest laid hold upon his servants and ill-treated them and slew them. But the king was wroth, and sent his armies, and destroyed those murderers, and [w]burned up their city.

[v] cf. Gen. 19. 14.

[w] Lk. 19. 27.

3 (8-10): The wedding furnished.

[3] Then he saith unto his servants, The wedding indeed is ready, but those that were invited were not worthy: go out, therefore, into the [x]thoroughfares, and as many as ye shall find call to the marriage. And those servants went out into the highways, and gathered together as many as they found, both [y]bad and good; and the wedding was furnished with guests.

[x] cf. Acts 28. 28.

[y] cf. ch. 13. 47.

4 (11, 12): The failure still.

[4] And when the king came in to see the guests, he saw there a man that had not on a [z]wedding-garment. And he saith unto him, Friend, how camest thou in hither, having no wedding-garment? And he was [a]speechless.

[z] cf. Lk. 15. 22 with Phil. 3. 7, 9.

[a] cf. Rom. 3. 19.

but not till after atonement had been made in the sacrifice of the Cross could the message go forth, "I have prepared my dinner; my oxen and my fatlings are killed, and all things are now ready: come unto the marriage." Nothing is said of what the Cross is on the human side of it; we have only the result in divine grace; and that is "tidings of joy which shall be unto all people."

[2] The messengers go out with this, but only to find how little it is this to those to whom it is sent. Only the general result as to Israel is given, and this is rejection whether it be manifest simply in making light of it and going off to other things, or in harsher treatment of the messengers, even to putting them to death. This brings sure retribution: "the king sent forth his armies and destroyed those murderers and burned up their city." Israel is thus for the time being set aside,—left without priest or altar or sacrifice, as it is this day.

[3] But divine goodness will not be frustrated in this way; and through Israel's fall salvation comes to the Gentiles. The invited guests were not worthy: the servants of the king are sent out therefore into the public thoroughfares to invite all without restriction of any kind—the universal call of the gospel now. "Bad and good" are welcome alike: salvation is needed by the best, sufficient for the worst. The response is still not universal as the call is; but the vacant seats are nevertheless filled: the wedding is furnished with guests.

[4] But this, alas, is not yet the whole account. The Kingdom, as we have seen, in all these parabolic representations of it, in which the "mysteries" of it are told out,—the Kingdom while the King is absent and the administration in the hands of men—is in a mixed condition, the false found with the true; and needs in consequence that purging which when the King comes to take it into His own hands, it will surely receive. The gathering of the guests is on earth ideally, where of course, alone the confusion is, but even this is not stated, nor have we here any prophetic outline of final events. It is the awful fact alone that is put before us of what the end will reveal as to a class of which the man without a marriage garment is simply the representation. The coming of the King reveals them: a class which, with whatever profession, have not Christ, the precious gift of God's grace, and who alone is title and fitness for the eternal joy.

Whether the garment was a gift or not, and what it stands for, have been variously disputed. The circumstances of the case are sufficient proof that the multitude of invited could not be expected to have or to provide for themselves what would suit a royal feast. While the spiritual meaning can only be made

5 (13, 14): The recompense.

5 Then the king said unto his servants, Bind him foot and hand, and cast him out into the [b] outer darkness: there shall be the weeping and gnashing of teeth. For [c] many are called, but few chosen.

b ch. 8. 12. Rev. 22.15.

c ch. 20. 16. cf. Lk.12.32.

SUBDIVISION 4. (Chap. xxii. 15–46.)

Testing and tested.

1 (15-22): The claims of Cæsar and of God.

1. THEN the Pharisees went and took [d] counsel together how they might ensnare him in speech. And they sent to him their disciples with the [e] Herodians, saying, Teacher, we know that thou art [f] true, and teachest the way of God in truth, and carest not for any one, for thou regardest not the person of men. Tell us, therefore, what thinkest thou? is it lawful to give [g] tribute to Cæsar, or not?

d Lk. 20. 20.

e Mk. 12.13-17. Lk. 20. 21-26.

f cf. Jno.3.2.

g cf. Jno.11. 48. cf. Lk. 3. 1.

clear by the language of the gospel as we find it elsewhere. The "robe of righteousness" (Isa. lxi. 10) with which God covers His people, and which, though it be put upon a prodigal, is the "best robe" in the Father's house, is only susceptible of the most evangelic meaning. Christ is alone "made unto us righteousness" (1 Cor. i. 30), and as with the first God-given covering for the nakedness of sinful man, death it is that in His wonderful way has furnished it. That He is God's free gift to all who will receive Him, will strike dumb every one who appears at last before God without this.

5 Judgment follows. The refuser of Christ is really outside all the light of God by that very fact. He is but sent to his own place in the darkness outside the rejoicing in the house of God. There the awful sting of remorse must follow him: "there is the weeping and gnashing of teeth."

The last dread words here multiply this one man into a multitude indeed: "for many are called, but few chosen."

SUBD. 4.

Thus the Lord has made, and made good for Himself, the highest claim. He has searched out the hearts of His accusers, and summoned their consciences before Him, not in vain, though they have not yielded to their convictions. On the contrary we are now to find their whole strength massed against Him to try and remedy their desperate condition, and give Him, if possible, even yet an overthrow. For this Pharisees and Herodians combine together, and Sadducees seek to retrieve the lost battle of the Pharisees. But all is vain, and the leaders and factions among the people appear before Him only to receive severally specific judgment from Him, until He turns upon them at last with one decisive question which completely silences them all, and that with regard to the very claim which He is making. From that time they have but the one answer, in deeds, not words.

1. The Pharisees, who are all through the leaders, lead now in the attack. But they confess their fear in the subtlety with which they make it, sending their disciples instead of openly appearing themselves, and with them their adversaries the Herodians, with whom it would not be expected they could have collusion. Between them they would catch Him as between the opposite blades of shears; not with an argument either, but only a matter for His decision, as to which they can depend upon His entire and unfearing truthfulness, teaching the way of God in truth, and regarding not the person of men. "Tell us, therefore, what thinkest thou? is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar, or not?"

A dangerous question, however it were decided: whether to refuse it, under the iron heel of Rome as they were, or to yield it in the face of a people constantly fretting against the sign of their humiliation. Was He too, if indeed

But Jesus, [h] knowing their wickedness, said, Why tempt ye me, hypocrites? Show me the tribute-money. And they brought unto him a penny.* And he saith unto them, Whose is this [i] image and superscription? They say unto him, Cæsar's. Then saith he unto them, [j] Render then to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the [k] things that are God's. And when they heard it they marvelled, and left him, and went their way.

2 (23-33): Relationships hereafter and the Scripture testimony as to death.

2. On that day, there came unto him Sadducees, who say there is [l] no resurrection; and they asked him, saying, Teacher, [m] Moses said, if a man die, not having h Jno. 2. 25. Jno. 6. 64.

i cf. Dan. 2. 31-43 with Dan. 3. 1.
j cf. ch.17.24-27. cf.Rom.13. 7.
k cf. Is. 5. 7. cf.Mi.6.6-9.
l Mk. 12. 18-27. Lk. 20. 27-38. Acts 23. 8.
m Deut. 25. 5, 6. cf.Gen.38.8. cf .Ru. 4.5.

* "denarius."

their King, to bring them no deliverance? Would it not be the collapse of all His claims to leave a question of this sort even for a moment doubtful?

In reply, He assures them that their object was fully known to Him. They were hypocrites, only tempting Him; and yet for all that, they should have their answer; indeed should help to find it for themselves: let them show Him the tribute money. So they brought Him the Roman coin, and there was the image of Cæsar upon its face. "Whose is this?" He asks; and they say, "Cæsar's." "Render, then," He replies, "what is Cæsar's to Cæsar; and to God the things that are God's."

It is a mistake to consider this as simply settling the rights and distinguishing the jurisdictions of the civil and spiritual powers. It was the dominion of the Gentile over the people of God that was felt by the Pharisees,—a yoke under which they never would have come, had they rendered, as the Lord bids them, to God His own. It was the refusal of this which had put them into Cæsar's hands, and now to seek escape was only to refuse the chastisement of their sins, and thus was rebellion against God Himself.

The Gentile yoke had come as their father Jacob had long since prophesied. Issachar had become "like a strong ass, couching between the hurdles; and he saw rest that it was good, and the land that it was pleasant, and bowed his shoulder to bear and become servant to tribute" (Gen. xlix. 14, 15 Notes). Israel had accepted fellowship with the Gentile, and Cæsar's coin was only the sign of this. Gentile in heart and way, God had reckoned her where she belonged; but then she could not maintain an independence, which for her could only be another name for dependence on God. Let them give Cæsar his own; but let them give God His own also. When they really do this, there will be no question at all to settle as to Cæsar. Not by self-assertion, but by repentance only can deliverance come for them.

While the principle, of course, remains the same for the Christian, the case of the Christian is far different. He is not a citizen of earth, but a pilgrim and a stranger. He is to "render to all their due; tribute to whom tribute is due" (Rom. xiii. 1–7). For him, "the powers that be are ordained of God," and to "resist the power" would be to "resist the ordinance of God"; while this, of course, defines the limit also. If there be collision between the higher and the lower power, the apostles' rule, "We must obey God rather than men" (Acts v. 29) is the only real fulfilment of duty both to God and man. To render to man what belongs to God is evil every way.

Thus the first attack upon the Lord turns only to the confusion of His adversaries: "when they heard it, they marvelled and left Him, and went their way."

2. There follows now an attack on the part of the Sadducees, the unbelievers in resurrection, who had their question (more honest, as it would seem, than that of the Pharisees), though displaying, as the Lord tells them, ignorance both of the Scriptures and the power of God. But the Pharisees on their part had children, that his brother should marry his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother.

Now there were with us [n]seven brethren; and the first having married died, and, having no seed, left his wife unto his brother. In like manner, the second and the third, unto the seven. Last of all, the woman died also. In the resurrection, therefore, whose wife shall she be of the seven? for they all had her.

But Jesus answered and said unto them: Ye err; [o]not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God. For in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the [p]angels of God in heaven. But concerning the resurrection of the dead, have ye not read what was spoken to you by God, [q]saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. He is not the God of the dead, but of the living. And when the multitudes heard it, they were [r]astonished at his doctrine.

n cf. 1 Tim. 1. 4.

o cf. Jno.20. 9. cf. Acts 13. 27.

p cf. Phil. 3. 21. cf. 1 Jno.3. 2.

q Ex. 3.6,16. Acts 7. 32.

r ch.7.28,29.

done much to give occasion to such difficulties with regard to the future life as their opponents here suggest; perhaps, in spite even of the Lord's words here, we are not at the present time altogether beyond them.

Their question is as to the relationship in the resurrection of a woman who, according to the law in Deuteronomy (xxv. 5, 6), had married seven brethren. "In the resurrection, therefore, whose wife shall she be of the seven: for they all had her?"

The Lord answers their question first, and then rebukes the unbelief which had inspired it. The question He answers with a simple affirmation, in which He contradicts another article of their unbelieving creed,—that there were no angels (Acts xxiii. 8). It was sufficient to meet a mere argument from their ignorance with His own perfect knowledge. Angels there were, and in the resurrection the saints would be like these, neither marrying nor giving in marriage. They knew not the power of God, and could conceive of nothing else than a mere reproduction of earthly conditions. Their perplexity was but the fruit of their own carnal imaginations.

But as for the truth of resurrection, it underlay the very simplest assurance of God's covenant-relationship with men. The "dead" were for the Sadducees extinct, and the denial of any enduring personality was the natural root of the denial of resurrection. It is here, therefore, that the Lord meets them; for, if death be not extinction, but the spirit survives it, not only is all argument for extinction taken away, but this survival by itself implies that death is but a temporary interference with what creation shows to be God's thought of man, and may be perfected but cannot be abandoned. If man still continue to exist in death, then it is natural and reasonable that, whether for judgment or reward, the body should rise again.

Sadduceeism was thorough in its denial; and for the Sadducee "I am the God of Abraham," said to Moses at the bush, could be but mockery. Abraham was a shadow that had passed without even hope of recall. The God of a nonentity—what of comfort or blessing was in that? Could there be even such?

It was by that title, the "God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob," and as that "I am," who had looked upon and had respect unto His people, that God had sent forth Moses from "the bush" to be their deliverer. Sadduceeism never could have been the gospel of that deliverance, nor the inspiration of it. A living God in covenant with men meant life, not death; and if death were, then a life supreme above it. Thus resurrection was the necessary filling out of such a declaration: the hand that God held out to man was not to clasp the listless fingers of a corpse.

3 (34-40): The heart of the law.

3. But when the Pharisees heard that he had put the Sadducees to silence, they were gathered together. And one of them, a lawyer, asked him, tempting him, Teacher, which is the [s]great commandment in the law? And he said unto him, Thou shalt [t]love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the great and first commandment.

And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy [u]neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hangeth the [v]whole law, and the prophets.

4 (41-46): The testers tested.

4. And when the Pharisees were gathered together, Jesus [w]asked them, saying, [x]What think ye of Christ? Whose son is he? They say unto him, [y]David's. He saith unto them, How then doth David in Spirit call him Lord, [z]saying, The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, until I put thine enemies beneath thy feet? If David, then, call him Lord, [a]how is he his son?

And no one was [b]able to answer him a word, neither did any one from that day dare to ask him further.

s cf. ch. 5. 17-20. Mk. 12. 28-34.
t Lk. 10. 25-27. Deut. 6. 5. Deut. 10. 12. u Lev. 19. 18. ch. 19. 19. Rom. 13. 9. Jas. 2. 8. 1 Jno. 4. 20.
v Gal. 5. 14. cf. 1 Cor. 13. 1-3, 13.
w cf. ch. 21. 24.
x Mk. 12. 35-37. Lk. 20. 41-44. cf. Acts 2. 22-28.
y cf. 2 Sam. 7. 12-14.
z Ps. 110. 1. Acts 2. 34. Heb. 1. 13. Heb. 10. 12, 13.
a cf. Jno. 1. 14.

cf. Rom. 1. 3, 4. b cf. Lk. 14. 6; cf. Jno. 18. 6.

3. So the Pharisees hear that He has put the Sadducees to silence, and they are gathered together; not, alas, to own His divine wisdom, but to "tempt" Him yet again. Still there has been an effect produced, as Mark tells us, upon the questioner, and some better thing is hidden under the test question he proposes. Matthew takes no note of this because he is occupied with the position of the nation as a whole with regard to the Lord, and the state of the individual does not indicate this.

The question is, "which is the great commandment of the law?" The answer shows what is the heart of it, the life-pulse beating through it all. Alas, that this should be a question. The apostle answers it afterward in a similar manner to the Lord here.—"love is the fulfilling"—or, the fullness—"of the law" (Rom. xiii. 10). God claims heart and soul and mind; but then, on that very account, man as the image of God must come in under it. Thus the second commandment is like unto the first: that commandment which they were so manifestly breaking. Nay, here was the Image of God indeed; and in Him they had seen and hated both Himself and His Father (John xv. 24).

But He adds no word of reproach; only enlarges upon the central place which these two commandments had, not in the law only, but also in the prophets: wherever, therefore, the mind of God was expressed. All, in fact, depended upon them there: they were the moral unity manifested in all.

4. And now the Lord appeals to them as they are gathered there before Him as to that which was now for them the question of questions: what do they think of Christ? "whose son is He?" To that they readily reply, "The son of David." This was the truth, and they knew He would not deny it: it was in fact a question which any child among them could have answered.

He did not deny it: it was truth, but was it the whole truth? "How then," He asks, "does David in Spirit call Him 'Lord,' saying, 'The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit Thou on My right hand until I put thine enemies beneath thy feet'? If David, then, call Him Lord, how is He his Son?"

The argument was complete and crushing, and so they felt it.* "No one was able to answer Him a word, nor from that day did any one dare to ask Him further."

* It "proceeded, of course," says Edersheim, "on the two-fold supposition that the psalm (cx.) was Davidic, and that it was Messianic. Neither of these statements would have been

SUBDIVISION 5. (Chap. xxiii.)

Judgment pronounced.

1 (1-12): Barren profession in Moses' seat.

1 (1-7): the rule of the rabbi.

1. [1] THEN spake Jesus unto the multitudes and to his disciples, saying, The scribes and the Pharisees have [c]set themselves down in Moses' seat: all things, therefore, that they bid you, do and keep; but do not after their works, for they say and do not. And they bind [d]heavy burdens and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders; but they themselves will not move them with their finger. But all their works they

c Lev.10.11. Mal. 2.7,8. Rom. 2.19-22.

d Lk. 11. 46. Acts 15.10.

SUBD. 5.

They are silenced, but not won. The human heart is a citadel that can entrench itself against the clearest evidence; and the conscience can harden itself by repeated rejection of the truth, until light be as darkness. Thus it is now that He who would (how often!) have gathered the children of Jerusalem, as a hen gathers her brood under her wings, is forced to give them up to the avenger soon to come. Israel is doomed, and the lips of divine love have to pronounce her doom, until she shall say in truth and penitence, "Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord."

But the terrible denunciation that follows is rather against the leaders that have misled her to her ruin, though the blind leaders and the led fall together into it. From the necessity of the case, the judgment pronounced is given in the most open manner in the presence of the multitude, preceded by that picture of the rule of the rabbi, which could not but appeal to the experience of all who heard it. Yet it left them under it, of their own choice.

1. [1] The scribes and Pharisees had set themselves down in Moses' seat. It was their own act, and yet could not be looked upon wholly as a usurpation. An earnest zeal for the law of God in opposition to prevailing laxity had put them originally in the place that they now occupied. Degeneration had come in, and they had fallen from the ancient spirit while retaining the place,—a place in which the Lord evidently recognizes them here, while recognizing fully also the degeneracy. They were now mere barren professors, contradicting their profession with their lives; while the rule of the rabbi was a tyranny of the severest kind, binding upon men's shoulders burdens grievous to be borne—a growing oppression, more and more intolerable, and never lightened.

"Rabbinism placed the ordinances of tradition above those of the Law, and this by a necessity of the system, since they were professedly the authoritative exposition and the supplement of the written law. And although it was a general rule that no ordinance should be enjoined heavier than the congregation could bear, yet it was admitted that, whereas the words of the Law contained what 'lightened,' and what 'made heavy,' the words of the scribes contained only what 'made heavy.' Again it was another principle that where an 'aggravation' or increase of the burden had once been introduced, it must continue to be observed."* Well might the Lord say, that they would not put forth even a finger to move the intolerable load.

---

questioned by the Synagogue. But we could not rest satisfied with the explanation that this sufficed for the purpose of Christ's argument, if the foundation on which it rested could be seriously called in question. Such, however, is not the case. To apply Ps. cx., verse by verse and consistently, to any one of the Maccabees, were to undertake a critical task which only a series of unnatural explanations of the language could render possible. Strange, also, that such an interpretation of what at the time of Christ would have been a comparatively young composition, should have been wholly unknown alike to Sadducee and Pharisee. For our own part, we are content to rest the Messianic interpretation on the obvious and natural meaning of the words taken in connection with the general teaching of the Old Testament about the Messiah, on the undoubted interpretation of the ancient Jewish synagogue, on the authority of Christ, and on the testimony of history." (Life and Times of Jesus, vol. ii. 405.)

* Edersheim, vol. ii. p. 407.

do to [e]be seen of men: for they make broad their phylacteries and enlarge the borders [of their garments],* and love the [f]chief place at feasts, and the chief seats in the synagogues, and greetings in the markets, and to be called of men Rabbi.

2 (8-12): the disciples in contrast.

[2] But be not [g]ye called Rabbi: for one is your teacher, and all ye are brethren. And call not [any] your father upon earth: for [h]one is your Father, who is heavenly. Nor be ye called leaders: for [i]one is your [e] ch. 6.1,2,5, 16. Rom. 2. 28.

[f] Mk. 12. 38, 39. Lk. 11. 43. Lk. 20. 46.
[g] Jas. 3. 1. cf. 1Cor.3,5.
[h] ch. 6. 9. Mal. 1. 6.
[i] ver. 9. Jno. 13. 13.

* Some omit.

With the people all this, of course, increased their power; and power and place was what they were constantly seeking. Thus they made broad the 'phylacteries' or parchment strips in which they strove after their peculiar manner to have the law in the most literal way as "frontlets between the eyes" (Deut. vi. 8)*; while the actually enjoined tasselled "borders" (Num. xv. 38) they enlarged, to make them conspicuous, as the Lord reproaches them. Naturally with this there was the love of conspicuous places also, at feasts and in the synagogues, and of greetings in the markets in which they were to be accosted as Rabbi, with all due respect.

[2] Such were the Jewish leaders: among the disciples Jesus enjoins them that such things were not to be. They were not to be called Rabbi, but to be all brethren, with Christ alone their real Teacher. There was to be no authority among them but His own; no claim of spiritual fatherhood but for the Heavenly Father; nor of leadership, again, for any but Christ. The "leader" here (καθηγητης) is more than teacher: he is the teacher who may have many teachers under him. All this, as it plainly calls for most serious attention on the part of all who call Christ Lord in truth, so also it needs wisdom in the application: for all these terms, "teacher," "father," "leader,†" are applied in Scripture itself to disciples, and cannot be meant, therefore, to be in an absolute way forbidden. But it was in Israel then, as it has come to be so largely in the Christian Church to-day, that those who should have been the servants of their brethren claimed to be masters, and stood between the consciences of men and Him who is alone the Lord of the conscience. Neither the Church as a whole nor any class of men in it can claim aright authoritative place for their teaching, which Scripture alone (as the word of the Lord) has; and yet this is what, with many modifications, is continually being done, and the people of God also are on their side not merely allowing but prompting the claim. In this way the word of God loses irreparably; it is made plastic in the hands of men; and, dethroned from its place of authority, it becomes subject to the reproach which attaches to all human handiwork: infidelity finds its own in this degradation. The louder and more authoritative the Church's voice, the more that of God through His word becomes silenced and unheard.

But how different is the "ministry" which is really that, which seeks no lordship for itself, and no authority, but, like the Baptist of old, points only to that Other, in whose presence it stands self-emptied, because filled, satisfied, glorified with the light, unseen of the world, into which it has entered! True, it will not lead men universally to faith, which Christ's own presence in it was not able to do; yet the faith to which it brings men will be how different! But it is not of this the Lord speaks here. He carries us back instead to that glimpse

* They were "square capsules, covered with leather, containing on small scrolls of parchment these four sections of the law: Ex. xiii. 1-10; 11-16; Deut. vi. 4-9; xi. 13-21. The phylacteries were fastened by long leather straps to the forehead, and round the left arm, near the heart."

